

THE ESSENTIAL WORKS OF THOMAS MORE

Edited by Gerard B. Wegemer and Stephen W. Smith

THOMAS MORE'S LONDON

Charterhouse

St. Mary Spital Hospital

St. Bartholomew's Hospital

Bedlam

Greyfriars

Guildhall

Birthplace

Paul's Cross

St. Lawrence Jewry

Mercer's Hall

St. Anthony's School

Grosby Place

St. Paul's Cathedral

Paul's Head Tavern

The Barge

St. Stephen Walbrook

Minories Convent

Tower Hill

Old Swans Wharf

London Bridge

Botolph's Wharf

Tower of London

All Hallows Church

Winchester House

Marshalsea Prison

St. Thomas's Hospital

Greenwich Palace (5 miles)

THE ESSENTIAL WORKS OF THOMAS MORE

THE ESSENTIAL WORKS OF
THOMAS MORE

Edited by Gerard B. Wegemer and Stephen W. Smith

Yale UNIVERSITY PRESS

New Haven and London

Published with support from the Fund established in memory of Oliver Baty Cunningham, a distinguished graduate of the Class of 1917, Yale College, Captain, 15th United States Field Artillery, born in Chicago September 17, 1894, and killed while on active duty near Thiaucourt, France, September 17, 1918, the twenty-fourth anniversary of his birth.

Copyright © 2020 by Gerard B. Wegemer and Stephen W. Smith. All rights reserved.

This book may not be reproduced, in whole or in part, including the illustrations, in any form (beyond the copying permitted by Sections 107 and 108 of the U.S. Copyright Law and except by reviewers for the public press), without written permission from the publishers.

Yale University Press books may be purchased in quantity for educational, business, or promotional use. For information, please e-mail sales.press@yale.edu (U.S. office) or sales@yaleup.co.uk (U.K. office).

Designed by Gregg Chase.
Set by Julie Allred in Garamond Premier Pro customized by Charles Ellertson.
Printed in the United States of America.

Library of Congress Control Number:
2019933373 ISBN 978-0-300-22337-8 (hardcover :
alk. paper)

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

This paper meets the requirements of ANSI/NISO Z39.48-1992 (Permanence of Paper).

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Frontispiece: Thomas More (2013), bronze, 8', by Pablo Eduardo, Boston College Law School. He has The City of God and Utopia in one hand and a palm branch in the other as he faces rising winds.

To the more than thirty editors and translators and the many dedicated members of Yale University Press who worked thirty-nine years (1958–1997) to produce The Yale Edition of the Complete Works of St. Thomas More, guided by Executive Editors Richard S. Sylvester and Clarence H. Miller and Editorial Board Chair Louis L. Martz—collaborative international scholarship at its best; and to Germain Marc’hadour, CW advisor and editor as well as founding editor of Moreana, who traveled the world for almost fifty years fostering that international collaboration.

This page intentionally left blank

CONTENTS

Map of London . . . . . Inside front cover List of Illustrations . . . . . ix General Preface . . . . . xiii Abbreviations . . . . . xix Chronology . . . . . xxi ENGLISH POETRY . . . . . 1 LUCIAN DIALOGUES AND DECLAMATIONS . . . . . 17 THE LIFE OF JOHN PICO . . . . . 61 THE HISTORY OF KING RICHARD III . . . . . 95 (Latin text: www.essentialmore.org) UTOPIA . . . . . 141 (Latin text: www.essentialmore.org) EPIGRAMS . . . . . 217 (Latin text: www.essentialmore.org) LETTERS: 1501 TO MARCH 1534 . . . . . 265 LETTERS: ON HUMANISM, 1505–20. . . . . 389 THE FOUR LAST THINGS . . . . . 473 A RESPONSE TO LUTHER (Selections) . . . . . 503 (Full text: www.essentialmore.org) A DIALOGUE OF SIR THOMAS MORE, KNIGHT (Dialogue Concerning Heresies) . . . . . 525 THE SUPPLICATION OF SOULS . . . . . 735 THE CONFUTATION OF TYNDALE’S ANSWER (Selections) . . . . . 795 (Full text: www.essentialmore.org)	THE APOLOGY OF SIR THOMAS MORE, KNIGHT . . . . . 817 THE DEBELLATION OF SALEM AND BIZANCE (Selections) . . . . . 905 (Full text: www.essentialmore.org) THE ANSWER TO A POISONED BOOK . . . . . 915 A TREATISE UPON THE PASSION OF CHRIST . . . . . 1025 A TREATISE TO RECEIVE THE BLESSED BODY. . . . . 1101 A DIALOGUE OF COMFORT . . . . . 1107 THE SADNESS OF CHRIST. . . . . 1249 LETTERS: PRISON YEARS, 1534–35 . . . . . 1303 INSTRUCTIONS, MEDITATIONS, AND PRAYERS . . . . . 1337 THOMAS MORE’S TRIAL RECONSTRUCTED . . . . . 1353 EARLIEST BIOGRAPHICAL ACCOUNTS AND COLLECTED EDITIONS . . . . . 1367 Online Resources . . . . . 1469 Writings of Thomas More . . . . . Inside back cover Selective Glossary . . . . . Inside back cover PLATES FOLLOW PAGE 734
--	--

This page intentionally left blank

ILLUSTRATIONS

cover: Sir Thomas More, detail, Hans Holbein the Younger, 1527, © The Frick Collection, New York

front endpapers: Thomas More's London, © 2018 by Michael Hall

frontispiece: Thomas More, 2013, sculpture by Pablo Eduardo, Boston College Law School;

photo by J. F. Keefe, © CTMS

ILLUSTRATIONS IN THE TEXT

- |   |  |
|---|--|
| xvi, 1470–72 Autograph, Thomas More to Henry VIII (5 March &lt;1534&gt;), © 2018 British Library Board, MS Cleop E.VI, f176–f177 6 Mery Gest (London, 1516), title page, Huntington Library 19 Luciani opuscula (Paris: Ascensius, 1506), title page of first edition, Houghton Library, Harvard University 60 The Life of Pico in Workes of Sir Thomas More (London, 1557), page 1, Beinecke Library,* Yale 98 Holinsbed's Chronicles (London, 1587), p. 732, Folger Shakespeare Library 139 Opera omnia Thomae Mori (Louvain, 1566), 51v, 52r, Dean and Chapter of Canterbury Cathedral and Library 140 Register of Doctors' Commons (1514), MS s.r.136, f. 18v, Lambeth Palace Library 144 Utopia title page by Ambrosius Holbein (Basil: Froben, March 1518), Amici Thomae Mori 149–50 Utopia map by Ambrosius Holbein and Utopian alphabet, Utopia (Basil: Froben, March 1518), Amici Thomae Mori 153 Preface title page, border by Hans Holbein the Younger, Utopia (Basil: Froben, March 1518), Amici Thomae Mori 156 Garden scene by Ambrosius Holbein, Utopia (Basil: Froben, March 1518), Amici Thomae Mori 216 Serpent-and-dove design by Hans Holbein the Younger, last page of Utopia (Basil: Froben, March 1518), Amici Thomae Mori | 218 Epigrams, title page border by Hans Holbein the Younger, in Utopia (Basil: Froben, March 1518), Amici Thomae Mori 264 Chelsea Manor of Sir Thomas More, © 2018 by Michael Hall 373 Tomb of Thomas More, Chelsea Old Church; photo © Frank Mitjans 388 Triumph of Humanitas by Urs Graf, Senecae lucubrations (Basil: Froben, 1515), frontispiece, © 2018 British Library Board, 524.i.7 475–76 De quatuor nouissimis in Workes of Sir Thomas More (London, 1557), pages 72, 75, Beinecke Library,* Yale 524 A dyaloge of Syr Thomas More knyght (London: Rastell, 1529), first edition, title page, Folger Shakespeare Library 734 Sir Thomas More, 1969, sculpture by L. Cubitt Bevis, Chelsea, London, photo by Thomas Heyne, © CTMS 794 Confutation of Tyndale's Answer (London: Rastell, 1532), first edition, sig. l<sub>4</sub>v, Beinecke Library,* Yale 816 Treatise concernynge the Division (London: Berthelet, 1532), title page, Beinecke Library,* Yale 818 The Apologye of Syr Thomas More, Knight (London: Rastell, 1533), sig. H<sub>1</sub>v, Beinecke Library, Yale 906 Salem and Bizance (London: Berthelet, 1533), title page and p. ii, © British Library Board, c21b47 916 Answer to a Poisoned Book (London: Rastell, 1533[4]), title page and sig. E<sub>3</sub>, Folger Shakespeare Library |
|---|--|

*All of the Beinecke images are from the General Collection of the Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library at Yale University.

- 1110 Verso of title page and etching of Thomas More in A Dialogue of Comfort (London: John Fowler, 1573), Huntington Library
- 1250, 1302 De tristitia Christi, fols. 76 and 66 of Valencia MS, Royal College and Seminary of Corpus Christi, Valencia
- 1304 Margaret Roper's oath, side gloss of p. 1441, Workes of Sir Thomas More (London, 1557), Beinecke Library,* Yale
- 1336, 1338 More Book of Hours, sig. c1 (fol. xvii) and sig. d1v (fol. xxv<sup>v</sup>), Beinecke Library,* Yale
- 1341 More Psalter, sig. a3 (fol. iii) and sig. a4 (fol. iiiii), Beinecke Library,* Yale
- 1352 "Remembrances" of Thomas Cromwell, June 1535, © British Library Board, MS Cotton Titus B. I f475r
- 1368 Desiderius Erasmus, Quentin Matsys, detail, 1517, Royal Collection Trust / © Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II 2018
- 1391 The Life of Syr Thomas More Knight, William Roper (Paris, 1626) title page, Beinecke Library,* Yale
- 1417–19 Workes of Sir Thomas More (London, 1557), title page and dedicatory epistle, Beinecke Library,* Yale
- 1420 Life and Death of Sir Thomas More, N. Harpsfield, fols. [5]<sup>r</sup>–[6]<sup>r</sup>, 24a, Emmanuel College, Cambridge
- 1421 Acts and Monuments, John Foxe (London, 1563, 1570, 1576, 1583), title page
- 1422 Thomae Mori lucubrationes, (Basil, 1563), title page, Beinecke Library,* Yale
- 1423 Thomae Mori opera omnia (Louvain, 1565), title page, Beinecke Library,* Yale
- 1424 Tres Thomae, Thomas Stapleton (Douai: Bogardi, 1588), title page, Beinecke Library,* Yale
- 1438 The Booke of Sir Thomas Moore, Addition 2, Hand D, © British Library Board, Harley 73682C f9r

PLATES

- 1 Sir Thomas More, Hans Holbein the Younger, 1526–27, RL 12225, Royal Collection Trust / © Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II 2018
- 2 Sir Thomas More, Hans Holbein the Younger, 1526–27, RL 12268, Royal Collection Trust / © Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II 2018
- 3 Sir Thomas More, Hans Holbein the Younger, 1527, © The Frick Collection, New York
- 4a Design for the More Family Group, Hans Holbein the Younger, 1526–27, Kunstmuseum Basel
- 4b The Family of Sir Thomas More. Attributed to Hans Holbein the Younger and to Rowland Lockey, ca. 1530 and 1593, Winn Family, on loan to the National Trust. Hangs at Nostell Priory Wakefield (The National Trust Photographic Library)
- 5a Elizabeth Dauncey, detail of 4b, The Family of Sir Thomas More
- 5b Cecily Heron-More and Margaret Roper-More, detail of 4b, The Family of Sir Thomas More
- 5c Thomas More II, Cresacre More, Maria More-Scrope, detail of Sir Thomas More and Family, Rowland Lockey, 1593–94, © Victoria and Albert Museum, London
- 6a, 6b, 6c, 6d, 7a, 7b Sir John More, Elizabeth Dauncey, John More, Cecily Heron, Anne Cresacre, Margaret Giggs, Hans Holbein the Younger, 1526–27, RL 12224, 12228, 12226, 12269, 12270, 12229, Royal Collection Trust / © Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II 2018
- 7c Lady Alice More, detail of 4b, The Family of Sir Thomas More
- 7d Self-portrait, Hans Holbein the Younger, 1542–43, Uffizi, Florence, © Scala / Art Resource, NY
- 8a Margaret Roper, miniature, Hans Holbein the Younger, ca. 1536, © The Metropolitan Museum of Art, Image source: Art Resource, NY
- 8b William Roper, miniature, Hans Holbein the Younger, ca. 1536, © The Metropolitan Museum of Art, Image source: Art Resource, NY

- 8c Young Teacher at a Lectern, woodcut in Erasmus's A deuoute treatise vpon the Pater noster, 1531, © British Library Board, c.37.e.6(1) fAlr
- 8d King Richard III, unknown artist, late sixteenth century, © National Portrait Gallery, London
- 9a Queen Elizabeth of York, unknown artist, late sixteenth century, © National Portrait Gallery, London
- 9b King Henry VII, unknown artist, 1505, © National Portrait Gallery, London
- 9c Desiderius Erasmus, Quentin Matsys, 1517, Royal Collection Trust / © Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II 2018
- 9d Peter Giles, Quentin Matsys, 1517, Photographic Survey, Courtauld Institute of Art, Longford Castle Collection
- 10a Thomas Wolsey, unknown artist, 1589–95, © National Portrait Gallery, London
- 10b Thomas Cromwell, Hans Holbein the Younger, 1532–33, oil on panel, © The Frick Collection
- 10c Cuthbert Tunstall, unknown artist, ca. 1540, courtesy of the Auckland Project / The Church Commissioners
- 10d William Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, Hans Holbein the Younger, ca. 1527, Musée du Louvre, Paris, © RMN-Grand Palais / Art Resource, NY
- 11a John Fisher, detail, stained glass window, St. Dunstan's Church, Canterbury, photo by Thomas Heyne, © CTMS
- 11b Martin Luther, Lucas Cranach the Elder, 1529, St. Anne's Church, Augsburg
- 11c William Tyndale, unknown painter, ca. 1540s, © National Portrait Gallery, London
- 11d Thomas Cranmer, Gerlach Flicke, 1545–46, © National Portrait Gallery, London
- 12–13 The Field of the Cloth of Gold, unknown artist, ca. 1545, Hampton Court, Royal Collection Trust / © Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II 2018
- 14 Henry VIII in Parliament, 1523, watercolor with gold leaf, Wriothesley Garter Book, Windsor Castle, MS 1114, Royal Collection Trust / © Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II 2018
- 15 Sir Thomas More Refusing to Grant Wolsey a Subsidy 1523, Oil painting by Vivian Forbes, © Parliamentary Art Collection, WOA 2596, www.parliament.uk/art
- 16 The Tudors, 1667, unknown artist, copy of the 1537 mural by Hans Holbein the Younger, Royal Collection Trust / © Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II 2018
- 17 The Ambassadors, Hans Holbein the Younger, 1533, © The National Gallery, London
- 18a Catherine of Aragon, unknown artist, © National Portrait Gallery, London
- 18b Anne Boleyn, unknown artist, Royal Collection Trust / © Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II 2018
- 18c John Colet, Hans Holbein the Younger, Royal Collection Trust / © Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II 2018
- 18d John Houghton, unknown sculptor, London, St. Etheldreda's Church, photo by Thomas Heyne, © CTMS
- 19a John Morton, carved sarcophagus, Canterbury Cathedral, photo by Thomas Heyne, © CTMS
- 19b Thomas Howard, 3rd Duke of Norfolk, Hans Holbein the Younger, 1538–39, Windsor Castle, Royal Collection Trust / © Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II 2018
- 19c William Grocyn, stained glass window, St. Lawrence Jewry Church, London, photo by Thomas Heyne, © CTMS
- 19d Thomas Linacre, an 1810 copy by William Miller, original at Windsor Castle, Royal Collection Trust / © Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II 2018
- 20a Thomas More's Bell Tower cell, Tower of London, photo by Nicholas Wignall, © CTMS
- 20b Thomas More on His Way to Execution, school of Hans Holbein the Younger, private collection, © Christie's Images / Bridgeman Images
- 20c Carthusians' Execution at Tyburn, unknown artist, 1555, London Metropolitan Archives

This page intentionally left blank

GENERAL PREFACE

A distinguished lawyer and judge and the first major author of early modern England, Sir Thomas More (1478–1535) wrote in poetry and prose, in Latin and English, throughout a lifetime of no little fame and still lingering controversy. Called both “a man for all seasons” and “Master Mock” during his career, and likened to Cicero and Socrates after his death, Thomas More was executed for high treason on July 6, 1535, following a historic trial. In the 1540s, Tudor historian Edward Hall wondered over More. “I cannot tell,” he wrote frankly, “whether I should call him a foolish wise man, or a wise foolish man,” especially when he considered the spectacle of More’s death. While conversation and dialogue will no doubt continue over his writings, life, and legacy, one necessary means for advancing these labors remains a better knowledge of More’s varied and voluminous writings in poetry, history, literature, law, theology, and contemporary controversies.

The Essential Works of Thomas More gathers together — for the first time in a one-volume standardized edition — More’s writings in poetry and prose from his Latin and English works. The only other one-volume editions of More date from earlier centuries, and focus on either his English or Latin compositions. William Rastell’s 1557 folio edition, The Workes of Sir Thomas More Knight, was published in London during the reign of Queen Mary and gathered together principally More’s English writings, while the Opera omnia, published in Louvain in 1565 and 1566, collected and presented his Latin writings to the wider European audience. A later one-volume Latin edition would follow in the seventeenth century, and Rastell’s edition of the English works would be reprinted in the twentieth century, but only in its original “blackletter” Gothic script, an impediment for many contemporary readers.

The Essential Works offers those texts considered necessary for a general view and understanding of More, presented in modernized English and with updated glosses, based on recent scholarly advances and made after the model of today’s single-volume editions of William Shakespeare and other major authors. In publishing The Essential Works, we hope to facilitate the study of More’s place in the early modern period by providing the reader with those texts and other helps that prove essential for a clearer understanding of More’s complex life and works.

A reliable single volume of More’s essential writings has become possible because of the Yale University Press’s critical edition of The Complete Works of Saint Thomas More. Yale’s model project of international scholarship and collaboration, The Complete Works involved the work of twenty-five scholars from 1963 to 1997 and totaled twenty-one books in its fifteen-volume set. The Essential Works is profoundly indebted to the labors of these editors and scholars and includes many fruits of the Yale critical edition, presenting them to contemporary readers with the help needed for a closer encounter with More’s early sixteenth-century writings. This type of project was envisioned by the founders and editors of Yale’s Complete Works, who began what they called “modernized” editions of More’s works. That useful but incomplete series included More’s Selected Letters (1961), Utopia (1964), The History of King Richard III and Selections from the English and Latin Poems (1976), A Dialogue of Comfort against Tribulation (1977), and The Tower Works (1980). The Essential Works of Thomas More aims to build upon and continue that work by presenting Thomas More anew to the great variety of readers and scholars interested in his life and writings, and in this remarkable historical period.

More’s writings are presented chronologically, with brief introductions, content outlines, relevant images, and glosses, all of which seek to assist the reader and facilitate careful study; in preparing the edition, we have had particularly in mind those for whom More’s works are less familiar, but who nevertheless wish to make a solid beginning of studying his writings. This edition endeavors to present a comprehensive More to the contemporary reader, as fully as limitations of space and wit allow.

To provide this fuller view, a detailed chronology situates More’s life and writings in their historical, social, and intellectual contexts. A reconstructed version of More’s fateful trial is also included, based on the most recent scholarship, as well as texts of the relevant legal acts and oaths. The Essential

Works is rounded off by an illuminating selection of the earliest biographical accounts of More, mostly from those contemporaries who witnessed him in action, in one form or another: his humanist friend, Erasmus; his son-in-law, William Roper; his rival in theological controversy, William Tyndale; the court historian, Edward Hall; the anonymous author of the Paris Newsletter account of his trial and death; and fellow humanist and later polemicist Reginald Pole. This final section also includes the full text of Sir Thomas More, the first dramatic depiction of More's life, written by a group of London dramatists, including William Shakespeare.

On Editing Thomas More's English. More's English texts have been edited and standardized in spelling and punctuation, per modern usage, but with exceptions made on occasion for his poetry. While original spelling and punctuation remain indispensable and illuminating, we follow the lead of other editors of one-volume editions of major authors (e.g., Shakespeare and Milton) and present to readers a modern More. (See the "Note on This Edition" at the end of this preface, for some detail.) We do, however, reference Yale's critical editions on most pages to facilitate further study and cross referencing.

Glosses are provided throughout The Essential Works for both the Latin and English works. Our authority for English glosses is the second edition of the Oxford English Dictionary. English glosses are rendered as concisely as possible; the nuances, valences, and subtleties of More's English are suggested within reason. We gloss obsolete and archaic words, as well as syntactical and morphological archaisms. We also gloss historical references, as well as intertextual references, when they are explicit, clear, or important. Of the making of glosses there is no ending; we can only hope to have achieved a thorough yet tempered approach, one especially helpful for less experienced readers of sixteenth-century literature and English.

One page from a letter to King Henry VIII, in More's own hand (see page xvi), gives the reader some sense of the challenges involved in editing More's English. In The Essential Works, punctuation is edited to clarify syntax while respecting More's style as much as possible. Some Moreanisms have been retained, such as comma-less serial adjectives in phrases like "a seely rude roaring ass" or "Christ's dear bitter passion."

One prominent editorial change, especially in the English dialogues, is the replacement of More's virgule — the mark "/" — with modern punctuation. The following selection gives the reader some sense of the difference between the original punctuation with virgules and the standardized, modern punctuation used in this edition:

while the thing shall not apere so terrible vnto them / reason shall better entre, & thorow grace workyng with their diligens / engendre & set sure, not a sodayne sleyght affection of sufferance for godes sake / but by a long contynuaunce, a strong depe rotid habit. (CW 12: 205)

while the thing shall not appear so terrible unto them — reason shall better enter, and, through grace working with their diligence, engender and set sure not a sudden slight affection of sufferance for God's sake, but, by a long continuance, a strong deep-rooted habit.

Proper names are standardized in spelling and always capitalized. For recognizable historical personages, literary characters, places, battles, and so on, the spelling used is the standard (first-listed) spelling given in The Oxford Dictionary of National Biography and Contemporaries of Erasmus: A Biographical Register of the Renaissance and Reformation.

Nouns which refer to God, such as "Maker, Creator, Redeemer, etc.," titles of Jesus and Mary, royal and noble honorifics, and the word "Church" (when it does not refer to a building) are capitalized. For example, in Richard III, King Edward IV is called "his Highness"; Bishop Morton, "your Grace"; and Christ, "our Lord." The titles of secular and ecclesiastical offices as well as references to current holders of those offices are also capitalized, so that Morton was made "Archbishop of Canterbury and Chancellor of England, whereunto the Pope joined the honor of Cardinal," and in Letter 200 (for example) the following phrases appear: "my Lord Chancellor," "the King's Highness," "my Lord of Canterbury," and "the King's Grace."

Quotations in Latin are italicized, often followed by More's own translation given in parentheses and enclosed in quotation marks, as in this example from his Dialogue of Comfort:

For as Saint James saith, Omne datum optimum, et omne donum perfectum, de sursum est, descendens

a Patre luminum (“Every good gift, and every perfect gift, is given from above, descending from the Father of lights”).

By editing and glossing More’s English in these ways, the hope is to facilitate the reader’s encounter with More’s mind, art, and wit. The precise cross-referencing to The Complete Works throughout this edition is done so that interested readers may easily refer to the Yale critical edition texts with original spelling and punctuation, along with their notes and commentaries, to which we are also indebted.

On Translations from More’s Latin. For More’s Latin writings, the Yale Complete Works translations have generally been used, but with several exceptions. An English translation of More’s Latin translations of Lucian’s dialogues was sorely needed because the translations provided in the Yale critical edition are from the Loeb Classical Library edition of Lucian, and are not translations of More’s striking Latin. For Utopia, we offer Clarence Miller’s astute translation from the Yale Nota Bene series. For the remaining Latin writings (the Epigrams, the humanist letters, the selections from Response to Luther, and the Sadness of Christ), we use the translations from the Yale critical editions. Translations for many of the other letters are from Yale’s St. Thomas More: Selected Letters, supplemented by additional translations, as noted in the contents page for each section. Erasmus’s letters and comments on More are drawn from the Toronto edition of his complete works, except for the letter to John Faber, which we present in a new translation.

On Complete Texts versus Selections. As much as possible, complete texts have been chosen, but for reasons of space, selections are sometimes offered: for two of the controversial works—the long Response to Luther and the massive Confutation of Tyndale’s Answer—only representative selections are given; for More’s exchange with the legal scholar Christopher St. German, the complete Apology of Sir Thomas More, Knight is provided, but not the complete text of More’s follow-up response to St. German, The Debellation of Salem and Bizance. Standardized versions of Confutation and Debellation are, however, available as online resources at www.essentialmore.org, along with the full text of Responsio ad Lutherum.

On More’s Correspondence. More’s wide-ranging correspondence is presented in three separate sections: (1) his general correspondence, dating from 1501 to 1534, the year of his arrest and imprisonment; (2) his “humanist letters,” often treatise-like in length and more public in character; and (3) his prison letters, dating from 1534 to the week of his death in July 1535. Considered together, the correspondence provides the reader with a valuable window into More’s mind, his keen sense of rhetoric and truth, and all the little particularities of his times, friends, family, and associates. As much of More’s “essential” correspondence as possible has been included since the two-part volume that the Yale Complete Works planned for his correspondence has not yet been done—a much needed labor for the future to contemplate and undertake, one hopes.

A wealth of materials and tools for further study of Thomas More and his time is also available online at www.essentialmore.org. This website includes texts from More in English and Latin, a library of supporting historical documents and images, study guides, and links to the complete International Thomas More Bibliography, maintained by Romuald Lakowski. Specially useful are complete concordances for both the English and Latin works, as well as three cumulative concordances—one for the English works, one for the Latin works, and one for the complete works. Readers should also consult the archives of Moreana: Thomas More and Renaissance Studies, digitized and available from Edinburgh University Press at <http://www.euppublishing.com/loi/more>.

Two recent collections of helpful scholarly materials are The Cambridge Companion to Thomas More, edited by George M. Logan (Cambridge University Press, 2011) and A Companion to Thomas More, edited by A. D. Cousins and Damian Grace (Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 2009).

To help improve this book in future editions, you are encouraged to contact us with corrections and suggestions, through www.essentialmore.org. To conclude with a merry variation on what Ben Jonson wrote for the first folio of Shakespeare in 1623: it’s no longer time to look on prefaces about Thomas More, gentle readers, but on “his book.”

It may like yo<sup>r</sup> highnes to call to yo<sup>r</sup> gracious remembrance that at this tyme ab<sup>o</sup> that great weighty counsell & office of your chancery with which so far above my merit or qualite abli<sup>g</sup> & more therefore yo<sup>r</sup> highnes had of yo<sup>r</sup> incomparable goodnes honored & exalted me ye were so good & gracious vnto me ab<sup>o</sup> at my poore humble suit to discharge & discharge me, giving me licence with yo<sup>r</sup> gracious favour to bestow the residue of my life in myn age now to come, about the provision for my soule in the service of god, & to be yo<sup>r</sup> gracye besymer & pray for you, it pleased yo<sup>r</sup> highnes fortoe to say vnto me, that for the p<sup>er</sup>vice which I before had done you (which it than liked yo<sup>r</sup> goodnes far above my deservyng to commend) that in my suit that I should after have vnto yo<sup>r</sup> highnes, which otherwise should have myn soule (that word it liked yo<sup>r</sup> highnes to use vnto me) or that should p<sup>er</sup>veyne vnto my profit, I should fynd yo<sup>r</sup> highnes good & gracious lord vnto me. So is it now gracious p<sup>er</sup>veyner, that worldly soule of the thing wherof I have resigned both the possession & the desire in the resignation of yo<sup>r</sup> most honorable office, and worldly profit I trust experience p<sup>ro</sup>videth & daily more & more shall p<sup>ro</sup>ve, that I never was very greedy thereon, but now yo<sup>r</sup> my most humble suit vnto yo<sup>r</sup> excellent highnes partly to besyche the same some what to reduce my poore soules, but principally that of yo<sup>r</sup> accustomed goodnes no sinister information move yo<sup>r</sup> noble grace, to have any more distruste of my trouth, f<sup>er</sup>ward & devotion toward you, than I have or shall during my life geve the cause. For in the matter of the wylded woman of Cantebury
 I have vnto yo<sup>r</sup> trouth & complacency @ Thomas Cromwell & my

This is a facsimile of the first page of Thomas More's 5 March <1534> letter to King Henry VIII. See pages 1470-72 for the other facsimiles, transcribed on pages 381-82.

Hit may lyke yor highnes to call to yor graciouse remembraunce / that at such tyme as of that great weighty rome & office of your chauncellor (with which so far aboute my meritis or qualitees able & mete therefore yor highnes had of yor incomparable goodnes honored & exalted me) ye were so good & graciouse vn to me as at my pore humble suit to discharge & disburden me, geving me licence with yor graciouse favor / to bestow the residew of my life in myn age now to come / about the provision for my soule in the service of god, & to be yor gracys bedisman & pray for you, it pleased yor highnes ferther to say vnto me, that for the service which I byfore had done you, (Which it than lyked yor goodnes far aboute my deserving to commend) that in eny suit that I should after haue un to yor highnes / which either should concerne myn honor (that word it lyked your highnes to vse vn to me) or that should pertyne vn to my profit / I should fynd yor highnes good & graciouse lord vn to me . So is it now graciouse soverayn, that worldly honor ys the thing wherof I haue resigned both the possession & the desire / in the resignation of yor moost honorable office . And wordlely profit I trust experience proveth & dayly more & more shall prove, that I never was very gredy theron . ¶ But now ys my most humble suit vn to yor excellent highnes / partely to beseche the same some what to tendre my pore honestie . But principally that of yor accustomed goodnes no sinistre information move yor noble grace / to have eny more distruste of my trowth toward & devotion toward you, than I have or shall duryng my life geve the cause . For in this mater of the wykked woman of canterbery
I have vn to yor trusty counsaylour @ Thomas Cromwell by my

NOTE ON THIS EDITION

Spelling is standardized to accord with the headwords of the Oxford English Dictionary. In the following instances, however, spelling has been modernized to assist the general reader: “eath” to “easy,” “egall” to “equal,” “en/sample” to “example,” “fro” to “from,” “leese” to “lose,” “minish” to “diminish,” “mo” to “more,” “nathless” to “nevertheless,” “quod” to “quoth,” “seld” to “seldom,” “sith(en)” to “since,” “shew” to “show,” “throughly” to “thoroughly,” “the tone . . . the tother” to “the one . . . the other”; and (where appropriate) “knowledge” to “acknowledge.” In addition, all reflexive pronouns are given modern forms, so “self” becomes “itself”; “themself” and plural “yourself” are changed to “themselves” and “yourselves.” Final “s” is added wherever modern usage requires it, such as: “allthing” to “all things”; “alway” to “always”; “mean” (in the sense of “way”) to “means”; “many time” to “many times”; and (where appropriate) “sometime” to “sometimes”; “beside” to “besides”; “other” to “others,” and to show possession (“fox” to “fox’s”).

Archaic verb number and tense forms are standardized in spelling: “doutest” becomes “doubtest.” Irregular past tense forms are standardized to the modern form, so that “bare” becomes “bore,” “brake” becomes “broke,” “celebrate” becomes “celebrated,” “drave” becomes “drove,” “fet” becomes “fetched,” “forbare” becomes “forbore,” “forboden” becomes “forbidden,” “gat” becomes “got,” “holpen” becomes “helped,” “infect” becomes “infected,” “spake” becomes “spoke,” “sware” becomes “swore.” Past participles ending in -en are also standardized, and -en is added to verbs as needed, such as “been” instead of “be” or “strengthen” instead of “strength.”

Archaic plurals are standardized: for example, “eyen” becomes “eyes” and “shoon,” “shoes.” The abbreviations “wt,” “&,” “yt,” and “ye” are expanded to “with,” “and,” “that,” and “the,” respectively. The abbreviations “S” and “St” are expanded to “Saint.” Before an aspirated “h,” “an” becomes “a.”

One distinctive Latinate feature of More’s English style is the “continuative relative clause,” similar to a then-common type of Latin syntax in which a relative pronoun (such as whicb, who, whom, whose) is the grammatically independent subject of its own sentence or clause and refers to an antecedent in the previous sentence. This type of construction is meant to indicate a close relationship between the two sentences, but the two sentences are separate. In this edition, these continuative relative clauses are sometimes treated as independent clauses, but often they follow semicolons or commas and are treated as part of the previous sentence.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Special thanks to managing editor Katherine Stearns; to Latin editor Gerald Malsbary; to the Center for Thomas More Studies’ directors Steve Bennett, Myles Harrington, Tom Jodziewicz, Tom Spence, Shane Tucker; to senior advisors Clarence Miller, Elizabeth McCutcheon, Marie-Claire Phélippeau, Seymour House; to the many individuals who helped at various stages of development including Joshua Avery, Hubert Baudet, John Boyle, Emma Curtis, Travis Curtright, Jenny Fast, Andrea Frank, Mary Gottschalk, Joseph Koterski, Tamara Kuykendall, Jacquelyn Lee, Leonard Leo, Matthew Mehan, Frank Mitjans, Carle Mock, Matthew Post, Bradley Ritter, Michael Simmons, Katherine Sorensen, Mary Taneyhill, Alex Taylor, and Eliot Wondercheck; to book designers Gregg Chase and Julie Allred; to artist Mike Hall for his beautiful

recreations of More’s London and Chelsea manor; and to the editorial team at Yale University Press, especially Sarah Miller, Ash Lago, Margaret Otzel, and Joyce Ippolito for their patient and expert help to bring this challenging work to completion.

We are grateful to the institutions who granted permission to use their materials: all those given in our List of Illustrations; Moreana for translations of Letters 106a, 106b, 106c, 106d, 108a, 135, 138, 139, 142, 155, 155a, 155b; University of Toronto for translations of the following letters from The Collected Works of Erasmus: Letters 191, 513, 601, 623, 683, 684, 688, 706, 999, 1087, 1090, 1093, 1096, 1106, 1233; Boydell Press for translations of trial documents; and of course, special gratitude to Yale University Press for permission to quote from The Complete Works of St. Thomas More.

ABBREVIATIONS

- ASD* Opera omnia Desiderii Erasmi Roterodami, Amsterdam, 1969–
- CC* The Cambridge Companion to Thomas More, ed. George M. Logan, Cambridge University Press, 2011
- Corr* Correspondence of Sir Thomas More, ed. Elizabeth F. Rogers, Princeton University Press, 1947
- CWE* The Collected Works of Erasmus, 86 vols., Toronto University Press, 1974–
- CW* The Complete Works of St. Thomas More, 15 vols., Yale University Press, 1963–97
- EE* Erasmi Epistolae, ed. P.S. Allen et al, 12 vols., Oxford University Press, 1906–55
- Harpsfield Nicholas Harpsfield's The life and death of Sir Thomas Moore, knight, EETS, 1932
- Lehmberg Stanford E. Lehmberg's The Reformation Parliament 1529–35, Cambridge University Press, 1970
- LP* Letters and Papers, Foreign and Domestic, of the Reign of Henry VIII, 1862–1932
- OCEL* Oxford Companion to English Literature, ed. Margaret Drabble, Oxford University Press, 1985
- ODCC* Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, eds. F. L. Cross and E. A. Livingstone, Oxford University Press, 2005
- OED* Oxford English Dictionary, second edition (1989) and online (2017)
- OLD* Oxford Latin Dictionary, 2005
- Opera omnia* Opera omnia Latina Thomae Mori, Louvain, Bogard, 1565
- PG* Patrologia cursus completus: series graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 161 vols., Paris, 1857–66
- PL* Patrologia cursus completus: series latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 221 vols., Paris, 1844–1903
- Ps Psalm: the Vulgate numbering is given first, e.g., Ps 117(118):14
- Roper William Roper's The Lyfe of Sir Thomas Moore, knight, EETS, 1935
- Stapleton Thomas Stapleton's The Life and Illustrious Martyrdom of Sir Thomas More, Burns & Oates, 1928
- SL* St. Thomas More: Selected Letters, ed. Elizabeth F. Rogers, Yale University Press, 1961
- Til* M. P. Tilley's A Dictionary of the Proverbs in England in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries, University of Michigan Press, 1950
- WA* Martin Luther's Werks, ed. J. K. F. Knaake et al., 93 vols., Weimar, 1883–1978
- Whit* B. J. Whiting's Proverbs, Sentences, and Proverbial Phrases, Harvard University Press, 1968
- Workes* The Workes of Sir Thomas More Knight . . . wrytten by him in the Englysh tonge, London, 1557

This page intentionally left blank

CHRONOLOGY OF THOMAS MORE'S LIFE AND WRITINGS

- 1478 Born February 7 in London to law student John More and his wife, Agnes Granger.
- 1483 Richard III becomes king in July; Edward V and his younger brother disappear.
- 1484 Begins his studies at St. Anthony's School on Threadneedle Street, London.
- 1485 Richard III dies at Bosworth Field August 22, ending the Wars of the Roses (1455–85); Henry VII assumes the throne.
- 1486 John Morton becomes Archbishop of Canterbury.
- 1487 John Morton becomes Lord Chancellor of England.
- 1489 Serves as page for Archbishop and Lord Chancellor Morton at Lambeth Palace.
- 1491 Grocyn returns from studies in Italy and teaches at Oxford.
- 1492 Studies at Canterbury College, Oxford, at Morton's urging.
- 1494 Begins pre-law studies at New Inn, London, and writes "Pageant Verses." Falls in love with Elizabeth; writes later about the experience in Epigram 263, composed in 1519.
- 1496 Begins law studies at Lincoln's Inn. John Colet returns to London from studies in Italy and proceeds to Oxford to teach.
- 1497 Writes epitaphs for Abingdon the Singer: Epigrams 159–61.
- 1498 Writes epigrams satirizing astrology: Epigrams 60–65, 67, 101, 118, 169, and 182. About this time, also writes Epigrams 273–74 for Holt's Latin grammar, Lac Puerorum, dedicated to Morton.
- 1499 Meets Erasmus for the first time and introduces Erasmus to Prince Henry. Linacre settles in London after completing a doctorate in medicine at Padua.
- 1500 Morton dies. Grocyn moves to London as rector of St. Lawrence Jewry (stays until 1506). Erasmus finishes the textual editing of Cicero's De officiis (published in Paris 1501).
- 1501 Moves in or near the Carthusians' Charterhouse (stays until 1504). Attends Grocyn's lectures on Dionysius the Areopagite; begins Greek studies with Grocyn; writes comedy about Solomon; lectures on City of God at St. Lawrence Jewry at Grocyn's invitation; finishes formal study of law; becomes an utter barrister. Prince Arthur marries Catherine of Aragon.
- 1502 Prince Arthur dies in April; Prince Henry is now heir to Henry VII's throne. More becomes Reader at Furnivall's Inn (serves through 1506).
- 1503 More's father becomes a serjeant-at-law; More writes "A Merry Jest" about a serjeant. Queen Elizabeth dies; More writes his "Rueful Lamentation" after her death.
- 1504 Serves in Parliament as a burgess representing London and leads opposition to Henry VII's tax plan. Writes "Letter to Colet" about the need for good counsel; writes the "Book of Fortune" poem. Continues studying Greek with Linacre and Lily; begins his study and translations from Giofrancesco's Life of Pico.
- 1505 Marries Joanna Colt, ca. January; rents Bucklersbury in London. Erasmus visits a second time; he stays with More and they translate Lucian. More's daughter Margaret is born.
- 1506 Daughter Elizabeth is born. More visits the Rastells at Coventry; encounters an angry friar

- promising easy salvation. More's Lucian translations are published; he dedicates these to Henry VII's secretary, Thomas Ruthall.
- 1507 Daughter Cecily is born. More is appointed pensioner (financial secretary) of Lincoln's Inn.
- 1508 Acts as Latin spokesman and orator for Mercer's Company in dealing with Antwerp representatives; visits Paris and Louvain.
- 1509 Son John is born. More is admitted to Mercers' Company "frank and free"; joins his father on a Middlesex Commission; acts as Mercers' negotiator with chief magistrate of Antwerp. Henry VII dies. Henry VIII crowned at age seventeen after marrying Catherine; More writes "Coronation Ode" and Epigrams 20–23. Erasmus makes his third and longest visit (stays until August 1514). Erasmus writes Praise of Folly at More's urging and edits Seneca as well. Linacre appointed royal physician.
- 1510 Chosen undersheriff of London (serves until 1518). Represents London in the 1510 Parliament; elected as Marshall of Lincoln's Inn. Competes with Lily in translating Greek epigrams. Publishes The Life of John Pico. On February 6, Colet gives his speech to the Convocation, focusing on reform and criticism of the war between England and France.
- 1511 Wife Joanna dies. Marries Alice Middleton within a month. Named Autumn Reader for Lincoln's Inn. On January 1, Prince Henry is born but dies February 22. England allies with Spain and Rome to war against France. Henry VIII has Parliament order all men to practice the longbow. On November 18, Ammonius writes that More sees Lord Chancellor and Archbishop William Warham daily. Richard Hunne's infant son, Stephen, is buried; Hunne refuses to pay the mortuary fee.
- 1512 On February 4, Warham opens Parliament with a speech on peace and justice. In April, England declares war on France, with Wolsey as war minister. In May, Cuthbert Tunstall (Chancellor to Archbishop Warham) hears Hunne's case. On June 7, an English expedition lands on the Spanish coast. On August 10, the English Regent and French Cordelière blow up and sink. On August 28, the English army abandons the field. In November, Brixius's Chordigera is published and addressed to Queen Anne; More responds with epigrams satirizing Brixius: Epigrams 188–95, and 209, written through 1513. During the winter, Henry prepares to lead his army into France, over objections of his counselors. More becomes one of Lincoln Inn's four governors. Lily becomes the first master of Colet's school, St. Paul's, and John Clement is one of the first pupils. More writes Epigram 275 for Linacre's Latin grammar.
- 1513 Begins drafting The History of King Richard III and Historia Richardi Tertii, published in 1557 and 1565, respectively. Hunne files suit under Praemunire against the English Church. In February, Pope Julius dies; Leo X is elected Pope. On March 27, Colet preaches about war in King's presence. The satiric invective Julius Excluded from Heaven is published anonymously, likely written by Erasmus. In June, Henry lands in France with the English army. In July, Erasmus dedicates to Henry VIII his translation of Plutarch's How to Tell a Flatterer from a Friend. In August, Queen Catherine and the Earl of Surrey quell the Scottish uprising, and More writes Epigrams 183, 184, and 271. In September, Henry conquers Tournai, and More writes Epigrams 243 and 244. On September 17, Prince Henry is born to Henry and Catherine, but dies the same day. In October, Henry returns in triumph and plans to continue war. In October–November, More writes Epigram 277 satirizing two friars for their lack of friendship. Machiavelli's The Prince circulates in manuscript.
- 1514 Elected to the Doctors' Commons; joins his father as a commissioner of sewers. Asked to serve on embassy to Flanders to ease tensions between merchants of London and foreign traders in the Steelyard. On July 10, the peace treaty between England and France is signed. In December, Hunne is found hanged in the Bishop of London's prison.

- 1515 Serves as orator for London to receive the Venetian ambassador in January. On January 8, Prince Arthur is born to Henry and Catherine, but dies the same day. On February 16, More is included in the peace commission of Hampshire. Appointed Lenten Reader for Lincoln's Inn. In May, goes on embassy to Bruges and Antwerp to negotiate commercial treaties. In July, meets Giles and begins Utopia. Writes Epigram 259, "To Himself... Having Escaped from a Storm," and Epigrams 250, 252, and 279 to Busleyden. Erasmus visits again; More helps alleviate Erasmus's financial difficulties. On October 21, More writes from Bruges the "Letter to Dorp," defending Erasmus. Erasmus publishes Against War as part of his Adages.
- 1516 Erasmus publishes his edition of the Greek New Testament. More writes Epigram 255 on Erasmus's edition; writes Epigrams 256–57 presenting Erasmus's edition to Cardinal Wolsey. In February, More writes to Erasmus that he plans to decline an annual pension of £100 offered by the King, because of a conflict of interest. In March, the sixteen-year-old Charles (nephew of Catherine of Aragon) becomes king of Spain. In May, John More enters the King's service as a judge. In July and August, Erasmus is in England; his Education of a Christian Prince is written for young Charles V. On August 24, the Turks occupy Jerusalem. In the fall, More becomes a member of the court of Star Chamber. Around November, More's Utopia is published. In December, Norfolk remarks that the "whole of this kingdom wishes for a general peace."
- 1517 John More becomes a judge of the Court of Common Pleas. In the spring, the English-financed expedition against France fails. In March, Leo X's bull is published, imposing a five-year truce and calling for united action against the Turks. Bishop Fox founds Corpus Christi College to advance humanism at Oxford; Fox opposes further war. In April, Erasmus makes his last trip to England. In May, Wolsey and the Royal Council ask More to help investigate the Evil May Day riots. In July, Erasmus publishes his Complaint of Peace. On September 8, Erasmus rededicates his translation of Plutarch's How to Tell a Flatterer from a Friend to King Henry. On September 29, More goes on his second embassy to Calais to help settle disputes between English and French merchants. On October 7, More writes Epigram 276 on friendship to thank Peter Giles and Erasmus for their pictures sent. More's second edition of Utopia published, in Paris. In November, Luther publishes his "Disputation on the Power and Efficacy of Indulgences," also known as the "95 Theses." In December, More successfully defends in Star Chamber the Pope's interest in a shipping dispute over those of the Crown.
- 1518 In January, Wolsey presents his plan for Universal Peace. In January–March, More decides to enter the King's service; Henry tells More to adhere to God and his conscience, "the most virtuous lesson that ever a prince taught his servant," as More later wrote. Wolsey employs More as official secretary between Westminster and the royal Court and for much judicial work. On February 18, Princess Mary is born. On March 6, a five-year truce of peace is proclaimed in Rome. In March, More publishes the Epigrams with the third edition of Utopia, printed by John Froben. On March 29, writes the "Letter to Oxford." In April, Erasmus writes to More that "you are lost to literature, and to us." Erasmus tells Tunstall he regrets More's advancement. In the spring, More publicly refutes the clergyman who preached against Greek studies in the King's presence. On May 17, Wolsey is made papal legate a latere. In the summer, More joins the Privy Council. On June 21, receives first payment of his annuity. In July, gives the welcoming oration to Campeggio; on July 23, resigns as undersheriff. On October 2, Wolsey's "Treaty of Universal Peace" is signed. In November, More's Epigrams and Utopia are published again. In December, Wolsey summons the bishops for March 1519 to consider Church reform.
- 1519 In January, Maximilian dies and Henry, Francis, and Charles all vie to be Holy Roman Emperor. On March 14, Wolsey's legate meeting of bishops is held, and Fisher gives his speech for reform. On June 28, Charles V is

- elected Holy Roman Emperor. More defends Erasmus in the “Letter to Lee” and the “Letter to a Monk.” Erasmus publishes a second edition of his Greek New Testament. Colet and Grocyn die. Wolsey sets up permanent court at White Hall, later known as the Court of Requests.
- 1520 Brixius writes Antimorus and More publishes “Letter to Brixius.” John More becomes judge of the King’s Bench. On May 26–29, Charles and Henry meet in Dover and Canterbury. On June 11, the Field of the Cloth of Gold at Calais solemnizes peace with the French, with More present. Over the next three months, More negotiates in Bruges, and Erasmus introduces him to Cranevelt. On June 20, the papal condemnation of Luther is made; Luther is given sixty days to admit his errors. In August, Luther publishes Address to the Christian Nobility of the German Nation. In October, Luther publishes On the Babylonian Captivity of the Church. In November, Luther publishes Liberty of a Christian Man. Charles V is crowned emperor. On December 10, Luther publicly burns the papal bull and decretals. Responding to Luther’s Babylonian Captivity, Henry VIII publishes In Defense of the Seven Sacraments, More having cautioned him not to exaggerate the Pope’s secular authority.
- 1521 Daughter Margaret marries William Roper. On January 3, Luther is excommunicated. On April 17–18, Luther speaks before Charles V at the imperial Diet at Worms and refuses to recant. On April 19, Charles V condemns Luther and bans him from the empire. In the spring, More accompanies Wolsey to Calais and Bruges for negotiations with French and Imperial envoys; wins a legal battle of wits against the Imperial lawyer by stumping him with an issue about rural English law: “Whether cattle taken in withernam are irrepleviable.” Meets for the last time Erasmus, who introduces to More the Valencian humanist Juan Vives (later is advisor to Catherine and teacher to Princess Mary). In May, knighted and made under-treasurer of the Exchequer. On May 12, Wolsey burns heretical books before a large crowd. On May 17, the Duke of Buckingham is executed. In August, the Turks under Suleiman take Belgrade. Wolsey concludes the Anglo-Imperial Treaty at Bruges and delays large-scale war. In September, More joins Wolsey in Calais; in mid-October, More is sent to the King in England but contracts a tertian fever, making him both hot and cold at the same time. In October, the Pope declares Henry the Defender of the Faith. On December 2, Leo X dies and Wolsey puts his name forward at the papal election.
- 1522 On January 9, Adrian VI is elected Pope; on January 21, Suleiman captures Rhodes after five-month siege; on May 19, England declares war on France. During the summer, Emperor Charles V visits England, and More gives the welcoming oration. More is given wardship of Giles Heron. Surrey leads 11,000 as an expeditionary force into France. Luther publishes Against Henry, King of the English. More expresses reservations about the war. In December, the Turks under Suleiman capture Rhodes. More’s Last Things, Erasmus’s Colloquies, and Vives’s edition of Augustine’s City of God are published. Tunstall dedicates his treatise on arithmetic, De arte supputandi, to More. More serves as Henry’s secretary.
- 1523 Gives oration defending free speech as Speaker of the House of Commons. At Henry VIII’s request, writes Response to Luther against Luther’s vituperative Against Henry. Wolsey appoints Vives to lecture at Oxford. England signs a treaty to invade France; Suffolk leads 10,000 troops in an attempted march on Paris. Erasmus announces his decision to combat Luther in print.
- 1524 Moves to Chelsea; publishes a second edition of Response to Luther; appointed High Steward to Oxford; given wardship of Anne Cresacre. The Turks invade Hungary. Erasmus publishes On Free Choice of the Will, responding to Luther. In October, Linacre dies. In November, the army in France retreats, but Henry still orders a winter campaign. More remarks to Roper: “If my head could win [the King] a castle in France, . . . it would not fail to go.” Bishop

- Tunstall warns booksellers not to import heretical books.
- 1525 Elizabeth marries William Dauncey and Cecily marries Giles Heron in a double wedding ceremony. More is made High Steward of Cambridge. On February 14, the French king is captured by Charles V at Pavia; in March, Henry plans to lead an army against France; in April, Warham reports the commoners' aversion to paying for the French war. Wolsey removes Vives from Oxford for opposing war. In June, More attends ceremonies making Henry VIII's illegitimate son, Henry, the Duke of Richmond. During the summer, the peasants revolt in Germany; Luther writes "Against the Murderous, Thieving Hordes of Peasants"; 60,000–100,000 peasants are killed. In August, More helps negotiate a peace agreement with France. In September, appointed the Chancellor of Duchy of Lancaster. In December, Luther publishes On the Servitude of the Will (reprinted six times in two months) as a response to Erasmus, but writes a submissive letter to King Henry as well. More begins but does not publish Letter to Bugenhagen, in response to the Lutheran controversies.
- 1526 In January, Wolsey orders raids upon Steelyard for Luther's writings, and More leads one of these. On February 11, Robert Barnes abjures heresy before Fisher and Wolsey. In March, Henry receives Luther's letter. More helps in making the King's reply, and so does not publish his Letter to Bugenhagen (later published in 1568). In March, Francis I is released by Charles V. In the spring, Henry's infatuation with Anne Boleyn begins. In April, More continues to help negotiate a peace treaty with France and is among those who sign the agreement. In June, Erasmus publishes his response to Luther, Hyperaspistes I (Shield-Bearer I, running through seven editions in six months) and an edition of Irenaeus's Against Heresies. On August 28, the Turks achieve victory at Mohacz, Hungary, with Buda occupied. In the autumn, Tunstall has copies of Tyndale's New Testament burned; Barnes helps distribute it. More's daughters dispute philosophy before King Henry. On December 18, More asks Erasmus to complete Hyperaspistes II. In December, Vives complains that the English do nothing to help resist the Turks; Holbein arrives to More's home from Antwerp.
- 1527 Holbein paints the portrait of More's family at Chelsea, along with More's own portrait. In April, More is with Wolsey in France for final negotiations and the formal signing of the Anglo-French Treaty. On May 17, Henry appears before the secret court of Wolsey and Warham, and Catherine objects. Wolsey explains to Henry the difficulties involved with the divorce. Henry informs Catherine of his scruple about their marriage. Imperial troops under Bourbon sack Rome without Charles V's knowledge. In September, Erasmus publishes Hyperaspistes II. Henry consults More on the marriage and invites Erasmus to England as a consultant. With one of the worst harvests of the century because of the continual rain, wheat prices are doubled. On November 21, the heresy trial of Bilney takes place, and More abjures.
- 1528 More feeds one hundred people a day at Chelsea after the bad harvest of 1527. In January, war is declared against Charles V. In March, Bishop Tunstall commissions More to defend the Church in England through writing. In the spring, Margaret almost dies from illness. In the autumn, Cardinal Campeggio arrives in London to hear the case of Henry and Catherine's annulment. In November, Henry gives official arguments for his divorce: not the lack of a male heir, but concern for Mary's legitimacy. Catherine gives her public statement that the consummation with Arthur never occurred. Endangered by his sympathy for Catherine, Vives leaves England. Christopher St. German's first dialogue of Doctor and Student appears, along with William Tyndale's Obedience of a Christian Man (the first divine right theory in English), which Anne Boleyn gives to Henry. Simon Fish dedicates his anticlerical Supplication of Beggars to King Henry. More is chosen as alternate Master of Revels, Lincoln's Inn. Castiglione's The Book of the Courtier is published in Venice. More tells Roper his three great wishes: that Christian

- princes would cease to make war and learn to work peace; that the afflicted Church would settle into uniformity of belief again; and that the matter of the King's marriage "to the glory of God and quietness of all parties" would be brought "to a good conclusion."
- 1529 More's son John marries Anne Cresacre. More publishes Dialogue of Sir Thomas More, Knight "under royal favor." Serves as delegate at the Peace of Cambrai. In July, Wolsey fails to get Henry's marriage annulled at London legatine court. In August, Cranmer suggests use of himself, the universities, and Collectanea to resolve marriage issue, not Rome. In September, More counters Fish in The Supplication of Souls. More's family suffers a fire at Chelsea. Chapuys becomes the new Imperial ambassador. In October, Henry consults More a second time on marriage. Wolsey is dismissed and charged with Praemunire. More appointed Lord Chancellor; writes Erasmus that "this post involves the interests of Christendom." In November, Parliament is convened. More as Lord Chancellor calls for reformation of laws and condemns Wolsey's failures. The Commons' "Supplication" (with corrections in Thomas Cromwell's hand) lists clerical grievances. Henry VIII makes a partial defense of Luther to ambassador Eustace Chapuys and says he will reform the Church by Parliament.
- 1530 The opening of Parliament is delayed several times. Cromwell enters royal service. Agents are sent to enlist Tyndale's and Frith's help in the King's "Great Matter"; other royal agents are sent to universities and private scholars to gain support for Henry's marriage annulment and to gather materials for Cranmer's Collectanea. St. German adds a second dialogue to Doctor and Student, arguing that common law has precedence over canon law. On February 23, Thomas Hitton is burned for heresy at Maidstone. In March, Charles V is crowned emperor by the Pope. In September, Archbishop Cranmer presents Collectanea satis copiosa to Henry VIII, arguing for the English king's divine right and imperial status. Henry studies and annotates Collectanea carefully, then uses royal prerogative forbidding
- the exercise of foreign authority in England. On September 20, Chapuys reports that More is nearly dismissed for opposing Henry's designs. In October, Henry argues that his imperial power allows him to prevent appeals to foreign powers; chief lawyers and clerics say no. Cromwell joins the King's Council. In November, More's father, John, dies. Tyndale's Practice of Prelates denounces Henry's divorce. On November 4, Wolsey is arrested. He is tried for treason, but dies on November 29. In December, the King's Council decides on Praemunire charges against all the clergy for illegal use of ecclesiastical courts.
- 1531 King Henry charges the clergy with Praemunire and requires that they recognize him as "Supreme Head of the Church of England." They do so "as far as Christ's law allows" and submit to paying a £100,000 penalty. On March 30, More is required to report to Parliament the universities' approval of the royal divorce (citing Collectanea). In the spring, More refuses to accept a letter from Charles V (Letter 183a). More publishes the second edition of Dialogue of Sir Thomas More, Knight. In the summer, Tyndale publishes his Answer to Sir More Thomas More's Dialogue. Henry is enraged, yet Cromwell still seeks Tyndale's support. St. German publishes his New Additions — arguing for Parliament's authority over the Church — and drafts reform legislation. On August 16, Thomas Bilney is burned at Norwich for heresy. In December, Richard Bayfield and John Tewkesbury are burned at Smithfield in London for heresy. Cromwell becomes a principal counselor of King Henry. Thomas Elyot's The Book of the Governor is published, dedicated to Henry VIII.
- 1532 Thomas Benet is burned at Exeter. Fisher and Tunstall are not called for January's Parliament session. Pole leaves England, having refused the See of York. In February, Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, formally dissociates himself from the anticlerical laws promulgated since 1529. In March, More publishes The Confituation of Tyndale's Answer, Books 1–3. On March 15, there is an open clash over divorce tactics between Henry VIII and Archbishop

- Warham. On March 18, the Commons submit Supplication against the Ordinaries to Henry VIII, who shows little interest. On March 19, the Conditional Restraint of Annates Act passes the House of Lords after Henry VIII visits the House three times; all bishops, two abbots and the Earl of Arundel oppose the act. On March 26, the Conditional Restraint of Annates Act passes the House of Commons after Henry VIII “causes the House to divide” for voting, for the first time in English history. On March 31, Henry is enraged by Friar Peto’s Easter sermon against his intended divorce. After this sermon, which likens Henry to King Ahab and Anne to Jezebel, Friar Peto (the Queen’s chaplain) is arrested. On April 12, Henry presents the Commons’ Supplication to Warham to answer; Henry receives the bishops’ reply on April 27. On April 30, an enraged Henry VIII finds the bishops’ Answer “very slender”; James Bainham (husband of Simon Fish’s widow) is burned in London. On May 10, the King sends his demands to the Convocation who are described by the King as “half our subjects . . . scarce our subjects.” On May 14, Henry VIII dismisses Parliament after it refuses, under More’s leadership, to pass the Submission of the Clergy Act. On May 15, a few members of the Upper House of Convocation approve the Submission of the Clergy after disbanding the Lower House. On May 16, More resigns as Lord Chancellor, saying he is “not up to the work.” During the summer, More writes his epitaph, and has it engraved on his tombstone. More gives his advice to Cromwell on working with lions. In July, Frith returns to England to support the Protestant effort. In August, Warham dies leaving a speech defending the liberties of the English Church and repeatedly invoking St. Thomas Becket. In October, Frith is arrested and Cromwell visits him. In December, More’s “Letter against Frith” is published. Anne Boleyn becomes pregnant. Machiavelli’s The Prince is published posthumously in Italy.
- 1533 On January 25, Henry and Anne are secretly married. On January 26, Audley becomes Lord Chancellor. In February, St. German’s anonymous Treatise on the Division Between the Spirituality and Temporality is published by the royal printer (runs to five editions by 1537). In the February–April Parliament, the Act in Restraint of Appeals declares England to be an empire and begins the transfer of power to Henry as Head of the Church. On March 30, Cranmer is consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury. In April, More publishes his Apolo-gy responding to “the Pacifier,” a reference to St. German. In the spring, More also publishes The Confutation of Tyndale’s Answer, Books 4–8. In April, More refuses the bishops’ invitation to attend Anne’s coronation, lest he be “deflowered, then devoured.” In May, Cranmer grants Henry’s divorce. On June 1, Anne is crowned queen, and Henry drafts revisions to the coronation oath. More sends his “Epitaph, a public declaration of the actual facts,” to Erasmus and urges Erasmus not to delay in publishing it (Letter 191). In July, Pope Clement VII condemns the divorce; Elizabeth Barton, the Nun of Kent, is arrested; John Frith is burned at Smithfield in London. On September 7, Anne gives birth to Elizabeth. In September, St. German anonymously publishes his Salem and Bizance; in November, More responds by publishing his Debellation of Salem and Bizance. In December, More publishes his Answer to a Poisoned Book, responding to the anonymous Supper of the Lord. The Royal Council publishes a book of nine Articles defending Henry’s marriage and denouncing the Pope; Tunstall writes to Henry to object; Henry replies.
- 1534 Fisher, Tunstall, Lee, Darcy, and others are told not to attend the January Parliament session. In February, Henry VIII includes More’s name in the bill of attainder against the Nun of Kent. In February–March, More writes to Cromwell and Henry denying any guilt (Letters 197–99). The House of Lords requests to hear More’s case; instead, Henry has More appear before the royal commission of Cromwell, Cranmer, Audley, and Norfolk. More is removed from attainder, but his salary as royal councillor is stopped. Parliament formalizes, through the Act of Submission of the Clergy, the 1532 Convocation statute: all appeals of Church law must now go to the King’s Court

- of Chancery. The Act Restraining Annates confirms the 1532 Conditional Act: abbots and bishops will now be appointed by Henry VIII. The Act Ratifying the Oath to the Succession authorizes penalty of high treason for writing or acting against succession, and misprision of treason for refusing an oath concerning it. On April 13, More is interrogated at Lambeth Palace (Letter 200). On April 17, More is imprisoned (illegally) for refusing to take the oath of succession. On April 20, the Nun of Kent and five priest-supporters are executed at Tyburn. In mid-May, Margaret begins visiting More in prison. In August, Chancellor Audley sends a warning to More through Alice Alington (Letters 205–6). In November–December, the Act Recognizing the King as Supreme Head of the Church in England passes. The Second Act of Succession, giving the text of the required oath, passes. The Treason Act makes it high treason to maliciously deprive the King and Queen of the dignity, title, or name of their royal estates, by word, deed, or thought. An Act of Attainder is made against Bishop Fisher and others, convicting them of misprision of treason for refusing the oath of Succession. An Act of Attainder of Thomas More follows: misprision of treason for refusing the oath of Succession. This act, retrospectively, makes More's earlier imprisonment legal. More begins A Treatise upon the Passion before his imprisonment, continuing More's commission by Tunstall to defend the Church's teachings. Writes A Dialogue of Comfort against Tribulation and A Treatise to Receive the Blessed Body after imprisonment.
- 1535 Cromwell is made Viceregent in spiritual affairs, to visit ecclesiastical foundations and make a detailed list of property. On April 28, the treason trial of three Carthusian and one Bridgettine priors occurs. On April 30, More is interrogated in the Tower by Cromwell and others (Letter 214). On May 4, the Charterhouse and Bridgettine priors are placed on pallets to be taken to Tyburn and hanged in their habits; the process begins below More's cell window and while Margaret is visiting. The priors are dragged to Tyburn and hung, drawn, and quartered. Ca. May–June, More writes De tristitia Christi (published in 1565, with an English translation in 1557). On June 3, More is interrogated again, this time by members of the Royal Council. Tunstall gives full support to the King's Supremacy. On June 12, Richard Rich removes More's books and writing materials from his cell, and their disputed conversation about Parliament's proper powers occurs. On June 14, More's formal interrogation is recorded by a notary before Council members and witnesses. On June 17 and 22, Bishop John Fisher is tried and executed. Ca. June 18: Cromwell makes a "Remembrances" note to himself to find out the King's "pleasure touching Master More" after informing the King about "the opinion of the judges thereon." On June 25, Henry VIII gives the order to publicize the guilt of Fisher and More. On June 28, the Grand Jury of Middlesex County indicts Thomas More. On July 1, More is tried at Westminster Hall and found guilty of malicious treason. On July 1–5, More writes his final prayer. On July 6, More is executed, not as decreed at trial (by hanging, drawing, quartering), but by beheading, a mercy from the King. On October 6, William Tyndale is executed in Brussels.
- 1536 On January 8, Queen Catherine of Aragon dies. From February 4 to April 14, the Seventh Parliamentary Session is held. On March 11, Henry delivers a speech to the House of Commons on the Dissolution of the Lesser Monasteries Act. On May 17, Henry's marriage to Anne Boleyn is annulled by Thomas Cranmer. On May 19, Anne is executed for witchcraft, incest, and adultery. On May 20, Henry is betrothed to Jane Seymour. On May 30, Henry and Jane marry. In June, a New Parliament is called. In July, Princess Mary and her sister Elizabeth are bastardized by the Second Act of Succession. On July 31, the Act Extinguishing the Authority of the Bishop of Rome passes. On October 8, rebellions begin in Lincolnshire and Yorkshire (the "Pilgrimage of Grace") and continue on until June 1537.

English Poetry

While Thomas More wrote vastly more prose than poetry during his life, the early poetry remains a revealing testimony to the author's wit and skill, and an intriguing foreshadowing of his later concerns as a writer and thinker. Erasmus wrote in Ciceronianus that More was "a poet even in his prose," and More scholar Richard Sylvester concluded "that there is a great deal of 'poetry' in More's dialectic and an almost equal amount of 'dialectic' in his poetry."

The "Pageant Verses," written to accompany tapestries in his father's house, are most likely More's earliest poems, written sometime before 1503. Composed in rhyme royal meter, the poems strikingly mingle both English and Petrarchan iconographic traditions (CW 1: xx). The sequence culminates in a Latin poem, "The Poet," which places the earlier meditations on Childhood, Manhood, Venus and Cupid, Age, Death, Fame, Time, and Eternity in a comprehensive perspective that cautions against trusting and hoping in lesser goods that "will fade away." The only source for these "Pageant Verses" is Rastell's 1557 English edition.

More's "Rueful Lamentation" was inspired by the untimely death of Elizabeth of York, King Henry VII's wife, on February 11, 1502/3, her thirty-seventh birthday. The poem was probably composed shortly after her death, and may have been written to be hung beside Elizabeth's tomb, given the young More's connections to her family (CW 1: xxiii). Anthony Edwards notes that More's provocative "integration" of first person lamentation, de casibus tragedy (see Lydgate's Fall of Princes), and verse epitaph may be unique to the author (xxiv). As in "Pageant Verses," the poetry addresses itself—through the dead queen's voice—to those who put "trust and confidence / In worldly riches and frail prosperity." By juxtaposing earthly realities and desires with Elizabeth's repeated lament, "Lo, here I lie," the poem explores favorite themes of the later More, such as the transience of life and the danger of human blindness, and the poem counsels the reader to "love and magnify" true and lasting goods, what Elizabeth calls "heavenly things," and to avoid "worldly vanity" and "earthly folly." Her "Rueful Lamentation" survives in two manuscripts, marked by many differences. Our edition follows the text of CW 1.

"A Merry Jest," More's rollicking comic poem on one form of human folly, was probably composed either for the occasion of his father's election to sargeant of law in 1503, or later in 1509, for the occasion of young More's appointment as an honorary mercer (CW 1: xxvi–xxvii). In this youthful jest, the reader encounters for the first time a favorite form of the author, the "merry tale." More's later writings are replete with merry tales as well, but in prose. "A Merry Jest" is written in "tail rhyme"—two rhymed lines followed by a longer "tail" line—a poetic form used in Chaucer's "Tale of Sir Topaz" and other medieval poems (OCEL 959). Through its satirical portrait of a man who pretends to be a friar, the poem directs readers away from "feigning" and toward diligent work in areas where one has proper competence, or "skill."

Regarding More's "Fortune Verses," William Rastell writes that these rhyme royal poems were "written by Master Thomas More in his youth," and were intended to serve as a preface to a "Book of Fortune." The poems were written sometime earlier than 1505, though how much earlier is difficult to say, and identifying the "Book of Fortune" has proved elusive as well (CW 1: xxviii–xxix). In the "Fortune Verses," young More focuses on issues of credence and trust, in regard to fortune, described as "inconstant, slipper, frail, and full of treason." The poetry reveals both blindness and the governance of pride in human life. "Fortune Verses" attempt to alter the "eye" of those that trust in fortune by praising the surprising freedom to be found in poverty, challenging the reader to choose "bondage, or free liberty." The dialectical structure of this poem shows More's lifelong interest in the dialogue form and its role in fostering active reflection and free choice. As More writes later in the 1529 Dialogue, pursuits such as poetry and dialectical inquiry help foster "a good mother wit," without which human learning is "half lame."

The last two poems in this section, the rhyme royal "Lewis the Lost Lover" and "Davey the Dicer," are described by Rastell as “two short ballads which Sir Thomas More made for his pastime” during his imprisonment in the Tower of London. More’s son-in-law William Roper attests that “Lewis the Lost Lover” was composed after a visit from Thomas Cromwell, who “pretended much friendship” toward More, and “for his comfort told [More] that the King’s Highness was his good and gracious Lord, and minded not with any matter wherein he should have any cause of scruple, from henceforth to trouble his conscience.” The poem records More’s response and reveals the imprisoned author’s vigilance about fortune’s flatteries and beguilements—returning to a topic treated in his earliest poetry. In these prison verses, More stresses the need to be prepared for whatever “storm” will arise in human life, a need consistently pondered across his writing career.

More’s last known poem, “Davey the Dicer,” may have been composed along with “Lewis the Lost Lover” or close in time (CW 1: xxxii). More’s habitual humor—his way of “speaking the truth through jests,” an art learned from Chaucer, Lucian, and others—sparkles again in this poem. Fortune’s sharp downward turn, though it has ruined poor Davey in obvious ways, has nevertheless also provided “some leisure” for writing poetry again, a happy development.

In addition to the English poems given here, More also included four rhyme royal poems in the concluding part of his Life of John Pico. Moreover, he composed 281 poems in Latin, published as his Epigrams in 1518 and 1520, with additions and corrections. These poems are found in those sections of Essential Works.

CONTENTS

Pageant Verses. . . . .	3
Rueful Lamentation . . . . .	5
A Merry Jest. . . . .	7
The Fortune Verses. . . . .	12
Lewis the Lost Lover. . . . .	16
Davy the Dicer . . . . .	16

English Poetry

PAGEANT VERSES

Master Thomas More in his youth devised in his father's house in London a goodly hanging of fine painted cloth, with nine pageants,<sup>1</sup> and verses over every of those pageants, which verses expressed and declared what the images in those pageants represented; and also in those pageants were painted the things that the verses over them did, in effect, declare; which verses here follow.

In the first pageant was painted a boy playing at the top and scourge.<sup>2</sup> And over this pageant was written as followeth:

CHILDHOOD

I am called Childhood; in play is all my mind, 15 To cast a quoit,<sup>3</sup> a cock-stele,<sup>4</sup> and a ball.
A top can I set, and drive it in his kind.<sup>5</sup>
But would to God these hateful bookés all Were in a fire brent<sup>6</sup> to powder small.
Then might I lead my life always in play:
20 Which life God send me to mine ending day.

In the second pageant was painted a goodly fresh young man riding upon a goodly horse, having a hawk on his fist and a brace<sup>7</sup> of greyhounds following him. And under the horse feet was painted the same boy that in the first pageant was playing at the top and scourge. And over this second pageant the writing was thus:

MANHOOD

Manhood I am; therefore I me delight
30 To hunt and hawk, to nourish up and feed<sup>8</sup>
The greyhound to the course,<sup>9</sup> the hawk to the flight,<sup>10</sup>
And to bestride a good and lusty<sup>11</sup> steed.
These things become a very man indeed,

Yet thinketh this boy his peevish<sup>12</sup> game swetter,<sup>13</sup>
But what, no force,<sup>14</sup> his reason is no better. 35

In the third pageant was painted the goodly young man in the second pageant lying on the ground. And upon him stood Lady Venus, goddess of love, and by her upon this man stood the little god Cupid. And over this third pageant, this was the writing that followeth:

VENUS AND CUPID

Whoso ne<sup>15</sup> knoweth the strength, pow'r, and might
Of Venus and me, her little son Cupide,
45 Thou, Manhood, shalt a mirror been<sup>16</sup> aright,
By us subdued for all thy great pride.
My fiery dart pierceth thy tender side.
Now thou which erst<sup>17</sup> despised'st children small,
Shall wax<sup>18</sup> a child again and be my thrall.<sup>19</sup>

In the fourth pageant was painted an old sage father sitting in a chair. And lying under his feet was painted the image of Venus and Cupid, that<sup>20</sup> were in the third pageant. And over this fourth pageant the scripture<sup>21</sup> was thus:

AGE

Old Age am I, with lockés thin and hore,<sup>22</sup>
55 Of our short life, the last and best part.
Wise and discreet: the public weal<sup>23</sup> therefore,
I help to rule to my labor and smart.<sup>24</sup>
Therefore, Cupid, withdraw thy fiery dart, 60 Chargeable<sup>25</sup> matters shall of love oppress<sup>26</sup>
Thy childish game<sup>27</sup> and idle busyness.

In the fifth pageant was painted an image of Death, and under his feet lay the old man in the fourth pageant. And above this fifth pageant, this was the saying:

1 pictorial illustrations 2 top and scourge: child's top, spun with a detached whip-like string 3 iron ring for throwing 4 stick thrown in sport at a tethered rooster 5 A top... kind: i.e., I can spin a top and keep it going in its way 6 burned 7 pair

8 nourish... feed: raise and train 9 the course: chase hares or game with greyhounds 10 the flight: hawk's pursuit of game in sport 11 good and lusty: strong and spirited 12 foolish 13 sweeter 14 matter 15 does not 16 a mirror been: an example

be 17 which erst: who before 18 become 19 slave 20 who 21 inscription 22 hoar, gray, aged, venerable 23 well-being 24 pain 25 weighty, requiring responsibility 26 of love oppress: deprive love of 27 pleasure, amusement

DEATH

Though I be foul, ugly, lean, and misshapè,<sup>28</sup>
 Yet there is none in all this worlde wide, 70 That may my power withstand or escape.
 Therefore, sage father, greatly magnified,<sup>29</sup>
 Descend from your chair,<sup>30</sup> set apart your pride, Witsafe<sup>31</sup> to lend (though it be to your pain)
 To me, a fool,<sup>32</sup> some of your wise brain.

75 In the sixth pageant was painted Lady Fame. And under her feet was the picture of Death that was in the fifth pageant. And over this sixth pageant the writing was as followeth:

FAME

80 Fame I am called; marvel you nothing,
 Though with tongues am compasséd all round
 For in voice of people is my chief living.
 O cruel death, thy power I confound.<sup>33</sup>
 When thou a noble man hast brought to ground, 85 Maugré thy teeth,<sup>34</sup> to live cause him shall I,
 Of people in perpetual memory.

In the seventh pageant was painted the image of Time, and under his feet was lying the picture of Fame that was in the sixth pageant. And this was 90 the scripture over this seventh pageant:

TIME

I, whom thou seest with horologe<sup>35</sup> in hand,
 Am named Time, the lord of every hour;
 I shall in space<sup>36</sup> destroy both sea and land.
 95 O simple Fame, how darest thou man honour
 Promising of his name an endless flour?<sup>37</sup>
 Who may in the world have a name eternall,
 When I shall, in process,<sup>38</sup> destroy the world and all?

100 In the eighth pageant was pictured the image of Lady Eternity, sitting in a chair under a sumptuous cloth of estate,<sup>39</sup> crowned with an imperial crown. And under her feet lay the picture of Time, that was in the seventh pageant. And above this eighth pageant, was it written as followeth:

ETERNITY

105

Me needeth not to boast; I am Eternity.
 The very name signifieth well
 That mine empire infinite shall be.
 Thou mortal Time, every man can tell,
 Art nothing else but the mobility
 110 Of sun and moon changing in every degree.
 When they shall leave their course, thou shalt be brought,
 For all thy pride and boasting, into nought.<sup>40</sup>

In the ninth pageant was painted a Poet sitting in a chair. And over this pageant were there written these 115 verses in Latin following:

THE POET

Has fictas quemcunque iuvat spectare figuras,
 Sed mira veros quas putat arte homines,
 Ille potest veris, animum sic pascere rebus,
 120 Ut pictis oculos pascit imaginibus.
 Namque videbit uti fragilis bona lubrica mundi,
 Tam cito non veniunt, quam cito pretereunt,
 Gaudia laus et honor, celeri pede omnia cedunt,
 Qui manet excepto semper amore dei?
 125 Ergo homines, levibus iamiam diffidite rebus, Nulla recessuro spes adhibenda bono.
 Qui dabit eternam nobis pro munere vitam,
 In permansuro ponite vota deo.

[Translation:<sup>41</sup>
*Whoever delights to behold these fashioned figures,
 But thinks them, by a wondrous art, to be true to life,
 Is able to nourish his soul on true things,
 As he nourishes his eyes on the painted images.
 For indeed he will see how the slippery goods of the fragile world
 No more quickly come than they quickly pass away.
 Joys, praise, and honor, all things move past at a swift pace;
 What remains always, except for the love of God?
 Therefore, O mortals, distrust fickle things right now,
 No hope should be attached to a good that will fade away.
 It is God who will give us the gift of eternal life;
 Place your prayers with him who ever will remain.]*

<sup>28</sup> ill-shaped, deformed, monstrous

<sup>29</sup> praised; enlarged to the sight

<sup>30</sup> throne <sup>31</sup> deign to <sup>32</sup> The original spelling, "fole," could be read as two syllables, which renders a regular iambic line. <sup>33</sup> defeat <sup>34</sup> Maugré thy teeth:

despite your resistance <sup>35</sup> hourglass

<sup>36</sup> time <sup>37</sup> flowering <sup>38</sup> due course

<sup>39</sup> cloth of estate: tapestry used by monarchs <sup>40</sup> nothing <sup>41</sup> For an alternate translation of this poem, see Epigram 272.

A RUEFUL LAMENTATION<sup>1</sup>

Ye that put your trust and confidence
 In worldly riches and frail prosperity,
 That so live here as ye should never hence,<sup>2</sup>
 5 Remember death and look here upon me.
 In sample<sup>3</sup> I think there may no better be.
 Yourself wot<sup>4</sup> well that in this realm was I
 Your queen but late.<sup>5</sup> Lo, here I lie.

Was I not born of old worthy lin'age?<sup>6</sup>
 10 Was not my mother queen and my father king?
 Was I not a king's fere<sup>7</sup> in marriage?<sup>8</sup>
 Had I not plenty of every pleasant thing?
 Merciful God, this is a strange reckoning:
 Riches, honor, wealth, and ancestry
 15 Hath me forsake. Lo, here I lie.

If worship<sup>9</sup> might have kept me, I had not<sup>10</sup> gone.
 If wealth might me have served, I needed not to fear.
 If money might have hold,<sup>11</sup> I lackéd none.
 But O good God, what availeth all this gear?<sup>12</sup>
 20 When death cometh, thy mighty messenger,
 Obey we must; there is no remedye,
 He hath me summoned. Lo, here I lie.

Yet was I lately promised otherwise:<sup>13</sup>
 This year to live in wealth and delice.<sup>14</sup>
 25 Lo, whereto cometh thy blandishing<sup>15</sup> promise, O false astrology divinatrice,<sup>16</sup>
 Of Godés secretés making thee so wise!
 How true is for this year the prophecy?
 The year yet lasteth, and lo, now here I lie.

30 O brittle wealth, aye<sup>17</sup> full of bitterness,
 Thy sing'lar pleasure ay doubled is with pain.

Accompt<sup>18</sup> my sorrow first and my distress,
 Sundry wise,<sup>19</sup> and reckon there again
 The joy that I have had, I dare not fain.<sup>20</sup>
 For all my honor, enduréd yet have I 35 More woe than wealth, and lo, here I lie.

Where are our castlés now and our towers?
 Goodly Richmond,<sup>21</sup> soon art thou gone from me.
 At Westminster that goodly work of yours,<sup>22</sup>
 Mine own dear Lord, now shall I never see.
 40 Almighty God witsave<sup>23</sup> to grant that ye
 And your children well may edify.<sup>24</sup>
 My place builded is,<sup>25</sup> for lo, here I lie.

Adieu, my true spouse, my worthy lord;
 The faithful love, that did us two combine 45 In marriage and peaceable concord,
 Unto your handés here I clean resign,
 To be bestowed on your children and mine.
 Erst<sup>26</sup> were ye father; now must ye supply
 The mother's part also. Lo, here I lie.
 50

Farewell, my daughter Lady Margarete.
 God wot full sore<sup>27</sup> it grievéd hath my mind,
 That ye should go where we should seldom meet.<sup>28</sup>
 Now am I gone, and have left you behind.
 O mortal folk, what, we ever blind!<sup>29</sup>
 55 That we least fear, full oft it is full nigh.<sup>30</sup>
 From you depart I first. Lo, here I lie.

Farewell, Madam, my lordés worthy mother, Comfort your son, and be ye of good cheer.
 Take all in worth,<sup>31</sup> for it will be none other.<sup>32</sup>
 60 Farewell, my daughter Katherine,<sup>33</sup> late the fere<sup>34</sup>
 To Prince Arthur, my own child so dear.
 It booteth<sup>35</sup> not for me to weep and cry;
 Pray for my soul, for now, lo here I lie.

<sup>1</sup> The full title as given in the 1557 Workes is "A Rueful Lamentation written by Master Thomas More in his youth, of the death of Queen Elizabeth, mother to King Henry the Eighth, wife to King Henry the Seventh, and eldest daughter to King Edward the Fourth, which Queen Elizabeth died in childbed in February in the year of our Lord 1503 and in the 18th year of the reign of King Henry the Seventh." <sup>2</sup> (depart) from here <sup>3</sup> In sample: As an example or warning <sup>4</sup> know <sup>5</sup> but late: not long ago <sup>6</sup> Elizabeth was the daughter of Elizabeth Woodville and Edward IV, and hence a descendant of the royal Plantagenet line. <sup>7</sup> consort, spouse <sup>8</sup> Elizabeth married

Henry VII on January 18, 1486. <sup>9</sup> honor <sup>10</sup> had not: would not have <sup>11</sup> helped <sup>12</sup> stuff <sup>13</sup> differently, i.e., by the court astrologer, William Parron, who published two optimistic predictions in the months preceding Elizabeth's death <sup>14</sup> delight <sup>15</sup> flattering <sup>16</sup> a female seer or diviner <sup>17</sup> always <sup>18</sup> account, consider <sup>19</sup> Sundry wise: In various ways <sup>20</sup> (be) glad <sup>21</sup> new name for Henry VII's palace, given when rebuilt after a fire soon before Elizabeth's death <sup>22</sup> Henry VII's new chapel, under construction at the time of Elizabeth's death <sup>23</sup> deign <sup>24</sup> well may edify: may build well <sup>25</sup> my place builded is: i.e., her tomb is complete, in contrast to the castle and chapel <sup>26</sup> before <sup>27</sup> full sore: very bitterly <sup>28</sup> Just before Elizabeth's death, negotiations had been completed for Margaret's marriage to James IV of Scotland. <sup>29</sup> what... blind: This text follows the L edition for a clearer metrical reading. <sup>30</sup> full oft... nigh: very often is very near <sup>31</sup> Take... worth: Be content <sup>32</sup> none other: no other way <sup>33</sup> Not included in Yale, but appears in L and 1557. This emendation clarifies meaning and increases the line to a full ten syllables. <sup>34</sup> late the fere: recently the wife. Catherine of Aragon had married Elizabeth's eldest son, Prince Arthur, on November 14, 1501. He died on April 2, 1502. <sup>35</sup> helps

- 65 Adieu, Lord Harry, my lovely son adieu.
 Our Lord increase your honor and your estate;<sup>36</sup>
 Adieu, my daughter Mary, bright of hue.<sup>37</sup>
 God make you virtuous, wise, and fortunáte.
 Adieu, sweet heart, my Lady daughter Kate;<sup>38</sup>
 70 Thou shalt, good babe, such is thy destiny,
 Thy mother never know: for lo here I lie.

O Lady Cécil', Anne, and Katherine,
 Farewell, my well-beloved sisters three.

- O Lady Bridget, dear sister mine,
 75 Lo, here the end of worldly vanity;<sup>39</sup>
 Lo, well are you that earthly folly flee
 And heavenly things love and magnify.<sup>40</sup>
 Farewell, and pray for me, for lo here I lie.

Adieu, my lords, adieu my ladies all,<sup>41</sup>

- 80 Adieu, my faithful servants every chone;<sup>42</sup>
 Adieu, my commons<sup>43</sup> whom I never shall See in this world. Wherefore to thee alone,
 Immortal God, very<sup>44</sup> three in one,
 I me commend. Thy infinite mercy
 85 Show to thy servant now, for lo here I lie.

Title page, Mery Gest, ca. 1516. Courtesy Huntington Library, RB 31484.

<sup>36</sup> position <sup>37</sup> complexion <sup>38</sup> Elizabeth's last child, Katherine, was born on February 2, 1503, just over a week before her mother's death. <sup>39</sup> here...

vanity: proverbial, from "This world is but a vanity" (cf. Eccl 1:2) <sup>40</sup> praise <sup>41</sup> Adieu... all: Text is emended to follow L and 1557, rendering the line metrically more regular. <sup>42</sup> every chone: everyone (dialect) <sup>43</sup> common people <sup>44</sup> truly

A MERRY JEST: HOW A SERGEANT
WOULD LEARN TO PLAY THE FRÈRE<sup>1</sup>

Wise men always Affirm and say 5 That best is for a man Diligently For to apply The business that he can <sup>2</sup> And in no wise <sup>3</sup> 10 To enterprise <sup>4</sup> Another faculty; <sup>5</sup> For he that will, And can <sup>6</sup> no skill, Is never like to thee. <sup>7</sup> 15 He that hath laft <sup>8</sup> The hosier's <sup>9</sup> craft, And falleth to making shone, <sup>10</sup> The smith that shall To painting fall, 20 His thrift <sup>11</sup> is well-nigh <sup>12</sup> done. A black draper, <sup>13</sup> With white paper To go to writing school, An old butler, 25 Become a cutler, I ween <sup>14</sup> shall prove a fool. An old trot, <sup>15</sup> That good can not But ever kiss the cup, <sup>16</sup> 30 With her physic <sup>17</sup> Will keep one sick Till she have soused <sup>18</sup> him up. A man of law That never saw 35 The ways to buy and sell, Weening to arise By merchandise, I pray God speed him well. A merchant eke, <sup>19</sup> 40 That will go seke, <sup>20</sup> By all the means he may,	To fall in suit <sup>21</sup> Till he dispute His money clean away, Pleading the law 45 For every straw, Shall prove a thrifty man With bate <sup>22</sup> and strife; But by my life, I cannot tell you whan. <sup>23</sup> 50 When an hatter Will go smatter <sup>24</sup> In philosophy, Or a peddler Wax <sup>25</sup> a meddler 55 In theology; All that ensue <sup>26</sup> Such craftés new, They drive so far a-cast <sup>27</sup> That evermore 60 They do, therefore, Beshrew <sup>28</sup> themself at last. This thing was tried And verified Here by a sergeant late <sup>29</sup> 65 That rifely <sup>30</sup> was, Or <sup>31</sup> he could pass, <sup>32</sup> Rapped about the pate, <sup>33</sup> While that he would <sup>34</sup> See how he could 70 In God's name play the frère; Now if you wyll <sup>35</sup> Know how it fyll, <sup>36</sup> Take heed and ye shall hear. It happéd so, 75 Not long ago, A thrifty <sup>37</sup> man there <sup>38</sup> died. An hundred pound Of nobles <sup>39</sup> round, That had he laid aside, 80 His son he would <sup>40</sup> Should have this gold, For to begin with all:
---	---

1 French for brother, monk 2 knows 3 way 4 undertake 5 skill, occupation 6 knows 7 like to thee: likely to prosper 8 left 9 one who makes or sells stockings and socks 10 shoes 11 prosperity 12 almost completely 13 cloth maker or dealer 14 think, surmise 15 hag 16 i.e., the drinking cup 17 medicine 18 intoxicated

 19 also 20 seek 21 lawsuit 22 conflict 23 when 24 dabble 25 become 26 follows 27 astray 28 cause misfortune on 29 recently 30 commonly; amply 31 before 32 leave; accomplish his deception (i.e., pass for a friar) 33 Rapped...pate: Beaten on the crown of his head 34 While...would:

 When he wanted to 35 will, want to 36 happened, befell 37 prosperous 38 "there" is added in the 1557 edition, and added here to fill out the trimester line.
 39 gold coins 40 wished

But to suffice
 85 His child, well thrice
     That money were too small.
 Yet or<sup>41</sup> this day
 I have heard say,
     That many a man certesse<sup>42</sup>
 90 Hath, with good cast,<sup>43</sup>
 Be rich at last
     That hath begun with less.
 But this young man
 So well began 95 His money to employ,
 That certainly,
 His policy,<sup>44</sup>
     To see it was a joy.
 For lest some blast<sup>45</sup> 100 Might over cast
     His ship, or by mischance
 Men with some wile
 Might him beguile
     And minish<sup>46</sup> his substance;
 105 For to put out
 All manner doubt,
     He made a good purvey<sup>47</sup>
 For every whyt,<sup>48</sup>
 (By his own wyt)
 110 And took another way.
 First, fair and wele,<sup>49</sup>
 A great dele,<sup>50</sup>
     He dight<sup>51</sup> it in a pot;
 But then him thought,
 115 That way was nought,<sup>52</sup>
     And there he left it not.
 So was he fain,<sup>53</sup>
 From thence again,
     To put it in a cup;
 120 And, by and by,<sup>54</sup>
 Covetously,
     He supped it fair up.<sup>55</sup>
 In his own breast,
 He thought it best,
 125 His money to enclose.
 Then wist<sup>56</sup> he well,
 Whatever fell,

He could it never lose.
 He borrowed than,<sup>57</sup>
 Of another man, 130
     Money and merchandise.
 Never paid it;
 Up he laid it,
     In like manner wise.<sup>58</sup>
 Yet on the gear,<sup>59</sup> 135
 That he would wear,
     He rough<sup>60</sup> not what he spent,
 So it were nice,
 As for the price
     Could him not discontent. 140
 With lusty sport,
 And with resort<sup>61</sup>
     Of jolly company,
 In mirth and play,
 Full many a day 145
     He livéd merrily.
 And men had sworn,
 Some man is born
     To have a goodly flour,<sup>62</sup>
 And so was he, 150
 For such degree<sup>63</sup>
     He gat,<sup>64</sup> and such honour,
 That without doubt,
 When he went out,
     A sergeant well and fair 155
 Was ready straight,<sup>65</sup>
 On him to wait
     As soon as on the may'r.<sup>66</sup>
 But he, doubtless
 Of his meekness, 160
     Hated such pomp and pride,
 And would not go
 Comp'nied<sup>67</sup> so,
     But drew himself aside,
 To Saint Katherine,<sup>68</sup> 165
 Straight as a line,<sup>69</sup>
     He gat him at a tide.<sup>70</sup>
 For devotion,
 Or promotion,<sup>71</sup>
     There would he needs abide. 170
 There spent he fast

41 before 42 assuredly 43 fortune
 44 shrewdness 45 storm 46 diminish
 47 plan, arrangement 48 creature
 49 well 50 deal 51 hid; also, misused 52 not good 53 obliged 54 by and by: immediately 55 supped... up: drank

it up completely 56 knew 57 then 58 in... wise: in the same way; i.e., he drank it 59 apparel 60 cared 61 help 62 flowering 63 degree
 64 got 65 immediately 66 mayor
 67 accompanied 68 Saint Katherine:

Hospital by the Tower; a sanctuary for debtors 69 Straight as a line: immediately (proverbial) 70 at a... tide: for a time 71 informing against someone; here, gather information against those to whom he owes money

	Till all was past, And to him came there many To ask their debt, 175 But none could get The valor <sup>72</sup> of a penny. With visage stout, <sup>73</sup> He bare it out <sup>74</sup> Unto the hard hedge, <sup>75</sup> 180 A month or twain, <sup>76</sup> Till he was fain <sup>77</sup> To lay his gown to pledge. Then was he there, In greater fere, <sup>78</sup> 185 Then, or <sup>79</sup> that he came thither, And would as fain <sup>80</sup> Depart again, But that he wist <sup>81</sup> not whither. Then, after this, 190 To a friend of his He went and there abode, Where, as he lay So sick alway, He might not come abrode. <sup>82</sup> 195 It happéd than, A merchant man That he ought <sup>83</sup> money to, Of an officer Then 'gan <sup>84</sup> inquire, 200 What him was best to do. And he answered, "Be not afeared, Take an action <sup>85</sup> therefore; I you behest, <sup>86</sup> 205 I shall him 'rest, <sup>87</sup> And then care for no more." <sup>88</sup> "I fear," quod he, "It will not be, For he will not come out." 210 The sergeant sayd, "Be not afraid, It shall be brought about. In many a game, Like to the same, <sup>89</sup> 215 Have I been well in ure, <sup>90</sup>	And for your sake, Let me be bake, <sup>91</sup> But if <sup>92</sup> I do this cure." Thus part they both, And forth him go'th 220 Apace, this officere, And for a day, All his array He changéd with a frère. So was he dight <sup>93</sup> 225 That no man might Him for a frère deny, He dopped and douked, <sup>94</sup> He spake and loked So religiously. 230 Yet in a glass, <sup>95</sup> Or he would pass, <sup>96</sup> He touted <sup>97</sup> and he peered: His heart for pride Leapt in his side, 235 To see how well he frèred. <sup>98</sup> Then forth apace, Unto the place, He goeth, in God's name, To do this deed. 240 But now take heed, For here beginneth the game. He drew him nigh <sup>99</sup> And softly At the door he knocked; 245 A demoiselle, <sup>100</sup> That heard him well, Came and it unlocked. The frère sayd, "God speed, <sup>101</sup> fair maid; 250 Here lodgeth such a man, It is told me . . ." "Well, sir," quod <sup>102</sup> she "And if he do, what than?" Quod he, "Mistress, 255 No harm, doubtless; It 'longeth for our order To hurt no man, But, as we can,
--	--	--

72 value 73 brave; also proud or arrogant 74 bare it out: endured 75 Unto . . .
hedge: to the very edge (proverbial)
76 two 77 obliged 78 fear 79 before 80 willingly (as he had come) 81 know
82 abroad 83 owed 84 began

85 legal action 86 promise 87 arrest 88 care . . . more: no longer be troubled (by him) 89 the same: this situation 90 in ure: accustomed to 91 baked (an exclamation) 92 But if: Unless 93 dressed 94 dopped and douked: bowed and cringed

95 mirror 96 Or . . . pass: Before he would depart 97 gazed 98 to act the part of a friar (More's playful invention) 99 near 100 young, unmarried woman 101 make you prosper 102 said

260	Every wight <sup>103</sup> to forder. <sup>104</sup> With him, truly, Fain <sup>105</sup> speak would I.” “Sir,” quod she, “By my fay, <sup>106</sup> He is so sike, <sup>107</sup> 265 Ye be not like <sup>108</sup> To speak with him today.” Quod he, “Fair may, <sup>109</sup> Yet I you pray, This much, at my desire, 270 Vouchsafe <sup>110</sup> to do, As to go him to And say an Austen frèrè <sup>111</sup> Would with him speak And matters break <sup>112</sup> 275 For his avail <sup>113</sup> certain.” Quod she, “I will; Stand ye here still Till I come down again.” Up is she go 280 And told him so As she was bode <sup>114</sup> to say. He, mistrusting No manner thing, Said, “Maiden, go thy way 285 And fetch him hither, That we together May talk. Adown she go’th, And up she brought No harm, she thought; 290 But it made some folk wroth. But this officere, This feigned frèrè, When he was come aloft, He dopped <sup>115</sup> than, 295 And greet this man Religiously and oft. And he, again Right glad and fain, <sup>116</sup> Took him there by the hand. 300 The frèrè then sayd, “Ye be dismayed With trouble, I understand.” “Indeed,” quod he, “It hath with me	305 Been better than it is.” “Sir,” quod the frèrè, “Be of good chere; Yet shall it after this. For Christ’s sake, Look that you take 310      No thought in your breast; God may turn all — And so he shall, I trust — unto the best. <sup>117</sup> But I would now 315 Come in with you In counsel, if you please — Or else nat <sup>118</sup> — Of matters that Shall set your heart at ease.” 320 Down went the maid. The merchant said, “Now say on, gentle frèrè. Of all this tiding That ye me bring, 325      I long full sore to hear.” When there was none But they alone, The frèrè, with evil grace, Said, “I ’rest <sup>119</sup> thee. 330 Come on with me,” And out he took his mace. “Thou shalt obey. Come on thy way, I have thee in my clouch. <sup>120</sup> 335 Thou goest not hence For all the pence The mayor hath in his pouch.” This merchant there, For wrath and fere, <sup>121</sup> 340      Waxed well-nigh wood, <sup>122</sup> Said, “Whoreson thief, With a mischief, <sup>123</sup> Who hath taught thee good?” And with his fist, 345 Upon the list <sup>124</sup> He gave him such a blow That backward down, Almost in swown, <sup>125</sup>
-----	--	--

103 person 104 help 105 gladly 106 faith 107 sick 108 unlikely 109 maiden 110 deign, agree 111 Austen frère: Augustinian friar (St. Katherine’s, where the man had sought refuge previously, was an Augustinian hospital)

112 disclose 113 benefit 114 bidden
115 bowed his head 116 well-pleased
117 See Rom 8:28. 118 not 119 arrest
120 clutch 121 fear 122 crazy, mad

123 with a mischief: expletive; misfortune on you 124 ear 125 in swown: fallen down; in a swoon

THE FORTUNE VERSES

THE PROLOGUE

As often as I consider these old noble clerks,<sup>1</sup> Poets, Orators, and Philosophers, sects<sup>2</sup> three,
 5 How wonderful they were, in all their works
 How eloquent, how inventive in every degree,
 Half amazed I am, and as a dead tree
 Stand still, over-rude<sup>3</sup> for to bring forth
 Any fruit or sentence that is ought worth.<sup>4</sup>

10 Nevertheless, though rude<sup>5</sup> I be in all contriving Of matters, yet somewhat<sup>6</sup> to make, I need not to care;
 I see many a one occupied in the same thing.
 Lo, unlearned men nowadays will not spare
 To write, to babble, their mindés to declare, 15 Trowing<sup>7</sup> themself gay fantasies to draw,
 When all their cunning is not worth a straw.

Some in French chronicles gladly doth presume.
 Some in English blindly wade and wander.
 Another in Latin bloweth forth a dark fume,<sup>8</sup>
 20 As wise as a great-headed Ass of Alexander.<sup>9</sup>
 Some in philosophy, like a gagging<sup>10</sup> gander, Beginneth lustily<sup>11</sup> the brows to set up,<sup>12</sup>
 And at the last concludeth in the good ale cup.

Finis Prologus,<sup>13</sup>

25 quod<sup>14</sup> T. M.

Fortune perverse
 Qui le monde verses
 Tout à ton désire
 Jamais tu ne cesses
 30 Pleine de finesse
 Et y prends plaisir.
 Par toi viennent maux
 Et guerres mortelles
 Tous inconvenients,
 35 Par monts et par vaux

1 scholars 2 kinds of people 3 too unlearned 4 ought worth: having any value 5 unlearned 6 something worth-while 7 believing 8 smoke 9 Ass of Alexander: reference unclear; possibly expressing contempt for Alexander the Great's excess and drunkenness 10 cackling 11 with vigor 12 the brows to set up: to be full of contempt 13 Finis Prologus: End Prologue 14 said 15 Fortune . . .

gens: Perverse Fortune, / Who turn the world / All at your desire, / You never cease, / Full of cunning; / And you take pleasure in it. / Through you come evils / And mortal wars, / All disadvantages; / On the mountains and in the valleys / And in the hospitals / So many people die. 16 Fortune . . . forsaketh: These two stanzas are a translation of a Latin epigram, attributed to Caelius Firmianus Symphosius

(4th-5th century AD). More's version strengthens the indictment of Fortune and omits any mention of poverty. 17 destroys 18 those deserving reproof 19 guarantee 20 screech 21 robs 22 what 23 loses 24 hath no difference: does not discern 25 rational conduct 26 slippery, unreliable 27 state, position 28 (do) not 29 man's 30 planning 31 decree 32 foolishly 33 luck 34 intelligence

Et aux hôpitaux
 Meurent tant de gens.<sup>15</sup>

Fortune, O mighty and variable,<sup>16</sup>
 What rule thou claimest, with thy cruel power!
 Good folk thou stroyest,<sup>17</sup> and lovest reprobable.<sup>18</sup> 40
 Thou mayst not warrant<sup>19</sup> thy gifts for one hour.
 Fortune unworthy men setteth in honor.
 Through Fortune, th'innocent in woe and sorrow shritcheth.<sup>20</sup>
 The just man she spoileth,<sup>21</sup> and the unjust enricheth.

Young men she killeth, and letteth old men live, 45
 Unrighteously dividing time and season.
 That<sup>22</sup> good men leeseth,<sup>23</sup> to wicked doth she give.
 She hath no difference,<sup>24</sup> but judgeth all good reason:<sup>25</sup> Inconstant, slipper,<sup>26</sup> frail, and full of treason, Neither forever cherishing whom she taketh, 50
 Nor forever oppressing whom she forsaketh.

Finish, quod T. M.

THE WORDS OF FORTUNE TO THE PEOPLE

Mine high estate,<sup>27</sup> power, and auctory,
 If ye ne<sup>28</sup> know, ensearch and ye shall spy 55
 That riches, worship, and dignity,
 Joy, rest, and peace, and all-thing finally That any pleasure or profit may come by
 To mannés<sup>29</sup> comfort, aid, and sustenance,
 Is all at my device<sup>30</sup> and ordinance.<sup>31</sup> 60

Without my favor, there is nothing won.
 Many a matter have I brought at last
 To good conclusion, that fondly<sup>32</sup> was begun.
 And many a purpose, bounden sure and fast
 With wise provision, I have overcast. 65
 Without good hap,<sup>33</sup> there may no wit<sup>34</sup> suffice:
 Better is to be fortunate than wise.

And, therefore, hath some men been, or<sup>35</sup> this,
 My deadly foes, and written many a book
 70 To my dispraise. And other cause there n'is,<sup>36</sup>
 But for me list<sup>37</sup> not friendly on them look.
 Thus, like the fox they fare, that once forsook
 The pleasant grapes, and 'gan<sup>38</sup> for to defy<sup>39</sup> them, Because he leapt and leapt and could not come by them. 110

But let them write; the labor is in vain.
 For well ye wot,<sup>40</sup> mirth, honor, and riches<sup>41</sup> Better is than shame, penury, and pain.
 The needy wretch that lingereth in distress
 Without mine help is ever comfortless,
 80 A weary burden, odious and loath
 To all the world, and to himself, both.

But he that by my favor may ascend
 To mighty power and excellent degree,
 A commonweal to govern and defend, 85 O in how blessed condition standeth he:
 Himself in honor and felicity,
 And over<sup>42</sup> that, may further and increase
 An whole region in joy, rest, and peace.

Now in this point there is no more to say;
 90 Each man hath of himself the governance.
 Let every wight<sup>43</sup> then take his own way.
 And he that out of poverty and mischance
 List<sup>44</sup> for to live, and will himself enhance<sup>45</sup>
 In wealth and riches, come forth and wait on me;
 95 And he that will be a beggar, let him be.

TO THEM THAT TRUSTETH IN FORTUNE

Thou that are proud of honor, shape,<sup>46</sup> or kin,
 That heapest up this wretched world's treasure,<sup>47</sup>
 Thy fingers shined with gold, thy tawny skin 100 With fresh apparel garnished out of measure,<sup>48</sup>
 And weenest<sup>49</sup> to have Fortune always at thy pleasure,
 Cast up thine eye, and look how slipper<sup>50</sup> Chance
 Eludeth her men with change and variance.

Sometime she looketh as lovely, fair, and bright
 As goodly Venus, mother of Cupide, 105
 She beckett<sup>51</sup> and smileth upon every wight.
 But this feigned cheer may not abide;
 There cometh a cloud, and farewell all our pride.
 Like any serpent, she beginneth to swell,
 And looketh as fierce as any fury of hell. 110

Yet for all that, we brittle men are fain,<sup>52</sup>
 So wretched is our nature and so blind,
 As soon as Fortune list to laugh again,
 With fair countenance and deceitful mind,
 To crouch and kneel and gape after the wind. 115
 Not one or twain,<sup>53</sup> but thousands on a rout,<sup>54</sup>
 Like swarming bees, come flattering her about.

Then, as a bait, she bringeth forth her ware:
 Silver, gold, rich pearl, and precious stone,
 On which the mazéd<sup>55</sup> people gaze and stare, 120
 And gape<sup>56</sup> therefor, as doggés for the bone.
 Fortune at them laugheth; and in her trone,<sup>57</sup>
 Amid her treasure and wavering riches,
 Proudly she hoveth<sup>58</sup> as Lady and Empress.

Fast by her side doth weary Labor stand, 125
 Pale Fear also, and Sorrow all bewept,
 Disdain and Hatred on that other hand,
 Eke<sup>59</sup> restless Watch, from sleep with travail<sup>60</sup> kept,
 His eyes drowsy and looking as he slept;
 Before her standeth Danger and Envy, 130
 Flattery, Deceit, Mischief, and Tyranny.

About her cometh all the world to beg:
 He asketh land; and he to pass would bring
 This toy and that, and all not worth an egg; 135
 He would in love prosper above all-thing;
 He kneeleth down and would be made a king;
 He forceth not, so<sup>61</sup> he may money have,
 Though all the world accompt<sup>62</sup> him for a knave.

Lo, thus diveris<sup>63</sup> heads, diveris wittes.
 Fortune alone, as diveris as they all, 140
 Unstable, here and there among them flittes:
 And, at adventure,<sup>64</sup> down her giftés fall,
 Catch whoso may; she throweth great and small

35 before 36 is not 37 please 38 began 39 despise 40 know
 41 wealth 42 besides 43 person
 44 Desires 45 will... enhance: wishes to increase 46 beauty 47 That...

treasure: Mt 6:19–20 48 excessively 49 hope 50 fickle 51 beckons, or curtsies to show respect 52 glad 53 two 54 on a rout: in a crowd 55 amazed 56 desire, long for 57 throne; a weighing scale 58 hovers, remains above 59 Also 60 toil 61 forceth not, so: doesn't care, provided that 62 account; reckon 63 different, various 64 random

- 145 Not to all men, as cometh sun or dew,
But, for the most part, all among a few.
- And yet, her brotel<sup>65</sup> giftés may not last.
He that<sup>66</sup> she gave them looketh proud and high;
She whirleth about and plucketh away as fast,
And giveth them to another by and by.
150 And thus, from man to man continually,
She useth<sup>67</sup> to give and take, and slyly toss
One man to winning of another's loss.
- And when she robbeth one, down go'th his pride;
He weepeth and waileth and curseth her full sore.<sup>68</sup> 155 But he that receiveth it, on that other side,
Is glad, and blesseth her a thousand times therefore.
But in a while, when she loveth him no more,
She glideth from him, and her giftés too,
And he her cuseth,<sup>69</sup> as other foolés do.
- 160 Alas, the foolish people cannot cease
Ne void<sup>70</sup> her train,<sup>71</sup> till they the harm feel.
About her alway, busily they prese.<sup>72</sup>
But Lord, what he thinketh himself wele,<sup>73</sup>
That may set once his hand upon her wheel.
165 He holdeth fast, but upward as he stieth,<sup>74</sup>
She whippeth her wheel about, and there he lieth.
- Thus fell Julius<sup>75</sup> from his mighty power.
Thus fell Darius,<sup>76</sup> the worthy king of Perse.<sup>77</sup>
Thus fell Alexander,<sup>78</sup> the sovereign conqueror.
170 Thus many mo<sup>79</sup> than I may well rehearse.
Thus, double<sup>80</sup> Fortune, when she list<sup>81</sup> reverse
Her slipper<sup>82</sup> favor from them that in her trust,
She flieth her way,<sup>83</sup> and layeth them in the dust.
- She suddenly enhanceth them aloft,
175 And suddenly mischieveth<sup>84</sup> all the flock.
The head that late lay easily and soft,
Instead of pillows, li'th after on the block.<sup>85</sup>
And yet, alas, the cruel proud mock:<sup>86</sup>
- The dainty mouth, that ladies kissed have,
She bringeth in the case<sup>87</sup> to kiss a knave. 180
- Thus when she changeth her uncertain course,
Up starteth a knave, and down there falleth a knight;
The beggar rich, and the rich man poor is;
Hatred is turned to love, love to despise.<sup>88</sup>
This is her sport; thus proveth she her might. 185
Great boast she maketh if one, by her power,
Wealthy and wretched both in an howre.
- Poverty, that of her gifts will nothing take,
With merry cheer she looketh on the prese,<sup>89</sup>
And seeth how Fortune's household go'th to wrack.<sup>90</sup> 190
- Fast by her standeth the wise Socrates, Aristippus,<sup>91</sup> Pythagoras,<sup>92</sup> and many a lese<sup>93</sup>
Of old philosophers; and eke<sup>94</sup> against the sun
Beeketh him<sup>95</sup> poor Diogenes<sup>96</sup> in his tun.<sup>97</sup>
- With her is Bias,<sup>98</sup> whose country lacked defense, 195
And whilom<sup>99</sup> of their foes stood in doubt,
That each man hastily gan<sup>100</sup> to carry thence,<sup>101</sup>
And askéd him why he nought<sup>102</sup> carried out.
"I bear," quod<sup>103</sup> he, "all mine with me about."
Wisdom he meant, no<sup>104</sup> Fortune's brittle fees;<sup>105</sup> 200
For nought<sup>106</sup> he counted his that he might leese.<sup>107</sup>
- Heraclitus,<sup>108</sup> eke, list<sup>109</sup> fellowship to keep
With glad Poverty; Democritus<sup>110</sup> also;
Of which the first can never cease but weep
To see how thick<sup>111</sup> the blind people go 205
With great labor to purchase care and woe.
That other laugheth to see the foolish apes,
How earnestly they walk about their japes.<sup>112</sup>
- Of this poor sect, it is the usage
Only to take that nature may sustain, 210
Banishing clean<sup>113</sup> all other surplusage,<sup>114</sup>

65 frail, perishable 66 to whom 67 is accustomed 68 bitterly 69 accuses 70 Ne void: Nor leave 71 entourage; also trap 72 press 73 well-off 74 rises up
75 Julius Caesar, 100–44 BC 76 Darius the Great, 550–486 BC, was King of Persia at that empire's height. 77 Persia
78 Alexander the Great, 356–323 BC
79 more 80 deceitful 81 desires to 82 fickle 83 her way: following 1556 and 1557 texts 84 harms 85 i.e., the executioner's block 86 mockery

87 in the case: perhaps 88 disdain
89 throng 90 ruin 91 Aristippus of Cyrene, 435–356 BC, pupil of Socrates, founder of the Cyrenaic school of philosophy 92 Pythagoras of Samos, 570–495 BC, philosopher and mathematician 93 group of three (hunting term) 94 also 95 beeketh him:
warms himself 96 Diogenes the Cynic, 412–323 BC, was a founder of the Cynic school of philosophy, famous for mocking Alexander the Great, sleeping in a large jar

in the marketplace (the "tun" of this line).
97 barrel or cask 98 Bias of Priene,
6th century BC, pre-Socratic philosopher 99 while 100 began 101 away from there 102 nothing 103 said 104 not 105 goods 106 nothing 107 lose
108 Heraclitus of Ephesus, 535–475 BC
109 desires 110 Democritus, 460–
370 BC, famous for his atomic hypothesis of matter 111 numerous 112 tricks;
playthings 113 completely 114 excess;
surplus

- They be content, and of nothing complain.
 No niggard eke is of his goods so fain,<sup>115</sup>
 But they more pleasure have a thousandfold, 215 The secret draughts<sup>116</sup> of nature to behold.
- Set Fortune's servants by themselves and ye will,<sup>117</sup>
 That one is free, that other ever thrall,<sup>118</sup>
 That one content, that other never full,
 That one in sur'ty,<sup>119</sup> that other like<sup>120</sup> to fall.
 220 Who list to advise them both, perceive he shall
 As great difference between them as we see Betwixt wretchedness and felicity.
- Now have I showed you both: choose which ye list, Stately Fortune, or humble Poverty;
 225 That is to say, now lieth it in your fist<sup>121</sup>
 To take you to bondage, or free liberty.
 But in this point, and ye do after me,
 Draw thee to Fortune and labor her to please
 If that ye think yourself too well at ease.
- 230 And first, upon thee, lovely shall she smile,
 And friendly on thee cast her wandering eyes,
 Embrace thee in her arms, and, for a while,
 Put thee into a fool's paradise.
 And forthwith, all whatso you list devise,<sup>122</sup>
 235 She will thee grant it liberally, perhaps.
 But for all that, beware of afterclaps.<sup>123</sup>
- Reckon you never of her favor sure:
 Ye may in the clouds as easily trace<sup>124</sup> an hare,
 Or in dry land cause fishes to endure,
 240 And make the brenning<sup>125</sup> fire his heat to spare,
 And all this world encompass to forfare,<sup>126</sup>
 As her to make by craft of engine<sup>127</sup> stable,
 That of her nature is ever variable.
- Serve her day and night as reverently 245 Upon thy knees as any<sup>128</sup> servant may,
 And in conclusion, that<sup>129</sup> thou shalt win thereby Shall not be worth thy service, I dare say.
 And look yet; what she giveth thee today,
 With labor won, she shall haply<sup>130</sup> tomorrow 250 Pluck it out of thine hand again<sup>131</sup> with sorrow.
- Wherefore, if thou in sur'ty list<sup>132</sup> to stand,
 Take Poverty's part and let proud Fortune go;
 Receive nothing that cometh from her hand.
 Love manner<sup>133</sup> and virtue, for they be only tho<sup>134</sup>
 Which double<sup>135</sup> Fortune may never take thee fro.<sup>136</sup> 255
 Then mayst thou boldly defy her, turning<sup>137</sup> Chance:
 She can thee neither hinder nor advance.
- But and thou wilt needs<sup>138</sup> meddle with her treasure,
 Trust not therein, and spend it liberally.
 Bear<sup>139</sup> thee not proud, nor take not out of 260 measure.
- Build not thine house high up in the sky.
 None falleth far, but he that climbeth high;
 Remember, nature sent thee hither bare;
 The gifts of Fortune, count them borrowed ware.
- TO THEM THAT SEEKETH FORTUNE 265
- Whoso delighteth to prove and assay,<sup>140</sup>
 Of wavering Fortune, the full uncertain lot,
 If that the answer please thee not alway,
 Blame not me: for I command you not Fortune to trust; and eke<sup>141</sup> full well ye wot,<sup>142</sup> 270
 I have of her no bridle in my fist.
 She runneth loose, and turneth where she list.
- The rolling dice, in whom your luck doth stand,
 With whose unhappy chance ye be so wroth,
 Ye know yourself came never in mine hand. 275
 Lo, in this pond be fish and frogs both.
 Cast in your net; but be you lief<sup>143</sup> or loath,<sup>144</sup> Hold you content as Fortune list<sup>145</sup> assign;
 It is your own fishing, and not mine.
- And though, in one chance, Fortune you offend, 280
 Grutch<sup>146</sup> not thereat, but bear a merry face;
 In many another she shall it amend.
 There is no man so far out of her grace
 But he sometime hath comfort and solace;
 Ne none<sup>147</sup> again so far-forth<sup>148</sup> in her favor 285
 That fully satisfied is with her behavior.

115 glad 116 plans, designs 117 and ye will: if you will 118 enslaved 119 surety, security 120 likely 121 grasp 122 list devise: desire to contrive 123 unexpected consequences 124 pursue 125 burning 126 destroy

127 ingenuity 128 following 1556 and 1557 texts 129 what 130 perhaps 131 1556 and 1557 add "again" to produce the decasyllabic line. 132 sur'ty list:
 security wish 133 moderation 134 those (things) 135 deceitful 136 thee fro:

from you 137 revolving 138 and thou wilt needs: if you must 139 behave 140 test 141 also 142 know 143 glad 144 reluctant 145 desires to 146 Murmur, complain 147 Ne none: Not one (is) 148 so far-forth: to such an extent

Lucian Dialogues and Declamations

Thomas More's Translations and Response

These translations of Lucian of Samosata (ca. 125–80 AD) are among Thomas More's earliest Latin writings. More had begun his study of Greek by 1501, and these translations are, as he puts it, the "first fruits of my Greek studies," published in 1506 in collaboration with Erasmus. The first of More's Latin writings to be published, these translations proved More's most popular work during his lifetime. Reprinted nine times between 1506 and 1534, the translations exceed even Utopia on this count, and attest to the general interest in Lucian during More's lifetime, and to the skills and reputations of the translators (CW 3.1: xxv).

For this volume, More contributed three dialogue translations, along with his prefatory letter to Thomas Ruthall, and an original declamation in response to Lucian's Tyrannicide, which he also translated. Erasmus offered his own dialogue translations, and he too supplied a declamation in response to Lucian's Tyrannicide, part of what he called a "contest of wits" with More, "that most congenial of all my friends, in whose company I enjoy combining jest and earnest" (CWE 2: 113).

So why translate Lucian? More's letter to Ruthall praises Lucian as an author who "everywhere reprimands and censures, with very honest and at the same time very entertaining wit, our human frailties." Lucian does so with such art that "although no one pricks more deeply, nobody resents his stinging words." Lucian, in More's judgment, fulfills Horace's famous maxim of mingling delight and learning as well as any author does, a position echoed by Erasmus too, who claims that Lucian's "superb wit" invites us to see human beings "with our own eyes" so successfully that "whether you look for pleasure or edification, there is not a comedy or satire that challenges comparison with his dialogues" (CWE 2: 116). While More and Erasmus admired Lucian for his wit and vision, Lucian was also associated with skepticism, scoffing, and irreverence at the time, and More himself was even termed a Lucian during later controversies (CW 3.1: xxii–xxiv).

More chooses his three dialogues—The Cynic, Menippus, and Lover of Lies—because they exhibit Lucian's art "exceptionally well" and "particularly struck my fancy," likely on account of their irony, a figure that More uses repeatedly across his writings. A classical figure, irony has a range of meanings for Lucian and More. As Craig Thompson explains, irony may mean: "first, ironical speech, (a) the rhetorical tactic of saying one thing while meaning another and usually contrary thing, e.g. praising when one is blaming and vice versa, (b) understatement or litotes; (c) intentional over-simplification; second, an habitual manner or cast of mind, specifically an assumed self-depreciation such as that practiced by Socrates; third, the irony of situation or fortune, when decisions and actions planned or carried out for supposedly sound, logical, dependable reasons produce instead wholly unforeseen and often catastrophic results" (CW 3.1: l–li). More explicitly discusses irony as a manner of speech that "every man uses," for example, when he chooses to call a naughty boy "a good son" (CW 10: 24), and in his last work, written in the Tower, More argues that understanding irony as a figure of speech is necessary to grasp the "real sense" of speech, literary or ordinary (CW 14: 295–97). Later in 1560, Thomas Wilson compares More with Socrates for their use of irony or "pleasant dissembling," in his Art of Rhetoric. Like Socrates and Plato, More uses irony as a strategy to awaken and engage the intellect, in the service of discovery and deeper insight.

In addition to his irony, Lucian's fusion of comedy and dialogue no doubt struck More as well. As Lucian explains in Bis accusatus, comedy and dialogue do not "easily tolerate partnership," because dialogue loves to ponder "nature and virtue," while comedy delights in jests, quips, and "liberties." Despite this tension, Lucian claims that he has "dared to combine them as they are into a harmony," a combination More explores in writings such as Utopia and A Dialogue of Sir Thomas More, Knight, with their serious play of wit, pleasure, and reason.

The last work More includes is also his most original: the declamation in response to Lucian's Tyrannicide. In rhetorical declamation exercises like this, a common part of education at the time, the writer "professedly commits himself to an imagined, fictive argument and thereby claims immunity from being taken literally" (CW 3.1: xxxv–xxxvi). More's reply to Lucian is made in the voice of a citizen-orator. Offering his services to his country and speaking with a concern for law and liberty, the speaker critiques the tyrannicide's fanciful arguments. More's declamation not only demonstrates his rhetorical skill but also serves as an example of his lifelong interest in tyranny. As Erasmus wrote in his letter to von Hutton, More had a "special hatred for tyranny" and a corresponding love of equality and friendship. The treatment of tyranny here curiously anticipates his later considerations in Richard the Third, Utopia, the Epigrams, and elsewhere. More's declamation was praised by Erasmus as an example of the author's eloquence and discerning mind.

The three Lucian dialogues and Lucian's "Tyrannicide" are translated from More's Latin into English by Gerald Malsbary. Modern scholarship has cast doubts on the Lucianic authorship of The Cynic, but that is of little consequence for the study of More. The other translations of More's Letter to Ruthall and More's response to Lucian's "Tyrannicide" are by Craig R. Thompson, from volume 3.1 of The Complete Works of St. Thomas More (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1974). The Greek references are from the Loeb Classical Library's Lucian, ed. M. D. McLeod (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1967). The section numbers are taken from this Greek edition and are included to assist the reader; they did not appear in More's Latin editions.

CONTENTS

Letter to Thomas Ruthall . . . . .	20
The Cynic . . . . .	22
Menippus or A Consultation with the Dead. . . . .	27
The Lover of Lies or The Sceptic. . . . .	34
The Tyrannicide or Declamation on Behalf of the Tyrant-slayer . . . . .	45
Thomas More's Declamation in Response to Lucian's "Tyrannicide" . . . . .	51

de la ampa de Jany de conde na B<sup>o</sup> 29.

Luciani viri q̄ disertissimi cōpluria opuscula longe festiuissima ab Erasmo Roterodamo & Thoma moro interpretibus optimis in latinorum linguam traducta. hac sequentur serie.

Ex Erasmi interpretatione

Toxaris siue de amicitia Luciani dialogus.

Alexander qui & Pseudomantis eiusdem.

Gallus siue Somnium eiusdem quoq; luciani

Timon seu Misanthropus.

Tyrannicida seu pro tyrannicida eiusdem declamatio.

Cum declamatione Erasmica eidem respondente.

De iis qui mercede conducti degunt dialogus eiusdem.

Et quædam eiusdem alia

Ex Mori traductione.

Tyrannicida Luciani Moro interprete.

Declamatio Mori de eodem.

Cynicus Luciani a Moro versus

Menippus seu Necromantia Luciani eodem interprete.

Philopseudes seu incredulus Luciani ab eodē Moro in latinā linguā traductus:

Ex ædibus Ascensianis.

Ordubensy Societatis Jany Regij. B<sup>o</sup> 29.

J. R.

5. To Thomas Ruthall.

<London 1506>

To the most illustrious and learned Thomas Ruthall, English Royal Secretary, Thomas More sends greeting.

If, most learned sir, there was ever anyone who fulfilled the Horatian maxim and combined delight with instruction,<sup>1</sup> I think Lucian certainly ranked among the foremost in this respect. Refraining from the arrogant pronouncements of the philosophers as well as from the wanton wiles of the poets, he everywhere reprimands and censures, with very honest and at the same time very entertaining wit, our human frailties. And this he does so cleverly and effectively that although no one pricks more deeply, nobody resents his stinging words.<sup>2</sup> He is always first-rate at this, but in my opinion he has done it exceptionally well in these three dialogues, which for this very reason I have chosen, from such an abundance of exceedingly pleasant ones, to translate, though perhaps other persons might much prefer other dialogues. For just as, among girls, all men do not love the same one, but each has his own preference as fancy dictates and adores not the one he can prove is best but the one who seems best to him — so of the most agreeable dialogues of Lucian, one man likes a certain one best, another prefers another; and these have particularly struck my fancy, yet not without reason, I trust, nor mine alone.

For to begin with the shortest, which is called Cynicus, and which might appear unacceptable on account of its very brevity, did not Horace<sup>3</sup> remind us that the greater strength is often to be found in a slight body, and did not we ourselves see that even the smallest jewels are prized? My choice of it is endorsed by the estimable approval of Saint John Chrysostom, a man of the most acute judgment, of all learned men perhaps the most Christian and (at least in my opinion) of all Christians the most learned. So much did this dialogue delight him that he introduced a large part of it into a homily he composed on the Gospel of Saint John.<sup>4</sup> And not without reason: for what should have pleased that grave and truly Christian man more than this dialogue in which, while the severe life of Cynics, satisfied with little, is defended and the soft, enervating luxury of voluptuaries denounced, by the same token Christian simplicity, temperance, and frugality, and finally that strait and narrow path which leads to life eternal, are praised?

Next Necromantia, for this is what the second dialogue is called — not very auspicious in its title but felicitous in content — how wittily it rebukes the jugglery of magicians or the silly fictions of poets or the fruitless contentions of philosophers among themselves on any question whatever!

There remains Philopseudes, which, with a measure of Socratic irony, is entirely concerned (as its title indicates) with ridiculing and reproving the inordinate passion for lying. Whether this dialogue is more amusing or more instructive is hard to say. I'm not much troubled by the fact that the author seems to have been disposed to doubt his own immortality, and to have been in the same error as Democritus, Lucretius, Pliny, and many others likewise were. For what difference does it make to me what a pagan thinks about those articles contained in the principal mysteries of the Christian faith? Surely the dialogue will teach us this lesson: that we should put no trust in magic and that we should eschew superstition, which obtrudes everywhere under the guise of religion. It teaches us also that we should live a life less distracted by anxiety; less fearful, that is, of any gloomy and superstitious untruths. Very many of these are related with such a show of confidence and authority that some cunning rogue or other even induced the most blessed father Augustine, a man of complete sobriety and a zealous enemy of lies,<sup>5</sup> to tell as a truth, as something that occurred in his own lifetime, that yarn about two Spurinnae — one coming back to life and the other departing from it — which Lucian made fun of in this dialogue, with only the names changed, so many years before Augustine was born.

You should not be surprised, therefore, if the common herd are taken in by the fictions of those who think they've done a great work, and put Christ in their debt forever, if they've feigned a story about a

<sup>1</sup> The Art of Poetry 333–34, 343    <sup>2</sup> or literally: "... that although no one pricks more deeply, yet no one would receive his barbs without equanimity" (nemo tamen sit, qui non aequo animo illius aculeos admittat).

See note 27 of The Cynic.    <sup>3</sup> uncertain; perhaps Epistle 1.17.40 or 1.20.19–24

<sup>4</sup> The last part of Chrysostom's Homily 80 on John 17:1–5 treats the slavery that comes from excessive attachment to material goods as opposed to the "true wisdom" and freedom of a Christ who paradoxically "emptied himself, taking the nature of a slave."    <sup>5</sup> See De mendacio 10.17.

90 saint or a horrendous tale of hell to drive some old woman to tears or make her tremble with fear. And so there is scarcely a martyr's or a virgin's life which they have passed over without inserting some falsehoods of this kind—with pious intent, to be sure, 95 for otherwise there was danger lest truth could not stand by its own strength but had to be bolstered with lies! They have not shrunk from defiling with their tales that religion which Truth itself established and which it intended to consist of truth unadorned; and they have not considered that fables of 100 this kind, so far from helping at all, do more deadly harm than anything else. Surely, as the aforementioned father Augustine testifies, when the added falsehood is detected, the authority of truth is im-105 mediately diminished and weakened. Wherefore
 I have often suspected that a large portion of such fables has been concocted by certain crafty, wicked wretches and heretics whose object was partly to amuse themselves by the thoughtless credulity of 110 the simple-minded (rather than the wise), partly to undermine trust in the true stories of Christians by traffic in mere fictions; since they often invent things so nearly resembling those in Sacred Scripture that they easily reveal that by playing upon those stories 115 they have been ridiculing them. Therefore we ought to place unquestioning trust in the stories commended to us by divinely inspired Scripture, but testing the others carefully and deliberately by the teaching of Christ (as though applying the rule of Critolaus<sup>6</sup>), we should either accept or reject them if we wish to free ourselves both from foolish confi-120 dence and superstitious dread.

But where am I headed? This epistle already rivals a book in length, yet I haven't said a word so far in praise of you; another man would have dwelt 125 perhaps on that theme exclusively. I had abundant resources for doing so, without being open to the slightest suspicion of flattery. There is—quite apart from the rest of your virtues—your distinction in learning and your unsurpassed wisdom in practi-130 cal affairs, attested by numerous diplomatic missions carried out in various lands with such difficult negotiations and with such success. Or there is your extraordinary trustworthiness and dignity.
 Unless he had regarded this as tried and tested, a 135 sagacious prince would never have appointed you to be Secretary. But your singular modesty, which makes you unwilling to hear yourself praised for the praiseworthy things you so willingly do, balks at publication of your other virtues. Accordingly I 140 spare your sense of propriety, begging only that you kindly accept these first fruits of my Greek studies and treat them as a token, in some sort, of my affection and my duty toward you. I have ventured to submit them to you with the greater confidence 145 because, although your judgment is so keen that nobody would more quickly detect any error there may be, yet your nature is so kind that none would more readily condone it. Farewell.

<sup>6</sup> See Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 5.51.

The Cynic

Characters: Cynic, Lucian

1. LUCIAN:<sup>1</sup> So what are you, then? You have a beard and long hair, but you don't have any shirt; you look naked; you're not wearing shoes — and no wonder, having chosen a roaming, inhuman, bestial way of life, treating your body always unsuitably, and in a manner opposite to the way most people do, wandering about here and there, sleeping besides on bare hard ground so that your worn-out cloak<sup>2</sup> acquires even more dirt,<sup>3</sup> not to mention that it is neither finely woven nor soft nor attractive.

CYNIC: Nor certainly do I need one like that, since one like this is very easy to acquire and gives the least possible trouble to its master,<sup>4</sup> and that kind of cloak, I say, is sufficient for me.

2. But tell me, by the gods, don't you think there is vice in luxury?<sup>5</sup>

LUCIAN: Of course I do.

CYNIC: And, by contrast, that frugality<sup>6</sup> is a virtue?

LUCIAN: Yes.

CYNIC: Then, when you see me living more frugally than most people and them living more luxuriously, why do you correct me, and not them?

LUCIAN: Because, by Jove, you do not seem to me to be living more frugally than they do, but simply in greater poverty: in fact, you are living a poor and needy life. You are no different than beggars who beg for their food every day.

3. CYNIC: Then would you like to examine, now that the conversation has gone this far, what neediness is and then abundance?<sup>7</sup>

LUCIAN: If you want to, yes.

CYNIC: So then, wouldn't you say that "enough" for any person is what satisfies that person's necessity? Or is it something else? 35

LUCIAN: Okay, let that be granted.

CYNIC: But neediness is whatever falls short of what someone has, and does not reach the point that is necessary? 40

LUCIAN: Of course.

CYNIC: Nothing then is lacking in my possessions, since there is nothing that does not satisfy my necessity. 45

4. LUCIAN: How can you say that?

CYNIC: You will understand if you consider the purpose why each of the things we need was made,<sup>8</sup> such as a house. Is it not for the purpose of shelter?

LUCIAN: Yes, very much so. 50

CYNIC: So then, what is the purpose of clothing? Isn't it also a kind of shelter?

LUCIAN: Of course.<sup>9</sup>

CYNIC: And by the gods, what do we need shelter for? Isn't it for the betterment of what is sheltered? 55

LUCIAN: So it seems.

CYNIC: Do my feet, then, seem to be in worse shape?

LUCIAN: I don't know.

CYNIC: But here's how you will find out. What is the duty<sup>10</sup> of feet? 60

LUCIAN: To walk.

CYNIC: Do my feet seem to you to walk less well than the feet of other<sup>11</sup> people?

1 More changes the interlocutor's name from "Lycinus" to "Lucian." 2 More translates the Greek word tribōn in two words (tritum . . . pallium, "worn-out cloak") to bring out the etymology of the Greek word for a "philosopher's cloak" (from the verb tribō, "to wear down"). 3 sordium: can mean "dirt or filth of any kind," "the dark or soiled clothing of mourners," "squalor" associated with poverty, or "meanness of character or conduct" 4 More uses the Latin domino ("master") for the Greek ktēsamenōi (literally "possessor"). 5 luxuria: unruly or willful behavior; disregard for moral restraints, licentiousness; indulgence in extravagance, or good living 6 More consistently translates the Greek euteles ("economical, thrifty") with the Latin frugalis. 7 More translates the Greek

endeēs, hikanon ("lacking," "sufficient") with the Latin inopia, copia ("neediness," "abundance"). 8 Greek gégonen ("happened, came about"); Latin paratum est 9 sane: This term is commonly used ironically. 10 More chooses officium ("duty, function, fitting behavior") for the Greek ergon ("work, deed, task"). 11 More has aliorum ("other people") for the Greek pollōn ("the many people").

LUCIAN: In this case, perhaps not.

CYNIC: But regardless of whether they were in better or in worse shape, would they not be able to perform their own duty?

5 LUCIAN: Perhaps.

CYNIC: So with regard to my feet, do I appear to be any worse off than other people?

LUCIAN: You don't seem to.

10 CYNIC: What then? Is my body in worse shape than the rest of the people? Because if it is, it would be weaker, since strength is bodily health. Is my body any weaker?

LUCIAN: It does not appear to be.

15 CYNIC: Well then, neither my feet nor the rest of my body needs shelter. If they did need it, they would be in a bad condition. For poverty is always bad and makes worse off anything near it. But in fact my body does not seem to be less well nourished, since it is nourished by whatever it happens 20 to get.

LUCIAN: That at least is clear.

CYNIC: Nor would it be healthy and strong, if it were badly nourished. And this is because bad foods weaken bodies.

25 LUCIAN: Yes, that is the case.

5. CYNIC: So tell me, since this is the way things are, why do you find fault with me? Why do you disapprove of my way of life and say it is miserable?

30 LUCIAN: Because, by Jove, nature (which you cherish) and the gods have established the earth for us all in common,<sup>12</sup> and have produced, of course,<sup>13</sup> many good things from it so that we have everything in abundant supply, and not only for necessity, but for pleasure<sup>14</sup> as well. You nonetheless take no part in 35 any of these, or at least not in most of them, and you take no more advantage of them than the animals. You drink the water the animals drink; you eat whatever you find like the dogs, and your bed is no better than what dogs have; straw is as good for 40 you as it is for them; the cloak you wear is no better than a beggar's. But if you are correct in thinking that this is good enough, then the god was wrong to make sheep have plush fleeces, and grapes sweet for wine, and all the other wonderful variety, such as olives and honey and the rest, so that we have all sorts 45 of food and sweet drink and money and soft bedding, lovely houses as well, and finally all the other marvelous provisions.<sup>15</sup> And in fact the benefits of the arts are gifts of the gods. To live deprived of all these things is truly miserable if someone has been 50 deprived of them by someone else, as are people in prison. But much more miserable it is if someone deprives himself of all these goods. For that is really plain madness.

6. CYNIC: Well, perhaps you are right. But tell me:
55 say there is a wealthy man who very eagerly and generously invites people to a banquet and hosts many guests at once, some weak, some in good health, and then serves them all kinds of things, but he himself
60 grabs and eats everything, not only what is near him, but also what is put farther away for the sick guests, even though he is himself in good health and only in possession of one stomach, needing to be nourished only by a little, but taking up more time in doing it 65 than many others. What does such a man seem like to you? Does he seem a good man<sup>16</sup> to you?

LUCIAN: No, not to me.

CYNIC: Self-controlled?

LUCIAN: No, not that, either.

7. CYNIC: What if somebody sitting at the same
70 banquet takes no thought for the great variety of delicacies and chooses only one item from the things that are set near him since he considers that enough for his needs, and he eats it decently,<sup>17</sup> and only eats that, without even looking at the other 75 things? Wouldn't you think this man more self-controlled and a better man than the other?

LUCIAN: Of course I would.

CYNIC: Well, do you understand yet, or do I have to tell you?
80

LUCIAN: What?

CYNIC: That god is just like a host who sets out a beautiful banquet, who serves many and various

<sup>12</sup> More translates the Greek en mésōi ("in our midst, in the middle of us all") by in communi. <sup>13</sup> More adds nimirum ("and

no wonder," "of course"). <sup>14</sup> Greek pros hēdonēn; Latin ad voluptatem <sup>15</sup> Greek kataskeuásmata; Latin praeparata <sup>16</sup> More

uses probus ("good, upright, honest") for Greek phronimos ("prudent") <sup>17</sup> Greek kosmíos; Latin decenter

things, all kinds of things, to be suitable for each person: some things for the healthy, other things for the sick, some things for the strong, others for the weak — not that every one of us gets everything, but that each of us makes use of what most fits his own nature, selecting from just those things whatever happens to be most needed.

8. But you people resemble the one who snatches everything without being satisfied and without self-control, as if you wanted to use everything, no matter where they are taken from, and not being content with things that are at hand; you think neither your own land nor sea is enough, but you import your pleasures from the very ends of the earth and prefer foreign goods to native things, luxurious things to frugal ones, things that are difficult to obtain to things that are easy to obtain. To sum it all up, you prefer troubles and evils to living without troubles. But those many precious provisions for happiness by which you exalt yourselves only come to you through great misery and wretchedness. Think, if you like, of gold itself — so much desired — or think of silver, of expensive homes, and fancy clothing, and everything of that kind: how much trouble it costs, how many labors and risks are involved in getting them, how much blood and how much murder. Not only in sailing the seas do many perish for the sake of these things, suffering greatly in finding and getting them, but also many sword battles are caused, and plots are laid because of these things, by friends against friends, children against parents, wives against husbands. This, I think, is why Eriphyle<sup>18</sup> betrayed her husband: for the sake of gold.

9. And all this happens even though those different clothes cannot bring a bit more warmth; those golden buildings give no better shelter; those silver goblets add nothing to the drink. Nor do those golden or ivory beds bring any sweeter sleep; in fact, you frequently see those blessed people not being able to sleep in that ivory bed or in that luxurious bedding. Furthermore, all those many anxieties about food do not nourish anyone the more, but rather spoil bodies and even generate illness in them.

10. What would be the point in saying how many mortal miseries are created and suffered for the sake of their lust?<sup>19</sup> Yet it would be easy to remedy this desire if not for wanting to indulge in wanton pleasures. But not even this insanity and corruption seem to be enough for mortals since they actually pervert the use of things, using them for what they were not in the least made for, just like someone wanting to use a bed in place of a wagon, and as a carriage.

LUCIAN: And who would do that?

CYNIC: You do, I say, when you use people like beasts of burden. For you command them to bear your litters on their shoulders as if they were carriages. And all the while you lie up high in luxury, and from that position you drive human beings like mules, commanding them to go here and there, and those of you who do this the most, consider yourselves the most well off.

11. Then there are the people who not only use fish flesh for food, but even make certain colors out of it; I am talking about the people who dye things purple: don't they use these things made<sup>20</sup> by god contrary to their nature?

LUCIAN: No, by Jove! After all, the meat of the purple-fish can be used for dye as well as for eating.

CYNIC: But it was not born<sup>21</sup> for this. Somebody can torture a soup dish contrary to its nature and can use it in place of a jug, but it was not made<sup>22</sup> for that. But how could anybody describe fully the complete unhappiness of these people, so great as it is? But you hold it against me that I refuse to participate in this. And yet I am living just like that decent one,<sup>23</sup> using only those things put before me and using them most frugally, not panting for variety or for all sorts of things.

12. And then, since I make use of a few things and do not use many, I seem to you to be living a bestial life. But by that reasoning, surely the gods themselves run the risk of becoming worse than the beasts, because they have need of absolutely nothing. But in order for you to understand more precisely the difference between these two — to need a few things or to need many things — consider this: children need more than adults, women need more than men, the sick need more than the healthy, and in general and as a whole, inferior things need more than superior things, just as the gods need nothing at all, and those who come closest to the gods need the least.

<sup>18</sup> Eriphyle: the wife of the seer Amphiaraus in the Theban saga, who was bribed to send her husband to war <sup>19</sup> Greek apbrodisiōn; Latin libidinis <sup>20</sup> Greek

kataskewāsmasin; Latin praeparata <sup>21</sup> Greek ou . . . gegonen (“did not . . . come to be”); Latin nata est (“was not born for this”) <sup>22</sup> Greek ou . . . gegonen

(“did not . . . come to be”); Latin paratum est <sup>23</sup> Greek kósmios; Latin modestus; the reference is to the ideal banqueter in section 7.

13. Or do you think that Hercules — the most outstanding human being of all, seeing that he was a divine man, and rightly considered a god — was unhappy going around naked, clothed only in a skin, and not needing any of our things? But surely he was not miserable, but drove off the misery of others; nor again was he poor, who had the mastery of land and sea. And wherever he turned his force, he conquered everyone in all directions; nor did he encounter anyone in his time who equaled or overcame him until he left the mortal realm altogether. Do you think he needed fancy coverings or shoes? Or that such a man walked around the world in search of them? That must not be said. Rather, he was temperate and brave, and desired to live modestly<sup>24</sup> and not to indulge in pleasures. What do you think about Theseus, his follower? Was he not king of all the Athenians, and even, as they say, the son of Neptune and the bravest man of his time?

14. But he too wanted to go without shoes and walk about naked; he liked having a beard and long hair, and he was not alone, but all the men of old did, because they were better than you, and none of them would have put up with these things, no more than a lion would submit to having his hair shaved off. They felt that softness and smoothness of skin are fit for women, but they wanted to appear as men, just as they were, and they believed that the beard was a man's ornamentation, the same as a mane for horses and as a beard for lions: to them god gave splendor and decoration, just as he gave men beards. Therefore I envy those men of old, I say, and I want to imitate them, but I do not envy the men of this age for their marvelous happiness that consists in their dining and clothing habits, shaving and smoothing all the parts of their bodies, and not allowing even the most private parts to be as nature established them<sup>25</sup> to be.

15. But I would like to have feet no different from a horse's, such as they say Chiron<sup>26</sup> had. Then

I would not need any coverings, the way lions are, nor would I need food any better than what dogs eat. And let any ground be good enough for my bed, since I would think of this world as my home. Let me choose the food that is easiest to come by. May I never want gold or silver — neither I myself nor any of my friends, because all evils arise among men from the desire for these things: rebellions, wars, plots, and slaughters. All such things originate in the desire of possessing more. Let them depart far away from us; let me never desire more than enough, and let me be able to bear with equanimity<sup>27</sup> less than what I have.

16. Well, that's our way. It is very different from what the vulgar crowd thinks. No wonder, therefore, we differ in clothing as much as in way of life.<sup>28</sup> But I wonder about you, when you grant a musician his own clothing and style, or a flute player or tragic actor his own costume, but you think there should not be a distinctive costume and style for a good man, thinking he should wear the same clothing as the crowd, although the crowd is evil. If there should be a distinctive clothing for the good, what would be more fitting than mine, which those extravagantly luxuriant<sup>29</sup> people would be most ashamed of? And which they shun more than anything?

17. Therefore my own way is this: to be rough, shaggy, wear a plain cloak, let my hair grow, and go without shoes. But your<sup>30</sup> way is like that of luxurious people,<sup>31</sup> and nobody could distinguish you from them by the color of your clothes, or by the softness or quantity of your shirts, by your cloaks, your footwear, your hair style, or your cologne. In fact you smell very much like them, you, O so very fortunate ones! And yet what is to be done when someone has the same smell as the luxurious? In fact, you are no better than they are when it comes to undertaking hard work. You are overcome by pleasures no less than they are, you eat the same things, you sleep the same way, you walk around — actually you don't like walking: you would rather be carried like baggage, either by other human beings or by beasts of burden. But my feet take me wherever I have to go. I am able to put up with cold and heat and whatever the gods grant me; I endure

<sup>24</sup> More's moderate vivere translates the Greek krateîn in an ethical sense ("to be powerful"). <sup>25</sup> Greek hêi péphyken ("as naturally [became]"); Latin ita ut instituit natura <sup>26</sup> Chiron: the centaur,

half man and half beast <sup>27</sup> More adds aequo animo. <sup>28</sup> More translates the Greek prohairesis ("life choice") with the Latin word institutum ("design; mode of life"). <sup>29</sup> More uses luxuriosus for the

Greek akolastois ("uncontrolled, insolent"). <sup>30</sup> plural second person <sup>31</sup> More's word here and a little below is cinaedi, following Lucian's Greek.

with the least trouble possible, just because I am a “sad” man.<sup>32</sup> But you, because of your “happiness,” are not content with any fortune that comes your way;<sup>33</sup> you are sorry about everything, unable to bear the things that are at hand; you long for things that are absent, wish for summer in the winter and winter in the summer, for heat during cold and for cold during heat, just like sick people, always peevish and complaining; and what their illness causes in them, your habits<sup>34</sup> cause in you.

18. And so, since this is the way things are, you now think it right to tell us to live like you and to damage our way of life, when the things that you do are often badly thought out, and you yourselves are not at all careful in your own business, doing nothing with judgment and reason, but by your habitual desire. Therefore you differ in no way from those who are carried by a torrent. Such persons are carried wherever the flow of water goes, and you are carried wherever your emotions go. You are just like the fellow who mounted a raving horse. The horse took him away, and he couldn’t get off the horse. When a passerby asked him where he was going, the man said, “Wherever he wants to go,” pointing to the horse. If somebody should ask you people where you are going, you will all in general say, “Wherever we feel like” — but individually, sometimes it is for pleasure, sometimes for ambition, sometimes for profit. And sometimes it is anger, sometimes fear, sometimes something else of this kind that seems to be carrying you off. And you don’t appear to have mounted one horse only, but ride off on many horses, now this one, now that one, and all of them mad horses. And they will take you off cliffs and into the abyss. You have no idea where you will end up until you land there.

19. But this cloak of mine and my hair and my appearance, you laugh at — the things that give me the power to live a quiet life, to do whatever I want, to live with whom I want.<sup>35</sup> In fact, none of the ignorant and uninformed wishes to come near me, thanks to my clothes. The faint-hearted turn aside when they are still far away. But the most knowledgeable and the most self-controlled and the lovers of virtue come toward me most of all, and I am delighted by their constant company. I do not frequent the doorsteps of those who are called human beings;<sup>36</sup> I despise their golden crowns and think their purple is arrogance, and the people themselves I scoff at.

20. So when you understand that this outfit of mine suits<sup>37</sup> not only good men but the gods themselves, if you still want to laugh at it, just consider the statues of the gods and decide if they appear more like me or like you, and take a look at the temples not just of the Greeks but of the foreigners as well to see if the gods themselves are bearded and have long hair like me, or if they are smooth shaven and painted like yourselves. You will even see many with no cloaks at all, just as you see me now. From this time forward, how will you dare to find fault with this way of being when it is seen to suit<sup>38</sup> even the gods?

THE END

THOMAS MORE, TRANSLATOR

32 Greek áthlios; Latin miser. The Cynic is speaking with sarcasm here. 33 More uses fortuna, for the Greek gignomena (“what comes to be”). 34 Greek nósos . . . trópos; Latin morbus . . . mores 35 ut vitam . . . atque agam quicquid volo . . . volo. Compare with Raphael’s vivo ut volo in Utopia at CW 4: 56/1; sic vivere ut velis at 1.70 of Cicero’s De officiis, and vivit ut vult at 14.25 of Augustine’s City of God. 36 More substitutes homines for eudaimonón (“happy ones”): Lucian’s “so-called blessed ones” becomes More’s “so called human beings” (qui vocantur homines). 37 Greek preponos (“is proper, is fitting”); Latin decet 38 Greek prepon; Latin decere (“to suit, be fitting, be proper”)

Menippus or A Consultation with the Dead<sup>1</sup>

Characters: Menippus, Philonides<sup>2</sup>

1. MENIPPUS [Dressed like Hercules]:

Hail, O hall and vestibule of my house!

5 How glad am I to see you, now restored to light!<sup>3</sup>

PHILONIDES: Well, isn't that Menippus, the cynic? By Hercules — it is no other! Unless perhaps I am hallucinating Menippuses everywhere!<sup>4</sup> But what is the meaning of this strange attire? A club,<sup>5</sup> a lyre, a lion-skin cape? I must approach him, anyway.

10 Greetings, Menippus. From where have you come to us? It's been a long time since we've seen you in the city.

2. MENIPPUS:

15 Here, returned from the hidden chambers of the dead,

And from the black gates of the shadows sad,
Where the departed shades dwell below, far from the gods above.<sup>6</sup>

20 PHILONIDES: Hercules! Did Menippus die on us without our knowing, and then come back to life again?

MENIPPUS:

No; hell received me, while still alive—<sup>7</sup>

25 PHILONIDES: And what was the cause of this strange and incredible journey?

MENIPPUS:

Youth spurred me on, and audacity,
By no means weaker than my youth.<sup>8</sup>

30 PHILONIDES: Give up the tragedy, my good man, and climbing down from your iambic lines, just tell me simply: what is all this get-up? What was the reason for your journey to the land below? It certainly could not have been a very pleasant or enjoyable trip for you.

MENIPPUS: Dear friend,

'Twas serious business drove me to the shades below

To consult the ghost of Prophet Tiresias—<sup>9</sup>

PHILONIDES: But you're mad. Otherwise, why would you sing in such rhapsodic verses to your friends?

MENIPPUS: Do not wonder, my friend, for I have just been keeping company with Euripides and Homer, and I am somehow so filled up with their verses that the lines come spontaneously to my mouth. But tell me, how are human affairs here on earth<sup>10</sup> and what's going on in the city?

PHILONIDES: Nothing new. Just like they ever did: people steal, lie, lend money, collect interest.

MENIPPUS: O sad, unfortunate people. They just don't realize what decrees have lately been made about our lives by the people in the underworld. What voting pebbles have been tossed against the wealthy—by Cerberus, they will never escape them.

PHILONIDES: What's that you say? Something new has been decreed about our lives by the dead?

MENIPPUS: By Jupiter, yes, many things! But I am not at liberty to say: I cannot reveal the secrets, lest someone accuse me to Rhadamanthus<sup>11</sup> of impiety.

PHILONIDES: No, Menippus! By Jupiter, don't begrudge such information to your friend. You will be telling someone who knows how to keep a secret; and besides, I was once initiated into the mysteries.

MENIPPUS: You drive a hard bargain, and it's not very safe. . . . Oh well, I'll take the chance for your sake. So it has been decided then that all those rich and really well-off people who hoard their money like Danae<sup>12</sup> in a prison —

<sup>1</sup> Lucian's Greek title is Menippus e Nekyomantia, which More translates Menippus sive Necromantia, both alluding to Odysseus's visit to Hades in Book 11 of Homer's Odyssey (commonly referred to as the Necromancy). <sup>2</sup> Philonides, in Greek, means "son of a friend." <sup>3</sup> Menippus quotes Hercules' exclamation on returning home from the underworld in Euripides' play on the madness of Hercules (Hekabe Furens 523–24). More's Latin is, like

Lucian's quoted lines, in iambic trimeter.

<sup>4</sup> More has added "By Hercules" to Lucian's Greek text. <sup>5</sup> Here and later, More has replaced Lucian's "felt cap" (pilos) with a club (clava). <sup>6</sup> See Euripides, Hekabe 1–2. <sup>7</sup> trimeter verse, source unknown <sup>8</sup> trimeter verse, source unknown

<sup>9</sup> Homer's Odyssey 11.164–65, but with this adjustment: where Odysseus addresses his dead mother in the underworld as "O mother mine," Lucian has "O friend"; More

has changed the meter to epic hexameter.

<sup>10</sup> res humanae . . . in terris for ta hyper ges ("the things on earth") <sup>11</sup> son of Zeus and Europa and one of the judges of the dead. See Homer's Iliad 14.322 and Odyssey 4.564, 7.323; Plato's Gorgias 524a; Virgil's Aeneid 6.566. <sup>12</sup> In this mythical story, Danae (Perseus's mother) is held captive by her father to prevent her from conceiving a child, but she is impregnated by Zeus in the form of a shower of golden rain.

PHILONIDES: My good man, don't tell me what has been decreed before you run through everything that I really want to hear from you most: What was the reason for your journey down there?
 5 Who was your guide? And then tell me in order what you saw and what you heard. It is very likely, since you are very curious about seeing beautiful sights, that you did not miss a single thing worth seeing or hearing about.

10 3. MENIPPUS: Well, I will do as you say in regards to that too. After all, what can you do when a friend urges? So first I will tell you the reasons that compelled me to this descent. Now when I was still a boy and heard Homer and Hesiod singing of wars and quarrels—not only of the demi-gods but even 15 of the gods themselves—and also adulteries, assaults, rapes, tortures, banishing fathers, and marriages between brothers and sisters, by Hercules,<sup>13</sup> I thought all this was great and I was really fascinated by it. But after I reached the age of manhood, then there I am, hearing<sup>14</sup> the laws commanding the opposite of the poets: saying not to commit adultery, plot revolts or rape and pillage. So there I stood, completely uncertain how I should conduct myself.
 20 For I never thought the gods would be adulterers or raise rebellions against each other unless they had decided that those were really good actions to perform; nor, on the other hand, would the law-makers have commanded the opposite things, if they hadn't 25 thought that would be helpful.

4. So, since I was in doubt, I decided to go to the philosophers, put myself in their hands, and ask them to have their will with me by showing me a simple and certain way to live. So with such 35 thoughts in mind, off I go to them, and foolishly too, since, as they say, I was only throwing myself from the smoke into the fire. For, observing them very carefully, I found the utmost ignorance and everything even more uncertain—so much so, in fact, 40 that compared with them, right away even the life of ordinary people<sup>15</sup> seemed golden to me. One of them told me to pursue pleasure alone, and to direct the entire course of my life to that goal. That, he said, is where happiness itself is located. Another advised that I just work hard, subject my body to 45 thirst and lack of sleep and squalor, feel wretched at all times, and be constantly the subject of insults; and he praised Hesiod's widely known poetry about virtue and, of course, the strenuous and sweaty ascent up the steep mountain. Still another com-

 50 manded me to despise money, and to think possession of it a matter of indifference. Another instead declared wealth as good. And what about the cosmos? All I heard about it, one day after another, was incorporeal ideas, substances, atoms, the void,
 55 and a certain mass of words fighting against each other; and the most absurd of all the absurd things I heard was when each one of them asserted contrary things, and brought forward such unassailable and persuasive arguments that I was not able to utter a 60 single thing against someone who said cold and hot were the same thing, even though I clearly knew it could never happen that the same thing could be both cold and hot. And something happened to me that happens to people who are dozing off, that
 65 I would sometimes nod my head in assent and at other times shake my head in disagreement.

5. Besides, much more absurd than this was when, watching carefully their way of life, I discovered that their lives greatly conflicted with their words 70 and teachings. Those who held that money must be spurned were, I noticed, most eagerly gazing at the collection of riches, going to court over the collection of debts, and instructing people how to make 75 a profit. They would put up with anything for the sake of cash. And those who decried fame in their speeches were directing their whole way of life for the sake of winning fame. On the other hand, while everybody fairly openly attacked pleasure, secretly they were all gladly flocking after<sup>16</sup> pleasure alone.
 80

6. And so, disappointed in this hope, I was even more miserable and irritated. Nevertheless, I was able to console myself a little bit with the fact that I was unwise along with many wise and very famous 85 persons, and was still really wandering about in ignorance. Finally, one day as I was sleepless and thinking about this, it came into my head to go to Babylon and meet up with a Magi, one of Zoroaster's<sup>17</sup> disciples and successors. I had heard, you see, that

13 More adds the interjection hercle.

14 More uses the vivid present audio here and elsewhere, even though Lucian uses past tenses throughout. 15 Greek idiotōn; Latin idiotarum—also used at the end of the dialogue 16 More translates

Lucian's prostartōmai (“attach oneself to”) with the Latin confluere, evoking an image of a crowd of people “streaming” into a place. 17 Zoroaster (ca. 628–ca. 551 BC), or Zarathustra, is credited with founding Zoroastrianism, a religion with dualistic and monotheistic elements that became the dominant religion of Ancient Persia. The Hellenistic world associated him with astrology, alchemy, and magic.

they could open the doors of the underworld with their chants and secret rituals, and could take anybody they wanted down there and safely bring them back again. So I thought I would be doing a most excellent thing if I could engage someone to take me down to consult the Boeotian seer Tiresias<sup>18</sup> and learn from him (since he was, after all, a wise man and a prophet) what the best life is, and what life the wisest person would especially choose.<sup>19</sup> And so, leaping up on the spot, I headed for Babylon the fastest way I could. When I got there, I spent<sup>20</sup> some time with a Chaldaean man, certainly a very wise and skilled one, very venerable with white hair and a long beard. His name was Mithrobarzanes.<sup>21</sup> Begging and pleading with him, I barely managed, at any price he wanted, 7. to get him to take me on that trip below. So at long last, beginning with a new moon, for twenty-nine days he cleansed me, taking me at dawn eastwards to the Euphrates, and mumbling a long speech of some kind, which I did not hear very well. He was shouting (the way incompetent announcers do at the games) something rather loud and incoherent, except that he seemed to be calling on certain daemons.<sup>22</sup> After that incantation, he spat in my face three times, and led me back the way we came, never turning his eyes toward anyone we met coming the other way. Our food was only nuts; our drink was milk mixed with honey and the water of Choaspus; our bed was in the grass, under the sky. Now after we had been prepared by this regimen, in the silence of midnight<sup>23</sup> he brought me to the Tigris River, cleansed me and wiped me off, brandished a torch around me and sea-weed and many other things in the same way, mumbling a magical chant at the same time; and after casting a complete spell upon me, circling around me, so that I would be safe from any specters, he led me back home just as I was, walking backwards, and for the rest of the night we made ready for the journey. 8. He donned a certain magical cloak himself, very similar to a Median cloak,<sup>24</sup> and he outfitted me as you see me now, with a club,<sup>25</sup> a lion skin, and a lyre as well. Then he instructed me that if anyone asked me my name, I should not say “Menippus,” but “Hercules,” “Ulysses,” or “Orpheus.”

45

PHILONIDES: Why did he do that, Menippus? I don’t understand the reason for the name or the costume.

MENIPPUS: It’s obvious, really—nothing secret about it. Regarding the men who had descended alive to the underworld before our time, he reasoned that if I looked similar to them, it would be easier for me to elude the guards of Aeacus,<sup>26</sup> and pass through without anybody stopping me, since I would be a more familiar figure if I were sent out in that really dramatic outfit.

50

55

9. Now day was already dawning when we reached the river and attended to our departure below. The raft, the sacrifices, the honey-drinks were ready, and whatever else was necessary for the mystic rite. Therefore, after we had loaded whatever was ready to hand, we “sadly stepped in ourselves, our eyes filling with tears,”<sup>27</sup> and after we were borne along by the river for a while, we were carried into a wood, and a kind of lake into which the Euphrates was channeled. After we crossed that, we came to a lonely region, forested and dark, and climbing down (Mithrobarzanes was leading the way), we dug a pit and slaughtered sheep and sprinkled their blood into it. Meanwhile the Magus, holding a burning torch, and no longer with just a low murmur, but speaking as loudly as he could, called upon all the daemons at once—the Punishments, the Avengers, Hecate of the night, lofty Proserpina—and at the same time he mixed in as well some unknown barbarian names with many syllables.

60

65

70

75

10. Immediately everything began to shake; cracks in the ground were caused by his incantations; you could hear Cerberus barking; it was a sad and miserable business, “and Orcus the King of shadows felt fear

80

18 consult... Tiresias: as Odysseus is commanded to do in Homer’s Odyssey

19 More adds two superlatives to Lucian’s Greek, which is without superlatives: “What life a wise person would choose.”

20 More is using historical presents, which are more usual in Latin than in Greek or English narratives. 21 A Roman general by this name was defeated in 69 BC, but no Chaldean by this name has been identified.

In Utopia, the old name of the ruler was Barzanes (CW 4: 132/8); their name for the supreme being is Mithras (CW 4: 216/20, 232/13). 22 The Greek daímones—and again below in section 9—were translated literally by More as daemones in the Latin. 23 More adds a Virgilian touch by adding “silent” to “midnight”: cf. “nocte silenti”; see Aeneid 4.527, 7.87, 7.102. 24 Median cloak: a luxurious cloak with sleeves, sometimes ornamented with gold

25 Again More has substituted “club” (Latin clava) for Greek pilos (“felt hat”).

26 one of the three mythological judges of departed shades, along with Radamanthus and Minos 27 Here Lucian quotes Homer’s Odyssey 11.5, and More translated it as prose. More, or a later editor, may have adapted a line from Virgil’s Aeneid 4.30: sic effata sinum lacrimis implevit abortis.

in his deep abodes,<sup>28</sup> and right away, many things of the underworld could be seen: the lake, Periphlegethon, the kingdoms of Pluto. Then, climbing down, we encountered Rhadamanthus, who was nearly 5 frightened to death. Cerberus at first was barking and moving himself about, but when I quickly took up my lyre and strummed it, he instantly fell into a deep sleep. Afterwards, when we reached the lake, we were almost not able to cross it. For the ferry
 10 was already loaded, and was certainly filled with lamentation. Everybody riding in it was wounded: this one in his leg, that one in the head, everybody with some part of his body out of order, so much so that they looked to me like they had all come from 15 some war. But good old Charon, when he saw my lion skin, thought I was Hercules and let us aboard and gladly brought us over, and after we got out of the boat even showed us the path to follow. 11. Since we were already in the darkness then, Mithrobarzanes led the way, and I stuck right behind him until we came to some huge meadow planted with 20 asphodel, where we were followed by the screaming shades of the dead surrounding us on all sides. Then going on a little further we came to the actual court of Minos. He happened to be sitting on 25 some very high stool, with Punishments, Tortures, Genii, and Furies standing by in attendance. From the other side a very great number, bound by a long rope, were standing in order. They were said to be 30 adulterers, pimps, fornicators, murderers, flatterers, informants, and such a crowd of people who had perpetrated something in life. Separate from them were coming along wealthy ones and creditors, pale, with big bellies, suffering from gout, and each one 35 was strapped to a beam of iron weighing two talents each. While we are standing there, watching everything that is happening and hearing everything that is being said, some amazing, strange attorneys were accusing them.

40 PHILONIDES: And who were they, by Jupiter? Don't hesitate to tell me that too.

MENIPPUS: Are you familiar with the shadows that bodies make when they are in the sunlight?

PHILONIDES: Yes, what of it?

MENIPPUS: Well, these are the ones who, as soon 45 as we die, accuse, bear witness, and prove whatever wrong we have done in life. Some of them are apparently very trustworthy witnesses, since they have kept our company constantly, never leaving our
 50 bodies. 12. So Minos, consequently, carefully examining each one, was assigning them to the group of evil-doers, where they would undergo the penalties worthy of their crimes. He was especially incensed
 55 against those whose wealth and honors had puffed them up while they lived, and who expected to be almost worshipped; he detested their haughtiness, of course, and their pride that would so quickly disappear, since they had forgotten that because they
 60 were mortals, they were only acquiring mortal and perishable goods. But now they had shed all those splendid things — wealth, I mean, and noble birth, and privileges; they stood there naked, with down-
 65 cast faces, thinking over this human felicity as if it was a dream, and to such an extent that I was more than delighted to see it. And if I happened to recognize anybody, I walked up and quietly spoke in his 70 ear to tell him what he had been in life, how greatly he had been puffed up then, when so many people, waiting at his door in the morning for him to come out, were pushed away and shut out by his servants
 75 and then, how he would emerge like the rising sun, dressed in gold or purple or rainbow colors, thinking he would make them happy and blessed if he stretched forth his side or hand to be kissed. They did not take it well when they heard this.

13. But once Minos did make a favorable judgment. For Dionysius the Sicilian tyrant,<sup>29</sup> who was accused of many atrocious crimes by Dion, and convicted by the grave witness brought by the 80 Stoics<sup>30</sup> — Aristippus the Cyrenean philosopher intervened (the shades in the underworld revere him, you know, and his authority is very great there) and got him released from his punishment, just when he was about to be strapped onto the Chimaera,<sup>31</sup> by 85 asserting that he had helped out many learned men by financially supporting them.

14. Next, leaving the court of judgment, we came to the place of punishment. There, my friend, could numerous and miserable things be both seen and 90 heard. All at one time could be heard the sound of

<sup>28</sup> In Lucian, this line is from Homer (Iliad 20.61); More, or a later editor, has adapted it, perhaps with reference to Virgil's Georgics 4.471 and 4.507. <sup>29</sup> a famous Greek

despot in Sicily, ca. 432–367 BC <sup>30</sup> As Thompson notes, More's text read stoas ("porch" or the "Stoic school"), whereas the correct reading is skias ("shadow").

In Lucian's version, Menippus is saying that Dionysius's shadow accused him with Dion's help. <sup>31</sup> Chimaera: a fabled monster part lion, part dragon, part goat

burning flames and the screams of people burning in the fire; then the wheels and tortures, the chains; Cerberus tearing with his teeth; the Chimaera ripping apart; and everybody being equally put to torture, captives, kings, prefects, paupers, beggars, wealthy people—and they were all sorry for their crimes. And we recognized certain of them as we watched, who had recently departed from life. But these individuals were hiding in shame, and took themselves out of our sight, or if some of them were looking at us, they did so very abjectly and in a servile manner—and how proud and difficult do you think these people once were in life? But half of the evils were taken away for the poor, and after they had taken a break for a while, they were taken back to their punishment. But I also saw those famous figures told of in myths: Ixion, Sisyphus, and Tantalus the Phrygian,<sup>32</sup> that man so grievously punished; and how big—good gods!—was that earth-born Tityos?<sup>33</sup> He took up a whole field, spread out.

15. Finally passing by these, we came to the Acherusian plain, where we found the demi-gods, heroines, and at the same time another multitude of the dead, divided up into nations and tribes, some old, some shrunken and (as Homer says) strengthless, others young and hale—and these were especially Egyptians, thanks to their very efficient burial practices. But it was scarcely easy to distinguish any one of them, since they all looked very much alike with their exposed skeletons, unless we stared at them for a very long time, and then we could make them out. After all, they were sitting there together, all dark and dreary, and preserving no trace of their original beauty.<sup>34</sup> When then many of those bony figures stood there together, completely alike each other, giving you a rather terrifying stare through their empty eye hollows, showing their teeth all exposed, I really hesitated, thinking by what mark I could distinguish Thersites<sup>35</sup> from lovely Nireus,<sup>36</sup> the beggar Irus<sup>37</sup> from the King of the Phaeacians,<sup>38</sup> Pyrrhias the cook<sup>39</sup> from Agamemnon.<sup>40</sup> There was just nothing left to them of any former distinguishing mark; their bones were all alike, unrecognizable, with no labels written on them, or anything recognizable to anyone.

16. So as I was watching all this, human life seemed to me very much like some long pageant for which Fortune supplied and arranged everything by fitting various costumes to each of those in the pageant. And so, one she liked and equipped with royal trappings (placing a tiara on him, providing him with servants, putting a crown on his head); another she gave the accoutrement of a servant; one she made beautiful, another deformed and ridiculous, since the display, I think, had to include all kinds. In fact, the costumes of certain ones she changed frequently, even in the midst of the pageant, not permitting them to go all the time in the same order and with the same costume as they had when they first came out. Croesus<sup>41</sup> she forced, with changed dress, to put on the clothes of a servant and prisoner of war, but Meandrius,<sup>42</sup> who was at first walking along with the servants, she adorned, on the other hand,<sup>43</sup> with the imperial style of Polycrates.<sup>44</sup> And she permitted him to use the costume for some time; but afterwards, when the time for the pageant was past, each one returned his trappings, and leaving aside both his clothes and his body, became what he was before, no different from his neighbor. But some, because of their inexperience,<sup>45</sup> when Fortune demanded back her trappings, took it hard and were indignant, as if they had been deprived of their own

32 Ixion is bound to a wheel in the Underworld that turns forever; Sisyphus is condemned to roll a large stone to the top of a hill, only to have it roll down again when it reaches the top; Tantalus is set in a pool of water that eternally recedes when he tries to drink from it. 33 Tityos is stretched out in Tartarus, where two vultures feed on his liver, which grows back each night. 34 More has nullum pristinae formae vestigium for Lucian's ouden tōn par' hēmin kalōn ("nothing of the things that are beautiful with us"). 35 an ill-favored Greek soldier in Homer's Iliad 36 one of the Greek leaders in the Trojan War, known for his beauty 37 a beggar with whom Odysseus fights in Book 18 of

Homer's Odyssey 38 King Alcinoos offers Odysseus the hospitality of his palace and a ship to Ithaca in the Odyssey. 39 a slave in Menander's Dyskolos 40 the commander of the Greek army in the Trojan War 41 Croesus, the last king of Lydia, who was renowned for his riches, was defeated and captured by Cyrus in 546 BC at Sardis. In a fictitious account by Herodotus (Histories 1.29–33), the Athenian Solon warned Croesus that good fortune rather than wealth was the source of happiness. 42 According to Herodotus (Histories 3.123, 142–43), Meandrius was the tyrant Polycrates' scribe, who ruled Samos after Polycrates' assassination. At first, he sought to reestablish democratic rule, but soon he also became a tyrant. 43 More adds vicissim ("in turn, by contrast") for clarity. 44 Polycrates was a tyrant of the island of Samos (ca. 535–522 BC). According to Herodotus (Histories 3.40–43), even when Polycrates was counseled to throw his most treasured possession—an emerald ring—into the sea in order to avoid the jealousy of the gods over his good fortune, shortly afterwards, a fisherman presented him with a fish that was discovered to have the ring in its belly. However, he was later assassinated during a visit to the Persian governor of Sardis. 45 inscitiām: also "inattention, unskilledness, absence of knowledge" for the Greek agnomosunes ("want of sense") proper goods, and had not merely changed out of the clothing that belonged to others and that they had used a little while. I think that you have frequently seen those tragic actors on the stage who, as the plot of the play demands, are Kreons<sup>46</sup> now, and now Priams,<sup>47</sup> and now Agamemnons. And the same actor, if chance should allow it, who had a little while before portrayed so gravely the figure of Cecrops or Erechtheus,<sup>48</sup> then shortly thereafter, at the playwright's command, comes forth as a servant. But when the end of the play has come, and he has taken off those golden clothes and stopped playing that role, climbing out of the raised boots of the dramatic actors, he walks about humble and poor, no longer Agamemnon the son of Atreus or Creon the son of Menoecus, but Polus<sup>49</sup> the son of Charicles or Satyrus<sup>50</sup> the son of Theogiton of Marathon. This is the way of mortal affairs,<sup>51</sup> the way it seemed to me as I watched it then.

17. PHILONIDES: Tell me, Menippus: those people who have magnificent and high tombs on the earth, with columns, statues, and inscriptions—are they not in any way more honored among the people below than the other shades?

MENIPPUS: You are joking, of course: if you had seen Mausolus (I mean that Carian man famous for his pyramid),<sup>52</sup> I know very well that you would never have stopped laughing, he was so shamefully flung into some out-of-the-way cave, hidden among the crowd of the dead. The only good he gained from that monument, it seems to me, was that he suffered all the more, being pressed under such a great weight. For, my friend, when Aeacus measures out a place for someone, he gives at the most scarcely more than a foot, and each one has to be content with that and squeeze himself into the place. But you would have laughed a lot more, I think, if you had seen these kings of ours and sa-traps among the beggars, selling pickled goods or learning how to write under duress of poverty, or how they were being afflicted with reproaches by anybody coming along, or being struck in the jaws just like the most worthless of slaves. Looking at Philip of Macedon, I was really not able to control myself: he was pointed out to me in some corner, repairing old shoes for pay. You could even see many others begging at the street corners—like Xerxes, Darius, and Polycrates.

18. PHILONIDES: You are telling me amazing things about those kings; it's almost incredible. But what is Socrates doing? And Diogenes?<sup>53</sup> Were there any other men of wisdom?

MENIPPUS: Socrates is there too, refuting everybody. Palamedes, Ulysses, and Nestor are keeping company with him and whoever else is a great talker among the dead. His legs were still puffy and swollen from when he had drunk the poison. But excellent Diogenes stays close to Sardanapalus the Assyrian and Midas the Phrygian and many others of that crowd of lavish spenders; when Diogenes heard them moaning as they thought over the greatness of their former good fortune, he laughed and enjoyed himself enormously, falling onto his back and singing out loudly, and with his harsh and unpleasant voice he drowned out their complaints so much that they took it very hard and were not able to put up with Diogenes, and were thinking about changing their location.

19. PHILONIDES: Okay, enough about these. What was it you said was decreed when you said something was decreed against the wealthy?

MENIPPUS: You are right to remind me: I don't know how, but although I first intended to talk about that, I wandered far off the subject I had planned. Well, while I was spending time there, the magistrates<sup>54</sup> called together an assembly to deliberate about what would be for their common good. Seeing so many of them gathering together, I mingled with them myself, and became one of the members of the assembly. Many other things were discussed, and finally the business about the wealthy, against whom very many things were alleged—violence, pride, arrogance, injustices—and finally a certain leading man of the people<sup>55</sup> stood up and read this decree.

<sup>46</sup> the king of Thebes, who takes the throne after Oedipus chooses exile in Sophocles' Theban plays <sup>47</sup> the king of Troy during the Trojan War <sup>48</sup> Cecrops and Erechtheus were legendary kings of Athens. <sup>49</sup> Polus of Aegina (4th century BC) was a celebrated Greek tragic

actor. <sup>50</sup> an actor who, according to Plutarch, helped Demosthenes improve his rhetoric (Demosthenes 7.1–2) <sup>51</sup> Here More's mortalium res closely mirrors Lucian's tà tōn anthrōpōn prágmata. <sup>52</sup> Mausolus of Caria had himself buried in a huge sepulcher; hence our "mausoleum"

for a lavish tomb. <sup>53</sup> a Greek philosopher and a founder of the Cynic school of philosophy (d. ca. 320 BC) <sup>54</sup> magistratus for prutaneis (chiefs, in Athens, members of the boule, a council of 500) <sup>55</sup> ex populo primas for the Greek demagogon

20. Since the wealthy perpetrate many things in life by their thefts and use of force and their despising of the poor in every way, it has been decided by the assembly and the people<sup>56</sup> that when they have departed from life, their bodies are to pay their penalties along with the other criminals' bodies; but their souls will re-emerge into life, and become donkeys, until they have spent two hundred and fifty thousand years in that state, always as donkeys being reborn from donkeys, carrying loads, and driven around by poor men. After that, they will be allowed to be released from life. This is the sentence of Calvarius,<sup>57</sup> son of Aridellus,<sup>58</sup> of Manica, the tribe of Styx.<sup>59</sup>

15 When this law was read out, the leaders<sup>60</sup> approved, the people voted for it, Proserpina raged, Cerberus howled — that's how the folks in the world below confirm statutes and make them official.

21. And that's what happened in the assembly. 20 Then I immediately went to see Tiresias, who was my reason for going there, and after I had explained my business in order, I made my plea to him, that he tell me what he thought was the best kind of life. Smiling at me (he's a little old man blind and pale, with a frail voice) he said, "My son, I know that the cause of your perplexity comes from those men of wisdom, who hardly ever think the same as one another about the same things; but it's not lawful for me to speak to you: it's prohibited by Rhadamanthus."

30 "By no means," I said, "little father, but please tell me; do not despise me, who wander about in life more blind than you."

And so leading me aside, very far away from the others, he leaned to speak in my ear: "The life of private and ordinary citizens<sup>61</sup> is the best life and the most prudent one. So leaving off this most empty consideration of lofty matters, give up seeking for origins and ends;<sup>62</sup> spit out of your mouth those blabbering syllogisms, and, realizing that all that kind of thing is but foolishness, seek throughout your whole life<sup>63</sup> only this: having put things into good order, without being curious or being anxious about anything,<sup>64</sup> spend your life as cheerfully as you can,<sup>65</sup> and smiling."

"So he spoke and hastened back to the meadow of asphodels."<sup>66</sup>

22. Then — it was already evening now — I said, "Well, Mithrobarzanes, why are we waiting around? Shouldn't we go back to life now?" To which he replied: "Trust me, O Menippus, since I am going to show you a short and easy path." And straightaway he led me off to a certain region more shadowy than the first, and pointing out with his hand a dim<sup>67</sup> and faint light pouring through a crack, he said, "That is the temple of Trophonius, and this is the way people descend to the underworld from Boeotia; if you climb out this way, you will immediately be in Greece." So, delighted by these words, and saying farewell to the Magus, I crawled with much difficulty through the narrow passage of a cave, and arrived, I do not know how, in Lebedeia.<sup>68</sup>

THE END

THOMAS MORE, TRANSLATOR

<sup>56</sup> More uses Curiae et populo visum est for Lucian's Dedóchthōi tēi boulēi kai tōi dēmōi. <sup>57</sup> or "Mr. Skull"; Calvarius is a translation of Lucian's Kraníōn (cf. cranium). <sup>58</sup> Aridellus or "Little dried up one," an equivalent for Lucian's Skeletōn. <sup>59</sup> Manica, as Thompson suggests (CW 3.1: 145), is from Latin manes ("departed shade"), translating the Greek Nekyieus ("Dead One"); Stygiana is More's suitable replacement for Alibantidos, an obscure Greek word for "corpse." The wordplay of this sentence is translated by Harmon in

the Loeb Lucian as "On motion of Scully Fitzbones of Corpsebury, Cadavershire." <sup>60</sup> For Lucian's archai, More uses principes; the same word used for the ruler of each city in Utopia. <sup>61</sup> More's idiotarum privatorumque vita and Lucian's idiōtōu both probably recall Plato's Republic 620c where, in the "Myth of Er," the shade of Odysseus chooses "the life of a private, quiet-living citizen" (bíon andrós idiōtōu aprágmonos). <sup>62</sup> principia . . . fines: or "principles and final causes" <sup>63</sup> in tota vita for ex hapantos ("above all") <sup>64</sup> Here

More gives minime curiosus, nulla re sollicitus for Lucian's peri mēdēn espoudakós ("taking nothing seriously"). <sup>65</sup> More adds quam plurimum potes hilaris ("being cheerful as you can") to ridens ("smiling"), where Lucian has only gelōn tā pollā ("laughing at many things"). <sup>66</sup> Homer's Odyssey 11.539; More translates it as prose. <sup>67</sup> subobscurum, for the Greek amauron. <sup>68</sup> Lebedeia in Boeotia is the location of the temple of Trophonius, who helped build Apollo's temple at Delphi.

The Lover of Lies or The Skeptic

Characters: Tychiades, Philocles

1. TYCHIADES: Can you tell me, Philocles, just what is it that leads so many to the love of lying, so that they are just as happy to say nothing worthwhile themselves, as they are to pay the utmost attention to other people who say such things?

PHILOCLEES: There are many things, Tychiades, that compel some mortals to lie, because they see a profit in doing so.

TYCHIADES: That has nothing to do with it (as they say) and I was not asking about the people who lie when they have to, since of course such people deserve forgiveness, or even praise whenever they deceive their enemies, or make use of lying as a kind of drug<sup>1</sup> to survive in emergencies. Ulysses did many things of that kind, in order to win his own life and the return of his companions.<sup>2</sup> I am asking, rather, my excellent man, about those who, with no need whatsoever, greatly prefer falsehood itself to truth, and take delight in the thing itself, engaging in lying without any regard for what is fitting for the occasion—I want to know, therefore, for the sake of what benefit<sup>3</sup> these people do this?

2. PHILOCLEES: So have you somewhere already detected some of these, in whom this desire to lie is engrained?

TYCHIADES: Really, there are very many like this.

PHILOCLEES: What other reason is there for them to lie, except madness? Because they are preferring something very bad in place of something very good.

TYCHIADES: That's nothing. I could show you many people who are sensible in other respects and wonderfully wise, but somehow or other they are taken in by this evil, and are enthusiastic about lying to such an extent that I really am annoyed that such men who are excellent in all other respects nevertheless take pleasure in fooling both themselves and the people they meet. You know better than I do how those men of old—Herodotus and Ktesias the Cnidian<sup>4</sup> and before them going back finally to Homer himself, renowned men—made use of the lies they wrote down, not only so as to deceive the ones who heard them in person, but even to the extent that the deception has been handed down to us, preserved in the loveliest verses and meters. Consequently I often feel ashamed on account of those verses whenever they tell of the cutting of heaven or the chains of Prometheus or the rebellion of the Giants and all that sad story about the people in the underworld. And the way Jupiter was turned into a bull or a swan for the sake of love affairs, and how someone was changed from a woman into a little bird or a bear. Then there are the Pegasuses, the Chimaeras, the Gorgons, and the Cyclopes, and all that sort of thing—really monstrous and absurd stories, the kind that can affect the minds of children who still fear goblins and ghosts. Even so, the poetry is perhaps somewhat tolerable.

3. But what about cities and whole nations who lie publicly and in unison—isn't that ridiculous? Such as when the Cretans are not ashamed to show people the grave of Jupiter; or the Athenians who say that Erichthonius came out of the earth, and that the first people in Attica grew out of the ground like vegetables. But they are more modest than the Thebans who tell how certain men germinated from the planted teeth of a dragon; now if someone, carefully examining them, does not believe these things are true because they are so ridiculous and thinks that it would require the mind of a Coroebus<sup>5</sup> or a Margites<sup>6</sup> for someone to believe that Triptolemos<sup>7</sup> was borne through the air on dragon's wings, or that Pan came from Arcadia to help at Marathon, or that Orithyia<sup>8</sup> was snatched by the North Wind—anybody with that view is considered impious and insane to them, since he does not believe obvious truths; that's how far lying has gone.

1 More uses the same Greek word as Lucian here (pharmacum), rather than Latin medicamentum. 2 In Lucian's Greek the words closely recall Homer's Odyssey 1.5, but More translates in prose. 3 Lucian's agathon is rendered by More as commodum, a frequent word in Utopia. 4 a Greek physician and historian (5th century BC) 5 a character of Greek legend who convinced Aeneas and other Trojans to fight the Greeks in disguise (Aeneid 2.385-95) 6 the eponymous hero of the lost mock-epic Margites, who is extremely dull-witted 7 a priest of Demeter and the inventor of agriculture in Greek mythology 8 the mythological daughter of King Erechtheus, who is abducted by Boreas (Ovid, Metamorphoses 6.683)

4. PHILOCLEES: But you could forgive the poets and the cities perhaps, Tychiades: after all, they had to mix in with their poetry the pleasure that comes from fables and make it as alluring as possible for their audience. And the Athenians and the Thebans and some others win more magnificence for their native land by these kinds of fictions; but if somebody removed the myths from Greece, nothing would keep their story-tellers from dying of hunger, when nobody will go as a tourist there who wants to hear the truth, even for free. But when someone does it for no reason at all, but simply enjoys lying—such people seem completely ridiculous, for good reason.

5. TYCHIADES: You speak rightly, for I just now came from visiting that famous Eucrates, and after hearing many incredible and mythical things, I left right in the middle of the conversation, being unable to stand such stories that went so far beyond belief—but it was as if the Furies drove me away, while so many monstrous and absurd things were being told.

PHILOCLEES: But, Tychiades, Eucrates is a serious man; certainly nobody would believe that a man with such a long beard, sixty years of age, and well versed in philosophy to boot, would permit anybody to hear some person lying in his presence, let alone dare to do such a thing himself.

TYCHIADES: But you don't know, my friend, what he was saying, how consistently he asserted it, and then how solemnly he swore about so many things, even when his sons were brought into his presence, and so much so that when I saw him I wondered much to myself how it had eluded my notice what an imposter he was and how much time he had been "leading an ape around in a lion's cloak," so absurd were the things he spoke of.

PHILOCLEES: By the gods of the hearth, Tychiades, what were they? I want to know what kind of imposture he was hiding under his long beard.

6. TYCHIADES: Well, Philocles, I used to visit him from time to time—whenever, that is, I had plenty of leisure at my disposal.

And today, because I had to see Leontichus (he's a friend of mine, as you know), I was informed by his servant, that he had gone to see Eucrates, to examine his illness, so I went there for both reasons, to meet Leontichus and see Eucrates, although I hadn't known he was sick. But I didn't find Leontichus there, for he had left just before I arrived, as they told me; I did, however, find many others gathered there, among whom were Cleodemus the Peripatetic, Dinomachus the Stoic, and Ion—do you know the man? He's the one who hopes to get great admiration for his Platonism, as if he were the only one who rightly detected Plato's meaning, and who alone is capable of explaining his oracular sayings to others; you see the kind of men I am naming: endowed of course with all wisdom and every virtue, each one the head of a school, all very respectable, by Hercules, and almost terrifying to behold. In addition, Antigonus the medical doctor was present, who, I think, was called there to give medical assistance, and Eucrates seemed to be already on the mend since his illness was one of the familiar ones, for the humor had descended into his feet. So when he caught sight of me, Eucrates, in a relaxed and quiet sort of voice told me to sit down on the bed next to him, although when I was entering the room I had heard him speaking loudly with exertion in his voice; nevertheless, being very careful not to touch his feet, after I had excused myself with the usual niceties—saying that I did not know he was sick, but as soon as I found out, came at a run—I proceeded to sit next to him. 7. They were talking about the illness: they had already said some things about it, and were still discussing it then, each one proposing some remedy.

Then Cleodemus said, "If someone picks up, with his left hand, the tooth of a weasel, killed in the way I just said, and ties it into a lion's skin (a lion that has recently been skinned), and then puts it around your shin, the pain will immediately cease."

"Not in a lion's skin," said Dinomachus, "according to what I heard, but rather in the skin of a female deer, young and not yet mated, and this is more likely for the following reason: a doe is very fast, and very strong in the feet, whereas although a lion is very strong, since a lion's fat and right forepaw and the hairs that stick straight out from his beard have a lot of strength as well if someone knows how to use them along with the appropriate spells—nevertheless these things promise little help for the feet."

"I too," said Cleodemus, "once thought a deer's skin should be used, because a deer is swift, but recently a certain Libyan man, very skilled in these matters, taught me the opposite, by pointing out that lions were faster than deer: “After all,” he said, “they can hunt them down and capture them.”

8. The others who were present praised the Lib-5 yan for speaking correctly. Then I said, “Do you think that such maladies are cured by certain spells?
 Or by things hung on the outside, when the trouble is inside the body?” They laughed at what I said, and openly condemned my great foolishness, my igno-10 rance of very obvious things, which no one with any sense would dispute how they are. But the doctor Antigonus, to be sure, seemed to be pleased by my questioning. I think he was already being ignored for a long time, since he wanted to bring Eucrates 15 some help from the medical art, advising him to abstain from wine, eat vegetables, and in general, limit the strain on his mind.

Cleodemus meanwhile, said with a grin, “What 20 do you say, Tychiades? Does it seem unbelievable to you that remedies against disease can be made from things like that?”

“It seems certain to me,” said I, “unless my nose is running too much for me to believe that what is applied externally, and has no communication at all 25 with what is causing the disease on the inside, can work through a few little words, as you say, to work some magic and, when tied to the body, introduce healing powers—that can surely never happen, not even if you put sixteen weasel’s teeth into the skin 30 of the Nemean lion. I once saw a lion limping from pains, still in his own whole skin.”

9. “You are just not very well informed,” said Dinomachus, “and you’ve never taken the trouble to learn how things like this do battle against diseases,<sup>9</sup> 35 when they are applied; and it seems to me that you would not accept even the most well known: the re-pellents, I mean, of those fevers that recur at regular intervals, and the de-toxifying of snakes, the heal-ings of swellings, and the rest—whatever old wives 40 do; and if they all really happen, why will you not think that these too happen through similar means?”

“Dinomachus,” I said, “you are heaping up an infinite number of things, and driving in one nail on top of another, as the saying goes. Nor is it certain 45 that what you are talking about happens by that kind of a power. Consequently, unless you first persuade me by a logical argument that it can naturally happen that a fever or a tumor is frightened by a divine name, everything you have reported is nothing but old wives’ tales.” 50

10. “When you talk like that,” Dinomachus replied, “you seem to me not even to believe that the gods exist, if you think it cannot happen that reme-55 dies are brought to diseases through sacred spells.”

“My good man,” I said, “do not speak so. Even if the gods fully exist, that does not keep the things you are talking about from being nonsense. In fact,
 I worship the gods and I see their acts of healing,
 the assistance they give to those who are in pain, 60 namely, restoring them by medicines and the art of doctoring. And hence Asclepius and his successors have been healing by bringing healing medicines to their patients, but not by tying lions or weasels to them.”

11. “Let him alone,” said Ion. “But I will tell you something marvelous. I was still a teenager, about 65 fourteen years old, when a fellow came up to my father to inform him that Midas, his vine-dresser servant, although a strong and hard-working man in other respects, about the time of the crowded forum,<sup>10</sup> had been bitten by a snake and was ly-70 ing down with a putrefying leg. He had been tying palm-branches together and weaving them into fences when the little creature crawled up and bit him on his big toe, then immediately slithered away and hid himself again. The man was howling, and wracked to death with pains. While we were hear-75 ing about all this, we saw Midas himself being carried on a litter by his fellow servants: he was all swollen and discolored and his skin looked like it was decaying—he was breathing with great diffi-80 culty. My father was very upset about this, and one of his friends, who was standing near, said, ‘Take courage. Right away, I am going to bring in a certain Babylonian, one of the people they call the Chal-85 daeans, and he will cure the man.’ And so, lest I take up the whole day telling the story, the Babylonian came and restored Midas to health. He drove the poison out of his body with a certain spell, and by 90 tying to his foot a pebble that he had taken from a column that marked the grave of a deceased virgin.

12. “So far this was nothing very spectacular.
 Then Midas went back to the fields, and carried his litter away: so much was accomplished by a spell and <sup>9</sup> For the Greek homilēi tois nosēmasi, More gives adversus morbos . . . conferunt. Lucian uses a military metaphor, which More accurately reproduces, since Greek homilēō with dative means “join battle with.”

<sup>10</sup> around noontime, when the agora or forum is full of people

by that stone from a grave-column. But the Babylonian clearly did other divine things. For going out into the fields the next morning, after declaiming from an old volume seven sacred names, and walking in a circle three times with burning sulfur and a torch, he stirred up and summoned all the snakes that were in the area. And many serpents came, as if drawn by the spell: the aspids, vipers, horned snakes, jumping snakes, poisonous frogs and puff-toads, all except one old python that (I think) was too old to crawl very well, and did not obey the summons. But the Magus said, “Not all are present.” Then he chose one of the snakes—the youngest one there—and sent him as a messenger to the old snake, and after a little while that one came too. After they were all collected there, the Babylonian hissed<sup>11</sup> at them, and suddenly they were all burned up by his breath, as we watched in amazement.”

13. Then I said, “Tell me, Ion: did that messenger snake—I mean the young one—did he lead the old snake back by the hand or did the old one use a cane?” “You joke,” said Cleodemus, “but I myself, who used to be even less believing of such things than you, and thought there was no way I could ever be made to believe them, when I first saw the flying man, that foreign traveler (they say he came from the Hyperboreans),<sup>12</sup> then I believed, then I was won over, even though I fought hard against it for a long time, since what could I do when I saw him flying in the air, in broad daylight, and also walking on water, and walking slowly, step by step, right through the midst of a fire?” “So,” I said, “you really saw that? A Hyperborean man flying, and walking on water?” “Yes, I really did,” he said, “and with canvas shoes on, which is the kind of shoes those people mostly use. And what would be the point of me telling all the minor things he did—how he conjured up love affairs, or drove out demons, or brought decayed dead persons back to life, or made Hecate herself appear to bystanders, and dragged the moon from the sky?”

14. “But I might as well tell you what I saw he did for Glaucias, the son of Alexicles. When this Glaucias had inherited the wealth left behind by his recently dead father, he fell in love with Chrysis, the daughter of Demaenetus; he was a pupil of mine in arts education, and if his love interest had not drawn him away, he would have learned the whole Peripatetic doctrine, since he was eighteen and had already finished with analytics, and had reached the end of my lectures on the physics. But he was overcome by love, and told me all about it. Well then, as was only right, since I was his teacher, I brought the Hyperborean Magus to him. He was hired right away at the price of four minae cash up front, since he had to get some sacrifices ready, and then would need to be paid another sixteen minae if Glaucias did succeed in winning Chrysis. So, waiting for the waxing moon (that’s when sacred rituals like that are usually done), after digging a trench in the open-air part of his house, under the night sky at midnight, he first summoned the spirit of Alexicles, the father of Glaucias, who had died seven months before. The old man was enraged about the love affair, quite against it. But he finally gave his permission. Then the Magus brought up Hecate, who brought Cerberus along with her, then brought down the moon from the sky and made it have many forms, looking different at different times: first it showed a womanly shape, then it was turned into a beautiful calf, and finally it looked like a little dog. Then the Hyperborean, after making a kind of figurine of Cupid from clay, said: “Now go away, and bring back Chrysis.” The clay figurine instantly rushed off, and soon after, the girl was knocking on the door. Coming inside, she embraced Glaucias, being madly in love with him, and they spent their time together until we heard the cocks crowing. Then the moon flew up to the sky, Hecate went back underground, the other spectres disappeared, and we sent Chrysis on her way when it was just about dawn.

15. “If you had seen this, Tychiades, you would surely no longer doubt that there are many benefits in those spells.” “You are right,” I said. “I would believe, if I had seen them, but I think you should forgive me if I am not able to see as clearly and sharply the kinds of things you see; that Chrysis you mention, by the way, I know, is a very loose woman—a prostitute—so I surely do not see why you would need the clay figurine messenger, the Hyperborean Magus, and the moon, to boot. You could have brought her all the way to the Hyperboreans for twenty drachmas. The woman is marvelously responsive to the charm, and her case is the opposite of the ghosts: if they hear any sound of bronze or iron, they run away (that's what you say), but if she hears anything like the sound of money, she comes running to the sound of the jingling. And I also 5 wonder at the Magus: since he can get the richest women to fall in love with him, and get whole talents from them, why would he be so desperate for such a tiny profit of four minae, just so Glaucias could get Chrysis's affections?" "You joke because 10 you believe nothing," said Ion.

<sup>11</sup> For the Greek enephusēsen; More’s insibulavit humorously recalls the “hissing” sound of snakes. <sup>12</sup> a race of giants in Greek mythology

16. "Let me ask you what you might say about those who liberate possessed persons from their terrors, so very clearly casting out those ghosts by means of spells? I don't have to tell you about this,
 15 since everybody knows it: that Syrian fellow from Palestine, who is an artist in these matters, how many poor souls he has helped, who fall down at the moon, twist their eyes and foam at the mouth, but he raises them up and sends them away healed,
 20 freeing them from those fearful evils for a substantial profit. And when he stands over them as they lie there, asking them whence they had come into the body, the sick man is quiet, but the daemon replies in either Greek or barbarian, depending on where 25 he was from, both how and whence he entered into the man. And then the Magus, adjuring him and threatening him if he does not cooperate, drives out the daemon. I have even seen one coming out, all black and smoky in color."

30 "It was not something great, O Ion," I said, "for you to see such things—you, to whom the very Ideas appear, which the father of your family Plato reveals: that is, a thing barely to be seen and vanishing as far as concerns us blind mortals."

35 17. "So, did only Ion," Eucrates said, "see that kind of sight? Did not many others come upon daemones: some at night, others even in daytime? To be sure, I have seen such things not once but a thousand times, and at first I was troubled about 40 them, but soon, because of habituation, it seemed I was not seeing anything strange or marvelous, especially since that Arabian gave me a ring made of iron made from a cross,<sup>13</sup> and taught me a spell filled with many names—just in case you won't believe 45 me either, Tychiades."

"But how can it be," I said, "that I would disbelieve Eucrates, the son of Dino? A man especially wise, and freely telling, with authority, in his own home and in private, what was seen by him?"

18. "Haven't you heard," said Eucrates, "that bit
 50 about the statue that appears to everyone in the house every night—the boys, the teenagers, the older men? You might have heard that, I say, not only from me, but from any of my people." "About what statue?" I said. "Didn't you see," he said, "as 55 you came in, that statue in the atrium, a quite beautiful one, a work by Demetrius, who customarily makes statues of the human form?" "You don't mean the one throwing a discus? It's bent over, as if going to throw, leaning back toward the side
 60 where he's holding the discus, with the other leg bent somewhat, and seeming about to straighten up at the throw of the discus?" "No, not that one," he said. "You are talking about that discus-thrower; that's one of the works of Myron.<sup>14</sup> Nor do I mean
 65 the one next to it: I mean the one with fillets on his head, a real beauty, that one—it's the work of Polycleitus.<sup>15</sup> But forget the ones to the right hand side as you come in, among whom are the images of the tyrannicides Critias and Nesiotes;<sup>16</sup> but didn't you 70 see, beside the water fountain, a statue with a protruding belly, bald, half-undressed, and some hairs of the beard plucked out, with clearly visible veins, but very similar to a human being? It appears to be
 75 Pelichus, the Corinthian general."

19. "By Jupiter," I said, "I saw a certain statue to the right side of Saturn with head-bands and dry-leaf crowns, and some gold leaves on his chest." "I had that gold put on it," Eucrates said, "when he healed me when I was being ruined by three-day fever. "Was that noble Pelichus also a medical 80 doctor?" I said. "He is," said Eucrates, "and don't laugh—or the man will attack you not long afterwards. I certainly know how strong that statue is, at which you are laughing. But don't you think that 85 it would be in the power of a statue to send fevers into any people it wants if that same statue has the power to expel them?" "Let that statue, that has so much strength, be favorable and kindly to me!" I said. "What else have the people in the house seen
 90 him doing?" "As soon as it is night," he said, "that statue, climbing down from the pedestal on which

13 More gives the singular cruce ("cross, crucifix") for the Greek ek tôn staurôn, "[made] from stakes." 14 Greek sculptor (fl. ca. 480–440 BC) known for his bronze depictions of athletes in action 15 (fl. ca. 450–415 BC) Greek sculptor known for his sculptures of athletes 16 Critias and Nesiotes were sculptors in Athens, 5th century BC, of a work called The Tyrant-Slayers.

it was standing, walks in a circle around the entire house. Everyone has met up with him, sometimes singing. He has not hurt anyone; you only have to move out of his way. And the statue goes past without a hostile expression while it bathes itself and plays all night, as you can hear from the splash of the water.” “Look,” I said, “that statue may not be of Pelichus but of Talus<sup>17</sup> the Cretan that was supposed to belong to Minos. He was made of bronze, and was the guard of Crete. But if he<sup>18</sup> had been made out of bronze, and not out of wood, nothing would keep him from appearing to be, not the work of Demetrius, but one of the devices created by Daedalus! After all, that statue also climbed off his pedestal, as you said this one does.”

20. “Look here, Tychiades,” said he, “and be careful you don’t regret making this joke afterwards. I know what happened to the fellow who stole the obols<sup>19</sup> that we offer the statue every new moon.” “Really horrible things must have happened,” said Ion, “since that was a sacrilege. How did he punish him, Eucrates? I want to hear, even if Tychiades will be very disbelieving.” “There were many obols lying at his feet, as well as other coins, and even some silver ones stuck on his legs with wax, and silver foil too: they were each person’s thanksgiving offerings or rewards for healing from anyone who was freed by him, when oppressed by fever. But we had a servant, a Libyan scoundrel, a horse groomer. He approached at night and took all the money, watching when the statue was away from his pedestal. But because the moment he came back, Pelichus knew he had been a victim of sacrilegious robbery, consider how he got revenge and exposed the theft of the Libyan: all night long, the man wandered around the atrium, miserable, not able to go outside, as if he had been trapped in a Labyrinth, until at sunrise he was apprehended holding the money he had taken, and then, once captured, he received not a few blows, nor did he survive very long after that and, as an evil man, died evilly, being beaten up every night so that welts appeared on his body the next day. So go ahead, Tychiades, and laugh at Pelichus now that you have heard this, and think of me as if I were just some hold-over from the age of Minos, gone mad.” “But Eucrates,” I said, “as long as bronze is bronze, Demetrius the Alopecian will be a sculptor who specializes in making humans, not gods. I will never revere the statue of Pelichus, of whom I would not have been afraid even if he were still alive and making threats at me.”

21. At this point Antigonus the medical doctor said, “Eucrates, I have a statue of Hippocrates, a bronze one, about one cubit<sup>20</sup> high. As soon as the lamp is extinguished, he goes around the whole house, making noise and overturning jars, mixing up the drugs, and overturning the sacrifice, especially if we delay any of the sacrifices we offer him on a yearly basis.” “So, then,” said I, “even Hippocrates the doctor demands sacrifices to be made to him, and he gets angry if he is not entertained at the proper time by the correct sacrificial offerings. Of course, someone should have had the good idea to pour him a libation or sprinkle some sacrificial meal or put a crown on his head.”

22. “Listen, then,” said Eucrates, “I can prove with certainty by means of witnesses something that I saw five years ago. It was about harvest time. About the middle of the day, I sent the workers into the vineyards, and walked alone into the woods, thinking and pondering about something. After I reached the wild pasture, I heard the sound of dogs barking. I guessed it was my son Mnason coming along with his friends to play and hunt, as usual. But it was something altogether different: a little later, there was an earthquake and a sound like thunder, and I saw a woman coming up to me, terrible to behold. She was almost half a stadium tall, with a torch in her left hand, and a sword in her right about twenty cubits long. Down below, her feet were serpents, and up above, she had, you see, a face that reminded me of the Gorgon and was terrifying in appearance. She had snakes for hair that was tied back, and snakes around her neck and still others spread over her shoulders. Look, my friends, how terrified I am just telling you about it,” and saying this, Eucrates showed everybody there how the hairs on his arms were sticking straight up with fear.

23. Now Ion and Dinomachus and Cleodemus were listening, agape with wonder, all old men

<sup>17</sup> See Apollonius Rhodius, Argonautika 4.1638–88. <sup>18</sup> i.e., the statue of Pelichus. More appears to have corrected his Greek text by adding a negative (non). The thought is then clear: if the statue of

Pelichus had been bronze and not wood, it would be just like something made by Daedalus (i.e., like Talos, who was made of bronze) rather than by Demetrius (who, presumably, worked in wood). More makes an intelligible joke to avoid some obscurity in Lucian’s Greek text. <sup>19</sup> a silver coin in Ancient Greece, one-sixth of a drachma <sup>20</sup> about eighteen inches

giving reverence to such an unbelievable Colossus in their midst: a woman half a stadium high, a kind of giant monster. Now, I was pondering in the interim, what sort of men these were who, in the name of wisdom, consorted with youth and were popularly held up for admiration, when they differ from children only by having beards and white hair. But they are even more easily led to believe lies than children. “Tell me, Eucrates,” said Dinomachus. “Those dogs of the woman — what size were they?”

24. “Taller,” said he, “than the elephants of India, black and shagged and with filthy dirty tufts of hair. Now when I saw her, I stood still, and turned the seal of the ring (that the Arab had given me) to the inside of my finger. And so, Hecate, striking the ground with those snaky feet of hers, created a huge chasm, so large that it went all the way down to Tartarus. Shortly after, she leaped into it and disappeared. But I had the presence of mind to bend down and look, holding on to a tree that stood nearby, taking care not to fall headlong into the shadows and steep chasm before me; then I saw everything down below: Pyriphlegethon, the lake, Cerberus, the shades of the dead, so that I could even recognize some of them. I clearly saw my father, clothed in the very same things we buried him in.”

“O Eucrates,” said Ion, “what were the souls doing?” “What else,” said he, “but hanging around with their friends and relations, divided into families and tribes, and settled upon the asphodel?” “Let the Epicureans try,” said Ion, “to contradict holy Plato and his arguments about the soul. But did you see Socrates and Plato himself among the shades?” “I saw Socrates,” he said, “although none too clearly, apart from guessing that he was bald and had a protruding stomach. I didn’t see Plato — among friends one must tell the truth, of course. As soon as I saw everything, the chasm closed up, and some of my servants came looking for me, among them Pyrrhias here, and they got there before the chasm had closed all the way up — right, Pyrrhias? Don’t I speak the truth?” “By Jupiter,” said Pyrrhias, “I even heard howling through the gap, and fire seemed to me to be blazing, as from a torch.” And then I really laughed, when the eye-witness added the howling and the fire to top it all off.

25. Then Cleodemus said, “This is hardly new, and what you saw has not been unseen by others. For I myself not too long ago, when I was sick, saw something like that. Antigonus here was looking out for me and tending to me, and it was the seventh day of my illness. What kind of fever was it? It was certainly stronger than burning. Everybody had left me alone, and they were waiting outside with the doors closed. Indeed, those were your orders, Antigonus — so that I could get some sleep. Well, then a young man was standing by me, as I lay there still awake. Very handsome he was, and clothed in a bright white garb. And when he had gotten me up, he led me through some kind of opening to the lower regions, as I immediately understood when I saw Tantalus and Tityus and Sisyphus. Why should I rehearse the rest to you? After I reached the judges’ stand (Aeacus was there, and Charon, the Fates and the Furies), some kind of king (he seemed to me, of course, to be Pluto) took his seat to review the names of each person who was about to die who had happened to evade their appointed last day of life. So the young man brought me up and showed me to Pluto. Pluto got blazing mad and said to the one who led me there, “His thread is not finished yet. Let him go. But bring me the carpenter Demylyus; he’s already living ‘beyond the spool.’” Then I was very happy to leave, and coming back I was free of my fever and told everybody that Demylyus was going to die. He lived in our neighborhood, and even he was a little sick, as it was reported. And a little afterwards we heard the wailing of his mourners.”

26. “What is so marvelous about that?” said Antigonus. “For I knew someone who was resurrected twenty days after he was buried. I took care of the man both before he died and after he came back to life.”<sup>21</sup> “And how,” I said, “in those twenty days did the body not spoil or become decayed through starvation, unless you had some Epimenides<sup>22</sup> for your patient?”

27. When we were saying this, the sons of Eucrates came in, just returning home from the palaestra.<sup>23</sup> One had just outgrown the ephebes,<sup>24</sup> the other was about fifteen years old. After the exchange of greetings, they took a seat next to their father on the bed, and a chair was brought for me to sit in. Then Eucrates, as if reminded of something by the sight of his sons, said, “By the joy I take in 21 Greek anastánta . . . anéstē; Latin resurrexisse . . . resurrexit. Lucian appears to have used the Christian terminology rather than the Platonic anabiōsthai. 22 a Cretan seer (fl. ca. 6th century BC) who, according to legend, miraculously slept for fifty-seven years 23 a gymnasium for wrestling and other sports 24 military training for citizens between eighteen and twenty these boys,” and he put his arms around them, “I will tell you the truth, Tychiades. Everyone knows my wife of happy memory, the mother of these two, how I loved her; and I declared it in the things I did 5 for her not only while she lived but even after she died. Because, you see, I included in her grave all her personal affects and the clothing she was delighted by when alive. On the seventh day after her death, I was lying here on this same bed, the way I am now,

 10 trying to lessen the grief that I felt for her. I was silently reading Plato’s volume on the soul. And then Demanete herself came into the room, and sat next to me, just the way Eucratides is here,” he said, pointing to his younger son. And the son was trembling very much like a boy, and for a while was pale at hearing the story. “But when I saw her,” said Eucrates, “I embraced her and wept and sobbed. But she would not allow me to talk, but accused me, saying that although I was pleasing to her with every-20 thing else, nevertheless I had not cremated one of her golden sandals, which she said was still to be found, because it had fallen under the chest, and because we could not find it, we only had burned the one sandal. While we were talking about this, a certain most rascally dog, one of my pets, that was lying on the bed,<sup>25</sup> barked, and she vanished at the barking. But the sandal was found under the chest, and we burned it afterwards.

28. “So, Tychiades, will you refuse to believe 30 these things too, even though they are so evident and happen every day?” “By Jupiter,” I said, “if any people don’t believe these things and still so impudently resist them, they deserve to have their behinds spanked, like children, with a golden sandal.”

35 29. Meanwhile Arignotus the Pythagorean had entered the room, most venerable in appearance, and you know that he is famous by reason of his learning; he has been given the name “holy.” Well, when I saw him, I breathed easily again, thinking, 40 as the saying goes, that he had come to my rescue, a veritable axe to cut falsehoods: “That wise man will close their mouths, who are telling such monstrous tales,” and immediately, according to that old adage, I thought that a god had suddenly been sent down 45 to me by fortune. So after he took a seat (Cleodemus meanwhile getting up and giving him room to sit), he asked, first of all, about the illness, and said that he had heard that Eucrates was getting better. “But what are you all philosophizing about?” he said. “For while I was coming in, I overheard you 50 a little, and you seemed to be involved in a lovely conversation.”

“What else,” said Eucrates, “but trying to persuade this block of marble (pointing at me) that daemones and ghosts exist and that the souls of dead
 55 persons walk the earth and can show themselves to whomsoever they please!” Well, I blushed at that, and looked down, feeling some shame before Arignotus. But he said, “Look, Eucrates, is Tychiades saying that? The only souls that wander about are 60 the souls of those who have died violently, say by being strangled or beheaded or crucified or departing from life in some such way as that; those, however, who have died a natural kind of death no longer wander at all. If that is what he is saying, he has 65 not said anything really that absurd.”

“By Jupiter!” said Dinomachus, “he doesn’t think they even exist, or can be seen as present at all.”

30. “What’s that you say?” said Arignotus, looking at me rather sternly. “You don’t think any of this happens? Especially when everybody, so to speak, 70 sees it?” “Please forgive me,” I said, “if I do not believe, since I am the only one who doesn’t see them. I am sure that if I had seen them, I would have surely believed in them just the way you do.” “But 75 if you go to Corinth,” he said, “ask where the house of Eubatides is, and when it is pointed out to you (it’s near the Cranion), go on in, and tell the doorman Tibius that you want to see the place where Arignotus the Pythagorean brought forth the dae-
 80 mon and drove it away, and made the house habitable again.”

31. “What was that all about, Arignotus?” asked Eucrates. “The house was uninhabitable for a long time because of some frightening things so that if 85 anybody lived there, he became terrified and was chased away by a horrifying and terrible ghost. It was already falling down, the roof had caved in, and there was nobody who even dared to go in it at all. Now, when I heard about it, taking some books with 90 me (I own quite a few Egyptian books about these very matters), I went into the house about the first

<sup>25</sup> More makes a small change here, perhaps to humanize the scene: Lucian’s Greek says, “a little dog, a Maltese (Greek

Melitaion), which was under (hypò) the bed, barked”; More omits mentioning the kind of dog (as CW 3.1 editor Thompson points out, p. 147), but instead makes it “a pet he loves” (in deliciis) and has it lying on the bed (in lecto) instead of under it.

watch of the night, even though the homeowner was pleading with me and almost forcing me not to go in, when he learned where I was headed—he thought I was going surely to destruction. Holding a lamp, I went in alone. Entering a very large room, I set down the lamp and began to read silently. The daemon shows up, thinking he was dealing with just another common person, and intending to frighten me the same way he had the others—he was shaggy and filthy and darker than the shadows. As he stood there, he tried to get at me from every which way, changing into a dog, a bull, and a lion. But holding in my hands the most terrifying spell I had, and making my voice sound Egyptian, chanting the spell, I drove him into a corner of the dark house. When I saw where he hid himself in the ground, I left off. In the morning, when everyone had given up hope, and thought they would find me dead the way they had found the rest, out I came to everyone’s surprise! Going up to Eubatides, I cheerfully announced to him that his house was now clean and free of ghosts and that he could live there again. So bringing him and many others (they were following in curiosity over this unexpected event) to the place where I had seen the daemon burying himself, I told them to get picks and shovels and dig it up. When they had done so, about six feet under they found a decayed cadaver, with only an intact skeleton to show the human shape. Digging it out, we gave it a proper burial, and after that the house stopped being haunted.

32. When Arignotus—a man of haunting<sup>26</sup> wisdom, and respected by all—told this story, nobody was there who failed to think me quite mad for not believing such things, especially when Arignotus was telling them. But I had no regard for his long hair, nor for their high opinion of him. “What is this, Arignotus? You, in whom all my hopes were placed, have been full of smoke and images like this? Well then, I have experienced in your case the old proverb, ‘Look for a treasure, but only find charcoal.’” “But listen, you,” said Arignotus. “If you don’t believe me or Dinomachus or Cleodemus here, or Eucrates himself, tell me whom do you find worthier of belief concerning these matters? Who is telling you differently?” “By Jupiter,” said I, “a most admirable man, Democritus from Abdera, whose firm conviction that nothing of this kind can exist was made clear, when he enclosed himself outside the gates of the city in a sepulcher, and spent days and nights there, composing and writing, and some youths who wanted to scare him and play tricks on him dressed themselves in black and put on masks to look like corpses, stood around him and jumped and danced a lot; he had no fear of their deceptions and didn’t even look at them, but just spoke to them while he kept on writing: ‘Stop being fools.’ That’s how firmly he believed that souls are nothing after they depart from bodies.” “So you say,” said Eucrates, “that there was a madman like Democritus? And that he thought like that?”

33. “I will tell you something else, something that happened to me, and not something I heard from somebody else; perhaps even you, Tychiades, will be forced to give in, when you have heard it, and be compelled by the truth of the story. When I was spending time in Egypt, still a young man—having been sent there by my father for the purpose of education—I wanted to hear that miraculous sound. Leaving by boat for Coptus, I wanted to go from there to Memnon, to hear that sound that he gives at the rising sun. And I heard him, but not in the common way, whereby other people hear some silly noise, but Memnon himself divulged oracles to me, opening his mouth to speak in seven verses, and if it weren’t pointless for me to do so, I would now recite them for you. 34. While we were sailing, we met a certain man from Memphis who was traveling with us, one of those sacred scribes, of wonderful wisdom, thoroughly versed in the whole doctrine of the Egyptians. He was said to have spent twenty-three years in subterranean chambers, and to have learned magic from Isis. Arignotus my teacher said, ‘You speak of Pancrates, a holy man with a shaved head, clothed in linen, learned and speaking very good Greek, tall, with a snub nose, protruding lips and slender legs.’ The other said, ‘That’s him, Pancrates, but at first I didn’t know who he was. After we came to harbor, and I saw him in addition to many other wonders, riding on crocodiles and consorting with animals, while they fawned on him and wagged their tails, I realized that he was a holy man, and by keeping company with him, I gradually insinuated myself into his confidence and friendship

<sup>26</sup> Latin vir prodigiosa sapientia: a humorous touch introduced by More; the Latin word prodigiosa (“spooky”) picks up

More’s own translation of the sentence before turbari prodigiis “to be disturbed by prodigies.” Lucian’s Greek says simply that the man’s wisdom was “godlike” (daimonios).

so much so that he told me all his secrets. At last he persuaded me to leave all my servants behind in Memphis and follow him by myself; he said we would not be lacking our own assistants. And this was how we lived from that time forwards.

35. When we came to an inn, the man would take something—a pestle, or a little broom, or a door-bolt—and wrapping it up in his cloak, would chant a certain spell upon it, and make it walk, and appear to others like a human being. So the thing would go away and fetch water, make dinner, set the table, and in all respects served us and ministered to us comfortably. After the service was accomplished, reciting another spell, he made the broom turn back into a broom or the pestle turn back into a pestle. And though I tried very hard, there was no way I could fish the secret out of him. He begrudged me that, even though he was very generous in everything else. One day, while hiding in a shadowy place where he didn't notice me, I overheard the spell at closer range. It had three syllables. He gave a pestle some orders to do something, then left for the forum.

36. The next day, when he was busy at the forum, I took the pestle, wrapped it up and, pronouncing the syllables exactly as I heard them pronounced, commanded it to fetch water. When it brought me the amphora full of water, I said, 'Stop. Don't bring me any more water, and become a pestle again.' But it did not want to obey me anymore and kept bringing water without stopping until he filled up our whole house with water. And when I was not able to stop the thing, fearing that Pancrates would be angry when he returned (and he did in fact return), I picked up an axe and cut the pestle into two pieces. But then each part picked up a jug and fetched water, and it now began to be two servants instead of one. That's when Pancrates arrived and, grasping the situation, changed the pieces back into the wood they were to begin with. Then he disappeared from my sight, going off someplace secretly." "But are you still able," said Dinomachus, "to make a pestle into a human?" "By Jupiter," said the other, "I know half of it, but I was never able to turn it back into its original form, once it became a water-carrier. We would have to get out of a house full of water."

37. Then I said, "Old men, will you not stop telling these monstrous stories? At least for the sake of the young people, leave to another time the telling of these incredible and terrifying stories lest they be filled, without your noticing it, with terrors and scary tales. You should spare them from getting used to hearing such things which will stick with them and disturb them all their lives and make them jumpy at every little sound, let alone fill them with every kind of superstition."

38. "You are right," said Eucrates, "to warn me about superstition. But what do you think about these kind of things, Tychiades: I mean oracles and prophecies, and whatever people proclaim who are inspired by some divinity, things heard from caverns? Or when a virgin prophetess speaking in elegant verses predicts the future? Don't you even believe that? Well, I won't tell you that I have a sacred ring that has a signet with the image of Pythian Apollo, nor will I tell you what this Apollo says to me lest you think I am telling incredible things for my own glory. But what I heard in the presence of Amphilocheus in Mallus, when the hero spoke to me for a long time, getting advice from the god about my affairs, as well as what I saw myself—that is what I would like to tell you about. Then what I saw in Pergamum, and next what I heard in Patara, in order. So then, when I came back home from Egypt, and I heard that that very clear prophecy in Mallus, at the same time as being very truthful, would also give out oracles in such a way that they would exactly answer whatever somebody wrote on a tablet and handed to the prophet. I thought I would be acting rightly, if I experienced the oracle, while I was sailing near the place anyway, and consult the god about the future."

39. Eucrates was still speaking, when I saw how long the thing was going to take, since he had started no brief tragic tale about the oracle. Deciding it would not do any good for me alone to contradict everybody there, I left him sailing from Egypt to Mallus. You see, I also gathered that my presence was obnoxious to them since I was disagreeing with them and refuting their lies. "Okay, I am leaving," I said. "I want to find Leonticus, whom I still need to talk to about something. Since you all believe that human things are not enough for you, you call the gods themselves to aid you with their myths." As soon as I said that, I left. And they, delighted to have their liberty, as you can truly imagine, toasted each other generously and drowned themselves in lies. O Philocles! After hearing all that at Eucrates's house, I come here with a stomach bursting, like people who have been drinking sweet wine—I need to vomit! I would gladly buy for a high price

some drug that would bring forgetfulness of what I heard, to keep the memory of it from damaging me: I think I see monsters, daimons, Hecates!

5 40. PHILOCLES: Actually, Tychiades, this story of yours has brought something similar to me: they say that not only people who have been bitten by rabid dogs go crazy and become hydrophobic,<sup>27</sup> but even if a man who has been bitten like that bites another, that bite will be no less powerful than the dog bite,
10 and the next man will be just as hydrophobic. So, since you have been bitten by many lies at Eucrates', you appear now to have communicated that same bite to me, so much have you filled my mind with daemones!

TYCHIADES: Let's be of good cheer, my friend, 15 since we have a great remedy against things of this kind: truth and right reason in all things, and if we use that, we will never be disturbed by these vain and stupid lies.

THE END

THOMAS MORE, TRANSLATOR

20

<sup>27</sup> The fear of water was considered a symptom of rabies.

The Tyrannicide or Declamation on Behalf of the Tyrant-slayer

THE ARGUMENT OF THE DECLAMATION

5 A man went up into the citadel in order to kill<sup>1</sup> the tyrant; although he did not find him, after he slew the tyrant's son, he left his sword in the body. The tyrant himself came up, and, seeing his son already dead, drove himself through with the very same 10 sword; the man who had gone up and slain the tyrant's son requests reward as a tyrant-slayer.

THE DECLAMATION

1. Since, judges, I have killed two tyrants in a single day—one already advanced in age, the other in the 15 prime of youth and thus fit for taking up the succession of crimes—I am here today, all the same, to ask for a single reward for the double action, and I do this, even though I am the only one of those who have assassinated tyrants to dispatch and destroy
20 two wicked persons with one blow: I killed the son by means of my sword, but the father by means of the excessive love he had for his son. Therefore the tyrant paid a sufficient penalty for what he had done, in so far as he saw his own son killed while he was 25 still alive himself, and at the last (and this was especially beyond all expectation) was forced to become his own tyrannicide. And therefore the son was slain by me, and even when dead, acted as my assistant toward another death: for he who, when alive, together with his father committed injustices, when 30 dead, killed his father as only he could have done it.

2. I am the one who removed the tyranny; mine is the sword that accomplished everything; I only switched the order of their deaths: removing the 35 stronger one, the one who could have taken revenge, and leaving the old man only to the sword.

3. Now because of these things I was actually expecting something extra from you, and would hope to receive rewards equaling the number of the slain, 40 seeing that I have snatched you not only from present evils, but also from the fear of future crimes, and have given you certain freedom, with no living heir of wickedness. But in the meanwhile, I run the risk of going away from you without receiving any reward at all, to be alone deprived of the payment 45 which the very laws, rescued by me, have decreed. Therefore, this adversary of mine here is apparently not doing this out of love of country,<sup>2</sup> as he claims, but rather, has been stirred up by the killing of the tyrants to avenge himself on the one who was the 50 cause of their death.

4. But, judges, listen to me a little, while I present the evils of the tyranny (even though you yourselves are quite aware of them); in this way you will better grasp the extent of my service, and you will
55 also rejoice more, when you think over the ills from which you have been delivered. For, the way it often happens to many others, it has not in the same way happened to us also: to have suffered a simple tyranny and a single servitude; nor have we put up with the passion of a single master, but alone of all those 60 whom a similar unhappiness has ever oppressed, have had two tyrants in place of one, and been wretchedly distraught into double the injuries. But the old man was much more moderate: milder in his anger, less keen to enforce punishments, slower to act on his desires, since his old age restrained the 65 excessiveness of his drive, and reined in his passions for pleasures. In fact, he was said to have been pushed unwillingly into starting injustices, since he was not extremely tyrannical himself, except when he gave in 70 to the other, for, as he showed, he was overly fond of his son. That son was everything to him: the father obeyed him, did whatever injustice he commanded, and punished whomever the son wished; in a word,
75 he lived under his tyranny, and had become the willing<sup>3</sup> accomplice of his son's desires.

5. The young man yielded in honor to the father because of his age, and abstained from the title alone of tyranny; in actual fact, however, he was 80 himself the tyranny's head. The stability and the safety of the rulership<sup>4</sup> depended upon him, since

<sup>1</sup> Lucian used the same Greek verb for "kill" (apokténein) three times; More varies it: occidere, perimere, interemere. <sup>2</sup> Greek kēdōmenos . . . tōn koinōn ("caring for the things that are in common"); Latin nullo Reipublicae studio. <sup>3</sup> More has added ultroneus ("willing")—perhaps to bring out further the contradiction in the father's behavior. <sup>4</sup> Greek dynasteias; Latin principatus

he alone enjoyed the results of the injustices. He was the one who directed the henchmen, who ruled the bodyguards, who struck down the tyrannized, who terrified the rebellious. He was the one who kidnapped the young men and violated weddings, the one to whom maidens were brought. If there were any killings, any forced exiles, any confiscations, any tortures or insults — all that was the work of the young one, for the old one followed his lead, was his companion in crime, and had only approval for his son's misdeeds. The whole business became intolerable to us, since, when the mind's desires get a license from political power, they bring no end of injustices.

6. But the most burning thing<sup>5</sup> of all to us was that we knew it was going to be a long-lasting — even a permanent — enslavement, and that the republic<sup>6</sup> and people were going to be handed down in succession, moving as an inheritance from one criminal overlord to the next. Of course, others have no little hope about this situation, and can rationalize and say to themselves: “It will be over soon,” and “he will die, then we will be free.” But nothing of the kind could be hoped for with those, but we saw the heir prepared for succession to the rule, and none of the braver men dared do anything, even the ones who longed for the same outcome as I. Freedom was completely despaired of, and the tyranny appeared invincible, since so many had to be attacked.

7. But these things frightened me not at all, nor did thinking of the difficulty of the business make me shirk from it, or dread the danger. I alone, I alone advanced against so strong and extensive a tyranny — well, not really alone, with my trusty sword, my comrade in tyrannicide — having my own death before my eyes, but counterbalancing my own slaughter with the freedom of all.<sup>7</sup> After I made my first attack on the guards, and had pushed aside — not easily — the bodyguards, killing whomever I encountered, and overcoming whatever stood in the way, I flew at the very head of the problem, the one bulwark of the tyranny, the very source of our woes. And standing there amid the guards of the citadel, when I caught sight of him manfully defending himself and resisting, with many wounds, nevertheless, I killed him.

8. The tyranny was removed, the exploit was accomplished, and from that point forward we were all free. The old man alone remained, unarmed, stripped of his guards, and now with that one henchman of his gone, he was deserted, and no longer worthy of any noble foe's hand. At that moment, judges, these were my thoughts: “My entire project has turned out well: everything is done; all has been vigorously accomplished. In what way, now, is the one who survives to be punished? He is, of course, unworthy of my hand, and especially, now that my noble, youthful exploit has been done, I would only subtract from the glory of it by adding<sup>8</sup> such a lackluster killing. It would be worthwhile to look for an executioner — but after the catastrophe, then, let him get no benefit from it. Let him see, let him be punished, let him have the sword at his disposal: I entrust the rest of the business to the sword!” Once I decided this, I removed myself from there. But he acted just as I had divined he would, and killing a tyrant, added the final act to my fable.<sup>9</sup>

9. Therefore I am present today, bringing back popular government<sup>10</sup> to you, proclaiming safety to all, joyfully proclaiming freedom. So therefore, make use now of what I have accomplished. As you see, the citadel is freed of criminals; nobody is giving orders, but it is permitted to bestow honors, to make judgments, to plead cases on the basis of laws; and these are results that derive from me, that have proceeded from my daring deed and from that one killing, after which the father could no longer live. Therefore for these reasons I judge it worthy, that the reward be given me, not because I am eager for profit, or because I make a lot out of a little, or because I have set my heart on getting paid for helping the fatherland, but because I want my services to be approved by your reward, that my daring attempt not be belittled or become inglorious, abandoned as if maimed by you, and judged unworthy of reward.

10. But this fellow disputes it, and says I act unjustly because I want to be honored and win a reward, for he says I am not a tyrant-slayer, and that in Latin Europe. <sup>10</sup> Greek dēmokratian; Latin popularem gubernationem. Like drama, democratia has apparently not yet become a familiar word in Latin Christendom.

<sup>5</sup> Greek elípei (“pained”); Latin urebat (“burned”). More has specified a particular kind of pain. <sup>6</sup> Here More uses respublica for the Greek pólis. <sup>7</sup> More adds propria and brings out the juxtaposition of private sacrifice and public service: propria, communi. <sup>8</sup> More adds a playful paradox,

“I would subtract [minuerem] . . . by adding [addita],” where Lucian's Greek is “he, being despatched . . . would put shame on that killing [of mine].” <sup>9</sup> Greek drámati, Latin fabulae. More uses the traditional Latin word for a tragedy. The Greek word drama has not yet become a standard word

nothing has been done by me in accordance with the law, but that something is still lacking to my action for it to be rewarded. And so I ask him: What more do you want from me? Did I not will the act? 5 Did I not go up into the citadel? Did I not I kill? Did I not liberate? Does anybody give orders? Does anyone give commands? Is any overlord making threats? Has any criminal escaped? You will not say so. But everything is full of peace; all the laws have 10 been restored; our freedom is manifest; the popular government is stable; marriages are not violated; boys are out of danger; maids are safe; and the state<sup>11</sup> is celebrating festival days because of the general happiness. What is, then, the reason for all this? 15 Who took away those things, and brought about these things? In fact, if someone is more deserving of this honor than myself, I let him have the gift; I abstain from the reward. But if I alone have done everything — daring, risking, attacking, killing, punishing, avenging the one upon the other — why do 20 you slander my services? Why do you make me unappreciated by the people?

11. “But you did not kill the tyrant,” you say; “the law decrees a reward for a tyrant-slayer.” So tell me: 25 is there a difference between killing him and providing the cause of his death? I certainly don’t think there is any difference, and I think the law-maker had only this in mind: freedom, and a state for the 30 people,<sup>12</sup> the removal of ill-doers; that is what he honored, that is what he counted worthy of thanks, and you cannot deny that this is what has been done by me. For if I killed the one person without whom he could not go on living, then, of course, I 35 killed him. The killing was mine; the hand was his. So do not quibble over-curiously about the mode of death, nor investigate how he died, but rather, whether or not he is still alive, and whether or not it was through me that he is no longer still alive. Indeed, you seem to me about to discuss this too, and 40 become a persecutor of benefactors, asking whether somebody killed him with a sword or a rock or a stick or in some other way.

But what if I had blockaded the tyrant and by starvation driven him to death? Even then would 45 you demand a killing carried out by my own hand? Or would you still say that something was lacking toward the fulfillment of the law? And this, even though the evil-doer had died by a harsher punishment? Investigate one thing only; interrogate about 50 this; be inquisitive to find out this: who of those wicked men is still living? What fear of injury still hangs over us? What traces of those calamities? If everything has been cleaned up and pacified, it is the role of a sycophant to besmirch the way things 55 are done and to wish to deprive actual deeds of their deserved reward.

12. Now I also recall that this was stated in the law (unless perhaps, owing to our long enslavement, I have forgotten what is said in them), that there 60 are two causes of death, either someone killed,<sup>13</sup> or, without killing the person himself or doing it by his own hand, nevertheless forced it and provided the occasion of the killing. The law judges that this latter man too should be punished, and quite justly, 65 for the supplying of the cause of death it has judged to be no less than the actual fact, and any remaining question about the mode of killing is superfluous. Therefore, someone who murdered a man in that way, you would think justly to be punished as 70 a homicide, and would in no way absolve him; but when someone has benefited the state in the same way, will you consider him undeserving of the reward of a benefactor?

13. Nor can you say this: that I simply did it, but a particular good result followed by chance, without 75 my intending it. What further cause would I have had to fear, once the stronger one had been slain? Why would I have left my sword in the wound, unless I had foreseen completely what was going to 80 happen? Unless perhaps you will say that he who was killed was not the tyrant, nor had acquired that name, nor that you would have gladly offered many rewards for it, if he had been slain. But you will never say this.

Therefore, now that the tyrant is dead, you will 85 not give a reward to the one who supplied the cause for it? Oh, what quibbling! You are concerned about how he was killed, when you enjoy your freedom, or you demand something more from the one who restored the republic.<sup>14</sup> And yet the law, 90 as you say, investigates the core of things, but bids all the intermediate issues farewell, and quibbles

<sup>11</sup> Greek hè pólis; Latin civitas <sup>12</sup> Greek dēmokratian; Latin popularem statum
<sup>13</sup> More adds this short clause to make the two categories of murder more explicit.

He has not changed the meaning. <sup>14</sup> The use of republicam in the earlier editions listed by Thompson (1506, 1516, 1519) is preferable to democratiam, which, apparently, first appeared in a marginal gloss and was then brought into the text. More does not use Latin democratia for the Greek word elsewhere in the work.

no further. Why indeed—would not one who had driven a tyrant into exile, not have received the honor of a tyrannicide? Well, of course, and justly so, since that man too has brought liberty in the place of servitude. But what was done by me was not exile, nor any fear that a rebellion would be repeated, but a complete removal, the destruction of the whole family, the evil entirely cut out at its root.

14. And now, by the gods, examine everything in my case from the beginning to end, and determine whether anything has been left out in fulfilling the law, if I lack anything that a tyrant-slayer ought to have. Above all, then, it is becoming that a generous spirit should be present, passionate for the republic,<sup>15</sup> prepared to undergo dangers for the common welfare, and to purchase with his own death the safety of the many: so was anything lacking to me, in doing it? Was I broken in spirit? Or, foreseeing what I had to go through, did I shrink before the danger? That you would not say. Dwell, then, on this point alone: imagine that only on the basis that I wanted to do it, and had a plan to do it, and even though no good came from it, that still, just because of my serious intention in itself, I was seeking a reward as a benefactor, but nevertheless I did not do it, but some other person came after me and killed the tyrant, wouldn't it be discordant (tell me!) or absurd to award me, especially if I were to say, "O men of the jury! I wanted to do it, I longed to do it, I went right up, I made signs of my intention, and I alone am worthy of honor." What would you say in reply to that?

15. But that is not what I am saying. I climbed up; I put myself in danger; I accomplished countless feats before I killed the young man. And do not think that it is all so easy a matter to overcome the guards, defeat the henchmen, and, although alone, turn aside so many: this is really the biggest thing in the slaying of a tyrant, the very core of the matter. For the tyrant himself, in fact, is not a big deal, nor a great problem to take care of, nor difficult to fight down, but rather those are that protect and preserve the tyranny. He who overcomes those, overcomes everything; the rest is rather little. Indeed, I could not have been allowed to get through all the way to the tyrants unless I had first been victor over the guards and the henchmen who encircled them, if I had not first defeated them all. I add nothing more, but again insist on these things: I overcame the guards and the henchmen, I say, and I made the tyrant guardless, armless, stripped. Do I not seem worthy of reward because of this? Do you still require of me his actual killing?

16. But if you also want a killing, that is not absurd. Nor am I without blood on my hands, but I have perpetrated the great and noble killing of the young man in his flower, when he was feared by all, through whom even the tyrant was safe from plots, in whom alone he trusted, and was all he needed, taking the place of many henchmen for him. So then, am I not worthy of a reward? Shall I be deprived of the honor of such great deeds? What if I had killed one of the henchmen, or some servant of the tyrant? Or some rather distinguished retainer? Would not this seem big to you, also: if I went up to the middle of the citadel and in the midst of the weapons had accomplished the killing of one of the tyrant's friends? But as it is, just consider the one who has been slain: he was the son of the tyrant, but really a worse tyrant, a more pitiless master, a more cruel torturer, a more violent extortionist. Then, and most of all, the heir and successor of all that; finally, someone who was capable of extending our calamities for a long time.

17. Do you wish I had only done that, with the tyrant still alive, having made his escape? This is what I am asking to be rewarded for. What do you say? You won't give it? Didn't you also consider the son wicked? Wasn't he an overlord? A bad one? An intolerable one?

But now, understand the heart of the matter. What this adversary of mine is demanding from me, I accomplished, and it was done the best way it could have been: I killed one tyrant by the killing<sup>16</sup> of another, and not just any old way,<sup>17</sup> nor with a single blow, which is the most he could have wished for, considering all the crimes he committed. But I did it by giving him a lot of pain first: showing him, laid out wretchedly before his eyes, what was most dear to him, his son—an evil man, but in the prime of life, and just like his father—lying there, covered in blood and gore. Here are wounds for fathers, here

<sup>15</sup> Greek philópolis ("city-loving");

More periphrases: reipublicae studiosum

<sup>16</sup> More adds a wordplay with the Latin nex (paronomasia or polyptoton) that is not in Lucian: tyrannum alterius nece necavi.

<sup>17</sup> More adds a touch of emphasis, translating Greek haplós ("simply") with vulgariter ("in the cheap, common way"), strengthening the idea that the killing was "fit" for a bad tyrant.

the swords of legitimate tyrant-slayers! This was a death to befit cruel tyrants; this was a punishment fit for such huge crimes. To die instantly, at the same instant to be unaware, not to see such a sight — that holds nothing worthy for a tyrant’s punishment.

18. For I was not unaware — listen to me — I was not, I say, unaware, nor in fact was anyone else, of how much love he had for his son, and that he did not think it worthwhile to outlive him for even a short time. And perhaps all fathers are this way toward their sons. But he certainly had this trait more than others, and for good reason, since he saw the son as the lone caretaker and guardian of the tyranny, saw him alone undergoing dangers before his father, and providing strength to the rule.<sup>18</sup> Consequently, I knew he would soon die — although not for love, at least out of desperation — since he thought his life would be useless to him once the security his son provided was gone. Thus I surrounded him with all these things at once: nature, grief, separation, terror, and apprehension for what the future would bring. I made use of all these as my allies, and forced him to make plans for death. He died on us<sup>19</sup> bereaved, afflicted, grieving, weeping, and engaged in a mourning that was brief, but enough for a father, and, most grievously of all, at his own hand: the most miserable kind of death, much more bitter than if caused by someone else.

19. Where is my sword? Can anybody else recognize it? Does it belong to anyone else? Who brought it up to the citadel? Who used it before the tyrant did? Who sent it to the tyrant? O sword, who shared in my deeds, and succeeded to the legacy of my actions, after so many risks, after so many deaths, we are despised, and appear unworthy of honor and reward! For, if because of this reason alone I were seeking honor from you, if I were to say, “O men, when the tyrant was longing for death and was caught without a weapon, that’s when my sword came to serve, and contributed its work to acquiring liberty for all,” would you have thought it unworthy of honor and reward? Wouldn’t you have exchanged<sup>20</sup> your overlord for such a public possession? Wouldn’t you have listed it among your benefactors? Wouldn’t you have set my sword among the sacred objects? And not have revered it along with the gods?

20. Now, think over with me, what kinds of things it is likely that the tyrant himself said and did before he died, once I had killed his son, and pierced him with many wounds in the visible parts of the body, in order, namely, that the father be burned<sup>21</sup> with suffering, and be struck dumb at first sight as soon as he saw it. He screamed out for his father, and shouted at him, not to come to help or aid in battle, he being old and infirm, but to behold his family’s misfortunes. I departed from the place, the author of the entire tragedy, and left to the stage-actor the dead body, the scene, the sword and what remained to be performed. But when he came on the scene, and saw his son, the only one he had, breathing his last, covered with deadly slashes, bearing those many lethal wounds, he shouted: “O son! We are destroyed, we are slain, we are tyrants who have been assassinated. Where is the killer? Why did he spare me? For what evil is he saving me, who am already dead, by you being dead? Perhaps he despises me as an old man, and having decided to kill me slowly, stretches out my death, in order to prolong his act of killing me.”

21. And at the same time as he said this, he looked for a sword. He was unarmed, being a man who had placed all his hopes in his son. But even this was not lacking to him, since it had been made ready by me long before, and had been left behind to work a future exploit. And so, tearing it out of the body, and removing the sword from the wound, “You have already cut me down, killed me, so now make an end, O sword,” he said; “come to console a grieving father, and help the unlucky hand of an old man; slaughter a tyrant, kill me, and release me from grief. How I wish I had met with you first, that I had begun the series of slaughters, and had fallen, but just as a tyrant, still hoping for an avenger; as it is, I die bereaved, and not even able to provide an executioner.” And as he said these words, he gave as such. <sup>19</sup> Greek humin (“on you”); More has changed it to “us” (nobis), which makes a little more sense, considering the pathos of the immediate context.

<sup>18</sup> Greek tēi archē; Latin imperio. Yet another word for “state” (cf. civitas, respublica, principatus, popularis status, popularis gubernatio). The Greek word archē (“beginning, principle”) emphasizes where the chain of command “begins”; the Latin word imperium, the “command”

<sup>20</sup> Greek ēmeipsasthe; Latin retaliassetis. In her edition of the Utopia, Delcourt lists retaliare as one of the rare words More uses; it is used twice in the Utopia: once with reference to pain and pleasure (CW 4: 167/10) and once in close association with tyranny and tyrannicide (CW 4: 200.10).

<sup>21</sup> Greek hypsēsin; Latin ureretur

himself the wound with trembling hand, weakly, but still desiring it, without the strength needed to administer such a deed.

22. How many punishments are there here? How 5 many wounds? How many deaths? How many assassinations of tyrants? How many rewards? And yet you have all seen the young one lying there, no small deed, and no easy one: the old man poured out upon him, the blood of both clinging to them, 10 that funereal libation-rite that engendered us our freedom,<sup>22</sup> and the work of my sword. The sword itself was in display between them, showing that it was not unworthy of its owner, and giving witness that it faithfully obeyed me. Had this been done by me, it would have been more obscurely done, but 15 now it has been made more brilliant by its very novelty. The one who removed the whole tyranny is I, but the work was distributed among many, as in the acting of a play.<sup>23</sup> I played the leading part;<sup>24</sup> the son played the second, the tyrant the third, and the 20 sword played the servant to all.

THE END

THOMAS MORE, TRANSLATOR

22 More introduces a Roman religious term Libitinam, the goddess of death and funerals, as a kind of play on the similar Latin word libationem; Greek spondén

(“libation”). He also modifies Libitinam with the adjective parentem: the goddess of death; the father-tyrant’s suicide is thus the “parent” or “engenderer” of liberty, something missing from Lucian’s Greek.

23 Greek drámati; Latin fabula 24 More uses the plural of pars for an actor’s (single) role, an idiom in Terence and Cicero.

Thomas More's Declamation in Response to Lucian's "Tyrannicide"

I had not imagined, gentlemen of the jury, that one who undertook to plead a case in the public interest, as I now do, would need to explain why he resolved to do this. For there would be no danger of his seeming to be impelled by malice rather than by a sense of duty, since he offers as indisputable proof of his thorough integrity his willingness to exert himself, on his own initiative, for the general welfare. Though I suppose all pleaders of cases such as this can defend themselves justly from every suspicion of calumny, yet I can do this most justly of all. I have not only taken this task upon myself for the sake of the public weal but have incurred the personal enmity of this man who boasts that he killed the tyrants. But since I see that nothing is attempted, however rightly, which the malevolence of the wicked does not carp at and distort; and since even now I hear the murmurings of some who, convinced by his speech, are prejudiced against my performance of duty—I have resolved, gentlemen of the jury, to explain to you the reasons for this lawsuit of mine, lest any spiteful critic try to ascribe my zeal to grief, hatred, or envy.

First of all, why should I be thought to mourn the death of the tyrant, as my opponent has lately charged? He offered no proof, to be sure, content merely with having made the assertion; and he asks to be believed without evidence, without a witness. Nay, more than that: "Unless you were mourning," he says, "unless you desired to avenge the tyrant's death, you would not oppose me." Hence do you demonstrate that I sorrow at the tyrant's death merely by the fact that I have justly opposed you in your unjust claim to the reward for his violent end? Do you want to see how empty that retort is? If you could prove you killed the tyrant, I could not bring suit against you if I would, nor would if I could. Why indeed am I going to oppose you now, except that you did not kill him? If you had slain him, I would not complain; on the contrary I would praise and admire you, and I would be the first to vote for a reward. Now, in fact, it is for this very reason that I speak against you, for this very reason I deny the honor to you, for this very reason I appear against you, for this very reason I object: that you did not kill the tyrant. I do not seem on that account to be plunged into sorrow for his death, do I? My opponent ought rather to have shown, gentlemen, that I was connected with the tyrant by blood or marriage ties, or obligated to him for favors, or leagued with him in crimes! But he has been unable even to pretend anything of the sort. If therefore I was neither related to him nor connected with him, if he never employed my services to the injury of anyone, if no benefit accrued to me from him, if he oppressed me along with others by bitter slavery, if his destruction restored me as well as you to freedom, what reason is there that I should lament his death, the good omen of my safety and liberty?

Yet surely there is just as little reason for hatred on my part. What has he done to provoke my hatred? First, he killed the tyrant's son. Afterward, when the tyrant had slain himself by his own hand, this man here demanded reward as a tyrannicide. Consider, for one thing, that he did kill the youth, though with too little forethought and without benefit to the public had not the gods been gracious to us. Yet he did it, so far as I can conjecture, from no unworthy motive. The other point is that he seeks the reward. Although he has not deserved it, men's dispositions are such nowadays that I am not surprised by his seeking it, and I excuse him if he can carry it off.

Neither of these actions excites my animosity toward him. Excepting these, he never did anything that pertains to me in any way. Am I therefore so unfair that I should gratuitously prosecute, out of hatred, a man hardly known to me by looks or reputation, who had never offended me by word or deed?

There remains to be explained the suspicion of jealousy, which is such a thing that from no fault would I more earnestly wish to be free. For although all vices are of their own nature pernicious, none is more destructive than envy, which excites with exceptionally grievous torments the breast wherein it has once lodged. Surely to deem another's good fortune one's own misfortune, to rage at the success of others, to be vexed by praise of others, to be tormented by another's happiness—is not this the greatest misery, is it not the most extreme madness? And so, if I am free from any other fault, gentlemen of the jury, I am certainly the furthest of all from this. Whose fortune have I ever attacked? Whose achievements have I disparaged? Whose praises have I ever belittled? Whose reputation have I besmirched? Assuredly if my own modest fortune — not so mean that I must envy the resources and rewards of other men — does not free me from suspicion of this fault; if I am not vindicated by the record of my life, which has not been so lacking in achievements that I should waste away with envy at another's praise, by Hercules this suit itself straightway absolves me. It is such as deserves the indulgence of everyone rather than the jealousy of anyone. I ask you, jurors, what mark of hatred, what example of envy do I exhibit?

I utter no challenge, I am not angry, I make no accusation; I am only defending the city, which is summoned to the bar by him. But since there are others sitting here, all of them keeping silence, and among them many distinguished men and persons eminent in authority and much more skilled in speaking than I am, why do I of all others rise and oppose him when he seeks rewards? I doubt not that they feel the same as I do, and that there are many among them who would willingly have undertaken this duty had I not done so; yet I am not to be blamed because I was the first to offer my services to my country. I am not bound by the reasons for others' silence, whatever they are. Beyond question the public welfare and, secondly, reverence for the immortal gods, urged me to speak.

When I considered the meager resources of our treasury, the present scarcity of funds, and the fact that many occasions of necessary expense confront us, I could not bear it that the state be drained of money by this extra, unnecessary expenditure. You are not unaware how large the reward for tyrannicide is — and rightly so; for what sum is large enough if it means recovery of fields, homes, fortunes, children, wives, the liberty and safety of all people and finally the very altars and temples of the gods? The more burdensome this sum is to the city, the more care we must take lest it be awarded rashly. The vast expenditures with which we are threatened, judges — quite apart from what is demanded by this man, to whom we owe nothing — are enough to empty our treasury.

Besides, since this slaying of the tyrant came about only by the mercy of the gods, who, so often implored, at last took pity on our calamities and pleased to liberate us from the yoke of that cruelest of tyrants and restore us to freedom, it would in my opinion be intolerable if the city withheld homage and gratitude owed to the gods and gave them instead to a man who does not deserve them. I shall demonstrate by the plainest proofs that this whole affair is due to fortune and divine clemency, with no thanks at all to this man. While I do this, gentlemen of the jury, I request your close attention.

There are three reasons, any one of which he thinks sufficient ground for seeking this honor: because he slew the tyrant's son, or because he attempted to kill the tyrant, or because the father, moved by the murder of his son, committed suicide with the sword this man left behind.

Does the murder of that youth seem tyrannicide? "Why not? Surely he too was a tyrant." Who would believe, jurors, that one city satisfied two tyrants? That two tyrants lived in concord within the same walls? That they could be contained within the circuit of a single city, when the whole world would scarcely have been room enough for either one? Whoever asks us to believe that seems to me to have a very inadequate notion of the nature of tyranny. Even legitimate authorities, not only governing by laws but also obeying laws, and so very much milder than a tyranny, are nevertheless so dominated by the desire for power that they spare not the lives of intimate friends rather than allow them to share their rule. Is it credible that a tyrant, cruel and violent by nature, suffers any associate to share his power, which he prizes so passionately that he has trampled on the laws of men, scorned those of gods, had no respect for life? Nearly all beasts living by prey (the characteristic of tyrants), on whom hunger alone has stamped certain marks of a tyrannical nature, rage against their own offspring rather than accept them as companions of the hunt. And do we imagine that a human tyrant, puffed up by pride, driven by the lust of power, impelled by greed, provoked by thirst for fame, can share his tyranny with anyone?

Now my adversary not only supposes two tyrants but even wants to make the youth appear more than tyrant; for (it is said) he committed dreadful crimes against the citizens — murder, robbery, rape — in brief, all known forms of crime. The title he eschewed; but in reality he was the head of the tyranny and more powerful than the parent, whom he governed as he pleased.

But the truth is far otherwise, gentlemen of the jury. Certainly tyranny is always a violent and fearful thing. If the son had had power, he would not have endured his father; nor would the father for his part have allowed the son to gain so much power that he could take control. No one is more suspect to tyrants than the heir, who, the more he gives vent to his savage nature and tyrannical practices, the more he terrifies his parent. Therefore he restrained his son's passions and checked rather than loosened his reins over the boy, lest the youth, growing too powerful, eager for rule and arrogant in his strength, no longer master of himself, at length would not spare even his parent; nay, the gods might prefer Jove to Saturn. If from time to time he committed outrages, what was that but proof that he was his father's accomplice? Of such persons, how few are there who would not rob, violate marriages, plunder homes, despoil temples, kill those who stand in the way, and murder the leading citizens? But since there is one man under whose power and protection they commit such outrageous crimes—else they would be punished for their deeds, either by him or by the laws, as thieves, murderers, bandits, adulterers—he alone, the sole master under whose title they all take shelter, is tyrant. And that youth, when he committed some extraordinarily outrageous deed, would always say his father had so commanded; nor do I doubt that he did command it. Though the son's temperament was such that he gave promise of some day—if he lived long enough—matching his father in shameful deeds and enormities, nevertheless in his youth, by comparison with his parent's cruelty and savagery (already thoroughly familiar to him from childhood), he was still a raw recruit, scarcely a beginner, and did scarcely anything of importance unless ordered and instructed by his father.

But whether he did not do those deeds unless commanded or whether he dared to do them himself without orders, yet, since he acted as if under orders; since he neither usurped the name of tyrant, nor bore himself as tyrant, but made plain that he was acting in obedience to his father and referred the reasons for his exploits to him; since he acknowledged another (in whose power he trusted) was stronger than he and the sole source of his impunity—call him robber or sacrilege if you like, or any other name you please, but assuredly he is not one against whom tyrannicide could be committed. If you contend that he alone had absolute power and was actually tyrant, and that, as you boasted a short time ago, the state became free immediately after his death, let us imagine, I beg you, the parent as still alive though not put to flight; I do not know why you feigned that, when you had neither put him to flight nor done anything to make him flee. For though his son had been so treacherously slain, his other forces were left intact; I fail to see what reason there would have been for the father to despair or to flee, any more than if he had not had a son or the son had died of plague. Let us therefore, as I said, imagine the father living and bereft of his only son, but nevertheless surrounded by his palace guard, bewailing the murder of his son, yet threatening the murderer and intending all kinds of punishments. Let us imagine him with mournful but grim countenance rushing into the forum and, displaying the sword you left behind, promising vast rewards if anyone makes known the owner of that sword. With the forum here already occupied by him and his retinue, and inquiry already directed toward you, rush forward, brave tyrannicide, and, dashing into the midst of the crowd, announce that you have killed the tyrant, proclaim liberty for all, and demand a tyrannicide's reward! Why do you run away? Why look for a hiding-place? Why are you, the tyrannicide, afraid? Is not the commonwealth free? Has not the tyrant been killed?—Then the one you slew was not the tyrant but rather some accomplice of the tyrant; nor was the city by his death restored to liberty, which, as you said a short time ago, was the sole end the proposer of this law had in view.

"But," he says, "I killed the heir." Why mention heirs to me? Why remind me of laws in a tyranny? They are laws in name only. Succession is a matter of legal right. If a pirate's son filled the place of the dead father, who would speak of the "heir"? A tyrant always dies intestate, since the laws, which alone can make a will valid, are held captive by him. In like manner, he who succeeds to the place of a deceased tyrant is not an heir but a new tyrant, for he does not succeed but usurps. "We would have been in subjection to him even now." Why assume that? I say, on the contrary, that the people are free the instant the tyrant dies. Otherwise the law decreed a reward for the tyrannicide in vain, if at the death of one tyrant we fell into the hands of another.

But the case is far different, gentlemen; for when the tyrant died, by whatever chance, then—while his friends are busy with lamentation, his accomplices stunned by his death—the people already free, would thereupon have proclaimed their liberty. The son could no more have resisted their strength than can anyone now, either the strongest of the tyrant’s cronies or whoever in his family was closest to him after the son; to whom, if the title of inheritance and succession is to be considered, the tyranny belongs as much as it would have belonged to the son. For this reason, whoever slays an agent, a friend, a relative, a son of the tyrant, boasts of tyrannicide in vain. It is the tyrant alone whose death the state<sup>1</sup> buys with so great a reward.

“But I determined to do something,” he says; “I made an attempt, I ventured; and you cannot deny that with the tyrant’s son dead, the expectation of future tyranny eliminated, I have left behind distinguished proof of my resolution; and this alone, I think, merits the honor.”

Observe here, I beg you, how fairly, how frankly, I argue everything with you; how I expound your whole case with the minimum of mistrust. If another person were arguing this case, not one of your enemies either but one of the keener advocates, who scrutinize every point, and ply with doubt, and press upon you as roughly as possible, by Hercules he would so handle this point as to make it an argument that you never attempted the deed or planned to do it! If you voiced astonishment that anyone could be so surpassingly impudent as to dare to say such things when the tyrant’s son was slain in that very attempt, he will reply directly to the effect that it could not fail to be the case that you climbed to the stronghold not to free your country (which you did not accomplish), not to kill the tyrant (whom you did not touch), but rather to slay the very youth whom you did murder: you did that in revenge or retaliation for some private injury done to you. If he should plead, urge, press this, and demand some certain proofs of your “resolution” and intention, you see, I am sure, into what difficult positions you would be drawn.

But I shall not deal with you in this manner, since in matters extremely obscure, like this, I am accustomed always to incline to the more lenient interpretation. So I grant that you appear to have committed the deed with patriotic motive. You wished, and forthwith attempted, to destroy the tyranny. Does this seem to you to merit this reward? That, first of all, you wished to do it: who does not see how poor a reason that is? For by this logic we should all seek reward for tyrannicide. Who was so lacking in patriotism that he did not long to destroy that cruelest of tyrants? By making an attempt what have you shown except that you wished to be a tyrannicide? Moreover, that you exposed yourself to dangers, and whether that deserved any reward, we shall consider afterward. I hope it is clear to you, gentlemen of the jury, merely from a recital of the law, that it did not. Since the law provides no reward except to a tyrannicide, and since he who has not killed a tyrant cannot be a tyrannicide, however much he has attempted, however many risks he has run, he will seek a tyrannicide’s reward in vain unless the tyrant was killed. To one who in trying to kill him forced him into exile, a reward should be given; but I would not grant as big a one, or the same kind of one, as to a tyrannicide.

If, struggling with some sickness, I announce that whoever heals me will receive three talents when I recover, some one led by hope of gain might come to undertake my cure. Later, when he had given me medicines, found that his efforts failed, confessed that his skill was baffled by the disease, and left me sorely afflicted but nonetheless somewhat improved, I do not owe him a fee for restoring my health, because he did not restore it; on the other hand, because he helped me, it is unfair for me to dismiss him empty handed. But if, after trying a thousand drugs, he leaves me no whit better, he deserves no reward who gave me no help; indeed deserves only the thanks due to one who tried to cure me for his own sake and not for mine. If, grossly ignorant of medical science, he nevertheless ventured to attack the disease, and after a time abandoned the case, with me miserably poisoned—not only having failed to help me but making me worse, even though he offered his services gratis—is he worthy of affection because, by his own exertion over so long period of time, without hope of reward, he maltreated me so obligingly? Does he not, rather, deserve the strongest condemnation for rashly med-

<sup>1</sup> respublica: Here and throughout, More changes Lucian’s setting from a democracy to a republic. At 53/77 and 58/10, 26, 41, 91

and 59/28–29, this term has been translated as “commonwealth” or “state” or “republic.”

dling, to my danger, in this matter in which he was unskilled?

The present case, gentlemen, seems to me not far different from this. The law is very ready to hire a tyrannicide from somewhere, and it promises him a specific reward when the tyrant has been slain. But when it says tyrannicide, gentlemen, it seeks a resourceful man, one not only strong-handed but (much more) strong-hearted; able in stratagem rather than in force; one who knows how to lay plots, hide his traps, make the most of opportunities. If one who has undertaken a business of this sort attacks the tyrant himself by means of some clever stratagem, overpowers him when attacked, and slays him when overpowered, and does not desist from his work, once begun, until it is finished—this man may boldly demand the reward for tyrannicide. If he were unable to do this but instead did something approximate and related to it, for instance drove the tyrant into exile or forced him to surrender, his life being spared, or compelled him to relinquish his tyranny on a certain condition—this man I deem worthy of some reward, yet not the reward for tyrannicide.

If a person physically powerful but slow-witted, and utterly unfamiliar with the skill a tyrannicide must possess, who supposed the job could be done by force alone and not with careful planning; who, finally, would be much more like Ajax than Ulysses but like Ajax running mad when the arms have been awarded and slashing at cattle instead of men; if, I say, such a person took upon himself the execution of so great a business and then, failing to devise a stratagem or choose the proper time for awaiting his chance, rushed forward in his attack but instead of beginning with the tyrant himself sprang at his guards, the tyrant meanwhile having opportunity to look out for himself; and after that, the tyrant having escaped, the affair rashly attempted, stupidly managed, abandoned through cowardice, and wholly unfinished, he thinks only of his own flight, even throwing his sword away; and later, when the tyrant has died or has been killed, he should appear in public and claim the reward as if he were the tyrannicide, and make a speech of this kind: "I resolved, jurors, I made an attempt, I tried, I essayed it"—would you give him the reward for tyrannicide, gentlemen of the jury, because he tried to kill the tyrant? Or would you, rather, bear him ill will and esteem him deserving of punishment because,

by his recklessness, he had not only exposed himself alone, uselessly, to dangers, but at the same time had thrown the entire city into extreme peril, since by foolishly inciting him he made the tyrant more menacing to the citizens and more wary of plots?

You see, therefore, gentlemen, how that which he relied on to be sufficient in itself is so far from helping him that it damages his case considerably. Accordingly, if the man he killed was not the tyrant, and it was not enough to have killed the tyrant's son, but to have made the attempt recklessly was more than vain, it remains for us to examine the last point, the death of the tyrant himself, which this man contends we owe to him.

This is the crux of the whole matter. If he persuades you of his view on this, there is nothing to prevent his winning; and if on the contrary I win this point and, as they say, cut away his sheet anchor, must he not at once, of necessity, be tossed about and perish in the shipwreck? For this reason, gentlemen of the jury, I hereby request you again and again to be as attentive as possible while I demonstrate that the death of the tyrant, on which this entire controversy hangs, has no connection at all with my opponent.

You recall that this whole ground was covered by him in the manner of one who wanted to persuade you to believe that even at the time he slew the son he knew in advance the parent would do what afterward he did. "I knew it was enough to kill the son," he says. "I knew the father would take his own life instantly after the death of his son." Nay, rather you knew quite well that when you thus argued this case it was incumbent on you to appear to have foreknown those facts! Else you would seek the reward for tyrannicide in vain if you had not yourself killed the tyrant, or at least done that as a result of which you knew his destruction was close at hand. This is why, gentlemen of the jury, he wanted the result of his act to seem so certain: that he might tell you, his listeners, it was for that very reason he withheld his hand from the tyrant and left him to himself—and to this man's sword as well. Otherwise he could easily have killed him—so he says—and would have done so except that, sure of his death, he purposely refrained in order that the tyrant shortly after would die the more wretched death.

So then, what am I to do with this story? Where can I possibly turn? Where find arguments to show that this man is not able to foretell future events?

Rather let us question him and demand some of the reasons for which he would have us believe a thing so far beyond credibility; whence he got such marvellous skill in prophecy; whether he learned it from a teacher or grasped it rather by divine inspiration.

Tell us, then, Tiresias, how will you demonstrate that you have achieved this knowledge of future events? Dig up buried treasure somewhere, disclose our thoughts, bring forth something mysterious and secret, which we may all wonder at; for to declare what present events lie hidden and to predict what future ones will be is, I suppose, the function of this art. Or, if you can only foretell future happenings, inform us now of some events that will occur some years hence; or, if it please you, events of future ages. When all these will have come to pass in accordance with your promise, then return and declare that you had foreknown the future. Meantime you will have difficulty, I suspect, in persuading us that you knew before it happened what occurred without your knowledge. If, then, when you killed the son you did not know that the father would slay himself, as afterward he did, why do you now demand the reward for his murder—which, unless you are willing to be a brazen liar, you must confess was committed without your being aware of it or even thinking of it?

But perhaps this is the very reason he considers himself the one responsible for the tyrant's death, since the murder he did commit was in some manner (though beyond expectation) the cause of it. On this subject I dare say you, gentlemen of the jury, are of a very different opinion. If someone had killed the tyrant by chance, or in a fit of madness, you would not have given the reward for tyrannicide to him. Why? Surely because in either case the killer had killed without knowing it and without intending it. This man's plea, it seems to me, is somewhat weaker. For if either of those others claimed the reward, though the one who had killed unwittingly would therefore demand it in vain, nevertheless that claimant had, after all, killed him. But in the present circumstances the tyrant was slain without this man's knowing about it at all and by no act of his.

"But," he says, "I did nothing by accident or without knowing it. I murdered the son deliberately, and thus designedly and knowingly provided the father with a reason to die—who, had I not killed his son, would still be living as tyrant." Permit me to examine this more closely.

If you attacked the tyrant in order to kill him and then, overcome by him and throwing your sword away, you fled; and if when he was pursuing you on horseback his horse stumbled and he very opportunely fell headlong on your sword, so that he was pierced through by it; could you not say all these same things here, namely that you had intended it and that intending it you attacked him, hence by intending and planning it you caused his death—since unless you had attacked him he would not have been killed? But do you not see that in the same manner you could, rather, boast of your flight and seek reward for your cowardice? For unless you had fled, he would not have fallen; unless you had disgracefully thrown your sword away, he would not have been transfixed. Finally, by this reasoning cowards also may be tyrannicides! Just as in that case, what followed after would not be deemed your doing, though you would have attacked to kill (but ran away with the deed unperformed), and though it would not have followed unless you had done something earlier:—so, even though you did climb to the citadel to kill the tyrant, and while searching for the father slew the son, yet since what you had undertaken to perform you either dared not do because of fear, would not do because of negligence, or could not do because of chance, but straightway returned with the deed unachieved, and then afterward something occurred unknown to you and unexpected by you, you cannot say it was effected by you. Even if any of it could be called yours, it ceased to be so then and there when you abandoned your enterprise.

Now it may be that he will not concede that this is a fair representation of what he did but will contradict me again, in this fashion: "This man you imagine did not attack the tyrant with the thought that afterward the victorious tyrant, in pursuit of his defeated and fugitive foe, would fall to his death. Hence what he did not intend he cannot justly call his. But as for me, I did slay the son with the intention that the father, overwhelmed by grief, would kill himself; and in my mind's eye I foresaw this would happen." Do you see, gentlemen of the jury, that once more he confronts us with that divination of his? We ought, therefore, to demand of him how he perceived it would happen. Did he have foreknowledge of it? Or did he surmise it? If he replies that he foreknew it, I am confident no one will believe him. If he says he surmised it, he confesses meanwhile that he did not know it but only supposed it; confesses, that is, that he was doubtful, uncertain—what else, finally, but that he did not know it at all? Yet let us consider by what signs, what clear evidence, he thus inferred the eventuality of a thing so conjectural that what nobody else could have hoped, this man imagined to himself as sure and inevitable. "I had known how desperately he loved his son," he says. So that made you certain and confident, did it, that you could determine his death would follow, not so much through chance but of necessity? I am aware, gentlemen, of the extraordinary affection for their children that nature has planted in the hearts of parents. But I would not have believed it to be either so great, or so thoroughly tested, that one would dare promise himself what this man says he did: that a father would be the voluntary companion of his son in death. How many of those whose sons—their only, dearly loved sons—die every day from disease or perish by reason of treachery or fall in battle or die by accident are so overwhelmed by grief that they commit suicide?

"But," he says, "besides love, desperation was equally a reason for his desiring death." So then, I ask you, when you slew the son, did you kill all his surviving followers too? You will not affirm, I dare say, that you made so big a slaughter! So he still had the others; he had plenty of wealth, plenty of resources. And therefore, when a single person was slain and so many were safe, including—most important of all—this man, the tyrant, why was it so great a grief to him that he should flee in haste, not from the city but from the earth? Are we to believe that there is anyone in the world today who would have done what that tyrant did? Why ask about others?

Let us question you instead, for probably you had made this supposition about yourself and viewed the tyrant by the light of your own character. If your son perished, and your fortune and your life seemed threatened, you would not choose to join your son rather than avenge his death, would you? Or would you kill yourself to avoid being killed by others? Of course not. (I will answer for you.) Then how could you have imagined that the tyrant would do what others have not done, what nobody would have done, and what you yourself would not do?

"But clearly I was thinking of it," he retorts, "else why would I have left my sword there?" You do well, surely, to remind us of your cowardice! For when he says this, gentlemen of the jury, does he not seem to you to be saying, "Of course I knew what would happen, else why had I fled from that place?" For what difference is there between "Else why would I have left my sword there?" and "Else why did I basely throw my sword aside and run away?" Now of what use was it to leave the sword for the tyrant? To make certain he would not lack means of dying? So the man who feared everybody's sword lacked a sword himself, did he? Was he ever without a sword—he who got by the sword, held by the sword, and guarded by the sword whatever he possessed? A wondrous prodigy, jurors: a tyrant without a sword! No: he did not lack a sword; nor did this man here leave a sword behind for him. He threw it away; and he did not foresee what was going to happen in the future, even by the slightest guess. But after he had rashly broken into the citadel—I know not how—and there suddenly attacked and overpowered the young man, who (with the carelessness of youth) was alone, off guard, not in the least suspicious; and, advancing farther, might perhaps have been able to deal with the tyrant in the same manner—at that instant fright took hold of him, fearful as he was lest, already betrayed to the tyrant's retinue by the cry and groans of the dying youth, he would be captured. Already before his eyes were the chains, dungeon, tortures, and a thousand deaths, a thousand punishments. Terrified by this empty fancy, fearful now of every noise, every sound, and at last afraid of his own shadow, suddenly as timid as before he was rash, he rushed from the citadel; he did not even dare to carry his sword with him, for fear his flight would be slowed or, arrested with a sword in his possession, he would be accused of having plotted against the tyrant—at whose death he now returns arrogantly and demands the reward for tyrannicide, as if he had killed him!

Bear in mind, then, that I am not asking whether you killed the tyrant himself. I ask only this: could you have killed him? If not, then you did not await opportunity, you did not choose a suitable place, you did not seize the proper moment; but recklessly, rashly, without plan, without thought, you undertook what you were unable to carry through to completion. Do not boast, therefore, of having killed him whom you confess you were not able to kill. But if you were able, it was due to great want of skill, or cowardice, that you did not do so.

"Not at all," he says. "I could have done it but refrained deliberately. I had already done enough; I had killed the son. The father I left to his grief and to my sword, with which—I foresaw—he would kill himself.”

5 Shameless man, if you are lying! Insane, if you are not! If you invented things so incredible we marvel at your impudence; if you reasoned so absurdly we marvel at your stupidity. Were you so mad that when able at a single stroke to ensure your own life and the safety of the republic, you preferred to leave everything exposed to mere chance and to promise yourself as a future occurrence what no sane man would dare to hope? What if the tyrant had been disposed to do what you yourself would doubtless have done, and what it is far more likely he would have done than what he actually did—summon his guard, call his ruffians together, arm his scoundrels; and, when the body of his son was brought before him, his cruel nature and his rage at so horrid a sight would have caused him to vent his wrath and fury first of all on you, by whom his son was slain, and then on the entire city for which he was slain? Had these things happened (as, thanks to your folly, they came close to happening), you would not be alive today, you miserable wretch, to seek this reward, nor would we have any commonwealth of which it could be sought.

But the immortal gods, jurors, remembered our prayers and entreaties; the gods took pity on the miseries of our enslavement; the gods came to our aid in our worst, most extreme perils. Though they had always intended to rescue this city, they chose the most opportune occasion especially to bestow their blessing on us. For though the tyrant was always oppressive when the son was alive, yet he was less burdensome to citizens for that very reason; he did not want to bequeath to his son a city internally miserable and exhausted. But with the murder of him on whose account he had forbore previously, who can doubt that he would have totally destroyed everything? After the state had fallen into the gravest danger, first because of this man's rashness, then by his cowardice, the gods, thinking the time had come to fashion for us an everlasting memorial of their favor, suddenly diverted all the calamities pressing so closely on us to the head of the tyrant himself, and so swiftly that we knew we were freed from danger before we realized we had been in danger—before dread of so great a crisis could even move us. Who would have thought, gentlemen of the jury, that after the body of his son had been found the tyrant would have turned his sword on himself rather than on this city, unless the gods, through concern for us, had driven him to his own destruction by loosing the Furies upon him? 55

Even now I seem to see the glittering eyes of the brigand, the knitted brows, the contracted forehead, the pale cheeks, the gnashing teeth, the swelling lips; in short, as the poets describe Pentheus, showing his madness with his whole face, his whole countenance. When he first came in and found his son slain, what might we suppose he did, what exclaimed? What else, accursed and frenzied as he was, but to have vomited from his filthy mouth insane abuse against the gods? “O wrath of the gods, O hatred of the divine powers! I see the manifestations of your ill-will, you denizens of heaven. I see the signs of your dark malice. Nothing exists more wicked, more vainglorious and malevolent than you. You wish to rule alone, to govern alone; yet, not sufficiently contented with your own happiness, you are always consumed by envy of others' happiness. Why did you not come down to earth to oppose me? Why did you send instead a cowardly plotter against my son? Whoever he was, he did not even dare to match his strength with the tyrant's. This at any rate I rejoice in, that no one will be able to call himself a tyrannicide, no one seek the reward for tyrannicide, because no one will kill the tyrant today—except the tyrant. I shall die today as tyrant, despite the displeasure of the gods.” When he had babbled frantic words of this sort, at length, frenzied and distraught, he fell upon the sword. 60 65 70 75 80

The tyrant, then, lies dead, transfixed by this man's sword—no, no, not by his, since he had previously thrown it away (by his own hand, in truth), but through the act of the gods alone. Yet now this man, who played no part at all there, claims the leading role. And so I ask you who called me cheat to consider which of us is closer to this fault, I who today clash with you on behalf of the state and the gods—yet without demanding a victor's reward—or you, a deserter and fugitive, who strive for a triumph when others—and those the gods—are the real victors? Cease, cease to arrogate to yourself the victory produced by another power than yours. Cease to becloud so signal a favor of the gods upon this city. Cease to obstruct our praises of the gods, and refrain from this presumptuous claim. 85 90 95

But if he continues to be troublesome, gentlemen 100 of the jury, weigh the fact in even scales. What else did he do but warn the tyrant to be on his guard? The gods brought it about that the tyrant could not guard himself, and that there should be no further need of plots. What else did he do than arm the tyrant with his own sword against us all? The gods diverted that sword from us to the throat of the tyrant. Finally, what else did he do than plunge the whole city into the greatest danger by his folly? The gods, amending his madness, suddenly turned that danger into the most fortunate safety. I entreat you, then, jurors, by the immortal gods, the gods who are the sources of this most precious freedom, this unlooked-for happiness, not to allow what came to us through the design and power of all the gods to be ascribed to the madness of one man; nor to allow this city ever to be so ungrateful to the gods their liberators; nor to suffer it to confess that its safety is owed to the temerity of a human being rather than to the benevolence of the gods, who we may now hope will always be propitious toward this city if we, mindful of what they have bestowed, acknowledge them (as is right) the authors of their blessings. But if—may it never come about!—we prove ungrateful, ascribing their deeds to others, and giving to men the gratitude owed to gods, we must fear in turn, by Hercules, lest the gods curtail their favor toward us and leave off the protection of our commonwealth as unworthy of their guardianship.

To conclude, at last, what I have to say: since this man erred in a dutiful act, and blundered with good intentions, but the gods turned his misdeed to our benefit; and since it was the gods who caused the tyrant's death, though the tyrant actually killed himself; and moreover, since they who brought it about do not seek a reward, and the man who committed the murder cannot seek one—in your decision, gentlemen of the jury, give pardon to this man and thanks to the gods; and absolve the city of the obligation of this reward, for which the gods wanted it to be free.

I have finished.

The life of John Picus
 Erle of Mirandula, a great Lorde of Italy, an excellent conyng man in all sciences, & vertuous of living:
 with diuers epistles & other woorkes of sayd John Picus, full of greates science, vertue, and wiledome: whose life and woorkes bene woorthy and digne to be read, and of ten to be had in memoꝝy.

Translated out of latin into Engliſhe by maister Thomas More.
 (.)

Unto his right entierly beloved ſiſter in Chriſt, Joyence Leigh, Thomas
 More greting in our lorde.

Is, and of lōge time hath bene (my well beloved ſi-ſter) a cuſtome in the beginnyng of the new yere, fren-des to ſende betwene, pre-ſentes oꝝ gyftes, as the wit-nesſes of their loue and frendſhip, & alſo ſignifyng, that thei deſire eche to other that yere a good continuance and pro-ſperous ende of that lucky beginnyng.
 But commonly all thoſe preſentes, that are bleſd cuſtomably all in this maner betwene frendes to be ſent: be ſuch thin-ges as pertaine only vnto the body, either to be fed, oꝝ to be clad, oꝝ ſome other wiſe delited: by whiche it ſemeth, that their frendſhip is but fleſhly, and ſeret-chey in maner to the body only. But foꝝ aſmuch as the loue & amitie of chriſten folke ſhould be rather ghofly frēd-ſhip then bodily: ſith that all faithfull people are rather ſpirituall then car-nall. (foꝝ, as thapouſte ſaith: we be not now in fleſh, but in ſpirit, if Chriſt abide in vs.) Therefore myne herſelf be-loured ſiſter, in good lucke of this new yere, haue ſent you ſuche a preſent, as maie beare witneſſe of my tender loue and zeale to the happy cōtinuāce & graetious increace of vertue in your ſoule.
 And whereas the giſtes of other folke declare that thei wiſh their frendes to be woꝝldly fortunare: myne teſtifieth, that I deſire to haue you godly proſperous. Theſe woꝝkes moꝝe profitable the large, were made in latine by one John Picus Erle of Mirandula, a lordſhip in Italy: of whole conyng and vertue we nede here nothing to ſpeake: foꝝ aſmuch as hereafter we perule the courſe of his whole life, rather after our litle power ſlenderly, then after his merites ſufficiently. The woꝝkes are ſuche, ȳ trewly god ſiſter, I ſuppoſe of the quātitie ther cometh none in your hande moꝝe proſi-table, neither to thatchieuyng of temperāce in pſperitie, noꝝ to the purchaſing of paciēce in aduerſitie, noꝝ to the diſpi-ſing of woꝝldly vanitie, noꝝ to the deſi-ring of beauly felicitie: which woꝝkes

 I wolde require you gladly to receiue:
 ne were it, that thei be ſuch, that foꝝ the godly mater (how ſo euer thei be translated) maie delite & pleaſe any perſon, that hath any meane deſire and loue to God: and that your ſelfe is ſuch one, as foꝝ your vertue and ſeruent zeale to god, can not but ioyouſly receiue any thing,
 that meancly ſoundeth either to the reproch of vice, commendacion of vertue, oꝝ honoure and laude of God, who pre-ſerue you.

The life of John Picus
 Erle of Mirandula.

John Picus

If the fathers ſide, deſcended of the woꝝ-thy lineage of themſelues, by a newe of the ſayde Emperour called Picus,
 by whō al the auncellers of this John Picus, vnderſtōdly beare that name. But we ſhall lette his auncellers paſſe, to whom (though they were right excellent) he gaue agayn as much honour, as he receiued: & we ſhall ſpeake of him ſelf, rehearſing in part his learning, & his vertue. foꝝ theſe be the thinges, whiche we may accōpt foꝝ our owne: of which eueꝝ man is moꝝe properly to be cōmeded, the of the noblenes of his auncellers: whose honour maketh vs not honozable. foꝝ either they were themſelf verteuſe oꝝ not: if ſoꝝ, the had thei none honour theſelf: had thei neuer ſo great poſſeſſiōs: foꝝ honour is the reward of vertue. And howe maie they claime the rewarde ȳ properly longeth to vertue: if they lacke the vertue, that the rewarde longeth to: Then if theſelfe
 a. j. had

The profit of his woꝝkes.

The lineage of J. Picus.

Nobleneſſe of auncellers.

Honour.

The inſet oꝝ new yeres gyftes.

Preſentes bodily.

Chriſtē tone.

Rom. 2.

This facsimile of page 1 of the 1557 Workes of Sir Thomas More shows the variety of font sizes and the care taken in this large folio of 1,490 pages. The letters in the margin are to help in locating and referencing specific passages. The book features a detailed "Table of many matters contained in this book."

The Life of John Pico

Earl of Mirandola

Thomas More's first book published in English, The Life of John Pico, Earl of Mirandola, is an unusual work in five parts, only the first of which is biographical. Dead at thirty-one in 1494, the famous intellectual Pico grew in stature posthumously through the publication of his Opera omnia in 1496. His nephew Gianfrancesco edited the collection and contributed a Latin Vita of his uncle to serve as an "extremely laudatory preface" to the volume (CW 1: xli). More probably based his translations on the 1504 Strassburg edition of the Opera omnia (xlii). While Gianfrancesco's large folio of Pico's life and works was 531 folio pages, More's is only thirty-four. More was probably introduced to Pico's life and writings by either John Colet, Thomas Linacre, or Cuthbert Tunstall, all of whom had studied in Italy and had returned during the time that More was struggling, as had Pico, to discern his own path in life.

Prefaced by a dedication to young nun Joyce Leigh on friendship, virtue, and true nobility, More's Life opens with his translation — characterized by revealing additions and deletions — of Gianfrancesco's biography. After this much abbreviated biographical portrait, More includes English translations of three Pico letters and a translation of Pico's "Commentary on Psalm 15." After these works, More offers his own English poetry, loosely based on what are originally short prose texts from Pico: "Twelve Rules of Spiritual Battle," "Twelve Weapons of Spiritual Battle," and a list of "Twelve Properties of a Lover." The volume concludes with More's translation of Pico's Deprecatoria ad Deum, "A Prayer of Picus Mirandola unto God." As Anthony Edwards observes, More's Life is really "both biography and anthology" (CW 1: xxxvii), a carefully edited and curious whole, a work mingling prose and verse that continues to make readers wonder about the author's intentions in sharing this Life, or in undertaking the work of translation.

While early biographers Thomas Stapleton and Cresacre More have claimed that the young More found in Pico a model or pattern for the layman, More's Life is considerably more ambiguous in its presentation and probing of Pico's character. One can imagine other models of living, for example, than a precocious intellectual who dies prematurely and ends in the "dark fire" of purgatory, at least according to the testimony of Pico's most controversial advisor, Savonarola, whom More leaves unnamed but Gianfrancesco highly praised. The combination of admiration and ambivalence, irony and adulation, makes More's Life a challenging portrait to judge. Throughout More's later writings, he will continue his consideration of prominent intellectual figures and their varying works. More's Pico is the first in a series of portraits that will grow to include: Raphael Hythloday in Utopia; the lawyers and theological doctors in The History of King Richard the Third; Martin Luther, William Tyndale, and John Frith; the Messenger from A Dialogue of Sir Thomas More, Knight; his own daughter, Margaret Roper (Letter 206); and the interlocutors of A Dialogue of Comfort against Tribulation.

The Life of John Pico was published around 1510 by John Rastell, but earlier dates of composition have been proposed. More's Life is presented as a "New Year's gift," an act of "ghostly friendship," from the young More to a nun, Joyce Leigh, sister to Edward Lee, later Archbishop of York and the addressee of one of More's humanist letters. In the prefatory letter to this Life, More identifies his intention as the hope that the reader will become "godly prosperous," especially through a study of "cunning and virtue" in the life of Pico, Earl of Mirandola.

This edition of Pico indicates, through the use of half brackets (⸮), More's additions to the text, especially prominent in the biographical section. More's changes to Gianfrancesco's Vita tend to intensify the "focus on the figure of Pico himself," and serve to make the text "a meditative or exemplary life appropriate for study" (CW 1: xlvi). The Life of John Pico was the first English work of More's to be reprinted; the prominent publisher de Worde produced his edition of the text in 1525, featuring a specially designed woodcut of Christ crucified (lvi). After the 1557 edition of More's English works, there are references to The Life of John Pico in Robert Parsons's Treatise of Three Conversions of England (1603), but the work would not be reprinted again until the early eighteenth century (lviii).

CONTENTS

Part 1

Introductory Epistle to Joyce Leigh . . .	63
Life of John Pico . . . . .	64
Three Epistles of Pico . . . . .	74
Pico's First Epistle to Francis . . . . .	74
Pico's Epistle to Corneo . . . . .	77
Pico's Second Epistle to Francis. . . . .	79

Part 2

Pico's Commentary on Psalm 15(16) . . .	82
Twelve Rules of Spiritual Battle . . . . .	86
Twelve Weapons of Spiritual Battle . . .	88
Twelve Properties of a Lover . . . . .	90
Pico's Prayer unto God . . . . .	93

TIMELINE

24 February 1463	Pico is born; his father dies shortly after.
1477	His mother sends him to Bologna to study canon law and become a priest.
August 1478	His mother dies; Pico goes to Florence to study.
May 1479	Goes to Ferrara to study philosophy and Greek; meets Savonarola
August 1480–82	University of Padua; introduced to Cabala; writes love poetry he later burns
Fall 1482	Studies philosophy, Greek, rhetoric in Pavia; asks Ficino to send Th. Platonica
1483–85	Studies in Florence and at Sorbonne
1486	Leaves for Rome with 900 Theses ; abducts Margherita de Medici; wounded, arrested, released
	Letter to Corneo (although More's Life of Pico gives 1492 as the date)
February 1487	Pope Innocent VIII cancels conference Pico helped organize.
March 1487	Seven of his theses are condemned; six are declared dubious.
May 1487	Publishes Apologia defending Cabala and magic—taken as insubordination by Pope
July 1487	Retracts officially his 900 Theses ; leaves Rome to escape arrest
January 1488	Arrested and briefly imprisoned at Lyons by order of Innocent VIII
June 1488	Permitted to return to Florence if he does not discuss his 900 Theses
1489	Innocent VIII's advice is reported to Lorenzo de' Medici: have Pico write poetry.
	Pico writes Heptaplus (on Mosaic account of creation in Genesis)
1491	Sells patrimony; writes De ente et uno on reconciliation of Aristotelianism and Platonism
	Tells Gianfrancesco he sees his vocation to Friars Preachers as “God's special command”
15 May 1492	First letter to Francis
2 July 1492	Second letter to Francis
18 June 1493	Pope Alexander VI absolves Pico of heresy
14 November 1494	Contracts fever; King's two physicians do not succeed in restoring health
17 November 1494	Dies; appears shortly afterwards to Savonarola (as reported by Savonarola)
1496	Nephew Gianfrancesco publishes Pico's life and collected works in a 531-page folio.
1497	Savonarola excommunicated
1498	Savonarola executed for heresy and for conspiring to depose Pope Alexander VI
1498–1500	Thomas More's likely introduction to Pico's writings by Colet or Linacre
ca. 1504	Thomas More decides on marriage, not priesthood.
ca. 1510	More publishes in thirty-four folio pages Pico's life and selected works.

The Life of John Pico

Earl of Mirandola, a great lord of Italy, an excellent cunning man in all sciences, and virtuous of living;
with diverse epistles and other works of the said John Pico, 5 full of great science, virtue, and wisdom: whose life and works been worthy and digne<sup>1</sup> to be read, and often to be had in memory. 7

7 Translated out of Latin into English by Master Thomas More. 7

10 Unto his right entirely beloved sister in Christ, Joyce Leigh: Thomas More, greeting in our Lord. 7

It is, and of long time hath been, my well-beloved sister, a custom in the beginning of the new year, 15 friends to send between<sup>2</sup> presents or gifts, as the witnesses of their love and friendship, and also signifying that they desire each to other that year a good continuance and prosperous end of that lucky<sup>3</sup> beginning. But commonly all those presents, 20 that are used customably all in this manner between friends to be sent,<sup>4</sup> be such things as pertain only unto the body, either to be fed or to be clad or some other wise<sup>5</sup> delighted, by which it seemeth that their friendship is but fleshly,<sup>6</sup> and stretcheth<sup>7</sup> in manner 25 to the body only. But forasmuch as the love and amity of Christian folk should be rather ghostly<sup>8</sup> friendship than bodily, since that all faithful<sup>9</sup> people are rather spiritual than carnal (for as the Apostle<sup>10</sup> saith, "We be not now in flesh but in spirit, if 30 Christ abide in us"),<sup>11</sup> I therefore, mine heartily beloved sister, in good luck of this new year have sent you such a present as may bear witness of my tender love and zeal to the happy continuance and gracious increase of virtue in your soul; and whereas the gifts of other folk declare that they wish their friends to 35 be worldly-fortunate, mine testifieth that I desire to have you godly prosperous. These works, more profitable than large, were made in Latin by one John Pico, Earl of Mirandola (a lordship in Italy), of whose cunning<sup>12</sup> and virtue we need here nothing to 40 speak forasmuch as hereafter we peruse the course of his whole life, rather after<sup>13</sup> our little power slen-derly, than after his merits sufficiently. The works are such that truly, good sister, I suppose of the quantity<sup>14</sup> there cometh none in your hand more 45 profitable, neither to the achieving of temperance in prosperity, nor to the purchasing of patience in adversity, nor to the despising of worldly vanity, nor to the desiring of heavenly felicity. Which<sup>15</sup> works

I would require<sup>16</sup> you gladly to receive, ne<sup>17</sup> were it 50 that they be such that, for the goodly matter (how-soever they be translated), may delight and please any person that hath any mean<sup>18</sup> desire and love to God, and that yourself is such one as for your virtue and fervent zeal to God cannot but joyously re-55 ceive anything that meanly soundeth<sup>19</sup> either to the reproach of vice, commendation of virtue, or honor and laud of God, who preserve you.

1 deserving 2 send between: exchange
3 auspicious; fortunate; prosperous 4 used . . . sent: sent customarily between friends 5 way 6 worldly 7 extends

8 spiritual 9 having the Christian faith
10 Saint Paul 11 Rom 8:9 12 knowledge; cleverness; learning 13 in accord with 14 of the quantity: for the size

15 These 16 ask 17 nor 18 moderate; average 19 meanly soundeth: moderately tends

THE LIFE OF JOHN PICO
Earl of Miranda

John Pico of the father's side descended of the worthy lineage of the Emperor Constantine, by a nephew of the said emperor called Pico, by whom all the ancestors of this John Pico undoubtedly bear that name. But we shall let his ancestors pass,<sup>20</sup> to whom (though they were right excellent) he gave again<sup>21</sup> as much honor as he received, and we shall speak of himself, rehearsing<sup>22</sup> in part his learning and his virtue. For these be the things which we may account for our own of which every man is more properly to be commended than of the nobleness of his ancestors, whose honor maketh us not honorable. For either they were themselves virtuous or not. If not, then had they none honor themselves, had they never so great possessions. For honor is the reward of virtue. And how may they claim the reward that properly longeth<sup>23</sup> to virtue, if they lack the virtue that the reward longeth to? Then, if themselves had none honor, how might they leave to their heirs that thing which they had not themselves? On the other side, if they be virtuous and so, consequently, honorable, yet may they not leave their honor to us as inheritance, no more than the virtue that themselves were honorable for. For never the more noble be we for their nobleness if ourselves lack those things for which they were noble. But rather the more worshipful<sup>24</sup> that our ancestors were, the more vile and shameful be we, if we decline from the steps of their worshipful living, the clear beauty of whose virtue maketh the dark spot of our vice the more evidently to appear and to be the more marked. But Pico, of whom we speak, was himself so honorable, for the great plenteous abundance of all such virtues the possession whereof very<sup>25</sup> honor followeth (as a shadow followeth a body), that he was to all them that aspire to honor a very spectacle in whose conditions, as in a clear polished mirror, they might behold in what points very honor standeth:<sup>26</sup> whose marvelous cunning and excellent virtue, though my rude<sup>27</sup> learning be far unable sufficiently to express, yet forasmuch as if no man should do it but he that might sufficiently do it, no man should do it—and better it were to be insufficiently done than utterly undone—I shall, therefore, as I can, briefly rehearse you his whole life, at the leastwise to give some other man hereafter (that can do it better) occasion to take it in hand when it shall haply<sup>28</sup> grieve him to see the life of such an excellent cunning man so far uncunningly written.<sup>50</sup>

Of His Parents and Time of His Birth.

In the year of our Lord God 1463, Pius the Second being then the general vicar of Christ in his Church, and Frederick, the third of that name, ruling the Empire,<sup>29</sup> this nobleman was born, the last child of his mother, Julia, a woman comen of a noble stock, his father, high<sup>30</sup> John Francis, a lord of great honor and authority.<sup>60</sup>

Of the Wonder That Appeared before His Birth.

A marvelous sight was there seen before his birth: there appeared a fiery garland standing over the chamber of his mother while she travailed,<sup>31</sup> and suddenly vanished away; which appearance was peradventure a token<sup>32</sup> that he which should that hour in the company of mortal men be born, in the perfection<sup>33</sup> of understanding should be like the perfect figure of that round circle, or garland, and that his excellent name should round about the circle of this whole world be magnified,<sup>34</sup> whose mind should always, as the fire, aspire upward to heavenly things, and whose fiery eloquence should, with an ardent heart, in time to come worship and praise Almighty God with all his strength; and as that flame suddenly vanished, so should this fire soon from the eyes of mortal people be hid. We have oftentimes read that such unknown and strange tokens hath gone before or followeth the nativities of excellent, wise, and virtuous men, departing,<sup>35</sup> as it were (and by God's commandment), severing<sup>36</sup> the cradles of such special children from the company of others of the common sort, and showing that they be born to the achieving of some great thing. But to pass over<sup>37</sup> others, the great Saint Ambrose: a swarm of bees flew about his mouth in his cradle, and some entered into his mouth, and after that, issuing out again and flying upon high, hiding themselves among the clouds, escaped both the sight of 20 go unmentioned 21 in turn; back

22 telling 23 belongs 24 honorable 25 true 26 consists 27 rudimentary;

inexpert 28 perhaps 29 i.e., the Holy Roman Empire 30 named 31 was in labor 32 peradventure a token: perhaps a portent 33 maturity; fullness 34 praised 35 separating 36 setting apart 37 to pass over: not mentioning

his father and of all them that were present. Which prognostication, one Paulinus,<sup>38</sup> making much of, expounded it to signify<sup>39</sup> to us the "sweet" honey-combs of his "pleasant" writing, which should show 5 out the celestial gifts of God and should lift up the minds of men from earth into heaven.

"Of His Person"

He was of feature and shape seemly and beautiful: of stature, goodly and high; of flesh, tender and soft; his visage lovely and fair; his color white, intermingled with comely ruds;<sup>40</sup> his eyes grey, and quick of look; his teeth white and even; his hair yellow, and not too picked.<sup>41</sup>

"Of His Setting Forth to School, and Study in Humanity"

Under the rule and governance of his mother, he was set to masters<sup>42</sup> and to learning, where with so ardent mind he labored the studies of humanity that within short while he was (and not without a cause) accounted among the chief orators and poets of that time: in learning marvelously swift, and of so ready a wit that the verses which he heard once read, he would again<sup>43</sup> — both forward and backward, to the great wonder of the hearers — rehearse;
20 and, over that, would hold it in sure remembrance; which in other folk is wont commonly to happen contrary. For they that are swift in taking be oftentimes slow in remembering; and they that with more labor and difficulty receive it, more fast<sup>44</sup> and surely hold it.

"Of His Study in Canon"<sup>45</sup>

In the fourteenth year of his age, by the commandment of his mother (which<sup>46</sup> longed very sore<sup>47</sup> to have him priest), he departed to Bologna
35 to study in the laws of the Church. Which, when he had two years tasted, perceiving that the faculty leaned to<sup>48</sup> nothing but only mere traditions and ordinances, his mind fell from it. Yet lost he not his time therein; for in that two years, yet being a child, 40 he compiled a breviary or a sum upon all the decretals,<sup>49</sup> in which, as briefly as possible was, he comprised the effect of all that whole great volume and made a book, no slender thing to right cunning and perfect doctors.

"Of His Study in Philosophy and Divinity"

After this, as a desirous ensearcher of the secrets of nature, he left these common-trodden paths and gave himself wholly to speculation and philosophy, as well human as divine. For the purchasing<sup>50</sup> whereof (after the manner of Plato and Apollonius<sup>51</sup>), he scrupulously sought out all the famous doctors of his time, visiting studiously all the universities and schools not only through Italy, but also through France. And so<sup>52</sup> indefatigable labor gave he to those studies that, yet a child and beardless, he was both reputed, and was indeed, both a perfect philosopher and a perfect divine.<sup>53</sup>

"Of His Mind and Vainglorious Dispicions"<sup>54</sup> at Rome

Now had he been seven years conversant<sup>55</sup> in these studies when, "full of pride, and desirous of glory and man's praise" (for yet was he not kindled in the love of God), he went to Rome, and there (coveting to make a show of his cunning and little considering how great envy he should raise against himself), nine hundred questions<sup>56</sup> he purposed<sup>57</sup> of diverse and sundry matters, as well in logic and philosophy as divinity, with great study picked and sought out as well of the Latin authors as the Greeks, and partly fetched out of the secret mysteries of the Hebrews, Chaldeans, and Arabians, and many things drawn out of the old obscure philosophy of Pythagoras, Trismegistus, and Orpheus, and many other things strange and to all folk (except right few special excellent men) before that day
60 not unknown only, but also unheard of. All which questions in open<sup>58</sup> places (that they might be to all people the better known) he fastened and set up, offering also himself to bear the costs of all such as would come thither out of far countries to dispute.
65 But through the envy of his malicious enemies (which envy, like the fire, ever draweth to the highest), he could never bring about to have a day to his dispicions appointed.<sup>59</sup> For this cause he tarried at Rome a whole year; in all which time, his enviers
75 80 85

38 See Paulinus, The Life of St. Ambrose of Milan 2. 39 expounded it to signify: explained it as signifying 40 ruddiness; red 41 ornate, fastidious 42 tutors 43 in turn; in reply 44 steadfastly

45 Canon Law 46 who 47 greatly 48 faculty leaned to: professors relied on 49 canon-law decrees 50 obtaining 51 Apollonius of Tyana (ca. AD 15–100) traveled to India, Babylon, and Egypt in search of teachers. 52 such 53 theologian 54 Disputations 55 engaged in 56 theses 57 proposed 58 public 59 to . . . appointed: scheduled for his disputations never durst openly, with open dispicions, attempt<sup>60</sup> him, but rather, with craft and sleight<sup>61</sup> and, as it were, with privy trenches,<sup>62</sup> enforced to undermine him — for none other cause but for malice and for they were (as many men thought) corrupt with a pestilent envy. This envy, as men deemed, was specially raised against him for this cause: that where there were many which had many years, some for glory, some for covetise, given themselves to learning, they thought that it should haply deface their fame and diminish the opinion of their cunning if so young a man, plenteous of substance<sup>63</sup> and great doctrine, durst in the chief city of the world, make a proof of his wit and his learning, as well in things natural as in divinity and in many such things as men many years never attained to. Now when they perceived that they could not against his cunning anything openly prevail, they brought forth the serpentines<sup>64</sup> of false crime<sup>65</sup> and cried out that there were thirteen of his nine hundred questions suspect of heresy. Then joined they to them some good simple folk that should, of zeal to the faith and pretense of religion, impugn those questions as new things, and with which their ears had not been in ure.<sup>66</sup> In which impugnation, though some of them haply<sup>67</sup> lacked not good mind, yet lacked they erudition and learning, which questions notwithstanding, before that, not a few famous doctors of divinity had approved as good and clean, and subscribed their names under them. But he, not bearing the loss of his fame, made a defense for those thirteen questions — a work of great erudition, and elegant, and stuffed with the cognition of many things worthy to be learned (which work he compiled in twenty nights) — in which it evidently appeareth not only that those conclusions were good and standing with the faith, but also that they which had barked at them were of folly and rudeness<sup>68</sup> to be reproved. Which defense, and all other things that he should write, he committed, like a good Christian man, to the most holy judgment of our mother, holy Church. Which defense received, and the thirteen questions duly by deliberation examined, our holy father the Pope approved Pico,<sup>69</sup> and tenderly favored him, as by a bull of our holy father Pope Alexander the VI it plainly appeareth; but the book in which the whole nine hundred questions with their conclusions were contained — forasmuch as there were in them many things strange and not fully declared<sup>70</sup> and were more meet for secret<sup>71</sup> communication of learned men than for open<sup>72</sup> hearing of common people, which for lack of cunning might take hurt thereby — Pico desired<sup>73</sup> himself that it should not be read. And so was the reading thereof forbidden. ¶ Lo, this end had Pico of his high mind and proud purpose: that where he thought to have gotten perpetual praise, there had he much work to keep himself upright, that he ran not in perpetual infamy and slander. ¶

¶ Of the Change of His Life ¶

But, as himself told his nephew, he judged that this came thus to pass by the especial provision and singular goodness of almighty God: that by this false crime<sup>74</sup> untruly put upon him by his evil-willers, he should correct his very<sup>75</sup> errors, and that this should be to him (wandering in darkness) as a shining light in which he might behold and consider how far he had gone out of the way of truth. For before this, he had been both desirous of glory and kindled in vain love, and held in voluptuous use of women. The comeliness<sup>76</sup> of his body with the lovely favor of his visage, and therewith all his marvelous fame, his excellent learning, great riches, and noble kindred, set many women afire on him. From the desire of whom he not abhorring (the way of life set aside) was somewhat fallen into wantonness.<sup>77</sup> But after that he was once with this variance wakened, he drew back his mind flowing in riot, and turned it to Christ. Womanish blandishments<sup>78</sup> he changed into the desire of heavenly joys, and despising the blast of vainglory, which he before desired, now with all his mind he began to seek the glory and profit of Christ's Church, and so began he to order his conditions that from thenceforth he might have been approved and though<sup>79</sup> his enemy were his judge.

60 attack 61 underhanded trickery
62 privy trenches: hidden earthworks or tunnels 63 wealth 64 malicious actions 65 accusation 66 familiarity 67 perhaps 68 ignorance 69 Not so by Pope Innocent VIII, who ordered the suppression of Pico's book in 1487. Only in June 1493 did Pope Alexander VI absolve Pico of heresy charges. 70 explained 71 meet . . . secret: suitable for private 72 public 73 asked 74 accusation 75 true 76 attractiveness 77 lustfulness 78 allurements 79 and though: even if

“Of the Fame of His Virtue, and the Resort unto Him Therefore”

Hereupon shortly,<sup>80</sup> the fame of his “noble cunning and excellent virtue” both far and nigh<sup>81</sup> began gloriously to spring, for which many worthy<sup>82</sup> philosophers (and that were taken in number of<sup>83</sup> the most cunning) resorted busily unto him as to a market of good doctrine: some for to move<sup>84</sup> questions and dispute, some (that were of more godly mind) to hear and to take the wholesome lessons and instruction of good living, which lessons were so much the more set by<sup>85</sup> in how much they came from a more noble man and a more wise man and him also which had himself some time followed the crooked hills of delicious pleasure. To the fastening of good discipline in the minds of the hearers, those things seem to be of great effect which be both of their own nature good and also be spoken of such a master as is converted to the way of justice from the crooked and ragged path of voluptuous living.

“The Burning of Wanton Books”

Five books, that in his youth of wanton verses of<sup>86</sup> love with other like fantasies, he had made in his vulgar tongue,<sup>87</sup> altogether (“in detestation of his vice past, and lest these trifles might be some evil occasion afterward”) he burned.

“Of His Study and Diligence in Holy Scripture”

From thenceforth he gave himself day and night most fervently to the studies of Scripture, “in which he wrote many noble books, which well testify<sup>88</sup> both his angelic wit, his ardent labor, and his profound erudition, of which books some we have and some (as an inestimable treasure) we have lost. Great libraries — it is incredible to consider with how marvelous celerity<sup>89</sup> he read them over and wrote out what him liked. Of the old fathers of the Church, so great knowledge he had as it were hard for him to have that hath lived long and all his life hath done nothing else but read them. Of these newer divines,<sup>90</sup> so good judgment he had that it might appear there were nothing in any of them that were unknown to him, but all things as ripe as<sup>91</sup> though he had all their works ever before his eyes. But of all these new doctors he specially commendeth Saint Thomas<sup>92</sup> as him that enforceth<sup>93</sup> himself in a sure pillar of truth. “He was very quick, wise, and subtle in dispicions,<sup>94</sup> and had great felicity<sup>95</sup> therein, while he had that high stomach.<sup>96</sup> But now a great while he had bidden such conflicts farewell, and every day more and more hated them, and so greatly abhorred them that when Ercole d’Este, Duke of Ferrara, first by messengers and after by himself, desired<sup>97</sup> him to dispute at Ferrara (because the general chapter of Friars Preachers<sup>98</sup> was held there), long it was ere<sup>99</sup> he could be brought thereto. But at the instant<sup>100</sup> request of the Duke, which very singularly loved him, he came thither, where he so behaved himself that was wonder to behold how all the audience rejoiced to hear him, for it were not possible for a man to utter neither more cunning, nor more cunningly. But it was a common saying with him that such altercations were for a logician and not meetly<sup>101</sup> for a philosopher. He said also that such disputations greatly profited as were exercised with a peaceable mind, to the ensearching of the truth in secret<sup>102</sup> company, without great audience; but he said that those dispicions did great hurt that were held openly<sup>103</sup> to the ostentation of learning and to win the favor of the common people and the commendation of fools. He thought that utterly<sup>104</sup> it could uneth<sup>105</sup> be but that with the desire of worship<sup>106</sup> (which these gazing disputers<sup>107</sup> gape after<sup>108</sup>) there is with an inseparable bond annexed<sup>109</sup> the appetite of his confusion and rebuke whom they argue with. Which appetite is a deadly wound to the soul and a mortal<sup>110</sup> poison to charity. There was nothing passed<sup>111</sup> him of those captions, subtleties, and cavillations<sup>112</sup> of sophistry; nor again there was nothing that he more hated and abhorred, considering that they served of nought<sup>113</sup> but to the shaming of such other folk as were in very<sup>114</sup> science much better learned and in those trifles ignorant, and that unto the ensearching of the 80 Hereupon shortly: Soon after this 81 near 82 distinguished 83 taken in number of: considered to be among 84 for to move: in order to raise 85 set by: valued 86 wanton verses of: lustful poems about 87 vulgar tongue: native language

88 attest to 89 how marvelous celerity: what astonishing speed 90 theologians

91 as ripe: as ready; as maturely considered 92 Aquinas 93 strengthens
94 disputations; debates 95 success; delight 96 high stomach: proud heart
97 asked 98 i.e., the Dominicans
99 before 100 insistent 101 suitable 102 private 103 in public 104 truly; entirely 105 scarcely 106 honor;

distinction 107 gazing disputers: debaters looking around at the audience 108 gape after: long for 109 attached 110 deadly 111 that got by 112 captions . . . cavillations: fallacies, verbal tricks, frivolous quibbles 113 of nought: for nothing 114 true

truth (to which he gave continual labor) they profited little or nought.

“Of His Learning Universally”

But because we will hold the reader no longer
 5 in hand,<sup>115</sup> we will speak of his learning but a word or twain<sup>116</sup> generally. Some man hath shined in eloquence, but ignorance of natural things hath dishonested<sup>117</sup> him. Some man hath flowered in the knowledge of diverse strange<sup>118</sup> languages, but he 10 hath wanted<sup>119</sup> all the cognition of philosophy. Some man hath read the inventions<sup>120</sup> of the old philosophers, but he hath not been exercised in the new schools. Some man hath sought cunning, as well philosophy as divinity,<sup>121</sup> for praise and vain-glory, and not for any profit or increase of Christ’s Church. But Pico all these things with equal study hath so received that they might seem by heaps, as a plenteous stream, to have flowed into him. For he was not of the condition of some folk (which 20 to be excellent in one thing set all others aside) but he in all sciences profited so excellently that which of them soever ye had considered in him, ye would have thought that he had taken that one for his only study. And all these things were in him so much the 25 more marvelous in that he came thereto by himself with the strength of his own wit, “for the love of God and profit of His Church,” without masters, so that we may say of him that Epicurus the philosopher said of himself, that he was his own master.<sup>122</sup>

30 “Five Causes That in So Short Time Brought Him to So Marvelous Cunning”

To the bringing forth of so wonderful effects in so small time, I consider five causes to have come together: first, an incredible wit; secondly, a marvelous fast memory; thirdly, great substance,<sup>123</sup> by the which, to the buying of his books as well Latin as Greek and other tongues, he was especially helped. (Seven thousand ducats<sup>124</sup> he had laid out in the gathering together of volumes of all manner of literature.) The fourth cause was his busy and indefatigable study. The fifth was the despising of all earthly things.

“Of His Conditions and His Virtue”

But now let us pass over those powers of his soul which appertain to understanding and knowledge, 45 and let us speak of them that belong to the achieving of noble acts. Let us, as we can, declare his excellent conditions, that his mind inflamed to Godward may appear, and his riches given out to poor folk may be understood, to the intent that they “which 50 shall hear his virtue” may have occasion thereby to give especial laud and thanks therefor to almighty God, of whose infinite goodness all grace and virtue cometh.

“Of the Sale of His Lordships,<sup>125</sup> and Alms” 55

Three years before his death (to the end that, all the charge<sup>126</sup> and business of rule or lordship set aside, he might lead his life in rest and peace, well considering to what end this earthly honor and worldly dignity cometh), all his patrimony and dominions—that is to say, the third part<sup>127</sup> of the earldom of Mirandola and of Concordia, unto John Francis, his nephew, he sold and that so good cheap<sup>128</sup> that it seemed rather a gift than a sale. All that ever he received of this bargain, partly he gave out to poor folk, partly he bestowed in the buying of a little land to the finding of him<sup>129</sup> and his household. And over that,<sup>130</sup> much silver vessel and plate, with other precious and costly utensils of household, he divided among poor people. He 70 was content with mean<sup>131</sup> fare at his table, howbeit somewhat yet retaining of the old plenty in dainty viand<sup>132</sup> and silver vessels. Every day at certain hours he gave himself to prayer. To poor men always, if any came, he “plenteously” gave out his money; and not content only to give that he had himself ready, he wrote over that to one Jerome Benivieni, a Florentine, a well-lettered man (whom for his great love toward him and the integrity of his conditions he singularly favored), that he should with his own money ever help poor folk, and give maidens 80 money to their marriage, and always send him word what he had laid out that he might pay it him again. This office<sup>133</sup> he committed to him that he might the more easily by him, as by a faithful messenger, 85

115 suspense 116 two 117 discredited
 118 foreign 119 lacked 120 discoveries
 121 theology 122 See Diogenes Laërtius’s
Lives and Opinions of Eminent Philosophers

10.13. 123 wealth 124 gold coins 125 domains; lands one has a right to rule 126 burden; responsibility 127 the third part: one-third 128 so good cheap:

at such a low price 129 finding of him:
 supporting of himself 130 over that:
 moreover 131 moderate 132 dainty viand: fancy foods 133 responsibility relieve the necessity and misery of poor needy people such as himself haply<sup>134</sup> could not come by the knowledge of.

5 Of the Voluntary Affliction and Paining of His Own Body

Over all this, many times (which is not to be kept secret) he gave alms of his own body. We know many men which, as Saint Jerome saith, put forth their hand to poor folk, but with the pleasure of the flesh they be overcomen.<sup>135</sup> But he, many days — and namely<sup>136</sup> those days which represent unto us<sup>137</sup> the Passion and death that Christ suffered for our sake — beat and scourged his own flesh in the remembrance of that great benefit, and for cleansing of his old offenses.

15 Of His Placability, or Benign Nature

He was of cheer always merry, and of so benign nature that he was never troubled with anger. And he said once to his nephew that whatsoever should happen (fell there never so great misadventure) he could never, as him thought, be moved to wrath but if<sup>138</sup> his chests perished in which his books lay, that he had with great travail and watch<sup>139</sup> compiled. But forasmuch as he considered that he labored only for the love of God and profit of his Church, and that he had dedicated unto him all his works, his studies, and his doings; and since he saw that, “since God is almighty,” they could not miscarry but if it were either by his commandment or by his sufferance,<sup>140</sup> he verily trusted, “since God is all good,” that he would not suffer him to have that occasion of heaviness.<sup>141</sup> O “very” happy mind, which none adversity might oppress, which no prosperity might enhance: not the cunning of all philosophy was able to make him proud; not the knowledge of the Hebrew, Chaldean, and Arabian languages, besides Greek and Latin, could make him vainglorious; not his great substance,<sup>142</sup> not his noble blood could blow up his heart; not the beauty of his body, not the great occasion of sin were able to pull him back into the voluptuous broad way “that leadeth to hell.”<sup>143</sup> What thing was there of so marvelous strength that might overturn the mind of him which now (as Seneca saith) was “gotten above fortune”<sup>144</sup> as he which as well her favor as her malice hath set at nought,<sup>145</sup> that he might be coupled with a spiritual knot unto Christ and his heavenly citizens?

45 How He Eschewed Dignities

When he saw many men with great labor and money desire<sup>146</sup> and busily purchase the offices and dignities of the Church (which are nowadays, alas the while,<sup>147</sup> commonly bought and sold), himself refused to receive them when two kings offered them. When another man offered him great worldly promotion if he would go to the king's court, he gave him such an answer that he should well know that he neither desired worship<sup>148</sup> nor worldly riches, but rather set them at nought, that he might the more quietly give himself to study and the service of God. This was he persuaded: that to a philosopher and him that seeketh for wisdom, it was no praise to gather riches but to refuse them.

60 Of the Despising of Worldly Glory

All praise of people and all earthly glory he reputed utterly for nothing, but in the renaying<sup>149</sup> of this shadow of glory, he labored for very<sup>150</sup> glory, which evermore followeth virtue as an inseparable servant. He said that fame oftentimes did hurt to men while they live, and never good when they be dead. So much only set he by<sup>151</sup> his learning: in how much he knew that it was profitable to the Church and to the extermination of errors. And over that, he was come to that prick<sup>152</sup> of perfect humility that he little forced<sup>153</sup> whether his works went out under his own name or not, so that<sup>154</sup> they might as much profit<sup>155</sup> as if they were given out under his name. And now set he little by<sup>156</sup> any other books save only the Bible, in the only study of which he had appointed himself<sup>157</sup> to spend the residue of his life, saving<sup>158</sup> that the common profit pricked<sup>159</sup> him when he considered so many and so great works as

134 perhaps 135 See St. Jerome, Letter to Eustochium (Letter 108) 17. 136 especially 137 represent unto us: call to our minds 138 but if: unless 139 keeping awake and vigilant 140 allowing it 141 dejectedness of mind; sadness 142 wealth

143 See Mt 7:13–14. 144 Seneca, On the Shortness of Life 5 145 set at nought: value as nothing 146 ask for 147 alas the while: sad to say 148 honor; prestige 149 refusing; renouncing 150 true 151 set he by: did he value 152 height

153 cared 154 so that: as long as 155 might as much profit: could do as much good 156 set he little by: he placed little value on 157 appointed himself: decided 158 except 159 spurred; goaded he had conceived and long travailed upon, how they were of every man, by and by,<sup>160</sup> desired and looked after.

How Much He Set More by Devotion Than Cunning

The little affection of an old man or an old woman to Godward (were it never so small) he set more by than by all his own knowledge as well of natural things as godly. And oftentimes in communication<sup>161</sup> he would admonish his familiar friends how greatly these mortal things bow and draw<sup>162</sup> to an end: how slipper<sup>163</sup> and how falling<sup>164</sup> it is that we live in now; how firm, how stable that shall be that we shall hereafter live in, whether we be thrown down into hell or lifted up into heaven. Wherefore he exhorted them to turn up their minds to love God, which was a thing far excelling all the cunning that is possible for us in this life to obtain. The same thing also in his book which he entituled De Ente et Uno<sup>165</sup> lightsomely<sup>166</sup> he treateth, where he interrupteth the course of his dispicion<sup>167</sup> and turning his words to Angelo Poliziano (to whom he dedicateth that book), he writeth in this wise: "But now behold, O my well-beloved Angel, what madness holdeth us. Love God (while we be in this body) we rather<sup>168</sup> may, than either know him or by speech utter<sup>169</sup> him. In loving him, also we more profit ourselves; we labor less and serve him more. And yet had we liefer<sup>170</sup> always by knowledge never find that thing that we seek than by love to possess that thing which also, without love, were in vain found."

Of His Liberality and Contempt of Riches

Liberality only in him passed measure,<sup>171</sup> for so far was he from the giving of any diligence to earthly things that he seemed somewhat besprent<sup>172</sup> with the freckle<sup>173</sup> of negligence. His friends oftentimes admonished him that he should not all utterly despise riches, showing him that it was his dishonesty and rebuke when it was reported (were it true or false) that his negligence and setting nought by<sup>174</sup> money gave his servants occasion of deceit and robbery. Nevertheless, that mind of his (which evermore on high cleaved fast in<sup>175</sup> contemplation and in the ensearching<sup>176</sup> of nature's counsel<sup>177</sup>) could never let down itself to the consideration and over-seeing of these base, abject, and vile earthly trifles. His high steward came on a time to him and desired<sup>178</sup> him to receive his account of such money as he had in many years received of him, and brought forth his books of reckoning.<sup>179</sup> Pico answered him in this wise: "My friend," saith he, "I know well ye have might oftentimes, and yet may, deceive me and ye list;<sup>180</sup> wherefore the examination of these expenses shall not need.<sup>181</sup> There is no more to do." If I be aught<sup>182</sup> in your debt, I shall pay you by and by.<sup>183</sup> If ye be in mine, pay me — either now if ye have it, or hereafter if ye be now not able."

Of His Loving Mind and Virtuous Behavior to His Friends

His lovers and friends with great benignity and courtesy he entreated. Whom he used in all secret communing<sup>184</sup> virtuously to exhort to Godward. Whose godly words so effectually wrought<sup>185</sup> in the hearers that, where a cunning man (but not so good as cunning) came to him on a day for the great fame of his learning to commune<sup>186</sup> with him, as they fell in talking of virtue, he was with two words<sup>187</sup> of Pico so thoroughly pierced that forthwith<sup>188</sup> he forsook his accustomed vice and reformed his conditions. The words that he said unto him were these: "If we had evermore before our eyes the painful death of Christ which he suffered for the love of us, and then if we would again<sup>189</sup> think upon our death, we should well beware of sin." Marvelous benignity and courtesy he showed unto them, not whom strength of body or goods of fortune magnified, but to them whom learning and conditions bound him to favor, for similitude of manners is a cause of love and friendship. A likeness of conditions is, as Apollonius saith, an affinity.<sup>190</sup>

160 by and by: on and on, continuously
161 conversation 162 bow and draw: decline and come 163 unreliable; uncertain 164 transitory 165 "On Being and Unity" 166 clearly, lucidly 167 discussion 168 sooner 169 reveal 170 rather 171 passed measure: went beyond moderation 172 spotted 173 blemish 174 setting nought by: caring nothing about 175 cleaved fast in: clung steadfastly to 176 probing 177 secret design 178 asked 179 accounting 180 and ye list: if you wish 181 be necessary 182 at all 183 by and by:

directly, immediately 184 all secret communing: every personal conversation 185 worked 186 talk 187 utterances 188 immediately 189 further; in turn 190 Philostratus, The Life of Apollonius of Tyana 6.40

“What He Hated, and What He Loved”

There was nothing more odious nor more intolerable to him than (as Horace saith) the proud palaces of stately lords.<sup>191</sup> Wedding and worldly business he fled almost alike; notwithstanding, when he was asked once in sport whether<sup>192</sup> of those two burdens seemed lighter, and which he would choose if he should of necessity be driven to that one and at his election, which he sticked thereat<sup>193</sup> a while but at the last he shook his head and a little smiling he answered that he had liefer<sup>194</sup> take him to marriage, as that thing in which was less servitude and not so much jeopardy. Liberty above all things he loved to which both his own natural affection and the study of philosophy inclined him, and for that was he always wandering and flitting and would never take himself to any certain dwelling.

“Of His Fervent Love to God”

Of outward<sup>195</sup> observances he gave no very great force.<sup>196</sup> We speak not of those observances which the Church commandeth to be observed, for in those he was diligent; but we speak of those ceremonies which folk bring up, setting the very<sup>197</sup> service of God aside, which is, “as Christ saith,” to be worshipped “in spirit and in truth.”<sup>198</sup> But in the inward affects of the mind he cleaved to God with very fervent love “and devotion.” Sometimes that marvelous alacrity languished and almost fell, and eft<sup>199</sup> again with great strength rose up into God. In the love of whom he so fervently burned that on a time as he walked with John Francis (his nephew) in an orchard at Ferrara in the talking of the love of Christ, he broke out into these words: “Nephew,” said he, “this will I show thee; I warn thee, keep it secret: the substance<sup>200</sup> that I have left after certain books of mine finished,<sup>201</sup> I intend to give out to poor folk; and fencing<sup>202</sup> myself with the crucifix, barefoot walking about the world in every town and castle I purpose<sup>203</sup> to preach of Christ.” Afterward I understand, “by the especial commandment of God,” he changed that purpose and appointed<sup>204</sup> to profess himself<sup>205</sup> in the Order of Friars Preachers.<sup>206</sup>

“Of His Death”

In the year of our Redemption 1494, when himself had fulfilled the thirty-second year of his age and abode at Florence, he was suddenly taken with a fervent access<sup>207</sup> which so far-forth crept into the interior parts of his body that it despised<sup>208</sup> all medicines and overcame all remedy, and compelled him within three days to satisfy nature and “repay her the life which he received of her.”

“Of His Behavior in the Extremes of His Life”

After that he had received the holy Body of our Savior, when they offered unto him the crucifix (that in the image of Christ's ineffable Passion suffered for our sake, he might, ere<sup>209</sup> he gave up the ghost, receive his full draught of love and compassion in the beholding of that pitiful figure as a strong defense against all adversity and a sure portcullis<sup>210</sup> against wicked spirits) the priest demanded<sup>211</sup> him whether he firmly believed that crucifix to be the image of him that was very<sup>212</sup> God and very man: which in his Godhead was before all time begotten of his Father, to whom he is also equal in all things and which of the Holy Ghost, God also, of him and of the Father coeternally going forth (which three Persons be one God) was in the chaste womb of our Lady, a perpetual virgin, conceived in time; which suffered hunger, thirst, heat, “cold,” labor, travail, and watch;<sup>213</sup> and which at the last, for washing of our spotty<sup>214</sup> sin contracted and drawn unto us in the sin of Adam, for the sovereign love that he had to mankind, in the altar of the cross willingly and gladly shed out his most precious blood. When the priest inquired of him these things and such others as they be wont to inquire of folk in such case, Pico answered him that he not only believed it, but also certainly knew it.

When that one Albert, his sister's son, a young man both of wit, cunning, and conditions excellent, began to comfort him against death, and by natural reason to show him why it was not to be feared but strongly to be taken — as that only thing which maketh an end of all the labor, pain, trouble, and sorrow of this short, miserable, “deadly”

191 Horace, Epodes 2.7–8 192 which 193 sticked thereat: hesitated about for 194 rather 195 external 196 importance 197 true 198 Jn 4:24 199 afterward 200 wealth 201 are finished 202 protecting 203 intend 204 decided 205 profess himself: take religious vows 206 Dominican Order 207 fervent access: burning or intense fever 208 defied; was impervious to 209 before 210 an iron gate used to defend castles 211 asked 212 true 213 sleeplessness 214 staining

life—he answered that this was not the chief thing that should make him content to die (because the death determineth<sup>215</sup> the manifold incommodities<sup>216</sup> and painful wretchedness of this life) but rather, this cause should make him not content only but also glad to die: for that<sup>217</sup> death maketh an end of sin, inasmuch as he trusted the shortness of his life should leave him no space to sin and offend. He asked also all his servants’ forgiveness if he had ever before that day offended any of them for whom he had provided by his testament<sup>218</sup> eight years before: for some of them meat<sup>219</sup> and drink; for some, money; each of them after their deserving. He showed also, to the above-named Albert and many other credible persons, that the Queen of heaven came to him that night with a marvelous fragrant odor, refreshing all his members that were bruised and frushed<sup>220</sup> with that fever, and promised him that he should not utterly die. He lay always with a pleasant and a merry countenance,<sup>221</sup> and in the very twitches and pangs of death he spoke as though he beheld the heavens open. And all that came to him and saluted<sup>222</sup> him, offering their service, with very loving words he received, thanked, and kissed. The executor of his movable goods he made one Anthony, his brother. The heir of his lands he made the poor people of the hospital of Florence. “And in this wise, into the hands of our Savior he gave up his spirit.”

30 “How His Death Was Taken”

What sorrow and heaviness<sup>223</sup> his departing out of this world was, both to rich and poor, high and low, well testifieth the princes of Italy, well witnesseth the cities and people, well recordeth the great benignity and singular courtesy of Charles, King of France, which as he came to Florence (intending from thence to Rome, and so forth, in his voyage<sup>224</sup> against the realm of Naples), hearing of the sickness of Pico, in all convenient<sup>225</sup> haste he sent him two of his own physicians as ambassadors both to visit him and to do him all the help they might, and over that, sent unto him letters, subscribed<sup>226</sup> with his own hand, full of such humanity and courteous offers as the benevolent mind of such a noble prince and the worthy virtues of Pico required.

45

“Of the State of His Soul”

“After his death (and not long after),” one Jeronimus,<sup>227</sup> a Friar Preacher<sup>228</sup> of Ferrara, a man as well in cunning<sup>229</sup> as holiness of living most famous, in a sermon which he rehearsed in the chief church of all Florence, said unto the people in this wise: “O thou city of Florence, I have a secret thing to show thee which is as true as the Gospel of Saint John. I would have kept it secret, but I am compelled to show it. For he that hath authority to command me hath bid me publish<sup>230</sup> it. I suppose verily that there be none of you but ye knew John Pico, Earl of Mirandola, a man in whom God had heaped many great gifts and singular graces. The Church had of him an inestimable loss. For I suppose if he might have had the space of his life prorogued,<sup>231</sup> he should have excelled (by such works as he should have left behind him) all them that died this eight hundred years before him. He was wont to be conversant with me and to break<sup>232</sup> to me the secrets of his heart, in which I perceived that he was by privy<sup>233</sup> inspiration called of God unto religion.<sup>234</sup> Wherefore he purposed<sup>235</sup> oftentimes to obey this inspiration and follow his calling.

50

55

60

65

Howbeit, not being kind<sup>236</sup> enough for so great benefices<sup>237</sup> of God, or called back by the tenderness of his flesh (as he was a man of delicate complexion) he shrank from the labor or thinking haply<sup>238</sup> that the religion<sup>239</sup> had no need of him, deferred it for a time. Howbeit, this I speak only by conjecture. But for this delay I threatened him two years together<sup>240</sup> that he would be punished if he forsothed<sup>241</sup> that purpose which our Lord had put in his mind. And certainly I prayed to God myself (I will not lie therefor<sup>242</sup>) that he might be somewhat beaten, to compel him to take that way which God had from above showed him. But I desired not this scourge upon him that he was beaten with; I looked not for that. But our Lord had so decreed that he should forsake<sup>243</sup> this present life and lose a part of that noble crown that he should have had in heaven. Notwithstanding,

70

75

80

85

215 put an end to 216 harms and discomforts 217 for that: because 218 will 219 food 220 crushed; disabled 221 look on his face 222 greeted 223 grief 224 military expedition 225 due 226 signed

227 Savonarola, as stated in More’s source document 228 Friar Preacher: Dominican 229 knowledge; cleverness; learning 230 publicize 231 extended 232 reveal 233 private 234 life in a religious order 235 intended 236 grateful 237 benefits;

gifts 238 perhaps 239 religious order 240 uninterruptedly 241 through sloth neglected 242 about that; on that account 243 give up the most benign Judge hath dealt mercifully with him and for his plenteous alms given out with a free and liberal hand unto poor people, and for the devout prayers which he most instantly<sup>244</sup> offered unto 5 God, this favor he hath: though his soul be not yet in the bosom of our Lord in the heavenly joy, yet is it not on the other side deputed<sup>245</sup> unto perpetual pain, but he is adjudged<sup>246</sup> for a while to the fire of purgatory, there to suffer pain for a season. Which I am 10 the gladder to show you in this behalf,<sup>247</sup> to the intent that they which knew him — and such, in especially,<sup>248</sup> as for his manifold benefices are singularly beholden unto him — should now with their prayers, alms, and other suffrages<sup>249</sup> help him.” These things

 15 this holy man Jerome, this servant of God, openly<sup>250</sup> affirmed and also said that he knew well if he lied in that place,<sup>251</sup> he were worthy<sup>252</sup> eternal damnation. And over that, he said that he had known all those things within a certain time, but the words which 20 Pico had said in his sickness of the appearing of our Lady caused him to doubt and to fear lest Pico had been deceived by some illusion of the devil, inasmuch as the promise of our Lady seemed to have been frustrated by his death. But afterward he understood that Pico was deceived in the equivocation of the word, while she spoke of the second death and everlasting, and he undertook her of<sup>253</sup> the first death and temporal. And after this the same Jerome showed to his acquaintance that Pico had after his death appeared unto him all compassed in fire, and 30 showed unto him that he was suchwise in purgatory punished for “his negligence and” his unkindness.<sup>254</sup> “Now, since it is so — that he is adjudged<sup>255</sup> to that fire from which he shall undoubtedly depart unto glory and no man is sure how long it shall be first, and may 35 be the shorter time for our intercessions — let every Christian body show their charity upon him to help to speed him thither where, after the long habitation with the inhabitants of this dark world (to whom his goodly conversation gave great light), and after the 40 dark fire of purgatory (in which venial offenses be cleansed), he may shortly (if he be not already) enter the inaccessible and infinite light of heaven, where he may in the presence of the sovereign Godhead so pray for us that we may the rather by his intercession

 45 be partners of that unspeakable joy which we have prayed to bring him speedily to. Amen.”

“Here endeth the life of John Pico, Earl of Mirandola.”

“Finis”

50

244 persistently 245 consigned 246 sentenced 247 in this behalf: for this reason 248 particular 249 prayers offered for the dead 250 publicly 251 in that place: i.e., in the church pulpit 252 deserving of 253 undertook her of:

took her as referring to 254 ingratitude;
 unnatural conduct 255 sentenced

HERE FOLLOWETH THREE EPISTLES OF THE SAID PICO

of which three, two be written unto

John Francis, his nephew; the third unto one Andrew Corneo, a nobleman of Italy.

The argument and matter of the first epistle of Pico unto his nephew John Francis

It appeareth by this epistle that John Francis, the nephew of Pico, had broken<sup>256</sup> his mind unto Pico and had made him of counsel in some secret godly purpose which he intended to take upon him;<sup>257</sup> but what this purpose should be, upon<sup>258</sup> this letter can we not fully perceive. Now after that he thus intended, there fell unto him many impediments and diverse occasions which withstood his intent and in manner letted<sup>259</sup> him and pulled him back. Wherefore Pico comforteth him in this epistle and exhorteth him to perseverance, by such means as are in the epistle evident and plain enough. Notwithstanding, in the beginning of this letter, where he saith that the flesh shall, but if<sup>260</sup> we take good heed, “make us drunk in the cups of Circe” and misshape us into the likeness and figure of brute beasts: those words, if ye perceive them not, be in this wise understood. There was sometime in [Aeaea]<sup>261</sup> a woman called Circe, which by enchantment (as Virgil maketh mention) used with a drink to turn as many men as received it into diverse likenesses and figures of sundry beasts — some into lions, some into bears, some into swine, some into wolves — which afterward walked ever tame about her house and waited upon her in such use or service as she list<sup>262</sup> to put unto them.<sup>263</sup> In like wise<sup>264</sup> the flesh, if it make us drunk in the wine of voluptuous pleasure or make the soul leave the noble use of his<sup>265</sup> reason and incline unto sensuality and affections<sup>266</sup> of the body, then the flesh changeth us from the figure of reasonable men into the likeness of unreasonable beasts, and that diversely, after the convenience<sup>267</sup> and similitude between our sensual affections and the brutish properties of sundry beasts: as the proud-hearted man into a lion, the irous<sup>268</sup> into a bear, the lecherous into a goat, the drunken glutton into a swine, the ravenous extortioner into a wolf, the false<sup>269</sup> deceiver into a fox, the mocking jester into an ape. From which beastly shape may we never be restored to our own likeness again unto<sup>270</sup> the time we have cast up again the drink of the bodily affections by which we were into these figures enchanted. When there cometh sometime a monstrous beast to the town, we run and are glad to pay some money to have the sight thereof. But I fear if men would look upon themselves advisedly, they should see a more monstrous beast nearer home; for they should perceive themselves, by the wretched inclination to diverse beastly passions, changed in their soul, not into the shape of one, but of many beasts: that is to say, of all them whose brutish appetites they follow. Let us then beware, as Pico counseleth us, that we be not drunken in the cups of Circe — that is to say, in the sensual affections of the flesh — lest we deform the image of God in our souls, after whose image we be made,<sup>271</sup> and make ourselves worse than idolaters. For if he be odious to God which<sup>272</sup> turneth the image of a beast into God,<sup>273</sup> how much is he more odious which turneth the image of God into a beast?

John Pico, Earl of Mirandola, to John Francis, his nephew by his brother: health in him that is very<sup>274</sup> health.

That thou hast had many evil occasions after thy departing which trouble thee and stand against the virtuous purpose that thou hast taken, there is no cause, my son, why thou shouldst either marvel thereof, be sorry therefor, or dread it. But rather, how great a wonder were this: if only to thee among mortal men the way lay open to heaven without sweat, as though that now at erst<sup>275</sup> the deceitful world and the cursed devil failed, and as though thou were not yet<sup>276</sup> in the flesh, which “coveteth against the spirit,”<sup>277</sup> and which false flesh (but if<sup>278</sup> we watch and look well to ourselves) shall make us drunk in the cups of Circe and so deform us into monstrous shapes of brutish and unreasonable beasts. Remember also that of these evil occasions the holy apostle Saint James saith thou hast cause to be glad, writing in this wise: Gaudete, fratres, cum in tentationes varias incideritis (“Be glad,”

256 revealed 257 take upon him: undertake 258 from 259 prevented; hindered 260 but if: unless 261 For this missing place name, see Aeneid 3,386 and Odyssey 10.135. 262 chose 263 See hot-tempered 269 unfaithful 270 until 271 Gn 1:26–27 272 who 273 Ex 20:3–6 274 true 275 at erst: for the first time 276 still 277 Gal 5:17 278 but if: unless saith he, “my brethren, when ye fall in diverse temptations”),<sup>279</sup> and not causeless. For what hope is there of glory if there be none hope of victory? Or what place is there for victory where there is no battle? He is called to the crown and triumph which is provoked to the conflict, and namely<sup>280</sup> to that conflict in which no man may be overcome against his will, and in which we need none other strength to vanquish but that we list<sup>281</sup> ourselves to vanquish. Very happy is a Christian man, since that the victory is both put in his own free will, and the reward of the victory shall be far greater than we can either hope or wish. Tell me, I pray<sup>282</sup> thee, my most dear son, if there be aught<sup>283</sup> in this life—of all those things the delight whereof so vexeth and tosseth these earthly minds—is there, I say, any of those trifles in the getting of which a man must not suffer many labors, many displeasures, and many miseries ere<sup>284</sup> he get it? The merchant thinketh himself well served if, after ten years sailing, after a thousand incommodities,<sup>285</sup> after a thousand jeopardies of his life, he may at last have a little the more gathered together. Of the court and service of this world there is nothing that I need to write unto thee the wretchedness whereof the experience itself hath taught thee, and daily teacheth. In obtaining the favor of the princes, in purchasing the friendship of the company,<sup>286</sup> in ambitious labor for offices and honors, what a heap of heaviness<sup>287</sup> there is. How great anguish, how much business and trouble, I may rather learn of thee than teach thee, which, holding myself content with my books and rest, of a child have learned to live within my degree and (as much as I may), dwelling with myself, nothing out of myself labor for or long for. Now then, these earthly things—slipper,<sup>288</sup> uncertain, vile, and common also to us and brute beasts—sweating and panting we shall uneth<sup>289</sup> obtain. And look we, then, to heavenly things and godly—which “neither eye hath seen nor ear hath heard, nor heart hath thought”<sup>290</sup>—to be drawn slumbery<sup>291</sup> and sleeping maugre our teeth,<sup>292</sup> as though neither God might reign nor those heavenly citizens live without us? Certainly if this worldly felicity were gotten to us with idleness and ease, then might some man that shrinketh from labor rather choose to serve the world than God. But now, if we be forlabeled<sup>293</sup> in the way of sin as much as in the way of God and much more—whereof the damned wretches cry out, Lassati sumus in via iniquitatis! (“We be wearied in the way of wickedness!”)<sup>294</sup>—then must it needs be a point of extreme madness if we had not liefer<sup>295</sup> labor there where we go from labor to reward than where we go from labor to pain. I pass over how great peace and felicity it is to the mind when a man hath nothing that grudgeth<sup>296</sup> his conscience, nor is not appalled with the secret twitch of any privy<sup>297</sup> crime. This pleasure undoubtedly far excellet all the pleasures that in this life may be obtained or desired. What thing is there to be desired among the delights of this world, which in the seeking weary us, in the having blindeth us, in the losing paineth us? Doubtest thou, my son, whether the minds of wicked men be vexed or not with continual thought and torment? It is the word of God which neither may deceive nor be deceived: Cor impii quasi mare fervens, quod quiescere non potest (“The wicked man’s heart is like a stormy sea, that may not rest”).<sup>298</sup> There is to him nothing sure, nothing peaceable, but all things fearful, all things sorrowful, all things deadly. Shall we, then, envy these men? Shall we follow them? And forgetting our own country (heaven) and our own heavenly Father, where we were freeborn, shall we willfully make ourselves their bondsmen? And with them wretchedly living, more wretchedly die and at the last most wretchedly in everlasting fire be punished? O the dark minds of men! O the blind hearts! Who seeth not more clear than light that all these things be (as they say) truer than truth itself? And yet do we not that that we know is to be done. In vain we would pluck our foot out of the clay, but we stick still. There shall come to thee, my son, doubt it not (in these places namely where thou art conversant<sup>299</sup>) innumerable impediments every hour, which might fear thee from the purpose of good and virtuous living (and but if<sup>300</sup> thou be wary) shall throw thee down headlong. But among all things, the very<sup>301</sup> deadly pestilence is this: to be conversant day and night among them whose life is

Aeneid, 7.15–20; Odyssey, 10.208–43. 264 manner 265 i.e., the soul’s 266 inclinations; passions; appetites 267 after the convenience: according to the correspondence 268 irascible;

279 Jas 1:2 280 especially 281 want 282 ask, beg 283 anything 284 before 285 inconveniences 286 group of other courtiers 287 grief 288 slipper;

unreliable; having no stability or certainty
289 not easily; with difficulty 290 1 Cor
2:9 291 lethargic 292 maugre our teeth:
despite our resistance 293 exhausted

294 Ws 5:7 295 had not liefer: would not rather 296 disturbs 297 private 298 Is 57:20 299 familiar 300 but if: unless 301 truly

not only on every side an allactive<sup>302</sup> to sin, but over that all set in the expugnation<sup>303</sup> of virtue, under their captain the devil, under the banner of death, under the stipend<sup>304</sup> of hell, fighting against heaven, against our Lord God, and against his Christ. But cry thou, therefore, with the prophet, Dirumpamus vincula eorum, et proiciamus a nobis iugum ipsorum (“Let us break the bands of them, and let us cast off the yoke of them”).<sup>305</sup> These be they whom, as the glorious apostle Saint Paul saith, our Lord hath “delivered into the passions of rebuke” and “to a reprovable sense<sup>306</sup> to do those things that are not convenient,<sup>307</sup> full of all iniquity, full of envy, manslaughter, contention, guile, and malice; backbiters, odious to God, contumelious,<sup>308</sup> proud, stately finders<sup>309</sup> of evil things, foolish, dissolute; without affection, without covenant, without mercy; which when they daily see the justice of God, yet understand they not that such as<sup>310</sup> these things commit are worthy death—not only they that do such things, but also they which consent to the doing.”<sup>311</sup> Wherefore, my child, go thou never about to please them whom virtue displeaseth; but evermore let these words of the Apostle<sup>312</sup> be before thine eyes: Oportet magis Deo placere quam hominibus (“We must rather please God than men”).<sup>313</sup> And remember these words of Saint Paul also: Si hominibus placerem, servus Christi non essem (“If I should please men, I were not Christ’s servant”).<sup>314</sup> Let enter into thine heart a holy pride, and have disdain to take them for masters of thy living which have more need to take thee for a master of theirs. It were far more seeming<sup>315</sup> that they should with thee by good living begin to be men than thou shouldst with them, by the leaving of thy good purpose,<sup>316</sup> shamefully begin to be a beast. There holdeth me sometimes, by almighty God, as it were even a swoon and an insensibility for wonder when I begin in myself: I wot<sup>317</sup> never whether I shall say to remember or to sorrow, to marvel or to bewail the appetites of men, or, if I shall more plainly speak, the very madness. For it is verily a great madness not to believe the Gospel, whose truth the blood of martyrs crieth, the voice of apostles soundeth, miracles proveth, reason confirmeth, the world testifieth, the elements speaketh, devils confesseth.<sup>318</sup> But a far greater madness is it, if thou doubt not but<sup>319</sup> that the Gospel is true, to live then as though thou doubttest not but that it were<sup>320</sup> false. For if these words of the Gospel be true—that it is “very hard for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven”<sup>321</sup>—why do we daily then gape after<sup>322</sup> the heaping up of riches? And if this be true—that we should seek for the glory and praise not that cometh of men, but that cometh of God—why do we then ever hang upon the judgment and opinion of men, and no man reckoneth<sup>323</sup> whether God like him or not? And if we surely<sup>324</sup> believe that once the time shall come in which our Lord shall say, “Go, ye cursed people, into everlasting fire,”<sup>325</sup> and again, “Come, ye my blessed children, possess ye the kingdom that hath been prepared for you from the forming of the world,”<sup>326</sup> why is there nothing then that we less fear than hell, or that we less hope for than the kingdom of God? What shall we say else but that there be many Christian men in name, but few in deed? But thou, my son, enforce<sup>327</sup> thyself to enter by the strait<sup>328</sup> gate that leadeth to heaven<sup>329</sup> and take no heed what thing many men do, but what thing the very law of nature, what thing very reason, what thing our Lord himself showeth thee to be done. For neither thy glory shall be less if thou be happy with few, nor thy pain more easy if thou be wretched with many. Thou shalt have two specially effectual remedies against the world and the devil, with which two, as with two wings, thou shalt out of this vale of misery be lifted up into heaven: that is to say, almsdeed<sup>330</sup> and prayer. What may we do without the help of God? Or how shall he help us if he be not called upon?

But over that, certainly he shall not hear thee when thou callest on him if thou hear not first the poor man when he calleth upon thee. And verily it is according<sup>331</sup> that God should despise thee, being a man, when thou, being a man, despisest a man. For it is written, “In what measure that ye mete,<sup>332</sup> it shall be meted you again.”<sup>333</sup> And in another place of the Gospel it is said, “Blessed be merciful men, for

302 allurement 303 vanquishing; overcoming 304 under the stipend: in the pay 305 Ps 2:3 306 reprovable sense: reprehensible idea 307 appropriate 308 insolent 309 stately finders: arrogant devisers 310 such as: those who 311 Rom 1:26, 28–32 312 St. Peter 313 Acts 5:29 314 Gal 1:10 315 fitting 316 resolution 317 know 318 acknowledge 319 doubt not but: do no doubt 320 doubttest . . . were: had no doubt that it was 321 Lk 18:24 322 gape after: long for 323 cares 324 definitely; firmly 325 Mt 25:41 326 Mt 25:24 327 exert; strengthen 328 narrow 329 See Mt 7:13–14. 330 almsgiving 331 fitting 332 measure 333 Mt 7:2

they shall get mercy.<sup>334</sup> When I stir thee to prayer, I stir thee not to the prayer which standeth in many words, but to that prayer which in the secret chamber of the mind, in the privy closet of the soul, with very affect<sup>335</sup> speaketh to God, and in the most light-
 5 some<sup>336</sup> darkness of contemplation not only presenteth the mind to the Father but also uniteth it with him by unspeakable ways which only they know that have assayed.<sup>337</sup> Nor I care not how long or how short thy prayer be, but how effectual, how ardent, and rather interrupted and broken between with sighs than drawn on length with a continual row<sup>338</sup> and number of words. If thou love thine health; if thou desire to be sure<sup>339</sup> from the grins<sup>340</sup>
 10 of the devil, from the storms of this world, from the await<sup>341</sup> of thine enemies; if thou long to be acceptable to God; if thou covet to be happy at the last, let no day pass thee but thou once, at the leastwise, present thyself to God by prayer, and, falling
 20 down before him flat to the ground with a humble affect of devout mind—not from the extremity of thy lips, but out of the inwardness of thine heart—cry these words of the prophet: Delicta iuventutis meae, et ignorantias meas, ne memineris; sed secundum misericordiam tuam memento mei, propter bonitatem tuam, Domine (“The offenses of my youth, and mine ignorances, remember not, good Lord; but after<sup>342</sup> thy mercy, Lord, for thy goodness, remember me”).<sup>343</sup> What thou shalt in thy prayer
 25 ask of God—both the Holy Spirit which<sup>344</sup> prayeth for us and, eke<sup>345</sup> thine own necessity shall every hour put in thy mind, and also what thou shalt pray for—thou shalt find matter enough in the reading of Holy Scripture; which that thou wouldst now
 30 (setting poets’ fables and trifles aside) take ever in thine hand, I heartily pray thee. Thou mayst do nothing more pleasant to God, nothing more profitable to thyself, than if thine hand cease not day nor night to turn and read the volumes of Holy 35 Scripture. There lieth privily in them a certain heavenly strength, quick<sup>346</sup> and effectual, which with a marvelous power transformeth and changeth the reader’s mind into the love of God if they be clean and lowly entreated.<sup>347</sup> But I have passed now the 40 bounds of a letter, the matter drawing me forth and the great love that I have had to thee, both ever before and specially since that hour in which I have had first knowledge of thy most holy purpose.

Now to make an end with this one thing, I warn thee (of which, when we were last together, I often talked with thee) that thou never forget these 50 two things: that both the Son of God died for thee and that thou shalt also thyself die shortly live thou never so<sup>348</sup> long. With these twain,<sup>349</sup> as with two spurs—that one of fear, that other of love—spur
 55 forth thine horse through the short way of this momentary life to the reward of eternal felicity since we neither ought nor may prefix<sup>350</sup> ourselves any other end than the endless fruition<sup>351</sup> of the infinite goodness both to soul and body in everlasting 60 peace. Farewell and fear God.<sup>352</sup>

“The Matter or Argument of the Epistle of Pico to Andrew Corneo”

“This Andrew, a worshipful<sup>353</sup> man and an especial friend of Pico, had by his letters given him 65 counsel to leave the study of philosophy, as a thing in which he thought Pico to have spent time enough, and which, but if<sup>354</sup> it were applied to the use of some actual business, he judged a thing vain and unprofitable. Wherefore he counseled Pico to 70 surcease of study and put himself with some of the great princes of Italy. With whom (as this Andrew said) he should be much more fruitfully occupied than always in the study and learning of philosophy. To whom Pico answered as in this present epistle
 75 appeareth. Where he saith these words—“By this it should follow that it were either servile or at the leastwise not princely to make the study of philosophy other than mercenary”—thus he meaneth: “Mercenary” we call all those things which we 80 do for hire or reward. Then he maketh philosophy mercenary, and useth it not as cunning but as merchandise, which studieth it not for pleasure of itself, or for the instruction of his mind in moral virtue, but to apply it to such things where he may get 85 some lucre or worldly advantage.”

John Pico, Earl of Mirandola, to Andrew Corneo: greeting.

Ye exhort me by your letters to the civil<sup>355</sup> and active life, saying that in vain—and, in manner, to 90

334 Mt 5:7 335 very affect: real feeling 336 luminous 337 experienced (them)
 338 string 339 safe 340 snares
 341 ambush 342 according to 343 Ps

24(25):7 344 who 345 also 346 living 347 treated, handled 348 never so: no matter how 349 two 350 intend for 351 enjoyment 352 More omits

this place and date: Ferrara, May 15, 1492.
 353 distinguished 354 but if: unless 355 civic; public; political

my rebuke and shame—have I so long studied in philosophy, but if I would at the last exercise that learning in the entreating<sup>356</sup> of some profitable acts and outward business. Certainly, my well-beloved 5 Andrew, I had cast away both cost and labor of my study if I were so minded that I could find in my heart in this matter to assent unto you and follow your counsel. This is a very deadly and monstrous persuasion which hath entered the minds
 10 of men: believing that the studies of philosophy are of estates<sup>357</sup> and princes, either utterly not to be touched, or, at the leastwise, with extreme lips<sup>358</sup> to be sipped and—rather to the pomp and ostentation of their wit than to the culture “and profit” of their 15 minds—to be little and easily tasted. The words of Neoptolemus<sup>359</sup> they hold utterly for a sure decree, that philosophy is to be studied either never or not long;<sup>360</sup> but the sayings of wise men they repute for japes<sup>361</sup> and very fables: that sure and steadfast felicity standeth only in the goodness of the mind, and that these outward things of the body or of fortune little or nought<sup>362</sup> pertain unto us. But here ye will say to me thus: “I am content ye study, but I would have you outwardly occupied also.” And I desire<sup>363</sup>
 20 you not so to embrace Martha that ye should utterly forsake Mary.<sup>364</sup> “Love them and use them both: as well study as worldly occupation.” “Truly, my well-beloved friend,” in this point I gainsay<sup>365</sup> you not: they that so do, I find no fault in, nor I blame them
 25 not; but certainly it is not all one to say “We do well if we do so” and to say “We do evil but if we do so.” This is far out of the way: to think that from contemplation to the active living—“that is to say, from the better to the worse”—is none error to decline and to think that it were shame to abide still in the better and not decline. Shall a man then be rebuked because that he desireth and ensueth<sup>366</sup> virtue only for itself? Because he studieth the mysteries of God? Because he ensearcheth the counsel<sup>367</sup> of nature?
 30 Because he useth continually this pleasant ease and rest, seeking none outward thing, despising all other things, since those things are able sufficiently to satisfy the desire of their followers? By this reckoning it is a thing either servile or at the leastwise not princely to make the study of wisdom other than mercenary. Who may well hear this? Who may suffer<sup>368</sup> it? Certainly he never studied for wisdom which so studied therefor that in time to come either he might not or would not study therefor. This man rather exercised the study of merchandise<sup>369</sup> 45 than of wisdom. Ye write unto me that it is time for me now to put myself “in household with” some of the great princes of Italy. But I see well that as yet ye have not known the opinion that philosophers have of themselves which, as Horace saith, repute<sup>370</sup> themselves “kings of kings.”<sup>371</sup> “They love liberty;” they cannot bear the proud manners of estates; they cannot serve. They dwell with themselves and be content with the tranquility of their own mind. They suffice themselves and more; they seek nothing out of themselves. The things that are had in honor among the common people, among them be not holden honorable. All that ever the voluptuous desire of men thirsteth for, or ambition sightheth for, they set at nought and despise. Which, while it belongeth to all men, yet undoubtedly it pertaineth most properly to them whom fortune hath so liberally favored that they may live not only well and plenteously but also nobly. These great fortunes lift up a man high and setteth him out to the show;

 50 but oftentimes, as a fierce and a skittish horse, they cast off their master. Certainly, always they grieve and vex him, and rather tear him than bear him. The golden mediocrity,<sup>372</sup> “the mean estate,<sup>373</sup>” is to be desired, which shall bear us, as it were, in hands more easily; which shall obey us, and not master us. I, therefore, abiding firmly in this opinion, set more by<sup>374</sup> my little house, my study, the pleasure of my books, the “rest and” peace of my mind, than by all your kings’ palaces, all your common business,
 55 “all your glory,” all the advantage that ye hawk after, and all the favor of the court. Nor I look not for this fruit of my study—that I may thereby hereafter be tossed in the flood and rumbling of your worldly business—but that I may once bring forth the children that I travail on:<sup>375</sup> that I may give out some books of mine own, to the common<sup>376</sup> profit, which may somewhat savor, if not of cunning, yet

356 undertaking 357 of estates: by nobility 358 with extreme lips: i.e., delicately, superficially; in small amounts 359 a son of Achilles. The words quoted are from a fragment of a play by Ennius (ca. 239–169 BC). 360 See Cicero,

Tusculan Disputations 2.1; On the Republic 1.18. 361 trifles; tricks 362 nothing 363 ask 364 See Lk 10:38–42. 365 oppose; contradict 366 pursues 367 secret designs 368 tolerate 369 commerce 370 regard 371 Horace,

Epistles 1.1.106–7 372 golden mediocrity: golden mean; happy medium 373 mean estate: middle position 374 set more by: value more highly 375 travail on: am in labor with 376 public at the leastwise of wit and diligence. And because<sup>377</sup> ye shall not think that my travail and diligence in study is anything remitted<sup>378</sup> or slacked, I give you knowledge that after great fervent labor, with much 5 watch and infatigable<sup>379</sup> travail, I have learned both the Hebrew language and the Chaldean, and now have I set hand to overcome the great difficulty of the Arabic tongue. These, my dear friend, be things which to appertain to<sup>380</sup> a noble prince, I have ever 10 thought and yet think.

“Fare ye well.” Written at Paris, the 15th day of October, the year of grace 1492.<sup>381</sup>

“The Argument of the Epistle Following”

After that John Francis, the nephew of Pico, 15 had (as it appeareth in the first epistle of Pico to him) begun a change in his living,<sup>382</sup> it seemeth, by this letter, that the company of the court where he was conversant,<sup>383</sup> diversely (as it is their unman-20 nerly manner) descanted thereof,<sup>384</sup> to his rebuke as them<sup>385</sup> thought, but as truth was unto their own. Some of them judged it folly; some called it hypoc-25 isy; some scorned him; some slandered him. Of all which demeanor (as we may of this epistle conjecture) he wrote unto this earl Pico, his uncle; which 25 in this letter comforteth and encourageth him, as it is in the course thereof evident.”

John Pico, Earl of Mirandola, to Francis, his nephew: greeting “in our Lord.”

Happy art thou, my son, when that our Lord not 30 only giveth thee grace well to live, but also that while thou livest well, he giveth thee grace to bear evil words of evil people for thy living well. Certainly, as great a praise as it is to be commended of them that are commendable, as great a commendation it is to 35 be reprov'd of them that are reprovable. Notwithstanding, “my son,” I call thee not therefor<sup>386</sup> happy because this false reproof is worshipful<sup>387</sup> and glo-
 40 rious unto thee, but for because that our Lord Jesus Christ (which is not only true, but also Truth itself<sup>388</sup>) affirmeth that our reward shall be plenteous in heaven when men speak evil to us and speak all evil against us, lying, for his name.<sup>389</sup> This is an apostle’s dignity: to be reputed digne<sup>390</sup> “afore God” to be defamed of<sup>391</sup> wicked folk for his name. For we 45 read in the Gospel of Luke that the apostles went joyful and glad from the council house of the Jews because God had accepted them as worthy to suf-

 50 fer wrong and reproof for his sake.<sup>392</sup> Let us therefore joy and be glad if we be worthy so great worship before God that his worship<sup>393</sup> be showed in our rebuke. And if we suffer of the world anything
 55 that is grievous or bitter, let this sweet voice of our Lord be our consolation: Si mundus vos odio habet, scitote quia priorem me vobis odio habuit (“If the world,” saith our Lord, “hate you, know ye that it
 60 hated me before you”).<sup>394</sup> If the world, then, hated him by whom the world was made, we most vile and simple men — and worthy<sup>395</sup> (if we consider our 65 wretched living well) all shame and reproof — if folk backbite us and say evil of us, shall we so grievously take it that, lest they should say evil, we should be-
 70 gin to do evil? Let us rather gladly receive these evil words, and if we be not so happy to suffer for virtue and truth as the old saints suffered — beatings,
 65 binding, prison, swords, “and death” — let us think, at the leastwise we be well served if we have the grace to suffer chiding, detraction, and hatred of 70 wicked men, lest that, if all occasion of deserving be taken away, there be left us none hope of reward. If men for thy good living praise thee — thy virtue,
 75 certainly, in that it is virtue, maketh thee like unto Christ — but in that it is praised it maketh thee un-
 80 like him, which for the reward of his virtue received the “opprobrious” death of the cross, for which, as the Apostle<sup>396</sup> saith, “God hath exalted him and 75 given him a name that is above all names.”<sup>397</sup> More desirous is then to be condemned of the world and exalted of God, than to be exalted of the world and 80 condemned of God. The world condemneth to life; God exalteth to glory. The world exalteth to a fall; God condemneth to the fire of hell. Finally, if 85 the world fawn upon thee, uneth it may be<sup>398</sup> but that thy virtue (which, all lifted upward, should have God alone to please) shall somewhat unto the 85 blandishing<sup>399</sup> of the world and favor of the people incline. And so, though<sup>400</sup> it lose nothing of the

377 so that 378 diminished 379 untiring 380 appertain to: befit; suit 381 The actual date of the letter is 1486, the year before Pico’s alleged conversion. More omits Pico’s excuses for the affair with

Margherita de’ Medici. 382 way of living 383 familiar 384 descanted thereof: made comments about it 385 they 386 for that reason 387 honorable 388 See Jn 14:6. 389 See Mt 5:11–12. 390 worthy

391 defamed of: slandered by 392 Acts 5:27–41 393 honor 394 Jn 15:18 395 deserving of 396 Saint Paul 397 Phil 2:9 398 uneth . . . be: scarcely can it be 399 flattery 400 even if integrity of our perfection, yet it loseth of the reward; which reward, while it beginneth to be paid in the world, where all things is little, it shall be less in heaven, where all-thing is great. O happy rebukes 5 which make us sure that neither the flower of our virtue shall wither with the pestilent blast of vain-glory, nor our eternal reward be diminished for the vain promotion of a little popular fame. Let us, my son, love these rebukes; and only of the ignominy and reproof of our Lord's cross let us, like faithful servants, with a holy ambition be proud. "We," saith Saint Paul, "preach Christ crucified, which is unto the Jews despite,<sup>401</sup> unto the Gentiles folly, unto us the virtue and wisdom of God."<sup>402</sup> "The wisdom of 10 this world is foolishness afore God,"<sup>403</sup> and the folly of Christ is that by which he hath overcome the wisdom of the world, by which it hath pleased God to make his believing people safe.<sup>404</sup>

If that thou doubt not but that they be mad 20 which backbite thy virtue — which the Christian living, that is very<sup>405</sup> wisdom, reputeth for madness — consider, then, how much were thy madness if thou shouldst for the judgment of madmen swerve from the good institution<sup>406</sup> of thy life namely since all error is with amendment to be taken away and not, with imitation and following, to be increased. Let them therefore neigh, let them bawl, let them bark; go thou boldly forth thy journey as thou hast begun, and of their wickedness and misery consider how 30 much thyself art beholden to God, which hath illumined thee sitting in the shadow of death and, translating<sup>407</sup> thee out of the company of them which, like drunken men without a guide wander hither and thither in obscure darkness, hath associated thee to the children of light. Let that same sweet voice of our Lord always sound in thine ears: Sine mortuos sepelire mortuos suos; tu Me sequere ("Let dead men alone with dead men; follow thou me").<sup>408</sup> Dead be they that live not to God and in the space of this 35 temporal death laboriously purchase themselves eternal death. Of whom, if thou ask whereto they draw,<sup>409</sup> whereto they refer their studies, their works, and their business, and finally what end they have appointed<sup>410</sup> themselves in the adeption<sup>411</sup> whereof

they should be happy, either they shall have utterly 45 nothing to answer or they shall bring forth words repugnant in themselves and contrary each to other, like the raving of Bedlam<sup>412</sup> people. Nor they wot never<sup>413</sup> themselves what they do, but like them that swim in swift floods, they be borne forth with the 50 violence of evil custom as<sup>414</sup> it were with the boistous<sup>415</sup> course of the stream. And their wickedness blinding them on this side, and the devil pricking<sup>416</sup> them forthward on that side, they run forth headlong into all mischief as blind guides of blind men,
 55 till that death set on them unware,<sup>417</sup> and till that it be said unto them "that Christ saith in the Gospel:" "My friend, this night the devils shall take thy soul from thee. These goods, then, that thou hast gathered, whose shall they be?"<sup>418</sup> Then shall they envy
 60 them whom they despised. Then shall they commend them that they mocked. Then shall they covet to ensue<sup>419</sup> them in living when they may not, whom when they might have ensued they pursued.<sup>420</sup> Stop therefore thine ears, my most dear son, and whatsoever men say of thee, whatsoever men think on thee, account it for nothing, but regard only "the judgment of God," which shall "yield every man
 65 after his own works"<sup>421</sup> "when he shall show himself from heaven with the angels of his virtue,<sup>422</sup> in flame of fire doing vengeance upon them that have not known God nor obeyed his Gospel," which, as the Apostle<sup>423</sup> saith, "shall suffer in death eternal pain from the face of our Lord and from the glory
 70 of his virtue, when he shall come to be glorified of his saints and to be made marvelous in all them that have believed."<sup>424</sup> It is written, Nolite timere qui corpus possunt occidere, sed qui animam potest mittere in gehennam ("Fear not them," saith our Lord, "that may slay the body; but fear him that may cast the 75 soul into hell").<sup>425</sup> How much less, then, be they to be feared that may neither hurt soul nor body? Which, if they now backbite thee living virtuously, they shall do the same never the less if, virtue forsaken, thou were overwhelmed with vice —
 80 not for that<sup>426</sup> vice displeaseth them, but for that the vice of backbiting always pleaseth them. Flee if thou love thine health; flee as far as thou mayest

401 an insult 402 1 Cor 1:23–24
 403 1 Cor 3:19 404 saved 405 true
 406 ordering 407 moving 408 Mt
 8:22 409 whereto they draw:
 what they're aiming for 410 set

411 acquiring; attaining 412 an insane asylum 413 Nor... never: Nor they ever know 414 as if 415 stormy; rough 416 spurring; goading 417 unware, unexpectedly 418 Lk 12:20 419 follow

420 persecuted 421 yield... after: render to every man according to; Rom 2:5–6;
 Rv 22:12; Mt 16:27 422 power, might 423 Saint Paul 424 2 Thes 1:7–10 425 Mt 10:28 426 for that: because their company; and, returning to thyself, oftentimes secretly pray unto the most benign Father ⌈of heaven,⌋ crying with the prophet, Ad te, Domine, levavi animam meam; Deus meus, in te confido. Non 5 erubescam, etiam si irrideant me inimici mei. Etenim universi qui sperant in te non confundentur. Con- fundantur iniqua agentes supervacue. Vias tuas, Do- mine, demonstra mihi, et semitas tuas edoce me; di- rige me in veritate tua et doce me. Quia tu es Deus

 10 salvator meus, et in te sperabo tota die— that is to say, “To thee, Lord, I lift up my soul; in thee I trust. I shall not be shamed, and though<sup>427</sup> mine enemies mock me. Certainly all they that trust in thee shall not be ashamed. Let them be ashamed that work 15 wickedness in vain. Thy ways, good Lord, show me, and thy paths teach me; direct me in thy truth and teach me for thou art God my Savior; in thee shall I trust all the day.”<sup>428</sup> Remember also, my son, that the death lieth at hand. Remember that all the time 20 of our life is but a moment and yet less than a moment. Remember how cursed our old enemy is, which offereth us the kingdoms of this world that he might bereave us<sup>429</sup> the kingdom of heaven; how false the fleshly pleasures which therefor embrace us that they might strangle us; how deceitful these 25 ⌈worldly⌋ honors, which therefor lift us up, that they might throw us down; how deadly these riches, which, the more they feed us, the more they poison us; how short, how uncertain, how shadow-like, false, imaginary it is that all these things to- 30 gether may bring us, and though they flow to us as we would wish them. Remember again<sup>430</sup> how great things be promised and prepared for them which, despising these present things, desire and long for that country whose king is the Godhead, whose law 35 is charity, whose measure is eternity. Occupy thy mind with these meditations and such others that may waken thee when thou sleepest, kindle thee when thou waxest<sup>431</sup> cold, confirm thee when thou waverest, and exhibit<sup>432</sup> thee wings of the love of 40 God while thou laborest to heavenward, that when thou comest home to us (which with great desire we look for), we may see not only him that we covet but also such a manner one as we covet.

Farewell and love God, whom of old thou hast 45 begun to fear.

At Ferrara, the 2nd day of July, ⌈the year of our Redemption⌋ 1492.

“THE INTERPRETATION OF JOHN PICO UPON THIS PSALM, “CONSERVA ME DOMINE”

[<sup>1</sup>]Conserua me, Domine, [<sup>2</sup>]quoniam speravi in te.
5 [<sup>3</sup>]Dixi Domino, ‘Deus meus es tu, [<sup>4</sup>]quoniam bono- rum meorum non eges.’ [<sup>5</sup>]Sanctis qui sunt in terra, mirificavit voluntates suas. [<sup>6</sup>]Multiplicatae sunt in- firmitates, postea acceleraverunt. [<sup>7</sup>]Non congregabo 10 conuenticula eorum de sanguinibus; nec memor ero nominum eorum per labia mea. [<sup>8</sup>]Dominus pars he- reditatis meae et calicis mei: [9]tu es qui restitues he- reditatem meam mihi. [<sup>10</sup>]Funes ceciderunt mihi in praeclaris: [11]etenim hereditas mea praeclara est mihi.
15 [<sup>12</sup>]Benedicam Dominum, qui tribuit mihi intellec-
tum: insuper [13]et usque ad noctem increpauerunt me
renes mei. [<sup>14</sup>]Providebam Dominum in conspectu
meo semper, quoniam [15]a dextris est mihi, ne com- movear. Propter hoc [16]laetatum est cor meum, et ex- 20 ultavit lingua mea; insuper [17]et caro mea requiescet in spe. [<sup>18</sup>]Quoniam non derelinques animam meam in inferno, [19]nec dabis sanctum tuum videre corrup- tionem. [<sup>20</sup>]Notas mihi fecisti vias vitae; [21]adimplebis me laetitia cum vultu tuo. [<sup>22</sup>]Delectationes in dextera
tua usque in finem.<sup>433</sup>

25 [<sup>1</sup>]Conserua me Domine: “Keep me, good Lord.”
If any perfect<sup>434</sup> man look upon his own estate,<sup>435</sup> there is one peril therein: that is to wit,<sup>436</sup> lest he wax<sup>437</sup> proud of his virtue. And therefore David, speaking in the person of a righteous man of his 30 estate, beginneth with these words: “Conserua me, Domine”—that is to say, “Keep me good Lord”— which word “keep me,” if it be well considered, taketh away all occasion of pride. For he that is able of himself anything to get, is able of himself that 35 same thing to keep. He that asketh, then, of God to be kept in the state of virtue signifieth in that asking that from the beginning he got not that virtue by himself. He, then, which remembereth that he attained his virtue, not by his own power but by 40 the power of God, may not be proud thereof but rather humbled before God, after<sup>438</sup> those words of the Apostle Quid habes quod non accepisti? (“What hast thou that thou hast not received?”) and “if thou hast received it, why art thou proud thereof, as though thou hadst not received it?”<sup>439</sup> Two words, 45 then, be there which we should ever have in our mouth: that one, Miserere mei, Deus (“Have mercy on me, Lord”),<sup>440</sup> when we remember our vice; that other, Conserua me, Deus (“Keep me good Lord”), when we remember our virtue. 50

[<sup>2</sup>]Quoniam speravi in te: “For I have trusted in thee.”
This one thing is it that maketh us obtain of God our petition: that is to wit, when we have a full hope and trust that we shall speed.<sup>441</sup> And if we observe these two things in our requests—that is to wit, that 55 we require<sup>442</sup> nothing but that which is good for us, and that we require it ardently with a sure<sup>443</sup> hope that God shall hear us—our prayers shall never be void. Wherefore, when we miss the effect of our petition, either it is for that we ask such thing as is 60 noyous<sup>444</sup> unto us—for, as Christ saith, we “wot<sup>445</sup> never what we ask”;<sup>446</sup> and Jesus said, “Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, it shall be given you”<sup>447</sup> (This name “Jesus” signifieth a Savior, and therefore there is nothing asked in the name of Jesus but 65 “that is wholesome and helping” to the salvation of the asker)—or else God heareth not our prayer because that though the thing that we require be good yet we ask it not well, for we ask it with little hope.
And he that asketh doubtingly asketh coldly; and 70 therefore Saint James biddeth us ask in faith, nothing doubting.<sup>448</sup>

[<sup>3</sup>]Dixi Domino, ‘Deus meus es tu’: “I have said to our Lord, ‘My God art thou.’” After that he hath warded and fenced<sup>449</sup> himself against pride, he describeth in 75 these words his estate. All the estate of a righteous man standeth<sup>450</sup> in these words: Dixi Domino, ‘Deus
meus es tu’ (“I have said to our Lord, ‘My God art *thou.’”). Which words, though they seem common to all folk, yet are there very few that may say them 80 truly. That thing a man taketh for his god that he taketh for his chief good. And that thing taketh he for his chief good which only had, though<sup>451</sup> all other things lack, he thinketh himself happy, and 85 which only lacking, though he have all other things, he thinketh himself unhappy. The niggard,<sup>452</sup> then, saith to his money, Deus meus es tu (“My God art thou”). For though honor fail, and health and* 433 Ps 15(16) 434 righteous 435 state of soul, general condition 436 say 437 become 438 in keeping with 439 1 Cor 4:7 440 Ps 50(51):1

441 succeed 442 ask for 443 secure; steadfast 444 harmful 445 know 446 See Mt 20:22. 447 See Jn 14:13, 15:16, 16:23–26. 448 See Jas 1:5–8.

449 warded and fenced: guarded and protected 450 consists 451 even if 452 miser

strength and friends, so<sup>453</sup> he have money he thinketh himself well. And if he have all those things that we have spoken of, if money fail, he thinketh himself unhappy. The glutton saith unto his fleshly 5 lust, the ambitious man saith to his vainglory, “My God art thou.” See, then, how few may truly say these words: “I have said to our Lord, ‘My God art thou.’” For only he may truly say it which is content with God alone, so that if there were offered him all 10 the kingdoms of the world, and all the good that is in earth, and all the good that is in heaven, he would not once offend God to have them all. In these words, then — “I have said to our Lord, ‘My God art thou’” — standeth all the state of a right wise man.

[4] Quoniam bonorum meorum non eges: “For thou hast no need of my goods.” In these words he showeth the cause why he saith only to our Lord “Deus meus es tu” (“My God art thou”). The cause is for that<sup>454</sup> only our Lord hath no need of our goods.
 20 There is no creature but that it needeth other creatures, and though<sup>455</sup> they be of less perfection than itself, as philosophers and divines<sup>456</sup> proven. For if these “more imperfect creatures” were not, the others “that are more perfect” could not be. For if any 25 part of the whole university<sup>457</sup> of creatures were destroyed and fallen to nought, all the whole were subverted. For certainly, “one part of” that university perishing, all parts perish; and all creatures be parts of that university; of which university God
 30 is no part, but he is the beginning, nothing thereupon depending. For nothing truly won he by the creation of this world, nor nothing should he lose if the world were annihilated and turned to nought again. Then, only God is he which hath no need of 35 our goods. Well ought we certainly to be ashamed to take such thing for God as hath need of us, and such is every creature. Moreover, we should not accept for God — that is to say, for the chief goodness — but only<sup>458</sup> that thing which is the most sovereign 40 goodness of all things, and that is not the goodness of any creature. Only therefore to Our Lord ought we to say, “My God art thou.”

[5] Sanctis qui sunt in terra eius, mirificavit voluntates suas: “To his saints that are in the land of him, he hath made marvelous his wills.” After God should 45 we specially love them which are nearest joined unto God, as be the holy angels and blessed saints that are in their country of heaven. Therefore, after that he had said to our Lord, “My God art thou,” he addeth thereunto that our Lord “hath made marvelous his 50 wills”: that is to say, he hath made marvelous his loves and his desires toward his saints that are “in the land of him” — that is to wit,<sup>459</sup> in the country of heaven, which is called “the land of God”<sup>460</sup> and the “land of living people.”<sup>461</sup> And verily if we inwardly

 55 consider how great is the felicity of that country and how much is the misery of this world, how great is the goodness and charity of those “blessed” citizens, we shall continually desire to be hence, that we were there. These things and such others when
 60 we remember, we should “evermore” take heed that our meditations be not unfruitful, but that of every meditation we should always purchase<sup>462</sup> one virtue or other, as, for example, by this meditation of the goodness of that heavenly country we should win
 65 this virtue: that we should not only strongly<sup>463</sup> suffer death and patiently when our time cometh or if it were put unto us for the faith of Christ, but also we should willingly and gladly long therefor,<sup>464</sup> desiring to be departed out of this vale of wretchedness, that we may reign in the heavenly country with God and his holy saints.

[6] Multiplicate sunt infirmitates eorum, postea acceleraverunt: “Their infirmities be multiplied, and after they hasted.”<sup>465</sup> These words the prophet speaketh
 75 of wicked men. By “infirmities” he understandeth idols, and so it is in the Hebrew text. For as good folk have but one God whom they worship, so evil folk have many gods and idols for they have many voluptuous pleasures, many vain desires, many diverse
 80 passions which they serve. And wherefore seek they many sundry pleasures? Certainly for because they can find none that can set their heart at rest. And for that<sup>466</sup> “(as the prophet saith),” “wicked men walk about in a circuit” “or “compass”<sup>467</sup>
 85 whereof there is none end.” Now, after these words “Their idols be multiplied” it followeth, “after they hasted” — that is to say, “after their idols,” after their “passions and beastly desires,” they run forth

453 so long as 454 for that: because 455 and though: even if 456 theologians 457 universe; universality 458 but only:
 anything but 459 say 460 i.e., in this psalm, and also Zech 9:16 461 Ps 26(27):13, 115(116):9 462 endeavor to bring about; strive to achieve 463 stalwarty 464 for it 465 hastened

466 for that: because 467 circular course;
 Ps 1(2):8

headlong unadvisedly without any consideration. And in this be we taught that we should as speedily run to virtue as they run to vice, and that we should with no less diligence serve our Lord God than they serve their lord, the devil. The just man, considering the estate of evil folk, determineth firmly with himself (as we should also) that utterly he will in no wise follow them, and therefore he saith:

[7] Non congregabo conventiculum [sic] eorum de sanguinibus, nec memor nominum: “I shall not gather the congregation of them from the blood, nor I shall not remember their names.” He saith “from the blood” both because idolaters were wont to gather the blood of their sacrifice together and thereabout to do their ceremonies, and also for that<sup>468</sup> all the life of evil men forsakes reason, which standeth all in the soul, and follows sensuality, that standeth all in the blood. The prophet saith not only that he will not “gather their congregation” together “from the blood” (that is to say, that he would do no sacrifice to those idols) but also that he would not “remember their names” — that is to say, that he would not talk nor speak of the voluptuous delights which are evil people’s gods, which we might yet lawfully do, showing us by that, that a perfect man should abstain not only from unlawful pleasures but also from lawful, to the end that he may altogether whole have his mind into heavenward and the more purely intend unto the contemplation of heavenly things. And forasmuch as some man would peradventure<sup>469</sup> think that it were folly for a man utterly to deprive himself from all pleasures, therefore the prophet addeth:

[8] Dominus pars hereditatis meae: “Our Lord is the part<sup>470</sup> of mine inheritance,” as though he would say, “Marvel ye not though I forsake all things to the intent that I may have the possession of God, in whom all other things also be possessed.” This should be the voice of every good Christian man: Dominus pars hereditatis meae (“God is the part of mine inheritance”). For certainly we Christian people, to whom God is promised for an inheritance, ought to be ashamed to desire anything besides him. But for that some man might haply<sup>471</sup> repute it for a great presumption that a man should promise himself God for his inheritance, therefore the prophet putteth thereto:<sup>472</sup>

[9] Tu es qui restitues hereditatem meam mihi: “Thou, good Lord, art he that shall restore mine inheritance unto me,” as though he would say, “O good Lord, my God, I know well that I am nothing in respect of thee. I wot<sup>473</sup> well I am unable to ascend by mine own strength so high, to have thee in possession; but thou art he that shalt draw me to thee, by thy grace; thou art he that shalt give thyself in possession unto me.” Let a righteous man then consider how great a felicity it is to have God fall unto him as his inheritance. It followeth in the psalm: “

[10] Funes ceciderunt mihi in praeclaris: “The cords have fallen to me nobly.” The parts and lots<sup>474</sup> of inheritances were of old time meted out and divided by cords or ropes. These words, then — “The ropes” (or “cords”) “have fallen to me nobly” — be as much to say as, “The part” (or “lot”) “of mine inheritance is noble.” But forasmuch as there be many men which, though they be called to this great felicity (as, indeed, all Christian people are), yet they set little thereby and oftentimes change it for a small simple delight, therefore the prophet saith suingly:<sup>475</sup>

[11] Hereditas mea praeclara est mihi: “Mine inheritance is noble to me,” as though he would say that “as it is noble in itself, so it is noble to me” — that is to say, “I repute<sup>476</sup> it noble.” And all other things in respect of it I repute, as Saint Paul saith, ‘for dung.’<sup>477</sup> But forasmuch<sup>478</sup> as to have this light of understanding whereby a man may know this gift that is given him of God to be the gift of God, therefore the prophet suingly saith:

[12] Benedicam Dominum, qui tribuit intellectum — that is to say, “I shall bless our Lord, which hath given me understanding.” But insomuch as a man oftentimes intendeth after<sup>479</sup> reason to serve God, and that notwithstanding, yet sensuality and the flesh repugneth,<sup>480</sup> then is a man perfect when that, not his soul only, but also his flesh draw forth to Godward, after those words of the prophet in another psalm: “Cor meum et caro mea exultaverunt

468 for that: because 469 maybe 470 portion 471 perhaps 472 putteth thereto: adds to that 473 know 474 allotments 475 accordingly

476 consider 477 Phil 3:8 478 so 479 in accord with 480 resists

in Deum vivum — that is to say, “My mind and my flesh, both, have joyed into living God.”<sup>481</sup> And for<sup>482</sup> this, the prophet saith here suingly:<sup>483</sup>

[13] Et usque ad noctem increpuerunt me renes mei:

5 “My reins” — (or “kidneys<sup>484</sup>”) — “hath chidden<sup>485</sup> me unto the night” — that is to say, “My reins (in which is wont to be the greatest inclination to concupiscence) not only now inclineth me not to sin but also chideth me (that is to say, withdraw me from sin) ‘unto the night’ — that is to say, they so far-forth withdraw me from sin that willingly<sup>486</sup> they afflict and pain my body.” Affliction is “in Scripture” oftentimes signified by the night “because it is the most discomfortable<sup>487</sup> season.” Then “suingly,<sup>488</sup>

10 the prophet “showeth what is the root of this privation “or taking away of fleshly concupiscence in a man,” saying:

[14] Providebam Deum semper in conspectu meo: “I provided<sup>489</sup> God always before my sight.” For if a 20 man had God always before his eyes as a ruler of all his works, and in all his works he should neither seek his own lucre,<sup>490</sup> his glory, nor his own pleasure, but only to the pleasure of God, he should shortly be perfect. And forasmuch as he that so doth prospereth in all thing, therefore it followeth:

[15] Ipse a dextris est mihi ne commovear: “He is on my right hand, that I be not moved” — or troubled. Then the prophet declareth how great is the felicity of a just man, which shall be everlastingly blessed

30 both in body and in soul, and therefore he saith,

[16] Laetatum est cor meum: “My soul is glad,” knowing that after death heaven is made ready for him,

[17] Et caro mea requiescet in spe: “And my flesh shall rest in hope” — that is to say, that though it joy not by and by,<sup>491</sup> as in receiving his glorious estate immediately after the death, yet it resteth in the sepulchre with this hope: that it shall arise in the Day of Judgment immortal and shining with his soul. And also the prophet more expressly declareth in the verse following. For where he said thus — “My soul is glad” — he addeth the cause, saying:

[18] Quoniam non derelinques animam in inferno: “For thou shalt not leave my soul in hell.” Also, where the prophet said that his “flesh” should “rest in hope” he showeth the cause, saying:

45

[19] Nec dabis sanctum tuum videre corruptionem: “Nor thou shalt not suffer<sup>492</sup> thy saint to see corruption” — that is to say, “Thou shalt not suffer the flesh of a good man to be corrupted.” — “For that that was corruptible shall arise incorruptible.”<sup>493</sup> And forasmuch as Christ was the first which entered paradise, and opened the life unto us, and was the first that rose again and the cause of our resurrection, therefore these words that we have spoken of the resurrection be principally understood of Christ, as Saint Peter the apostle hath declared;<sup>494</sup> and secondarily they may be understood of us, in that we be the members of Christ — which only<sup>495</sup> never saw corruption, for his “holy” body was in his sepulcher nothing putrefied. Forasmuch, then, as the way of good living bringeth us to perpetual life of soul and body, therefore the prophet saith:

50

55

60

[20] Notas mihi fecisti vias vitae: “Thou hast made the ways of life known unto me.” And because that all the felicity of that standeth<sup>496</sup> in the clear beholding and fruition<sup>497</sup> of God, therefore it followeth:

65

[21] Adimplebis me laetitiis [sic] cum vultu tuo: “Thou shalt fill me full of gladness with thy cheer.” And for that<sup>498</sup> our felicity shall be everlasting, therefore he saith:

70

[22] Delectationes in dextra tua usque in finem: “Delectation<sup>499</sup> and joy shall be on thy right hand forever.” He saith “on thy right hand” because that our felicity is fulfilled in the vision and fruition of the humanity of Christ (which sitteth in heaven on the right hand of his Father’s majesty), after<sup>500</sup> the words of Saint John: Haec est tota merces, ut videamus Deum et quem misisti, Iesum Christum (“This is all our reward: that we may behold God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent”). To which reward he bring us, that sitteth there and prayeth for us. Amen.

75

80

481 See Ps 83(84):3. 482 because of 483 next 484 reins... kidneys: the seat of the feelings or of sexual desire 485 rebuked 486 deliberately

487 distressing 488 right after that 489 took steps to keep 490 financial gain 491 by and by: right away 492 allow 493 1 Cor 15:42 494 Acts 2:25–32

495 alone 496 consists 497 enjoying 498 for that: because 499 delight 500 according to

TWELVE RULES OF JOHN PICO, EARL OF MIRANDOLA PARTLY EXCITING, PARTLY DIRECTING, A MAN IN SPIRITUAL BATTLE

5 Whoso to virtue esteemeth hard the way,<sup>501</sup>
Because we must have war continual Against the world, the flesh, the devil, ⁊ that ay<sup>502</sup> Enforce<sup>503</sup> themselves to make us bond<sup>504</sup> and thrall, ⁊
Let him remember that choose what way he shall<sup>505</sup>
10 Even after<sup>506</sup> the world, yet must he need sustain<sup>507</sup>
Sorrow, adversity, labor, grief, and pain.

THE SECOND RULE

Think in this wretched world's busy woe
The battle more sharp and longer is iwis<sup>508</sup> 15 With more labor and lessé fruit also,
In which the end of labor, labor is.
⁊ And when the world hath left us after this Void of all virtue, the reward when we die
Is nought<sup>509</sup> but fire ⁊ pain perpetually.

20 THE THIRD RULE

Consider ⁊ well ⁊ that folly it is ⁊ and vain<sup>510</sup>
To look for heaven ⁊ with pleasure and delight
Since Christ, our ⁊ Lord and sovereign ⁊ captain Ascended never but by manly fight
25 And bitter passion.<sup>511</sup> Then were it no right
That any servant, ⁊ ye will yourself record,<sup>512</sup>
Should stand in better condition than his lord.<sup>513</sup>

THE FOURTH RULE

Think how that we not only should not grudge<sup>514</sup> 30 But eke<sup>515</sup> be ⁊ glad and joyful ⁊ of this fight,
And long therefor although<sup>516</sup> we could not judge
How that thereby redound<sup>517</sup> unto us might Any ⁊ profit, but only ⁊ for delight
To be conformed and like in some behavior 35 To Jesus Christ, our blessed Lord and Savior.

As often as thou dost warré<sup>518</sup> and strive,
By the resistance of any sinful motion,<sup>519</sup>
Against any of thy sensual wits five,
Cast<sup>520</sup> in thy mind as oft<sup>521</sup> ⁊ with good devotion
How thou resemblest Christ, as with sour potion<sup>522</sup> 40
If thou pain thy taste: remember therewithal<sup>523</sup>
How Christ for thee tasted eisell<sup>524</sup> and gall.<sup>525</sup>

If thou withdraw<sup>526</sup> thine handés and forbear<sup>527</sup>
The ravin of anything, remember then
How his ⁊ innocent ⁊ handés nailéd were.<sup>528</sup> 45
If thou be tempt with pride, think how that “when He was in form of God, yet of a bondsman<sup>529</sup>
He took the shape and humbled himself” for thee
To the ⁊ most odious and vile ⁊ death of a tree.<sup>530</sup>

Consider when thou art moved to be wroth 50
He who that was God, and of all men the best,
Seeing himself scornéd and scourgéd both,<sup>531</sup>
And as a thief between two thievés threst<sup>532</sup>
With all rebuke and shame, yet from his breast
Came never sign of wrath or of disdain, 55
But patiently endured all the pain.

Thus every snare and engine<sup>533</sup> of the devil
If thou this wise<sup>534</sup> peruse them by and by,<sup>535</sup>
There can be none so curséd or so evil
But ⁊ to some virtue thou mayst it apply 60
For oft thou shalt, resisting valiantly
The fiendé's<sup>536</sup> might and subtle fiery dart, ⁊
Our Savior Christ resemble in some part.

THE FIFTH RULE

Remember well that we in no wise<sup>537</sup> must, 65
Neither in the foresaid espiritual<sup>538</sup> armor
Nor any other remedy, put our trust,
But only in the strength of our Savior
For he it is by whose mighty power
The world was vanquished and his<sup>539</sup> prince cast out 70
Which reigned before in all the earth about.<sup>540</sup>

In him let us trust to overcome all evil;
In him let us put our hope and confidence
To subdue the flesh and master the devil;

501 Whoso . . . way: Whoever thinks the way to virtue is hard 502 ever; always 503 Exert 504 enslaved 505 choose what way he shall: whatever way he chooses 506 according to 507 endure 508 certainly 509 nothing 510 futile; conceited 511 suffering 512 recall;

remember 513 Mt 10:24; Jn 15:20 514 complain about; be discontented 515 also 516 even if 517 return 518 war 519 impulse, instigation, incitement 520 Consider 521 as oft: just as often 522 medicine 523 with that 524 vinegar 525 Mt 27:34 526 keep back 527 refrain from 528 Jn 20:25; Lk 24:39–40 529 slave 530 Phil 2:6–8 531 Mt 27:26–31 532 thrust, Lk 23:32–33 533 plot; cunning trick 534 way 535 by and by: presently; straightway 536 fiend's 537 way 538 spiritual 539 its 540 See Jn 12:31; 1 Jn 5:19; 2 Cor 4:4; Rv 12:9.

75 To him be all honor and lowly reverence.
Oft should we require<sup>541</sup> with all our diligence,
With prayer, <sup>with</sup> tears, and lamentable plaints,<sup>542</sup><sup>7</sup>
The aid of his grace and his holy saints.

THE SIXTH RULE

80 One sinné vanquished, <sup>look</sup> thou not tarry<sup>543</sup><sup>7</sup>
But lie in await<sup>544</sup> for another every hour
For “as a wood<sup>545</sup> lion, the fiend our adversary Runneth about seeking whom he may devour.”<sup>546</sup>
Wherefore continually upon thy tower,<sup>547</sup>
85 Lest he thee unpurveyed<sup>548</sup> and unready catch, Thou must with the prophet “stand and keep watch.”<sup>549</sup>

THE SEVENTH RULE

Enforce<sup>550</sup> thyself not only for to stand Unvanquished against the devil’s might 90 But over<sup>551</sup> that take valiantly on hand
To vanquish him and put him unto flight,
And that is when of the same deed, thought, or sight
By which he would have thee with sin contract, Thou takest occasion of<sup>552</sup> some good <sup>virtuous</sup><sup>7</sup> act.

95 Sometimes he secretly casteth in thy mind
Some laudable deed to steer thee to pride
As vainglory maketh many a man blind;
But let humility be thy sure guide,
Thy good work to God let it be applied.<sup>553</sup> 100 Think it not thine but a gift of his
Of whose grace undoubtedly all goodness is.

THE EIGHTH RULE

In time of battle so put thyself in preace<sup>554</sup>
As though thou shouldest after that victory
105 Enjoy forever a perpetual peace
For God <sup>of</sup> His goodness and liberal mercy<sup>7</sup>
May grant the gift, and eke<sup>555</sup> thy proud enemy, Confounded and <sup>rebuked</sup><sup>556</sup> by thy battail,<sup>557</sup>
Shall thee no more haply<sup>558</sup> for very shame assail.

But when thou mayest once the triumph obtain, 110
Prepare thyself and trim thee in thy gear<sup>559</sup>
As<sup>560</sup> thou shouldest incontinent<sup>561</sup> fight again:
<sup>For</sup> if thou be ready, the devil will thee fear.<sup>7</sup>
Wherefore, in any wise,<sup>562</sup> so evin though thee bear<sup>563</sup>
That thou remember and have ever in memory: 115
In victory, battle; in battle, victory.

THE NINTH RULE

If thou think thyself well fenced and sure<sup>564</sup> Against every subtle suggestion of vice,
120 <sup>Consid’r:</sup> frail glass may no distress<sup>565</sup> endure
And great adventurers oft curse the dice.
Jeopard<sup>566</sup> not too far therefore and<sup>567</sup> ye be wise,<sup>7</sup>
But evermore eschew<sup>568</sup> the occasions of sin
For “he that loveth peril shall perish therein.”<sup>569</sup>

THE TENTH RULE

In all temptation, withstand the beginning. 125
The cursed infants of wretched Babylon
<sup>To</sup> suffer them wax<sup>570</sup> is a jeopardous<sup>571</sup> thing.<sup>7</sup>
Beat out their brainés therefore at<sup>572</sup> the stone.<sup>573</sup>
<sup>Perilous</sup> is the canker that catcheth<sup>574</sup> the bone.<sup>7</sup> 130
Too late cometh the medicine if thou let the sore
By long continuance increase more and more.

THE ELEVENTH RULE

Though in the time of the battle and war
The conflict seemé<sup>575</sup> bitter, sharp, and sore,<sup>576</sup> 135
Yet consider it is more pleasure far
Over the devil to be a conqueror
Than is in the use of thy beastly pleasure.
<sup>Of</sup> virtue more joy the conscience hath within Than outward the body of all his filthy sin.<sup>7</sup> 140

In this point many men err <sup>for</sup><sup>577</sup> negligence<sup>7</sup>
For they compare not the joy of the victory
To the sensual pleasure of their concupiscence,
But like rude beastés unadvisedly,
Lacking discretion, they compare and apply<sup>578</sup> 145
Of their foul sin the voluptuous delight
To the laborous travail<sup>579</sup> of the conflict and fight.

541 ask 542 wailings, moanings
543 (to) delay 544 watchfulness 545 raging 546 1 Pt 5:8 547 lookout 548 unprepared 549 Hb 2:1
550 Strengthen; Exert 551 beyond 552 takest occasion of: take as an opportunity for 553 ascribed 554 the thick of the fight 555 also 556 confounded and refuted: utterly defeated and forced back

557 battle 558 perhaps 559 trim... gear: dress yourself in your armor 560 As if 561 immediately 562 Wherefore...
wise: For which reason, in any habitual manner of action 563 so evin though thee bear: in such a way steadily yet conduct yourself 564 fenced and sure:
protected and secure 565 pressure, strain
566 Risk 567 if 568 avoid, shun

569 Ecclus(Sir) 3:26 570 suffer them
wax: allow them to grow 571 dangerous 572 against 573 See Ps 136(137):8-9.
574 canker that catcheth: corruption that attacks 575 seem 576 grievous, severe 577 out of 578 liken; weigh against;
make use 579 oppressive toil

And yet, alas, he that ofté hath known
 What grief it is by long experience
 150 Of his cruel enemy to be overthrown,
 Should once at the leastwise do his diligence
 To prove and assay<sup>580</sup> with manly defense
 What pleasure there is, what honor, peace, and rest,
 In glorious victory, triumph, and conquest.

155 THE TWELFTH RULE

Though thou be tempted, despair thee nothing.
 Remember the glorious apostle Saint Paul:
 When he had seen God in his perfect being,
 Lest such revelation should his heart extol,
 160 His flesh was suffered<sup>581</sup> rebel against the soul.
 This did almighty God of his goodness provide
 To preserve his servant from the danger of pride.

And here take heed that he whom God did love,
 And for his most especial vessel chose,<sup>582</sup>
 165 “Ravished<sup>583</sup> into the third heaven” above, Yet stood in peril lest pride might him depose,<sup>584</sup>
 Well ought we then our heartés fence<sup>585</sup> and close Against<sup>586</sup> vainglory, “the mother of reproof,<sup>587</sup>”
 The “very crop<sup>588</sup> and” root of all mischiéf.

170 Against this “pomp and wretched worldé’s gloss,<sup>589</sup>”
 Consider how Christ the Lord sovereign power Humbled himself for us unto the cross —
 And “peradventure<sup>590</sup>” death “within one hour”
 “Shall us bereave wealth,<sup>591</sup> riches, and honor,” 175 And bring us down full low, “both small and great,”
 To<sup>592</sup> “vile carrion and wretched” wormés’ meat.

“THE TWELVE WEAPONS OF SPIRITUAL BATTLE

which every man should have at hand when the pleasure of a sinful temptation cometh to his mind”

5

The pleasure little and short.
 The followers grief and heaviness.<sup>593</sup>
 The loss of a better thing.
 This life a dream and a shadow.
 The death at our hand and unaware.
 10 The fear of impenitent departing.
 Eternal joy, eternal pain.
 The nature and dignity of man.
 The peace of a good mind.
 The “great” benefits of God.
 15 The “painful” cross of Christ.
 The witness of martyrs and example of saints.

“THE TWELVE WEAPONS have we more at length declared,<sup>594</sup> as it followeth.

THE PLEASURE LITTLE AND SHORT

170 Consider well the pleasure that thou hast:
 Stand it in touching or in wanton<sup>595</sup> sight,
 In vain smell or in thy lickerous tast,<sup>596</sup>
 Or finally in whatsoever delight
 Occupied is thy wretched appetite,
 175 Thou shalt it find, when thou hast all cast,<sup>597</sup>
 Little, simple, short, and suddenly past.

THE FOLLOWERS GRIEF AND HEAVINESS

Any good work if thou with labor do,
 The labor go’th, the goodness doth remain.
 15 If thou do evil with pleasure joined thereto,
 The pleasure which thine evil work doth contain Glideth his way; thou mayst him<sup>598</sup> not restrain.
 The evil then in thy breast cleaveth behind
 With grudge<sup>599</sup> of heart and heaviness of mind.

580 test 581 allowed to 582 Acts 9:15
 583 Transported 584 2 Cor 12:1–10
 585 safeguard 586 In contrast to 587 fault, censure, opprobrious behavior

588 topmost branch 589 superficial luster 590 (that) perhaps 591 us bereave wealth: strip us of well-being 592 To the status of 593 sadness 594 set forth

595 unrestrained; lewd 596 lickerous tast: pleasant or dainty taste 597 calculated, reckoned 598 the pleasure 599 discontent

20 THE LOSS OF A BETTER THING

When thou laborest thy pleasure for to buy,
Upon the price look thou thee well advise;<sup>600</sup>
Thou sellest thy soul therefor even by and by<sup>601</sup>
To thy most utter<sup>602</sup> despiteous enemies.

25 O mad merchant, O foolish merchandise,<sup>603</sup>
To buy a trifle — O childish reckoning<sup>604</sup> —
And pay therefor<sup>605</sup> so dear<sup>606</sup> a precious thing.

THIS LIFE A DREAM AND A SHADOW

This wretched life (the trust and confidence 30 Of whose continuance maketh us bold to sin)
Thou perceivest well by experience:
Since that hour in which it did begin,
It holdeth on the course and will not lin<sup>607</sup>
But fast it runneth on and passen shall<sup>608</sup>
35 As doth a dream or shadow on the wall.<sup>609</sup>

DEATH AT OUR HAND AND UNWARE<sup>610</sup>

Consider well that ever night and day
While that we busily provide and care
For our disport,<sup>611</sup> revel, mirth, and play, 40 For pleasant melody and dainty fare,<sup>612</sup>
Death stealeth on full slyly and unaware:
He lieth at hand and shall us enterprise<sup>613</sup>
We n'wot<sup>614</sup> how soon nor in what manner wise.<sup>615</sup>

FEAR OF IMPENITENT DEPARTING

45 If thou shouldest God offend, think how therefor<sup>616</sup>
Thou were forthwith in very jeopardous case
For haply<sup>617</sup> thou shouldest not live an hour more Thy sin to cleanse;<sup>618</sup> and though thou haddest space<sup>619</sup>
Yet peradventure<sup>620</sup> shouldest thou lack the grace.
50 Well ought we then be fear'd to done<sup>621</sup> offense
Impenitent lest we departen hence.

ETERNAL REWARD, ETERNAL PAIN

Thou seest this world is but a thoroughfare.
See thou behave thee wisely with thine host.

Hence must thou needs depart naked and bare 55
And after thy desert<sup>622</sup> look to what coast<sup>623</sup>
Thou art conveyed at such time as thy ghost<sup>624</sup>
From this wretched carcass shall dissever:
Be it joy or pain, endure it shall forever.

THE NATURE AND DIGNITY OF MAN 60

Remember how God hath made thee reasonable
Like unto his image and figure.<sup>625</sup>
And for thee suffered pains intolerable
That he for angel never would endure.
65 Regard, O man, thine excellent nature,
Thou that with angel art made to been equall,<sup>626</sup>
For very shame be not the devil's thrall.<sup>627</sup>

THE PEACE OF A GOOD MIND

Why lovest thou so this brittle<sup>628</sup> worldé's joy?
Take all the mirth, take all the fantasies, 70
Take every game, take every wanton<sup>629</sup> toy,
Take every sport<sup>630</sup> that men can thee devise,
And among them all on warrantise<sup>631</sup>
Thou shalt no pleasure comparable find
To th'inward gladness of a virtuous mind. 75

THE GREAT BENEFICES OF GOD

Besides that God thee bought and formed both,<sup>632</sup>
Many a benefit hast thou received of his:
Though thou have moved him often to be wroth
Yet he thee kept hath<sup>633</sup> and brought us up to this, 80
And daily calleth upon<sup>634</sup> thee to his bliss.
How mayst thou then to him unloving be
That ever hath been so loving unto thee?

THE PAINFUL CROSS OF CHRIST

When thou in flame of the temptation fry'st 85
Think on the very lamentable pain,
Think on the piteous cross of woeful Christ.
Think on his blood beat out at every vein,
Think on his precious heart carved in twain,<sup>635</sup>
90 Think how for thy redemption all was wrought:<sup>636</sup>
Let him not lose that he so dear<sup>637</sup> hath bought.

600 consider 601 even by and by: quite directly; right then and there 602 complete 603 transaction 604 calculation 605 for it 606 expensive, valuable 607 cease to do so 608 passen shall: will pass 609 See Ps 143(144):4; Eccl 6:12, 8:13; Ws 2:5; Plato's Republic 514a–518d. 610 unexpected; unnoticed 611 entertainment 612 dainty fare: choice foods

613 attack 614 do not know 615 man-ner wise: kind of way 616 on account of that 617 perhaps 618 Thy sin to cleanse: (in which to get) your sin absolved 619 i.e., time 620 perhaps 621 do 622 after thy desert: according to what you have merited 623 place 624 soul 625 See Gn 1:26–28. 626 been equall: be equal 627 slave 628 fragile; perishable;

unreliable 629 carefree; lustful 630 entertainment 631 on warrantise: it can be guaranteed 632 bought and formed both: both redeemed and created 633 thee kept hath: has kept (taken care) of you 634 calleth upon: invites 635 two 636 done 637 so dear: at such a high cost

THE WITNESS OF MARTYRS AND EXAMPLE OF SAINTS

Sin to withstand<sup>638</sup> say not thou lackest might:<sup>639</sup> 95 Such allegations<sup>640</sup> folly it is to use;
The witness of saints' and martyrs' constant fight
Shall thee of slothful cowardice accuse;
God will thee help if thou do not refuse.
If others have stood ere<sup>641</sup> this, thou mayst eftsone;<sup>642</sup> 100 Nothing impossible is that hath been done.

THE TWELVE "PROPERTIES OR" CONDITIONS<sup>643</sup> OF A LOVER

To love one alone and contemn<sup>644</sup> all others for that one.
To think him unhappy that is not with his love.
5 To adorn himself for the pleasure of his love.
To suffer all-thing, though<sup>645</sup> it were death, to be with his love.
To desire also to suffer harm for his love and to think that hurt sweet.
To be with his love ever<sup>646</sup> as he may, if not in deed, yet in thought.
To love all-thing that pertaineth unto his love.
10 To covet the praise of his love and not to suffer any dispraise.<sup>647</sup>
To believe of his love all things excellent and to desire that all folk should think the same.
To weep often with his love: in presence for joy, in absence for sorrow.
To languish ever and ever to burn in the desire of his love.
To serve his love, nothing thinking of any reward or profit.

"THE TWELVE PROPERTIES" 15
we have at length more openly<sup>648</sup> expressed in ballade<sup>649</sup> as it followeth.

The first point is to love but one alone
And for that one all others to forsake,<sup>650</sup>
For whoso loveth many, loveth none: 20
The flood that is in many channels take,<sup>651</sup>
In each of them shall feeble streames<sup>652</sup> make;
The love that is divided among many Uneath<sup>653</sup> sufficeth that every part have any.

So that thou hast thy love set unto God 25
In thy remembrance this imprint and grave:<sup>654</sup>
As he in sovereign dignity is odd<sup>655</sup>
So will he in love no parting fellows<sup>656</sup> have.
Love him therefore with all that he thee gave,
For body, soul, wit, cunning, mind, and thought 30
Part will he none, but either all or nought.<sup>657</sup>

THE SECOND PROPERTY

Of his love, lo, the sight and company
To the lover so glad and pleasant is
That whoso<sup>658</sup> hath the grace to come thereby 35
He judgeth him in perfect joy and bliss,
And whoso of that company doth miss,<sup>659</sup>
Live he in never so prosperous estate,<sup>660</sup>
He thinketh him wretched and infortunate.

So should the lover of God esteem that he 40
Which<sup>661</sup> all the pleasure hath, mirth and disport,<sup>662</sup>
That in this world is possible to be—
Yet till the time that he may once resort<sup>663</sup>
Unto that blessed joyful heavenly port
Where he of God may have the glorious sight— 45
Is void of perfect joy and sure delight.

THE THIRD PROPERTY

The third point of a perfect lover is
To make him fresh, to see that all-thing been Appointed<sup>664</sup> well and nothing set amiss 50
But all well-fashioned, proper, goodly, clean,
That in his person there be nothing seen

638 resist 639 power, ability 640 excuses 641 before 642 again
643 Characteristics 644 disregard 645 even if 646 always 647 suffer any dispraise: tolerate any denigrating (of his lover) 648 clearly 649 stanzaic verse (rhyme royal) 650 renounce, give up 651 carried 652 streams 653 Scarcely 654 engrave 655 matchless; unique; alone 656 parting fellows: partners;

sharers 657 nothing 658 whoever 659 of... miss: is lacking that company 660 condition or state 661 Who 662 entertainment 663 may once resort:
can finally go 664 Put in order, arranged

In speech, apparel, gesture, look, or pace<sup>665</sup>
That may offend or minish<sup>666</sup> any grace.

Half the dolor, grief, and adversity 90
That he already suffered hath for thee.

55 So thou that wilt<sup>667</sup> with God get into favor, Garnish<sup>668</sup> thyself up in as goodly wise<sup>669</sup> —
As comely<sup>670</sup> be as honest in behavior
As it is possible for thee to devise:
I mean not hereby that thou shouldest arise
60 And in the glass<sup>671</sup> upon thy body prowl<sup>672</sup>
But with fair virtue to adorn thy soul.

THE SIXTH PROPERTY
The perfect lover longeth for to be
In presence of his love both night and day,
And if it haply<sup>686</sup> so befall that he 95
May not as he would, he will yet as he may Ever be with his love: that is to say,
Where his heavy body n'ill<sup>687</sup> be brought
He will be conversant<sup>688</sup> in mind and thought.

THE FOURTH PROPERTY

If love be strong, hot, mighty, and fervent,
There may no trouble, grief, or sorrow fall<sup>673</sup>
65 But that the lover would be well content
All to endure and think it eke<sup>674</sup> too small,
Though<sup>675</sup> it were death, so he might therewithal<sup>676</sup>
The joyful presence of that person get
On whom he hath his heart and love i-set.<sup>677</sup>

Lo, in like manner the lover of God should 100
At the least in such wise as he may,
If he may not in such wise as he would,
Be present with God and conversant always,
For certes<sup>689</sup> whoso list,<sup>690</sup> he may purvey<sup>691</sup> — Though all the world would him there from 105
bereaven<sup>692</sup> —
To bear his body in earth, his mind in heaven.

70 Thus should of God the lover<sup>678</sup> be content
Any distress or sorrow to endure
Rather than to be from God absent,
And glad to die so<sup>679</sup> that he may be sure
By his departing hence for to procure 75 After this valley dark, the heavenly light,
And of his love, the glorious blessed sight.

THE SEVENTH PROPERTY

There is no page or servant, most or least,
That doth upon his love attend and wait —
There is no little worm, no simple beast, 110
Ne<sup>693</sup> none so small a trifle or conceit<sup>694</sup>
(Lace, girdle, point,<sup>695</sup> or proper glove strait<sup>696</sup>) —
But that if to his love it have been near,
The lover hath<sup>697</sup> it precious, lief,<sup>698</sup> and dear.

THE FIFTH PROPERTY

Not only a lover content is in his heart
But coveteth eke<sup>680</sup> and longeth to sustain 80 Some labor, incommodity, or smart,<sup>681</sup>
Loss, adversity, trouble, grief, or pain,
And of his sorrow joyful is and fain<sup>682</sup>
And happy thinketh himself that he may take
Some misadventure for his lover's sake.

So every relic, image, or picture 115
That doth pertain to God's magnificence,
The lover of God should with all busy cure<sup>699</sup>
Have<sup>700</sup> it in love, honor, and reverence,
And specially give them preeminence
Which,<sup>701</sup> daily done, his blessed Body wurch<sup>702</sup> 120
The quick<sup>703</sup> relics, the ministers of his Church.

85 Thus shouldest thou that lovest God also In thine heart wisse, covet, and be glad
For him to suffer trouble, pain, and woe,
For whom, if thou be never so woe-bestead,<sup>683</sup>
Yet thou ne shalt<sup>684</sup> sustain (be not a-dread<sup>685</sup>)

THE EIGHTH PROPERTY

A very<sup>704</sup> lover above all earthly thing
Coveteth and longeth evermore to hear
Th' honor, laud, commendation, and praising, 125

665 gait; manner of movement

666 diminish 667 want to 668 Spruce; clothe in an elegant fashion 669 a way 670 attractive 671 mirror 672 carefully inspect 673 come; happen 674 moreover, also 675 Even if 676 along with it 677 set 678 of God the lover: the lover of God 679 provided 680 in addition 681 incommodity, or smart:

inconvenience, or pain 682 glad 683 never so woe-bestead: no matter how beset by affliction 684 ne shalt: shall not 685 afraid 686 by chance; perhaps 687 will not 688 speaking and interacting with, dwelling habitually 689 certainly 690 whoso list: whoever wants to 691 arrange; make plans 692 deprive him

693 Nor 694 ornament 695 needle-point; embroidery 696 tight-fitting 697 holds 698 beloved 699 concern 700 Holds 701 Who 702 works; i.e., makes (at the Consecration) 703 living 704 true

And everything that may the fame clear<sup>705</sup>
 Of his love; he may in no manner
 Endure to hear that therefrom mighten vary<sup>706</sup>
 Or anything sound into<sup>707</sup> the contrary.

130 The lover of God should covet in like wise<sup>708</sup>
 To hear his honor, worship, laud, and praise, Whose sovereign goodness none heart may comprise,<sup>709</sup>
 Whom hell, earth, and all the heaven obeys,
 Whose perfect lover ought by no manner ways<sup>710</sup>
 135 To suffer<sup>711</sup> the cursed words of blasphemy
 Or anything spoken of God unreverently.

THE NINTH PROPERTY

A very lover believeth in his mind
 On whomsoever he hath his heart i-bent<sup>712</sup>
 140 That in that person men may nothing find
 But honorable, worthy, and excellent,
 And eke<sup>713</sup> surmounting far in his intent
 All others that he hath known by sight or name,
 And would that every man should think the same.

145 Of God likewise so wonderful and high All-thing esteem and judge his lover ought —
 So reverence, worship, honor, and magnify<sup>714</sup> —
 That all the creatures in this world i-wrought<sup>715</sup>
 In comparison should he set at nought<sup>716</sup>
 150 And glad be if he might the means devise
 That all the world would think in like wise.<sup>717</sup>

THE TENTH PROPERTY

The lover is of color dead and pale;
 There will no sleep into his eyen stalk;<sup>718</sup>
 155 He savoreth neither meat, wine, nor ale;
 He mindeth not what men about him talk;
 But eat he, drink he, sit, lie down, or walk,
 He burneth ever as it were with a fire
 In the fervent heat of his desire.

160 Here should the lover of God ensample<sup>719</sup> take
 To have him continually in remembrance,

With him in prayer and meditation wake<sup>720</sup>
 While others play, revel, sing, and dance:
 None earthly joy, disport,<sup>721</sup> or vain pleasance<sup>722</sup>
 Should him delight, or anything remove 165 His ardent mind from God, his heavenly love.

THE ELEVENTH PROPERTY

Diversely passioned is the lover's heart:
 Now pleasant hope, now dread and grievous fere;<sup>723</sup>
 Now perfect bliss, now bitter sorrow smart.<sup>724</sup> 170
 And whether his love be with him or eléewhere,
 Oft from his eyen there falleth many a tere:<sup>725</sup>
 For very joy, when they together be;
 When they be sundered, for adversity.

Like affectionés<sup>726</sup> feeleth eke<sup>727</sup> the breast 175 Of Godé's lover in prayer and meditation:
 When that his love liketh in him rest<sup>728</sup>
 With inward gladness of pleasant contemplation,
 Out break the tears for joy and delectation;<sup>729</sup>
 And when his love list eft<sup>730</sup> to part him fro, 180 Out break the tears again for pain and woe.

THE TWELFTH PROPERTY

A very<sup>731</sup> lover will his love obey:
 His joy it is and all his appetite
 To pain himself in all that ever he may 185 That person in whom he set hath<sup>732</sup> his delight
 Diligently to serve both day and night
 For very love, without any regard
 To any profit, guerdon,<sup>733</sup> or reward.

So thou likewise that hast thine heart i-set<sup>734</sup> 190
 Upward to God, so well thyself endeavor,
 So studiously, that nothing may thee let<sup>735</sup>
 Nor from his service any wise dissever:<sup>736</sup> Freely, look eke<sup>737</sup> thou serve — that thereto<sup>738</sup> never Trust of reward or profit do thee bind
 195 But only faithful heart and loving mind. ▽

Wageless to serve, three thingés may us move:<sup>739</sup>
 First, if the service self<sup>740</sup> be desirable;

705 i.e., make clear or known 706 be at odds with 707 sound into: spoken to 708 manner 709 comprehend 710 by no manner ways: in no kind of way 711 tolerate 712 bent 713 moreover; also 714 praise 715 wrought, made 716 set at nought: regard as nothing

717 in like wise: the same way 718 eyen stalk: eyes enter stealthily 719 example 720 keep vigil 721 entertainment 722 pleasure 723 fear 724 keen 725 tear 726 emotions 727 also 728 liketh... rest: desires to remain 729 delight 730 list eft: chooses

afterward 731 true 732 set hath: has placed 733 recompense 734 set 735 hinder 736 any wise dissever: in any way cut you off 737 also 738 i.e., to his service 739 Wageless... move: Three things may motivate us to serve without pay 740 itself

200 Second, if they whom that we serve and love
 Be very good and very amiable;
 Thirdly, <sup>741</sup>of reason be we serviceable<sup>742</sup>
 Without the gaping after any<sup>743</sup> more<sup>744</sup>
 To such as<sup>744</sup> have done much for us before.
 205 Serve God for love then, not for hope of meed.<sup>745</sup>
 What service may so desirable be
 As where all turneth to thine own speed?<sup>746</sup>
 Who is so good, so lovely eke,<sup>747</sup> as he
 Who hath already done so much for thee?
 As he that first thee made, and on the rood<sup>748</sup>
 210 Eft<sup>749</sup> thee redeemed with his precious blood?

More is thy mercy far than all our sin:
 To give<sup>761</sup> them also that unworthy be 25 More godly is, <sup>762</sup>and more mercy therein.
 Howbeit, worthy enough are they, pardie,<sup>762</sup>
 Be they never so<sup>763</sup> unworthy, whom that he List<sup>764</sup> to accept, which wheresoever he taketh
 Whom he unworthy findeth, worthy maketh.<sup>765</sup> 30
 Wherefore, <sup>766</sup>good Lord, that ay<sup>766</sup> merciful art, Unto thy grace and sovereign dignity
 We seely<sup>767</sup> wretches cry with humble heart:
 Our sin forget and our malignity; <sup>768</sup>
 35 With piteous eyes of thy benignity Friendly look on us once;<sup>768</sup> thine own we be,
 Servants or sinners, whether it liketh thee.

A PRAYER OF PICO MIRANDOLA UNTO GOD

O holy God of dreadful<sup>750</sup> majesty,
 Verily one in three and three in one,
 5 Whom angels serve, whose work all creatures be,
 Which<sup>751</sup> heaven and earth directest all alone:
 We thee beseech, good Lord, with woeful moan,
 Spare us wretches and wash away our guilt
 That we be not by thy just anger spilt.<sup>752</sup>
 10 In strait balance<sup>753</sup> of rigorous judgment
 If thou shouldest our sin ponder and weigh,
 Who able were to bear thy punishment?<sup>754</sup>
 The whole engine<sup>755</sup> of all this world, <sup>756</sup>I say,
 The engine that endure shall for ay,<sup>756</sup>
 15 <sup>757</sup>With such examination<sup>757</sup> might not stand <sup>758</sup>Space of a moment<sup>757</sup> in<sup>758</sup> thine angry hand.
 Who is not born in sin original?
 Who doth not actual<sup>758</sup> sin in sundry wise?<sup>759</sup>
 But thou, good Lord, art he that sparest all 20 With piteous mercy tempering justice;
 For as thou dost rewardés us devise Above our merit,<sup>760</sup> so dost thou dispense Thy punishment far under our offense.

Sinners, if thou our crime behold certain,
 Our crime, the work of our uncourteous mind,
 But if thy giftés thou behold again<sup>769</sup> — 40
 Thy giftés noble, wonderful, and kind — Thou shalt us then the same personés find
 Which<sup>770</sup> are to thee, and have be long space,<sup>771</sup> Servants by nature, children by thy grace.
 But this thy goodness wringeth<sup>772</sup> us, alas; 45
 For we whom grace had made thy children dear
 Are made thy guilty folk by our trespass.
 Sin hath us guilty made this many a year,
 But let thy grace, thy grace that hath no peer,
 Of our offense surmounten all the preace<sup>773</sup> 50
 That in our sin thine honor may increase.
 For though thy wisdom, though thy sovereign power,
 May otherwise appear sufficiently —
 As thingés which thy creatures every hour
 All with one voice declare and testify 55
 Thy goodness — yet thy singular mercy,
 Thy piteous heart, thy gracious indulgence
 Nothing so clearly showeth as our offense.

741 of reason: as is reasonable 742 ready and willing to do service 743 gaping... any: striving after anything 744 such as: those who 745 reward; pay 746 success 747 lovely eke: lovable also 748 cross 749 Afterwards 750 awe-inspiring 751 Who 752 destroyed 753 In strait balance: On a strict scale 754 See Ps 129(130):3, 142(143):2. 755 whole engine: universal frame 756 forever 757 Space... moment: Even for a moment 758 personally committed, as opposed to inherited (original) 759 sundry wise: many different ways 760 rewardés... merit: provide us rewards beyond what we deserve 761 give to 762 from "by God" (French); certainly 763 never so: no matter how 764 Chooses 765 which... he

maketh: who, (referring to God) no matter where or how unworthy he finds them, God makes them worthy 766 always 767 poor; pitiful 768 under any circumstance; as an emphatic: simply 769 in turn 770 Who 771 be... space: been for a long time 772 pains 773 distress; difficulty

What but our sin hath showed that mighty love,
 60 Which able was thy dreadful majesty
 To draw down into earth from heaven above
 And crucify God, that we, poor wretches we,
 Should from our filthy sin i-cleanséd<sup>774</sup> be
 With blood and water of thine own side<sup>775</sup>
 65 That streaméd from thy blessed woundés wide.<sup>776</sup>

Thy love and pity thus, O heavenly King,
 Our evil maketh matter of<sup>777</sup> thy goodness.
 O love, O pity, our wealth ay providing,<sup>778</sup>
 O goodness, serving thy servants "in distress," 70 O love, O pity, well nigh now thankless,
 O goodness "mighty, gracious, and wise" —
 And yet almost now vanquished with our vice —

Grant, I thee pray, such heat into mine heart
 That to this love of thine may be egall;<sup>779</sup>

Grant me from Satana's service to astart<sup>780</sup> 75
 With whom me rueth<sup>781</sup> so long to have be thrall;
 Grant me, "good Lord and Creator of all,"
 The flame to quench of all sinful desire
 And in thy love set all mine heart afire,

That when the journey of this deadly<sup>782</sup> life 80
 My seely ghost<sup>783</sup> hath finished, and thence Departen must "without his fleshly wife,<sup>784</sup>"
 Alone, into his Lordés "high" presence,
 He may thee find, "O well of indulgence,"
 "In thy lordship" not as a lord, but rather 85
 As "a very tender loving" father.
 "Amen."

Imprinted at London by John Rastell dwelling at the Fleet Bridge at the Abbot of Winchcombe, his<sup>785</sup> place. 90

774 cleansed 775 Jn 19:34 776 i.e., far and wide 777 for 778 ay providing: always arranging for 779 equal 780 escape 781 me rueth:

 I regret 782 mortal 783 seely ghost:

poor soul 784 fleshly wife: i.e., the body 785 Winchcombe, his: Winchcombe's

The History of King Richard III

Unpublished during More's life, The History of Richard the Third exists in two distinct versions, English and Latin. According to William Rastell, who published the English text in the 1557 Workes, More wrote the History "about 1513," while serving as undersheriff of London. Although More may have started the History in 1513, he worked on it until at least 1514, and likely through 1518, if not beyond (CW 2: lxv). After More's death in 1535, the English History circulated in manuscript before it was incorporated, with corruptions, into the English chronicle histories of John Harding and Edward Hall. A more accurate English version was not published until Rastell's 1557 edition, while the Latin version first saw print in the 1565 Opera omnia. Both versions are apparently unfinished.

As early biographer Thomas Stapleton relates, More "studied with avidity all the historical works he could find," both contemporary and classical. Following Cicero, Renaissance humanists understood history as a part of rhetoric, especially demonstrative rhetoric. For More, the classical historians provide the best models for imitation, particularly Sallust and Tacitus, and help explain why More was less concerned with modern "accuracy" in certain details. After Sallust and Tacitus, St. Augustine emerges as another major influence on More's understanding of history. More lectured publicly on The City of God in London in 1501, "not from a theological point of view, but from the standpoint of history and philosophy," as Stapleton relates.

In humanist fashion, More's imitatio is more creative than simple repetition or echoing. As Petrarch wrote of imitation, "we must write just as bees make honey, not keeping the flowers but turning them into a sweetness of our own, blending many different flavors into one." Articulating what More "turns" his sources into through the History remains the reader's challenge, an invitation to consider what's uniquely Morean about this artful "blending."

More's History is mediated through its narrator, whose ironic voice suggests that discovering the truth will prove a challenge. The narrator introduces characters, makes asides, and relates what he has heard from various sources. He also conveys a sense of limits: "But of all this point there is no certainty," he admits regarding one question, "and whosoever divines upon conjectures may as well shoot too far as too short." Throughout the History, the narrator frequently withholds his judgment, and instead offers the reader two or more possibilities, leaving interpretation open. Confronted with multiple possibilities, readers must consider matters carefully and exercise their own judgment. As More contends in his 1518 "Letter to Oxford University," such serious study of history and literature helps foster "prudence in human affairs," and even "prepares the soul for virtue."

Throughout the History, More is further concerned with the questions of fate, freedom, and law. Considering how Richard obtained the office of Protector, for example, the narrator asks whether Richard rose through "destiny" or "folly," and leaves the question unanswered. Another emphasis in the History is the role law plays in Richard's unfolding tyranny. The "sanctuary scene," for example, raises questions about the purposes of law, the relationship between various kinds of law (divine law, natural law, and positive law), and the relationship between law and royal power. An experienced lawyer and judge, the author brings to bear the historical knowledge and practice of law, well aware of its abuses. However one approaches this work, More's History remains a provocative study of tyranny, a representation of a country and characters in the throes of violence — and in need of a renaissance.

Note on the text: Our text of the English History follows Richard Sylvester's edition in CW 2, based on Rastell's text from the 1557 Workes — with references to its many proverbs given by Andrea Frank. See her "Proverbs and Irony: Their Literary Role in Thomas More's Richard III" (Moreana nos. 195–96 [June 2014]: 211–36). For the Latin text and translation, see CW 15. The Latin text is also available on-line at www.essentialmore.org. More's History would go on to serve as a major source for Shakespeare's tragedy.

The History of King Richard III

DATES

- 28 June 1461: Edward IV is crowned king.
- 1 May 1464: Edward secretly marries Elizabeth Grey.
- 9 April 1483: Edward IV dies at Westminster.
- 24 April: Edward V and his escort depart Wales for London.
- 30 April or 1 May: Anthony Woodville, Richard Grey, and Thomas Vaughan are arrested by Richard; Elizabeth Woodville, Edward IV's queen, enters sanctuary with her younger son.
- 10 May: Richard is named Lord Protector.
- 19 May: Edward V enters the Tower of London.
- 13 June: Hastings is executed and Bishop Morton is arrested.
- 16 June: Edward V's younger brother Richard is removed from sanctuary and enters the Tower.
- 22 June: Dr. Shaw preaches a sermon which describes Edward IV's children as illegitimate.
- 24 June: The Duke of Buckingham gives a speech at the Guildhall supporting Richard's claim.
- 25 June: Anthony Woodville, Richard Grey, and Thomas Vaughan are executed.
- 25 or 26 June: Buckingham publicly offers Richard the crown at Baynard's Castle.
- 26 June: Richard accepts the crown at Westminster Hall.
- 6 July: Richard III is formally crowned.
- 22 August 1485: Richard is killed at Bosworth Field.

CONTENTS

Background to Richard's rise; Edward IV's rule and deathbed speech. . . . .	99
Richard's strategy to get control over young Edward V . . . . .	104
The Queen and her son Prince Richard enter sanctuary . . . . .	106
The Queen and the Cardinal debate . . . . .	112
How Richard extends his control; the demise of Hastings . . . . .	115
"Digression" on Jane Shore . . . . .	121
Richard's next step to "put himself in possession of the crown": deny legitimacy of Queen Elizabeth's marriage to Edward IV . . . . .	123
Richard's and Buckingham's "performance" at Guildhall . . . . .	127
"Kings' games... played upon scaffolds"; the "mockish election" . . . . .	133
Murder of the young princes in the Tower of London; aftermath . . . . .	135
Buckingham turns against Richard; Bishop Morton's role . . . . .	136

KINGS AND NOBLES

King Edward IV, oldest son of Richard Duke of York
Edward, Prince of Wales, later King Edward V; oldest son of Edward IV
Richard, Duke of York, second son of Edward IV
George, Duke of Clarence, second son of Richard Duke of York
Richard, Duke of Gloucester, youngest son of Richard Duke of York, later King Richard III
Henry, Earl of Richmond, later King Henry VII
Henry, Duke of Buckingham, Richard's principal collaborator
Richard Neville, Earl of Warwick, "King Maker"
Lord William Hastings, King Edward's Chamberlain
Lord Thomas Stanley, Steward of Edward IV's household

QUEENS AND NOBLES

Queen Elizabeth, wife of Edward IV; formerly Lady Grey Lord Rivers, Sir Anthony Woodville, her brother; arrested and beheaded
Lord Richard Grey, her second son by Squire John Grey; arrested and beheaded Marquis of Dorset, Thomas Grey, her oldest son by Squire John Grey Lord Thomas Vaughan, relative of the Queen; counselor to Edward IV; arrested and beheaded
Duchess of York, mother of Edward IV, Clarence, and Richard III
Elizabeth Lucy, mistress of Edward IV; known only as "a girl of noble blood"
Elizabeth of York, wife of Henry VII, daughter of Edward IV

CLERGY

Cardinal Bouchier, Archbishop of Canterbury
Archbishop of York, Thomas Rotherham
Bishop of Ely, John Morton, Thomas More's early patron; see Utopia, Book 1
Bishop of London, John Russell
Doctor Shaa, brother of Mayor Shaa, doctor of divinity
Friar Penker, Provincial of Augustinian Friars

CITIZENS

Edmund Shaa, Mayor of London
Sir William Catesby, lawyer; manager of Hastings's estates
Jane Shore, wife of William Shore; mistress of Edward IV, then of Lord Hastings
Sir John Markham, Chief Justice under Edward IV; resigned rather than illicitly cooperate against Cook
Sir Thomas Cook, a prosperous Londoner brought to trial for political reasons
Thomas Fitzwilliam, Recorder of London
Sir Richard Radcliff, strong supporter of Richard; brother-in-law to Catesby
Sir Robert Brackenbury, Constable of the Tower
Sir James Tyrell, coordinates murder of princes
John Dighton, Tower guard of the princes, enlisted by Tyrell to perform princes' murder
Miles Forest, Tyrell's horsekeeper, enlisted to perform princes' murder

I made match to coulen the people.

Innocent. 4. c. 2.

the king (so) so was he from that time called) and the people departed, talking diversie of the matter, euerie man as his fantasie gaue him. But much they talked and marvelled of the manner of this dealing, that the matter was on both parts made so strange, as though neither had euer commured with other thereof before, when that themselves with there was no man so dull that heard them, but he persecuted well enough that all the matter was made betwixt them. Whobreit some excused that againe, and said all must be done in god order though: and men must sometime for the manners sake, not be abashed what they know though it be hard to outreach the circumpect, wisse, & vigilant minded man; as the poet saith:

non facile est illis

Decipere Pyscom.]

For: at the consecration of a bishop, euerie man lootech well by the pating for his buis, that be purpo-seth to be one, & though he paie for nothing else. And yet must he be thuse asked whether he will be bishop or no, and he must thuse saie naie. and the thero time take it, as compelled thereto by his owne will. And in a stage plaie, all the people know right well, that one plaing the Soldan, is scarce a soliter; yet if one should can so little god, to thero out of season that acquaintance he hath with him, and call him by his owne name while he standeth in his maiestie, one of his tormentors might hap to breake his head (and soothie) for marring of the plaie. And so they said, that these matters be things games, as it were stage plaies, and for the more part plaied upon scaffolds, in which some men be but the lookers on. And they that wisse be will meddle no further. For they that sometime they vp, and plaie with them, when they can not plaie their parts, they disorder the plaie, and do themselves no good.

Thus saure Edward the fift, who was neuer king crowned, but shamefullie by his vnckle slaine, as in the processe following appeereth.

Richard the third, third sonne to Richard duke of Yorke, and vnckle to Edward the fift.

Anno Reg. 1483

1483

¶ This that is here be- come this marke is thus made: (¶) was not written by meister

More in this

biliope written by him in English, but is translated out of the

those which he wrote in Latine,

more in this

biliope written by him in English, but is translated out of the

those which he wrote in Latine,

more in this

biliope written by him in English, but is translated out of the

those which he wrote in Latine,

more in this

biliope written by him in English, but is translated out of the

those which he wrote in Latine,

more in this

biliope written by him in English, but is translated out of the

those which he wrote in Latine,

more in this

biliope written by him in English, but is translated out of the

those which he wrote in Latine,

more in this

biliope written by him in English, but is translated out of the

those which he wrote in Latine,

more in this

biliope written by him in English, but is translated out of the

those which he wrote in Latine,

more in this

biliope written by him in English, but is translated out of the

those which he wrote in Latine,

more in this

biliope written by him in English, but is translated out of the

those which he wrote in Latine,

more in this

biliope written by him in English, but is translated out of the

those which he wrote in Latine,

more in this

biliope written by him in English, but is translated out of the

those which he wrote in Latine,

more in this

biliope written by him in English, but is translated out of the

those which he wrote in Latine,

more in this

biliope written by him in English, but is translated out of the

those which he wrote in Latine,

more in this

biliope written by him in English, but is translated out of the

those which he wrote in Latine,

more in this

biliope written by him in English, but is translated out of the

those which he wrote in Latine,

The next daie the protector with a great traine went to Westminister hall, & there when he had placed himselfe in the court of the Kings bench, declared to the audience, that he would take upon him the crowne in that place there, where the king himselfe sitteth and ministreth the laie, because he considered that it was the chiefest dutie of a king to ministre the laies. Then with as pleasant an oration as he could, he went about to win vnto him the nobles, the merchants, the artificers, and in conclusion all kind of men, but especially the lawyers of this realme. And finally, to the intent that no man should hate him for feare, and that his decessfull clemencie might get him the god will of the people, then he had declared the discommodities of discord, & the comodities of concord & unitie, he made an open proclamation, that he did put out of his mind all enimitie, and that he there did openlie pardon all offenses committed against him.

And to the intent that he might thin a prowe thereof, he commanded that one Fog, whom he had long deadlie hated, should be brought then before him, who being brought out of the sanctuarie (so) thither had he fled for feare of him) in the sight of the people, he take him by the hand, which thing the common people reioiced at, and praised, but wisse men take it for a banitic. In his returne homeward, whom so euer he met, he saluted, for a man that knoweth it selfe guiltie, is in a manner detested to a seruile flatterie (which refuseth no dutifullnesse, tend the same to neuer to his a degree of indignitie; which one noteth, saieing:

rides & maure cubanos

Concatur, fiet, flachrymas efficit emic;

Frigidus? friget? flachrymas efficit emic.]

When he had begun his reigne in the month of June, after this mockish election, then was he crowned king in the verie same month. And that solemnitie was furnished, for the most part, with the selfe same pponction that was appointed for the coronation of his nephew. (¶) But here to shew the manner of his coronation, as the same is inserted in this pamphlet of the Thomas More, by meister Edward Hall and Richard Grafton (although not found in the same pamphlet) thus we find it by them reported.

(¶) First, to be sure of all enimitie (as he thought) he sent for five thousand men of the north against his coronation, which came by euill apparell, and woofe barnished, in rustie barnesse, neither defensible, nor scouered to the sale, which mustered in fustinarie field to the great dishaie of the lookers on. (¶) By which beginning it appeared to the world that he had his state in suspicion, otherwisse he would not have procured such a power to be attendant at his commandment, and that at such time as (all weapons laid aside peace and tranquillitie should have bene sought after for the comforts of the peoples minds, & the safetie of his owne person, but being verie mistrustfull & fraught with carefull thoughts, he was in a maye betwixt hope and feare, according to this verie true saieing:

From the marke (¶) is found in the Thomas More, but on neither Hall and Grafton.

Holinshed's Chronicles, 1587 (the edition Shakespeare would have used), p. 732, credits Thomas More in its marginal notes, indicating what portion is translated from his Latin Richardi Tertii and what portion is taken from Hall's and Grafton's edition of More's English History of King Richard III.

The History of King Richard III

(unfinished), written by Master Thomas More, then one of the undersheriffs of London, about the year of our Lord 1513. Which work hath been before this

5 time printed, in Harding's Chronicle and in Hall's Chronicle, but very much corrupt in many places, sometimes having less and sometimes having more, and altered in words and whole sentences, much varying from the copy of his own hand, by which this is printed.

10 King Edward of that name the Fourth, after that he had lived fifty and three years, seven months, and six days, and thereof<sup>2</sup> reigned two and twenty years, one month, and eight days, died at Westminster the ninth day of April, the year of our redemption a 15 thousand four hundred fourscore and three, leaving much fair issue, that is to wit,<sup>3</sup> Edward the Prince,<sup>4</sup> a thirteen year of age; Richard Duke of York, two years younger; Elizabeth, whose fortune and grace was after to be queen, wife unto King Henry the 20 Seventh and mother unto the Eighth; Cecily, not so fortunate as fair; Bridget, which,<sup>5</sup> representing<sup>6</sup> the virtue of her whose name she bore, professed and observed a religious life in Dartford, a house of close<sup>7</sup> nuns; Anne, that<sup>8</sup> was after honorably mar-
25 ried unto Thomas, then Lord Howard, and after Earl of Surrey; and Katherine, which<sup>9</sup> long-time tossed in either fortune — sometimes in wealth, oft in adversity<sup>10</sup> — at the last (if this be the last, for yet she liveth) is by the benignity of her nephew King
30 Henry the Eighth in very prosperous estate, and worthy her birth and virtue.

This noble prince deceased at his palace of Westminster, and with great funeral honor and heaviness<sup>11</sup> of his people from thence conveyed, was interred at 35 Windsor: a king of such governance and behavior

in time of peace (for in war each party must needs be other's enemy) that there was never any prince of this land attaining the crown by battle so heartily beloved with the substance<sup>12</sup> of the people, nor he himself so specially<sup>13</sup> in any part of his life as at the 40 time of his death. Which<sup>14</sup> favor and affection yet after his decease, by the cruelty, mischief, and trouble of the tempestuous world that followed, highly toward him more increased. At such time as he died, the displeasure of those that bore him grudge for 45 King Henry's sake the Sixth, whom he deposed, was well assuaged, and in effect quenched, in that that many of them were dead in more than twenty years of his reign, a great part of a long life — and many of them in the mean season<sup>15</sup> grown into his favor, of 50 which he was never strange.<sup>16</sup> He was a goodly personage and very princely to behold; of heart courageous, politic<sup>17</sup> in counsel; in adversity nothing abashed, in prosperity rather joyful than proud; in 55 peace just and merciful, in war sharp and fierce; in the field bold and hardy, and nevertheless no farther than wisdom would, adventurous.<sup>18</sup> Whose<sup>19</sup> wars whoso<sup>20</sup> well consider, he shall no less commend his wisdom where he voided,<sup>21</sup> than his manhood where he vanquished. He was of visage lovely, of 60 body mighty, strong, and clean-made,<sup>22</sup> howbeit<sup>23</sup> in

1 after that: after 2 of all that time (Edward in fact died at age forty.) 3 say 4 the Prince: the Crown Prince, first in line for the throne 5 who 6 demonstrating, showing 7 cloistered 8 who 9 who 10 either... adversity: Whit F523; Til F606

11 heavy-heartedness, sadness 12 with the substance: by the majority 13 especially (beloved) 14 This (a continuative relative pronoun; see Preface, p. xviii) 15 mean season: meantime 16 stinting, miserly 17 prudent; shrewd; crafty 18 no...

adventurous: no more than it would be wise for him to be bold or seeking adventures 19 i.e., Edward's (a continuative relative) 20 whoever 21 withdrew; retreated 22 properly; proportioned 23 although his latter days with over-liberal diet somewhat corpulent and burly, and nevertheless not uncomely; he was of<sup>24</sup> youth greatly given to fleshly wantonness, from which health of body in great prosperity and fortune, without a special grace, hardly refraineth. This fault not greatly grieved the people, for neither could any one man's pleasure stretch and extend to the displeasure of very many, and was without violence, and, over<sup>25</sup> that, in his latter days, lessed<sup>26</sup> and well left. In which time of his latter days, this realm was in quiet and prosperous estate: no fear of outward enemies, no war in hand, nor none toward,<sup>27</sup> but such as no man looked for; the people toward<sup>28</sup> the prince, not in a constrained fear, but in a willing and loving obedience; among themselves, the commons<sup>29</sup> in good peace. The lords whom he knew at variance,<sup>30</sup> himself in his deathbed appeased. He had left all gathering of money (which is the only thing that withdraweth the hearts of Englishmen from the prince), nor anything intended he to take in hand, by which he should be driven thereto, for his tribute out of France he had before obtained, and the year foregoing his death, he had obtained Berwick.<sup>31</sup>

And albeit that<sup>32</sup> all the time of his reign, he was with his people so benign, courteous, and so familiar that no part of his virtues was more esteemed, yet that condition in the end of his days (in which many princes by a long-continued sovereignty decline into a proud port<sup>33</sup> from debonair<sup>34</sup> behavior of their beginning) marvelously in him grew and increased: so far-forth that in the summer, the last that ever he saw, his Highness being at Windsor<sup>35</sup> in hunting, sent for the mayor and aldermen of London to him for none other errand but to have them hunt and be merry with him, where he made them not so stately, but so friendly and so familiar cheer, and sent venison from thence so freely into the city, that no one thing in many days before got him either more hearts or more hearty favor among the common people, which oftentimes more esteem and take for greater kindness a little courtesy than a great benefit.

So deceased (as I have said) this noble king in that time in which his life was most desired. Whose<sup>36</sup> love of his people and their entire affection toward him had been to his noble children (having in themselves also as many gifts of nature, as many princely virtues, as much goodly towardness,<sup>37</sup> as their age could receive) a marvelous fortress and sure armor, if division and dissension of their friends had not unarmed them and left them destitute, and the execrable desire of sovereignty provoked him to their destruction which, if either kind or kindness had holden place,<sup>38</sup> must needs have been their chief defense.<sup>39</sup> For Richard the Duke of Gloucester, by nature their uncle, by office their protector, to their father beholden, to themselves by oath and allegiance bounden, all the bands broken that binden man and man together, without any respect of God or the world, unnaturally contrived to bereave them<sup>40</sup> not only their dignity, but also their lives. But forasmuch as<sup>41</sup> this duke's demeanor ministreth<sup>42</sup> in effect all the whole matter whereof this book shall entreat,<sup>43</sup> it is therefore convenient<sup>44</sup> somewhat to show you, ere<sup>45</sup> we farther go, what manner of man this was, that could find in his heart so much mischief to conceive.

Richard Duke of York, a noble man and a mighty, began not by war, but by law, to challenge the crown, putting his claim into the Parliament, where his cause was either for right or favor<sup>46</sup> so far-forth advanced that, King Henry his blood<sup>47</sup> (albeit he<sup>48</sup> had a goodly prince) utterly rejected, the crown was by authority of Parliament entailed<sup>49</sup> unto the Duke of York and his issue male in remainder<sup>50</sup> immediately after the death of King Henry. But the Duke, not enduring so long to tarry, but intending, under pretext of dissension and debate arising in the realm, to prevent<sup>51</sup> his time and to take upon him the rule in King Harry his<sup>52</sup> life, was with many nobles of the realm at Wakefield<sup>53</sup> slain, leaving three sons: Edward, George, and Richard.

All three as they were great states of<sup>54</sup> birth, so were they great and stately of stomach,<sup>55</sup> greedy and

24 since his 25 besides 26 lessened
27 impending 28 in service to 29 commoners 30 dispute, state of discord
31 Berwick Castle, on the Scottish border 32 albeit that: although 33 deportment, bearing 34 gracious 35 Windsor, about twenty miles from London, was an important royal residence. 36 Edward's 37 aptitude, disposition 38 which...

place: who, if either nature or kinship had prevailed 39 the execrable... defense:
Whit D167 40 them of 41 forasmuch
as: because 42 provides 43 treat 44 appropriate 45 before 46 either... favor: Til R126 47 King Henry his blood:
(with) King Henry's bloodline, descendants 48 King Henry VI 49 bestowed in such a way that the designated person may not bequeath the possessions to others 50 a legal property right that comes into existence only upon the death of the heir 51 act before 52 Harry his: Harry's (i.e., King Henry's) 53 a battle in Yorkshire, on December 30, 1460 54 states of:

noblemen by 55 stately of stomach: proud in disposition

ambitious of authority, and impatient of partners. Edward, revenging his father's death, deprived<sup>56</sup> King Henry and attained the crown. George Duke of Clarence was a goodly noble prince and at all points fortunate, if either his own ambition had not set him against his brother, or the envy of his enemies, his brother against him. For were it by the Queen and the lords of her blood, which highly maligned the King's kindred (as women commonly, not of malice but of nature, hate them whom their husbands love),<sup>57</sup> or were it a proud appetite of the Duke himself intending to be king, at the leastwise heinous treason was there laid to his charge, and finally, were he faulty, were he faultless, attainted<sup>58</sup> was he by Parliament, and judged to the death, and thereupon hastily drowned in a butt of malmsey,<sup>59</sup> whose death King Edward (albeit he commanded it), when he wist<sup>60</sup> it was done, piteously bewailed and sorrowfully repented.

Richard, the third son, of whom we now entreat,<sup>61</sup> was in wit and courage equal with either of them, in body and prowess<sup>62</sup> far under them both: little of stature, ill-featured of limbs, crookbacked,<sup>63</sup> his left shoulder much higher than his right, hard-favored<sup>64</sup> of visage, and such as is in states<sup>65</sup> called warly,<sup>66</sup> in other men otherwise. He was malicious, wrathful, envious, and, from afore his birth, ever froward.<sup>67</sup> It is for truth reported that the duchess his mother had so much ado in her travail<sup>68</sup> that she could not be delivered of him uncut, and that he came into the world with the feet forward,<sup>69</sup> as men be borne outward,<sup>70</sup> and (as the fame runneth) also not untoothed — whether men of hatred report above the truth,<sup>71</sup> or else that nature changed her course in his beginning, which<sup>72</sup> in the course of his life many things unnaturally committed.

None evil<sup>73</sup> captain was he in the war, as to which his disposition was more meetly<sup>74</sup> than for peace. Sundry victories had he, and sometimes overthrows, but never in default<sup>75</sup> as for his own person,<sup>76</sup> either of hardiness or politic order. Free was he called of dispense,<sup>77</sup> and somewhat above his power liberal;<sup>78</sup> with large gifts he got him unsteadfast friendship, for which he was fain to pill and spoil<sup>79</sup> in other places, and get him steadfast hatred.

He was close<sup>80</sup> and secret, a deep dissimuler,<sup>81</sup> lowly of countenance,<sup>82</sup> arrogant of heart, outwardly companionable<sup>83</sup> where he inwardly hated,<sup>84</sup> not letting<sup>85</sup> to kiss whom he thought to kill:<sup>86</sup> spiteous and cruel, not for evil will always, but offer for ambition, and either for the surety or increase of his estate. Friend and foe was muchwhat<sup>87</sup> indifferent: where his advantage grew, he spared no man's death whose life withstood his purpose. He slew with his own hands King Henry the Sixth, being prisoner in the Tower, as men constantly say, and that without commandment or knowledge of the King, which<sup>88</sup> would undoubtedly, if he had intended that thing, have appointed that butcherly office to some other than his own born brother.

Some wise men also ween<sup>89</sup> that his drift,<sup>90</sup> covertly conveyed, lacked not in helping forth his brother of Clarence to his death, which he resisted openly, howbeit<sup>91</sup> somewhat (as men deemed) more faintly than he that were heartily minded to his wealth.<sup>92</sup> And they that thus deem, think that he long-time in King Edward's life forethought to be king in case that the King his brother (whose life he looked that evil diet should shorten) should happen to decease (as indeed he did) while his children were young. And they deem that for this intent he was glad of his brother's death, the Duke of Clarence, whose life must needs have hindered him so intending, whether the same Duke of Clarence had kept him true to his nephew the young king or enterprised to be king himself. But of all this point is there no certainty, and whoso divineth upon conjectures may as well shoot too far as too short.

Howbeit,<sup>93</sup> this have I by credible information learned, that the self<sup>94</sup> night in which King Edward died, one Mistlebrook, long ere<sup>95</sup> morning, came in great haste to the house of one Potter dwelling in Redcross Street without<sup>96</sup> Cripplegate; and when he was with hasty rapping quickly letten in, he showed

56 deposed 57 women . . . husbands love: Whit W540; Euripides' Andromache 181–82 58 convicted 59 butt of malmsey: barrel of a strong, sweet wine 60 knew 61 treat 62 virtue; excellence 63 hunchbacked 64 ugly 65 noblemen 66 warlike 67 perverse 68 ado . . . travail: trouble in her labor 69 he . . . forward: Til T234 70 out of the world 71 men . . . truth: Whit M310 72 who 73 none evil: not an unskillful 74 suitable 75 in default: lacking 76 as . . . person: personally 77 spending 78 above . . . liberal: generous beyond his means 79 fain . . . spoil: inclined to pillage and steal 80 private 81 dissembler. He . . . dissimuler: Til D386 82 lowly of countenance: humble in appearance

83 companionable 84 arrogant . . . hated: Whit C174, S138 85 refraining 86 to kiss . . . to kill: Whit J68; Til J92 87 pretty much 88 who 89 believe 90 scheme, plot, design 91 although 92 well-being 93 However 94 same 95 before 96 outside unto Potter that King Edward was departed. “By my troth,<sup>97</sup> man,” quoth Potter, “then will my master, the Duke of Gloucester, be king.” What cause he had so to think, hard it is to say — whether he, being toward<sup>98</sup> him, anything knew that he such thing purposed, or otherwise had any inkling thereof<sup>99</sup> — for he was not likely to speak it of nought.<sup>100</sup>

But now to return to the course of this history: were it that the Duke of Gloucester had of old foreminded<sup>101</sup> this conclusion, or was now at erst<sup>102</sup> thereunto moved and put in hope by the occasion of the tender age of the young princes, his nephews (as opportunity and likelihood of speed<sup>103</sup> putteth a man in courage of that he never intended),<sup>104</sup> certain is it that he contrived their destruction, with the usurpation of the regal dignity upon himself. And, forasmuch as he well wist<sup>105</sup> and helped to maintain a long-continued grudge and heart-burning<sup>106</sup> between the Queen’s kindred and the King’s blood, either party envying other’s authority, he now thought that their division should be (as it was indeed) a furtherly<sup>107</sup> beginning to the pursuit of his intent, and a sure ground for the foundation of all his building,<sup>108</sup> if he might first, under the pretext of revenging of old displeasure, abuse the anger and ignorance of the one party to the destruction of the other, and then win to his purpose as many as he could; and those that could not be won might be lost ere they looked therefor.<sup>109</sup> For of one thing was he certain: that if his intent were perceived, he should soon have made peace between the both parties, with his own blood.

King Edward in his life, albeit that<sup>110</sup> this dissension between his friends somewhat irked him, yet in his good health he somewhat the less regarded it, because he thought, whatsoever business should fall between them, himself should always be able to rule both the parties. But in his last sickness, when he perceived his natural strength so sore<sup>111</sup> enfeebled that he despaired all recovery, then he, considering the youth of his children — albeit he nothing less mistrusted than that that happened, yet well foreseeing that many harms might grow by their debate<sup>112</sup> while the youth of his children should lack discretion of themselves and good counsel of their friends, of which either party should counsel for their own commodity<sup>113</sup> and rather by pleasant advice to win themselves favor than by profitable advertisement<sup>114</sup> to do the children good — he called some of them before him that were at variance,<sup>115</sup> and in especial<sup>116</sup> the Lord Marquis Dorset,<sup>117</sup> the Queen’s son by her first husband, and Richard the Lord Hastings, a noble man, then Lord Chamberlain, again<sup>118</sup> whom the Queen specially grudged for the great favor the King bore him, and also for that<sup>119</sup> she thought him secretly familiar with the King in wanton company. Her kindred also bore him sore,<sup>120</sup> as well for that the King had made him captain of Calais<sup>121</sup> (which office the Lord Rivers,<sup>122</sup> brother to the Queen, claimed of the King’s former promise) as for diverse other great gifts which he received, that they looked for.

When these lords, with diverse others of both the parties, were come in presence,<sup>123</sup> the King, lifting up himself and underset with pillows, as it is reported, on this wise<sup>124</sup> said unto them: “My lords, my dear kinsmen and allies,<sup>125</sup> in what plight I lie, you see and I feel. By which, the less while<sup>126</sup> I look to live with you, the more deeply am I moved to care in what case I leave you; for such as I leave you, such be my children like<sup>127</sup> to find you. Which,<sup>128</sup> if they should (that God forbid) find you at variance, might hap to fall themselves at war ere their discretion would serve to set you at peace. Ye see their youth, of which I reckon the only surety<sup>129</sup> to rest in your concord. For it sufficeth not that all you love them, if each of you hate other. If they were men, your faithfulness haply<sup>130</sup> would suffice. But childhood must be maintained<sup>131</sup> by men’s authority, and slipper<sup>132</sup> youth underpropped with elder counsel,<sup>133</sup> which neither they can have but<sup>134</sup> ye give it, nor ye give it if ye gree<sup>135</sup> not. For where each laboreth to break that<sup>136</sup> the other maketh, and for hatred of each of other’s person impugne<sup>137</sup>th each other’s

97 By my troth: Upon my truth or faithfulness 98 in attendance upon 99 had... thereof: Whit I46; Til I79 100 of nought: for nothing 101 planned, intended 102 first 103 success 104 opportunity... intended: Whit E27; Til O71 105 knew 106 burning jealousy 107 favorable, adapted to further 108 a sure... building: Til F619 109 ere they looked therefor:

before they expected it 110 albeit that: although 111 greatly 112 strife, dispute 113 advantage 114 instruction, warning 115 dispute 116 in especial: in particular 117 Thomas Grey 118 against 119 for that: because 120 grievously 121 Calais, in France, was under English control at the time 122 Anthony Woodville 123 the royal presence 124 on this wise: in this manner 125 in-laws. See Sallust, Jugurtha 9–10. 126 less while: shorter time 127 likely 128 Who (the children) 129 security, safety 130 perhaps 131 supported; ruled 132 likely to slip; unreliable 133 slipper... counsel: Whit Y36 134 unless 135 reconcile 136 what counsel, there must it needs be long ere<sup>137</sup> any good conclusion go forward. And also, while either party laboreth to be chief, flattery shall have more place than plain and faithful advice, of which must needs ensue the evil bringing-up of the Prince, whose mind in tender youth infect,<sup>138</sup> shall readily fall to mischief and riot and draw down with this noble realm to ruin, but if<sup>139</sup> grace turn him to wisdom; which, if God send, then they that by evil means before pleased him best, shall after fall farthest out of favor, so that ever at length evil drifts<sup>140</sup> drive to nought,<sup>141</sup> and good plain ways prosper.<sup>142</sup>

“Great variance<sup>143</sup> hath there long been between you, not always for great causes. Sometimes a thing right well intended, our misconstruction turneth unto worse; or a small displeasure done us, either our own affection or evil tongues aggrieveth.<sup>144</sup> But this wot<sup>145</sup> I well: ye never had so great cause of hatred as ye have of love. That we be all men, that we be Christian men, this shall I leave for preachers to tell you (and yet I wot nere<sup>146</sup> whether any preacher's words ought more to move you than his that is, by and by, going to the place that they all preach of). But this shall I desire you to remember, that the one party of you is of my blood, the other of mine allies,<sup>147</sup> and each of you with other, either of kindred or affinity;<sup>148</sup> which spiritual kindred<sup>149</sup> of affinity, if the sacraments of Christ's Church bear that weight with us that would God they did, should no less move us to charity than the respect of fleshly consanguinity.<sup>150</sup> Our Lord forbid that you love together the worse, for the self<sup>151</sup> cause that you ought to love the better. And yet that happeneth. And nowhere find we so deadly debate as among them which by nature and law most ought to agree together. Such a pestilent serpent is ambition and desire of vainglory and sovereignty, which among states<sup>152</sup> where he once entereth creepeth forth so far till with division and variance he turneth all to mischief—first longing to be next the best, afterward equal with the best, and at last chief and above the best. Of which immoderate appetite of worship,<sup>153</sup> and thereby of debate and dissension, what loss, what sorrow, what trouble hath within these few years grown in this realm, I pray God as well forget as we well remember. Which things if I could as well have foreseen, as I have with my more pain than pleasure proved,<sup>154</sup> by God's blessed Lady”—that was ever his oath—“I would never have won the courtesy of men's knees with the loss of so many heads. But since things past cannot be gaincalled,<sup>155</sup> much ought we the more beware, by what occasion we have taken so great hurt afore, that we eftsoons<sup>156</sup> fall not in that occasion again.

“Now be those griefs past, and all is (God be thanked) quiet, and likely right well to prosper in wealthful peace under your cousins,<sup>157</sup> my children, if God send them life and you love. Of which two things, the less loss were they by whom though God did his pleasure,<sup>158</sup> yet should the realm always find kings, and peradventure<sup>159</sup> as good kings. But if you among yourselves in a child's reign fall at debate, many a good man shall perish and haply<sup>160</sup> he too, and ye too, ere this land find peace again. Wherefore in these last words that ever I look to speak with you, I exhort you and require<sup>161</sup> you all, for the love that you have ever borne to me, for the love that I have ever borne to you, for the love that our Lord beareth to us all, from this time forward, all griefs forgotten, each of you love other.<sup>162</sup> Which I verily<sup>163</sup> trust you will, if ye anything earthly regard—either God or your king, affinity or kindred, this realm, your own country, or your own surety.”<sup>164</sup>

And therewithal the King, no longer enduring to sit up, laid him down on his right side, his face toward them; and none was there present that could refrain from weeping. But the lords, recomforting<sup>165</sup> him with as good words as they could, and answering for the time as they thought to stand with his pleasure, there in his presence (as by their words appeared) each forgave other, and joined their hands together, when (as it after appeared by their deeds) their hearts were far asunder.

As soon as the King was departed, the noble Prince his son drew toward London, which at the time of his decease, kept his household at Ludlow in Wales. Which country, being far off from the law and recourse to justice, was begun to be far out of

137 before 138 infected 139 but if: unless 140 schemes, devices
141 nothing; evil... nought: Whit D392
142 good... prosper: Til W163; Whit W118 143 disagreement 144 Sometimes... aggrieveth: Til T31 145 know 146 wot nere: know not 147 in-laws 148 related by marriage 149 kinship 150 blood-relationship 151 very same 152 noblemen 153 distinction; prestige, renown 154 learned by experience 155 called back again; things... gaincalled: Whit D287,

P45; Til T203 156 soon after 157 kins-folk; relatives 158 his pleasure: i.e., taking them young 159 perhaps 160 perhaps 161 ask 162 See Jn 13:34–35. 163 truly 164 safety 165 reassuring

good will and waxen<sup>166</sup> wild, robbers and reavers<sup>167</sup> walking at liberty uncorrected. And for this encheason<sup>168</sup> the Prince was in the life of his father sent thither, to the end that the authority of his presence should refrain evil-disposed persons from the boldness of their former outrages. To the governance and ordering<sup>169</sup> of this young Prince, at his sending thither, was there appointed Sir Anthony Woodville (Lord Rivers and brother unto the Queen), a right honorable man, as valiant of hand<sup>170</sup> as politic<sup>171</sup> in counsel. Adjoined were there unto him others of the same party, and in effect everyone, as he was nearest of kin unto the Queen, so was planted next about the Prince.

That drift<sup>172</sup> by the Queen not unwisely devised, whereby her blood might of<sup>173</sup> youth be rooted in the Prince's favor, the Duke of Gloucester turned unto their destruction, and upon that ground set the foundation of all his unhappy building. For whomsoever he perceived either at variance<sup>174</sup> with them or bearing himself their favor, he broke<sup>175</sup> unto them, some by mouth, some by writing and secret messengers, that it neither was reason<sup>176</sup> nor in any wise<sup>177</sup> to be suffered that the young King, their master and kinsman, should be in the hands and custody of his mother's kindred, sequestered in manner<sup>178</sup> from their company and attendance, of which every one owed him as faithful service as they, and many of them far more honorable part of kin than his mother's side, "whose blood," quoth he, "saving the King's pleasure, was full unmeetly<sup>179</sup> to be matched with his — which<sup>180</sup> now to be, as who<sup>181</sup> say, removed from the King and the less noble to be left about him, is," quoth he, "neither honorable to his Majesty nor unto us, and also to his Grace no surety,<sup>182</sup> to have the mightiest of his friends from him, and unto us no little jeopardy to suffer<sup>183</sup> our well-proved evil-willers to grow in over-great authority with the Prince in youth, namely which is light of belief<sup>184</sup> and soon persuaded.<sup>185</sup>

"Ye remember, I trow,<sup>186</sup> King Edward himself, albeit<sup>187</sup> he was a man of age and of discretion, yet was he in many things ruled by the bend,<sup>188</sup> more than stood either with his honor or our profit, or with the commodity<sup>189</sup> of any man else, except only the immoderate advancement of themselves. Which,<sup>190</sup> whether they sorer<sup>191</sup> thirsted after their own weal<sup>192</sup> or our woe, it were hard, I ween,<sup>193</sup> to guess. And if some folks' friendship had not holden better place with the King than any respect of kindred, they might peradventure<sup>194</sup> easily have betrayed and brought to confusion<sup>195</sup> some of us ere<sup>196</sup> this. Why not, as easily as they have done some other<sup>197</sup> already, as near of his royal blood as we? But our Lord hath wrought his will, and, thanks be to his grace that peril is past. Howbeit,<sup>198</sup> as great<sup>199</sup> is growing, if we suffer this young king in our enemies' hand, which, without his witting,<sup>200</sup> might abuse the name of his commandment to any of our undoing, which thing God and good provision<sup>201</sup> forbid. Of which good provision none of us hath anything the less need for the late-made atonement,<sup>202</sup> in which the King's pleasure had more place than the parties' wills. Nor none of us, I believe, is so unwise oversoon to trust a new friend made of an old foe,<sup>203</sup> or to think that a hoverly<sup>204</sup> kindness, suddenly contract<sup>205</sup> in one hour, continued yet scant<sup>206</sup> a fortnight, should be deeper settled in their stomachs than a long-accustomed malice many years rooted."

With these words and writings and such other, the Duke of Gloucester soon set afire them that were of themselves easy to kindle,<sup>207</sup> and in especial twain:<sup>208</sup> Edward Duke of Buckingham, and Richard Lord Hastings and Chamberlain — both men of honor and of great power, the one by long succession from his ancestry, the other by his office and the King's favor. These two, not bearing each to other so much love as hatred both unto the Queen's party, in this point accorded together with the Duke of Gloucester, that they would utterly amove<sup>209</sup> from the King's company all his mother's friends, under the name of their enemies.

Upon this concluded, the Duke of Gloucester, understanding that the lords which at that time

166 grown, become 167 raiders
168 reason 169 training, raising 170 of hand: in combat 171 prudent; shrewd; crafty 172 scheme 173 from his 174 disagreement 175 revealed
176 reasonable 177 way 178 effect
179 full unmeetly: completely inappropriate 180 the blood-relations of Edward's 181 they 182 safety

183 allow 184 light of belief: credulous, gullible 185 youth... persuaded: Til Y44 186 trust 187 although 188 the bend: the (Queen's) faction 189 benefit 190 Who (i.e., those who sought their own advancement) 191 more intensely 192 well-being, advantage 193 think 194 perhaps 195 ruin, destruction
196 before 197 some other: George, the Duke of Clarence 198 However 199 as great a peril 200 knowing 201 foresight, planning 202 late-made atonement: recent reconciliation 203 unwise... foe: Whit F662; Til 373 204 superficial 205 contracted 206 hardly 207 soon... kindle: Til N308 208 two 209 remove

were about the King intended to bring him up to his coronation, accompanied with such power<sup>210</sup> of their friends that it should be hard for him to bring his purpose to pass without the gathering and great assembly of people and in manner of open war, whereof the end he wist<sup>211</sup> was doubtful,<sup>212</sup> and in which, the King being on their side, his party should have the face and name of a rebellion, he secretly therefore by diverse means caused the Queen to be persuaded and brought in the mind that it neither were need, and also should be jeopardous, the King to come up strong.<sup>213</sup> For whereas now every lord loved other, and none other thing studied upon but about the coronation and honor of the King, if the lords of her kindred should assemble in the King's name much people, they should give the lords atwixt<sup>214</sup> whom and them had been sometimes debate, to fear and suspect, lest they should gather this people, not for the King's safeguard, whom no man impugned,<sup>215</sup> but for their destruction, having more regard to their old variance<sup>216</sup> than their new atonement. For which cause they should assemble, on the other party, much people again for their defense, whose power, she wist well, far stretched. And thus should all the realm fall on a roar.<sup>217</sup> And of all the hurt that thereof should ensue, which was likely not to be little,<sup>218</sup> and the most harm there like<sup>219</sup> to fall where she least would, all the world would put her and her kindred in the wight,<sup>220</sup> and say that they had unwisely, and untruly also, broken the amity and peace that the King her husband so prudently made between his kin and hers in his deathbed, and which the other party faithfully observed.

The Queen, being in this wise<sup>221</sup> persuaded, such word sent unto her son<sup>222</sup> and unto her brother,<sup>223</sup> being about the King; and over<sup>224</sup> that, the Duke of Gloucester himself and other lords, the chief of his bend,<sup>225</sup> wrote unto the King so reverently, and to the Queen's friends there so lovingly, that they, nothing earthly<sup>226</sup> mistrusting, brought the King up in great haste, not in good speed,<sup>227</sup> with a sober<sup>228</sup> company.

Now was the King in his way to London gone from Northampton, when these Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham came thither. Where<sup>229</sup> remained behind the Lord Rivers, the King's uncle, intending on the morrow to follow the King and be with him at Stony Stratford (eleven miles thence), early before he departed. So was there made that night much friendly cheer between these dukes and the Lord Rivers a great while.

But incontinent<sup>230</sup> after that they were openly with great courtesy<sup>231</sup> departed and the Lord Rivers lodged, the dukes secretly with a few of their most privy friends set them down in council, wherein they spent a great part of the night. And at their rising in the dawning of the day, they sent about privily to their servants in their inns and lodgings about, giving them commandment to make themselves shortly ready, for their lords were to horsebackward.<sup>232</sup> Upon which messages, many of their folk were attendant, when many of the Lord Rivers's servants were unready. Now had these dukes taken also into their custody the keys of the inn, that none should pass forth without their license. And over<sup>233</sup> this, in the highway toward Stony Stratford where the King lay, they had bestowed<sup>234</sup> certain of their folk that should send back again and compel to return any man that were gotten out of Northampton toward Stony Stratford, till they should give other license, forasmuch as the dukes themselves intended, for the show of their diligence, to be the first that should that day attend upon the King's Highness out of that town: thus bore they folk in hand.<sup>235</sup>

But when the Lord Rivers understood the gates closed and the ways on every side beset, neither his servants nor himself suffered<sup>236</sup> to go out, perceiving well so great a thing without his knowledge not begun for nought, comparing this manner present with this last night's cheer, in so few hours so great a change marvelously disliked. Howbeit,<sup>237</sup> since he could not get away—and keep himself close<sup>238</sup> he would not, lest he should seem to hide himself for some secret fear of his own fault, whereof he saw no such cause in himself—he determined, upon the surety of<sup>239</sup> his own conscience, to go boldly to them and inquire what this matter might mean. Whom,<sup>240</sup> as soon as they saw, they began to quarrel

210 a military presence 211 knew
212 doubtful; war... doubtful: Whit B65;
Til C223 213 with a strong military escort
214 between 215 attacked 216 disputes 217 on a roar: into turmoil 218 of all... little: Til E191, M1012 219 likely 220 blame 221 way 222 Richard Grey

223 Anthony Woodville, the second Earl Rivers 224 besides 225 band, faction
226 in all the world 227 in great... speed:
Til H197; Whit H167 228 moderate in number 229 There (in Northampton) 230 immediately 231 with... courtesy:
Til C732 232 mount their horses

233 besides 234 stationed 235 bore... hand: they tricked people 236 allowed 237 However 238 enclosed, confined;
keep... close: keep himself confined 239 surety of: security given him by 240 Lord Rivers

with him and say that he intended to set distance between the King and them, and to bring them to confusion,<sup>241</sup> but it should not lie in his power. And when he began (as he was a very well-spoken man) in goodly wise to excuse himself, they tarried not the end of his answer, but shortly took him and put him in ward,<sup>242</sup> and, that done, forthwith<sup>243</sup> went to horseback and took the way to Stony Stratford, where they found the King with his company ready to leap on horseback, and depart forward, to leave that lodging for them, because it was too strait<sup>244</sup> for both companies.

And as soon as they came in his presence, they light a-down, with all their company about them. To whom the Duke of Buckingham said, “Go afore, gentlemen and yeomen; keep your rooms.”<sup>245</sup> And thus in a goodly array they came to the King, and on their knees in very humble wise saluted his Grace, which received them in very joyous and amiable manner, nothing earthly knowing nor mistrusting as yet. But even by and by,<sup>246</sup> in his presence they picked a quarrel to the Lord Richard Grey, the King’s other brother by his mother, saying that he, with the Lord Marquis<sup>247</sup> his brother and the Lord Rivers his uncle, had compassed<sup>248</sup> to rule the King and the realm, and to set variance<sup>249</sup> among the states,<sup>250</sup> and to subdue and destroy the noble blood of the realm. Toward the accomplishing whereof, they said that the Lord Marquis had entered into the Tower of London, and thence taken out the King’s treasure, and sent men to the sea. All which things these dukes wist<sup>251</sup> well were done for good purposes and necessary by the whole Council at London, saving that somewhat they must say.<sup>252</sup> Unto which words the King answered, “What my brother Marquis hath done, I cannot say. But in good faith, I dare well answer for mine uncle Rivers and my brother here, that they be innocent of any such matters.”

“Yea, my liege,” quoth the Duke of Buckingham, “they have kept their dealing in these matters far from the knowledge of your good Grace.” And forthwith they arrested the Lord Richard and Sir Thomas Vaughan, Knight, in the King’s presence, and brought the King and all back unto Northampton, where they took again further counsel. And there they sent away from the King whom it pleased them, and set new servants about him, such as liked better them than him. At which dealing he wept and was nothing content, but it booteth<sup>253</sup> not. And at dinner the Duke of Gloucester sent a dish from his own table to the Lord Rivers, praying him to be of good cheer, all should be well enough. And he thanked the Duke, and prayed the messenger to bear it to his nephew the Lord Richard with the same message for his comfort, who he thought had more need of comfort, as one to whom such adversity was strange. But himself had been all his days in ure therewith,<sup>254</sup> and therefore could bear it the better. But for all this comfortable<sup>255</sup> courtesy of the Duke of Gloucester, he sent the Lord Rivers and the Lord Richard with Sir Thomas Vaughan into the north country into diverse places to prison, and afterward all to Pomfret,<sup>256</sup> where they were in conclusion beheaded.

In this wise<sup>257</sup> the Duke of Gloucester took upon himself the order and governance of the young King, whom with much honor and humble reverence he conveyed upward toward the city. But anon<sup>258</sup> the tidings of this matter came hastily to the Queen, a little before the midnight following, and that in the sorest wise,<sup>259</sup> that the King her son was taken, her brother, her son,<sup>260</sup> and her other friends arrested, and sent no man wist whither, to be done with God wot<sup>261</sup> what. With which tidings the Queen in great flight and heaviness,<sup>262</sup> bewailing her child’s ruin, her friends’ mischance, and her own infortune,<sup>263</sup> damning the time that ever she dissuaded the gathering of power<sup>264</sup> about the King, got herself in all the haste possible, with her younger son and her daughters, out of the Palace of Westminster, in which she then lay, into the sanctuary, lodging herself and her company there in the abbot’s place.

Now came there one in likewise<sup>265</sup> not long after midnight, from the Lord Chamberlain unto the Archbishop of York,<sup>266</sup> then Chancellor of England, to his place not far from Westminster. And for that<sup>267</sup> he showed his<sup>268</sup> servants that he had tidings of so great importance that his master gave him

241 ruin 242 custody 243 immediately 244 small 245 places, stations 246 by and by: right away; before long 247 Dorset (Thomas Grey) 248 plotted 249 strife 250 noblemen 251 knew 252 saving . . . say: but they had to say something 253 mattered, helped 254 in ure therewith: used to it 255 encouraging 256 also known as Pontefract 257 way 258 at once 259 sorest wise: most grievous way 260 Richard Grey 261 knew 262 flight and heaviness: agitation and heavy-heartedness 263 misfortune 264 armed men 265 the same manner 266 Thomas Rotherham 267 for that: because 268 the Archbishop’s in charge not to forbear<sup>269</sup> his rest, they letted<sup>270</sup> not to wake him, nor he to admit this messenger into his bedside. Of whom he heard that these dukes were gone back with the King's Grace from Stony Stratford unto Northampton. "Notwithstanding, sir," quoth he, "my lord sendeth your Lordship word that there is no fear. For he assureth you that all shall be well."

"I assure him," quoth the Archbishop, "be it as well as it will, it will never be so well as we have seen it."<sup>271</sup> And thereupon, by and by,<sup>272</sup> after the messenger departed, he caused in all the haste all his servants to be called up; and so with his own household about him, and every man weapened, he took the Great Seal with him and came, yet before day, unto the Queen. About whom he found much heaviness, rumble,<sup>273</sup> haste, and busyness, carriage and conveyance of her stuff into sanctuary (chests, coffers, packs, fardels, trusses,<sup>274</sup> all on men's backs), no man unoccupied, some lading,<sup>275</sup> some going, some discharging,<sup>276</sup> some coming for more, some breaking down the walls to bring in the next way,<sup>277</sup> and some yet drew to them that helped to carry a wrong way. The Queen herself sat alone, alow on the rushes, all desolate and dismayed, whom the Archbishop comforted in the best manner he could, showing her that he trusted the matter was nothing so sore<sup>278</sup> as she took it for,<sup>279</sup> and that he was put in good hope and out of fear by the message sent him from the Lord Chamberlain.

"Ah, woe worth him"<sup>280</sup> quoth she, "for he is one of them that laboreth to destroy me and my blood."

"Madam," quoth he, "be ye of good cheer. For I assure you, if they crown any other king than your son whom they now have with them, we shall on the morrow crown his brother whom you have here with you. And here is the Great Seal, which in like wise as that noble prince your husband delivered it unto me, so here I deliver it unto you to the use and behoof<sup>281</sup> of your son." And therewith he betook her the Great Seal, and departed home again, yet in the dawning of the day. By which time he might in his chamber window see all the Thames full of boats of the Duke of Gloucester's servants, watching that no man should go to sanctuary, nor none could pass unsearched. Then was there great commotion and murmur as well in other places about, as specially in the city, the people diversely divining upon this dealing.<sup>282</sup> And some lords, knights, and gentlemen, either for favor of the Queen or for fear of themselves, assembled in sundry companies, and went flock-meal in harness,<sup>283</sup> and many also for that<sup>284</sup> they reckoned this demeanor attempted not so specially against the other lords as against the King himself in the disturbance of his coronation.

But then, by and by, the lords assembled together at London. Toward which meeting, the Archbishop of York, fearing that it would be ascribed (as it was indeed) to his overmuch lightness that he so suddenly had yielded up the Great Seal to the Queen, to whom the custody thereof nothing pertained without especial commandment of the King, secretly sent for the Seal again, and brought it with him after the customable manner. And at this meeting the Lord Hastings, whose troth<sup>285</sup> toward the King no man doubted nor needed to doubt, persuaded the lords to believe that the Duke of Gloucester was sure and fastly faithful to his prince and that the Lord Rivers and Lord Richard, with the other knights, were, for matters attempted by them against the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham, put under arrest for their surety, not for the King's jeopardy, and that they were also in safeguard, and there no longer should remain than till the matter were, not by the dukes only but also by all the other lords of the King's Council, indifferently<sup>286</sup> examined and by other discretions ordered, and either judged or appeased. But one thing he advised them beware: that they judged not the matter too far-forth ere<sup>287</sup> they knew the truth,<sup>288</sup> nor turning their private grudges into the common hurt, irritating and provoking men unto anger, and disturbing the King's coronation, toward which the dukes were coming up, that they might peradventure<sup>289</sup> bring the matter so far out of joint<sup>290</sup> that it should never be brought in frame<sup>291</sup> again. Which strife if it should hap as it were likely to come to a field,<sup>292</sup> though both parties were in all other things equal,

269 spare 270 hesitated 271 it will... it: Whit B277; Til B332 272 by and by:
directly, soon 273 commotion 274 fardels, trusses: parcels, bundles 275 loading 276 unloading 277 in... way: in by the nearest possible way 278 grievous

279 the matter... for: Til T31 280 woe worth him: may evil befall him 281 benefit 282 the people... dealing: Whit F370 283 flock-meal in harness: by companies in armor 284 for that: because 285 loyalty, faithfulness 286 impartially 287 before

288 judged... truth: Whit J77 289 perhaps 290 out of joint: Whit J54; Til J75
291 in frame: in shape, right order; Whit F607 292 battlefield

yet should the authority be on that side where the King is himself.

With these persuasions of the Lord Hastings—whereof part himself believed, of part he wist<sup>293</sup> the contrary—these commotions were somewhat appeased. But specially by that that<sup>294</sup> the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham were so near, and came so shortly on with the King, in none other manner, with none other voice or semblance, than to his coronation—causing the fame to be blown about<sup>295</sup> that these lords and knights which were taken had contrived the destruction of the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham and of other the noble blood of the realm, to the end that themselves would alone demean<sup>296</sup> and govern the King at their pleasure. And for the colorable<sup>297</sup> proof thereof, such of the dukes' servants as rode with the carts of their stuff that were taken (among which stuff no marvel though some were harness,<sup>298</sup> which at the breaking-up of that household must needs either be brought away or cast away), they showed unto the people all the way as they went: “Lo, here be the barrels of harness that these traitors had privily conveyed in their carriage to destroy the noble lords withal.” This device, albeit that<sup>299</sup> it made the matter to wise men more unlikely, well perceiving that the intenders of such a purpose would rather have had their harness on their backs than to have bound them up in barrels, yet much part of the common people were therewith very well satisfied, and said it were alms<sup>300</sup> to hang them.<sup>301</sup>

When the King approached near to the city, Edmund Shaa, goldsmith, then mayor, with William White and John Mathew, sheriffs, and all the other aldermen in scarlet, with five hundred horse of the citizens in violet, received him reverently at Hornsea, and riding from thence, accompanied him into the city, which he entered the fourth day of May, the first and last year of his reign. But the Duke of Gloucester bore him in open sight so reverently to the Prince, with all semblance of lowliness, that from the great obloquy<sup>302</sup> in which he was so late before, he was suddenly fallen in so great trust that at the Council next assembled, he was made the only man chosen and thought most meet<sup>303</sup> to be

Protector of the King and his realm, so that (were it destiny or were it folly) the lamb was betaken to the wolf to keep.<sup>304</sup> At which Council also the Archbishop of York, Chancellor of England, which had delivered up the Great Seal to the Queen, was thereof greatly reprovèd, and the Seal taken from him and delivered to Doctor Russell, Bishop of Lincoln, a wise man and a good and of much experience, and one of the best-learned men undoubtedly that England had in his time. Diverse lords and knights were appointed unto diverse rooms.<sup>305</sup> The Lord Chamberlain and some others kept still their offices that they had before.

Now, all were it so that the Protector so sore<sup>306</sup> thirsted for the finishing of that he had begun that thought every day a year till it were achieved, yet durst<sup>307</sup> he no further attempt as long as he had but half his prey in his hand, well witting<sup>308</sup> that if he deposed the one brother, all the realm would fall to the other if he either remained in sanctuary or should haply<sup>309</sup> be shortly conveyed to his farther liberty.<sup>310</sup> Wherefore incontinent<sup>311</sup> at the next meeting of the lords at the Council, he proposed unto them that it was a heinous deed of the Queen, and proceeding of great malice toward the King's Councillors, that she should keep in sanctuary the King's brother from him, whose special pleasure and comfort were to have his brother with him—and that by her done to none other intent, but to bring all the lords in obloquy and murmur of the people, as though they were not to be trusted with the King's brother, that<sup>312</sup> by the assent of the nobles of the land were appointed as the King's nearest friends, to the tuition<sup>313</sup> of his own royal person.

“The prosperity whereof standeth,” quoth he, “not all in keeping from enemies or ill viand,<sup>314</sup> but partly also in recreation and moderate pleasure, which he cannot in his tender youth take in the company of ancient persons,<sup>315</sup> but in the familiar conversation of those that be neither far under nor far above his age, and nevertheless of estate convenient<sup>316</sup> to accompany his noble Majesty. Wherefore, with whom rather than with his own brother? And if any man think this consideration light (which I think no man thinketh that loveth the King), let him consider

293 knew 294 by that that: by reason that 295 fame... blown about: Whit 643; Til 833 296 handle, control 297 ostensible 298 armor 299 albeit that: although 300 a good deed; act of charity 301 it... them: Til A2; Whit A113 302 disrepute, infamy 303 fit, appropriate 304 the lamb... to keep: Til W602; Whit S215 305 offices, positions 306 greatly 307 dared 308 knowing 309 perhaps

310 to... liberty: i.e., out of the country 311 right away 312 who 313 protection, guardianship 314 ill viand: bad food 315 which... persons: Whit Y33; Til Y43 316 appropriate, fitting that sometimes without small things greater cannot stand.<sup>317</sup> And verily it redoundeth<sup>318</sup> greatly to the dishonor both of the King's Highness and of all us that be about his Grace, to have it run in every man's mouth, not in this realm only, but also in other lands (as evil words walk far)<sup>319</sup> that the King's brother should be fain<sup>320</sup> to keep sanctuary. For every man will ween<sup>321</sup> that no man will so do for nought.<sup>322</sup> And such evil opinion once fastened in men's hearts, hard it is to wrest out,<sup>323</sup> and may grow to more grief than any man here can divine.

"Wherefore methinketh it were not worst to send unto the Queen, for the redress of this matter, some honorable trusty man, such as both tendereth<sup>324</sup> the King's weal<sup>325</sup> and the honor of his Council, and is also in favor and credence with her. For all which considerations, none seemeth me more meetly<sup>326</sup> than our Reverend Father here present, my Lord Cardinal,<sup>327</sup> who may in this matter do most good of any man, if it please him to take the pain. Which I doubt not of his goodness he will not refuse, for the King's sake and ours, and wealth<sup>328</sup> of the young Duke himself, the King's most honorable brother and, after my Sovereign Lord himself, my most dear nephew—considering that thereby shall be ceased the slanderous rumor and obloquy<sup>329</sup> now going, and the hurts avoided that thereof might ensue, and much rest and quiet grow to all the realm. And if she be percase<sup>330</sup> so obstinate, and so precisely set upon her own will, that neither his wise and faithful advertisement<sup>331</sup> can move her, nor any man's reason content her, then shall we, by mine advice, by the King's authority fetch him out of that prison and bring him to his noble presence, in whose continual company he shall be so well cherished and so honorably entreated<sup>332</sup> that all the world shall, to our honor and her reproach, perceive that it was only malice, forwardness,<sup>333</sup> or folly that caused her to keep him there. This is my mind in this matter for this time, except<sup>334</sup> any of your lordships anything perceive to the contrary. For never shall I, by God's grace, so wed myself to mine own will<sup>335</sup> but that I shall be ready to change it upon your better advices."

When the Protector had said, all the Council

affirmed that the motion was good and reasonable, and to the King and the Duke his brother honorable, and a thing that should cease great murmur in the realm, if the mother might be by good means induced to deliver him. Which thing the Archbishop of [Canterbury],<sup>336</sup> whom they all agreed also to be thereto most convenient,<sup>337</sup> took upon him to move her, and therein to do his uttermost devoir.<sup>338</sup> Howbeit,<sup>339</sup> if she could be in no wise entreated with her good will to deliver him, then thought he and such others as were of the spirituality<sup>340</sup> present that it were not in any wise to be attempted to take him out against her will. For it would be a thing that should turn to the great grudge of all men, and high displeasure of God, if the privilege of that holy place should now be broken, which had so many years been kept, which both kings and popes so good had granted, so many had confirmed, and which holy ground was more than five hundred years ago by Saint Peter, his own person in spirit, accompanied with great multitude of angels, by night so specially hallowed and dedicate to God (for the proof whereof they have yet in the abbey Saint Peter's cope<sup>341</sup> to show) that from that time hitherward<sup>342</sup> was there never so undevout a king that durst that sacred place violate, or so holy a bishop that durst<sup>343</sup> it presume to consecrate. "And therefore," quoth the Archbishop,<sup>344</sup> "God forbid that any man should, for anything earthly, enterprise to break the immunity and liberty of that sacred sanctuary, that hath been the safeguard of so many a good man's life. And I trust," quoth he, "with God's grace, we shall not need it. But for any manner need, I would not we should do it. I trust that she shall be with reason contented, and all things in good manner<sup>345</sup> obtained. And if it happen that I bring it not so to pass, yet shall I toward it so farforth do my best, that ye shall all well perceive, that no lack of my devoir, but the mother's dread and womanish fear, shall be the let."<sup>346</sup>

"Womanish fear? Nay, womanish forwardness,"<sup>347</sup> quoth the Duke of Buckingham. "For I dare take it upon my soul, she well knoweth she needeth no such thing to fear, either for her son or for herself.

317 without . . . stand: Whit T203
318 contributes 319 evil words walk far:
Whit W580 320 obliged 321 think 322 no reason, nothing 323 evil . . .
out: Til O68 324 holds dear, cares for 325 well-being 326 suitable 327 Thomas Bouchier, Archbishop of Canterbury 328 well-being;

prosperity 329 disgrace, slander, reproach 330 by chance 331 advice
332 treated 333 perversity, contrariness
334 unless 335 wed . . . will: Til W392 336 The 1557 text has York, but the other early texts correct this to Canterbury.

337 appropriate 338 effort; duty 339 However 340 clergy 341 a long cloak worn by priests and monks 342 till now 343 dared 344 The 1557 text mistakenly adds "of York." 345 all things . . .
manner: Whit M363, M464; Til 806
346 obstacle 347 perversity; contrariness

For as for her, here is no man that will be at war with women.<sup>348</sup> Would God some of the men of her kin were women too, and then should all be soon in rest. Howbeit, there is none of her kin the less loved for that<sup>349</sup> they be her kin, but for their own evil deserving. And nevertheless if we loved neither her nor her kin, yet were there no cause to think that we should hate the King's noble brother, to whose Grace we ourselves be of kin. Whose honor, if she as much desired as our dishonor, and as much regard took to his wealth<sup>350</sup> as to her own will, she would be as loath to suffer<sup>351</sup> him from the King as any of us be. For if she have any wit (as would God she had as good will as she hath shrewd<sup>352</sup> wit), she reckoneth herself no wiser than she thinketh some that be here, of whose faithful mind she nothing doubteth, but verily<sup>353</sup> believeth and knoweth that they would be as sorry of his harm as herself, and yet would have him from her if she bide<sup>354</sup> there. And we all, I think, content that both be with her if she come thence and bide in such place where they may with their honor be.

"Now then if she refuse in the deliverance of him to follow the counsel of them whose wisdom she knoweth, whose troth<sup>355</sup> she well trusteth, it is easy to perceive that frowardness letteth<sup>356</sup> her, and not fear. But go to,<sup>357</sup> suppose that she fear (as who may let her to fear her own shadow?);<sup>358</sup> the more she feareth to deliver him, the more ought we fear to leave him in her hands. For if she cast such fond doubts<sup>359</sup> that she fear his hurt, then will she fear that he shall be fetched thence. For she will soon think that if men were set (which God forbid) upon so great a mischief, the sanctuary would little let<sup>360</sup> them. Which good men might, as methinketh, without sin somewhat less regard than they do.

"Now then, if she doubt lest he might be fetched from her, is it not likely enough that she shall send him somewhere out of the realm? Verily, I look for none other. And I doubt not but she now as sore mindeth<sup>361</sup> it, as we the let<sup>362</sup> thereof. And if she might happen to bring that to pass (as it were no great mastery,<sup>363</sup> we letting her alone), all the world would say that we were a wise sort of councillors about a king, that let his brother be cast away under our noses. And therefore I ensure<sup>364</sup> you faithfully, for my mind, I will rather, maugre<sup>365</sup> her mind, fetch him away than leave him there, till her frowardness or fond<sup>366</sup> fear convey him away.

And yet will I break no sanctuary therefor. For verily, since the privileges of that place and others like have been of long continued, I am not he that would be about to break them. And in good faith if they were now to begin, I would not be he that should be about to make them. Yet will I not say nay, but that it is a deed of pity that such men as the sea or their evil debtors have brought in poverty should have some place of liberty, to keep their bodies out of the danger of their cruel creditors. And also if the crown happen (as it hath done) to come in question, while either party taketh other as traitors, I will well there be some places of refuge for both.

But as for thieves, of which these places be full, and which never fall from the craft after they once fall thereto,<sup>367</sup> it is pity the sanctuary should serve them. And much more manquellers,<sup>368</sup> whom God bade<sup>369</sup> to take from the altar and kill them if their murder were willful. And where it is otherwise, there need we not the sanctuaries that God appointed in the Old Law.<sup>370</sup> For if either necessity, his own defense, or misfortune draw him to that deed, a pardon serveth which either the law granteth of course, or the King of pity may.

"Then look me<sup>371</sup> now how few sanctuary men there be whom any favorable necessity compelled to go thither. And then see on the other side what a sort<sup>372</sup> there be commonly therein, of them whom willful unthriftiness<sup>373</sup> hath brought to nought.<sup>374</sup> What a rabble of thieves, murderers, and malicious heinous traitors, and that in two places specially: the one at the elbow of the city, the other in the very bowels.<sup>375</sup> I dare well avow it: weigh the good that they do with the hurt that cometh of them, and ye shall find it much better to lack both, than have both. And this I say, although they were not abused as they now be, and so long have been, that I fear

348 here... women: Til W685 349 for that: because 350 well-being 351 allow 352 clever; shrewish; malicious 353 truly 354 would... there: want him to be away from her if she stays there (in the sanctuary) 355 faithfulness, trustworthiness; truthfulness 356 frowardness letteth: perversity prevents 357 go to:

come now (interjection) 358 to fear... shadow: Whit S177; Til S261 359 if... doubts: if she devises such foolish doubt; Til D571 360 prevent 361 sore mindeth: seriously intends 362 the let: (intend) the prevention 363 achievement 364 assure 365 despite 366 frowardness or fond: perversity or foolish 367 thieves... thereto:

Til K133 368 murderers 369 See Ex 21:14. 370 See Ex 21:13; Nm 35:22. 371 look me: consider for me 372 group 373 dissoluteness 374 them... to nought: Til W81 375 elbow... bowels: Westminster Abbey is outside, while St. Martin le Grand is inside London.

me ever they will be while men be afeard to set their hands to the amendment—as though God and Saint Peter were the patrons of ungracious living.

“Now unthrifths riot and run in debt upon the boldness<sup>376</sup> of these places; yea, and rich men run thither with poor men’s goods; there they build, there they spend and bid their creditors go whistle them.<sup>377</sup> Men’s wives run thither with their husbands’ plate<sup>378</sup> and say they dare not abide with their husbands, for<sup>379</sup> beating. Thieves bring thither their stolen goods, and there live thereon. There devise they new robberies; nightly they steal out, they rob and reave<sup>380</sup> and kill, and come in again as though those places gave them not only a safe-guard for the harm they have done, but a license also to do more. Howbeit,<sup>381</sup> much of this mischief, if wise men would set their hands to,<sup>382</sup> it might be amended with great thanks of God and no breach of the privilege. The residue, since so long ago I wot nere<sup>383</sup> what pope and what prince more piteous<sup>384</sup> than politic<sup>385</sup> hath granted it and other men since of a certain religious fear have not broken it, let us take a pain therewith and let it a<sup>386</sup> God’s name stand in force as far-forth as reason will. Which is not fully so far-forth as may serve to let<sup>387</sup> us of the fetching forth of this nobleman, to his honor and wealth, out of that place in which he neither is nor can be a sanctuary man.

“A sanctuary serveth always to defend the body of that man that standeth in danger abroad, not of great hurt only, but also of lawful hurt. For against unlawful harms, never pope nor king intended to privilege any one place. For that privilege hath every place. Knoweth any man any place wherein it is lawful one man to do another wrong? That<sup>388</sup> no man unlawfully take hurt, that liberty<sup>389</sup> the king, the law, and very nature<sup>390</sup> forbiddeth in every place, and maketh to that regard<sup>391</sup> for every man every place a sanctuary. But where a man is by lawful means in peril, there needeth he the tuition<sup>392</sup> of some special privilege, which is the only ground and cause of all sanctuaries. From which necessity this noble prince is far, whose love to his king, nature and kindred proveth, whose innocence to all the world his tender youth proveth. And so sanctuary, as for him, neither none he needeth, nor also none can have. Men come not to sanctuary as they come to baptism, to require<sup>393</sup> it by their godfathers. He must ask it himself that must have it. And reason,<sup>394</sup> since no man hath cause to have it but whose conscience of his own fault maketh him have need to require it, what will<sup>395</sup> then hath yonder babe? Which, and<sup>396</sup> if he had discretion to require it, if need were, I dare say would now be right angry with them that keep him there. And I would think, without any scruple of conscience, without any breach of privilege, to be somewhat more homely<sup>397</sup> with them that be there sanctuary men indeed. For if one go to sanctuary with another man’s goods, why should not the King, leaving his body at liberty, satisfy the party of<sup>398</sup> his goods even within the sanctuary? For neither king nor pope can give any place such a privilege that it shall discharge a man of his debts, being able to pay.”

And with that, diverse of the clergy that were present—whether they said it for his pleasure, or as they thought—agreed plainly that, by the law of God and of the Church, the goods of a sanctuary man should be delivered in payment of his debts, and stolen goods to the owner, and only liberty reserved him to get his living with the labor of his hands.

“Verily,”<sup>399</sup> quoth the Duke, “I think you say very truth. And what if a man’s wife will take sanctuary because she list<sup>400</sup> to run from her husband? I would ween<sup>401</sup> if she can allege none other cause, he may lawfully, without any displeasure to Saint Peter, take her out of Saint Peter’s church by the arm. And if nobody may be taken out of sanctuary that saith he will bide there, then if a child will take sanctuary because he feareth to go to school, his master must let him alone. And as simple as that example is, yet is there less reason in our case than in that. For therein though it be a childish fear, yet is there at the leastwise some fear. And herein is there none at all. And verily I have often heard of sanctuary men. But I never heard erst<sup>402</sup> of sanctuary children. And therefore as for the conclusion of my mind, whoso

376 upon the boldness: relying on the security 377 go whistle them: a contemptuous dismissal; bid... them: Til W313 378 items of precious metal 379 due to 380 pillage; make raids 381 However 382 if... hands to: Whit

H81; Til H97 383 wot nere: know not 384 pious 385 prudent, cunning, shrewd 386 in 387 hinder 388 In order that 389 that liberty: i.e., the liberty to do others wrong 390 very nature: nature itself 391 to that regard: in that respect

392 protection 393 ask 394 that stands to reason 395 desire or cause (for it) 396 even 397 unceremonious; direct 398 with 399 Truly 400 wants 401 think 402 before may have deserved to need it, if they think it for their surety,<sup>403</sup> let them keep it. But he can be no sanctuary man that neither hath wisdom to desire it, nor malice to deserve it, whose life or liberty can 5 by no lawful process stand in jeopardy. And he that taketh one out of sanctuary to do him good, I say plainly that he breaketh no sanctuary.”

When the Duke had done, the temporal men whole, and good part of the spiritual also, thinking none hurt earthly meant toward the young babe, condescended<sup>404</sup> in effect, that if he were not delivered, he should be fetched. Howbeit,<sup>405</sup> they thought it all best, in the avoiding of all manner of rumor, that the Lord Cardinal should first assay<sup>406</sup>
 15 to get him with her good will. And thereupon all the Council came unto the Star Chamber at Westminster. And the Lord Cardinal, leaving the Protector with the Council in the Star Chamber, departed into the sanctuary to the Queen, with diverse other
 20 lords with him—were it for the respect of his honor, or that she should by presence of so many perceive that this errand was not one man’s mind, or were it for that<sup>407</sup> the Protector intended not in this matter to trust any one man alone, or else that 25 if she finally were determined to keep him, some of that company had haply<sup>408</sup> secret instruction incontinent, maugre<sup>409</sup> her mind, to take him and to leave her no respite<sup>410</sup> to convey him, which she was likely to mind<sup>411</sup> after this matter broken<sup>412</sup> to her, if her 30 time would in any wise serve her.

When the Queen and these lords were come together in presence,<sup>413</sup> the Lord Cardinal showed unto her that it was thought unto<sup>414</sup> the Protector and unto the whole Council that her keeping of the 35 King’s brother in that place was the thing which highly sounded,<sup>415</sup> not only to the great rumor of the people and their obloquy,<sup>416</sup> but also to the importable<sup>417</sup> grief and displeasure of the King’s royal majesty. To whose Grace it were as singular comfort
 40 to have his natural brother in company, as it was their both dishonor and all theirs and hers also, to suffer him in sanctuary. As though the one brother stood in danger and peril of the other. And he showed her that the Council therefore had sent him

unto her, to require<sup>418</sup> her the delivery of him, that he might be brought unto the King’s presence at his liberty, out of that place which they reckoned as a prison. And there should he be demeaned<sup>419</sup> according to his estate. And she in this doing should both do great good to the realm, pleasure to the Council, and profit to herself, succor to her friends that were in distress, and over<sup>420</sup> that (which he wist<sup>421</sup> well she specially tendered<sup>422</sup>), not only great comfort and honor to the King, but also to the young Duke himself, whose both great wealth<sup>423</sup> it were to be together, as well for many greater causes, as also for their both disport<sup>424</sup> and recreation; which thing the lords esteemed not slight, though it seem light, well pondering that their youth without recreation and play cannot endure, nor any stranger<sup>425</sup> 55 for the convenience of<sup>426</sup> their both ages and estates so meetly<sup>427</sup> in that point for any of them as either of them for other.

“My lord,” quoth the Queen, “I say not nay but that it were very convenient<sup>428</sup> that this gentleman, whom ye require,<sup>429</sup> were in the company of the King, his brother. And in good faith methinketh it were as great commodity<sup>430</sup> to them both, as for yet a while, to be in the custody of their mother, the tender age considered of the elder of them both, but special the younger, which besides his infancy, that also needeth good looking to, hath a while been so sore<sup>431</sup> diseased, vexed with sickness, and is so newly rather a little amended than well-recovered, that I dare put no person earthly in trust with his keeping but myself only, considering that there is, as physicians say and as we also find, double the peril in the recidivation<sup>432</sup> that was in the first sickness,<sup>433</sup> with which disease, nature—being forelabored, foreworn and weakened—waxeth<sup>434</sup> the less able to bear out a new surfeit.<sup>435</sup> And albeit<sup>436</sup> there might be founden others that would haply do their best unto him, yet is there none that either knoweth better how to order him than I that so long have kept him, or is more tenderly like to cherish him than his own mother that bore him.”

“No man denieth, good madam,” quoth the Cardinal, “but that your Grace were of all folk most

403 safety 404 agreed 405 However 406 endeavor 407 for that: because 408 perhaps 409 incontinent, maugre:
 immediately, despite 410 opportunity 411 intend 412 was told, revealed
 413 in formal presence of royalty

414 by 415 gave rise 416 reproach
 417 unbearable 418 ask 419 treated 420 besides 421 knew 422 cared about 423 happiness; well-being 424 fun 425 any stranger: anyone outside the family 426 convenience of: suitability to 427 appropriately 428 fitting 429 ask for 430 a benefit 431 grievously 432 relapse 433 double...sickness:

 Til R62 434 becomes 435 illness 436 although

necessary about your children, and so would all the Council not only be content but also glad that ye were, if it might stand with your pleasure to be in such place as might stand with their honor. But if 5 you appoint yourself to tarry<sup>437</sup> here, then think they yet more convenient<sup>438</sup> that the Duke of York were with the King, honorably at his liberty to the comfort of them both, than here as a sanctuary man to their both dishonor and obloquy;<sup>439</sup> since there 10 is not always so great necessity to have the child be with the mother, but that occasion may sometimes be such that it should be more expedient to keep him elsewhere. Which in this well appeareth that at such 15 time as your dearest son, then prince and now king, should for his honor and good order of the country, keep household in Wales, far out of your company, your Grace was well content therewith yourself.”

“Not very well content,” quoth the Queen. “And yet the case is not like, for the one was then in health,
 20 and the other is now sick. In which case I marvel greatly that my Lord Protector is so desirous to have him in his keeping, where if the child in his sickness miscarried by nature,<sup>440</sup> yet might he run into slander and suspicion of fraud. And where<sup>441</sup> they call it
 25 a thing so sore<sup>442</sup> against my child’s honor and theirs also that he bideth<sup>443</sup> in this place, it is all their honors there to suffer him bide, where no man doubteth, he shall be best kept. And that is here, while I am 30 here, which<sup>444</sup> as yet intend not to come forth and jeopard<sup>445</sup> myself after<sup>446</sup> others of my friends, which would God were rather here in surety<sup>447</sup> with me than I were there in jeopardy with them.”

“Why, madam,” quoth another lord, “know you anything why they should be in jeopardy?”

35 “Nay, verily,<sup>448</sup> sir,” quoth she, “nor why they should be in prison neither, as they now be. But it is, I trow,<sup>449</sup> no great marvel though I fear, lest those that have not letted<sup>450</sup> to put them in duress<sup>451</sup> without color,<sup>452</sup> will let as little to procure their destruction 40 without cause.”

The Cardinal made a countenance to the other lord that he should harp no more upon that string.<sup>453</sup> And then said he to the Queen that he 45 nothing doubted but that those lords of her honorable kin, which as yet remained under arrest, should, upon the matter examined, do well enough. And as toward her noble person, neither was nor could be, any manner<sup>454</sup> jeopardy.

“Whereby should I trust that?” quoth the Queen. “In that I am guiltless? As though they were guilty.
 50 In that I am with their enemies better beloved than they? When they hate them for my sake? In that I am so near of kin to the King? And how far be they off? — if that would help, as God send grace it hurt
 55 not. And therefore as for me, I purpose not as yet to depart hence. And as for this gentleman, my son, I mind that he shall be where I am till I see further. For I assure you, for that<sup>455</sup> I see some men so greedy without any substantial cause to have him, this maketh 60 me much the more fearder<sup>456</sup> to deliver him.”

“Truly, madam,” quoth he, “and the fearder that you be to deliver him, the fearder be other men to suffer<sup>457</sup> you to keep him, lest your causeless fear
 65 might cause you farther to convey him. And many be there that think that he can have no privilege in this place which neither can have will to ask it nor malice to deserve it. And therefore they reckon 70 no privilege broken, though they fetch him out. Which, if ye finally refuse to deliver him, I verily think they will. So much dread hath my lord his uncle, for the tender love he beareth him, lest your 75 Grace should hap to send him away.”

“Ah, sir,” quoth the Queen, “hath the Protector so tender zeal to him that he feareth nothing but 80 lest he should escape him? Thinketh he that I would send him hence which neither is in the plight<sup>458</sup> to send out, and in what place could I reckon him sure, if he be not sure in this the sanctuary whereof was there never tyrant yet so devilish that durst<sup>459</sup> presume to break? And I trust God is as strong now to 85 withstand his adversaries, as ever he was.

But my son ‘can deserve no sanctuary, and therefore he cannot have it’? Forsooth,<sup>460</sup> he hath foun-
 90 den a goodly gloss<sup>461</sup> by which that place that may defend a thief may not save an innocent. But ‘he is in no jeopardy, nor hath no need thereof.’ Would God he had not. Troweth the Protector<sup>462</sup> (I pray God he may prove a protector), troweth he that I perceive not whereunto his painted process draweth?<sup>463</sup> ‘It is not honorable that the Duke bide here.’ ‘It were

437 appoint . . . tarry: decide to remain 438 appropriate 439 disgrace 440 miscarried by nature: died of natural causes
 441 whereas 442 terribly 443 stays 444 who (i.e., she herself) 445 endanger 446 like 447 safety 448 truly

449 believe 450 hesitated 451 forcible restraint; imprisonment 452 justifiable evidence 453 harp . . . that string: Whit S838; Til S934 454 kind of 455 for that: because 456 afraid 457 allow 458 condition 459 dared 460 In truth

461 pretext 462 Troweth the Protector:
 Does the Protector believe 463 painted process draweth: pretended proceeding leads to

comfortable for them both that he were with his brother, because the King lacketh a playfellow' — be ye sure.<sup>464</sup> I pray God send them both better playfellows than him, that maketh so high a matter upon such a trifling pretext, as though there could none be founden to play with the King but if<sup>465</sup> his brother (that hath no lust to play, for sickness) come out of sanctuary, out of his safeguard, to play with him. As though princes, as young as they be, could not play but with their peers, or children could not play but with their kindred, with whom for the more part they agree much worse than with strangers.<sup>466</sup> But the child 'cannot require<sup>467</sup> the privilege.' Who told him so? He shall hear him ask it, an he will.<sup>468</sup> Howbeit, this is a gay<sup>469</sup> matter: suppose he could not ask it; suppose he would not ask it; suppose he would ask to go out. If I say he shall not, if I ask the privilege but for myself, I say: he that against my will taketh out him, breaketh the sanctuary. Serveth this liberty for my person only, or for my goods too? Ye may not hence take my horse from me, and may you take my child from me? He is also my ward, for, as my learned counsel showeth me, since he hath nothing by descent holden by knight's service,<sup>470</sup> the law maketh his mother his guardian. Then may no man, I suppose, take my ward from me out of sanctuary without the breach of the sanctuary. And if my privilege could not serve him, nor he ask it for himself, yet since the law committeth to me the custody of him, I may require it for him — except<sup>471</sup> the law give a child a guardian only for his goods and his lands, discharging him of the cure<sup>472</sup> and safekeeping of his body, for which only both lands and goods serve.

‡<sup>473</sup>And if examples be sufficient to obtain privilege for my child, I need not far to seek. For in this place in which we now be (and which is now in question whether my child may take benefit of it), mine other son, now king, was born and kept in his cradle, and preserved to a more prosperous fortune, which I pray God long to continue. And as all you know, this is not the first time that I have taken sanctuary, for when my lord my husband was banished and thrust out of his kingdom, I fled hither being great with child, and here I bore the Prince. And when my lord my husband returned safe again and had the victory, then went I hence to welcome him home, and from hence I brought my babe the Prince unto his father, when he first took him in his arms. And I pray God that my son's palace may be as great safeguard to him now reigning, as this place was sometimes to the King's enemy. In which place I intend to keep his brother, since* man's law serveth<sup>474</sup> the guardian to keep the infant. The law of nature wil- leth the mother keep her child. God's law privilege- the sanctuary, and the sanctuary my son, since I fear to put him in the Protector's hands that hath his brother already, and were, if both failed, inheritor to the crown. The cause of my fear hath no man to do<sup>475</sup> to examine. And yet fear I no further than the law feareth, which, as learned men tell me, forbid- deth every man the custody of them by whose death he may inherit less land than a kingdom. I can<sup>476</sup> no more, but whosoever he be that breaketh this holy sanctuary, I pray God shortly send him need of sanc- tuary, when he may not come to it. For taken out of sanctuary would I not my mortal enemy were."

The Lord Cardinal, perceiving that the Queen waxed ever the longer the farther off,<sup>477</sup> and also that she began to kindle and chafe, and speak sore<sup>478</sup> biting words against the Protector, and such as he neither believed and was also loath to hear, he said unto her for a final conclusion, that he would no longer dispute the matter. But if she were content to deliver the Duke to him and to the other lords there present, he durst<sup>479</sup> lay his own body and soul both in pledge, not only for his surety<sup>480</sup> but also for his estate.<sup>481</sup> And if she would give them a reso- lute answer to the contrary, he would forthwith<sup>482</sup> depart therewithal, and shift<sup>483</sup> whoso would with this business afterward; for he never intended more to move her in that matter in which she thought that he and all others also, save herself, lacked ei- ther wit or troth:<sup>484</sup> wit, if they were so dull that they could nothing perceive what the Protector in- tended; troth, if they should procure her son to be delivered into his hands, in whom they should per- ceive toward the child any evil intended.

464 be ye sure: oh sure! 465 but if: unless 466 children: . . . strangers: Til K38, K97; Whit K63 467 ask for 468 an he will: if he wants 469 specious 470 knight's service: land ownership given to those who served the king in war 471 unless 472 care 473 ‡: The editor of the 1557 Workes added this note: "This that is here between this mark ‡ and this mark* was not written by Mr. More in this history written by him in English, but is translated out of this history which he wrote in Latin." 474 appoints (as legal heir) 475 hath: . . . to do: is no one's business 476 can say 477 waxed: . . . off: grew evermore, the longer she talked, farther from giving up her son 478 harsh 479 dared 480 safety 481 condition 482 immediately 483 deal 484 wit or troth: intelligence or trustworthiness/truthfulness

The Queen with these words stood a good while in a great study.<sup>485</sup> And forasmuch her seemed the Cardinal<sup>486</sup> more ready to depart than some of the remnant, and the Protector himself ready at hand, so that she verily<sup>487</sup> thought she could not keep him there, but that he should incontinent<sup>488</sup> be taken thence; and to convey him elsewhere, neither had she time to serve her, nor place determined, nor persons appointed, all things unready (this message came on her so suddenly), nothing less looking for than to have him fetched out of sanctuary, which she thought to be now beset in such places about that he could not be conveyed out untaken, and partly as she thought it might fortune<sup>489</sup> her fear to be false, so well she wist<sup>490</sup> it was either needless or bootless,<sup>491</sup> wherefore, if she should needs go from him, she deemed it best to deliver him. And over<sup>492</sup> that, of the Cardinal's faith she nothing doubted, nor of some other lords neither, whom she there saw, which as she feared lest they might be deceived, so was she well assured they would not be corrupted. Then thought she it should yet make them the more warily to look to him, and the more circumspectly to see to his surety, if she with her own hands betook him to them of trust.

And at the last she took the young duke by the hand, and said unto the lords: "My lord," quoth she, "and all my lords, I neither am so unwise to mistrust your wits, nor so suspicious to mistrust your troths. Of which thing I purpose to make you such a proof as, if either of both lacked in you, might turn both me to great sorrow, the realm to much harm, and you to great reproach. For lo, here is," quoth she, "this gentleman, whom I doubt not but I could here keep safe if I would, whatsoever any man say. And I doubt not also but there be some abroad so deadly enemies unto my blood that if they wist where any of it lay in their own body, they would let it out. We have also had experience that the desire of a kingdom knoweth no kindred.<sup>493</sup> The brother hath been the brother's bane.<sup>494</sup> And may the nephews be sure of their uncle? Each of these children is other's defense while they be asunder,<sup>495</sup> and each of their lives lieth in the other's body. Keep one safe and both be sure, and nothing for them both more perilous than to be both in one place. For what wise merchant adventureth<sup>496</sup> all his goods in one ship?<sup>497</sup> All this notwithstanding, here I deliver him, and his brother in him, to keep into your hands, of whom I shall ask them both afore God and the world. Faithful ye be, that wot<sup>498</sup> I well, and I know well you be wise. Power and strength to keep him, if ye list,<sup>499</sup> neither lack ye of yourself, nor can lack help in this cause. And if ye cannot elsewhere, then may you leave him here. But only one thing I beseech you, for the trust that his father put in you ever, and for the trust that I put in you now, that as far as ye think that I fear too much, be you well ware<sup>500</sup> that you fear not as far too little."<sup>501</sup>

And therewithal<sup>502</sup> she said unto the child, "Farewell, my own sweet son; God send you good keeping. Let me kiss you once yet ere<sup>503</sup> you go, for God knoweth when we shall kiss together again." And therewith she kissed him, and blessed him, turned her back and wept and went her way, leaving the child weeping as fast.

When the Lord Cardinal and these other lords with him had received this young duke, they brought him into the Star Chamber, where the Protector took him in his arms and kissed him with these words: "Now welcome, my lord, even with all my very heart." And he said, in that, of likelihood as he thought.

Thereupon forthwith<sup>504</sup> they brought him to the King his brother, into the bishop's palace at Paul's, and from thence through the city honorably into the Tower, out of which after that day they never came abroad.

‡<sup>505</sup>When the Protector had both the children in his hands, he opened himself more boldly, both to certain other men, and also chiefly to the Duke of Buckingham, although I know that many thought that this duke was privy to all the Protector's counsel, even from the beginning. And some of the Protector's friends said that the Duke was the first mover of the Protector to this matter, sending a privy messenger unto him straight, after King Edward's death. But others again, which knew better

485 in a great study: Whit S854; Til S945
486 her seemed the Cardinal: the Cardinal seemed to her 487 truly 488 immediately 489 chance 490 knew 491 useless 492 besides 493 the desire of... no kindred: Whit D167 494 The brother... bane: Til H211 495 separated 496 risks 497 what wise... one ship: Til A209 498 know 499 want; choose to 500 wary 501 as far... too little: Whit W685; Til W912 502 with that 503 before 504 at once 505 ‡: The editor of the 1557 Workes added this note: "This that is here between this mark ‡ and this mark* was not written by Mr. More in this history written by him in English, but is translated out of this history which he wrote in Latin."

the subtle wit of the Protector, deny that he ever opened his enterprise to the Duke until he had brought to pass the things before rehearsed.<sup>506</sup> But when he had imprisoned the Queen's kinsfolks, and gotten both her sons into his own hands, then he opened the rest of his purpose with less fear to them whom he thought meet<sup>507</sup> for the matter, and specially to the Duke, who being won to his purpose, he thought his strength more than half increased.

The matter was broken<sup>508</sup> unto the Duke by subtle folks, and such as were their craft-masters in the handling of such wicked devices,<sup>509</sup> who declared unto him that the young King was offended with him for his kinsfolk's sakes, and that if he were ever able, he would revenge them, who would prick<sup>510</sup> him forward thereunto, if they escaped (for they would remember their imprisonment). Or else if they were put to death, without doubt the young King would be careful for<sup>511</sup> their deaths, whose imprisonment was grievous unto him. And that with repenting, the Duke should nothing avail for there was no way left to redeem his offense by benefits, but he should sooner destroy himself than save the King, who with his brother and his kinsfolks he saw in such places imprisoned, as the Protector might with a beck<sup>512</sup> destroy them all; and that it were no doubt but he would do it indeed, if there were any new enterprise attempted. And that it was likely that as the Protector had provided privy guard for himself, so had he spials<sup>513</sup> for the Duke, and trains<sup>514</sup> to catch him if he should be against him, and that peradventure<sup>515</sup> from them, whom he least suspected. For the state of things and the dispositions of men were then such that a man could not well tell whom he might trust, or whom he might fear. These things and suchlike, being beaten into the Duke's mind, brought him to that point that, where he had repented the way that he had entered, yet would he go forth in the same; and since he had once begun, he would stoutly go through. And therefore to this wicked enterprise, which he believed could not be voided,<sup>516</sup> he bent himself and went through, and determined that since the common mischief could not be amended, he would turn it as much as he might to his own commodity.<sup>517</sup>

Then it was agreed that the Protector should have the Duke's aid to make him king, and that the Protector's only lawful son should marry the Duke's daughter, and that the Protector should grant him the quiet<sup>518</sup> possession of the earldom of Hereford, which he claimed as his inheritance, and could never obtain it in King Edward's time. Besides these requests of the Duke, the Protector of his own mind promised him a great quantity of the King's treasure and of his household stuff. And when they were thus at a point<sup>519</sup> between themselves, they went about to prepare for the coronation of the young King, as they would have it seem. And that they might turn both the eyes and minds of men from perceiving of their drifts<sup>520</sup> otherwise,<sup>521</sup> the lords, being sent for from all parts of the realm, came thick to that solemnity. But the Protector and the Duke, after that, that they had set the Lord Cardinal,<sup>522</sup> the Archbishop of York<sup>523</sup> [with] the Lord Chancellor,<sup>524</sup> the Bishop of Ely,<sup>525</sup> the Lord Stanley,<sup>526</sup> and the Lord Hastings (then Lord Chamberlain), with many other noblemen, to commune and devise<sup>527</sup> about the coronation in one place, as fast were they in another place contriving the contrary, and to make the Protector king. To which council, albeit<sup>528</sup> there were adhibit<sup>529</sup> very few, and they very secret, yet began there, here and there about, some manner of muttering among the people, as though all should not long be well, though they neither wist<sup>530</sup> what they feared nor wherefore:<sup>531</sup> were it that before such great things, men's hearts of a secret instinct of nature misgiveth them<sup>532</sup> (as the sea without wind swelleth of himself sometimes before a tempest), or were it that some one man haply somewhat perceiving,<sup>533</sup> filled many men with suspicion, though he showed few men what he knew. Howbeit,<sup>534</sup> somewhat the dealing itself made men to muse on the matter, though the council were close.<sup>535</sup> For little and<sup>536</sup> little all folk withdrew from the Tower and drew to Crosby's Place in Bishopsgate's Street where the Protector kept his household. The Protector had the resort;<sup>537</sup>

506 related 507 suitable 508 told, revealed 509 schemes 510 spur, drive 511 careful for: grief-stricken over 512 nod 513 spies 514 traps 515 perhaps 516 avoided 517 advantage 518 uncontestable legally 519 at a point: agreed 520 schemes 521 elsewhere;

turn . . . otherwise: Whit S309; Til S438 522 Thomas Bourchier 523 Thomas Rotherham 524 [with] . . . Chancellor: John Russell, Bishop of London (corrected from the Latin) 525 John Morton 526 Thomas Stanley 527 commune and devise: confer and plan 528 although

529 admitted 530 knew 531 why 532 misgiveth them: give them a foreboding; men's . . . them: Til M475 533 haply somewhat perceiving: perhaps perceiving something 534 However 535 secret 536 by 537 assemblage of people the King, in manner desolate.<sup>538</sup> While some for their business made suit to them that had the doing, some were by their friends secretly warned that it might haply<sup>539</sup> turn them to no good to be too much attendant about the King without the Protector's appointment — which<sup>540</sup> removed also diverse of the Prince's old servants from him and set new about him.

Thus many things coming together, partly by chance, partly of purpose, caused at length not common people only that wave with the wind,<sup>541</sup> but wise men also and some lords eke,<sup>542</sup> to mark the matter and muse thereon, so far-forth that the Lord Stanley (that was after Earl of Derby) wisely mistrusted it, and said unto the Lord Hastings that he much disliked these two several<sup>543</sup> councils. "For while we," quoth he, "talk of one matter in the one place, little wot<sup>544</sup> we whereof they talk in the other place."

"My lord," quoth the Lord Hastings, "on my life, never doubt<sup>545</sup> you. For while one man is there, which is never thence, never can there be thing once minded that should sound amiss toward me but it should be in mine ears ere<sup>546</sup> it were well out of their mouths."

This meant he by<sup>547</sup> Catesby, which was of his near secret counsel and whom he very familiarly used, and in his most weighty matters put no man in so special trust, reckoning himself to no man so lief,<sup>548</sup> since he well wist<sup>549</sup> there was no man to him so much beholden as was this Catesby, which was a man well learned in the laws of this land and, by the special favor of the Lord Chamberlain,<sup>550</sup> in good authority, and much rule bore in all the county of Leicester where the Lord Chamberlain's power chiefly lay. But surely great pity was it that he had not had either more troth<sup>551</sup> or less wit. For his dissimulation only, kept all that mischief up. In whom if the Lord Hastings had not put so special trust, the Lord Stanley and he had departed with diverse other lords, and broken all the dance,<sup>552</sup> for many ill signs that he saw, which he now construed all to the best. So surely thought he that there could be none harm toward him in that council intended where Catesby was.

And of truth, the Protector and the Duke of Buckingham made very good semblance unto the Lord Hastings, and kept him much in company. And undoubtedly the Protector loved him well, and loath was to have lost him, saving for fear lest his life<sup>553</sup> should have quailed<sup>554</sup> their purpose. For which cause he moved Catesby to prove<sup>555</sup> with some words cast out afar off, whether he could think it possible to win the Lord Hastings into their party. But Catesby, whether he assayed him<sup>556</sup> or assayed him not, reported unto them that he found him so fast,<sup>557</sup> and heard him speak so terrible words, that he durst no further break.<sup>558</sup> And of troth<sup>559</sup> the Lord Chamberlain of very trust showed unto Catesby the mistrust that others began to have in the matter. And therefore he, fearing lest their motions might with the Lord Hastings diminish his credence, whereunto only all the matter leaned, procured<sup>560</sup> the Protector hastily to rid<sup>561</sup> him. And much the rather,<sup>562</sup> for that<sup>563</sup> he trusted by his death to obtain much of the rule that the Lord Hastings bore in his country, the only desire whereof<sup>564</sup> was the allective<sup>565</sup> that induced him to be partner and one special contriver of all this horrible treason.

Whereupon soon after, that is to wit,<sup>566</sup> on the Friday the thirteenth day of June, many lords assembled in the Tower and there sat in council, devising the honorable solemnity of the King's coronation, of which the time appointed then so near approached that the pageants and subtleties<sup>567</sup> were in making day and night at Westminster, and much victual<sup>568</sup> killed therefor that afterward was cast away. These lords so sitting together communing of<sup>569</sup> this matter, the Protector came in among them, first about nine of the clock, saluting them courteously, and excusing himself that he had been from them so long, saying merrily that he had been asleep that day. And after a little talking with them, he said unto the Bishop of Ely, "My lord, you have very good strawberries at your garden in Holborn; I require<sup>570</sup> you, let us have a mess of them."

538 the King... desolate: the King was, as it were, isolated 539 perhaps 540 who 541 that wave with the wind: Til W 439; Whit W 339 542 also 543 separate 544 knew 545 fear 546 before 547 concerning 548 dear 549 knew 550 Lord Hastings 551 trustworthiness

552 broken... dance: ended the whole conspiracy; Whit D11 553 staying alive 554 destroyed 555 test 556 assayed him: put him to the test 557 steadfast 558 durst... break: dared not reveal more 559 truthfulness; faithfulness 560 persuaded 561 do away with 562 more readily 563 for that: because 564 for which 565 allurement, enticement 566 say 567 pageants and subtleties: stage platforms and props or decorations 568 food 569 communings of: conferring about 570 ask of “Gladly, my lord,” quoth he. “Would God I had some better thing as ready to your pleasure as that.” And therewith in all the haste he sent his servant for a mess of strawberries.

5 The Protector set the lords fast in communing, and thereupon, praying them to spare him for a little while, departed thence.

And soon, after one hour, between ten and eleven, he returned into the chamber among them, all changed with a wonderful sour, angry countenance, knitting the brows, frowning and fretting and gnawing on his lips, and so sat him down in his place, all the lords much dismayed and sore<sup>571</sup> marveling of this manner of sudden change, and what thing should him ail. Then when he had sitten still a while, thus he began: “What were they worthy to have, that compass and imagine<sup>572</sup> the destruction of me, being so near of blood unto the King and Protector of his royal person and his realm?”

20 At this question, all the lords sat sore astonished,<sup>573</sup> musing much by whom this question should be meant, of which every man wist<sup>574</sup> himself clear. Then the Lord Chamberlain, as he that for the love between them thought he might be boldest with him, answered and said that they were worthy to be punished as heinous traitors, whatsoever they were. And all the others affirmed the same.

“That is,” quoth he, “yonder sorceress my brother’s wife—and others with her,” meaning the Queen.

30 At these words many of the other lords were greatly abashed that favored her. But the Lord Hastings was in his mind better content that it was moved by<sup>575</sup> her than by any other whom he loved better, albeit<sup>576</sup> his heart somewhat grudged that he was not afore made of counsel in this matter, as he was of the taking of her kindred and of their putting to death, which were by his assent before devised to be beheaded at Pomfret this selfsame day, in which he was not ware<sup>577</sup> that it was by others devised that himself should the same day be beheaded at London.

40 Then said the Protector, “Ye shall all see in what wise<sup>578</sup> that sorceress and that other witch of her counsel, Shore’s wife, with their affinity,<sup>579</sup> have by their sorcery and witchcraft wasted my body.” And therewith he plucked up his doublet sleeve to his elbow upon his left arm, where he showed a wearish,<sup>580</sup> withered arm and small—as it was never other.<sup>581</sup>

And thereupon every man’s mind sore misgave them, well perceiving that this matter was but a quarrel. For well they wist that the Queen was too wise to go about any such folly. And also if she would, yet would she of all folk least make Shore’s wife of counsel, whom of all women she most hated, as that concubine whom the King, her husband, had most loved. And also no man was there present but well knew that his arm was ever such, since his birth.

Nevertheless, the Lord Chamberlain (which from the death of King Edward kept Shore’s wife, on whom he somewhat doted in the King’s life, saving, as it is said, he that while<sup>582</sup> forbore her of reverence toward his King, or else of a certain kind of fidelity to his friend) answered and said, “Certainly, my lord, if they have so heinously done, they be worthy heinous punishment.”

“What?” quoth the Protector. “Thou servest me, I ween,<sup>583</sup> with ‘if’s and with ‘and’s!<sup>584</sup> I tell thee, they have so done, and that I will make good on thy body, traitor!”

And therewith, as in a great anger, he clapped his fist upon the board,<sup>585</sup> a great rap. At which token given, one cried “Treason!” without the chamber. Therewith a door clapped, and in came there rushing men in harness,<sup>586</sup> as many as the chamber might hold. And anon<sup>587</sup> the Protector said to the Lord Hastings, “I arrest thee, traitor.”

“What? Me, my lord?” quoth he.

“Yea, thee, traitor!” quoth the Protector. 80

And another let fly at the Lord Stanley, which<sup>588</sup> shrank at the stroke and fell under the table, or else his head had been cleft to the teeth; for as shortly<sup>589</sup> as he shrank, yet ran the blood about his ears.

Then were they all quickly bestowed in diverse chambers, except the Lord Chamberlain, whom the Protector bade speed and shrive him apace,<sup>590</sup> “for by Saint Paul,” quoth he, “I will not to dinner till I see thy head off.” It booted<sup>591</sup> him not to ask why, but heavily<sup>592</sup> he took a priest at adventure,<sup>593</sup> and made a short shrift,<sup>594</sup> for a longer would not be suffered,<sup>595</sup> the Protector made so much haste

571 greatly 572 compass and imagine: plot and plan 573 astonished 574 knew 575 moved by: said about 576 although 577 aware 578 way 579 allies

580 shrived 581 otherwise 582 that while: during that time 583 think 584 with ‘if’s... ‘and’s: Til I16 585 table 586 armor 587 at once 588 who

589 quickly 590 shrive... apace: give him a quick confession 591 helped 592 sadly 593 at adventure: at random 594 confession of his sins 595 allowed to dinner—which he might not go to till this were done, for saving of his oath. So was he brought forth into the green beside the chapel within the Tower, and his head laid down upon a long log of timber, and there stricken off, and afterward his body with the head interred at Windsor beside the body of King Edward, whose both souls our Lord pardon.

A marvelous case is it to hear either the warnings of that he should have voided<sup>596</sup> or the tokens of that he could not void. For the self night next<sup>597</sup> before his death, the Lord Stanley sent a trusty secret messenger unto him at midnight in all the haste, requiring<sup>598</sup> him to rise and ride away with him, for he was disposed utterly no longer to bide;<sup>599</sup> he had so fearful a dream, in which him thought that a boar with his tusks so razed them both by the heads that the blood ran about both their shoulders.<sup>600</sup> And forasmuch as the Protector gave the boar for his cognizance,<sup>601</sup> this dream made so fearful an impression in his heart that he was thoroughly determined no longer to tarry, but had his horse ready, if the Lord Hastings would go with him to ride so far yet the same night, that they should be out of danger ere<sup>602</sup> day.

“Ay, good lord,” quoth the Lord Hastings to this messenger, “leaneth my lord thy master so much to such trifles, and hath such faith in dreams, which either his own fear fantasieth<sup>603</sup> or do rise in the night’s rest by reason of his day thoughts? Tell him it is plain witchcraft to believe in such dreams—which if they were tokens of things to come, why thinketh he not that we might be as likely to make them true by our going if we were caught and brought back (as friends fail fleers)?<sup>604</sup> For then had the boar a cause likely to raze us with his tusks, as folk that fled for some falsehood, wherefore either is there no peril—nor none there is indeed—or if any be, it is rather in going than biding.<sup>605</sup> And if we should needs cost<sup>606</sup> fall in peril one way or other, yet had I liefer<sup>607</sup> that men should see it were by other men’s falsehood than think it were either our own fault or faint heart. And therefore go to thy master, man, and commend me to him, and pray him be merry and have no fear: for I ensure<sup>608</sup> him I am as sure of the man that he wotteth<sup>609</sup> of as I am of my own hand.”<sup>610</sup>

“God send grace, sir,” quoth the messenger, and went his way.

Certain is it also that in the riding toward the Tower, the same morning in which he was beheaded, his horse twice or thrice stumbled with him almost to the falling;<sup>611</sup> which thing, albeit each man wot well daily happeneth to them to whom no such mischance is toward,<sup>612</sup> yet hath it been of an old rite<sup>613</sup> and custom observed as a token oftentimes notably foregoing some great misfortune.

Now this that followeth was no warning, but an envious scorn. The same morning ere he were up, came a knight unto him, as<sup>614</sup> it were of courtesy to accompany him to the Council, but of troth<sup>615</sup> sent by the Protector to haste him thitherward, with whom he was of secret confederacy in that purpose, a mean<sup>616</sup> man at that time, and now of great authority. This knight, when it happed the Lord Chamberlain by the way to stay his horse and commune<sup>617</sup> a while with a priest whom he met in the Tower street, broke<sup>618</sup> his tale and said merrily to him, “What, my lord, I pray you come on. Whereto<sup>619</sup> talk you so long with that priest? You have no need of a priest yet.” And therewith he laughed upon him, as though he would say, “Ye shall have soon.” But so little wist<sup>620</sup> the other what he meant, and so little mistrusted, that he was never merrier nor never so full of good hope in his life—which self<sup>621</sup> thing is often seen a sign of change. But I shall rather let anything pass<sup>622</sup> me than the vain surety<sup>623</sup> of man’s mind so near his death.<sup>624</sup>

Upon the very Tower wharf, so near the place where his head was off so soon after, there met he with one Hastings, a pursuivant of his own name.<sup>625</sup> And of their meeting in that place, he was put in remembrance of another time, in which it had happened them before, to meet in like manner together in the same place. At which other time the Lord Chamberlain had been accused unto King Edward by the Lord Rivers, the Queen’s brother, in such wise that he was for the while (but it lasted not long) far

596 avoided 597 self night next: very last night 598 asking 599 stay 600 a boar... shoulders: Til R7 601 coat of arms 602 before 603 dreams... fantasieth: Whit S952, D387; Til D587 604 friends fail fleers: those who flee lack friends; Whit F637 605 staying 606 needs cost: of necessity 607 rather 608 assure 609 knows 610 I am... own hand: Whit H76 611 stumbled... falling: Til T9 612 impending 613 practice 614 as if 615 of troth:

in truth 616 low-ranking 617 talk 618 revealed 619 Why 620 knew 621 very 622 go unmentioned upon by 623 security 624 vain... death: Til T223 625 pursuivant... name: royal messenger by same name (i.e., Hastings) fallen into the King's indignation, and stood in great fear of<sup>626</sup> himself. And forasmuch as he now met this pursuivant in the same place, that jeopardy so well past, it gave him great pleasure to talk with him thereof with whom he had before talked thereof, in the same place while he was therein.

And therefore he said, "Ah, Hastings, art thou remembered when I met thee here once with a heavy heart?"

10 "Yea, my Lord," quoth he, "that remember I well; and thanked be God they got no good, nor ye none harm thereby."

"Thou wouldst say so," quoth he, "if thou knewest as much as I know, which few know else as yet and more shall shortly." That meant he by<sup>627</sup> the lords of the Queen's kindred that were taken before and should that day be beheaded at Pomfret — which he well wist, but nothing ware<sup>628</sup> that the axe hung over his own head.<sup>629</sup>

20 "In faith, man," quoth he, "I was never so sorry,<sup>630</sup> nor never stood in so great dread in my life as I did when thou and I met here. And lo, how the world is turned:<sup>631</sup> now stand mine enemies in the danger (as thou mayest hap to hear more hereafter), and I never in my life so merry, nor never in so great surety."<sup>632</sup>

O good God, the blindness of our mortal nature! When he most feared, he was in good surety; when he reckoned himself surest, he lost his life,<sup>633</sup> and that within two hours after.

Thus ended this honorable man, a good knight and a gentle, of great authority with his prince, of living somewhat dissolute, plain and open to his enemy and secret to his friend, easy to beguile, as he that of good heart and courage<sup>634</sup> forestudied no perils; a loving man and passing well beloved; very faithful, and trusty enough, trusting too much.<sup>635</sup>

Now flew the fame of this lord's death swiftly through the city, and so forth farther about like a wind<sup>636</sup> in every man's ear. But the Protector immediately after dinner, intending to set some color<sup>637</sup> upon the matter, sent in all the haste for many substantial men out of the city into the Tower. And at their coming, himself, with the Duke of Buckingham, stood harnessed in old ill-faring briganders,<sup>638</sup> such as no man should ween<sup>639</sup> that they would vouchsafe<sup>640</sup> to have put upon their backs, except that some sudden necessity had constrained them. And then the Protector showed them that the Lord Chamberlain and others of his conspiracy had contrived to have suddenly destroyed him and the Duke there, the same day, in the Council. And what they intended further was as yet not well known. Of which their treason he never had knowledge before ten of the clock the same forenoon. Which sudden fear drove them to put on for their defense such harness<sup>641</sup> as came next to hand. And so had God helped them, that the mischief turned upon them that would have done it. And this he required<sup>642</sup> them to report.

Every man answered him fair,<sup>643</sup> as though no man mistrusted the matter which of troth no man believed.<sup>644</sup> Yet for the further appeasing of the people's mind, he sent immediately after dinner, in all the haste, one herald of arms with a proclamation to be made through the city in the King's name, containing that the Lord Hastings, with diverse others of his traitorous purpose, had before conspired the same day to have slain the Lord Protector and the Duke of Buckingham sitting in the Council, and after to have taken upon them to rule the King and the realm at their pleasure, and thereby to pill and spoil<sup>645</sup> whom they list,<sup>646</sup> uncontrolled. And much matter was there in the proclamation devised to the slander of the Lord Chamberlain, as that he was an evil counselor to the King's father, enticing him to many things highly redounding to the diminishing of his honor and to the universal hurt of his realm, by his evil company, sinister procuring, and ungracious example, as well in many other things as in the vicious living and inordinate abusion<sup>647</sup> of his body, both with many others and also specially with Shore's wife, which was one also of his most secret counsel of this heinous treason, with whom he lay nightly, and namely the night last past next before his death, so that it was the less marvel if ungracious living brought him to an unhappy ending,<sup>648</sup> which he was now put unto, by the most dread 626 for 627 That . . . by: By that he meant 628 aware, wary 629 nothing . . . head: Whit S979 630 sad; distressed 631 lo . . . turned: Whit W672; Til W901 632 safety, security 633 when . . . life: Til T223 634 spirit, disposition 635 trusty . . . too much: Whit T492; Til T549 636 Now . . . wind: Whit W294 637 reasonable excuse; justification 638 body armor 639 think 640 be willing 641 armor 642 asked 643 agreeably 644 Every . . . believed:

Whit W581, D122, F50 645 pill and spoil: pillage and steal from 646 wished 647 misuse 648 ungracious . . . ending: Whit E186, L0; Til L392, L247 commandment of the King's Highness and of his honorable and faithful Council, both for his demerits, being so openly taken in his falsely conceived treason, and also lest the delaying of his execution might have encouraged other mischievous persons, partners of his conspiracy, to gather and assemble themselves together in making some great commotion for his deliverance, whose hope now being by his well-deserved death politicly<sup>649</sup> repressed, all the realm should by God's grace rest in good quiet and peace.

Now was this proclamation made within two hours after that he was beheaded, and it was so curiously indited,<sup>650</sup> and so fair written in parchment in so well a set hand, and therewith of itself so long a process, that every child might well perceive that it was prepared before. For all the time between his death and the proclaiming could scant<sup>651</sup> have sufficed unto the bare writing alone, all had it been but in paper and scribbled forth in haste at adventure.<sup>652</sup> So that upon the proclaiming thereof, one that was schoolmaster of Paul's, of chance standing by, and comparing the shortness of the time with the length of the matter, said unto them that stood about him, "Here is a gay goodly cast, foul cast<sup>653</sup> away for haste."<sup>654</sup> And a merchant answered him that it was written by prophecy.

Now then, by and by,<sup>655</sup> as it were for anger not for covetise, the Protector sent into the house of Shore's wife (for her husband dwelled not with her) and spoiled<sup>656</sup> her of all that ever she had, above the value of two or three thousand marks,<sup>657</sup> and sent her body to prison. And when he had a while laid unto<sup>658</sup> her, for the manner sake,<sup>659</sup> that she went about to bewitch him and that she was of counsel<sup>660</sup> with the Lord Chamberlain to destroy him, in conclusion, when that no color<sup>661</sup> could fasten upon these matters, then he laid heinously to her charge the thing that herself could not deny, that all the world wist<sup>662</sup> was true, and that nevertheless every man laughed at to hear it then so suddenly so highly<sup>663</sup> taken: that she was naught<sup>664</sup> of her body.

And for this cause (as a goodly continent prince, clean and faultless of himself, sent out of heaven into this vicious world for the amendment of men's manners) he caused the Bishop of London to put her to open<sup>665</sup> penance, going before the cross in procession upon a Sunday with a taper<sup>666</sup> in her hand. In which she went in countenance and pace demure so womanly, and albeit<sup>667</sup> she were out of all array<sup>668</sup> save her kirtle<sup>669</sup> only, yet went she so fair and lovely, namely<sup>670</sup> while the wondering of the people cast a comely rud<sup>671</sup> in her cheeks (of which she before had most miss), that her great shame won her much praise among those that were more amorous of<sup>672</sup> her body than curious of her soul.<sup>673</sup> And many good folk also, that hated her living and glad were to see sin corrected, yet pitied they more her penance than rejoiced therein, when they considered that the Protector procured it more of a corrupt intent than any virtuous affection.

This woman was born in London, worshipfully friended,<sup>674</sup> honestly brought up, and very well married (saving somewhat too soon), her husband an honest citizen, young and goodly and of good substance.<sup>675</sup> But forasmuch as they were coupled ere<sup>676</sup> she were well ripe, she not very fervently loved for whom she never longed. Which was haply<sup>677</sup> the thing that the more easily made her incline unto the King's appetite when he required<sup>678</sup> her. Howbeit,<sup>679</sup> the respect of his royalty, the hope of gay apparel, ease, pleasure, and other wanton wealth was able soon to pierce a soft tender heart. But when the King had abused her, anon<sup>680</sup> her husband (as he was an honest man and one that could his good,<sup>681</sup> not presuming to touch a King's concubine) left her up to him altogether. When the King died, the Lord Chamberlain took her. Which in the King's days, albeit<sup>682</sup> he was sore<sup>683</sup> enamored upon her, yet he forbore her, either for reverence or for a certain friendly faithfulness.

Proper she was and fair, nothing in her body that you would have changed, but if<sup>684</sup> you would have wished her somewhat higher. Thus say they that

649 prudently; shrewdly; craftily
650 curiously indited: elaborately composed 651 hardly 652 random
653 cast... cast: trick... thrown (a play on words) 654 a gay... haste: Whit H162; Til H189 655 by and by: immediately 656 despoiled 657 two... marks: i.e., about £1,500–2,000 (a considerable sum in those days) 658 laid unto: brought charges against 659 manner sake: sake of appearances; Til M806; Whit M464, M363 660 of counsel: in a plot 661 pretext, appearance 662 knew 663 seriously 664 immoral, wicked

665 public 666 candle 667 although 668 attire 669 simple gown or petticoat 670 especially 671 comely rud: beautiful redness 672 about 673 much...

soul: Til F13 674 worshipfully friended: befriended by honorable persons 675 wealth 676 before 677 perhaps 678 asked 679 However 680 immediately 681 could his good: knew what was good for him; Til G321 682 although 683 greatly 684 but if: unless knew her in her youth, albeit some that now see her (for yet she liveth) deem her never to have been well-visaged.<sup>685</sup> Whose judgment seemeth me somewhat like as though men should guess the beauty of one long before departed by her scalp<sup>686</sup> taken out of the charnel house:<sup>687</sup> for now is she old, lean, withered, and dried up, nothing left but riveled<sup>688</sup> skin and hard bone.<sup>689</sup> And yet being even such, whoso well advise her visage,<sup>690</sup> might guess and devise<sup>691</sup> which parts how filled would make it a fair face.

Yet delighted not men so much in her beauty as in her pleasant behavior. For a proper wit<sup>692</sup> had she, and could both read well and write, merry in company, ready and quick of answer, neither mute nor full of babble,<sup>693</sup> sometimes taunting without displeasure and not without disport.<sup>694</sup> The King would say that he had three concubines, which in three diverse properties diversely excelled: one the merriest, another the wiliest, the third the holiest harlot in his realm, as one whom no man could get out of the church lightly<sup>695</sup> to any place, but<sup>696</sup> it were to his bed. The other two were somewhat greater personages, and nevertheless of their humility content to be nameless, and to forbear<sup>697</sup> the praise of those properties. But the merriest was this Shore's wife, in whom the King therefore took special pleasure. For many he had, but her he loved, whose favor, to say the truth (for sin it were to belie the devil),<sup>698</sup> she never abused to any man's hurt, but to many a man's comfort and relief. Where the King took displeasure, she would mitigate and appease his mind; where men were out of favor, she would bring them in his grace. For many that had highly offended, she obtained pardon. Of great forfeitures she got men remission. And finally in many weighty suits,<sup>699</sup> she stood many men in great stead, either for none, or very small rewards, and those rather gay than rich — either for that<sup>700</sup> she was content with the deed itself well done, or for that she delighted to be sued unto and to show what she was able to do with the King, or for that wanton women and wealthy be not always covetous.

I doubt not some shall think this woman too slight a thing to be written of and set among the remembrances of great matters, which they shall specially think that haply<sup>701</sup> shall esteem her only by that they now see her. But meseemeth the chance<sup>702</sup> so much the more worthy to be remembered, in how much she is now in the more beggarly condition: unfriended and worn-out of acquaintance,<sup>703</sup> after good substance,<sup>704</sup> after as great favor with the Prince, after as great suit and seeking-to<sup>705</sup> with all those that those days had business to speed,<sup>706</sup> as many other men were in their times, which<sup>707</sup> be now famous only by the infamy of their ill deeds. Her doings were not much less, albeit they be much less remembered because they were not so evil. For men use,<sup>708</sup> if they have an evil turn, to write it in marble; and whoso doth us a good turn, we write it in dust<sup>709</sup> — which is not worst proved by her, for at this day she beggeth of many at this day living, that at this day had begged if she had not been.<sup>710</sup>

Now was it so devised by the Protector and his Council that the self<sup>711</sup> day in which the Lord Chamberlain was beheaded in the Tower of London, and about the selfsame hour, was there (not without his assent) beheaded at Pomfret the fore-remembered lords and knights that were taken from the King at Northampton and Stony Stratford. Which thing was done in the presence and by the order of Sir Richard Radcliff, knight, whose service the Protector specially used in the counsel<sup>712</sup> and in the execution of such lawless enterprises, as a man that had been long secret with him, having experience of the world and a shrewd<sup>713</sup> wit, short<sup>714</sup> and rude in speech, rough and boisterous of behavior, bold in mischief, as far from pity as from all fear of God. This knight — bringing them out of the prison to the scaffold, and showing to the people about that they were traitors, not suffering<sup>715</sup> them to speak and declare their innocence lest their words might have inclined men to pity them, and to hate the Protector and his party — caused them hastily, without judgment, process,<sup>716</sup> or manner of order to be beheaded, and without other earthly guilt but only

685 pretty faced 686 skull 687 the charnel house: a building in which skulls and bones are piled up 688 wrinkled 689 riveled... bone: Whit S362 690 advise her visage: considers her face 691 imagine 692 proper wit: fine mind 693 full of babble: Til F465 694 entertainment 695 easily 696 unless

697 avoid 698 sin... devil: Whit S337; Til S470 699 appeals (to the King) 700 for that: because 701 perhaps 702 event, circumstances 703 worn... acquaintance: having no companions left 704 wealth 705 suit and seeking-to: petition and searching to obtain things from 706 expedite 707 who 708 are accustomed 709 men... dust: Whit T531 710 she begged... not been: Til B223 711 very same. They actually occurred, however, on June 25, not June 13. 712 planning 713 cunning; wicked 714 curt 715 allowing 716 legal process that they were good men, too true to the King and too nigh<sup>717</sup> to the Queen.

Now when the Lord Chamberlain and these other lords and knights were thus beheaded and rid out of the way, then thought the Protector that while men mused what the matter meant, while the lords of the realm were about him, out of their own strengths, while no man wist<sup>718</sup> what to think nor whom to trust, ere ever they should have space to dispute and digest the matter and make parties, it were best hastily to pursue his purpose and put himself in possession of the crown, ere men could have time to devise any ways to resist. But now was all the study<sup>719</sup> by what means this matter, being of itself so heinous, might be first broken<sup>720</sup> to the people, in such wise<sup>721</sup> that it might be well taken. To this counsel<sup>722</sup> they took diverse,<sup>723</sup> such as they thought meetly<sup>724</sup> to be trusted, likely to be induced to that party, and able to stand them in stead,<sup>725</sup> either by power or policy.

Among whom they made of counsel Edmund Shaa, knight, then Mayor of London, which upon trust of his own advancement whereof he was of a proud heart highly desirous, should frame<sup>726</sup> the city to their appetite. Of spiritual men they took such as had wit and were in authority among the people for opinion of their learning, and had no scrupulous conscience. Among these had they John Shaa, clerk,<sup>727</sup> brother to the Mayor, and Friar Penker,<sup>728</sup> Provincial of the Augustinian Friars, both doctors of divinity, both great preachers, both of more learning than virtue, of more fame than learning. For they were before greatly esteemed among the people, but after that never.

Of these two the one had a sermon in praise of the Protector before the coronation, the other after; both so full of tedious flattery that no man's ears could abide them. Penker in his sermon so lost his voice that he was fain<sup>729</sup> to leave off and come down in the mids.<sup>730</sup> Doctor Shaa by his sermon lost his honesty, and soon after his life, for very shame of the world, into which he durst<sup>731</sup> never after come abroad. But the friar forced<sup>732</sup> for no shame, and so it harmed him the less. Howbeit, some doubt<sup>733</sup> and many thincken that Penker was not of counsel of the matter before the coronation, but, after the common manner, fell to flattery after — namely since his sermon was not incontinent upon<sup>734</sup> it, but at St. Mary Hospital at the Easter after. But certain is it that Doctor Shaa was of counsel in the beginning, so far-forth<sup>735</sup> that they determined that he should first break the matter in a sermon at Paul's Cross,<sup>736</sup> in which he should by the authority of his preaching incline the people to the Protector's ghostly<sup>737</sup> purpose.

But now was all the labor and study<sup>738</sup> in the devise of some convenient<sup>739</sup> pretext for which the people should be content to depose the Prince and accept the Protector for king. In which, diverse things they devised. But the chief thing and the weighty of all that invention rested in this:<sup>740</sup> that they should allege bastardy, either in King Edward himself or in his children, or both, so that he should seem disabled to inherit the crown by the Duke of York, and the Prince by him.

To lay bastardy in King Edward sounded openly to the rebuke<sup>741</sup> of the Protector's own mother, which was mother to them both; for in that point could be none other color<sup>742</sup> but to pretend that his own mother was an adulteress — which, notwithstanding, to further this purpose he letted<sup>743</sup> not. But nevertheless he would the point should be less and more favorably handled, not even fully plain and directly, but that the matter should be touched aslope,<sup>744</sup> craftily, as though men spared in that point to speak all the truth for fear of his displeasure. But the other point concerning the bastardy that they devised to surmise<sup>745</sup> in King Edward's children — that, would he<sup>746</sup> should be openly declared and enforced<sup>747</sup> to the uttermost.

The color and pretext whereof cannot be well perceived but if<sup>748</sup> we first repeat you some things long before done about King Edward's marriage. After that King Edward the Fourth had deposed King Henry the Sixth and was in peaceable possession of the realm, determining himself to marry (as it was requisite both for himself and for the realm),

717 near 718 knew 719 all the study: Whit S854 720 revealed 721 a way 722 To this counsel: Into this plot 723 several (individuals) 724 fit 725 stand them in stead: be of benefit to them 726 shape, dispose 727 cleric 728 Thomas Penker (d. 1487)

729 obliged 730 middle 731 dared 732 cared 733 suspect 734 incontinent upon: immediately following (the coronation) 735 so far-forth: to such an extent 736 Paul's Cross: an open-air pulpit on the grounds of St. Paul's Cathedral 737 shadowy; spiritual 738 all the labor and study: Whit S854 739 suitable 740 the chief... in this: Til W5 741 sounded... rebuke: suggested clearly the disgrace 742 pretext; justification 743 hesitated, refrained 744 indirectly 745 allege, accuse 746 would be: he wanted that it 747 emphasized 748 but if: unless he sent over in embassiate<sup>749</sup> the Earl of Warwick,<sup>750</sup> with other noblemen in his company, unto Spain, to entreat<sup>751</sup> and conclude a marriage between King Edward and the King's daughter of Spain. In which thing the Earl of Warwick found the parties so toward<sup>752</sup> and willing that he speedily, according to his instructions, without any difficulty brought the matter to very good conclusion.

Now happed it that in the mean season<sup>753</sup> there came, to make a suit<sup>754</sup> by petition to the King, Dame Elizabeth Grey (which was after his queen, at that time a widow), born of noble blood, specially by her mother, which was Duchess of Bedford ere<sup>755</sup> she married the Lord Woodville, her father. Howbeit,<sup>756</sup> this Dame Elizabeth, herself being in service with Queen Margaret, wife unto King Henry the Sixth, was married unto one John Grey, a squire, whom King Henry made knight upon the field<sup>757</sup> that he had on Shrove Tuesday<sup>758</sup> at Saint Albans against King Edward. And little while enjoyed he that knighthood, for he was at the same field slain. After which done, and the Earl of Warwick being in his embassiate<sup>759</sup> about the aforeremembered<sup>760</sup> marriage, this poor lady made humble suit unto the King that she might be restored unto such small lands as her late husband had given her in jointure.<sup>761</sup> Whom, when the King beheld and heard her speak — as she was both fair, of a good favor, moderate of stature, well-made, and very wise — he not only pitied her, but also waxed<sup>762</sup> enamored on her. And taking her afterward secretly aside, began to enter in talking more familiarly. Whose appetite when she perceived, she virtuously denied him. But that did she so wisely, and with so good manner, and words so well set, that she rather kindled his desire than quenched it. And finally, after many a meeting, much wooing, and many great promises, she well espied the King's affection toward her so greatly increased that she durst<sup>763</sup> somewhat the more boldly say her mind, as to him whose heart she perceived more firmly set than to fall off for a word. And in conclusion she showed him plain that, as she wist<sup>764</sup> herself too simple to be his wife, so thought she herself too good to be his concubine. 45

The King, much marveling of her constancy, as he that had not been wont elsewhere to be so stiffly said nay, so much esteemed her continence and chastity that he set her virtue in the stead of possession and riches.<sup>765</sup> And thus taking counsel of his desire, determined in all possible haste to marry her. 50

And after he was thus appointed,<sup>766</sup> and had between them twain ensured<sup>767</sup> her, then asked he counsel of his other friends, and that in such manner as they might easily perceive it booted<sup>768</sup> not greatly to say nay. Notwithstanding, the Duchess of York, his mother, was so sore<sup>769</sup> moved therewith that she dissuaded the marriage as much as she possibly might, alleging that it was his honor, profit, and surety<sup>770</sup> also, to marry in a noble progeny out of his realm, whereupon depended great strength to his estate by the affinity<sup>771</sup> and great possibility of increase of his possessions — and that he could not well otherwise do, standing<sup>772</sup> that the Earl of Warwick had so far moved already. Which<sup>773</sup> were not likely to take it well if all his voyage<sup>774</sup> were in such wise frustrate and his appointments deluded.<sup>775</sup> 60

And she said also that it was not princely to marry his own subject, no great occasion leading thereunto, no possessions or other commodities depending thereupon, but only as<sup>776</sup> it were a rich man that would marry his maid,<sup>777</sup> only for a little wanton dotage upon her person. In which marriage many more commend the maiden's fortune than the master's wisdom. And yet therein she said was more honesty than honor in this marriage, forasmuch as there is between no merchant and his own maid so great difference as between the King and this widow. In whose person, albeit<sup>778</sup> there was nothing to be misliked, yet was there, she said, "nothing so excellent but that it might be founden in diverse others that were more meetly,"<sup>779</sup> quoth she, "for your estate, and maidens also; whereas the only widowhood<sup>780</sup> of Elizabeth Grey, though she were in all other things convenient<sup>781</sup> for you, should yet suffice, as meseemeth, to refrain you from her 85

749 in embassiate: as an ambassador
750 Richard Neville, a cousin of Edward IV 751 negotiate
752 obliging
753 mean season: meantime 754 an appeal
755 before 756 However 757 battlefield
758 Shrove Tuesday: the day before Ash Wednesday
759 in his embassiate: on his ambassadorial mission

760 aforeremembered: aforementioned
761 in jointure: as property to be hers in the event of his death 762 grew 763 dared 764 knew 765 set... riches: Til N22; Whit N112, H447
766 decided 767 twain ensured: two become engaged to 768 helped 769 greatly 770 safety
771 marriage alliance
772 considering

773 Who 774 undertaking; journey
775 mocked
776 as if 777 it was...
778 maid: Whit M175, M4
779 although 779 appropriate
780 the only widowhood: the widowhood alone
781 suitable, appropriate marriage, since it is an unsitting<sup>782</sup> thing, and a very blemish and high disparagement to the sacred majesty of a prince, that ought as nigh to approach priesthood in cleanness as he doth in dignity, to be defouled with bigamy<sup>783</sup> in his first marriage.”

The King, when his mother had said, made her answer, part in earnest, part in play merrily, as he that wist himself out of her rule. And albeit he would gladly that she should take it well, yet was at a point<sup>784</sup> in his own mind, took she it well or otherwise. Howbeit, somewhat to satisfy her, he said that albeit marriage, being a spiritual thing, ought rather to be made for the respect of God where his grace inclineth the parties to love together as he trusted it was in his than for the regard of any temporal advantage, yet nevertheless him seemed<sup>785</sup> that this marriage, even worldly considered, was not unprofitable. For he reckoned the amity of no earthly nation so necessary for him as the friendship of his own, which he thought likely to bear him so much the more hearty favor in that he disdained not to marry with one of his own land. And yet if outward<sup>786</sup> alliance were thought so requisite, he would find the means to enter thereinto much better by other of his kin, where all the parties could be contented, than to marry himself whom he should haply<sup>787</sup> never love, and for the possibility of more possessions, lose the fruit and pleasure of this that he had already. For small pleasure taketh a man of all that ever he hath beside, if he be wived against his appetite.

“And I doubt not,” quoth he, “but there be, as ye say, others that be in every point comparable with her. And therefore I let<sup>788</sup> not them that like them to wed them. No more is it reason that it mislike<sup>789</sup> any man that I marry where it liketh me. And I am sure that my cousin of Warwick neither loveth me so little to grudge at that I love, nor is so unreasonable to look that I should, in choice of a wife, rather be ruled by his eye than by mine own, as though I were a ward that were bound to marry by the appointment of a guardian. I would not be a king with that condition, to forbear<sup>790</sup> mine own liberty in choice of my own marriage. As for possibility of more inheritance by new affinity in estrange<sup>791</sup> lands, is oft the occasion of more trouble than profit. And we have already title by that means to so much as sufficeth to get and keep well in one man’s days.<sup>792</sup> That she is a widow and hath already children, by God’s blessed Lady, I am a bachelor and have some too, and so each of us hath a proof that neither of us is like to be barren. And therefore, madam, I pray you be content; I trust in God she shall bring forth a young prince that shall please you. And as for the bigamy, let the bishop hardily<sup>793</sup> lay it in my way when I come to take orders.<sup>794</sup> For I understand it is forbidden a priest, but I never wist<sup>795</sup> it yet that it was forbidden a prince.”

The Duchess, with these words nothing appeased, and seeing the King so set thereon that she could not pull him back, so highly she disdained<sup>796</sup> it that, under pretext of her duty to Godward,<sup>797</sup> she devised to disturb this marriage, and rather to help that he should marry one Dame Elizabeth Lucy, whom the King had also not long before gotten with child. Wherefore the King’s mother objected openly against his marriage, as<sup>798</sup> it were in discharge of her conscience, that the King was sure<sup>799</sup> to Dame Elizabeth Lucy and her husband before God. By reason of which words, such obstacle was made in the matter that either the bishops durst<sup>800</sup> not, or the King would not, proceed to the solemnization of this wedding till these same<sup>801</sup> were clearly purged and the truth well and openly testified. Whereupon Dame Elizabeth Lucy was sent for.

And albeit that<sup>802</sup> she was by the King’s mother and many others put in good comfort to affirm that she was ensured<sup>803</sup> unto the King, yet when she was solemnly sworn to say the truth, she confessed that they were never ensured. Howbeit,<sup>804</sup> she said his Grace spoke so loving words unto her that she verily<sup>805</sup> hoped he would have married her, and that if it had not been for such kind words, she would never have showed such kindness to him, to let him so kindly get her with child.

This examination solemnly taken, when it was clearly perceived that there was none impediment, the King with great feast and honorable solemnity married Dame Elizabeth Grey, and her crowned Queen that was his enemy’s wife and many times had prayed full heartily for his loss. In which God loved her better than to grant her her boon.<sup>806</sup>

782 unbecoming 783 marriage to a widowed person 784 decision 785 him seemed: it seemed to him 786 foreign 787 perhaps 788 prevent 789 displease 790 do without; give up 791 affinity...

lands: alliance by marriage in foreign lands 792 so... days: Til E163 793 by all means 794 take orders: receive holy orders, be ordained a priest 795 knew 796 was offended by 797 to Godward: toward

God 798 as if 799 engaged, legally betrothed 800 dared 801 i.e., charges 802 albeit that: although 803 engaged 804 However 805 truly 806 wish, prayer

But when the Earl of Warwick understood of this marriage, he took it so highly<sup>807</sup> that his embassiate was deluded<sup>808</sup> that, for very anger and disdain, he at his return assembled a great puissance<sup>809</sup> against the King, and came so fast upon him ere<sup>810</sup> he could be able to resist, that he was fain to void<sup>811</sup> the realm and flee into Holland for succor, where he remained for the space of two years, leaving his new wife in Westminster in sanctuary, where she was delivered of Edward the Prince, of whom we before have spoken. In which meantime the Earl of Warwick took out of prison and set up again King Henry the Sixth, which was before by King Edward deposed and that muchwhat<sup>812</sup> by the power of the Earl of Warwick, which was a wise man and a courageous warrior, and of such strength, what for<sup>813</sup> his lands, his alliance,<sup>814</sup> and favor with all the people, that he made kings and put down kings almost at his pleasure, and not impossible to have attained it himself, if he had not reckoned it a greater thing to make a king than to be a king.

But nothing lasteth always,<sup>815</sup> for in conclusion King Edward returned, and, with much less number than he<sup>816</sup> had, at Barnet on the Easter Day field, slew the Earl of Warwick with many other great estates<sup>817</sup> of that party, and so stably attained the crown again that he peaceably enjoyed it until his dying day, and in such plight left it that it could not be lost but by the discord of his very friends, or falsehood of his feigned friends.

I have rehearsed<sup>818</sup> this business about this marriage somewhat the more at length because it might thereby the better appear upon how slipper<sup>819</sup> a ground the Protector builded his color,<sup>820</sup> by which he pretended King Edward's children to be bastards. But that invention simple as it was, it liked them to whom it sufficed to have somewhat to say, while they were sure to be compelled to no larger proof than themselves list<sup>821</sup> to make.

Now then, as I began to show you, it was by the Protector and his Council concluded that this Doctor Shaa should in a sermon at Paul's Cross signify to the people that neither King Edward himself nor the Duke of Clarence were lawfully begotten, nor were not the very children of the Duke of York, but begotten unlawfully by other persons by the adultery of the Duchess, their mother; and that also Dame Elizabeth Lucy was verily the wife of King Edward, and so the Prince and all his children bastards that were gotten upon the Queen.

According to this device,<sup>822</sup> Doctor Shaa, the Sunday after<sup>823</sup> at Paul's Cross in a great audience (as always assembled great number to his preaching), he took for his theme Spuria vitulamina non agent radices altas, that is to say, "Bastard slips<sup>824</sup> shall never take deep root."<sup>825</sup> Thereupon when he had showed the great grace that God giveth and secretly infoundeth<sup>826</sup> in right generation after the laws of matrimony, then declared he that commonly those children lacked that grace, and for the punishment of their parents, were for the more part unhappy, which were gotten in bast<sup>827</sup> and specially in adultery. Of which, though some by the ignorance of the world and the truth hid from knowledge inherited for the season other men's lands, yet God always so provideth that it continueth not in their blood long, but the truth coming to light,<sup>828</sup> the rightful inheritors be restored and the bastard slip pulled up ere it can be rooted deep.

And when he had laid for the proof and confirmation of this sentence certain examples taken out of the Old Testament and other ancient histories, then began he to descend into the praise of the Lord Richard, late Duke of York, calling him father to the Lord Protector, and declared the title of his heirs unto the crown, to whom it was, after the death of King Henry the Sixth, entailed by authority of Parliament. Then showed he that his very right heir of his body, lawfully begotten, was only the Lord Protector. For he declared then that King Edward was never lawfully married unto the Queen, but was, before God, husband unto Dame Elizabeth Lucy, and so his children bastards. And besides that, neither King Edward himself nor the Duke of Clarence, among those that were secret in the household, were reckoned very surely for the children of the noble Duke, as those that by their favors<sup>829</sup> more resembled other known men than him, from whose virtuous conditions he said also that King Edward was far off. "But the Lord Protector,"

807 indignantly 808 frustrated, mocked 809 military force 810 before 811 fained to void: forced to leave 812 to a great extent 813 what for: what with, because of 814 connections

815 nothing lasteth always: Whit N158 816 the Earl 817 nobles 818 related 819 slippery, false 820 justification 821 wished 822 plan, scheme 823 after Hastings's execution 824 shoots;

offspring 825 See Wis 4:3. 826 infuses 827 in bast: in bastardy, out of wedlock 828 God . . . light: Til T324 829 looks, faces

he said, “that very noble prince, the special pattern of knightly prowess, as well in all princely behavior as in the lineaments<sup>830</sup> and favor of his visage, represented the very face of the noble Duke his father. This is,” quoth he, “the father’s own figure; this is his own countenance, the very print<sup>831</sup> of his visage, the sure undoubted image, the plain express likeness of that noble duke.”

Now was it before devised that in the speaking of these words the Protector should have comen in among the people to the sermonward,<sup>832</sup> to the end that those words, meeting with his presence, might have been taken among the hearers as though the Holy Ghost had put them in the preacher’s mouth, and should have moved the people even there to cry: “King Richard! King Richard!” — that it might have been after said that he was specially chosen by God and, in manner,<sup>833</sup> by miracle. But this device quailed,<sup>834</sup> either by the Protector’s negligence or the preacher’s overmuch diligence. For while the Protector found, by the way, tarrying<sup>835</sup> (lest he should prevent<sup>836</sup> those words), and the Doctor (fearing that he should come ere his sermon could come to those words) hasted his matter thereto, he was come to them and past them and entered into other matters ere the Protector came. Whom, when he beheld coming, he suddenly left the matter with which he was in hand and, without any deduction<sup>837</sup> thereunto, out of all order and out of all frame, began to repeat those words again: “This is the very noble prince, the special pattern of knightly prowess, which as well in all princely behavior as in the lineaments and favor of his visage representeth the very face of the noble Duke of York his father. This is the father’s own figure, this his own countenance, the very print of his visage, the sure undoubted image, the plain express likeness of the noble Duke, whose remembrance can never die while he liveth.”

While these words were in speaking, the Protector, accompanied with the Duke of Buckingham, went through the people into the place where the doctors commonly stand, in the upper story, where he stood to hearken the sermon. But the people were so far from crying “King Richard!” that they stood as they had been turned into stones,<sup>838</sup> for wonder of this shameful sermon. After which once ended, the preacher got him home and never after durst look out, for shame, but kept him out of sight like an owl.<sup>839</sup> And when he once asked one that had been his old friend what the people talked of him, all were it that<sup>840</sup> his own conscience well showed him that they talked no good, yet when the other answered him that there was in every man’s mouth spoken of him much shame, it so struck him to the heart that, within few days after, he withered and consumed away.

Then on the Tuesday following this sermon, there came unto the Guildhall in London the Duke of Buckingham, accompanied with diverse lords and knights, more than haply<sup>841</sup> knew the message that they brought. And there, in the east end of the hall where the Mayor keepeth the Hustings,<sup>842</sup> the Mayor and all the aldermen being assembled about him, all the commons<sup>843</sup> of the city gathered before them, after silence commanded upon great pain in the Protector’s name, the Duke stood up, and (as he was neither unlearned and of nature marvelously well-spoken) he said unto the people with a clear and a loud voice, in this manner of wise:<sup>844</sup>

“Friends, for the zeal and hearty favor that we bear you, we be comen to break<sup>845</sup> unto you of a matter right great and weighty, and no less weighty than pleasing to God and profitable to all the realm — nor to no part of the realm more profitable than to you, the citizens of this noble city. For why? That thing that we wot<sup>846</sup> well ye have long-time lacked and sore<sup>847</sup> longed for, that ye would have given great good for, that ye would have gone far to fetch,<sup>848</sup> that thing we be come hither to bring you, without your labor, pain, cost, adventure, or jeopardy.

“What thing is that? Certes,<sup>849</sup> the surety<sup>850</sup> of your own bodies, the quiet of your wives and your daughters, the safeguard of your goods — of all which things in times past ye stood evermore in doubt.<sup>851</sup> For who was there of you all that would reckon himself lord of his own good, among so many grins<sup>852</sup> and traps as was set therefor, among so much pilling and polling,<sup>853</sup> among so many taxes

830 distinctive features 831 imprint

832 to the sermonward: to listen to the sermon

833 in manner: as it were

834 failed 835 found... tarrying: created, on the way, means of delay 836 arrive before 837 introduction 838 they...

stones: Whit S786 839 kept... owl:

Whit O73 840 all... that: even though

841 perhaps 842 highest London

court for civil matters 843 commoners

844 this manner of wise: words to this effect 845 reveal 846 know

847 greatly 848 That thing... fetch: Whit

F58 849 Certainly 850 security, safety

851 ye... in doubt: Til S817 852 snares

853 pilling and polling: robbing and extorting

and tallages,<sup>854</sup> of which there was never end and oftentime no need; or if any were, it rather grew of riot<sup>855</sup> and unreasonable waste than any necessary or honorable charge.<sup>856</sup> So that there was daily 5 pilled from good men and honest, great substance of goods to be lashed out<sup>857</sup> among unthrifths so far-forth<sup>858</sup> that fifteens<sup>859</sup> sufficed not — nor any usual names of known taxes — but under an easy<sup>860</sup> name of ‘benevolence and good will,’<sup>861</sup> the commissioners so much of every man took as no man would with his good will have given. As though the name of ‘benevolence’ had signified that every man should pay, not what himself of his good will list<sup>862</sup> to grant, but what the King of his good will list to 10 take. Which<sup>863</sup> never asked little, but everything was hawsed<sup>864</sup> above the measure:<sup>865</sup> ameracements<sup>866</sup> turned into fines,<sup>867</sup> fines into ransoms, small trespass to misprision,<sup>868</sup> misprision into treason.

“Whereof, I think, no man looketh that we should 20 remember<sup>869</sup> you of examples by name, as though Burdet were forgotten, that was for a word spoken in haste cruelly beheaded<sup>870</sup> by the misconstruing of the laws of this realm for the Prince’s pleasure; with no less honor to Markham, then Chief Justice, that
 25 left his office rather than he would assent to that judgment, than to the dishonesty of those that, either for fear or flattery, gave that judgment. What<sup>871</sup> Cook, your own worshipful<sup>872</sup> neighbor, alderman and mayor of this noble city? Who is of you either 30 so negligent that he knoweth not, or so forgetful that he remembreth not, or so hard-hearted that he pitieth not, that worshipful man’s loss? What<sup>873</sup> speak we of loss? His utter spoil<sup>874</sup> and undeserved destruction, only for that<sup>875</sup> it happed those to favor him whom the Prince favored not. We need not, I suppose, to rehearse of<sup>876</sup> these any more by name, since there be, I doubt not, many here present that either in themselves or their nigh<sup>877</sup> friends have known as well their goods as their persons greatly 35 endangered, either by feigned quarrels or small matters aggrieved<sup>878</sup> with heinous names.

“And also there was no crime so great of which there could lack a pretext. For since the King, preventing<sup>879</sup> the time of his inheritance, attained the crown by battle, it sufficed in a rich man for a pretext of treason to have been of kindred or alliance,<sup>880</sup> 45 near familiarity or leger<sup>881</sup> acquaintance with any of those that were at any time the King’s enemies, which was at one time and other, more than half the realm. Thus were neither your goods in surety,<sup>882</sup> and yet they brought your bodies in jeopardy — besides the common adventure<sup>883</sup> of open war, which, albeit that<sup>884</sup> it is ever the well<sup>885</sup> and occasion of much mischief, yet is it never so mischievous as where any

 50 people fall at distance<sup>886</sup> among themselves, nor in none earthly nation so deadly and so pestilent as when it happeneth among us, and among us never so long-continued dissension, nor so many battles in the season, nor so cruel and so deadly foughten, as was in the King’s days that dead is, God forgive
 60 it his soul. In whose time and by whose occasion — what about<sup>887</sup> the getting of the garland,<sup>888</sup> keeping it, losing and winning again — it hath cost more English blood than hath twice the winning of France. In which inward war among ourselves hath been
 65 so great effusion of the ancient noble blood of this realm that scarcely the half remaineth, to the great enfeebling of this noble land, besides many a good town ransacked and spoiled<sup>889</sup> by them that have been going to the field<sup>890</sup> or coming from thence. And peace long after not much surer than war.<sup>891</sup> So that no time was there in which rich men for their money and great men for their lands, or some other for some fear or some displeasure were not out of 70 peril. For whom trusted he that mistrusted his own brother? Whom spared he that killed his own brother?<sup>892</sup> Or who could perfectly love him, if his own brother could not?

“What manner of folk he most favored, we shall, for his honor, spare to speak of.<sup>893</sup> Howbeit, this wot you well all: that whoso was best bore always least rule, and more suit was in his days unto Shore’s wife, a vile and an abominable strumpet, than to all the lords in England — except unto those that made her

854 levies 855 extravagance 856 honorable charge: legitimate expense 857 lashed out: squandered 858 so far-forth: to such an extent 859 taxes on personal property, equivalent to one-fifteenth of it 860 convenient 861 benevolence . . . good will: Edward was the first to levy what he termed “benevolences” and “good will” offerings: taxes imposed, without approval by Parliament. 862 chose 863 Who

(the King) 864 raised 865 limit; everything . . . measure: Whit M463 866 small fees or penalties set by the judge 867 fees or penalties set by statute 868 offense similar to but less serious than treason or felony 869 remind 870 that . . . beheaded: Whit W591 871 What of 872 honorable 873 Why 874 robbery 875 for that: because 876 rehearse of: mention 877 close 878 exaggerated

879 anticipating, preceding 880 connection by marriage 881 slight 882 safety 883 common adventure: shared risk 884 albeit that: although 885 well-spring, source 886 discord, dissension 887 with 888 crown 889 plundered 890 battlefield 891 peace . . . war: Til C223 892 Edward’s brother George 893 we . . . speak of: Whit R100; Til R93

their proctor<sup>894</sup> — which simple woman was well-named and honest till the King, for his wanton lust and sinful affection, bereft her from her husband, a right honest substantial<sup>895</sup> young man among 5 you. And in that point, which in good faith I am sorry to speak of, saving that it is in vain to keep in counsel that thing that all men know: the King's greedy appetite was insatiable, and everywhere over all the realm intolerable. For no woman was there
 10 anywhere — young or old, rich or poor, whom he set his eye upon, in whom he anything liked, either person or favor, speech, pace, or countenance — but without any fear of God or respect of his honor, murmur or grudge of the world, he would importunately<sup>896</sup> pursue his appetite and have her, to the 15 great destruction of many a good woman, and great dolor to their husbands and their other friends, which being honest people of themselves so much regard the cleanness of their house, the chastity
 20 of their wives and their children that them were liefer<sup>897</sup> to lose all that they have beside than to have such a villainy done them.

“And all were it that<sup>898</sup> with this and other importable<sup>899</sup> dealing the realm was in every part annoyed,<sup>900</sup> yet specially ye here, the citizens of this noble city, as well for that<sup>901</sup> among you is most plenty of all such things as minister<sup>902</sup> matter to such injuries, as for that you were nearest at hand, since that near hereabout was commonly his most abiding.
 30 And yet be ye the people whom he had as singular cause well and kindly to entreat as any part of his realm, not only for that the Prince by this noble city (as his special chamber and the special well-renowned city of his realm) much honorable fame
 35 receiveth among all other nations, but also for that ye, not without your great cost and sundry perils and jeopardies in all his wars, bore ever your special favor to his party, which your kind minds [have] borne to the house of York, since he hath nothing worthily
 40 acquitted,<sup>903</sup> there is of that house that now, by God's grace, better shall; which thing to show you is the whole sum and effect of this our present errand.

“It shall not, I wot well, need that I rehearse you again that ye have already heard of him that can 45 better tell it, and of whom, I am sure, ye will better believe it. And reason is, that it so be. I am not so proud to look therefor, that ye should reckon my words of as great authority as the preacher's of the word of God, namely a man so cunning and so 50 wise that no man better wotteth what he should say, and thereto<sup>904</sup> so good and virtuous that he would not say the thing which he wist<sup>905</sup> he should not say in the pulpit, namely, into which none honest man cometh to lie. Which honorable preacher, ye 55 well remember, substantially declared unto you, at Paul's Cross on Sunday last past, the right and title that the most excellent prince, Richard Duke of Gloucester, now Protector of this realm, hath unto the crown and kingdom of the same.

“For as that worshipful<sup>906</sup> man groundly<sup>907</sup> made 60 open unto you, the children of King Edward the Fourth were never lawfully begotten, forasmuch as the King (living his very<sup>908</sup> wife, Dame Elizabeth Lucy) was never lawfully married unto the Queen, their mother — whose blood, saving that he set his 65 voluptuous pleasure before his honor, was full unmeetly<sup>909</sup> to be matched with his, and the mingling of whose bloods together hath been the effusion of great part of the noble blood of this realm. Whereby it may well seem that marriage not well made, of
 70 which there is so much mischief grown.<sup>910</sup> For lack of which lawful accoupling and also of other things which the said worshipful doctor rather signified than fully explained, and which things shall not be spoken for me, as the thing wherein<sup>911</sup> every man
 75 forbearth<sup>912</sup> to say that he knoweth in avoiding displeasure of my noble Lord Protector, bearing, as nature requireth a filial reverence to the Duchess, his mother — for these causes, I say, before remembered, that is to wit,<sup>913</sup> for lack of other issue
 80 lawfully coming of the late noble prince Richard Duke of York, to whose royal blood the crown of England and of France is by the high authority of Parliament entailed — the right and title of the same
 85 is by the just course of inheritance, according to the common law of this land, devolute<sup>914</sup> and comen unto the most excellent prince the Lord Protector as to the very lawfully begotten son of the fore-remembered<sup>915</sup> noble Duke of York.

“Which thing well considered, and the great 90 knightly prowess pondered, with manifold virtues which in his noble person singularly abound, the

894 advocate 895 well-to-do 896 persistently, imploringly 897 them were liefer: they would prefer 898 all were it that: although 899 intolerable

900 injured, offended 901 for that:
 because 902 furnish 903 required, repaid 904 also 905 knew 906 honorable 907 soundly 908 true

909 unfit 910 marriage . . . grown: Til M679 911 of which 912 refrains 913 say 914 transmitted to, inherited by 915 previously mentioned

nobles and commons also of this realm, and specially of the north parts, not willing any bastard blood to have the rule of the land, nor the abusions<sup>916</sup> before in the same used<sup>917</sup> any longer to continue, have condescended<sup>918</sup> and fully determined to make humble petition unto the most puissant<sup>919</sup> prince the Lord Protector that it may like his Grace, at our humble request, to take upon him the guiding and governance of this realm to the wealth and increase of the same, according to his very right and just title. Which thing, I wot<sup>920</sup> it well, he will be loath to take upon him, as he whose wisdom well perceiveth the labor and study both of mind and of body that shall come therewith to whomsoever so well occupy that room,<sup>921</sup> as I dare say he will if he take it. Which room, I warn you well, is no child's office.<sup>922</sup> And that, the great wise man<sup>923</sup> well perceived when he said, Vae regno cuius rex puer est, 'Woe is that realm that hath a child to<sup>924</sup> their king.'

"Wherefore, so much the more cause have we to thank God that this noble personage, which is so righteously entitled thereunto, is of so sad<sup>925</sup> age, and thereto of so great wisdom joined with so great experience; which<sup>926</sup> — albeit<sup>927</sup> he will be loath, as I have said, to take it upon him — yet shall he, to our petition in that behalf, the more graciously incline if ye, the worshipful citizens of this the chief city of this realm, join with us, the nobles, in our said request. Which for your own weal<sup>928</sup> we doubt not but ye will, and nevertheless I heartily pray<sup>929</sup> you so to do; whereby you shall do great profit to all this realm beside, in choosing them so good a king, and unto yourselves special commodity,<sup>930</sup> to whom his Majesty shall ever after bear so much the more tender favor, in how much he shall perceive you the more prone and benevolently minded toward his election. Wherein, dear friends, what mind you have, we require<sup>931</sup> you plainly to show us."

When the Duke had said — and looked that the people, whom he hoped the Mayor had framed<sup>932</sup> before, should, after this proposition made, have cried "King Richard! King Richard!" — all was hushed and mute, and not one word answered thereunto. Wherewith the Duke was marvelously abashed, and taking the Mayor nearer to him, with others that were about him privy to that matter, said unto them softly, "What meaneth this, that this people be so still?"

"Sir," quoth the Mayor, "percase<sup>933</sup> they perceive you not well."

"That shall we mend," quoth he, "if that will help."

And by and by,<sup>934</sup> somewhat louder, he rehearsed<sup>935</sup> them the same matter again in other order and other words, so well and ornately, and nevertheless so evidently and plain, with voice, gesture, and countenance so comely and so convenient,<sup>936</sup> that every man much marveled that heard him, and thought that they never had in their lives heard so evil a tale so well told. But were it for wonder or fear, or that each look that other should speak first, not one word was there answered of all the people that stood before, but all was as still as the midnight,<sup>937</sup> not so much as rounding<sup>938</sup> among them, by which they might seem to commune<sup>939</sup> what was best to do.

When the Mayor saw this, he, with other partners of that counsel, drew about the Duke and said that the people had not been accustomed there to be spoken unto but by the Recorder, which is the mouth of the city, and haply<sup>940</sup> to him they will answer.

With that, the Recorder, called Fitzwilliam, a sad<sup>941</sup> man and an honest, which was so new come into that office that he never had spoken to the people before — and loath was with that matter to begin, notwithstanding, thereunto commanded by the Mayor, made rehearsal to the commons<sup>942</sup> of that<sup>943</sup> the Duke had twice rehearsed them himself. But the Recorder so tempered his tale that he showed everything as the Duke's words and no part his own. But all this nothing no change<sup>944</sup> made in the people, which always, after<sup>945</sup> one, stood as they had been men amazed.

Whereupon the Duke rounded<sup>946</sup> unto the Mayor and said, "This is a marvelous obstinate silence," and therewith he turned unto the people again, with these words: "Dear friends, we come to move you to that thing which peradventure<sup>947</sup> we not so greatly needed, but that the lords of this realm and

916 abuses 917 allowed 918 agreed
919 mighty 920 know 921 office
922 Which . . . office: Whit 436; Til W600 923 the great wise man: Solomon. See Eccl 10:16. 924 for 925 mature 926 who 927 although 928 well-being; advantage

929 ask 930 benefit 931 ask 932 shaped, prepared 933 perhaps 934 by and by: immediately 935 told 936 appropriate 937 all . . . midnight:
Whit M532 938 whispering 939 discuss, confer 940 perhaps 941 sober;

grave 942 commoners 943 what 944 nothing no change: no change whatsoever 945 as 946 whispered 947 perhaps the commons of other parts might have sufficed, saving that we such love bear you, and so much set by you, that we would not gladly do without you that thing in which to be partners is your weal and honor, which, as it seemeth, either you see not or weigh not. Wherefore we require<sup>948</sup> you give us answer one or other: whether you be minded as all the nobles of the realm be, to have this noble prince, now Protector, to be your king or not.”

At these words the people began to whisper among themselves secretly, that the voice was neither loud nor distinct, but, as it were, the sound of a swarm of bees,<sup>949</sup> till at the last, in the nether<sup>950</sup> end of the hall, a bushment<sup>951</sup> of the Duke’s servants and Nashfield’s, and others longing<sup>952</sup> to the Protector, with some prentices and lads that thrust<sup>953</sup> into the hall among the press,<sup>954</sup> began suddenly at men’s backs to cry out as loud as their throats would give, “King Richard! King Richard!” — and threw up their caps in token of joy. And they that stood before<sup>955</sup> cast back their heads, marveling thereof, but nothing they said. And when the Duke and the Mayor saw this manner, they wisely turned it to their purpose, and said it was a goodly cry and a joyful to hear, every man with one voice, no man saying nay.

“Wherefore, friends,” quoth the Duke, “since that we perceive it is all your whole minds to have this noble man for your king, whereof we shall make his Grace so effectual<sup>956</sup> report that we doubt not but it shall redound unto your great weal and commodity,<sup>957</sup> we require ye that ye tomorrow go with us and we with you unto his noble Grace, to make our humble request unto him in manner before remembered.”<sup>958</sup>

And therewith the lords came down, and the company dissolved and departed, the more part all sad, some with glad semblance that were not very merry, and some of those that came thither with the Duke, not able to dissemble their sorrow, were fain<sup>959</sup> at his back to turn their face to the wall while the dolor of their heart burst out at their eyes.

Then on the morrow after, the Mayor, with all the aldermen and chief commoners of the city, in their best manner appareled, assembling themselves together, resorted unto Baynard’s Castle, where the Protector lay. To which place repaired also, according to their appointment, the Duke of Buckingham, with diverse noblemen with him, beside many knights and other gentlemen. And thereupon the Duke sent word unto the Lord Protector of the being-there of a great and honorable company, to move a great matter unto his Grace.

Whereupon the Protector made difficulty to come out unto them, but if<sup>960</sup> he first knew some part of their errand, as though he doubted and partly distrusted the coming of such number unto him so suddenly, without any warning or knowledge whether they came for good or harm. Then the Duke, when he had showed this unto the Mayor and others, that they might thereby see how little the Protector looked for this matter, they sent unto him by the messenger such loving message again, and therewith so humbly besought him to vouchsafe<sup>961</sup> that they might resort to<sup>962</sup> his presence to purpose their intent, of which they would unto none other person any part disclose, that at the last he came forth of<sup>963</sup> his chamber, and yet not down unto them, but stood above in a gallery over them, where they might see him and speak to him, as though he would not yet come too near them till he wist<sup>964</sup> what they meant.

And thereupon the Duke of Buckingham first made humble petition unto him, on the behalf of them all, that his Grace would pardon them and license them to purpose<sup>965</sup> unto his Grace the intent of their coming without his displeasure, without which pardon obtained, they durst<sup>966</sup> not be bold to move him of that matter. In which, albeit<sup>967</sup> they meant as much honor to his Grace as wealth to all the realm beside, yet were they not sure how his Grace would take it, whom they would in no wise<sup>968</sup> offend.

Then the Protector, as he was very gentle of himself and also longed sore to wit<sup>969</sup> what they meant, gave him leave to purpose what him liked, verily trusting, for the good mind that he bore them all, none of them anything would intend unto himward wherewith he ought to be grieved. When the Duke had this leave and pardon to speak, then waxed<sup>970</sup> he bold to show him their intent and purpose, with all the causes moving them thereunto, as ye before 948 ask that 949 the sound... bees:

Whit S937 950 lower 951 secretly planted group; ambush 952 belonging 953 forcibly made their way 954 crowd

955 in front 956 enthusiastic; effective 957 advantage 958 previously mentioned 959 obliged 960 but if: unless 961 grant 962 resort to:

come into 963 from 964 knew 965 propose 966 dared 967 although 968 way 969 sore to wit: greatly to know 970 became

have heard, and finally to beseech his Grace that it would like him, of his accustomed goodness and zeal unto the realm, now with his eye of pity, to behold the long-continued distress and decay of the same and to set his gracious hands to the redress and amendment thereof, by taking upon him the crown and governance of this realm, according to his right and title lawfully descended unto him, and to the laud of God, profit of the land, and unto his Grace so much the more honor and less pain, in that that never prince reigned upon any people that were so glad to live under his obeisance<sup>971</sup> as the people of this realm under his.

When the Protector had heard the proposition, he looked very strangely thereat, and answered that, all were it that<sup>972</sup> he partly knew the things by them alleged to be true, yet such entire love he bore unto King Edward and his children, and so much more regarded his honor in other realms about than the crown of any one, of which he was never desirous, that he could not find in his heart in this point to incline to their desire. For in all other nations where the truth were not well known, it should peradventure<sup>973</sup> be thought that it were his own ambitious mind and device to depose the Prince and take himself the crown. With which infamy he would not have his honor stained for any crown. In which, he had ever perceived much more labor and pain than pleasure to him that so would use it as he that would not were not worthy to have it. Notwithstanding, he not only pardoned them the motion that they made him, but also thanked them for the love and hearty favor they bore him, praying them for his sake to give and bear the same to the Prince, under whom he was and would be content to live; and with his labor and counsel, as far as should like the King to use him, he would do his uttermost devoir<sup>974</sup> to set the realm in good state. Which was already in this little while of his protectorship (the praise given to God) well begun, in that the malice of such as were before occasion of the contrary and of new<sup>975</sup> intended to be, were now (partly by good policy, partly more by God's special providence than man's provision<sup>976</sup>) repressed.

Upon this answer given, the Duke, by the Protector's license, a little rounded<sup>977</sup> as well with other noblemen about him as with the Mayor and Recorder of London. And after that, upon like pardon desired and obtained, he showed aloud unto the Protector that, for a final conclusion, that the realm was appointed<sup>978</sup> King Edward's line should not any longer reign upon them, both for that<sup>979</sup> they had so far gone that it was now no surety to retreat, as for that they thought it for the weal universal<sup>980</sup> to take that way, although they had not yet begun it. Wherefore, if it would like his Grace to take the crown upon him, they would humbly beseech him thereunto. If he would give them a resolute answer to the contrary, which they would be loath to hear,<sup>981</sup> then must they needs seek and should not fail to find some other nobleman that would.

These words much moved the Protector, which else,<sup>982</sup> as every man may wit, would never of likelihood have inclined thereunto. But when he saw there was none other way, but that either he must take it or else he and his<sup>983</sup> both go from it,<sup>984</sup> he said unto the lords and commons: "Since we perceive well that all the realm is so set, whereof we be very sorry that they will not suffer<sup>985</sup> in any wise King Edward's line to govern them, whom no man earthly<sup>986</sup> can govern again<sup>987</sup> their wills, and we well also perceive that no man is there to whom the crown can by so just title appertain<sup>988</sup> as to ourselves, as very right heir, lawfully begotten of the body of our most dear father Richard, late Duke of York, to which title is now joined your election, the nobles and commons of this realm, which we of all titles possible take for most effectual:<sup>989</sup> we be content, and agree favorably to incline to your petition and request and, according to the same, here we take upon us the royal estate, preeminence, and kingdom of the two noble realms England and France—the one from this day forward by us and our heirs to rule, govern, and defend; the other, by God's grace and your good help, to get again and subdue, and establish forever in due obedience unto this realm of England, the advancement whereof we never ask of God longer to live than we intend to procure."

With this there was a great shout crying "King Richard! King Richard!"

And then the lords went up to the King (for so was he from that time called), and the people

971 rule; obedience, submission
972 all... that: although 973 perhaps 974 effort 975 of new: recently 976 foresight, planning; more... provision:

Whit M162; Til M298 977 whispered 978 determined 979 for that: because 980 weal universal: good of all 981 which... bear: Whit L418 982 which

else: who otherwise 983 his nephew 984 he must... from it: Whit T14; Til T28 985 allow 986 in the world 987 against 988 belong 989 valid

departed, talking diversely of the matter, every man as his fantasy gave him.

But much they talked and marveled of the manner of this dealing, that the matter was on both parts made so strange, as though neither had ever communed with other thereof before, when that themselves well wist there was no man so dull that heard them but he perceived well enough that all the matter was made between them. Howbeit,<sup>990</sup> some excused that again, and said all must be done in good order though. And men must sometimes for the manner sake<sup>991</sup> not be acknow<sup>992</sup> what they know.<sup>993</sup> For at the consecration of a bishop, every man wotteth<sup>994</sup> well, by the paying for his bulls,<sup>995</sup> that he purposeth to be one, and<sup>996</sup> though he pay for nothing else. And yet must he be twice asked whether he will be bishop or no, and he must twice say nay, and at the third time take it as compelled thereunto by his own will.

And in a stage play all the people know right well that he that playeth the soudan<sup>997</sup> is percase<sup>998</sup> a souter.<sup>999</sup> Yet if one should can so little good<sup>1</sup> to show out of season what acquaintance he hath with him, and call him by his own name while he standeth in his majesty, one of his tormentors might hap to break his head—and worthy,<sup>2</sup> for marring of the play. And so they said that these matters be kings' games, as it were, stage plays, and for the more part played upon scaffolds,<sup>3</sup> in which poor men be but the lookers-on. And they that wise be, will meddle no farther. For they that sometimes step up and play with them, when they cannot play their parts, they disorder the play and do themselves no good.

‡<sup>4</sup>The next day the Protector, with a great train,<sup>5</sup> went to Westminster Hall, and there, when he had placed himself in the Court of the King's Bench, declared to the audience that he would take upon him the crown in that place there, where the king himself sitteth and ministreth the law, because he considered that it was the chiefest duty of a king to minister the laws. Then, with as pleasant an oration as he could, he went about to win unto him the nobles, the merchants, the artificers, and, in conclusion, all kind of men—but specially the lawyers of this realm. And finally, to the intent that no man should hate him for fear, and that his deceitful clemency might get him the good will of the people, when he had declared the discommodity<sup>6</sup> of discord and the commodities<sup>7</sup> of concord and unity, he made an open<sup>8</sup> proclamation that he did put out of his mind all enmities, and that he there did openly pardon all offenses committed against him. And to the intent that he might show a proof thereof, he commanded that one Fogge, whom he had long deadly hated, should be brought then before him. Who, being brought out of the sanctuary by<sup>9</sup> (for thither had he fled, for fear of him), in the sight of the people he took him by the hand. Which thing the common people rejoiced at and praised, but wise men took it for a vanity. In his return homeward, whomsoever he met, he saluted. For a mind that knoweth itself guilty is in a manner dejected<sup>10</sup> to a servile flattery.

When he had begun his reign the twenty-sixth day of June after this mockish election, then was he crowned the sixth day of July. And that solemnity was furnished for the most part with the selfsame provision that was appointed for the coronation of his nephew.*

Now fell there mischiefs thick.<sup>11</sup> And as the thing evil-gotten is never well-kept,<sup>12</sup> through all the time of his reign never ceased there cruel death and slaughter, till his own destruction ended it. But as he finished his time with the best death and the most righteous, that is to wit,<sup>13</sup> his own, so began he with the most piteous and wicked, I mean the lamentable murder of his innocent nephews, the young King and his tender brother, whose death and final infortune<sup>14</sup> hath nevertheless so far comen in question that some remain yet in doubt whether they were in his days destroyed or no. Not for that only that<sup>15</sup> Perkin Warbeck, by many folks' malice and more folks' folly so long space abusing<sup>16</sup> the world, was as well with princes as the poorer people reputed and taken for the younger of those two, but for that also that<sup>17</sup> all things were in late days so

990 However 991 for the manner sake: for the sake of custom; Whit M363, M464; Til 806 992 be acknow: acknowledge 993 men... know: Whit W691; Til K173 994 knows 995 the papal documents authorizing that he be made a bishop 996 even 997 sultan 998 perhaps 999 shoemaker 1 can... good: have so little sense as 2 deservedly 3 stages for plays; platforms for executions 4 ‡: The editor of the 1557 Workes added this note: "This that is here between this mark ‡ and this mark* was not written by Mr. More in this history written by him in English, but is translated out of this history which he wrote in Latin." 5 retinue, entourage

6 unprofitability 7 advantages 8 public 9 nearby 10 abased 11 Now... thick: Whit H139 12 as... well-kept: Whit G333, G342; Til G305 13 say 14 misfortune 15 Not... that: Not only because 16 so... abusing: for so long a time misleading 17 for that also that: also because covertly demeaned,<sup>18</sup> one thing pretended and another meant,<sup>19</sup> that there was nothing so plain and openly proved, but that yet for<sup>20</sup> the common custom of close<sup>21</sup> and covert dealing, men had it ever inwardly suspect, as many well-counterfeited jewels make the true mistrusted.<sup>22</sup> Howbeit,<sup>23</sup> concerning that opinion, with the occasions moving either party, we shall have place more at large to entreat<sup>24</sup> if we hereafter happen to write the time of the late noble prince of famous memory King Henry the Seventh, or percase<sup>25</sup> that history of Perkin in any compendious process<sup>26</sup> by itself.

But in the meantime, for this present matter, I shall rehearse you the dolorous end of those babes, not after every way that I have heard, but after that way that I have so heard by such men and by such means as methinketh it were hard but it should be true. King Richard, after his coronation — taking his way to Gloucester to visit, in his new honor, the town of which he bore the name of his old<sup>27</sup> — devised, as he rode, to fulfill that thing which he before had intended. And forasmuch as his mind gave him that, his nephews living, men would not reckon that he could have right to the realm, he thought therefore without delay to rid them, as though the killing of his kinsmen could amend his cause and make him a kindly king.

Whereupon he sent one John Green, whom he specially trusted, unto Sir Robert Brackenbury, Constable of the Tower, with a letter and credence<sup>28</sup> also that the same Sir Robert should in any wise<sup>29</sup> put the two children to death. This John Green did his errand<sup>30</sup> unto Brackenbury, kneeling before our Lady in the Tower, who plainly answered that he would never put them to death — to die therefor — with which answer John Green, returning, recounted the same to King Richard at Warwick, yet in<sup>31</sup> his way.

Wherewith he took such displeasure and thought that the same night he said unto a secret<sup>32</sup> page of his, “Ah, whom shall a man trust?”<sup>33</sup> Those that I have brought up myself, those that I had weened<sup>34</sup> would most surely serve me — even those fail me and at my commandment will do nothing for me.”

“Sir,” quoth his page, “there lieth one on your pallet without, that,<sup>35</sup> I dare well say, to do your Grace pleasure, the thing were right hard that he would refuse,” meaning this by Sir James Tyrell, which was a man of right goodly personage, and for nature’s gifts, worthy to have served a much better prince, if he had well served God and by grace obtained as much troth<sup>36</sup> and good will as he had strength and wit. The man had a high<sup>37</sup> heart and sore<sup>38</sup> longed upward, not rising yet so fast as he had hoped, being hindered and kept under by the means of Sir Richard Radcliff and Sir William Catesby, which,<sup>39</sup> longing for no more partners of the Prince’s favor, and namely not for him whose pride they wist<sup>40</sup> would bear no peer, kept him by secret drifts<sup>41</sup> out of all secret trust. Which thing this page well had marked and known. Wherefore, this occasion offered, of very special friendship he took his time to put him forward, and by such wise do him good that all the enemies he had except the devil could never have done him so much hurt.<sup>42</sup>

For upon this page’s words, King Richard arose (for this communication had he sitting at the draught,<sup>43</sup> a convenient carpet<sup>44</sup> for such a council) and came out into the pallet chamber,<sup>45</sup> on which he found in bed Sir James and Sir Thomas Tyrell, of person like and brethren of blood, but nothing of kin in conditions.

Then said the King merrily to them, “What, sirs? Be ye in bed so soon?” — and calling up Sir James, broke<sup>46</sup> to him secretly his mind in this mischievous matter, in which he found him nothing strange.<sup>47</sup> Wherefore on the morrow he sent him to Brackenbury with a letter by which he was commanded to deliver Sir James all the keys of the Tower for one night, to the end he might there accomplish the King’s pleasure in such thing as he had given him commandment. After which letter delivered and the keys received, Sir James appointed the night next ensuing to destroy them, devising before and preparing the means.

The Prince, as soon as the Protector left that name and took himself as king, had it showed unto him that he should not reign, but his uncle should

18 conducted; managed 19 one... meant: Whit T189 20 because of 21 secret 22 as... mistrusted: Whit J44 23 However 24 treat 25 perhaps 26 compendious process: succinct narrative 27 of his old: in his previous one (Duke of Gloucester) 28 a document furnishing credentials 29 manner 30 did his errand: delivered his message 31 on 32 personal, private 33 whom... trust: Whit W423; Til M198 34 thought 35 who 36 faithfulness;

truthfulness 37 haughty 38 greatly 39 who 40 knew 41 schemes 42 of... hurt: Whit F673, G219; Til F739 43 toilet 44 convenient carpet: appropriate setting 45 pallet chamber: waiting room 46 revealed 47 unwilling have the crown. At which word the Prince, sore abashed,<sup>48</sup> began to sigh and said, “Alas, I would my uncle would let me have my life yet, though I lose my kingdom.” Then he that told him the tale used

 5 him with good words, and put him in the best comfort he could.<sup>49</sup> But forthwith<sup>50</sup> was the Prince and his brother both shut up, and all others removed from them, only one called “Black Will” or “William Slaughter” except, set to serve them and see
 10 them sure.<sup>51</sup> After which time the Prince never tied his points,<sup>52</sup> nor aught rought of<sup>53</sup> himself, but with that young babe his brother lingered in thought and heaviness<sup>54</sup> till this traitorous death delivered them of that wretchedness.

15 For Sir James Tyrell devised that they should be murdered in their beds. To the execution whereof, he appointed Miles Forest, one of the four that kept them, a fellow fleshed<sup>55</sup> in murder before-time. To him he joined one John Dighton, his own
 20 horsekeeper: a big, broad, square, strong knave. Then, all the others being removed from them, this Miles Forest and John Dighton about midnight (the seely<sup>56</sup> children lying in their beds) came into the chamber and suddenly lapped them up
 25 among the clothes<sup>57</sup>—so bewrapped them and entangled them, keeping down by force the feather-bed<sup>58</sup> and pillows hard unto their mouths, that within a while, smored<sup>59</sup> and stifled, their breath failing, they gave up to God their innocent souls
 30 into the joys of heaven, leaving to the tormentors their bodies dead in the bed. Which,<sup>60</sup> after that the wretches perceived<sup>61</sup>—first by the struggling with the pains of death, and after, long lying still—to be thoroughly dead, they laid their bodies naked out
 35 upon the bed, and fetched Sir James to see them. Which,<sup>62</sup> upon the sight of them, caused those murderers to bury them at the stair-foot, meetly<sup>63</sup> deep in the ground, under a great heap of stones.

40 Then rode Sir James in great haste to King Richard, and showed him all the manner of the murder, who gave him great thanks and (as some say) there made him knight. But he allowed not, as I have heard, the burying in so vile a corner, saying that he would have them buried in a better place because they were a king’s sons. Lo, the honorable cour- 45 age<sup>64</sup> of a king! Whereupon they say that a priest of Sir Robert Brackenbury took up the bodies again and secretly interred them in such place as, by the occasion of his death which only<sup>65</sup> knew it, could never since come to light. Very truth is it and well 50 known that at such time as Sir James Tyrell was in the Tower for treason committed against the most famous prince King Henry the Seventh, both Dighton and he were examined, and confessed the murder in manner above-written, but whither the bod- 55 ies were removed, they could nothing tell.

And thus, as I have learned of them that much knew and little cause had to lie, were these two noble princes—these innocent tender children, born of most royal blood, brought up in great wealth, 60 likely long to live to reign and rule in the realm—by traitorous tyranny taken, deprived of their estate, shortly<sup>66</sup> shut up in prison, and privily slain and murdered, their bodies cast God wot<sup>67</sup> where by the cruel ambition of their unnatural uncle and his 65 despiteous tormentors. Which things on every part well pondered, God never gave this world a more notable example neither in what unsurety standeth this worldly weal,<sup>68</sup> or what mischief worketh the proud enterprise of a high heart,<sup>69</sup> or finally, what 70 wretched end ensueth such despiteous cruelty.<sup>70</sup>

For first to begin with the ministers: Miles Forest at Saint Martin’s<sup>71</sup> piecemeal rotted away. Dighton, indeed, yet walketh on alive in good possibility to be hanged ere<sup>72</sup> he die. But Sir James Tyrell died 75 at Tower Hill, beheaded for treason. King Richard himself, as ye shall hereafter hear, slain in the field, hacked and hewed of<sup>73</sup> his enemies’ hands, harried<sup>74</sup> on horseback dead, his hair in despite<sup>75</sup> torn and tugged like a cur dog. And the mischief that he took, within less than three years of the mischief that he did, in three months be not comparable.<sup>76</sup> And yet all the meantime spent in much pain and trouble outward; much fear, anguish, and sorrow within. For I have heard by credible report of 85 such as were secret with his chamberers that after this abominable deed done, he never had quiet in his mind;<sup>77</sup> he never thought himself sure.<sup>78</sup> Where

48 distraught 49 used... could: Til U26
 50 immediately 51 safe, secure 52 laces for attaching hose to doublet 53 aught rought of: took any care for 54 sadness
 55 experienced 56 poor, helpless
 57 bedclothes 58 mattress 59 smothered
 60 Who (i.e., the executioners)

61 wretches perceived: i.e., the children were perceived 62 Who (Sir James) 63 suitably 64 spirit, disposition 65 which only: who alone 66 abruptly, speedily 67 knows 68 prosperity;
 in... weal: Whit W671 69 what... heart: Whit P384 70 what... cruelty:

Til L247; Whit L250, L412 71 Saint Martin’s: a sanctuary 72 before 73 by 74 dragged around 75 contempt 76 the mischief... comparable: Til L247; Whit L250, L412 77 after... mind: Til F139
 78 safe, secure

he went abroad, his eyes whirled about, his body privily fenced,<sup>79</sup> his hand ever on his dagger, his countenance and manner like one always ready to strike again;<sup>80</sup> he took ill rest a-nights, lay long waking and musing, sore<sup>81</sup> wearied with care and watch, rather slumbered than slept, troubled with fearful dreams, suddenly sometimes start up, leap out of his bed and run about the chamber — so was his restless heart continually tossed and tumbled with the tedious<sup>82</sup> impression and stormy remembrance of his abominable deed.

Now, had he outward<sup>83</sup> no long time in rest. For hereupon soon after began the conspiracy, or rather good confederation, between the Duke of Buckingham and many other gentlemen against him. The occasion whereupon the King and the Duke fell out is of diverse folk diverse wise pretended.<sup>84</sup> This duke, as I have for certain been informed, as soon as the Duke of Gloucester,<sup>85</sup> upon the death of King Edward, came to York, and there had solemn funeral service for King Edward, sent thither, in the most secret wise he could, one Percival, his<sup>86</sup> trusty servant, who came to John Ward, a chamberer of like secret trust with the Duke of Gloucester, desiring that in the most close<sup>87</sup> and covert manner he<sup>88</sup> might be admitted to the presence and speech of his master.<sup>89</sup> And the Duke of Gloucester, advertised<sup>90</sup> of his desire, caused him in the dead of the night, after all other folk avoided,<sup>91</sup> to be brought unto him in his secret<sup>92</sup> chamber, where Percival, after his master's recommendation, showed him that he had secretly sent him to show him that in this new world he would take such part as he would, and wait upon him with a thousand good fellows if need were. The messenger, sent back with thanks and some secret instruction of the Protector's mind, yet met him again with further message from the duke his master,<sup>93</sup> within few days after at Nottingham, whither the Protector from York, with many gentlemen of the north country, to the number of six hundred horses,<sup>94</sup> was comen on his way to Londonward. And after secret meeting and communication had, eftsoon,<sup>95</sup> departed.

Whereupon at Northampton the Duke met with the Protector himself, with 300 horses, and from thence still continued with him as partner of all his devices, till that after his coronation they departed, as it seemed, very great friends at Gloucester. From whence, as soon as the Duke came home, he so lightly turned from him and so highly conspired against him that a man would marvel whereof that change grew. And surely the occasion of their variance<sup>96</sup> is of diverse men diversely reported.<sup>97</sup> Some have I heard say that the Duke, a little before the coronation, among other things required<sup>98</sup> of the Protector the Duke of Hereford's lands, to which he pretended himself just inheritor. And forasmuch as the title which he claimed by inheritance was somewhat interlaced with the title to the crown by the line of King Henry, before deprived,<sup>99</sup> the Protector conceived such indignation that he rejected the Duke's request with many spiteful and minatory<sup>100</sup> words, which so wounded his heart with hatred and mistrust that he never after could endure to look aright<sup>101</sup> on King Richard, but ever feared<sup>102</sup> his own life so far-forth that, when the Protector rode through London toward his coronation, he feigned himself sick, because he would not ride with him. And the other, taking it in evil part,<sup>103</sup> sent him word to rise and come ride or he would make him be carried. Whereupon he rode on with evil will and, that notwithstanding, on the morrow rose from the feast feigning himself sick; and King Richard said it was done in hatred and despite<sup>104</sup> of him. And they say that ever after, continually, each of them lived in such hatred and distrust of other that the Duke verily looked<sup>105</sup> to have been murdered at Gloucester. From which, nevertheless, he in fair manner departed.

But surely some right secret at the days<sup>106</sup> deny this; and many right wise men think it unlikely (the deep dissimulating nature of those both men considered, and what need in that green world the Protector had of the Duke, and in what peril the Duke stood if he fell once in suspicion of the tyrant) that either the Protector would give the Duke occasion of displeasure, or the Duke, the Protector occasion of mistrust. And utterly men think that if King

79 privily fenced: secretly shielded
80 back 81 very 82 troublesome
83 publicly 84 alleged; diverse... pretended: Whit F370 85 Duke of Gloucester: Richard's title before he became Protector
86 Buckingham's 87 secret 88 Percival

89 Richard (Ward's master) 90 notified
91 had left 92 private 93 Buckingham
94 horsemen; cavalry 95 soon after, again
96 falling out 97 diverse... reported: Whit F370 98 requested 99 deposed 100 menacing, threatening 101 directly;

correctly 102 feared for 103 taking... part: taking it badly; taking offense at it 104 contempt 105 verily looked: truly expected 106 right... days: especially privy to secrets at that time

Richard had any such opinion conceived, he would never have suffered<sup>107</sup> him to escape his hands. Very truth it is, the Duke was a high-minded<sup>108</sup> man, and evil<sup>109</sup> could bear the glory of another — so that I have heard, of some that said they saw it, that the Duke, at such time as the crown was first set upon the Protector's head, his eye could not abide the sight thereof, but wried<sup>110</sup> his head another way. But men say that he was of troth not well at ease, and that both to King Richard well known and not ill taken, nor any demand<sup>111</sup> of the Duke's uncourteously rejected, but he, both with great gifts and high behests,<sup>112</sup> in most loving and trusty manner departed at Gloucester.

But soon after his coming home to Brecknock, having there in his custody, by the commandment of King Richard, Doctor Morton, Bishop of Ely (who, as ye before heard, was taken<sup>113</sup> in the Council at the Tower), waxed with him familiar.<sup>114</sup> Whose wisdom abused<sup>115</sup> his pride to his own deliverance and the Duke's destruction.<sup>116</sup> The Bishop was a man of great natural wit, very well-learned, and honorable in behavior, lacking no wise ways to win favor. He had been fast<sup>117</sup> upon the party of King Henry while that party was in wealth,<sup>118</sup> and nevertheless left it not nor forsook it in woe,<sup>119</sup> but fled the realm with the Queen and the Prince while King Edward had the King<sup>120</sup> in prison — never came home but to the field. After which lost, and that party utterly subdued, the other,<sup>121</sup> for his fast faith<sup>122</sup> and wisdom, not only was content to receive him, but also wooed him to come and had him from thenceforth both in secret trust and very special favor, which he nothing deceived. For he — being, as ye have heard, after King Edward's death first taken<sup>123</sup> by the tyrant for his troth<sup>124</sup> to the King<sup>125</sup> — found the means to set this duke in his top:<sup>126</sup> joined gentlemen together in aid of King Henry,<sup>127</sup> devising first the marriage between him and King Edward's daughter,<sup>128</sup> by which his faith declared and good service to both his masters at once, with infinite benefit to the realm by the conjunction of those two bloods in one, whose several titles had long inquired the land. He fled the realm, went to Rome, never minding more to meddle with the world till the noble prince King Henry the Seventh got him home again, made him Archbishop of Canterbury and Chancellor of England, whereunto the Pope joined the honor of Cardinal. Thus living many days in as much honor as one man might well wish, ended them so godly that his death, with God's mercy, well-changed his life.

This man, therefore, as I was about to tell you, by the long and often alternate proof,<sup>129</sup> as well of prosperity as adverse fortune, had gotten by great experience, the very mother and mistress of wisdom,<sup>130</sup> a deep insight in politic worldly drifts.<sup>131</sup> Whereby, perceiving now this duke glad to commune<sup>132</sup> with him, fed him with fair words and many pleasant praises.<sup>133</sup> And perceiving by the process of their communications the Duke's pride now and then bolke out<sup>134</sup> a little braid<sup>135</sup> of envy toward the glory of the King, and thereby feeling him easy to fall out if the matter were well-handled, he craftily sought the ways to prick him forward, taking always the occasion of his coming, and so keeping himself close within his bonds that he rather seemed him to follow him than to lead him.

For when the Duke first began to praise and boast<sup>136</sup> the King and show how much profit the realm should take by his reign, my lord Morton answered: "Surely, my Lord, folly were it for me to lie, for if I would swear the contrary, your Lordship would not, I ween,<sup>137</sup> believe but that if the world would have gone as I would have wished, King Henry's son<sup>138</sup> had had the crown, and not King Edward. But after that God had ordered him to lose it, and King Edward to reign, I was never so mad that I would with a dead man strive against the quick.<sup>139</sup> So was I to King Edward faithful chaplain, and glad would have been that his child had succeeded him. Howbeit,<sup>140</sup> if the secret judgment of God have otherwise provided, I purpose not to spurn against a prick,<sup>141</sup> nor labor to set up that<sup>142</sup> God pulleth down. And as for the late Protector and now King —"

And even there he left,<sup>143</sup> saying that he had

107 allowed 108 haughty 109 ill
110 turned 111 request 112 promises 113 taken prisoner 114 waxed...familiar:
became friendly with him 115 deceived
116 Whose...destruction: Whit L381, W418 117 steadfastly 118 prosperity
119 had...woe: Whit W132, W432; Til W188 120 Henry VI 121 the other: i.e.,

Edward IV 122 his fast faith: the Bishop's steadfast loyalty 123 taken captive 124 loyalty 125 Edward IV 126 set... top: attack this duke (Richard III); Whit T422 127 Henry VII 128 Elizabeth of York (eldest daughter of Edward IV) 129 experience, test, trial 130 experience...wisdom: Til E221 131 schemes

132 talk 133 fed...praises: Whit W584
134 bolke out: let escape 135 outburst
136 extol 137 think 138 Prince Edward, son of Henry VI 139 living;
I was...quick: Til Q12 140 However 141 spurn...prick: kick against the goad.
See Acts 26:14; Whit P377. 142 set up that: advance forward what 143 left off

already meddled too much with the world, and would from that day meddle with his book<sup>144</sup> and his beads,<sup>145</sup> and no further. Then longed the Duke sore<sup>146</sup> to hear what he would have said, because he ended with the King and there so suddenly stopped, and exhorted him so familiarly between the twain,<sup>147</sup> to be bold to say whatsoever he thought; whereof he faithfully promised there should never come hurt and peradventure<sup>148</sup> more good than he would ween,<sup>149</sup> and that himself intended to use his faithful secret advice and counsel, which he said was the only cause for which he procured of the King to have him in his custody, where he might reckon himself at home, and else had he been put in the hands of them with whom he should not have founded the like favor.

The Bishop right humbly thanked him and said, “In good faith, my Lord, I love not much to talk much of princes, as thing not all out of peril, though the word be without fault — forasmuch as it shall not be taken as the party meant it, but as it pleaseth the Prince to construe it.<sup>150</sup> And ever I think on Aesop’s tale,<sup>151</sup> that when the lion had proclaimed that on pain of death there should none horned beast abide in that wood, one that had in his forehead a bunch<sup>152</sup> of flesh fled away<sup>153</sup> a great pace. The fox, that saw him run so fast, asked him whither he made all that haste. And he answered, ‘In faith, I neither wot nor reck,<sup>154</sup> so I were once hence, because of this proclamation made of<sup>155</sup> horned beasts.’

‘What, fool?’ quoth the fox. ‘Thou mayest abide well enough; the lion meant not by thee, for it is none horn that is in thine head.’

‘No, marry,’ quoth he, ‘that wot I well enough. But what and<sup>156</sup> he call it a horn, where am I then?’”

The Duke laughed merrily at the tale, and said, “My Lord, I warrant you, neither the lion nor the boar<sup>157</sup> shall pick any matter at<sup>158</sup> anything here spoken, for it shall never come near their ear.”

“In good faith, Sir,” said the Bishop, “if it did, the thing that I was about to say, taken as well as afore God I meant it, could deserve but thanks. And yet taken as I ween it would, might happen to turn me to little good and you to less.”

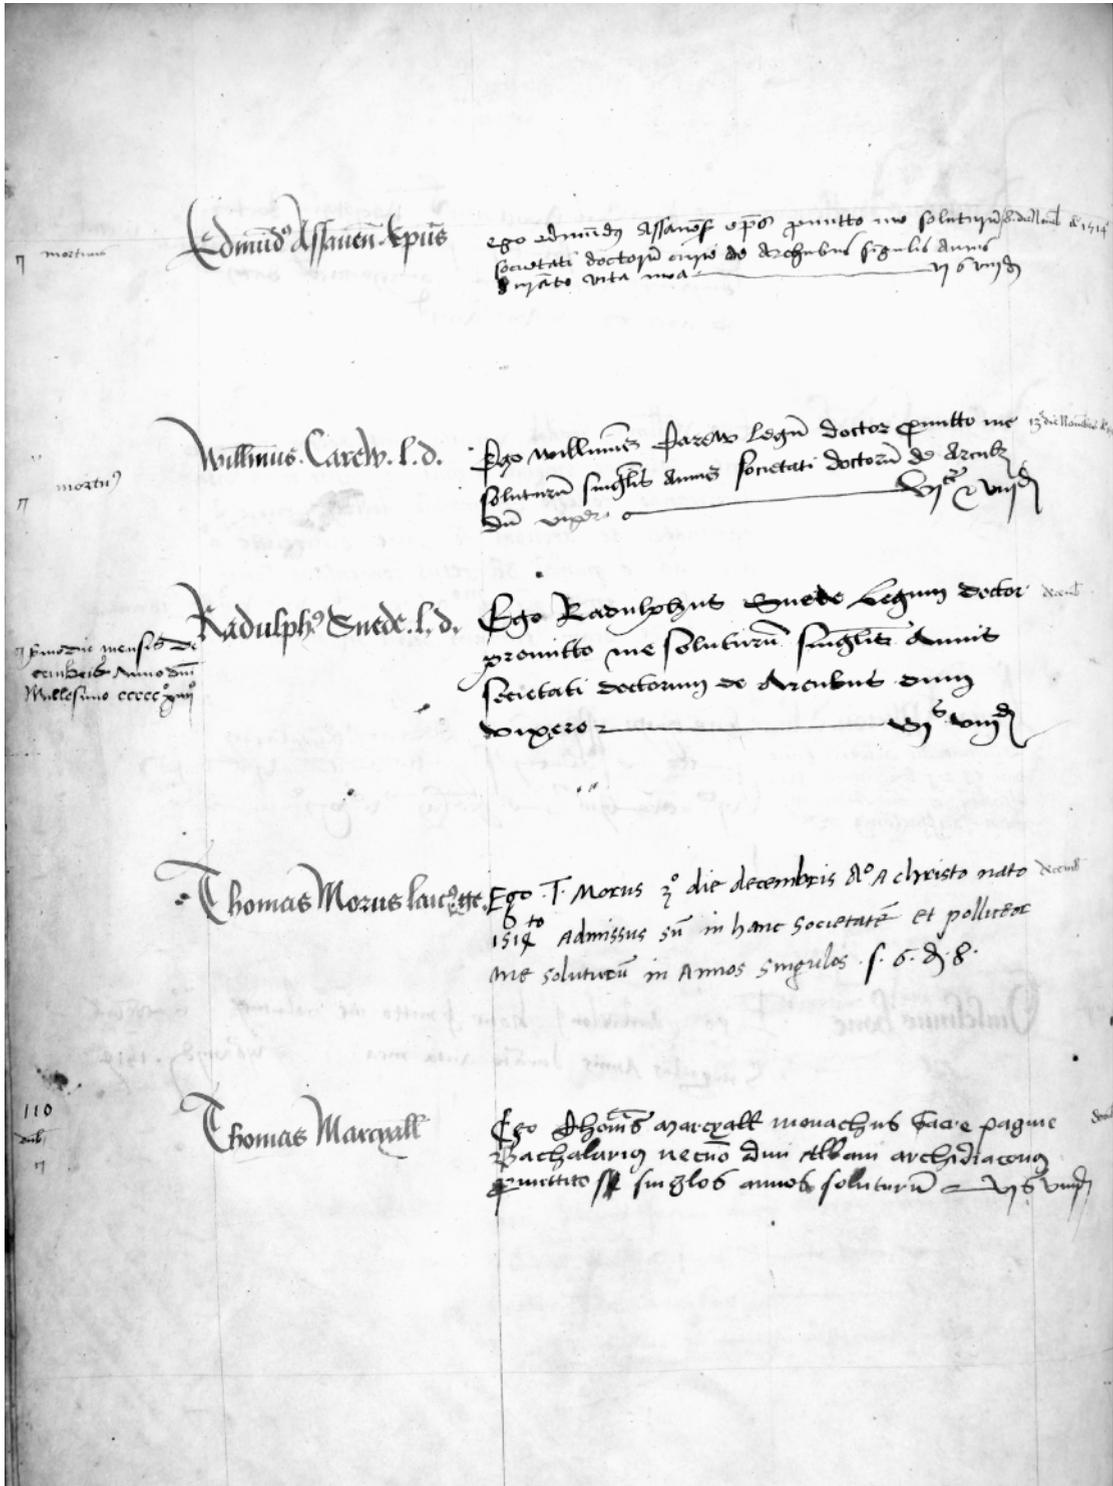

Then longed the Duke yet much more to wit<sup>159</sup> what it was. Whereupon the Bishop said, “In good faith, my Lord, as for the late Protector, since he is now king in possession, I purpose not to dispute his title. But for the weal<sup>160</sup> of this realm whereof his Grace hath now the governance, and whereof I am myself one poor member, I was about to wish that, to those good abilities whereof he hath already right many little needing my praise, it might yet have pleased God, for the better store,<sup>161</sup> to have given him some of such other excellent virtues meet<sup>162</sup> for the rule of a realm, as our Lord hath planted in the person of your Grace.”

144 prayer book, breviary 145 rosary
146 greatly 147 two 148 perhaps 149 suppose 150 it shall... construe it:
Til T31 151 Aesop's tale: not known from any fable collection; perhaps Morton's invention 152 growth; lump 153 away at 154 wot nor reck: know nor care 155 about 156 if 157 the lion nor boar:

i.e., Richard, whose royal arms included the lion and the boar 158 pick... at: find fault with 159 know 160 well-being 161 provision, supply for future use

162 suitable, fitting

In this official register of the Doctors' Commons, after Thomas Morus laicus, More writes in his own hand: Ego T. Morus 3<sup>o</sup> die decembris a[nno] a christo nato 1514<sup>o</sup> admissus sum in hanc societatem et polliceor me soluturum in annos singulos s.6.d.8. ["I, Thomas More, on December 3 of the year 1514 since Christ's birth, have been admitted into this society and I promise that I will pay, each year, 6 shillings, 8 pence."] Other members in this register include More's teachers and friends John Colet, Polydore Vergil, William Grocyn, and Andreas Ammonius. The Doctors' Commons was a society of canon and civil lawyers.

Utopia

More's most famous and thought-provoking book, Utopia has its sources in the author's long study of the classical and Christian traditions of reflection on vital questions such as: What is the best way for human beings to live, both personally and politically? What does humanity need to flourish in justice, peace, friendship, and concord? What kind of citizens and leaders does a commonwealth (respublica) need to achieve such ends?

Informed by More's habitual irony and merry wit, the work records a conversation between Thomas More, whose last name means "fool," and a wandering traveler named Raphael Hythloday, whose last name suggests "peddler of nonsense," though his first name means "God heals." In the course of an afternoon, the two characters discuss the demands of public service, and then Raphael recounts the customs, laws, and culture of the island commonwealth of "Utopia," a word that means "no place," or perhaps "good place" if one hears "eu-topia" in the name.

Written in Latin with puns in Greek, Utopia features a witty play of names that prompts bemusement and spurs reflection in the "sharp-sighted" reader: What could such a work of art possibly mean? Is this just silly banter, or some kind of learned game? In Utopia, More challenges the reader to exercise discerning judgment over the subjects discussed—in particular the best way to order a commonwealth, a concern linking the work to Plato, Cicero, and Augustine, and the roles that "soundly and wisely trained citizens" play in such a commonwealth. Where might this playful conversation about "no place," the experience of the "truly golden book," be leading the interlocutors—and the curious reader? How does the work of this "eloquent author" and "citizen," as the title page describes Thomas More, delight and educate?

Utopia is divided into two parts, but also features a provocative array of supporting materials such as commendatory letters from humanist friends, a map of Utopia, a sample of its alphabet, and even a poem on Utopia by their much-lauded laureate, Anemolius ("Wind-bag"). Far from unimportant, these paratexts or "Parerga" help create the rich intellectual experience and the perplexing whole that is Utopia. Taken together, they reveal More's understanding of authorship, reading, conversation, and friendship—all in the context of an emerging European humanism and its distinctive concerns. As Dominic Baker-Smith points out, the "most important thing" in recent readings of Utopia has been "the rediscovery of the work as a dialogue," where the "interplay" between characters and voices is vital and leads to the heart of the book's concerns (CC 162).

Book 1, known as the "The Dialogue of Counsel," takes place in Antwerp. With the help of his friend Peter Giles, Thomas More (away from home on diplomatic business) encounters Raphael Hythloday, an old and bearded philosophical traveler. Their discussion quickly centers on the question: Does a gifted intellectual, like Hythloday, have a duty to enter the service of a prince and counsel him for the best? They disagree pointedly, and their conversation ranges across a number of controversial subjects, including labor and greed, crime and punishment, leadership and corruption, private property and pride—and the question of justice. At the end of Book 1, Raphael tells More that he fundamentally misunderstands things because of the faulty "image" of a commonwealth that he has in his mind. If only More could visit Utopia, Raphael contends, he would see things differently.

Book 2 is Hythloday's eloquent monologue on behalf of Utopia, its cities and their organization, its households and their way of life, its philosophies and religions, its approach to peace and war, and the virtues of its citizens. After explaining the remarkable founding of Utopia, Raphael offers an account of Utopian life in some detail. Again, the strange names invite and stir our consideration. The great Utopian capital, for example, is called Amaurot ("City of Darkness"), and one kind of Utopian leader is called a phylarch ("fond of power"). Striking too are the names for the river Anyder ("Waterless") and the princeps or city leader Ademos ("Without a People"). Like the puzzling names, the events and practices described in Book 2, along with some apparent contradictions and tensions in Raphael's tale, work to elicit wonder and inspire fresh reasoning. Book 2 ends with More leading Raphael to dinner, after which More hopes for further conversation about Utopia, a detail that invites the reader to think of the book as a propaedeutic to more—but what exactly? The conversation about Utopia has continued for over five hundred years, with More’s work reprinted and translated into many languages around the globe. One of the most playful yet controversial works of modernity, Utopia is a book that continues to launch a thousand reflections on philosophy, public service, and the best way to live, or the worst.

Written while More served as undersheriff of London, Utopia was first published in 1516, in 1517, and then again in two revised editions in 1518 under the direction of Erasmus. In that same year, Thomas More would choose to enter the service of King Henry VIII and so commence the political drama of his maturity. An important discussion of these early editions of Utopia can be found in Elizabeth McCutcheon’s “More’s Utopia and its Parerga (1516–1518),” reprinted in Moreana nos. 201–2 (December 2015), pp. 133–48. John Guy’s chapter “Social Reformer?” ably explores the “enigma” of More’s Utopia and unfolds the long argument over the work’s possible meanings (Thomas More [Oxford University Press, 2000], 84–105). In her essay “‘The Best State of a Commonwealth’: Thomas More and Quentin Skinner,” Cathy Curtis probes the rich array of sources informing Utopia (Greek, Roman, and Christian) and More’s potent form of authorship: “More appropriated, fused, and transformed earlier traditions so as to comment on the utility of those traditions in contemporary society and to generate debate and new insight” (Rethinking the Foundations of Modern Political Thought [Cambridge University Press, 2006], 111).

The March 1518 edition of Utopia is the basis for the text here. That edition is noteworthy, among other things, for the inclusion of More’s complete Latin Epigrams, as well as a selection of epigrams by Erasmus. It is intriguing to read More’s Utopia—sometimes judged ironic and ambivalent beyond all attempts at resolution—in light of his Epigrams, which share many of the major themes of Utopia, addressed in playful and trenchant verse.

The translation of Books 1 and 2 and More’s two letters to Giles are by Clarence H. Miller (Yale University Press, 2001), and most of the footnotes are from Miller’s commentary. The other translated texts are from CW 4, ed. Edward Surtz and J. H. Hexter (Yale University Press, 1965).

TIMELINE

244 BC: Utopia founded (Raphael’s account)
 ca. 1497: Raphael meets and speaks with Morton.
 ca. 1504–9: Raphael then spends “more than five years” in Utopia.
 ca. 1504: Four Voyages of Amerigo Vespucci, a best seller (and a forgery), is published in Vienna.
 1514: First printing of Hesychius’s Greek dictionary, which Raphael says he brought to Utopia

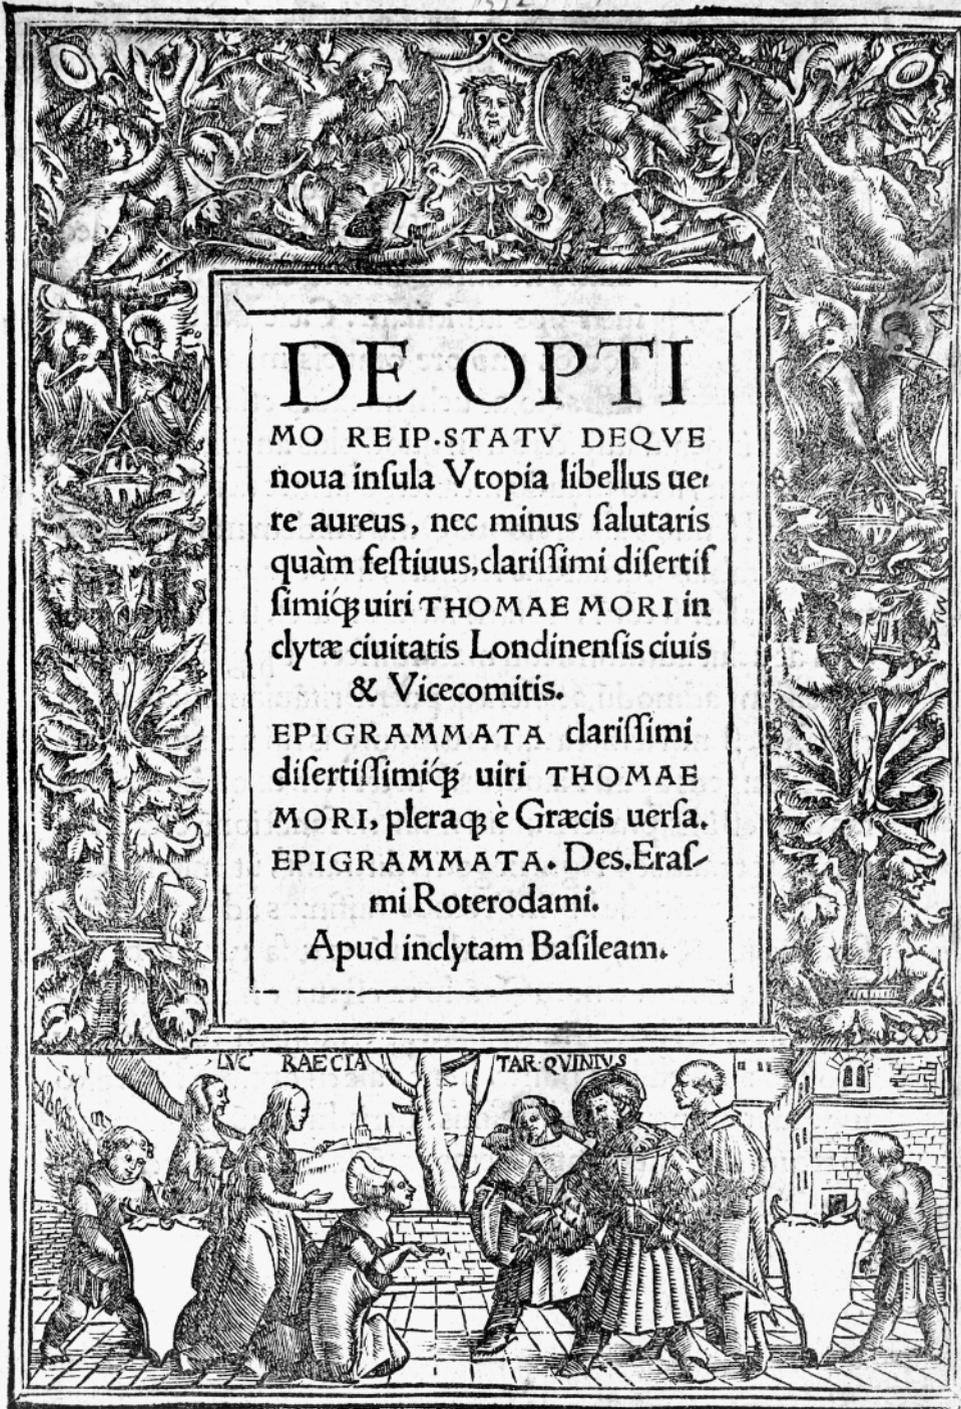

1515: More’s trip to Antwerp where he meets Giles and Raphael and then writes most of Utopia
 1516: First edition of Utopia published in Louvain
 1517: Second edition of Utopia published in Paris
 1518: March and November; third and fourth editions published in Basle by J. Froben 1519–22: Magellan is first to circumnavigate the globe, unless Raphael’s claim is correct.

CONTENTS<sup>1</sup>

Title page	On the Best State of a Commonwealth and on the New Island of Utopia . . . Epigrams with elaborate border. . . . .	144
Parerga <sup>2</sup> I	Letter of Erasmus to Froben; Letter of Budé to Lupset . . . . . Map of Utopia; Utopian alphabet with poem . . . . . Anemolius’s poem; Letter of Peter Giles to Busleyden . . . . .	145 149 151
Preface	Letter of Thomas More to Peter Giles . . . . .	152
Garden sketch	Depicts and names John Clement, Hythloday, Thomas More, Peter Giles . . . . .	156
Book 1	Introduction in Antwerp: More meets Giles after morning Mass . . . . . More meets Raphael Hythloday; they go to More’s home and sit in the garden . . . . . The main issue of debate is posed: Should an intellectual serve a king? . . . . . Raphael’s first example of the futility of service: English politics; Morton’s court . . . . . Enclosures; no capital punishment; Polylerites . . . . . The friar and the fool; More disagrees and invokes Plato . . . . . Raphael’s second example: a French king and the Achorians; More replies briefly . . . . . Raphael’s third example: an unnamed king and the Macarians . . . . . More’s longest reply, distinguishing academic and political philosophy . . . . . Raphael condemns and More defends private property. . . . . Raphael critiques More’s conception in light of Utopia. . . . . More invites Raphael to tell them all about Utopia—after lunch . . . . .	156 157 159 160 162 166 168 169 171 173 174 174
Book 2	Founding of Utopia: origin and general features of the isle . . . . . Cities of Utopia: number, size; house and garden rotation policies. . . . . Magistrates: number, method of selection; ruler and senate; occupations . . . . . Social relations: household and population policies; colonization policy; hospitals . . . . . Travel regulations and punishments . . . . . Commerce; use of money; policy toward gold and jewels . . . . . Education: ethics, happiness, virtue, pleasure; their books; medicine and inventions . . . . . Slavery in Utopia; other social policies: euthanasia, marriage, divorce, cosmetics, law . . . . . Military affairs: attitude toward war, mercenaries, truces . . . . . Religions: worship; compulsory beliefs; sects; priests; architecture; practices. . . . . Peroration: Utopia as best commonwealth; final comments on justice and pride. . . . . More makes final comment and hopes for further conversation. Off to dinner. . . . .	175 176 178 181 184 185 187 195 199 203 209 211
Parerga II	Letter of Busleyden to Thomas More; poems by Geldenhauer and de Schrijver . . . . . [From the 1516 and 1517 Utopia : Letter of John Desmarais to Peter Giles and poem; Letter of Thomas More to Peter Giles] . . . . . Etching of two snakes and a dove, with Latin, Greek, Hebrew . . . . .	212 214 216
Epigrams	Title page; Letter of Rhenanus to Pirckheimer; epigrams by Thomas More and Erasmus . . . . .	217

<sup>1</sup> The order and illustrations are those of the March 1518 edition of Utopia, except for the additions noted in Parerga II. For a careful study of the different Parergas in the first four editions of Utopia, see Elizabeth McCutcheon’s “More’s Utopia and Its Parerga (1516–1518),” Moreana nos. 201–2 (2015): 133–48.

<sup>2</sup> “something accessory to the main work.” This is not a term used by More; recently these supporting materials have been called “Paratexts.”

This elaborate title page of Froben's March 1518 Utopia depicts the thorn-crowned head of Christ at the top and the suicide of Lucretia (Livy 1.58) at the bottom. Both depictions are removed from Froben's November 1518 Utopia, replaced by a cherub with trumpet and a small snakes-and-dove etching. For the full title of On the Best State of a Commonwealth and on the New Island of Utopia . . . , see the formal title page ahead.

On the Best State of a Commonwealth and on the New Island of Utopia a truly golden handbook, no less beneficial than entertaining, by the most distinguished and eloquent author THOMAS MORE, citizen and undersheriff of the famous city of London

ERASMUS OF ROTTERDAM TO JOHN FROBEN, DEAREST FATHER OF HIS GODSON, GREETINGS.

10 Hitherto I have ever been exceedingly pleased with all my friend More's writings, but, on account of our very close friendship, I somewhat distrusted my own judgment. Now, however, I see that all learned men unanimously subscribe to my opinion and 15 admire the man's superhuman genius even more warmly than I—not that they have more affection but that they have greater critical discernment. I therefore openly approve of my verdict rather late, but I shall not hesitate in future to express my sen-20 timent publicly.

What would this wonderful, rich nature not have accomplished if his talent had been trained in Italy, if it were now totally devoted to the service of the muses, if it had ripened to its proper harvest and, 25 as it were, its own autumnal plenty? When a mere youth, he amused himself with epigrams, most of them written when he was but a lad. He has never left his native England except twice when serving his king on an embassy in Flanders. Not only is 30 he married, not only has he family cares to attend to, not only does he hold a public office and handle an overwhelming number of legal cases, but he is distracted by so many and weighty affairs of the realm that you wonder he finds time even to think 35 of books.

For these reasons we have sent you his Progymnasmata or Early Exercises and his Utopia so that, if you think well, they may go out to the world and to 40 posterity with the recommendation of having been printed by you. Such is the reputation of your press that, if it is known that a book has come from the house of Froben, that is enough to have it please the learned world.

Farewell to you and your excellent father-in-law, sweetest wife, and most delightful children. Erasmus, the godson whom I share in common with you, has been born in an atmosphere of learning: so mind that he is trained in all good learning.

Louvain, 25 August 1517

WILLIAM BUDÉ
TO THOMAS LUPSET, ENGLISHMAN, GREETINGS.

I owe you really immense thanks, Lupset, most learned of young men, for having handed me Thomas More's Utopia and thereby drawn my at-50 tention to what is very pleasant reading as well as reading likely to be profitable. It was not long ago that you strove to obtain from me by entreaties what of my own free will I had strongly desired, namely, the reading of the six books of The Pres-60 ervation of Health by Galen. Thomas Linacre, the physician outstanding in both Greek and Latin, had recently rendered them the service, or rather paid them the compliment, of translating them from the extant originals into elegant Latin. He has per-65 formed the task so well that, if all of Galen's works (which I judge to be worth the whole of medicine) are at length translated into Latin, the society of physicians seems unlikely to feel the lack of knowl-70 edge of Greek.

I consider your courteous loan of Linacre's manuscript to me for a lengthy period a favor of the highest type. My hasty and cursory reading has caused me to conclude that the perusal profited me a great deal and also to promise myself still greater profit after the publication of the book on which you are now busily engaged at the presses of this city of Paris. On this account I believed myself to be under sufficient obligation to you. But, behold, you have given me, as an appendix or a supplement to your previous favor, the Utopia of Thomas More, a man of keen discernment, of pleasant disposition, and of great experience in the appraisal of human affairs.

I had the book by me in the country as I ran up and down very busily and gave directions to the workmen, for, as you have partly come to know by yourself and partly heard from others, I had been expending much energy on the business of my country estate now for the second year. As I learned and weighed the customs and laws of the Utopians, the reading of the book impressed me so much that I almost neglected and even forsook the management of household affairs. I perceived the trumpery in all the theory and practice of domestic economy and in absolutely all anxiety for increasing one's revenue.

By the latter, as by some inner and innate horsefly, the whole human race is stung, as everyone sees and understands. The result I almost went as far as to say, is that one must necessarily confess the object of legal and civil arts and sciences to be this: with spiteful and watchful cunning a man should behave toward his neighbor, with whom he is joined by rights of citizenship and sometimes of family, so as always to be taking something or other away, drawing it away, shaving it away, swearing it away, squeezing it out, beating it out, scooping it out, twisting it out, shaking it out, hammering it out, taking it quietly, stealing it away, plucking it away, pouncing upon it, and—partly with the connivance and partly with the sanction of the laws—purloining it and embezzling it.

This condition prevails all the more in those countries where the so-called civil law and canonical law have greater authority in both forums. Their procedures and decrees, as everyone sees, have been pervaded more and more by the view that men who are skilled in bailing out—or rather in taking in, who prey like hawks on unadvised citizens, who are artists in formulas—that is, in duperies, who are adepts in contractual law, who are fixers of suits, and who are lawyers of a contraverted, perverted, inverted law, are to be upheld as the high priests of justice and equity. They are to be the only persons worthy to give definitive replies on what is good and fair and, what is far more, worthy to determine with authority and power what each man should be allowed to have, what not to have and how much and how long to have it—and all this according to the declaration of the common feelings of mankind dreaming up the nonsense!

The truth is that most of us, blind with the thick rheum of ignorance, presume that, as a rule, each person's case usually is right insofar as it satisfies the demands of the law or insofar as it is supported by the law. But suppose we were to estimate laws by the standard of truth and by the command of the Gospel to be simple. Anyone with a spark of intelligence and sense would admit, if pressed, that there is a vast difference between true equity and law as expressed in canonical censures (at present and for a long time past) and between true equity and the law as expressed in civil statutes and royal decrees, just as there is a vast difference between the principles of Christ, who established the moral law, and the conduct of his disciples and the opposing doctrines and tenets of those who regard the golden heaps of Croesus and Midas as the ultimate goal and the essence of happiness. Hence, if you should now wish to explain justice according to the definition acceptable to ancient writers, namely, as the virtue which gives his due to every man, either you would find it nowhere in evidence or we should have to confess that it is treated, if I may allow myself such a comparison, like a scullery maid, whether you observe the morality of contemporary rulers or the feelings of fellow citizens and countrymen toward one another.

This situation obtains unless you admit their contention that the real and world-old justice which is called the natural law has been the source of that law of theirs. According to the latter, the stronger a man is the more he should possess, and the more he does possess the more eminent among his fellow citizens he ought to be. The result is that we see it accepted by the law of nations that persons who cannot help their fellow citizens by any art or practice worth mentioning, provided only they control the knotty bonds of pacts and contracts which they use to entangle men's patrimonies and which the ignorant multitude and the humanistic scholars, living far from public business for the sake of relaxation or for the investigation of truth, account a combination of Gordian knots and charlatan methods hardly admirable—well, we see it accepted by the law of nations that such persons should each have an income equal to that of a thousand of his fellow citizens and often of individual states, or even more than that, and that these same persons should be hailed by the honorable titles of wealthy men, honest men, magnificent fortune-builders. This happens, of course, in those generations, those institutions, those customs, in those nations which have pronounced it lawful that every man should have reputation and power in proportion to the resources by which he has built up his own family fortunes—he and his heirs. This process snowballs as great-great-great-grandchildren and their great-great-grandchildren vie in increasing by splendid additions the patrimonies received from their forefathers—which amounts to saying that it snowballs as they oust, far and wide, their neighbors, their kindred by marriage, their relations by blood, and even their brothers and sisters!

5

10

15

20

Yet Christ, the founder and supervisor of possessions, left among his followers a Pythagorean communion and charity ratified by significant example when Ananias was condemned to death for breaking the law of communion. Certainly, by this arrangement, Christ seems to me to have abolished, among his own at least, the whole arrangement set up by the civil and canonical law of fairly recent date in contentious volumes. This law we see today holding the highest position in jurisprudence and controlling our destinies.

25

30

Now, the island of Utopia, which I hear is called also Udepotia, is said, by a singularly wonderful stroke of fortune (if we are to believe the story), to have adopted the customs and the true wisdom of Christianity for public and private life and to have kept this wisdom uncorrupted even to this day. It has done so by holding in close combat (as they say) to three divine principles: (1) the equality of all things, good and bad, among fellow-citizens or, if you prefer, their civic sharing of them, absolute on all counts; (2) the resolute and tenacious love of peace and quiet; and (3) the contempt of gold and silver. These are the three overthrowers, I may say, of all frauds, impostures, swindles, rogueries, and wicked deceptions.

40

45

Would that the inhabitants of heaven for their own name's sake would cause these three principles of Utopian legislation to be fixed in the minds of all mortals by the beam-spike of a strong and settled conviction! You would immediately see pride, avarice, mad strife, and almost all the other wound-inflicting darts of the Stygian adversary fall to the ground and lie inert. You would see that interminable array of legal tomes, engrossing the attention of so many excellent and solid intellects even until death, viewed as hollow and empty and therefore consigned to bookworms or used as wrapping paper in shops.

50

55

Immortal beings above! What sort of holiness did the Utopians possess to merit the heavenly grace of not having avarice and cupidity break or creep into that island alone for so many centuries, of not having them drive out and expel justice and decency by their audacity and shamelessness?

65

Would that the great and good God had behaved as benignly with those regions which hold fast and cling to the surname of Christian derived from his most holy name! Beyond the shadow of a doubt, avarice, the vice which perverts and ruins so many minds otherwise extraordinary and lofty, would depart hence once for all, and the golden age of Saturn would return. In Utopia the assertion could be made that Aratus and the ancient poets were dangerously close to being mistaken when they stationed Justice in the zodiac after her flight from the earth. If we are to believe Hythloday, she must have remained behind on the island of Utopia and not yet have made her way to the sky.

70

75

I personally, however, have made investigation and discerned for certain that Utopia lies outside the limits of the known world. Undoubtedly it is one of the Fortunate Isles, perhaps close to the Elysian Fields, for More himself testifies that Hythloday has not yet stated its position by giving its definite bearings. It is itself divided into many cities, but they all unite and harmonize in one state, named Hagnopolis. The latter is content with its own institutions and possessions, blessed in its innocence, and leading a kind of heavenly life which is below the level of heaven but above the rabble of this known world. Amid countless mortal pursuits, as empty and disappointing as they are painful and vehement, the rabble is hurled headlong wildly and feverishly.

80

85

90

95

We owe the knowledge of this island to Thomas More, who has made public for our age this model of the happy life and this rule of living. The discoverer, as More himself reveals, is Hythloday, to whom he ascribes the whole account. On the one hand, Hythloday is the one who has built their city for the Utopians and established customs and laws for them; that is to say, he has borrowed from them and brought home to us the pattern of the good life. On the other hand, beyond question it is More who has adorned the island and its holy institutions by his style and eloquence, who has embellished the very city of the Hagnopolitans according to precept and rule, and who has added all those touches that bring grace and beauty and impressiveness to the magnificent work — although in the help which he has given he has claimed for himself only the role of an arranger of the materials.

100

Manifestly it was a point of conscience with him not to arrogate to himself the major part in the work. Otherwise Hythloday could rightly complain that, if he ever would have decided to commit his own experiences to paper, More had left him a prematurely plucked and deflowered glory. More was afraid, I suppose, that Hythloday himself, now residing of his own choice on the island of Udepotia but appearing at some time in Europe, would be displeased and vexed at More's unfairness in leaving him but the deflowered glory of this discovery of his. Such a persuasion is the part of men who are good and wise.<sup>1</sup>

It was the testimony of Peter Giles of Antwerp which caused me to have full faith in More, who of himself carries weight and relies on great authority. I have never known More in person — I am now passing over the recommendation given his learning and character — but I love him on account of his sworn friendship with the illustrious Erasmus, who has deserved exceedingly well of sacred and profane letters of all kinds. With Erasmus himself, I have long ago formed an association of friendship sealed by an exchange of letters.

Farewell, my dearest Lupset. Give my greetings — whether in person or by a go-between letter, and that at the first opportunity — to Linacre, that pillar of the British name in all that concerns good learning. He is now, I hope, no more yours than ours. He is one of the few whose approbation I should be very glad to gain if possible. During his personal sojourn here, he himself gained the highest approbation of me and of Jehan Ruelle, my friend, who is privy to my studies. Especially shall I esteem and try to emulate Linacre's singular learning and careful diligence.

I should like also to have you greet More once and again at my request, either by written message, as I said before, or by word of mouth. Both in my mind and in my talk I have long ago entered his name in Minerva's album of greater immortals. Now I pay him the highest possible love and veneration for his island in the new world, Utopia. The reason is that our age and succeeding ages will hold his account as a nursery of correct and useful institutions from which every man may introduce and adapt transplanted customs to his own city. Farewell.

Paris, 31 July [1517]

<sup>1</sup> Budé wrote this italicized section in Greek.

12. V T O P I A E I N S V L A E T A B V L A .

This map by Ambrosius Holbein appeared in the March and November 1518 Utopia.

SIX LINES ON THE ISLAND OF UTOPIA BY ANEMOLIUS, POET LAUREATE, NEPHEW OF HYTHLODAY
BY HIS SISTER

The ancients called me Utopia or Nowhere because of my isolation. At present, however, I am a rival of Plato's republic, perhaps even a victor over it. The reason is that what he has delineated in words I alone have exhibited in men and resources and laws of surpassing excellence. Deservedly ought I to be called by the name of Eutopia or Happy Land.

TO THE MOST ILLUSTRIOUS
JEROME BUSLEYDEN,
PROVOST OF AIRE AND COUNCILOR
TO THE CATHOLIC KING CHARLES, PETER GILES OF ANTWERP SENDS GREETINGS.

Most excellent Busleyden, the other day, Thomas More, the greatest ornament of this age of ours, as you too can testify because of your intimate acquaintance with him, sent me his Island of Utopia. It is known as yet to few mortals, but it is eminently worthy of everyone's knowledge as being superior to Plato's republic. This statement is true especially because a man of great eloquence has represented, painted, and set it before our eyes in such a way that, as often as I read it, I think I see far more than when, being as much a part of the conversation as More himself, I heard Raphael Hythloday's own words sounding in my ears.

And yet this Hythloday, a man endowed with no ordinary power of expression, so described his subject as to make it readily apparent that he was not repeating what he had learned from the accounts of others but telling what he had taken in directly with his own eyes and what he had long experienced personally. To my mind he was a man superior even to Ulysses himself in his knowledge of countries, men, and affairs. I think he has had no equal anywhere in the last eight hundred years; in comparison with him Vespucci himself may be thought to have seen nothing. Apart from the fact that we tell more effectively what we have seen than what we have heard, the man had a special skill of his own in unfolding his narrative.

Nevertheless, when I contemplate the same picture as painted by More's brush, I am as affected as if I were sometimes actually living in Utopia itself. By heaven, I am even disposed to believe that in all the five years which Raphael spent on the island, he did not see as much as one may perceive in More's description. In the latter, such a quantity of marvelous things presents itself everywhere that I am at a loss which I should admire first or most: the faithfulness of a most happy memory which could repeat almost word for word many matters which he had merely heard; or the sagacity with which he has noted the sources from which all evils actually arise in the commonwealth or from which all blessings possibly could arise, all quite unknown to ordinary folk; or the force and fluency of his discourse by which in pure Latin style and forceful expression he has united numerous topics. This is especially amazing since he is a man distracted by a mass of public business and domestic affairs. But all these remarks will not much surprise you, most learned Busleyden, for by intimate contact you really know him for a man of superhuman and almost divine genius.

For the rest, there is nothing I can add to what he has written. There was only a poem of four lines in the Utopian vernacular which, after More's departure, Hythloday happened to show me. This verse, preceded by the Utopian alphabet, I have caused to be added to the book. I have appended also some brief annotations in the margins.

As to More's difficulty about the geographical position of the island, Raphael did not fail to mention even that, but in very few words and as it were in passing, as if reserving the topic for another place. But, somehow or other, an unlucky accident caused us both to fail to catch what he said. While Raphael was speaking on the topic, one of More's servants had come up to him to whisper something or other in his ear. I was therefore listening all the more intently when one of our company who had, I suppose, caught cold on shipboard, coughed so loudly that I lost some phrases of what Raphael said. I shall not rest, however, till I have full information on this point so that I shall be able to tell you exactly not only the location of the island but even the longitude and latitude—provided that our friend Hythloday be alive and safe.

There are various reports circulating about the man. Some say that he died during his travel. Others declare that, after his return to his native land, partly because he could not endure his countrymen's ways and partly because he was moved by his 5 longing for Utopia, he made his way back again to that country.

As to the difficulty that the name of this island is to be found nowhere in the cosmographers, that was well explained by Hythloday himself. It was 10 possible, he said, either that the name used by the ancients had afterward been changed or that this island had escaped even their notice, just as nowadays we find very many lands cropping up which were unknown to the ancient geographers.

15 But what is the use of finding arguments to make the account more credible when we have the distinguished More himself to vouch for it?

In conclusion, his hesitation about publication makes me praise and acknowledge his modesty.
20 From every point of view, however, I considered it unfitting to suppress the work for long and most fitting to place it in men's hands, especially since it is recommended to the world by your patronage. This latter is true not only because you are unusually well
25 acquainted with More's talents but because no man is better qualified than you to assist with good counsels the government of the commonwealth in which you have labored for many years, winning the highest praise for wisdom and integrity. Farewell, Maecenas of learned pursuits and ornament of our age.
30

Antwerp, 1 November 1516

Preface<sup>1</sup>

THOMAS MORE

TO PETER GILES, GREETINGS.

I am almost ashamed, my dear Peter Giles,<sup>2</sup> to have 35 delayed for almost a year in sending you this little book about the Utopian<sup>3</sup> commonwealth, which I'm sure you expected within six weeks.<sup>4</sup> You knew, after all, that I was spared the labor of finding my matter, 40 and did not have to give any thought to its arrangement; all I had to do was repeat what you and I heard Raphael<sup>5</sup> say. For that reason there was no need to strive for eloquence,<sup>6</sup> since his language could hardly 45 be polished, first because it was informal and extemporaneous, and also because he is a person, as you know, not as well versed in Latin as in Greek; the closer my language came to his casual simplicity,<sup>7</sup> the 50 more accurate it would be, and in this matter accuracy is all that I ought to, and in fact do, aim for.

I grant you, Peter, that with all this already taken 55 care of, I was relieved of so much effort that there was almost nothing left for me to do. If this had not been so, thinking up the subject matter and arranging it might have required not a little time and study, even from someone of not inconsiderable 60 intelligence and not totally without learning. But if I had been required to write not only accurately but also elegantly, no amount of time or study would have enabled me to do it. As it is, all these concerns, 65 which would have cost me so much labor, are removed and all that remained to do was to write what I heard — not a difficult task.

But nevertheless, even to perform this trifling
70 task, other chores left me almost no time at all. I am constantly pleading one case, hearing another, 75 acting as arbitrator, handing down decisions as a judge, visiting one person or another on business or because it is my duty to do so; I am out practically

<sup>1</sup> This letter is described as a "preface" in the running heads of the two Basel editions of 1518; both editions also begin this section with a title page having an elaborate border (see next page). The first edition (Louvain, 1516) has this heading: Prefatio in opus de optimo reipublicae statu. <sup>2</sup> Peter Giles (ca. 1486–1533) was a humanist friend of More and Erasmus. He was a corrector at the press of Dirk Martens in his native city of Antwerp and was a clerk of that city from 1512 on. <sup>3</sup> The name "Utopia" derives from Greek ou ("not") and topos

("place"), meaning "no place" (More also called it by the equivalent Latin name "nusquam"). "Utopia" includes a pun because the initial "u" may also be derived from Greek eu ("good"). Hence Utopia is a good place which is no place. <sup>4</sup> More visited Giles in Antwerp in September 1515; together with a letter dated September 3, 1516, he sent the manuscript of Utopia to Erasmus for publication. <sup>5</sup> The angel Raphael is a saving guide and healer in the biblical book of Tobias. Raphael's surname, Hythloday, is derived from Greek words meaning "peddler of nonsense." <sup>6</sup> More refers to the principal divisions of rhetoric according to the classical tradition: invention (finding matter), disposition (arranging it), and eloquence (stylistic elaboration). <sup>7</sup> This description applies to most of Hythloday's description of Utopia itself, but hardly to the elaborate and often passionate eloquence of Hythloday's language in much of Book 1 and in his peroration at the end of Book 2. Almost nothing in this letter (or in Utopia itself, for that matter) can be taken at face value.

This title page to Utopia's "Preface," More's Letter to Giles, appeared in the 1518 editions.

all day dealing with others, and the rest of my time is devoted to my family, and so I leave nothing for myself, that is for writing.<sup>8</sup>

When I get home, I have to talk with my wife, chat with my children, confer with the servants. All this I count as part of my obligations, since it needs to be done (and it does if you do not wish to be a stranger in your own home); and you must do everything you can to make yourself as agreeable as possible to the persons you live with, whether they were provided by nature, chance, or your own choice, as long as you do not spoil them by your familiarity or turn servants into masters through over-indulgence. As I am doing such things, as I said, a day, a month, a year slips by.

When do I write then? And as yet I have said nothing about sleep and nothing at all about eating, and for many that takes up no less time than sleep itself, which consumes almost half our lives. The only time I get for myself is what I steal from sleep and eating. Because that is so little, I progressed slowly, but because it was at least something, I did make progress, and I sent Utopia to you, my dear Peter, so that you can read it and let me know if I have missed anything. For, though on that score I do not lack all confidence in myself (and I only wish that my intelligence and learning were a match for my not inconsiderable memory), still I am not confident enough to think that nothing has escaped me.

As you know, John Clement,<sup>9</sup> my young assistant, was there with us, for I do not allow him to miss out on any conversation which could be profitable to him because from this sprout which is beginning to grow green with proficiency in Latin and Greek I expect someday a marvelous harvest. He has made me feel very doubtful about one point: as far as I remember Hythloday told us that the bridge which spans the river Anyder at Amaurot<sup>10</sup> is five hundred yards long, but my boy John says that is two hundred yards too many and that the river is no more than three hundred wide. Please try to remember that point. For if you agree with him, I will go along with you both and believe I am mistaken. But if you do not recall, I will stand by what I think I remember myself, for just as I have taken great pains to prevent any inaccuracy in the book, so too, when I am in doubt, I would rather say something inaccurate than tell a lie, because I would rather be honest than clever.<sup>11</sup>

Note the theological distinction between lying and speaking a falsehood

In fact, it would be easy to remedy this defect if you would find out from Raphael himself about it, in person or by letter. And you need to do the same concerning another difficulty which has arisen—who is more to blame for it, I or you or Raphael himself, I do not know. For it did not occur to us to ask, or him to mention, in what part of that new world Utopia is located. Indeed, to remedy this oversight I would be willing to give a sizeable sum, partly because I am ashamed not to know in which ocean the island lies about which I have recounted so much, partly because there are one or two people here, but especially one person, a devout man and a theologian by profession, who is amazingly eager to go to Utopia, not out of idle curiosity or any hankering after novelties but in order to nourish and spread our religion, which has made such a good beginning there. To do this properly he has decided to see to it beforehand that he is sent by the pope and made the bishop of the Utopians. He has no scruples whatever about begging for this bishopric, since he considers such ambition to be holy if it is not based on honor or gain but rather springs from piety.

A holy ambition

Therefore, my dear Peter, I beg you to contact Hythloday, either in person if that is convenient or by letter if you are separated, and see to it that this work of mine contains nothing false and lacks nothing true. And perhaps it would be best to show him the book. For there is no one else capable of correcting any errors and even he cannot do so unless he reads through what I have written. Then too, this will let you see whether he is pleased or annoyed at me for writing this work. For if he himself has decided to commit his labors to writing, he

<sup>8</sup> More describes himself (accurately) as devoted to the active life which Hythloday rejects. <sup>9</sup> John Clement (ca. 1500–1572), one of the first students at Coler's humanist school, St. Paul's, became a page and pupil in More's household about 1514; later he became a distinguished physician.

<sup>10</sup> "Anyder" is coined from the Greek for "waterless"; "Amaurot" from the Greek for "made dark or dim." <sup>11</sup> Though it is apparently not found among the theologians, the distinction between mentiri (tell a lie) and mendacium dicere (speak a falsehood, with no intention of deceiving) derives from Aulus Gellius (11.11.1–4) and was well known. Peter Giles, and perhaps Erasmus, probably added the sidenotes that appeared in the margins of the original edition.

may not want me to do so. And I certainly would not want to deprive his narrative of the bloom and charm of novelty by making the commonwealth of Utopia public.

5 But in fact, to tell you the truth, I myself have not yet made up my mind whether or not to publish it at all. For the tastes of mortals are so various, the temperaments of some are so bitter, their minds so ungrateful, their judgments so preposterous that a person would do far better to follow his own bent and lead a merry life than to wear himself out trying

Human judgments are ungrateful

15 ful. Most people know nothing about learning; many despise it. Dummies reject as too hard whatever is not dumb. The literati look down their noses at anything not swarming with obsolete words. Some like only ancient authors; many like only their own writing. One person is so dour that he cannot abide jokes; another is so witless that he cannot stand anything witty.

*Persons with no "nose"
he calls "flat-nosed"*

20 Some have so little nose for satire that they dread it the way someone bitten by a rabid dog fears water. Others are so changeable that their approval depends on whether they are sitting down or standing up.

They sit around in taverns and over their cups they pontificate about the talents of writers, condemning each author just as they please, pulling him down through his writings as if they had grabbed him by the hair, while they themselves are safe and out of harm's way,<sup>12</sup> as the saying goes, because these good men have their whole heads smooth-shaven so that there is not a single hair to grab on to.<sup>13</sup>

A proverb

Furthermore, some are so ungrateful that, even though a work has given them great pleasure, they still do not like the author any better because of it. They are not unlike ill-mannered guests who, after they have been lavishly entertained at a splendid banquet, finally go home stuffed without saying a word of thanks to the host who invited them. Go on, now, and at your own expense provide a banquet for persons of such delicate palates and various tastes, who will remember and repay you with such gratitude!

A remarkable comparison

Nevertheless, my dear Peter, raise with Hythloday the points I mentioned. Afterwards I will be free to consider the matter once more. But in fact, if he himself gives his consent — since it is late to be wise<sup>14</sup> now that I have finished all the work — in all other considerations about publishing I will follow the advice of my friends, and especially yours. Farewell, my dearest Peter Giles, with regards to your excellent wife, and be as fond of me as ever, since I am fonder of you than ever.

A DISCOURSE SPOKEN BY THE REMARKABLE
RAPHAEL HYTHLODAY
ON THE BEST FORM OF A COMMONWEALTH
AS REPORTED BY THE ILLUSTRIOUS
THOMAS MORE, A CITIZEN AND THE UNDERSHERIFF OF THE FAMOUS BRITISH CITY OF LONDON

Book 1

10 Recently the invincible king of England,<sup>1</sup> Henry the eighth of that name, who is lavishly endowed with all skills necessary for an outstanding ruler,<sup>2</sup> had some matters of no small moment<sup>3</sup> which had to be worked out with Charles, the most serene prince of 15 Castile.<sup>4</sup> To discuss and resolve these differences he

<sup>1</sup> In August 1513 Henry's army had been victorious at the Battle of the Spurs and briefly occupied Théroutanne and Tournai; but his French campaigns, then and later, were as futile and destructive as those of the French kings in Italy. <sup>2</sup> The word here is princeps, a term used five times but in different ways in these opening two paragraphs. This is the word used for the head-leader of each Utopian city. It has a long and complex history, as indicated in David Baker's "First Among Equals: The Utopian Princeps" in Moreana nos. 115–16 (Dec. 1993): 33–45. <sup>3</sup> The difficulties were mainly connected with the wool trade between England and Flanders. They were serious enough for Wolsey to be worried early in 1515 that Charles would seize the English fleet for back taxes. <sup>4</sup> By 1515 Charles V, later Holy Roman Emperor sent me to Flanders as his ambassador; I was the companion and colleague of the incomparable Cuthbert Tunstall, whom he recently appointed to be Master of the Rolls, to the enormous satisfaction of everyone.<sup>5</sup> I will say nothing in his praise, not because I am afraid that my friendship might seem to make me an unreliable witness, but because his virtue and learning are beyond my power to proclaim them and because they are everywhere so renowned and well known that there is no need for me to do so, unless I intend to display the sun by the light of a lantern, as they say.<sup>6</sup>

Cuthbert Tunstall

20

An adage

25

As had been agreed, we were met at Bruges by those to whom the prince had entrusted the negotiations, all of them outstanding men. Their leader

30

(1519), was Duke of Burgundy and Prince of Castile. <sup>5</sup> Tunstall (1474–1559), Bishop of London (1522) and later Durham (1530), was a close friend whom More admired throughout his lifetime. On May 12, 1516 Tunstall became Master of the Rolls and Vice-Chancellor; as such he was chief of the twelve assistants to the Lord Chancellor. <sup>6</sup> See Erasmus, Adages 1406–7 (CWE 33: 245).

and chief was the Mayor of Bruges,<sup>7</sup> a splendid man, but their spokesman and mastermind was George de Themsecke, the Provost of Cassel, who is not only a trained orator but also a naturally eloquent speaker; he is very skilled in the law as well, and also an extraordinarily deft negotiator because he is both intelligent and very experienced.<sup>8</sup> After one or two meetings we could not reach agreement on some points, and so they bade us farewell for some days and set out for Brussels to ask for the pronouncement of their prince.<sup>9</sup>

Meanwhile, as my business required, I made my way to Antwerp. While I was staying there, I was often visited by Peter Giles,<sup>10</sup> among others, though no other visitor was more delightful to me. A native of Antwerp, he holds a post of great responsibility and prestige (and he is worthy of the most prestigious), since for this young man it would be hard to say which is greater, his learning or his virtue.<sup>11</sup> For he is most virtuous and very widely read, and also good-natured toward everyone, but toward his friends he is so responsive, warmhearted, loyal, and unfeignedly affectionate that it would be hard to find even one or two anywhere that you would think comparable to him in every aspect of friendship. He has a modesty rarely to be found; no one is further from false poses; no one combines more prudence with simplicity.<sup>12</sup> Then, too, his elegant speech and his innocent wit are so attractive that his delightful companionship and his charming conversation alleviated my longing for my country, household, wife, and children, though I was tormented by my desire to see them again, for at that time I had been away from home for more than four months.<sup>13</sup>

One day, after I had heard mass at the church of Saint Mary, which is remarkable for its beautiful architecture and its large congregation, when the service was over and I was getting ready to return to my lodgings, I happened to see Giles conversing with a stranger who was getting up in years. His face was sunburned, his beard untrimmed, his cloak hanging carelessly from his shoulder; from his face and bearing I thought he looked like a sea captain. But then, when Peter saw me, he came up and greeted me. When I tried to answer, he took me a little aside and said, “Do you see this man?” (At the same time he indicated the person I had seen him talking to.) “He is the one,” he said, “I was just getting ready to bring straight to you.”

“He would have been all the more welcome to me on your account.”

“Actually on his own,” he said, “if you knew him. For there is no mortal alive today who can give more information about unknown peoples and lands, and I know that you are very eager to hear about them.”

“My guess was not far off, then,” I said, “for when I first set eyes on him, I immediately thought he was a sea captain.”

“But in fact,” he said, “you were far off the mark. Certainly he has sailed, not like Palinurus, but rather like Ulysses, or even better like Plato.<sup>14</sup> This man, who is named Raphael—his family name is Hythloday—has no mean knowledge of the Latin language but is especially proficient in Greek; he has devoted himself to Greek more than to Latin because he has totally committed himself to philosophy and he knew that in that field there is nothing of any importance in Latin except some works of Seneca and Cicero.<sup>15</sup> Out of a desire to see the world he left to his brothers his heritage in his homeland (he is from Portugal),<sup>16</sup> joined Amerigo Vespucci, and was his constant companion in the first three of the four voyages which everyone is now reading about; but on the last voyage he did not come back with him. He sought and practically wrested from Amerigo permission to be one of the twenty-four who were left behind in a fort at the farthest point of the last voyage.<sup>17</sup> And so he was left behind in

<sup>7</sup> Jean (or perhaps Jacques) de Halewyn, Seigneur de Maldeghem <sup>8</sup> De Themsecke (d. ca. 1536), a doctor of the law and a member of Charles V's council at Mechlin, was employed on many diplomatic missions. (Cassel is now in northern France.) <sup>9</sup> on or before July 25, 1515 <sup>10</sup> In Flemish his name is “Gillis” or “Gilles,” but the usual English translation of his Latin name (“Aegidius”) is “Giles.” <sup>11</sup> Giles (1486–1533) was learned in the law and edited classical and humanist works. Since

1512 he had been chief clerk of the court of justice at Antwerp. <sup>12</sup> Cf. Mt 10:16 (“wise as serpents, innocent as doves”). The same combination was part of the printer's mark of Johann Froben, who printed the two 1518 editions of Utopia. <sup>13</sup> More left England May 12, 1515. <sup>14</sup> Palinurus, Aeneas's steersman, dozed at the helm, fell overboard, and drowned (Aeneid 5.833–61), unlike Odysseus and Plato, who learned much from their travels (Odyssey 1.1–4; Diogenes Laertius 3.6–7, 18–22).

<sup>15</sup> More expressed the same opinion in his Letter to Oxford (CW 15: 143). <sup>16</sup> In 1515 the Portuguese excelled in exploration, especially in the Far East. <sup>17</sup> The voyages (1503–4) of the Florentine explorer Amerigo Vespucci (1451–1512), who was in the employ of the King of Portugal, were described in two Latin narratives (of disputed authenticity) published about 1507; one of the versions mentions the twenty-four mariners left behind in a fort at the farthest point of the voyage (Cape accordance with his outlook, since he was more concerned about his travels than his tomb. Indeed he often used to say, ‘Whoever does not have an urn has the sky to cover him,’<sup>18</sup> and ‘from everywhere it is the same distance to heaven.’<sup>19</sup> This attitude of his would have cost him dearly if God had not been merciful to him. However, after the departure of Vespucci, he traveled through many lands with five companions from the fort, and finally, by an extraordinary stroke of luck, he was transported to Ceylon and from there he reached Calicut,<sup>20</sup> where he opportunely found some Portuguese ships and at last, beyond all expectation, he got home again.”

Aphorism

When Peter had told me this I thanked him for his kindness in taking so much trouble to introduce me to someone whose conversation he hoped I would enjoy, and then I turned to Raphael. After we had greeted each other and spoken the usual amenities that are exchanged when strangers meet for the first time, we went off to my house, where we conversed sitting in the garden on a bench covered with grassy turf.<sup>21</sup>

And so he told us how, after the departure of Vespucci, he and his companions who had remained in the fort gradually began to win the good graces of the people of that land by encountering and speaking well of them, and then they started to interact with them not only with no danger but even on friendly terms, and finally they gained the affection and favor of some ruler, whose name and country escape me. He told how, through the generosity of the ruler, he and five of his companions were liberally supplied with provisions and ships on the sea and wagons on the land – together with a trustworthy guide who took them to other rulers to whom he heartily recommended them. After many days’ journey, he said, he discovered towns and cities and commonwealths that were very populous and not badly governed.

On both sides of the equator, it is true, extending almost as far as the space covered by the orbit of the sun there lie vast empty wastelands, scorched with perpetual heat.<sup>22</sup> The whole region is barren and ugly, rugged and uncultivated, inhabited by wild beasts and serpents and by people who are no less wild than the beasts and no less dangerous. But when you have traveled further, everything gradually becomes milder. The heavens are less fierce, the ground is green and pleasant, the creatures are more gentle, and finally one sees peoples, cities, towns, which not only trade continually among themselves and with near neighbors but also carry on commerce with distant nations by land and sea. From that point on they were able to visit many countries in all directions since there was no ship traveling anywhere in which he and his comrades were not eagerly welcomed.

He told us that in the first regions they traveled they saw flat-bottomed vessels, spreading sails made of wickerwork or of stitched papyrus, and in other places of leather. But afterwards they found ships with curved keels, canvas sails, and in fact all the features of our own vessels. The sailors were not unskilled in seamanship and celestial navigation, but he told us that they were extremely grateful to him for introducing them to the magnetic compass, with which they had been totally unfamiliar. For that reason they usually were afraid to commit themselves to the open sea and they did not venture to do so except during the summer. But now they have such confidence in the compass that they scorn the winter weather and are careless rather than secure; thus there is a danger that the device which they thought would do them so much good will do them great harm because of their imprudence.

To present what he told us about the things he saw in each and every place would take a long time and would be beyond the scope of this work. And perhaps I will speak of it elsewhere, especially those points of which it would be useful not to be ignorant, above all whatever correct and prudent provisions he observed among civilized nations. We asked him very eagerly about such matters, and he was quite willing to explain them, but we paid no attention to monsters, for nothing is less novel than they are. Indeed, there is almost no place where you will not find Scyllas and rapacious Celaenos and

Frio in southeast Brazil). 18 Lucan, Pharsalia 7.818–19; cf. Augustine, City of God 1.12 19 Cf. Erasmus, Apophthegmata 7, Anaxagoras Clazomenus 4, and Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 1.43.104. 20 The Portuguese had visited Calicut (a city on the west coast of India, not Calcutta) by 1487 and established a station there in 1511. 21 This is not an ordinary bench covered with sod. The small woodcut of the scene in the two editions of 1518 shows that it was a long wooden box filled with earth and covered on top with growing grass. 22 The torrid zone between the Tropic of Cancer and the Tropic of Capricorn, the northern and southern limits between which the sun’s orbit was thought to move.

man-eating Laestrigonians and such prodigious monsters,<sup>23</sup> but it is not everywhere that you will find soundly and wisely trained citizens. But just as he noted many ill-considered practices among those newly discovered nations, so too he recounted not a few features that could serve as patterns to correct the errors of our own cities, nations, peoples, and kingdoms. These, as I said, will have to be presented elsewhere. At present I intend to relate only what he told us about the customs and institutions of the Utopians,<sup>24</sup> but first I will present the conversation which led him on, as it were, to mention that commonwealth. For after Raphael had very judiciously analyzed some of our errors and some of theirs (and certainly there are plenty in both places) and had presented some wiser provisions both here and there—and he had such a mastery of the customs and institutions of every nation he visited that you would imagine he had spent his whole life there—Peter was amazed by him and said, “My dear Raphael, why do you not enter into the service of some king, for I am convinced that there is none who would not be extremely glad to have you, because this learning of yours and your knowledge of peoples and places would not only serve to delight him but would also make you fit to inform him of precedents and aid him with advice. In this manner you could at one and the same time promote your own interests enormously and be of great assistance to your relatives and friends.”

“As for my relatives and friends, I am not much concerned about them because I have done my duty by them well enough: others do not give up their possessions until they are old and sick, and even then they do so reluctantly, when they can no longer retain them; but I divided my possessions up among my relatives and friends when I was not only healthy and vigorous but also young. I think they ought to be satisfied with my generosity, and beyond that they should not demand and expect me to hand myself over into servitude to kings for their sake.”

“A fine thing to say,” said Peter. “I want you to go into the service of kings, not be in servitude to them.”

“There is,” he said, “only one syllable’s difference between them.”

“But I am of the opinion,” said Peter, “that, whatever name you give it, it is still the course by which you can not only profit others, both privately and publicly, but also make your own position a happier one.”

“Would I make it happier by following a course which is abhorrent to me? But as it is, I live as I please,<sup>25</sup> and I certainly suspect that is very seldom the case with the grandees of court. Surely there are plenty of people who strive to gain the favor of powerful men, so that you need not consider it any great loss if I and one or two like me are not among them.”

Then I said, “It is clear, my dear Raphael, that you are not greedy for wealth or power; I respect and revere a person with your attitude no less than I do any of the high and mighty. But it seems obvious to me that you would be acting in a fashion worthy of yourself and of your noble and truly philosophical nature if you could bring yourself to apply your intelligence and industry to public affairs, even at the cost of some private inconvenience. You will never be able to do this to such good effect as you could if you became a counsellor to some great prince<sup>26</sup> and urged upon him what is right and honorable, as I am sure you would. For the stream of good and evil, as if from a never-failing spring, flows from the prince down upon the whole people. And your learning is so complete, even if you had no great experience, and your experience is so full, even if you had no learning at all, that you would be an outstanding counsellor to any king whatever.”

“You are wrong on two counts, my dear More,” he said. “First about me, and then about the way things are. For I do not have the ability you attribute to me, and even if I had it in full measure, I would sacrifice my contemplative leisure to active endeavor without contributing anything to the common good. First of all, the princes themselves, almost all

<sup>23</sup> Scylla was a six-headed sea monster (Odyssey 12.73–100, 234–59; Aeneid 3.424–32); Celaeno was one of the harpies, disgusting birds with women’s faces (Aeneid 3.209–58); the Laestrigonians were giant cannibals (Odyssey 10.17–133).

<sup>24</sup> It seems likely that at this point More inserted the bulk of Book 1, the dialogue about counseling kings, which was written after Book 2, when More had returned to London. In this addition More does not limit himself to describing Utopian institutions but gives Raphael’s narration about the Polylerites, Achorians, and Macarians. <sup>25</sup> Hythloday paraphrases a definition of liberty given by Cicero in a context similar to this one (De officiis 1.69–70). See Pico, CW 1: 69/21–22 and 87/4–5, and Augustine’s City of God 14.25 for different uses of this proclamation of liberty. <sup>26</sup> As indicated in the opening paragraph, the term More uses here and frequently elsewhere is princeps.

of them, are more devoted to military pursuits (in which I neither have nor desire any skill) than they are to the beneficent pursuits of peacetime; and they are far more interested in how to acquire new kingdoms by hook or crook than in how to govern well those they have already acquired. Moreover, among the counsellors to kings, there is none who is not so truly wise as not to need — or at least thinks he is so wise as not to tolerate — the advice of any other counsellor, except that they support and fawn on any and all absurdities propounded by the prince's favorites, whose favor they strive to win by flattery. Certainly nature seems to have arranged it so that everyone is delighted with his own insights. So the crow dotes on its chick, and the monkey on its whelp.<sup>27</sup>

“But in a conclave made up of those who envy the insights of others or exalt their own, if anyone should propose something which he has read was done in other eras or which he has seen done in other places, his listeners there immediately act as if their whole reputation for wisdom were at risk, as if they would thereafter be considered totally stupid if they cannot propose something to undermine the proposals of others. If all else fails, then this is their last resort: these things pleased our ancestors, they say, and would that we were as wise as they! And with this remark they take their seat thinking they have said the last word on the subject, as if it were a very dangerous matter if anyone were detected to be wiser than his ancestors on any point. In fact if those ancestors have instituted some truly excellent policy, we are quite content to dismiss it. But if they might have taken a wiser course on some point, we immediately and eagerly seize the pretext of tradition to maintain it. And I have encountered such arrogant, absurd, and captious judgments often enough in other places, but once even in England.”

“What,” I said, “you were in our country?”

“I was,” he said, “and I spent some months there, not long after the revolt of the Englishmen from the west against the king was put down with such a miserable slaughter of the rebels.<sup>28</sup> While there I was much obliged to the most Reverend Father John Morton, Cardinal Archbishop of Canterbury, and at that time also Lord Chancellor of England.<sup>29</sup> He was a man, my dear Peter (for More already knows what I am about to say) no more venerable for his authority than for his prudence and character. He was of medium height, not stooped over though he was of an advanced age. His looks inspired reverence, not fear. In company he was not standoffish, but grave and serious. Sometimes he enjoyed handling suitors roughly, but harmlessly, so as to gauge the intelligence and presence of mind each would display. He was delighted with such qualities, provided they were devoid of all impudence, since they were related to his own character, and he embraced them as valuable in getting things done. His speech was polished and pointed; he was very skilled in the law; his intelligence was incomparable; his memory was so excellent as to be prodigious. These extraordinary natural gifts he had improved by study and practice. The king seemed to rely very much on his advice and while I was there he seemed to be the mainstay of the commonwealth. This was not surprising: thrust immediately from school into the court at a very young age, active in important affairs throughout his life, continually whirled about by violent changes of fortune, he had learned practical wisdom in the midst of many and serious perils, and wisdom so won is not easily forgotten.

“One day when I happened to be dining at his table, a layman who was skilled in the laws of your country was there. Following up some remark or other, he launched on an elaborate encomium of the Laws hardly just rigorous justice which was at that time applied to thieves in England. They were executed everywhere, he said, sometimes as many as twenty at a time hanging on one gallows,<sup>30</sup> and he remarked that he was all the more amazed that the country was cursed to have so many of them prowling about everywhere, since so few escaped punishment. Then I said (and I dared to speak my mind freely in the presence of the Cardinal): ‘You should not be at all surprised. For this punishment of thieves is both beyond the limits of justice and not in the public interest. As a punishment for theft it is too harsh, and even so it is not a sufficient deterrent: simple theft is the time he was a page in his household (ca. 1490–92). He is portrayed as skilled and shrewd in More's Richard III (CW 2: 90–92). <sup>30</sup> In his Description of England (1587), ed. Georges Edelen (Ithaca, NY:

<sup>27</sup> Cf. Erasmus, Adages 115, 121, 3064 (CWE 31: 158–60, 167–68). <sup>28</sup> A Cornish rebellion was crushed at the Battle of Blackheath on June 22, 1497. <sup>29</sup> More had admired Morton (1420–1500) since

Cornell University Press, 1968), 193, William Harrison reported that in the reign of Henry VIII alone 72,000 thieves and vagabonds were hanged.

not so serious a crime as to deserve capital punishment, and no penalty is great enough to keep people from stealing if they have no other way to make a living. Thus, in this matter, not only you but most 5 of the world seem to imitate bad teachers who are more eager to beat their pupils than to instruct them. For heavy and horrible punishments are imposed on thieves when it
 10 A feasible method for reducing the number of thieves would be much better to make some provision for their livelihood, so that no one should labor under the cruel necessity first of stealing and then of dying for it.'

15 "We have made sufficient provision for that,' he said. 'There are trades; there is farming. From them they can make a living, as long as they do not willfully prefer to be criminals.'

20 "You will not get out of it that way,' I said. 'First of all, we will overlook the many soldiers who come home crippled from foreign or domestic wars, as they recently did from the battle against the Cornishmen and not long before that from the French wars.<sup>31</sup> They have sacrificed their limbs for the commonwealth or the king; their disability does not allow them to practice their former trades and they are too old to learn a new one. These,' I said, 'let us overlook, since wars happen only now and then. Let us consider what is never not happening. Now there is a multitude of noblemen who not only live like
 30 drones on the labor of others<sup>32</sup> — namely the tenants of their estates whom they bleed white by raising their rents (for this is the only kind of frugality they recognize, and otherwise they are so prodigal as to reduce themselves to beggary) — but they also travel
 35 with a huge crowd of retainers, none of whom has ever learned how to make a living. As soon as their master dies or they get sick, they are immediately thrown out. For lords would rather support idle men than invalids, and often the heir of a dying
 40 master cannot support a household as large as his father's, at least at first. Meanwhile the outcasts vigorously starve unless they vigorously steal. For what are they to do? After tramping around a bit they will have ruined their clothes and their health. Disfigured as they are by disease and clad in rags, 45 no nobleman will deign to take them in and no farmer dares to do so. For the farmers are not unaware that a person who has been brought up in idle ease and pleasure and who has been used to swaggering about like a bully, girt with sword and buckler, looking down his nose at the whole neighborhood and despising everyone but himself, is hardly likely to be a reliable and faithful servant for a poor farmer, working with hoe and mattock for miserable wages and scanty keep.' 55

"To this the lawyer replied, 'But this is precisely the sort of person we should cherish the most. For since they are more high-spirited and lofty-minded than artisans and farmers, they provide the strength and power of an army if we ever have to fight a war.' 60

65 "Indeed,' I said, 'you might as well say that we should cherish thieves for the sake of warfare, for you will never lack for thieves as long as you have the retainers. In fact robbers are no slouches as soldiers and soldiers are not the most lethargic of thieves — so finely matched are the two callings.<sup>33</sup> But this problem, though it is widespread among you, is not peculiar to you; it is shared by almost all nations.

70 But France is infected with another pestilence besides, one that is even more virulent: the whole country is occupied and filled with mercenaries, even during peacetime (if it can be called that).<sup>34</sup> Their justification is the same as yours for maintaining idle retainers here: those foolosophers<sup>35</sup> think
 75 that the public welfare consists in having strong and stout armed forces in a state of readiness, especially veterans, for they have no confidence in untried troops, just as if they should 80 The disaster produced by standing military garrisons seek out a war precisely to avoid having inexperienced soldiers, and people should 85 be gratuitously slaughtered (as Sallust nicely puts it) lest hand and spirit should grow sluggish through inactivity.<sup>36</sup> Just how deadly it is to maintain such beasts France has learned to her cost,<sup>37</sup> and the same

<sup>31</sup> Since Hythloday was in England in late 1497 and early 1498, he may be referring to English skirmishes in France in the early 1490s. But as he speaks in 1515, he may also be thinking of the much heavier casualties in Henry VIII's futile French campaigns of 1512–13. <sup>32</sup> Plato uses the figure of the drones to describe an oligarchy ruled by rich men who exploit the poor and contribute nothing to society (Republic 8.552b–c).

<sup>33</sup> The parallel between soldiers and robbers is a frequent theme among humanists; see, for example, Erasmus, Complaint of Peace (CWE 27: 317). <sup>34</sup> In the time of Francis I, the French relied mostly on Swiss and German mercenaries.

<sup>35</sup> The Latin morosophi (transliterated from Greek) means literally "foolish wisemen" (the reverse of the modern "sophomore"). See Lucian, Alexander 40. Erasmus uses it in The Praise of Folly 13; in De copia, Opera omnia 1.12c; and in Adagia (prol., CWE 31: 23). <sup>36</sup> Bellum Catilinae 16.3 <sup>37</sup> Foreign mercenaries often wreaked

is made clear by the examples of the Romans, the Carthaginians, and the Syrians,<sup>38</sup> and of many other nations as well:<sup>39</sup> standing armies of mercenaries, on one occasion after another, destroyed not only their government but also their fields and even their cities. How little this was necessary is made clear by the fact that not even French soldiers, thoroughly trained in warfare to their very fingertips, can very often boast that they came off better than your draftees — not to put it more strongly lest I seem to be flattering present company.<sup>40</sup> But your troops, whether urban artisans or rough and untrained farmers, are not thought to be very much afraid of the idle retainers of noblemen, except for some whose physique does not lend itself to strength and boldness or whose brave spirit has been broken by the poverty of their families. There is little enough danger that those retainers whose vigorous and strong bodies (for noblemen do not deign to ruin any but choice physiques) are now either grown flabby with idleness or soft with almost ladylike activities, no danger, I say, that such retainers would be unmanned if they were taught a good craft to earn a living and were exercised in manly labors. However that may be, I certainly do not see that it can ever contribute to the common good to prepare for war (which you never have unless you wish to) by maintaining such a huge crowd of people who undermine the peace, to which we ought to pay so much more attention than to war. But this is not the only problem which makes it necessary to steal. There is another, more peculiar (so far as I know) to you Englishmen.

“What is that?” said the Cardinal.

“Your sheep,” I said, “which are ordinarily so meek and require so little to maintain them, now begin (so they say) to be so voracious and fierce that they devour even the people themselves; they destroy and despoil fields, houses, towns.<sup>41</sup> I mean that wherever in the realm finer and therefore more expensive wool is produced, noblemen, gentlemen, and even some abbots (holy men are they), not content with the annual rents and produce which their ancestors were accustomed to derive from their estates, not thinking it sufficient to live idly and comfortably, contributing nothing to the common good, unless they also undermine it, these drones leave nothing for cultivation; they enclose everything as pasture; they destroy homes, level towns, leaving only the church as a stable for the sheep; and as if too little ground among you were lost as game preserves or hunting forests, these good men turn all habitations and cultivated lands into a wilderness. And so that one glutton, a dire and insatiable plague to his native country, may join the fields together and enclose thousands of acres within one hedge, the farmers are thrown out: some are stripped of their possessions, circumvented by fraud or overcome by force; or worn out by injustices, they are forced to sell. One way or another, the poor wretches depart, men, women, husbands, wives, orphans, widows, parents with little children and a household which is numerous rather than rich, since agriculture requires many hands, they depart, I say, from hearth and home, all that was known and familiar to them, and they cannot find any place to go to. All their household furnishings, which could not be sold for much even if they could wait for a buyer, are sold for a song now that they must be removed. They soon spend that pittance in their wanderings, and then finally what else is left but to steal and to hang — justly, to be sure — or else to bum around and beg? For that matter, even as vagrants they are thrown into jail because they are wandering around idly, though no one will hire them, even when they offer their services most eagerly. For since no seed is sown, there is no farm labor, and that is all they are accustomed to. One herdsman or shepherd is sufficient to graze livestock on ground that would require many hands to cultivate and grow crops.

“And for this reason the price of grain has risen sharply in many places. Even the price of wool has gone up so high that poorer people who ordinarily make cloth out of it in this country cannot buy it, havoc in France during the Hundred Years' War (1337–1453). <sup>38</sup> The Greek historian Herodian (mentioned in Book 2 as one of the authors Hythloday brought to Utopia) describes how several emperors were murdered by the barbarian mercenaries of the Praetorian guard. After the first Punic War, foreign mercenaries revolted against their Carthaginian employers. From the thirteenth to the sixteenth centuries, the

Mamelukes (originally mercenaries from Turkey and Circassia) ruled despotically a large empire consisting of Egypt, Syria, and other parts of the Middle East. <sup>39</sup> Especially Italy, which was often devastated by foreign mercenaries; Machiavelli, who firmly opposed the use of mercenaries, gives many examples of the harm they caused. <sup>40</sup> The English defeated the French decisively at Crècy (1346), Poitiers and for that reason many of them are out of a job and reduced to idleness. For after pastureland was expanded, huge herds of sheep were carried off by a murrain, as if God were punishing the owners' greed by visiting on the sheep a pestilence which might more justly have been hurled at the heads of their owners. But even if the number of sheep should increase enormously, the price still does not go down, because, though the sellers cannot be said to have a monopoly since more than one is selling, still it is certainly an oligopoly. For the sheep have almost all come into the hands of a few, and these men are so rich that they are under no necessity to sell until they want to, and they do not want to until they get the price they want.

(1356), and Agincourt (1415). <sup>41</sup> Between the thirteenth and eighteenth centuries, much arable land was enclosed by hedges or ditches and used to pasture sheep. Hythloday's arguments against enclosure were widespread, and though it had its supporters (mostly because of the profitability of the wool trade), it undoubtedly caused much suffering to farm laborers and destroyed many villages.

“For the same reason other kinds of livestock are similarly high-priced, and all the more so because, once the farmhouses have been torn down and agriculture neglected, there is no one to see to the breeding of animals. For even those rich landholders do not rear other animals as they do sheep. Rather they buy them lean and cheap in some distant market and then sell them dear after fattening them up in their pastures. And for that reason, I think, the full disadvantage of this system has not yet been felt. I mean that up to now they have raised the prices only in the places where the animals are sold. But when the time comes that they are taken from the breeders faster than they can be bred, then finally the numbers will also gradually decrease where they are bought, so that here also there must needs be a severe shortage. Thus the very feature that seemed to make your island extremely fortunate has been turned into an instrument of its destruction by the wicked greed of a few men. For these high food prices are the reason why everyone dismisses as many as he can from his household—to go where, I ask you, except to go begging or else, as a noble spirit can more easily be persuaded to do, to turn to robbery.

“What shall we say when this miserable poverty and want is coupled with wanton luxury?<sup>42</sup> For the retainers of noblemen, artisans, and one might say even some peasants and, in sum, all classes of society indulge in extravagant sartorial display and excessive, luxurious cuisine. And then the cookshops, the brothels, the bawdy houses, and those other sorts of bawdy houses, the wine bars and alehouses, and then so many crooked games of chance, dice, cards, backgammon, tennis, bowling, quoits, don't all these quickly empty pockets and send their votaries off to rob someone? Get rid of these pernicious plagues, make laws requiring that villages and towns be rebuilt by those who have torn them down or be handed over to those who are willing to restore and rebuild them. Keep the rich from cornering the market and from having a licensed monopoly, as it were.<sup>43</sup> Let fewer people be supported in idleness, let agriculture be restored, let cloth working be reinstated as an honest trade which will give useful employment to this idle mob, whether those whom poverty has already turned into thieves or those who are now vagabonds or idle servants—in either case they will turn out to be thieves.

“Certainly unless you remedy these evils, it is pointless for you to boast of the justice administered in the punishment of thieves, a justice which is specious rather than either just or expedient. In fact when you bring people up with the worst sort of education and allow their morals to be corrupted little by little from their earliest years, and then punish them at last as grown men when they commit the crimes which from childhood they have given every prospect of committing, what else are you doing, I ask you, but making them into thieves and then punishing them for it?”

“As I was saying this, the lawyer was already getting ready to speak and had decided to employ that common method of disputants who are more diligent in repeating than in replying—so high is their opinion of memory. ‘A very fine speech indeed,’ he said, ‘especially for a stranger who has only had more opportunity to hear about these matters than to get any precise knowledge of them, as I shall make clear in a few words. For first I shall recount in an orderly way what you have said; then I shall show on what points your ignorance of our affairs has misled you; finally, I shall rebut and refute all your arguments. Therefore, to begin with the first task I promised to undertake, you seem to have made four—’

“Be quiet,’ said the Cardinal, ‘for it seems hardly likely that you will reply in a few words after such a

<sup>42</sup> Long before and after 1515 many sumptuary laws were passed against extravagant display, especially in clothing, but they were honored more in the breach than the observance. <sup>43</sup> During the reigns of Henry VII and Henry VIII, laws were passed forbidding gaming and alehouses, limiting enclosure, restoring land from pasture to tillage, and restricting monopolies, but with little effect.

beginning. Hence, for the present we will relieve you of the trouble of replying, but we reserve that whole task for you when you two meet again, which I wish to be tomorrow, if nothing prevents you or Raphael here from meeting then.

This shows the Cardinal's usual way of interrupting anyone who talks too much

But meanwhile, my dear Raphael, I would very much like to hear why you think theft should not be punished with execution, or what other punishment you would enact that would contribute more to the common good. For even you do not think we should put up with it. But if people rush into thievery now when it is punishable by death, and then if they could once be sure of their lives, what force, what fear could possibly restrain criminals? They would interpret the mitigation of the punishment almost as an incentive or reward for wrongdoing.

“Most gracious Father,” I said, “it seems to me to be entirely and absolutely unjust to take a person’s life because he has taken some money. For a human life cannot be equated with the goods of fortune, not even the whole sum of them. But if they say that this punishment is redress not for money but for the transgression of justice or the violation of laws, would it not be right to call this extreme justice extreme injury?<sup>44</sup> For we ought not to approve of legal decrees so Manlian<sup>45</sup> that the slightest infraction causes the sword to be unsheathed nor should we accept the Stoic maxim that all sins are equal,<sup>46</sup> making no distinction between killing a person or stealing a coin from him, for between these two crimes (if fairness means anything at all) there is no similarity or relationship. God forbade us to kill anyone,<sup>47</sup> and are we so ready to kill someone because he has taken a bit of money? But if someone should interpret that command to mean that the power to kill anyone is taken away except when human law declares a person should be killed, what is to prevent human beings from using the same principle to decide to what degree rape,

Manlian edicts from Livy

adultery, or perjury are permissible? In fact, God has deprived us of the right to kill not only others but also ourselves, but if the mutual consent of human beings to specific laws allowing them to kill one another has enough force to release their agents from the bonds of God’s commandment and enable them, with no precedent from God, to execute anyone condemned to death by human law, will that not mean that God’s commandment has only as much force as is granted to it by human law? And indeed on this principle human beings may decide to what degree God’s commands are to be observed in all fields. Finally, the law of Moses, though it was harsh and severe because it was made for slaves, and stubborn ones at that, still punished theft with a fine, not death.<sup>48</sup> Let us not think that in his new law of mercy, by which he commands us as a father does his children, God has granted us greater license to be cruel to one another.<sup>49</sup>

“These are the reasons why I think this punishment is wrong. And I think there is no one who does not understand how absurd and even dangerous it is to society to punish theft and murder in the same way. For when a thief sees that he is in no less danger if he is convicted of theft than if he had also been condemned for murder, that consideration alone will drive him to kill someone whom otherwise he would only have robbed. For apart from the fact that there is no more danger if he is caught, murder makes him more safe and gives him a greater hope of concealing his crime, since the witness to it has been eliminated. Thus by using excessively harsh measures to terrify thieves we encourage them to kill the innocent.

“As for the usual question of what punishment would be more advantageous, in my judgment it would be quite a bit easier to find a better one than to find one that is worse. For why should we doubt the utility of that way of punishing criminals which we know was once preferred for so long by the Romans, who were quite expert in the art of governing? Those convicted of serious crimes were condemned

<sup>44</sup> a proverbial saying (Erasmus, Adages 924, CWE 32: 244), derived primarily from Cicero, De officiis 1.10.33 <sup>45</sup> Proverbial for “harshly unjust” (Erasmus, Adages 987, CWE 32: 274–75). The Roman consul Manlius executed his son for winning a victory without having permission to do so (Livy 8.7.1–22). <sup>46</sup> Stoics such as Zeno, Seneca, and Epictetus believed that

virtue consisted in ignoring exterior forces and remaining faithful to the interior dictates of reason about what is right; such faithfulness has no degrees but is either kept or not. Cicero presents and refutes the paradox in De finibus 4.10.21–23; Horace ridicules it in Satires 1.3.113–24. <sup>47</sup> Ex 20:13; Dt 5:17 (All scriptural references are to the Vulgate text and numbering.)

<sup>48</sup> Ex 22:1–4 <sup>49</sup> The Mosaic law does, of course, prescribe death as a punishment for various crimes. And even under the more merciful Christian dispensation, Hythloday does not always condemn capital punishment; as the remedy of last resort, it is employed by the Polylerites and the Utopians.

to quarry stone or dig out ore, constantly shackled and guarded. But as for me, on this point I reserve my highest approval for the system practiced by a people generally called the Polylerites<sup>50</sup> whom I encountered in the course of my travels in Persia. Their population is not small and their institutions are not lacking in prudence; except that they pay an annual tribute to the king of Persia, they are otherwise free and allowed to make their own laws. But because they are a long way from the ocean and almost entirely surrounded by mountains, and because they are content with the produce of their land, which is by no means infertile, they neither visit others nor are visited very often themselves. In accord with the ancient policy of their country, they do not seek to extend their territory, and what they already have is easily protected by the mountains and the tribute paid to their overlord. They have absolutely no armed forces, their lifestyle is hardly splendid but it is comfortable, and they are happy rather than renowned or illustrious. Indeed, even their name, I think, is not very well known except to their immediate neighbors.

The commonwealth of the Polylerites in Persia

“And so, among them whoever is convicted of theft restores what was taken to its owner, not (as elsewhere) to the prince, for they consider he has no more right to stolen goods

We should note this, since we do otherwise than the thief himself.<sup>51</sup> If the goods have been lost, their equivalent is paid from the possessions of the thief, and whatever is left is handed over intact to his wife and children. He himself is condemned to hard labor.

“Moreover, unless the theft was committed with violence, they are not shackled or imprisoned but left free and unconstrained as they work on public projects. Shirkers and slackers are not restrained with shackles but egged on with the lash. If they work energetically, they are subjected to no humiliation; they are locked up in their cells only at nighttime after roll call. Except for constant labor their lives are not uncomfortable. Since they are doing public works they are fed at public expense, and not badly, but in different ways in different places. In some places what is spent on them is collected as alms; and this method, though it is unpredictable, has nevertheless been found to be the most productive because the people there are compassionate. In other places public revenues are set aside for that purpose. There are places where they levy a tax on private individuals to support the prisoners. Actually, in other places they do not do public works, but when a private person needs workmen he goes to the city square and hires some of them for that day at a fixed wage, which is a little less than what a freeman would cost. Moreover, if a slave is lazy it is permissible to whip him. Thus no one ever lacks work. And over and above his keep, each of them brings something into the public treasury every day.

“They are all dressed in one color and they are the only ones who wear it. Their hair is not shaved off but it is clipped a bit short above the ears. A little piece of one ear is cut off. Their friends are allowed to give any of them food, drink, and clothing of the right color. But it is death to give them money, both for the donor and the recipient, nor is it any less dangerous for a freeman to take money from them for any reason whatsoever or for a slave (for that is what they call the convicts) to lay a hand on a weapon. Each district has its own distinguishing badge, which it is a capital crime to throw away, just as it is to be seen outside the district boundaries or to say anything to a slave from another district. To plan an escape is no safer than to attempt it. In fact, to be an accessory to such a plan is death for a slave and enslavement for a freeman. On the other hand, rewards are allotted to informers: for a freeman money, for a slave freedom, and for either one pardon and amnesty for their complicity, to keep it from seeming safer to carry out a criminal plan than to repent of it.

But nowadays the servants of noblemen find such a haircut attractive

“This law and the system I have described constitute their policy in this matter. It is perfectly obvious how humane and advantageous it is since vengeance is managed in such a way as to eliminate the vice and preserve the person, and to handle him in such a way that he has to be good and will spend the rest of his life making up for the harm he has done. Furthermore, there is so little fear that they

<sup>50</sup> a name formed from Greek polus (“much”) and leros (“nonsense”)

in The Education of a Christian Prince (CWE 27: 270).

<sup>51</sup> Erasmus expresses the same opinion

will revert to their former ways that travelers who intend to make a journey consider no guides to be safer than these slaves, whom they exchange from district to district. For there is no opportunity 5 whatever to commit robbery: they are unarmed; money is of no use except as evidence of a crime; punishment is in store for them if they are caught; and there is absolutely no hope of escaping anywhere. For how could a person whose clothes are 10 totally different from anyone else's cover up his escape and disguise himself unless he ran away naked? And even then his ear would give him away. But couldn't they at least conspire to overthrow the republic? — that surely is the real danger. As if any district could hope to do so without sounding out and enlisting the slave gangs of many other districts! They are so far from being able to conspire that they cannot even meet or converse or greet one another. And then how can we believe anyone would dare 20 to trust his companions with such a plot, since it is dangerous for them to remain silent and most advantageous to reveal it? On the other hand, if they are patient and obedient, if they give good reason to believe that they will lead reformed lives in the future, none need despair of regaining his freedom; indeed not a year goes by in which some slaves who have recommended themselves by their patience are not reinstated.'

"When I had said this, and had added that I saw 30 no reason why this system could not be set up also in England, and with much more benefit than the justice which the lawyer had praised so highly, then he (namely the lawyer) said: 'This system could never be established in England without enormous danger to the commonwealth.' As he said this he 35 shook his head, puckered his mouth, and fell silent. And everyone there jumped on his bandwagon.<sup>52</sup>

"Then the Cardinal said, 'It is not easy to predict whether the outcome would be favorable or not 40 without at least trying it out. But when the death sentence has been pronounced, if the prince were to grant a reprieve without any right of asylum<sup>53</sup> in order to see how the system would work, and then if in fact it turned out to be useful, it would be right to establish it. If not, then thieves who had been condemned earlier could be executed at that time; on the part of the government this would be neither less nor more unjust than immediate execution, and during the trial period it would pose no danger. In fact, it seems clear to me that it would not be a bad 50 idea to treat vagabonds also in the same way, for in spite of the many laws made against them, we have still made no progress.'

"When the Cardinal had said this, there was no one there who did not vie with the others in praising what they had scorned when I proposed it, but especially the part about the vagabonds because the Cardinal himself had added it on.

"I do not know whether or not it would be better to say nothing about what happened then, for it was quite silly. But I will tell it anyway, for it was not malicious and it has some bearing on our subject. A certain

An entertaining exchange between a friar and a fool

hanger-on was standing around. It seems he wanted 65 to play the fool, but he did it so well that he seemed to be one, raising a laugh with such witless jokes that the laughter was directed more often at him than at the jokes. But every now and then he came up with something not entirely absurd, so as to confirm the proverb 'Throw the dice often enough and you will sooner or later get a lucky combination.'<sup>54</sup> One of the guests said that in my discourse I had made good provision for thieves and the Cardinal had also taken care of the vagabonds, and now all that remained was to make public provision for those
 75 whom disease or old age had rendered destitute and who were incapable of returning to the jobs by which they had earned their living. 'Leave that to me,' said the hanger-on. 'I will see to it that this is also properly taken care of. In fact, I am desperately anxious to ship off this sort of person somewhere out of my sight; they annoy me so much with their wailing and whining and pleas for money, though they can never sing so pretty a tune as to extract a penny from me. Actually, one of two things happens: either I don't want to give them anything or I don't have anything to give. And so they have now begun to get wise. To keep from wasting their effort, they keep silent when they see me passing by. Good 85 lord, they no more hope for anything from me than if I were a priest.'<sup>55</sup> I would decree by law that all such

A proverb frequently bandied about among beggars

<sup>52</sup> Erasmus, Adages 1612 (CWE 34: 8–10)

<sup>53</sup> If a criminal could reach a place of asylum or sanctuary (usually a church)

he could not be arrested, though during the reign of Henry VII the privilege was discussed and somewhat curtailed. It is debated in More's Richard III (CW 2: 27–33). <sup>54</sup> Cf. Erasmus, Adages 113 (CWE 31: 154–55) <sup>55</sup> There seems to beggars be divided up and parceled out among the Benedictine monasteries where they would become lay brothers (as they are called);<sup>56</sup> and the women I would order to become nuns.<sup>7</sup>

5 “The Cardinal smiled and took it as a joke, but the others took it seriously. A certain friar, however, a theologian, was so delighted by a joke aimed at priests and monks that he himself also began to make merry, though he was otherwise so serious as to be almost sour. ‘But even this,’ he said, ‘will not free you from beggars unless you also look out for us friars.’

10 “But that is already taken care of,’ said the hanger-on. ‘For the Cardinal looked out for you marvelously well when he proposed that vagabonds should be confined and put to work, for you are the greatest vagabonds of all.’

“After they all had looked at the Cardinal and saw that he did not reject this joke either, they were not

20 He alludes to the Horatian phrase “doused with Italian vinegar” at all loath to enjoy it, all except the friar. Needled in this fashion,<sup>57</sup> he was indignant and furious (nor am I surprised that he was), so much so that he couldn’t even refrain from hurling insults. He called the fellow a scoundrel, a backbiter, a sneak, and a son of perdition,<sup>58</sup> all the while citing terrible threats from Holy Scripture. Now the buffoon began to do some serious buffoonery, for he was clearly on his own ground.

30 “Do not grow angry, my good friar,’ he said, ‘for it is written, “In your patience you shall possess your souls.”<sup>59</sup>

35 “The friar replied (and I will give his very own words), ‘I am not angry, you jailbird, or at least I do not sin. For the psalmist says, “Be angry and do not sin.”<sup>60</sup>

40 “Then the friar was gently advised by the Cardinal to control his emotions, but he said, ‘No, my lord, my language springs from nothing but good zeal, as it should, for holy men have had good zeal, whence

it is said, “Zeal for your house has consumed me,”<sup>61</sup> and we sing in church, “Those who mock Elisha as he goes up to the house of God feel the zeal of the bald man,” just as perhaps this mocking and ribald rascal will feel it.<sup>62</sup>

Apparently the friar, in his ignorance, misuses zelus as if it were neuter like scelus

45

50 “‘Perhaps you are acting out of a laudable feeling,’ said the Cardinal, ‘but it seems to me that you would act, if not in a holier, then certainly in a wiser way, if you would not put yourself on the level of a fool and set out to cap his absurdities with your own.’

55

“‘No, my lord,’ he said, ‘I would not act more wisely. For Solomon, the wisest of men, says, “Reply to a fool in accord with his folly,”<sup>63</sup> as I am now doing, and I am showing him the pit into which he will fall<sup>64</sup> if he does not watch out. For if the multitude which mocked Elisha, who was just one bald man, felt the zeal of the bald man, how much more will be heaped on a single person who mocks a multitude of friars, for many of them are bald. And also we have a papal bull which excommunicates anyone who makes fun of us.’

60

65

70 “When the Cardinal saw there would be no end to it, he sent the hanger-on away with a motion of his head and opportunely turned the conversation to another subject. A little later he arose from the table and, dismissing us, devoted himself to hearing the petitions of suitors.

70

80 “See, my dear More, how I have burdened you with a long discourse, and I would be quite ashamed of myself for doing so if you had not eagerly impertuned me and seemed to listen as if you wanted no detail of this conversation omitted. Though I should have been more brief, still I did at least feel obliged to tell it to show how judiciously they scorned the plan when I proposed it and how the very same persons immediately reversed themselves and approved it when the Cardinal did not disapprove of it. Their flattery of him went so far that they seriously favored and almost accepted the ideas be no recorded or recognized proverb here (though it might still have been a frequent saying among beggars); there may be some allusion to the priest who passed by the wounded Samaritan (Luke 10:31). <sup>56</sup> Unordained members of religious orders were called “lay brothers.” <sup>57</sup> See Satires 1.7.32 and Erasmus, Adages 1252 (CWE 33: 164). The phrase is here translated as “needled.” <sup>58</sup> Jn 17:12; 2 Thes 2:3 <sup>59</sup> Lk 21:19 <sup>60</sup> Ps 4:5 <sup>61</sup> Ps 68(69):10 <sup>62</sup> In 2(4) Kgs 2:23-25, some children mocked Elisha because of his baldness; when he cursed them two bears came out of the woods and tore forty-two of them to pieces. The friar quotes a hymn attributed to Adam of St. Victor, sung within the octave of Easter. In the ordinary pronunciation of Erasmus’s time zelus (“zeal”) could sound like scelus (“crime”). The confusion produces the following result: those who mocked Elisha . . . feel the crime of the bald man. <sup>63</sup> Prv 26:5. But the preceding verse says: “Do not answer the fool according to his folly lest you become like him.” <sup>64</sup> perhaps alluding to Ps 7:16 of his hanger-on because his master took them as a joke and hence did not scorn them. From this you can judge how high an estimation courtiers would have of me and my advice.”

75

80

5 “Indeed, my dear Raphael,” I said, “you have given me much pleasure, you told the whole story so judiciously and so deftly. Moreover, while you spoke I seemed not only to have returned to my homeland but also to have grown young again because 10 of fond memories of the Cardinal, in whose household I was educated as a boy. When you honored his memory so highly, you cannot imagine how much dearer you became to me on that account, though you were already most dear. But I am by no means 15 ready to change my mind yet. No, I am convinced if you could bring yourself not to shrink from the courts of princes, you could contribute a great deal to the common good through your advice. No duty of a good man (and you are one, of course) is more 20 important than that. Then too, since your friend Plato thinks that commonwealths will be happy only when philosophers become kings or kings become philosophers,<sup>65</sup> how far will we be from happiness if philosophers will not even deign to impart their advice to kings.”

25 “They are not so disagreeable as that; they would do so gladly. Indeed they have already done so by publishing many books, if those in power were prepared to accept their good advice. But undoubtedly 30 Plato clearly foresaw that unless kings became philosophers, they would never give their approval to the advice of philosophers, because since childhood they have been thoroughly imbued and infected with misguided notions. He also found this 35 out for himself when he was with Dionysius.<sup>66</sup> But don’t you think that, if I proposed sound measures to some king and tried to eradicate from his mind the seeds of corruption, I would be banished or held up as a laughingstock!

“Come now,<sup>67</sup> imagine that I serve the French king<sup>68</sup> and sit in his council chamber, as the king himself presides in a secret session, surrounded by a most judicious circle of advisers who are very eagerly seeking out wiles and stratagems to keep Milan and win back Naples (which is always slipping 45 from his fingers),<sup>69</sup> and then to overthrow Venice and make all of Italy subject

Indirectly he is discouraging the French from acquiring Italy

to him,<sup>70</sup> and then to bring Flanders, Brabant, and finally all of Burgundy into 50 his control,<sup>71</sup> and other peoples as well, whose realms he has long had it in mind to invade. At this meeting, while one urges that a treaty be struck with Venice, to last only as long as it suits the French, and that the French share their plans with 55 them and even give them some share of the spoils, which they can reclaim when matters have been satisfactorily settled; while another advises them to hire German mercenaries, another to soothe the Swiss with payments of 60 money;<sup>72</sup> someone else, on

Swiss mercenaries

the other hand, thinks that his divine majesty the emperor ought to be propitiated with a votive offering, as it were, of gold;<sup>73</sup> while another thinks it best to strike a bargain with the king of Aragon, granting 65 him the kingdom of Navarre (which belongs to someone else) as the price of peace;<sup>74</sup> and on the same occasion another suggests that the prince of Castile should be snared by the prospect of a marriage alliance<sup>75</sup> and that some nobles of his court
70

65 Republic 5.473c–d; Epistles 7.326a–b

66 During his three sojourns at Syracuse, Plato failed in his attempt to reform the tyrant Dionysius or his son (also Dionysius); see his Epistles 7 and Plutarch, Dion 4.1–5.3, 10.1–20.2. 67 Here Hythloday launches into a 464-word sentence, suspended, unrealistically intricate, interminable (as Lupton called it), which ends with “react to this speech.” Though translators (with the exception of Robinson) have generally broken up this sentence to make it easier, such manipulation is unjustified: the sentence is no easier in Latin than in English. Its difficulty springs from Hythloday’s difficult outlook. See Gerald Malsbary’s “Hythlodeus’ 464-Word ‘Marathon Sentence’: How Does It Work?,” Moreana nos. 195–96 (June 2014): 153–75. 68 In

1515, the time of More’s imagined interview with Hythloday, the king of France was Francis I, who continued the policy of his predecessors Charles VII and Louis XII. All three invented claims to Milan and Naples, but their military adventures in Italy founded in confusion and intrigue. 69 The French won Milan in 1499, lost it in 1512, and regained it in 1515. They won Naples in 1495, lost it in 1496, regained it in 1501, and lost it in 1503. 70 At the battle of Agnadello (1509), France defeated Venice and deprived it of its territory on the mainland. By 1515, when the Venetians helped Francis I in his campaign against Milan, the French king restored Verona to his Venetian ally. Hythloday wonders if the French king is ready to turn on his recent ally once more. 71 After the death of Charles the Rash, Duke of Burgundy

(1477), Louis XI of France tried to seize all the vast Burgundian holdings, though many parts clearly did not belong to France. 72 The German mercenary footsoldiers were surpassed only by the Swiss; both were despised and excoriated by Erasmus and many humanists. 73 Emperor Maximilian of Hapsburg, grandfather of Charles V, was usually impecunious and totally unreliable. A votive offering was normally an expensive gift left in a church or shrine in thanksgiving for a favor from God or a saint. 74 With the help of troops sent by a duped Henry VIII, Ferdinand II, King of Aragon and regent of Castile, occupied southern Navarre in 1512 and annexed it to Castile in 1515. 75 Charles V, prince of Castile and the future emperor (1519), was often affianced for dynastic reasons, especially to French brides.

should be brought over to the French side by giving them reliable pensions; when the greatest difficulty of all is encountered, namely what to do in the meantime about England; but they agree that a peace treaty should be negotiated with them,<sup>76</sup> for a weak bond should always be tightened by the strictest terms; let them be called friends but be suspected as enemies; and that therefore the Scots should be stationed in readiness, poised on all occasions to attack immediately if the English make any moves;<sup>77</sup> moreover, that some exiled noblemen be supported secretly (for treaties forbid that it be done openly) who can claim that the kingdom is rightfully his so that the French king will have a rein to check an English king he does not trust<sup>78</sup> — at this council, I say, amidst such a mass of suggestions, surrounded by such distinguished men, all vying to give advice about going to war, if such a nobody as I were to stand up and give an order to tack in a different direction,<sup>79</sup> expressing the opinion that Italy should be ignored and that the king should stay at home, that France is a kingdom so large that it is not easy for one man to rule it (much less should the king imagine he should consider adding others to it);<sup>80</sup> and then if I should put before them the measures adopted by the Achorians,<sup>81</sup> whose country faces the island of Utopia on the southeast side; if I should tell them that they had once fought a war to gain for their king a realm which he claimed to inherit because of some ancient marriage tie, and that, when they finally won it, they saw that they would endure no less suffering in keeping it than they did in gaining it, but rather that the seeds of war were always sprouting up, either rebellion within or incursions from without against the subjected people, so that they were always having to fight either for them or against them; that they never had an opportunity to disband their army, and that at the same time they were being stripped of their resources, their money was being carried out of the country, their blood was being spilled to provide someone else a smidjeon of glory, that they were no

A notable example

safer during peacetime; that at home the war had corrupted morals, imbued the citizens with a lust for robbery, that slaughter in warfare made them completely reckless, that they scorned the laws because the king was so distracted by trying to take care of two kingdoms that he couldn't concentrate on either one. When they saw that otherwise there would be no end to these great troubles, they finally took counsel together and very courteously gave their king the choice of retaining whichever of the kingdoms he wished; but they said he could not have power over both because they were too numerous to be governed by half a king (indeed no one is willing to share even a muledriver with someone else). And so the good prince left his new kingdom to one of his friends (who was soon afterwards banished) and was forced to be content with his old one. Furthermore, if I showed that all these abortive wars, which had thrown so many countries into turmoil for his sake would exhaust his treasury, destroy his people, and in the end still come to nothing through some mishap or other; and that therefore he should care for the kingdom of his ancestors, improve it as much as he could, make it as flourishing as possible;<sup>82</sup> he should love his own and be loved by them; he should live with them, govern them kindly and leave other kingdoms alone, since the kingdom which has fallen to his lot is enough, and more than enough, for him — how do you imagine, my dear More, my listeners would react to this speech?"

"Certainly not very favorably," I said.

"Let us proceed, then," he said.<sup>83</sup> "If counsellors were in a discussion with some king or other and were thinking up schemes to fill up his treasury, while one person suggests increasing the value of the currency when the king pays out money and decreasing it exorbitantly when he collects it so that he can discharge a large debt with a little money and collect a great deal when he is owed only a little;<sup>84</sup> while another urges him to pretend he is going to war and to use that pretext to raise money and then, when it suits him, to make peace with religious ceremonies, pulling the wool over the people's eyes and

<sup>76</sup> Francis I did make a treaty with England in April 1515. <sup>77</sup> The Scots were traditionally allies of France against England. <sup>78</sup> The French had supported several pretenders to the English throne during the reigns of Henry VII and Henry VIII: Lambert Simnel, Perkin Warbeck, and Edmund de la Pole and his brother

Richard. <sup>79</sup> Erasmus, Adages 860 (CWE 32: 215) <sup>80</sup> Cf. More's epigram no. 243, "On Lust for Power," in CW 3.2. <sup>81</sup> From Greek a- ("without") and choros ("place, country") <sup>82</sup> More here echoes Erasmus's Adages 1401 (CWE 33: 237–43): "Sparta is your portion; make it flourish." <sup>83</sup> Hythloday presents his second imaginary council in an even longer marathon sentence (926 words); it is just as extravagant in Latin as in this English translation. <sup>84</sup> Fraudulent manipulation of the currency was practiced by Edward IV, Henry VII, and (later) Henry VIII.

making them think that he is a conscientious, merciful prince<sup>85</sup> who wishes to spare them bloodshed;<sup>86</sup> while another reminds him of certain antiquated, moth-eaten laws, long since fallen into disuse, laws which everyone ignores since no one even remembers that they were passed, and advises that he should therefore enforce them with fines, noting that no source of revenue could be more productive, none more honorable, since it has the appearance of a concern for justice;<sup>87</sup> while another advises him to prohibit many practices with heavy fines, especially those that are contrary to the public interest, noting that later he can make a monetary arrangement with those whose interests are hurt by the laws and that thus he can win the gratitude of the people and make a double profit, first from fining those whom greed has led into his trap and then by selling dispensations to others (the higher the price the better the prince, since he is reluctant to grant a private person the right to obstruct the common good, and therefore does it only for a high price); while someone else persuades him to put pressure on judges to rule in his favor in all cases and advises him to summon them to his palace where they are to discuss his affairs in his own presence, saying that thus no case will seem so flimsy that his judges (whether out of love of contradiction, or a desire to seem original, or a wish to curry favor) cannot, in his presence, find some loophole for a false verdict, noting that when the judges give differing opinions and argue about a case that is as clear as day, the truth can be called into question and the king will have a convenient handle to interpret the law in his own favor, pointing out that the others will acquiesce out of shame or fear and thus the judgment can be fearlessly rendered in court, nor can there be any lack of pretexts for someone ruling in the prince's favor, since he has on his side either equity or the letter of the law or a twisted interpretation of the language, or something that outweighs all laws in the minds of conscientious judges, the indisputable royal prerogative;<sup>88</sup> while everyone agrees completely with that saying of Crassus that no amount of gold is sufficient for a king, since he has to maintain an army,<sup>89</sup> and moreover that a king can do no wrong, no matter how much he wants to, since all the possessions of all his subjects, and even their own persons, belong to him, and since nothing belongs to anyone unless the king graciously refrains from taking it away from him, and that he should leave as little as possible to his subjects since his safety consists in keeping the people from enjoying too much wealth or freedom, which render them less willing to put up with harsh and unjust commands, whereas on the other hand poverty and privation break their spirits and make them patient, depriving the oppressed of the lofty aspirations needed for rebellion;<sup>90</sup> at this point, if I should stand up and contend that all this advice is both dishonorable and harmful to the king, for not only his honor but also his safety depends more on the people's wealth than on his own; if I were to show that the people choose a king for their own sake, not his, since his labor and effort enable them to live in comfort and safety; and that therefore a prince should be more concerned with the welfare of his people than with his own, just as it is the duty of a shepherd, insofar as he is a real one, to feed his sheep and not himself;<sup>91</sup> that experience itself shows how wrong they are in thinking that the poverty of the people is the safeguard of peace, for where can you find more quarrels than among beggars? who is more intent on changing things than someone who is most dissatisfied with his present state in life? or, finally, who is more driven to create a general disturbance in the hope of gaining something than someone who has nothing to lose? But if a king is so scorned and hated by his subjects that he cannot make them do their duty unless he harasses them with maltreatment, plundering, and confiscation and reduces them to

The saying of Crassus, a rich man

45

50

55

60

65

70

75

80

85 The Latin phrase used here, pius princeps, would immediately remind a renaissance humanist of Virgil's epic hero, pius Aeneas. More uses this phrase in History of King Richard III at CW 15: 424/8–9 and in Epigram 111. 86 In 1492 Henry VII not only levied taxes for a pretended war against France but accepted a bribe from Charles VIII of France for not fighting it. 87 Henry VII's ministers Empson and Dudley were notorious for such chicanery. 88 The royal prerogative, the special, inherited claims of the king apart from common law, was a subject of considerable dispute even in More's time, though it became more heated in the following century. 89 Hythloday adapts Cicero's statement in De officiis 1.25: "Recently Marcus Crassus said that no amount of money is enough for one who wishes to be head of state unless it produces enough income to maintain an army."

90 Among the techniques mentioned by Aristotle by which tyrants maintain their power are keeping subjects poor and humble-spirited and pretending to rule for the advantage of the citizens (Politics 5.9.4, 8, 11, 1313b, 1314a–b). 91 The biblical and Homeric figure of kings as shepherds was widespread; in his speech at the opening of Parliament in 1529 More compared kings to shepherds. See also his Latin epigrams against tyranny (CW 3.2: 65, 168–69).

poverty, it would certainly be better for him to abdicate his throne than to retain it by methods which may keep the name of authority but have certainly lost all of its majesty, for it does not befit the dignity of a king to rule over beggars but rather over wealthy and happy subjects; that was certainly what was meant by that upright and lofty spirit Fabricius, when he replied that he would rather rule over the rich than be rich himself.<sup>92</sup> Indeed, for one person to wallow in pleasure and luxury while he is surrounded on all sides by grieving and groaning, that is to be the guardian not of a kingdom but of a prison; finally, just as a physician is totally incompetent if he cannot cure a disease except by means of another disease, so too someone who does not know how to improve the lives of citizens except by depriving them of the comforts of life is admitting that he does not know how to rule over a free people; instead he should cure either his sloth or his pride, for these are usually the vices that make his people despise and hate him; he should live harmlessly on his own income, adapt his expenses to his income; he should curb crime and, by educating his people properly, prevent it rather than allow it to increase and then punish it; he should not be hasty to revive laws which are customarily ignored, especially those which are long disused because they were never desirable; he should never take something as a fine which a private person would not be allowed to accept because to do so would be criminal and deceitful. At this point, what if I told them that the Macarians,<sup>93</sup> who are also not very far from the Utopians, have a law requiring their king to swear formally and solemnly on the very first day of his reign that he will never have in his treasury at one time more than a thousand pounds in gold or the equivalent amount of silver?<sup>94</sup> They say that a king who was more concerned about the welfare of his land than about his own wealth made this law to prevent the heaping

*The marvelous law
of the Macarians*

up of so much treasure as to impoverish his people; for he saw that this amount would be enough either for the king to fight against rebels or for the kingdom to repel a hostile invasion but would be too little to encourage him to invade other countries — and that was the primary reason for making the law. A secondary reason was that he thought it would make enough money available for the ordinary business transactions of the citizens; and since any money which accrues over that limit has to be paid back, he reckoned that a king would not seek out methods of extortion. A king such as this would be feared by malefactors and loved by his law-abiding subjects. If I should obtrude such notions and others like them on persons who are violently opposed to them, don't you suppose they would turn deaf ears as I told my tale?"<sup>95</sup>

A proverb

"Deaf as a post, undoubtedly," I said. "And, by heaven I am not surprised, and, to tell you the truth, I don't think you should obtrude such speeches or give advice which you are certain they will never accept. For how can it do any good or how can such an odd discourse influence the thinking of those whose minds are prejudiced and dead set against such notions? In private conversation with good friends this academic philosophy is not unpleasant. But there is no room for it in the council chambers of kings, where great matters are handled with great authority."<sup>96</sup>

"That is what I said," he replied. "Among princes there is no room for philosophy."

"Yes indeed, there is," I said, "but not for this academic philosophy<sup>97</sup> which considers anything appropriate anywhere. But there is another sort of philosophy better suited to public affairs. It knows its role and adapts to it, keeping to its part in the play at hand with harmony and decorum. This is the sort you should use. Otherwise, during a performance of a comedy by Plautus, when the slaves are joking

An academic philosophy

<sup>92</sup> The saying derives from Manlius Curius Dentatus (Plutarch, Moralia 194f), but it was also attributed to Gaius Fabricius Luscinus by classical and medieval authors.

<sup>93</sup> From the Greek makarios ("happy"). This Greek word introduces each of the beatitudes (Mt 5:3–11). <sup>94</sup> More may be thinking of Henry VII, who had an enormous sum in his treasury when he died. <sup>95</sup> See Erasmus, Adages 1387 (CWE

31:376). <sup>96</sup> The following argument centers on the moral and rhetorical notion of decorum (Cicero, De officiis 1.27.93–39.141, Orator 21.69–22.74, and De oratore 3.55.109–12). It is also based on the conflict between rhetorical persuasion, which deals with probable truths, and philosophical logic, which produces demonstrable truths. <sup>97</sup> In the text and side note, this philosophy is designated scholastica. The only academic philosophy in More's time was that of the universities, which we nowadays call scholasticism, so that in this case "academic" and "scholastic" are practically synonymous. The humanists generally attacked the hair-splitting excesses of scholastic philosophy and favored a more rhetorical approach to literature and life. See, for example, More's Letter to Dorp (CW 15: 29–39, 49–70).

around together, if you should come out onto the

A marvelous comparison

stage dressed like a philosopher and recite the passage from Octavia where Seneca argues with Nero,<sup>98</sup>

5 wouldn't it have been better for you to have a non-

A mute role

speaking part<sup>99</sup> than to jumble together tragedy and comedy by reciting something inappropriate? By hauling in something quite diverse, you would spoil

10 and distort the play then being presented, even if what you add were better in itself. Whatever play is being presented, play your part as best you can and do not disturb the whole performance just because a more elegant play by someone else comes to mind.

15 "That's how it is in the commonwealth; that's how it is in the councils of princes. If you cannot thoroughly eradicate corrupt opinions or cure long-standing evils to your own satisfaction, that is still 20 no reason to abandon the commonwealth, deserting the ship in a storm because you cannot control the winds. You should not din into people's ears odd and peculiar language which you know will have no

25 effect on those who believe otherwise, but rather by indirection you should strive and struggle as hard as you can to handle everything deftly, and if you cannot turn something to good at least make it as little bad as you can. For everything will not be done well until all men are good, and I do not expect to see

30 that for quite a few years yet."

"In that way," he said, "I would be doing no more than trying to remedy the madness of others by succumbing to their madness myself. For if I want to tell the truth, then I have to say such things. I do not 35 know whether it is proper for a philosopher to say what is false,<sup>100</sup> but it certainly isn't for me. Though that discourse of mine might perhaps have been irksome and repugnant to them, I do not see why it should seem odd to the point of absurdity. If I were 40 to describe everything Plato imagines in his Republic

The institutions of the Utopians

or what the Utopians do in theirs, these things might be better (as they surely are),

but they might still seem strange, because here we

45 have private property and there all things are held in common.

"As for my speech (except that those who have deecided to run headlong down a different path cannot be pleased by someone who calls them back and points out the dangers), but otherwise what was there in it that it is not fitting and even obligatory

50 to say anywhere? Indeed if we are to avoid as odd or absurd everything that has been made to seem alien by the corrupt morals of mankind, we Christians will have to ignore almost all Christ's teachings, and he forbade us to ignore them, so much so that the 55 teachings which he himself whispered in the ears of his disciples, he commanded them to preach openly from the rooftops.<sup>101</sup> And most of his teachings are far more alien to our common customs than that 60 speech of mine was, except that preachers (following your advice, I imagine), whenever mankind refuses to make their behavior conform to the rule of Christ, adapt Christ's teaching to the behavior as if it were a ruler made of lead,<sup>102</sup> so as to make the two 65 match in some way or other. I don't see what good that does except to allow people to be wicked with a better conscience.

"And that, indeed, is all the good I would do in the councils of princes. For my opinion would ei-

70 ther be different, and that would amount to having no opinion at all, or it would be the same, and I would be the abettor, as Terence's Mitio says, of their madness.<sup>103</sup> For I do not see what you mean by that indirect approach of yours which you think

75 enables you to manage things deftly even if you cannot make everything good, and at least make them as little bad as you can. For there is no room there to dissemble or to look the other way: you must ap-

80 prove of advice that is clearly quite bad and subscribe to measures that are utterly pestilential. Anyone who gave faint praise to wicked advice would be taken for a spy or perhaps a traitor. There will be no occasions on which you can do any good, since you have fallen among colleagues who will corrupt

85 the best of men before they themselves will be reformed; either you will be deprived by their evil

way of life or, if you remain honest and innocent, you will be made a screen for the wickedness and folly of others. That is how far you are from being 90 able to improve anything by that indirect approach.

<sup>98</sup> Octavia is a tragedy once attributed to Seneca in which Seneca discusses the abuse of power with Nero. Cf. Erasmus, "to be subservient to your role" (Adages 91, CWE 31: 131–32). <sup>99</sup> John Clement plays such a part in Utopia. <sup>100</sup> Plato allows rulers

(even presumably philosopher-kings) to lie to their subjects for a useful purpose (Republic 3.21.414b–415d, 5.8.459c–d). Quintilian says that "everyone must allow, what even the sternest of the Stoics admit, that the good man will sometimes tell a lie" (Institutes 12.1.38). <sup>101</sup> Mt 10:27; Lk 12:3 <sup>102</sup> The so-called Lesbian ruler was made of lead so as to accommodate itself to measuring curved surfaces; see Erasmus, Adages 493 (CWE 31: 465). <sup>103</sup> Adelphoe 1.2.145–47

“That is why Plato, in a very elegant simile, explains why wise men are right to refrain from taking on governmental tasks: when they see people rushing out on the streets only to be soaked by never-ending rain and they cannot persuade them to get under a roof and out of the rain, they get under shelter themselves, knowing that they will accomplish nothing by going out except to get drenched together with the rest and considering it sufficient, when they cannot cure the folly of others, at least to remain in safety themselves.<sup>104</sup>

“But actually, my dear More (to tell you truly what I really think), it seems to me that wherever there is private property, where everything is measured in terms of money, it is hardly ever possible for the common good to be served with justice and prosperity, unless you think justice is served when all the best things go to the worst people or that happiness is possible when everything is shared among very few, who themselves are not entirely happy, while the rest are plunged into misery.

“Therefore, when I turn over in my mind the most prudent and holy institutions of the Utopians, who have very few laws and yet manage so well that virtue is rewarded and yet, since everything is equalized, everyone has plenty of everything, and then when I contrast their customs with those of other nations, always issuing ordinances but none of them all ever achieving order, where whatever a person can get he calls his own private property, where a mass of laws, enacted day after day, are never enough to ensure that anyone can protect what each calls his own private property or even adequately distinguish it from what belongs to someone else (as can easily be seen from the infinite lawsuits which are always being filed and are never finished), when I consider these things, I say, I have a higher opinion of Plato and I am not surprised that he would not deign to make any laws for people who would not accept laws requiring that all goods be shared equally by all. In his great wisdom he easily foresaw that the one and only path to the welfare of the public is the equal allocation of goods; and I doubt whether such equality can be maintained where every individual has his own property.<sup>105</sup> For where everyone tries to get clear title to whatever he can scrape together, then however abundant things are, a few men divide up everything among themselves, leaving everyone else in poverty. And it usually happens that each sort deserves the lot of the other, since the one is rapacious, wicked, and worthless, and the other is made up of simple, modest men who by their daily labor contribute more to the common good than to themselves.

“Thus I am firmly persuaded that there is no way property can be equitably and justly distributed or the affairs of mortal men managed so as to make them happy unless private property is utterly abolished. But if it remains, there will also always remain a distressing and unavoidable burden of poverty and anxiety on the backs of the largest and best part of the human race. I grant their misery may be somewhat alleviated but I contend that it cannot be fully eliminated. I mean, if you decreed that no one could own more than a certain amount of land and that there be a legal limit to the money anyone can possess, if some laws were enacted that could keep the prince from being too powerful or the people too headstrong, that would keep offices from being solicited or put up for sale, or keep them from entailing many expenses (for otherwise they provide opportunities to rake in money by fraud and spoliation or it becomes necessary to put rich men in offices which ought to be held by wise men), such laws, I say, could mitigate and alleviate these ills, just as applying continual poultices can relieve the symptoms of sick bodies that are beyond healing. But as long as everyone has his own property, there is no hope whatever of curing them and putting society back into good condition. In fact, while you are trying to cure one part you aggravate the malady in other parts; curing one disease causes another to break out in its place, since you cannot give something to one person without taking it away from someone else.”

“Quite the contrary,” I said, “it seems to me that no one can live comfortably where everything is held in common. For how can there be any abundance of goods when everyone stops working because he is no longer motivated by making a profit, and grows lazy because he relies on the labors of

<sup>104</sup> Republic 6.496d–e <sup>105</sup> According to Diogenes Laertius (3.23), “the Arcadians and Thebans, when they were founding Megalopolis, invited Plato to be their legislator; but . . . when he discovered that they were opposed to equality of possessions, he refused to go.” In the Republic, Plato prescribes community of property (and of wives and children) only for the guardians (5.464b–e), but in the Laws he says that in the best state it would be observed by the whole populace (5.739b–d).

others. And then, when people are driven by want and there is no law which enables them to keep their acquisitions for their own use, wouldn't everyone necessarily suffer from continual bloodshed and turmoil? Especially when the magistrates no longer have any respect or authority, for I cannot conceive how they could have any among people who are all placed on one level."<sup>106</sup>

"I am not surprised that you think so," he said, "since you have no conception of the matter, or only a false one. But if you had been with me in Utopia and had seen their customs and institutions in person as I did (for I lived there more than five years, and I would never have wanted to leave except to reveal that new world to others) you would quite agree that you had never seen a people well governed anywhere but there."

"But you would surely have a hard time persuading me," said Peter Giles, "that a better governed people can be found in that new world than in the one we know, since our intellects are no worse than theirs and our governments are older, I imagine, than theirs, so that long experience has brought to light many features which make our lives more comfortable, to say nothing of some things we have discovered by chance which no amount of ingenuity would have sufficed to invent."

"As for the antiquity of governments," said Raphael, "you could give a more accurate judgment if you had read through the histories of that world: if they are trustworthy, there were cities there before there were people here. As for what ingenuity has invented or chance revealed up till now, that could have happened in either place. But certainly I think that even though we may surpass them in intelligence, they still leave us far behind in diligence and zeal to learn."

"According to their chronicles before we landed there they had never heard anything about us Ultra-equatorials (for that is what they call us) except that some twelve hundred years ago a ship was driven to Utopia by a storm and shipwrecked there.

Some Romans and Egyptians were cast upon the shore and never left there again. Notice how their diligence turned this single occasion to their advantage. There was no useful skill in the whole Roman empire which they did not learn from the explanations of the strangers or did not manage to discover from the hints and clues they were given. Such was the enormous gain they made on this one occasion when some men from here were driven to their shores. But if a similar accident ever brought one of them from there to here, the incident has been completely forgotten, just as posterity perhaps will also forget that I was once there. One meeting alone was enough for them to appropriate all of our useful inventions, but I think it will be a long time before we will accept any institution of theirs which is better than ours. And I think that is the only reason why they manage their affairs more prudently and live more happily than we do, though we are not inferior to them in intelligence or resources."

"Therefore, my dear Raphael," I said, "I beg and implore you, describe the island to us. And do not try to be brief but explain in order their fields, rivers, cities, population, customs, institutions, laws, and, in short, whatever you think we would want to know. And you should think we want to know whatever we don't know yet."

"There is nothing I would rather do," he said, "for I have all this at my fingertips. But it will take some free time."

"Then let us go inside to eat lunch," I said. "Afterwards we will take as much time as we want."

"Agreed," he said. And so we went in to eat lunch. After lunch we came back to the same place and sat down on the same bench, and having instructed the servants that we were not to be interrupted, Peter Giles and I urged Raphael to keep his promise. When he saw that we were attentive and eager to hear, he sat there quiet and thoughtful for a little while, and then began as follows.

THE END OF THE FIRST BOOK

<sup>106</sup> More summarizes Aristotle's arguments in the Politics (2.1.2.1260b–4.13.1267b) against Plato's advocacy of communism. Aristotle's arguments had been adopted by the medieval scholastics such as Thomas Aquinas in his commentary on Aristotle's Politics (2.1–7).

THE DISCOURSE OF
RAPHAEL HYTHLODAY

ON THE BEST FORM OF A COMMONWEALTH
AS REPORTED BY THOMAS MORE, CITIZEN AND UNDERSHERIFF OF LONDON

Book 2

The island of the Utopians is two hundred miles across in the middle, where it is widest, and throughout most of the island it is not much narrower, but

Site and shape of the new island of Utopia toward both ends it narrows a bit. These ends, curling around into a circle

with a circumference of five hundred miles, make the whole island look like a new moon. The sea flows in between the horns through a strait about eleven miles wide and then spreads out into a huge empty space protected from the wind on all sides, like an enormous, smooth, unruffled lake; thus almost the whole inner coast serves as a harbor and allows ships to go from shore to shore in all directions, much to the advantage of the people. The

A place safe by nature is defended by one garrison

jaws of the strait are dangerous, on one side because of shallows, on the other because of rocks. In just about the middle of the channel, one rock stands out, visible and hence harmless; they have built and garrisoned a tower on it. The other rocks are hidden and treacherous. The channels are known only to the Utopians themselves, and hence it hardly ever happens that a foreigner enters the bay without a Utopian pilot. Indeed

The stratagem of shifting the signals

they themselves find it hard to enter it safely, except that they set their course by means of some signals on the shore. By moving these to different locations, they can easily lure an enemy fleet to shipwreck, no matter how large it is.

On the outside coast there are not a few ports. But everywhere the landing places are so well defended, either naturally or artificially, that a few troops can keep a huge army from coming ashore. According to

<sup>1</sup> The numerical equivalents of the Greek letters in "Abraxas" (the usual form, rather than "Abraxa") add up to 365. The name was given to the highest of the 365 heavens invented by the heretic Basilides. <sup>2</sup> Several attempts to dig a canal across the Isthmus of Corinth failed so that the attempt became proverbial for failure (Erasmus, Adages 332.6, CWE 36: 76–77). <sup>3</sup> According to Erasmus, in Utopia More "represented the English commonwealth in particular" (CWE 7: 23/281). In 1587, according to William Harrison's Description of England (1587), ed. Georges Edelen (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1968, pp. 86–87), England report, however (and the appearance of the place bears it out), their land was once not surrounded by the ocean. But Utopus, who conquered the island and named it after himself (for before that time it had been called Abraxa)<sup>1</sup> and

The island Utopia named for General Utopus

who brought its crude and rustic mob to a level of culture and humanity beyond almost all other mortals, after he won the victory at his first assault, had a channel cut fifteen miles wide at the point where the land adjoined the continent, and thus caused the sea to flow all around the land.<sup>2</sup> And since he set not only the inhabitants to this task but also employed his own soldiers (to keep the inhabitants from thinking the work was imposed on them as a humiliation), the labor was shared by a great multitude of workers and was finished in an incredibly short time,

A greater task than cutting through the Isthmus

Common effort lightens a burden

so that the neighboring peoples (who at first ridiculed the project as silly) were overwhelmed with wonder and fear.

The island has fifty-four cities,<sup>3</sup> all of them large and splendid and having exactly the same language, customs, institutions, and laws. They have the same layout and they look the same, insofar as the terrain allows.

The cities of Utopia

Likeness breeds concord

Those which are closest to each other are separated by twenty-four miles. None is so isolated that it is more than a day's journey on foot from another city.

A moderate distance between cities

Every year each city sends three old and experienced citizens to Amaurot to discuss problems common to the whole island. For that city, which is located at the navel of the land, so to speak, and hence is most convenient as a meeting place for the delegates from everywhere, is the capital and chief city.

The land is so well distributed that no city has less than twelve miles of ground on all sides, though

Land distribution

had fifty-three counties, which, together with London, make it match the city-states of Utopia. The city-states are mostly independent but loosely federated, each having its own governor; they are united only by codes and customs, as well as a triennial meeting of a senate.

it may have much more in some directions, namely where the cities are furthest apart from one another.

But today such a desire is the plague of all commonwealths

5 consider themselves its tenant-farmers, not its landlords. In the countryside, throughout the fields, they have conveniently located houses, each provided with farming tools. They are inhabited by the 10

The care of agriculture is first

15

fewer than forty men and women, besides the two slaves bound to the land; it is presided over by a master and mistress who are sober and mature. Every thirty households are ruled by one phylarch.<sup>4</sup> Every year twenty from each household return to the city, having fulfilled their two-year stint in the country. They are replaced by twenty substitutes from the city, who are to be trained by those who have already been there a year and hence are more skilled in farmwork; the substitutes themselves will train another group the following year, for if everyone were new and equally ignorant of farming, the crops would suffer from lack of skill. Although this system of exchanging farmers is customary, to keep anyone from being forced to live this hard life for a long time, nevertheless many who have a natural bent for agricultural pursuits apply for and are allowed additional years.

20

25

30

Farm duties

35

They farm the land, raise cattle, cut wood, and convey it to the cities by the most convenient route, whether by sea or by land. They raise a huge number of chickens, and they have a marvelous method of doing it. The hens do not sit on the eggs. For the 40

A wondrous method of hatching eggs

Utopians themselves tend a great number of eggs, keeping them alive and hatching them in constant warmth.<sup>5</sup> As soon as the chicks emerge from the shell, they recognize and follow human beings around as if they were their mothers.

45

Use of horses

They raise very few horses and none but high-spirited ones, which serve no other purpose than the training of young people in horsemanship. For ploughing and hauling they use oxen; they grant that they are inferior to horses in short sprints, but they consider them superior over the long haul and less subject to diseases; moreover, they require less effort and expense to maintain, and when they have served out their term, they can be used for food.

Use of oxen

50

55

Grain they use only for bread.<sup>6</sup> For they drink ei-

Food and drink

ther wine made from grapes or cider made from apples or pears or else plain water, which they often boil with honey or licorice, of which they have plenty. Although they know (and they know it very well) how much produce is needed by a city and its surrounding population, they plant far more grain and raise far more cattle than they need for their own use, giving the surplus to their neighbors. All the supplies that are necessary but not available in the country they get from the city, giving nothing in exchange; the city magistrates provide them the goods with no bargaining. For every month many of them gather there on the feast day. On the day of harvesting, the phylarchs of the farmers inform the city magistrates how many citizens should be sent out; since they arrive at precisely the right time, such a large crowd of workers gets the harvest almost completely done in one day if they have good weather.

60

65

70

75

The advantage of communal labor

THEIR CITIES, ESPECIALLY AMAUROT

If you know one of their cities, you know them all, so similar are they in all respects (so far as the terrain allows). And so I will describe one of them (it doesn't much matter which one). But why choose any one except Amaurot? For it is the most notable and takes precedence over the others because the senate meets there; and no other is better known to me, since I lived there for five whole years.

80

85

The description of Amaurotum, capital city of Utopia

Amaurot, then, is situated on the gentle slope of a mountain; its shape is almost square. Beginning almost at the crest of the hill, it stretches two miles down to the river Anyder;<sup>7</sup> its width is slightly

90

<sup>4</sup> from a Greek compound meaning "ruler of a tribe" <sup>5</sup> Pliny mentions artificial incubation (Natural History 10.76.154–55),

but it seems not to have been practiced in More's time. <sup>6</sup> That is, they do not use it to make beer or ale, as the English do.

<sup>7</sup> From a Greek adjective meaning "without water." Amaurot resembles London in its tidal river (the Thames) and smaller stream greater along the river than it is at the hilltop. The

A description of the river Anydrus

the source of the Anyder is eighty miles above Amaurot, a small spring which is 5 amplified by tributaries, two of them sizeable, until, when it reaches the city itself, it is five hundred yards wide. Then for sixty miles it flows on, getting wider and finally flowing into the ocean. In the space between the city and the coast, and also for 10 some miles above the city, the tide flows and ebbs for six whole hours in a swift current. Seawater flows in to a point thirty miles upstream, filling the whole channel of the Any-der and driving the river 15 water upstream. It also makes the water salty somewhat higher up; from there the river gradually grows fresh and it is pure when it flows by the city. And at ebb tide it flows pure and fresh nearly all the way to the mouth of 20 the river.

The city is connected to the opposite bank of the river by a bridge made not of pilings and planks but

In this feature London is also like Amaurot

of beautifully arched stonework; it is placed at a point 25 furthest from the sea so that ships can sail unobstructed along that whole side of the city.<sup>8</sup> They also have another stream, not large but very gentle and pleasant, which gushes from a spring on the same mountain where the city is located; it flows down through the middle of the city 30 into the Anyder. The Amaurotians have fortified the Use of drinkable water

head and spring of this stream, which is located a

35 little outside the city, surrounding it with walls that link it to the city, so that if an enemy ever attacks them, the water cannot be diverted or contaminated. From this stream the water is channeled in tile conduits to the various districts in the lower parts of the city. Where the terrain makes this impossible, rainwater collected in large cisterns serves 40 the same purpose.

Fortifications of the city walls

The city is surrounded by a high, thick wall with many towers and bastions. On three sides the wall is surrounded by a moat that is 45

dry but wide and deep and blocked by thorn hedges;
on the fourth side the river itself serves as a moat.
The streets are laid out to facilitate traffic and to offer protection from the

The kinds of streets

50 wind. The buildings are by no means ugly; the houses extend in a continuous row along the whole block,

The buildings

55 facing the row on the other side of the street; the housefronts along each block are separated by a street twenty feet wide. Behind the houses, a large garden, as long on each side as the block itself, is hemmed in on all sides by the backs of 60
the rowhouses.

Gardens attached to the houses

There is no house which does not have a door 60 opening on the street and a backdoor into the garden. The double doors, which open easily with a push of the hand and close again automatically, allow anyone to come in — so

This is reminiscent of Plato

65 there is nothing private anywhere.<sup>9</sup> For every ten years

they exchange the houses themselves by drawing lots. The Utopians place great stock by these gardens; in them they grow vines, fruit trees, herbs, and flowers, all so bright and well tended that I have 70 never seen anything more flourishing and elegant. In gardening they are motivated not only by their own pleasure but also by competition among the various blocks to see which has the best garden. And certainly you will not easily

Vergil also praised the usefulness of gardens

75 find any feature of the whole city that is of greater use to the citizens or gives them more pleasure.<sup>10</sup> For that reason the founder of the city seems to have devoted more attention to these gardens than he did to 80 anything else.

For they say that in the very beginning Utopus himself laid out the whole plan of the city. But he left it to succeeding ages to complete the adornment and landscaping that could not be completed 85 during one lifetime. Thus in their annals, which have been diligently and scrupulously kept up since the island was captured 1,760 years ago,<sup>11</sup> it is (Fleet Ditch, except that London's stream was foul and unpleasant). <sup>8</sup> But Amaurot has the advantage of having its bridge above the city, not below it. <sup>9</sup> See Republic 3.22.416a. <sup>10</sup> See Georgics 4.116–48. <sup>11</sup> That is, 244 BC, when Aegis IV became king of Sparta; he was killed because of the egalitarian reforms he wished to introduce. See Richard Schoeck, "More, Plutarch, and King Aegis: Spartan History and the Meaning of History," Philological Quarterly 35 (1956): 366–75; reprinted in recorded that at first their dwellings were humble, mere huts and shacks, built of wood gathered at random, the walls plastered with mud. The roofs came to a point and were thatched with straw. But 5 now all houses have a handsome appearance and are built three stories high. The outer sections of the walls are made of fieldstone, quarried rock, or brick, and the space between is filled up with gravel and cement. The roofs are flat and are coated with a sort 10 of plaster which is not expensive but is formulated so as to be fireproof and more weather-resistant than lead.<sup>12</sup> They commonly use glass (which is very Glass or linen windows plentiful there) to keep out the wind; sometimes they 15 also use thin linen, soaked in clear oil or treated with resin — a method which has two advantages: it lets in more light and keeps out more drafts.<sup>13</sup>

Essential Articles for the Study of Thomas More, ed. Richard Sylvester and Germain Marc'hadour (Hamden, CT: Archon Books, 1977), pp. 275–80.

THEIR MAGISTRATES

Every year each group of thirty families elects its 20 magistrate, who in their ancient language was called a syphogrant but is known as a phylarch in the modern tongue. Ten syphogrants with their households
In the Utopian language are presided over by an official once called a tranibor, 25 "tranibor" means "chief director" now known as a protophylarch.<sup>14</sup> Finally, all the syphogrants, who number two hundred,<sup>15</sup> having 30 sworn to choose the person they consider the most capable, elect the ruler<sup>16</sup> by secret ballot, choosing
A remarkable way of him from the four candidates named by the people.
electing officials For each of the four quarters of the city names one person and proposes him 35 to the senate. The ruler remains in office for life, unless his tenure is interrupted because he is suspected Tyranny is hateful of trying to become a tyrant. They elect the tranibors every year, but they do to the well-ordered commonwealth

<sup>12</sup> In More's time, lead was commonly used to roof important buildings. William Harrison, in his Description of England (1587), ed. Georges Edelen (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1968), speaks of "fine alabaster burned, which they call plaster of Paris, whereof in some places we have great plenty and that very profitable against the rage of fire," but he is describing the plastering of interior walls, not roofs, which he says are covered with shingles, straw, sedge, reeds, or slate (p. 196).

<sup>13</sup> Glass windows were uncommon in homes during More's time; oiled linen,

sheets of horn, or lattices of wicker or wood were used instead. Hythloday means that oiled linen is brighter and more impervious than linen alone, not that it is superior to glass. <sup>14</sup> "Syphogrant" seems to be derived from the Greek compound meaning "wise old man" (or perhaps "old man of the sty" = steward). "Tranibor" seems to come from a Greek compound meaning "plain eater." But other meanings have also been suggested. In fact, Hythloday continues to use the older terms "syphogrant" and "tranibor," not "phylarch" (ruler of a tribe) or "protophylarch" not lightly change them. All the other magistrates hold office for one year.<sup>17</sup>

Every third day, and sometimes oftener if circumstances require it, the tranibors gather to advise the ruler. They make decisions about public affairs; if there are any disputes 40 among private persons (and there are very few) they settle them in a timely fashion.
Disputes should be settled quickly, but nowadays
they are deliberately and lengthily prolonged
 They always invite two syphogrants into the senate, different ones on every occasion; and they have provided that no measures 50 concerning public affairs be adopted unless they have been discussed in the Nothing should be decided hastily senate three days before a decision is reached. To enter into schemes concerning affairs of state outside 55 the senate or public assemblies is a capital crime. These measures were taken, they say, to make it hard for the ruler and the tranibors to conspire to change the form of government and set up a tyranny over the people. And for the same reason matters of 60 great moment are presented at the assemblies of the syphogrants, who report the matter to the households, take counsel among themselves, and report their recommendations to the senate. Sometimes a matter will be referred to the council of the whole
 65 island.<sup>18</sup>

Then, too, the senate has a rule that no point is discussed on the same day it is brought up, but rather it is put off till the next meeting; they do this 70 so that someone who blurts out the first thing that occurs to him will not proceed to think up arguments to defend his position instead of looking for what is of use to the commonwealth, being willing to damage the public welfare
Would that the same thing were done in our councils
 75
This is the meaning of the proverb "take counsel at night"

(chief phylarch). <sup>15</sup> Thus there are six thousand families in Utopia, excluding the countryside. <sup>16</sup> The term used here and throughout Book 2 is princeps. For its significance, see the note to the opening paragraph of Book 1. <sup>17</sup> Utopia is presented as a federation of democratic republics: the households elect the syphogrants, who elect the tranibors and governor (whom they can also remove from office). The syphogrants also select the class of scholars, from which all high officials are chosen. <sup>18</sup> But for the whole island of Utopia there is no single executive branch rather than his own reputation, ashamed, as it were, in a perverse and wrong-headed way, to admit that his first view was short-sighted.<sup>19</sup> From the start such a person should have taken care to speak with deliberation rather than haste.

OCCUPATIONS

Farming is the one occupation in which all of them are skilled, men and women alike. They are all trained in it from childhood on, partly by instruction in the classroom, partly by being taken out to play at it,<sup>20</sup> as it were, in the fields near the city, not merely looking on but doing the work themselves for bodily exercise.

Besides farming (which, as I said, is common to all of them) everyone is taught some trade of his own. The ordinary ones are working with wool or linen or laboring as a stone mason, blacksmith, or carpenter. No other trade there employs any number worth mentioning. As for their clothing—which is uniform throughout the island for all age groups and varies only to indicate sex or marital status, and which is not unappealing to the eye, allows freedom of movement, and is adapted to either heat or cold—as for their clothing, I say, each household makes its own.

Everybody learns one or the other of these trades, including women as well as men. But women, as the weaker sex, engage in lighter crafts, mostly working with wool or linen. The other trades, which require more strength, are relegated to the men. Generally children take up their father's trade, for most are naturally inclined to it. But if anyone is drawn to another occupation, he is transferred by adoption into another household where he can work at the trade he wants to pursue. The move is supervised not only by his father but also by the magistrates, to make sure the master of his adoptive household is respectable and responsible. Actually, if someone has mastered one trade and wants to learn another besides, he gets permission to do so by the same procedure. When he has mastered both, he practices whichever he wants to, unless the city has a greater need for the other.<sup>21</sup>

The chief and practically the only function of the syphogrants is to take care and see to it that no one lounges around in idleness but rather that everyone practices his trade diligently, but not working from early morning till late at night, exhausted by constant labor like a beast of burden.<sup>22</sup> For such grievous labor is fit only for slaves, and yet almost everywhere it is the way workmen live, except in Utopia. Dividing the day and night into twenty-four equal hours, they devote only six to work, three before noon, when they go to lunch. After lunch they take two hours of rest in the afternoon, then three more given over to work, after which they have dinner. Counting the first hour after noon as ending at one o'clock, it is eight o'clock when they go to bed. Sleep takes up eight hours.

The intervals between work, meals, and sleep they are allowed to spend however they like, provided that the time they have free from work is not wasted in debauchery and idleness but spent well in some other pursuit, according to their preference. Many devote these intervals to intellectual activities. For every day they have regular lectures in the hours before dawn; attendance is required only from those who have been specially chosen to devote themselves to learning. But a great number of men, and also women, from all orders of society flock to hear these lectures, some one sort, some another, as each is naturally inclined. But if someone wishes to spend this same time practicing his trade (as do many whose temperaments are not suited to any abstract discipline), they are quite free to do so;

to carry out or enforce the deliberations or decisions of this council. <sup>19</sup> See Erasmus, Adages 1143 (CWE 33: 96). <sup>20</sup> Plato (Republic 7.797a–b) and Aristotle (Politics 7.15.5.1336a). Plato specifically advises that “to make a good farmer [a man] must play [in childhood] at tilling land” (Republic 1.643a–c). <sup>21</sup> Unlike the Utopians, Plato insists that each craftsman must have only one trade (Republic 2.11.370a–c, 2.13.474b–c; Laws 8.846d–e). <sup>22</sup> Statutes during the reign of Henry VII required laborers to work from daybreak to nightfall in spring and summer and from before 5 A.M. to between 7 and 8 P.M. in fall and winter.

5

10

15

20

25

30

35

40

45

50

55

60

65

70

75

80

85

The idle are to be expelled from the commonwealth

The work of laborers should be kept within bounds

Scholarly pursuits

indeed they are also praised for doing so, since their labor contributes to the common good.

After dinner they devote one hour to recreation, during the summer in the gardens, during the winter

5 in the common rooms where they have their meals.

Play at supper

There they either play music or entertain themselves with conversation. They do not so much as know about dice and other such pointless and pernicious

10 But nowadays playing at dice is the sport of princes games, but they do play two games not unlike chess. In one of them numbers fight against each other, one taking over the other; in the other game virtues are lined up in a battlefront

15 against the vices. This game shows very cleverly both how the vices fight among themselves but join forces

Even their games are useful against the virtues, and also which vices are opposed to which virtues, what forces

20 they bring to bear openly, what instruments they use to attack indirectly, what defenses the virtues use to fend off the forces of the vices, how they evade their assaults, and finally by what methods one side or the other wins the victory.

25 But at this point, it is necessary to examine the matter in more detail to avoid making a mistake. If only six hours are devoted to work, you might think that there would necessarily be some shortage of supplies. But that is so far from being true that six

30 hours is not only enough to produce abundantly all the necessities and comforts of life but is even more than enough. This you, too, will understand if you consider what a large part of the population in

Kinds of idle men

35 other countries live their lives in idleness. First, almost all the women do,<sup>23</sup> and they make up almost half the population. Or in places where the women work, the men take their place and lie around snoring. Add to that the huge idle crowd of priests and

40 religious, as they are called.<sup>24</sup> Throw in all the rich, especially the landlords of estates who are commonly called gentlemen and nobles. Include with

The bodyguard of the nobles

45 them their retainers, that rank cesspool of worthless swashbucklers. Add, finally, the strong and sturdy beggars who feign some disease as a pretext for their idleness. You will certainly find that it takes far fewer than you thought to produce everything that mortals use.

A very prudent statement

50

Now consider how few of these workers are occupied in necessary trades, since, where money is the measure of everything, many completely futile and superfluous crafts must be practiced just to support over-indulgence and wanton luxury. Now

55 if that same crowd who are presently working were divided up among the few trades needed to produce the few commodities that nature requires, the resulting abundance of goods would drive prices down so low that craftsmen could not make a living. But if all those who work away at pointless

60 tasks and, together with them, that whole crowd of lazy, languid idlers (any single one of whom consumes twice as much as any of the workers who produce the goods), if they all were put to work — and useful work at that — you can easily see how little

65 time would be enough and more than enough time to produce all the goods required for human needs and conveniences — and pleasures, too, as long as they are true and natural ones.

70

And this very point is confirmed by the experience of the Utopians. For there, in the whole city and the surrounding territory, out of all the men and women who are old enough and strong enough to work, barely five hundred are exempted from

75 work.<sup>25</sup> Among them the syphogrants, who are legally relieved from work, nevertheless do not exempt themselves; they work so as to motivate others to work by giving a good example. The same immunity is enjoyed by those to

80 whom the people give total leisure to pursue various branches of learning, but only after the priests have recommended them and the syphogrants have chosen them by a secret ballot. If any of them disappears the hopes they had in him, he is put back to

85 work; and on the other hand, it happens, not infrequently, that an artisan, devoting his free time to intellectual pursuits, works so diligently and makes such progress that he is exempted from working at

90 his trade and promoted to the scholarly class. From this order of scholars are

Not even the magistrates stop working

80

Only scholars are designated for the magistrates

90

<sup>23</sup> More surely knew how inaccurate Hythloday is here, since women in his time had duties at least as heavy as they have now.

<sup>24</sup> that is, members of the religious orders
<sup>25</sup> This number would be made up of the governor, the two hundred syphogrants, the twenty tranibors, the thirteen priests, the scholars, and the ambassadors.

the ruler himself, who was called Barzanes in their ancient language, but is named Ademus in the modern tongue.<sup>26</sup> The remaining group, which is neither idle nor devoted to useless trades, is so large that it is easy to imagine how many goods they produce in so few hours.

Apart from what I have just said, they have it easier because in most of the necessary trades they do not need to expend as much labor as in other nations. First of all, building or repairing structures everywhere else requires the continuous effort of so many workers for the simple reason that what a father has built his worthless heir allows to fall gradually into disrepair. Thus what could have been maintained with a minimum of effort has to be totally rebuilt, at great expense, by the next heir. Moreover, it often happens that a house that cost someone enormous sums to build seems contemptible to someone of more fastidious taste; after a short time it falls into ruin through neglect and the owner builds another house somewhere else, at no less expense. But among the Utopians, from the time when everything was settled and the commonwealth was established, it very rarely happens that a new site is chosen on which to build houses; and they not only repair damage quickly when it happens but they take preventive measures against it. The result is that their buildings last a very long time and require very little work, and sometimes construction workers have so little to do that they are set to shaping timbers or squaring and fitting stones at home, so that if they ever need to build anything, it can be constructed more quickly.

How house building costs could be avoided

Now as for their clothing, notice how little labor it requires. First of all, at work they wear informal garments made of leather or skins which last for seven years. When they go out in public they put on cloaks which cover these rough clothes; throughout the island they are all of the same color, that of the natural wool. Thus they not only get along with much less woollen cloth than anywhere else, but it also costs much less. But linen is easier to work and hence they use more of it; they are concerned only about the whiteness of linen and the neatness of wool, for they place no value on fineness of weave. The result is that in other places four or five woollen cloaks and the same number of silk shirts are not enough for one person, and if he is a bit fastidious, not even ten will do, but there everybody is content with one, which generally lasts for two years. Naturally there is no reason why he should want any more, for if he got them he would have no more protection against the cold, and his clothing would not look the least bit more fashionable.

How to avoid cost in clothing

Therefore, since everyone is employed in a useful trade and the trades themselves require less labor, the result is a great abundance of everything, so that sometimes they bring out an enormous number of people to repair the public roads, if any have deteriorated. It happens very often, when there is no occasion even for that kind of work, that they publicly decree a shorter workday. For the magistrates do not compel anyone to engage in superfluous labor against his will, since the structure of the commonwealth is primarily designed to relieve all the citizens from as much bodily labor as possible, so that they can devote their time to the freedom and cultivation of the mind. For that, they think, constitutes a happy life.

SOCIAL RELATIONS

Now is the time, I think, to explain how they treat each other, how they interact with one another, and what system they have for distributing goods.

SOCIAL RELATIONS

And so, while the city is made up of households, the households themselves consist mostly of blood relatives. Girls, when they grow up and marry, move into the dwellings of their husbands. But sons and, after them, grandsons remain in the household and are subject to the oldest parent, unless his mind is failing because of old age; in that case he is replaced by the next oldest. But to keep the city from being either over- or underpopulated, they see to it that no household (and each city, apart from its territory, has six thousand of them) has fewer than ten or more than sixteen adults. For it is not possible to set a limit for children.<sup>27</sup> This limit is easily maintained by transferring persons from households with too thousand in each city. Adding children and slaves would probably bring it to more than one hundred thousand (of whom only five hundred are exempt from work).

<sup>26</sup> “Barzanes” derives from the Hebrew for “son of” and the Greek Doric form for “of Zeus.” A Chaldean named “Mithrobarzanes” appears in Lucian’s Menippus, which

More translated. “Ademus” derives from the Greek for “without a people.” <sup>27</sup> An average of twelve adults in each household would produce a population of seventy-two thousand in each city. Adding children and slaves would probably bring it to more than one hundred thousand (of whom only five hundred are exempt from work).

many people to those with too few. But if it should happen that the whole city grows too large, they use the excess to supply underpopulated cities. But if it should happen that throughout the island the whole mass of the population should swell inordinately, they sign up citizens from each city and send them as colonists to live under their own laws on the nearest part of the continent, wherever the natives have a lot of land left over and uncultivated; they adopt any natives who choose to live with them. Assenting willingly to the same style of life and the same customs, the natives are easily assimilated, and that to the advantage of both groups. For by means of their institutions the Utopians make the land easily support both peoples, whereas before it provided a meager and skimpy living for only one. The natives who refuse to live under their laws are driven out of the territory the Utopians have marked off for their use; if they resist, the Utopians make war against them. For they think it is quite just to wage war against someone who has land which he himself does not use, leaving it fallow and unproductive, but denying its possession and use to someone else who has a right, by the law of nature, to be maintained by it.<sup>28</sup> If any of their cities is ever accidentally so reduced in population that they cannot replenish it from other parts of the island and still keep the full quota in those cities (which they say has only happened twice in their whole history because of a virulent plague), then they resupply it with citizens immigrating from a colony. For they would rather allow the colonies to disappear than let any of the cities on the island shrink in size.

But, to return to the citizens' way of life, the oldest man, as I said, presides over a household. Wives serve their husbands and children their parents, and generally the younger serve the older. Each city is divided into four equal districts. In the middle of each district is a marketplace for all sorts of commodities. The products of each household are taken to designated houses there and each kind of goods is separately stored in a warehouse. From them each head of household goes to get whatever he and his household need, and he takes away whatever he wants, paying no money and giving absolutely nothing in exchange for it. For

<sup>28</sup> Hythloday's and the Utopians' rather facile justification of colonialism offers many difficulties. For example, if no one is using or occupying the land, why does anyone have to be driven from it by force? Is farming the only satisfactory use of land?

why should he be denied anything, since there is plenty of everything and no one need fear that anyone would want to ask for more than he needs? For why should anyone be suspected of asking for too much if he is certain he will never lack for anything? Certainly fear of want makes all kinds of animals greedy and rapacious, but only mankind is made so by pride, which makes them consider their own glory enhanced if they excel others in displaying superfluous possessions; in the Utopian scheme of things there is no place at all for such a vice.

Adjoining the marketplaces I mentioned are food markets, to which vegetables, fruit, and bread are brought, and also fish and edible birds and beasts are conveyed from designated places outside the city where there is a stream to wash away refuse and offal. From here they bring the cattle which have been slaughtered and cleaned by the hands of bondsmen. For they do not allow their own citizens to become accustomed to butchering animals; they think that to do so gradually eliminates compassion, the finest feeling of human nature. They do not allow anything filthy or foul to be brought into the city, for air tainted by such rotteness might engender disease.

Furthermore, each block has spacious halls located at equal intervals, each known by its own name. The syphogrants look after them, and to each of them are assigned thirty families (namely fifteen on either side) who eat their meals there.<sup>29</sup> Stewards from each hall gather in the market at a designated hour and get food according to the number of mouths they have to feed.

But their first priority is the sick, who are cared for in public hospitals. They have four of them on the outskirts of the city, a little outside the walls; they are as capacious as four little towns so that no matter how many people are sick they do not need to be crowded uncomfortably together, and so that those who have contagious diseases that can be transferred from one person to another can be kept

<sup>29</sup> That is, each of the four sides of a block has thirty houses, with a hall in the middle of each side.

The cause of rapaciousness

Gore and filth carry the plague into cities

From slaughtering cattle we learned even to kill humans

Care for the sick

at a distance from the main body of the patients. These hospitals are so equipped and provided with everything that promotes health, the care provided in them is so gentle and solicitous, the doctors who

5 are in constant attendance are so skilled that, although no one is sent there against his will, there is still almost no one in the whole city who would not rather be lodged there than at home when he is in failing health.

10 After the stewards of the hospitals have received the food prescribed by the physicians, the best of what is left is divided equitably among the halls, according to the number fed

Common and mixed dining

15 by each one, except that they pay special attention to the ruler, the high priest, and the tranibors, and also to ambassadors and all foreigners (if there are any, for they are few and far between); but when there are any, designated residences are furnished and prepared for them. At the times fixed for lunch and dinner, the whole syphograncy, alerted by the blast of a bronze trumpet, convenes in these halls, except for those who are bedridden in the hospitals or at home.

20 Nevertheless, no one is forbidden to take home food from the marketplace once the halls have been supplied

They always take freedom into account lest anyone act under compulsion

25 with their quotas, for they know that no one would lightly choose to do so; though no one is prohibited from eating at home, still no one does it willingly, for it is not considered proper and it would be foolish to go to the trouble of preparing an inferior meal at home when a splendid and sumptuous one is ready and waiting in a hall nearby.

30 In this hall slaves perform all the chores which are somewhat heavy or dirty. But the women are solely<sup>30</sup>

Women serve at feasts

35 responsible for preparing and cooking the food and making arrangements for the whole meal, each household taking its turn. They sit at three tables or more, according to the number of diners. The men sit with their backs to the wall, the women on the outside, so that if they should suddenly feel ill, as happens, sometimes, when they are pregnant, they

40 can get up and go out to the nurses without disturbing the seating arrangement.

45 The nurses are seated separately with the nursing infants in a little room assigned to them; it never lacks a fire and clean water and also cradles so that when they want they can either lay them down or take off their swaddling clothes and let them refresh themselves by playing freely. Every mother nurses her own child unless death or disease prevents it. When that happens, the wives of the syphogrants immediately find a nurse, and that is not hard to do. For those who can are more than willing because everyone praises their compassion and the infant who is brought up this way takes the nurse as its natural mother.

50
55 60

Praise and a sense of duty are the best way to encourage citizens to act properly

Children who are under five sit in the nurses' den. Other minors, among whom they include members of both sexes who are not yet old enough to marry, either serve the diners, or, if they are too young and not strong enough for that, stand by — and that in absolute silence. Both groups eat what is handed to them by those seated at table, nor is any other time set aside for them to eat.

65
70

The education of the young

The syphogrant and his wife sit at the head table, which is the place of honor and overlooks the whole assembly, since it is placed crosswise in the highest part of the chamber. Next to them sit two of the oldest persons, for they sit in groups of four at all the tables. But if a church is located in that syphograncy, the priest and his wife sit with the syphogrant so as to preside. On both sides of them sit younger people, and then older people again, and so on throughout the whole hall. And so people sit with their coevals, and yet they are mixed in with a different age group. They say that this arrangement was adopted so that the dignity of the elders and the respect due them would keep the young people from indulging in improper language or behavior, since nothing can be done or said at table which would escape the notice of the persons sitting nearby on all sides.

75
80

Priests above the prince, though nowadays even bishops are the lackies of princes

The dishes of food are not served to the highest places and then downward to the others, but rather the choicest pieces are served first to the old people

85 90

Younger mixed with the elder

Respect for the elders

<sup>30</sup> that is, without the help of servants

(whose places are marked) and then equitable shares are served to the rest. But some of the delicacies which are not in sufficient supply to be distributed to the whole hall are given by the old people, as they see fit, to those sitting near them. Thus respect for the elders is maintained and yet everyone has the same advantage from it.

Nowadays even monks rarely observe this custom

Lunch and dinner always begin with some reading that concerns morals, but it is brief lest it be tedious. Taking off from this, the elders begin the discussion, but not in a gloomy and sour fashion. And they do not take up the whole meal with long disquisitions. No, they would much rather listen to the young people, and they even deliberately challenge them so as to learn about the temperament and intelligence of each of them as revealed in the free give and take of tabletalk.

Talk at meals

Nowadays physicians condemn this practice

Lunches are quite brief, dinners more ample because the one is followed by work and the other by rest and sleep during the night, which they think contribute more to good digestion. They never dine without music and after dinner they never lack for tasty desserts. They light incense and sprinkle perfumes and spare no effort to cheer up the diners. For they tend to incline to the position that no kind of pleasure ought to be forbidden as long as no harm comes of it.

Music at meals

Harmless pleasure should not be spurned

This is the way they live in the city. But in the country, since they live far apart, they all eat in their own homes. No household has any shortage of food, since, after all, everything eaten by the city-dwellers comes from the farmers.

HOW THE UTOPIANS TRAVEL

If someone wants to visit friends who live in another city or is simply taken with a desire to see the place, he easily gets the permission of his syphogrant and tranibor unless a necessary job keeps him from going. He is sent out as part of a group, with a letter from the ruler which grants them permission and sets the day they must be back. They are provided with a carriage and a public slave to drive the oxen and take care of them. But unless there are women in the group, they leave the carriage behind as more of a hindrance than a help. Throughout the whole journey they carry nothing with them; yet they lack for nothing and are at home everywhere. If they stay anywhere longer than one day, each of them works at his trade and is treated very kindly by his fellow craftsmen.

If someone takes it upon himself to wander outside his territory, when he is caught without the ruler's passport, he is treated with contempt, brought back as a runaway, and severely punished. If he dares to repeat the offense, he is punished with slavery. But if someone is taken with a longing to wander through the fields belonging to his own city, he is not prohibited from doing so, as long as he gets his father's permission and his wife's consent. But wherever he goes in the countryside, he is not given any food until he has done the work allotted to the morning or however much work is usually done there before dinner.<sup>31</sup> Under this regulation he is allowed to go anywhere within the boundaries of his city's territory, for he will be no less useful to the city than if he were in it.

So you see that nowhere is there any chance to be idle; there is no excuse for laziness, no wine taverns, no alehouses, no brothels, no occasion to be corrupted, no hideouts, no hangouts. With the eyes of everyone upon them, they have no choice but to do their customary work or to enjoy pastimes which are not dishonorable. Such behavior on the part of the people is bound to produce an abundance of everything. And when it is distributed equitably to everyone, it follows that no one can be reduced to poverty or forced to beg.

*O holy commonwealth, worthy to be imitated
even by Christians*

Equality ensures that there is enough for everyone

In the senate at Amaurot (to which, as I said before, three representatives come every year from each city), once they have determined what surpluses are at hand in each place and what places have shortages, they immediately make up the deficiencies of the one with the excess supplies of the other, and they provide them as a free gift, receiving nothing in return from those to whom they gave them. But if they gave something to a city and received nothing in return, they also get what they need from some other city and pay nothing for it. Thus the whole island is like one household.

<sup>31</sup> Cf. 2 Thes 3:10.

A commonwealth is nothing else than a kind of big family

5 When they have enough provisions for themselves (which they do not think they do unless they have provided for two years, since the next year's outcome is uncertain), they export to other countries vast quantities of grain, honey, wool, linen, 10 timber, red and purple dye,

Utopian business activity

fleece, wax, tallow, leather, and also livestock. They give one-seventh of all this to the poor in that country and sell the rest at a moderate price. In exchange they not only acquire goods they do not have at home (they lack almost nothing except iron) but also they bring back to their homeland enormous quantities of silver and 20 gold. They have continued this practice for such a long time that they now have everywhere a greater supply of those metals than you would think possible. Hence they do not much care whether they are paid in cash or credit, and they accept promissory

See how they never forget their sense of community

25 notes for most of what is owed them, but never from private persons; instead they make the usual legal documents binding on the city government. When the loan comes due, the city requires it to be paid by 30 the private debtors and puts it in the public treasury; then the city enjoys the use of it until the Uto-

With this method money would be considered worthless

35 pians call it in. For the most part they never do, since they think it is hardly right to claim what is of no use to them from those who have a use for it. But if circumstances require that they lend part of it to another nation they call it in, or when they are obliged to go to war; that is the only reason they keep all of 40 the treasure which they have at home, as protection against extreme danger or sudden emergencies.
 They use it especially to pay enormous wages to for-

It is enough to avoid war through payment or craft rather than shedding a lot of human blood

45 eign mercenaries, whom they would much rather expose to danger than their own citizens. They are also aware that with large sums 50 of money even the enemies themselves can be bought and set against one another, either through treason or open hostilities.

This is the reason they reserve such an incalculable treasure, although they do not keep it as treasure but in a form I am really ashamed to tell you. I am afraid you will not believe what I say, and all the more rightly so since I am aware that if I had not seen

What a clever fellow!

55 it in person I would have been reluctant to believe it if someone else told it to me. For in general the more foreign something is to the habits of the listeners, the harder it must be for them to believe it.
 60 But actually, a prudent judge of the matter will perhaps be less surprised that they handle silver and gold in their own way rather than ours, since all their arrangements are so different from ours. In fact, since they themselves have no use for money 65 but rather keep it as protection against events which might or might not happen, in the meantime they keep gold and silver (from which money is made) in a form that lets no one place more value on it than it deserves by its nature. And obviously it deserves 70 far less than iron, without which mortals could no more live, by heaven, than they could without fire or water, whereas nature gave to gold and silver no use

Gold is inferior to iron, when it comes to usefulness

75 which we could not easily do without; the folly of mankind gives them value because they are rare, but nature, on the other hand, like a kind and gracious mother, made the most useful elements openly available, like air, water, and earth, but she hid away 80 what is vain and unprofitable in the most remote recesses.

Now if in their society these metals were put away in some tower, the ruler and the senate might be suspected of deceiving the people by some trick and getting some good from it for themselves — 85 such is the foolish anxiety of the mob. And then if they made platters out of them or other vessels made by goldsmiths, if ever the occasion arose to melt them down and use them to pay mercenaries, 90 they realize that once people had begun to delight in them they would be reluctant to give them up. To obviate these difficulties they have thought up a method quite compatible with the rest of their arrangements but very far removed from ours (for we 95 value gold very highly and hide it away quite carefully), a method which is therefore hard to believe unless you have experienced it. Whereas they eat and drink from vessels of earthenware and glass, beautifully crafted but inexpensive, they use gold 100 and silver, not only in the common halls but also in private houses, to make all the chamberpots and lowliest containers. Moreover,

What a magnificent contempt for gold!

5 the chains and heavy shackles used to restrain the slaves are made of the same metals. Finally, the most notorious criminals wear gold rings in their ears,

Gold the accoutrement for infamy

10 around their heads. By these means they see to it that the same metals which other nations give up with almost as much grief as if their guts were being pulled out have so little value that if circumstances required the Utopians to part with all such metals none of them would think they had lost as much as a single farthing.

Furthermore, they gather pearls on the seashore and even diamonds and rubies on some cliffs; they do not look for them, however, but when they have found some by chance, they polish them. They use them to deck out their infants, who are boastful and

Gems the delight of children

25 proud of such gems in their earliest childhood; but, as they get a little older and notice that such trinkets are worn only by children, they become ashamed of them of their own accord and, with no urging from their parents, they give them up just as our children discard their baubles, necklaces, and dolls when they grow up.

30 These arrangements, so different from those of other peoples, have produced quite different feelings and attitudes. That never became clearer to me

A very fine story

35 than in the incident of the Anemolian ambassadors.<sup>32</sup> They came to Amaurot while I was there and since they had come to discuss important matters, the three citizens chosen by every city had come before they arrived. All the ambassadors from neighboring countries, who had landed there before and were familiar with the customs of the Utopians, knew that they did not revere sumptuous clothing, considered silk contemptible, and even associated gold with disgrace; and so they used to come clothed as modestly as possible. But the Anemolians lived further away and had less contact with them. Hence, when they saw that all the Utopians wore one and the same rough garment, they thought they did so because they had nothing better to wear and, with more pride than wisdom, they decided to set themselves up as gods by the elegance of their trappings and to dazzle the eyes of the poor Utopians by the splendor of their garb. 50

And so when the three ambassadors made their entry, their retinue of a hundred retainers was dressed in particolored garments, mostly made of silk, but the ambassadors themselves, who were noblemen in their own country, were garbed in cloth of gold, with large chains and earrings of gold, and also golden rings on their fingers, and on top of that strings of pearls and gems hanging from their hats, and in sum, decked out in everything that the Utopians use to punish slaves, to mark off someone in disgrace, or to make toys for children. And so it was a sight to see how they ruffled their feathers when they compared their finery with the clothing of the Utopians (for the people had poured out onto the streets). On the other hand, it was no less delightful to observe how totally mistaken their hopes and expectations were and how far they were from the consideration they thought they would receive. For in the eyes of all the Utopians, except for the very few who had had some good reason to travel to foreign countries, all their splendid trappings seemed shameful. They greeted all the retainers of the lowest rank reverently as if they were lords. But they considered the ambassadors to be slaves because they wore golden chains, and so they passed over them with no respect whatever. In fact, you could have also seen children there who had thrown away

55 their gems and pearls. When they saw such gems affixed to the hats of the ambassadors, they nudged their mothers and said: “Look, mother, that big lout is still wearing little pearls and gems, as if he were a little boy!” But the mother would reply in all seriousness: “Hush, my son, I think he is one of the ambassadors’ fools.” Others criticized those golden chains as useless because they were so fine that a slave could easily break them and so loosely fastened that a slave could shake them off whenever he wanted and run off anywhere he wanted, footloose and fancy-free.

60

65

70

75

80

85

90

But after the ambassadors had lived there for a day or two and seen such an enormous amount of gold treated as if it were worthless and contemned

<sup>32</sup> “Anemolian” is from the Greek word for “windy.”

there as much as it was honored in their countries, and when they also noticed that the chains and shackles of only one runaway slave contained more gold and silver than the trappings of all three of them, they were crestfallen and sheepishly put away all the finery which they had so haughtily displayed, especially after they had talked more informally with the Utopians and learned their customs and opinions.

He calls it dubious because the gems are fake, or at least because their glitter is scanty and dim

Indeed they are amazed that any mortal can take delight in the dubious sparkle of a tiny gem or precious stone when he can look at a star or even at the sun, or how anyone could be so insane as to imagine that he is nobler because of fine-spun woolen thread, since that wool (however fine-spun) was once worn by a sheep, which was at the same time nothing more than a sheep.<sup>33</sup> They are likewise amazed that gold, which in itself is useless, is now prized so highly everywhere that mankind itself, which gave it value and for whose use it got that value, is valued much less than the gold itself, so much so that some beef-witted blockhead, who has morals to match his folly, nevertheless has many wise and good men in his service, for no better reason than that he has a heap of gold coins. And if some turn of Fortune or trick of the law (which turns things topsy-turvy no less than Fortune herself) should transfer this heap from the heir to the lowest lout in the whole household, the master would shortly enter the service of his servant as if he were a mere adjunct and appendage of the coins.

How true and well put!

self) should transfer this heap from the heir to the lowest lout in the whole household, the master would shortly enter the service of his servant as if he were a mere adjunct and appendage of the coins.

But what they find most amazing and despicable is the insanity of those who all but worship the rich, to whom they owe nothing and who can do them no harm; they do so for no other reason except that they are rich, knowing full well that they are so the insanity of those who all but worship the rich, to whom they owe nothing and who can do them no mean and tightfisted that they will certainly never give them one red cent during their whole lives.

How much wiser are the Utopians than the general run of Christians!

These opinions and others like them they have formed partly from their upbringing, since they were brought up in a commonwealth whose institutions are farthest removed from those kinds of folly, and partly from instruction and books. For though not many in each city are dispensed from physical labor and assigned to do nothing but study (namely those in whom they have perceived from their childhood remarkable talent, extraordinary intelligence, and devotion to learning), nevertheless all children are introduced to good books, and throughout their lives a good many people, both men and women, devote to learning the hours I have mentioned as free from labor.

Study and instruction of the Utopians

They learn the various branches of knowledge in their own language, which has no lack of vocabulary, is not unpleasant to the ear, and is not surpassed by any other in the expression of thought. It has spread throughout most of that part of the world, though everywhere else it is corrupted in various ways.

Of all the philosophers<sup>34</sup> whose names are so famous in this known part of the world, they had not so much as heard of any before our arrival, and yet in music, dialectic, arithmetic, and geometry,<sup>35</sup> they have made almost the same discoveries as our own ancient writers did. But though they measure up to our ancient writers in almost all respects, they are not up to the discoveries of modern dialecticians. In fact, they have not discovered a single one of those rules about restrictions, amplifications, and suppositions which have been so subtly excogitated in the Parva logicalia and which are taught to young men everywhere in our world.<sup>36</sup> And then, as for second intentions,<sup>37</sup> they

Music, dialectic, arithmetic

There seems to be some underlying satire in this passage

<sup>33</sup> Cf. Lucian, Demonax 41; see also CW 13: 8. <sup>34</sup> More uses “philosophy” in the older, broader sense of the investigation of all the arts and sciences, including mathematics and the natural sciences (which was often called “natural philosophy”). <sup>35</sup> They have mastered the quadrivium, the second tier of university studies (music, arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy); of the first tier, the trivium

(grammar, logic or dialectic, and rhetoric), dialectic is mentioned here. Grammar and rhetoric they would learn in their literary studies. <sup>36</sup> Peter of Spain’s thirteenth-century Little Logicbook, with its fine-spun categories and distinctions, was dissected and mocked by More in his Letter to Dorp, which he wrote in 1515, near the time he wrote the second book of Utopia. On complicated “rules about restrictions, amplifications, and suppositions,” see More’s text and Daniel Kinney’s introduction to Letter to Dorp in CW 15: liv–lvii, 29–39. <sup>37</sup> “First intention” refers to the intellect’s direct perception of an object; a “second intention” is the intellect’s perception of or reflection on a first intention. It has no objective existence outside the mind.

are so far from being able to understand them that none of the Utopians could see man in general,<sup>38</sup> as they say, even when we pointed him out with our finger, though, as you know, he is plainly colossal and bigger than any giant. But they are very expert in the orbits of stars and the movement of heavenly bodies. In fact, they have devised instruments of various designs which enable them to understand very accurately the movements and positions of the sun and moon and also the other stars which are visible in their hemisphere. But as for the conjunctions and oppositions of the planets and the whole fraud of divination by the stars, they have never so much as dreamed of it.<sup>39</sup> By means of signs that they have perceived from long observation they predict rainstorms, winds, and other changes in the weather. But concerning the causes of those phenomena, and concerning tides and the saltiness of the ocean, and in general concerning the origin and nature of the heavens and the world, they agree on some points with our own ancient philosophers, and on others, just as the ancients disagreed with one another, they also differ from all the ancients and propose new theories, and yet they do not entirely agree among themselves.

In that area of philosophy which deals with ethics, they discuss the same issues as we do. They inquire about the goods of the mind and body and external goods, and whether the designation “good” applies to all of these or only to the gifts of the mind.<sup>40</sup> They discuss virtue and pleasure, but the primary and principal controversy is about what they think human happiness consists in, whether one thing or many. On this point they seem over-inclined to the position which claims that all or the most important part of human happiness consists of pleasure.<sup>41</sup> And what is even more surprising, they claim support for this self-indulgent view even from religion, which is sober and strict and, indeed, almost gloomy and stern. For they never analyze happiness unless they combine some religious principles with the rational analysis of philosophy, since they think that without such principles reason by itself is too weak and deficient to investigate true happiness.

These principles are of this sort: that the soul is immortal, and by the beneficence of God is born for happiness; that our virtues and good deeds will be rewarded after this life, and our crimes have punishments prepared for them.<sup>42</sup> Though these are religious principles, the Utopians still think that reason leads them to believe and grant them; if they are eliminated, the Utopians have no hesitation in affirming that no one could be so stupid as not to feel that he ought to pursue his own pleasure by hook or crook. He would only be concerned not to sacrifice a greater pleasure for a lesser one and not to pursue one that would be requited by pain. For they think it would be truly insane to pursue virtue, which is harsh and difficult, and not only to banish the pleasures of life but even to seek out pain of your own accord, and to expect to get nothing out of it (for how can you get anything out of it if you get nothing after death, since you have spent your whole life

<sup>38</sup> That is, the universal concept of man that applies to each man in particular. From the fourteenth century through More's time, scholastic philosophers from the camps of the Realists and the Nominalists quarreled elaborately about whether and how universals had any real existence. <sup>39</sup> More wrote a number of Latin epigrams ridiculing judicial astrology (CW 3.2: 101, 118, 169, 182). <sup>40</sup> These three categories of goods (external goods and goods of the mind and of the body) derive primarily from the Aristotelian tradition. Generally

the Aristotelians applied “good” to all three categories; the Stoics, only to the goods of the mind. <sup>41</sup> That is, they are inclined to the Epicurean position that pleasure is the highest good. Beginning with Lorenzo Valla's The True and False Good (1444–49) and with the help of such thinkers as Ficino, Pico, and Erasmus, Epicurean philosophy had been rehabilitated and shown to consist not in mere hedonism but rather in the calm pleasures of the mind. But the Utopians differ sharply from the Epicureans, who did not believe in immortality and thought the gods were unconcerned about mankind. <sup>42</sup> The fifth Lateran Council (1513) affirmed as dogma the immortality of the soul. The philosopher most closely associated with the dispute concerning the immortality of the soul was Pietro Pomponazzi, whose treatise On the Immortality of the Soul (1516) argued that the doctrine could not be proved by reason but has to be derived from revealed religion.

5

10

15

20

25

30

35

40

45

50

55

60

65

70

75

Study of starsBut nowadays these practitioners rule the roost among ChristiansNatural science the most uncertain study of allEthicsOrder of goodsEnds of goodsThe Utopians measure happiness by honorable pleasureFirst principles of philosophy should be derived from religionThe theology of the UtopiansThe immortality of the soul about which not a few Christians nowadays have doubts

here without pleasure, that is, wretchedly?). But as it is, they think happiness consists not in every sort of pleasure but in pleasure that is good and honorable, for they believe that our nature is drawn to pleasure as the highest good by virtue itself, whereas the opposite faction attributes happiness to virtue alone.<sup>43</sup>

Just as not just any pleasure should be sought after, so too pain should not be pursued except for the sake of virtue

This is a teaching of the Stoics

And then they define virtue as living according to nature; to that end, they say, we were created by God. We follow the guidance of nature when we obey reason in choosing and avoiding things. Furthermore, reason above all inspires mortals to love and revere the majesty of God, to whom we owe our very existence and our capacity to be happy. Secondly, reason admonishes and encourages us to lead lives with as little anxiety and as much joy as possible and, beyond that, to exert ourselves in helping all others achieve the same end because of our natural fellowship. For not even the gloomiest and sternest advocate of virtue, who despises pleasure so much that he would impose toil, vigils, and mortifications on you, would refrain from enjoining you to do as much as you can to alleviate the poverty and distress of others, and he would think it praiseworthy and humane for one human being to rescue and comfort another, since the very essence of humanity (and no virtue is more proper to human beings) is to relieve the distress of others, eliminate sadness from their lives, and restore them to a joyful life, that is, to pleasure. Why should nature not impel us to do the same for ourselves? For either a joyful life, that is, a life of pleasure, is wrong and in that case we should not only not help anyone to achieve it but rather we should do all we can to make everyone avoid it as harmful and deadly, or if you are not only allowed but even required to obtain it for others, why not do so first of all for yourself? You should be no less well-disposed to yourself than to others. For when nature prompts you to be good to others, she does not require you to turn around and be cruel and merciless to yourself. Nature herself, they say, prescribes as the aim of all our actions a joyful life, that is, pleasure, and they define virtue as following the prescriptions of nature.<sup>44</sup> But when nature invites mortals to help each other to lead cheerful lives (and she is certainly right to do so, since no one is so far above the rank of human beings that nature should care for him alone, whereas in fact she is equally concerned about all those whom she groups together as belonging to the same species), she also, of course, forbids you time after time to seek your own advantages in ways that create disadvantages for others.

But nowadays some seek out pain, as if religion consisted in it, whereas pain is only to be borne if it occurs by natural necessity or to someone performing the duties of piety

Therefore they think that not only private agreements must be kept but also public laws which have either been promulgated by a good ruler or which a people not oppressed by a tyrant or deceived by some trick have laid down by common consent to govern the distribution of vital commodities, that is, the means to pleasure. As long as these laws are not broken, to look out for your own good is prudent; to promote the public good is pious. But to deprive someone else of pleasure to promote your own is wrong; on the other hand, to deprive yourself of something to give it to someone else is a work of humanity and kindness and it always brings you more good than it takes away. For it is counterbalanced by gifts given in return, and also your consciousness of having done a good deed and the thought of the love and good will of those you have benefited will give you mental pleasure that outweighs any loss of bodily comfort. Finally, as religion makes clear to true believers, God will repay the loss of brief and paltry pleasures with enormous and never-ending joy. Following this line of reasoning and having considered

<sup>43</sup> This is in keeping with the teachings of Epicurus; see Diogenes Laertius 10.130–32. The opposite faction is the Stoics.

<sup>44</sup> Seneca, whose Stoicism is often severe and uncompromising, agrees with the Utopians: “Our motto . . . is ‘Live according to Nature’; but it is quite contrary to nature to torture the body, to hate unlabored elegance, to be dirty on purpose, to eat food that is not only plain, but disgusting and forbidding” (Epistulae morales 5.4). Unlike some Stoics, Seneca is not entirely unsympathetic with Epicurus: “the teachings of Epicurus are upright and holy and, if you consider them closely, austere; for his famous doctrine of pleasure is reduced to small and narrow proportions, and the rule that we Stoics lay down for virtue, his same rule he lays down for pleasure—he bids that it obey Nature” (De vita beata 13.1). The Utopians combine elements of Stoicism and Epicureanism, and add to the blend belief in divine providence, the immortality of the soul, and rewards and punishments in the afterlife—doctrine not specifically Christian but not uniformly held until the advent of Christianity.

treasure is hidden away, you feel carefree and happy.
 If a thief took it away and
A remarkable hypothesis, and a very apt one
 you died ten years later without knowing of the theft, in all those years that you lived after the money was stolen, what difference did it make to you whether it was removed or remained safe? In either case its usefulness to you was the same.

To these categories of absurd enjoyment they add gambling (a sort of madness they know of only through hearsay, not experience) and also hunting and falconry. For what pleasure can there be, they say, in throwing dice on a gaming table? Even if there were any pleasure in it, you have done it so often that mere repetition should have made you sick of it.

Dicing

 How can it be delightful to hear the barking and howling of dogs?— isn't that a disgusting noise?
 Why do hunters feel more pleasure when a dog

Hunting

chases a hare than when a dog chases a dog?<sup>46</sup> For in either case the action is the same, that is, running, if that is what pleases you. Or if you are attracted by the hope of carnage and the expectation of seeing the slaughter with your own eyes, you ought instead to be moved to compassion when you see a little hare torn to pieces by a dog, a weak creature tormented by a stronger one, a timid creature fleeing from a ferocious beast, a harmless creature from a cruel hound. And so the Utopians have assigned the whole business of hunting to the butchers, whose trade (as I said before) is conducted entirely by

But nowadays this is the craft practiced by godlike courtiers

slaves, considering it beneath the dignity of free men. They consider it the lowest function of the trade.
 The other activities of butchers are more useful and honorable, since they contribute much more and destroy animals only out of necessity, whereas the hunter seeks nothing but pleasure from the slaughter and butchering of some poor little creature. Even in beasts themselves,<sup>47</sup> according to the Utopians, such an eagerness to view carnage springs from a cruel disposition, or else the continual indulgence in such brutal pleasure finally degenerates into cruelty.

Though the herd of mortals consider such pursuits as these and others like them (for there is no end to them) to be pleasures, the Utopians firmly hold that they have nothing to do with pleasure, since there is no natural sweetness in them. Though they ordinarily produce sensual joy (which seems to be the function of pleasure), the Utopians are unwilling to change their minds. The reason they seem pleasant is not the nature of the things themselves but the perverse habits of their devotees, whose vicious attitudes cause them to embrace what is bitter as sweet, just as the defective tastebuds of pregnant women make them think Pica in pregnant women that pitch and tallow are sweeter than honey. And yet no one's judgment, if it is vitiated by disease or habit, can change the nature of pleasure, or of anything else for that matter.

True pleasures they divide into various classes, assigning some to the mind,
Types of true pleasures others to the body. To the mind they attribute understanding and the sweetness which springs from the contemplation of the truth. To these they add the pleasure of looking back on a lifetime of good deeds and the sure hope of happiness to come.

They divide bodily pleasure into two kinds: one Bodily pleasures
 is the sweetness which pervades the senses, either when the supplies our natural heat has used up are replenished (as they are by food and drink) or else when the excessive elements overburdening our bodies are discharged. This happens when we purge our intestines of excrement, or go about generating children or when the itching in some part of the body is alleviated by rubbing or scratching. But sometimes pleasure results not from the replenishment sought by our bodily members nor from relieving them of excess but from some secret but remarkable power which tickles, excites, and attracts our senses to itself, such as the pleasure arising from music.

They claim that there is another kind of bodily pleasure which consists in the balanced and quiet condition of the body, that is, when a person's health is not disturbed by any disease. Such health, as long as it is not interrupted by any pain, is delightful in itself, even though it is not affected by any external pleasure. Though it is less obvious and affects the senses less grossly than the insistent desire for food

<sup>46</sup> See More's Latin epigram against the cruelty of hunters; CW 3.2: 37.

<sup>47</sup> More is probably thinking of hunting dogs.

and drink, nevertheless many Utopians hold it to be the greatest pleasure of all. Almost all of them believe that it is a great pleasure and the foundation and basis, as it were, of all the others, since it is the only one which keeps our lives peaceful and desirable; and, if you take it away, there is no room left for any pleasure at all. For the mere absence of pain without health they regard as insensibility, certainly not as pleasure.

It is fitting that the possessor be in good health

They have long since rejected the position of those who think that stable and undisturbed health should not be considered to be a pleasure because, they say, its presence can be felt only through some external stimulus (for they, too, have debated this question intensely). But now they are in almost complete agreement with the opposite position, that health is actually essential to pleasure. For according to them, disease brings pain, which is unalterably opposed to pleasure, in the same way as disease is opposed to health. Why not conclude, in turn, that there is pleasure in undisturbed health? On this point they do not think it makes any difference whether the disease is a pain or the pain comes from the disease; in either case the effect is the same. Thus, if health itself is a pleasure or if it necessarily brings pleasure with it as fire brings heat, the result in either case is that, wherever health is, stable pleasure cannot be lacking.

Moreover, when we eat, they say, what happens is that health, which has begun to fail, now has food as its ally in the battle against hunger. As it gradually becomes stronger, the very progress toward its ordinary vigor brings with it the pleasure of being reinvigorated. And so if health finds joy in the struggle, will it not rejoice when the victory is won? But when it has at last happily recovered its former strength, which was the sole object of the whole struggle, will it immediately become insensible and fail to recognize and embrace its own good? The idea that health is not perceived they consider to be very far from the truth. For when we are awake, who does not perceive that he is healthy—except someone who is not? Who can be so constricted by dullness and lethargy that he does not admit that health is delightful and enjoyable? And what is enjoyment but another name for pleasure?

Above all they embrace the pleasures of the mind, which they consider the first and foremost of all pleasures. They think that mental pleasure springs primarily from the practice of the virtues and the consciousness of a good life. Of the pleasures supplied by the body they give the first place to health. As for the pleasure of eating and drink and whatever else falls under a similar category of delight, they think they should be sought, but only for the sake of health, for such activities are not enjoyable in themselves but only insofar as they counter the unnoticed encroachments of ill health. And therefore a wise man, they say, should ward off disease rather than seek medicine for it and avoid pain rather than seek relief from it; just so it would be better not to have any need for such pleasure than to be relieved by it.

If anyone thinks that this kind of pleasure makes him happy, he must also confess that his life would be the happiest of all if it could be spent in perpetual hunger, thirst, and itching, followed by eating, drinking, scratching, and rubbing—and who can fail to see that such a life would be not only foul but also miserable? Certainly these are the lowliest of all pleasures, since they are the least unadulterated and never occur except in conjunction with the pain contrary to them. Thus the pleasure of eating is coupled with hunger, and not in equal proportions, for the pain is both longer and more intense. For it begins before the pleasure and never departs until the pleasure also ceases. Therefore they do not place much stock in such pleasures, except insofar as necessity demands them. But they also rejoice in them and gratefully acknowledge the kindness of Mother Nature, who uses the sweetest pleasures to entice her offspring to do what they must always be doing out of necessity. How irksome our lives would be if the daily ailments of hunger and thirst had to be warded off by drugs and bitter medications like the other diseases which afflict us less often?

They gladly cherish beauty, strength, agility as special and enjoyable gifts of nature. Certainly the pleasures which are mediated by our ears, eyes, and noses and which nature assigned as proper and peculiar to the human race (for no other kind of creature admires the design and beauty of the world, or is moved by the beauty of fragrances except to distinguish kinds of food, or recognizes the harmonious or discordant intervals in sounds), these pleasures, I say, they cultivate as adding a certain enjoyable spice to their lives. In all of them, however, they impose the limitation that a lesser should not impede a greater pleasure or that a pleasure should not cause pain at some later time — and they think this will necessarily happen if the pleasure is dishonorable.

5 They think it is certainly quite mad for someone to despise a beautiful figure, to deplete his strength, to turn agility into torpor, to wear out his body with fasting, to ruin his health, and to scorn the other favors bestowed by nature, unless he neglects
10 his own good so as to work more avidly for the good of others or the public welfare, and in return for his effort he expects greater pleasure from God. Otherwise to inflict pain on oneself without doing anyone
15 any good — simply to gain the empty shadow of virtue or to be able to bear with less distress adversities that may never come — this they consider to be insane and the mark of a mind that is both cruel to itself and ungrateful to nature, rejecting her benefits and not deigning to be beholden to her.

20 This is their view of virtue and pleasure; and in the absence of religious inspiration from heaven revealing something holier, they think human reason
This point should be noted with special care can discover no truer doctrine.<sup>48</sup> I do not have time now to examine whether 25 or not their teaching is correct, nor is it necessary, since I undertook to present their principles, not to defend them. But whatever validity their precepts 30 may have, I am fully persuaded that nowhere will you find a more extraordinary people or a happier commonwealth.

Physically they are agile and vigorous, stronger 35 than you would expect from their height, though they are not undersized. Though their soil is not uniformly fertile and their weather is not particularly favorable, they protect themselves from the climate by moderation in their diet and they work hard to 40 remedy the defects of the soil, so that nowhere in the world will you find a more abundant supply of crops and cattle or bodies more vigorous and subject to fewer diseases. You can see them there diligently employing the usual agricultural methods of 45 improving infertile soil by skill and effort, but you could also see a forest that they uprooted with their own hands and planted in another place. The reason for doing this was not greater production but transportation: they wanted the timber closer to the sea or rivers or the cities themselves, since it takes less 50 labor to move crops by land over long distances than it does to transport timber.

They are an easy-going people, cheerful and clever. They enjoy their leisure but they endure physical labor well enough as long as it is useful (but otherwise 55 they are hardly fond of it); in intellectual pursuits they are indefatigable. When we told them about the literature and learning Usefulness of the Greek language of the Greeks (for in Latin there is nothing except the 60 poets and historians that would be likely to interest them very much) it was amazing how eagerly they pressed us to help them
The extraordinary teachableness of the Utopians master Greek by giving 65 them instruction. And so we began to read, at first more out of a desire not to seem lazy than from any hope that much good would come of it. But when we had made a little progress, their diligence immediately made us anticipate that ours would not be 70 wasted. They began to imitate the shape of the letters so easily, to pronounce the words so readily, to memorize so quickly, and to recite so accurately that we would have thought it miraculous except that 75 the majority of them had undertaken this study not only on their own initiative but also at the explicit command of the senate, and hence they were selected from the most talented and mature scholars.

And so in less than three
But nowadays blockheads and dolts are chosen to be educated; the most talented minds are corrupted by pleasures years there was nothing in 80 that language which they had not mastered; they read good authors with no hesitation, unless they encountered some textual crux. I tend to think they mastered
85 Greek all the more easily because it is somewhat related to their own language. I suspect that the Utopian people originally sprang from the Greeks because their language, which is otherwise 90 closest to Persian, preserves some vestiges of Greek in the names of cities and magistrates.

On the fourth voyage, instead of trade goods I took on board a fair-sized packet of books because I was fully determined to return only after a <sup>48</sup> In The Confutation of Tyndale's Answer (1532–33). More argued on religious grounds that “besides the taming of the body, fasting and our pain taken therein pleaseth God done with devotion, and serveth us for obtaining many and great gifts of grace” (CW 8.1: 72/20).

long time, if ever. From me they got most of Plato's works, more of Aristotle's, and also Theophrastus's<sup>49</sup> On Plants, which was mutilated in several places, I'm sorry to say. During the voyage the book had not been put away properly and a playful monkey came upon it; he mischievously ripped out some pages here and there and tore them up. Of the grammarians they have only Lascaris, for I did not take Theodore with me nor any dictionary except Hesychius and Dioscorides.<sup>50</sup> They are very fond of Plutarch's books and they are also much taken with the wit and elegance of Lucian.<sup>51</sup> Of the poets they have Aristophanes, Homer, and Euripides, and also Sophocles in the small typeface of Aldus.<sup>52</sup> Of the historians they have Thucydides and Herodotus, as well as Herodian.<sup>53</sup>

Furthermore, as for medical books, my companion Tricius Apinatus<sup>54</sup> had brought with him some shorter works of Hippocrates and the Microtechné of Galen;<sup>55</sup> for these books they have a high regard. Even though there is hardly a country in the world that has less need of medicine, still it is nowhere more honored, precisely because they consider a knowledge of it as one of the finest and most useful branches of science. When they investigate the secrets of nature using the resources of science, they not only experience wonderful pleasure from doing so but they also think they win the highest approbation from the creator and maker of the world. For they suppose that he, like other workmen, set up the marvelous mechanism of this world for mankind to view and contemplate (and men are the only creatures he made capable of doing so) and that therefore he is fonder of a careful observer and meticulous admirer than he is of some lazy block-

Medicine the most useful craft

The contemplation of nature

head who ignores such a marvelous spectacle as if he were a mindless brute.

And so the natural talent of the Utopians, trained by study, is marvelously effective in inventing techniques which make some contribution to a comfortable life. Two of these they owe to us, printing and papermaking, but even these they owe not only to us but in large part to themselves. For when we had shown them some books printed by Aldus on paper and had spoken a bit about the material for making paper and the technique of printing letters, though we did not really explain it (since none of us was expert in either process), they immediately and most ingeniously figured it out. And whereas before they had written only on vellum, bark, and papyrus, they immediately tried to make paper and to print with type. Though at first they did not get it quite right, by frequent attempts they soon mastered both techniques, and they became so proficient that if they had copies of Greek texts, there could have been no lack of printed editions. But as it is, they have no more than what I have mentioned, but what they have they have disseminated in many thousands of printed copies.

Any sightseers who visit them are especially welcome if they are recommended by unusual intellectual gifts or knowledge of many lands gained by traveling widely (and for that reason they welcomed us warmly when we landed), for they are eager to learn what is happening everywhere in the world. But not very many come there to trade. For what can they bring except iron or gold and silver, which they would prefer to take home than to export? As for their own exports, they think it more advantageous to deliver them themselves than to have others pick them up, for in that way they learn more about foreign countries everywhere and they keep their seamanship and nautical skills from getting rusty.

<sup>49</sup> The pupil and successor of Aristotle
<sup>50</sup> Constantine Lascaris (d. 1501) and Theodore of Gaza (d. 1475) wrote grammars of Greek. The dictionary of Hesychius (fl. ca. AD 400) was first published in 1514; Dioscorides (fl. ca. AD 50) wrote a handbook of medical and botanical terms. <sup>51</sup> Plutarch (ca. AD 50–120) was a favorite Greek writer among Renaissance humanists, both for his Moralia and for his Parallel Lives of eminent Greeks and Romans. Several pieces by the satirist Lucian (b. ca. AD 120)

were translated by More and Erasmus and first published in 1506; they were reprinted ten times in the sixteenth century. <sup>52</sup> In the early sixteenth century the Venetian printer Aldus Manutius was famous for his compact, elegantly printed editions of classical authors in both Latin and Greek. In 1508 he printed the first enlarged edition of Erasmus's huge and elaborate collection of proverbs, Adagia, which brought Erasmus almost instant fame. <sup>53</sup> Thucydides and Herodotus are the leading historians of ancient Greece. Herodian (ca.

AD 170–240) wrote a Greek history of the Roman emperors who reigned from AD 180 to 238. <sup>54</sup> A name in keeping with that of Hythloday himself: triciae apinaeque became proverbial, meaning "stuff and nonsense" (Erasmus, Adages 143, CWE 31: 184). <sup>55</sup> Hippocrates (5th century BC) and Galen (2nd century AD) were the leading Greek writers on medicine. Microtechné was a medieval summary of Galen.

SLAVES

The remarkable fairness of this people

Prisoners of war they do not consider to be slaves except those captured in wars they themselves have fought. The children of slaves and the slaves of foreign countries whom they have obtained are not kept in slavery.<sup>56</sup> Their slaves are those who have committed a serious crime in Utopia or foreigners who have been condemned to death for committing some crime (and these are by far the larger number), for the Utopians acquire many of them, sometimes cheaply, more often gratis, and take them away. These kinds of slaves they not only keep constantly at work but also in chains. Utopian slaves, however, they treat more harshly since they consider them baser and deserving of more severe punishment because they had an extraordinary education and the best of moral training, yet still could not be restrained from wrongdoing. Another class of slaves is made up of poor, overworked drudges from other nations who choose of their own accord to be slaves among the Utopians. These they treat decently and, except that they make them work a bit harder (since they are used to it), they are treated not much less kindly than the citizens. If they wish to depart (and that does not happen very often), they are not kept against their will nor are they sent away empty-handed.

They care for the sick, as I said, with great concern, omitting nothing whatever in the way of medicine or diet that might restore them to health. They sit with those who are suffering from an incurable disease, talk with them, console them, and do what they can to alleviate their pain. But if someone suffers from a disease which is not only incurable but also constantly and excruciatingly painful, then the priests and the magistrates point out that he can no longer live a useful life, that he is a heavy burden to himself and to others, and that he has outlived his own death; they encourage him to make a decision not to maintain the sickness and disease any longer and urge him not to hesitate to die, but rather to rely on hope for a better life; since he lives in a prison where he is cruelly tormented on the rack, he should escape from this miserable life on his own or willingly allow others to rescue him from it. This would be a wise act, they say, since death would deprive him of no advantages but would save him from suffering; and since in doing so he would be following the advice of the priests, the interpreters of God's will, it would also be a pious and holy deed.<sup>57</sup>

The sick

Voluntary death

Those who agree with these arguments voluntarily starve themselves to death or are put to sleep and dispatched with no sensation of dying. But they do not do away with anyone who is unwilling, and they do not in any way diminish their attendance on him. Those who are persuaded and die in this way are treated with honor; but otherwise anyone who commits suicide for reasons not approved by the priests and senate is deemed unworthy of either burial or cremation and is ignominiously thrown into a swamp without a proper funeral.

A woman does not marry until she is eighteen, a man not until he is four years older than that.<sup>58</sup> If a man and a woman are convicted of engaging in secret intercourse before marriage, they are both severely reprimanded and they are forbidden ever to marry anyone unless the ruler remits the sentence. But both the master and the mistress of the household where the offense was committed fall into utter disgrace for not doing their duty with sufficient diligence. They punish this offense so severely because they foresee that few would join together in married love, living their whole lives with one person and enduring besides the troubles that come with marriage, if they were not carefully restrained from promiscuous intercourse.

Moreover, in choosing spouses they have a custom which seemed to us absolutely absurd and thoroughly ridiculous, but they observe it strictly and seriously. The bride, whether virgin or widow, is at Morton's court Hythloday himself had said that God has forbidden us to kill ourselves, but he also told More and Giles earlier that he did not intend to discuss whether or not Utopian moral principles are correct. More has a long psychological analysis of suicide in A Dialogue of Comfort (CW 12: 129–56). <sup>58</sup> According to canon law in More's time, girls could not marry before the age of twelve and boys not before fourteen. Plato (Republic 5.9.460e, Laws 4.721a–b) and Aristotle (Politics 7.14.6.1335a) set the age of marriage for women at least twenty and for men over thirty.

<sup>56</sup> The non-hereditary character of Utopian slavery distinguishes it from both ancient slavery and feudal serfdom. In More's time it was generally agreed that Christians should not be enslaved, but the same was not true of Africans and American Indians. <sup>57</sup> Such euthanasia, naturally, is contrary to Catholic teaching;

presented naked to the groom by a sober and respected matron, and the

This practice is somewhat immodest, but it is far from imprudent

5 groom in turn is shown naked to the bride by some honorable man.<sup>59</sup> When we
 10 laughed at this custom and criticized it as ridiculous, they in turn were amazed at the extraordinary folly of all other nations: when they are buying a colt—a matter of no great expense—they are so cautious that even if the animal is almost completely exposed they refuse to buy it unless the saddle and saddlecloth are removed so as to reveal any sores that might be hidden beneath them; yet in choosing a spouse—a matter which will make them
 15 either happy or miserable for the rest of their lives—they are so careless that they judge her whole person by a mere handsbreadth, that is, by her face only, since the rest of her is wrapped up in her clothes, and according to that judgment they join themselves to her, not without great danger of not getting along with her if they later find something offensive. For not everyone is so wise as to pay attention only to character, and even in the marriages of the wise the gifts of the body add something to the virtues of the mind. Certainly some 20 ugly deformity concealed beneath clothing can completely alienate a man's mind from his wife when his body can no longer be separated from her. If such a deformity should occur after the wedding, then everyone must put up with his lot; but before the wedding the laws should see to it that no one is duped or deceived.

All the more care needs to be taken because, of all the countries in that part of the world, they are the only one that is monogamous, and their marriages
 35 are almost never dissolved

Divorce

except by death, though adultery or unbearably offensive conduct can be grounds for divorce.<sup>60</sup> The offended party gets permission from the senate to remarry; the offender is disgraced and can never remarry. Otherwise, it is absolutely forbidden to put away a wife against her will and without any blame on her part because of some bodily disfigurement. They consider it cruel to desert someone at the very time she is in most need 45 of comfort and they think it would make her uncertain and insecure about her old age, which brings diseases with it and is itself a disease.<sup>61</sup>

But sometimes it happens that two people are temperamentally incompatible, and if they have 50 each found someone else with whom they hope they can live more agreeably, they separate by mutual consent and remarry, but not, however, without the permission of the senate, which does not permit divorce unless the senators and their wives
 55 have examined the case very carefully. Even then they do not do it readily because they know that the expectation of easily remarrying is hardly a means of strengthening the love of married couples.

Adulterers are punished with the harshest servitude, and if both were married the injured parties may divorce their spouses and marry each other if they wish to; otherwise they may marry whomever they like. But if one of the injured parties continues to love such an undeserving spouse, the marriage
 65 can remain intact, as long as the innocent party is willing to accompany the criminal condemned to hard labor; and it happens sometimes that the affectionate concern of the one and the repentance of the other move the ruler to mercy so that he sets 70 them free again. But if the crime is repeated, it is punished with death.

Their laws do not prescribe punishments for other crimes, but rather the senate determines penalties
 75 according to how heinous Magistrates determine the amount of punishment or venial each particular offense seems to be. Husbands chastise their wives and parents their children, unless an offense is so serious that open punishment is advisable in order to maintain public 80 morality. But generally the most serious crimes are punished with servitude, which they consider no less grievous to the criminal and much more advantageous to the commonwealth than to execute wrongdoers and immediately get rid of them altogether. They do more good by their labor than by their death, and they offer a long-standing example to deter others from similar crimes. If slaves are rebellious and unruly, then they are finally slaughtered like wild beasts that cannot be restrained by 90 bars or chains. But if they are patient, they are not left entirely without hope. If they are tamed by long

<sup>59</sup> Plato requires similar premarital inspections in Laws 6.771c–772a, 11.925a.

<sup>60</sup> In More's time the Church permitted separation in the case of adultery but did not allow remarriage. In his commentaries on 1 Cor 7:10–11 and 39, Erasmus favored relaxing the prohibition of remarriage. <sup>61</sup> See Erasmus, Adages 1537 (CWE 33: 309–10).

suffering and show that they regret the sin more than the punishment, their servitude may be either mitigated or revoked, sometimes by the ruler's prerogative, sometimes by popular vote.

5 The penalty for seduction Attempted seduction is no less dangerous than seduction itself. In fact, in all sorts of crimes, they equate the clear and deliberate attempt with the completed deed, for they do not think that the mere 10 incompleteness of the deed should benefit someone who did everything he could to complete it.

They are very fond of fools: they consider it quite shameful to treat them with contempt, and they have 15 Pleasure from fools nothing against finding enjoyment in their foolery,<sup>62</sup> since they think that will do the most good for the fools themselves. If anyone is so strict and gloomy that he never laughs at any word or deed, they do not entrust fools to him, out of fear that he 20 would not treat them kindly enough, since to him they would be not only useless but not even entertaining — and that is the only talent they have.

To mock someone for being disfigured or crippled is considered shameful and disfiguring, not to the person mocked but to the mocker, since it is stupid for him to blame someone for a defect which it is not in his power to avoid.

25 They consider it lazy and negligent not to keep up natural beauty by grooming, but they consider seeking help from cosmetics a disgraceful affectation. They know from experience itself that no physical beauty recommends wives to their husbands as much as respect and an upright character. Some 30 men may be snared by beauty alone, but none can be held except by virtue and compliance.

They not only deter from crime by punishments, but they also foster virtue by rewarding it with hon-
35 Counterfeit beauty ors. And so in the marketplace they set up statues of outstanding men who have done extraordinary service to the commonwealth, thus preserving the memory of their good deeds so

40 Inspiring citizens to duty even by rewards place they set up statues of outstanding men who have done extraordinary service to the commonwealth, thus preserving the memory of their good deeds so that posterity may have the glory of their ancestors as a spur and incentive to virtuous deeds. 45

Anyone who campaigns Campaigning forbidden for public office becomes disqualified for holding any office at all. The Utopians live together amiably, since no magistrate is arrogant or terrifying; they are called fathers and they Magistrate's honor live up to the name. Honor is willingly paid to them (as is proper); it is not exacted from those unwilling to give it. The ruler is not singled out by his clothes or The dignity of the ruler a crown but rather by the sheaf of grain he carries:<sup>63</sup> the sign of the high priest is a wax candle borne before him. 55

They have very few laws, Few laws for very few suffice for persons trained as they are. Indeed, one of their primary charges against other nations is that endless volumes of laws and interpretations are not sufficient. But they consider it quite unjust to bind people by laws which are so numerous no one can read through all of them or so obscure that no one can understand them. Moreover, they ban absolutely all lawyers as clever practitioners and sly interpreters of the law.<sup>64</sup> For they think 60 it is practical that everyone should handle his own case and present the facts to the judge as he would to a lawyer; in this way there will be less confusion and the truth will be easier to determine, since he tells his story without having learned any evasion from a lawyer, while the judge weighs all the details carefully and protects simple souls from the false accusations of crafty litigants. In other countries, such straightforwardness is difficult to obtain because there is a mass of incredibly intricate laws. But 65 among them everyone is knowledgeable about the laws. For, as I said, there are very few laws, and as for interpretations, they consider the most obvious the most correct. For though all laws (they say) are promulgated to inform everyone of his duty, a subtle interpretation will inform very few (for few can

<sup>62</sup> The Latin for “fool” here is morio, wordplay on More’s name; Erasmus had exploited the same pun in the prefatory letter of his Encomium Moriae (The Praise of Folly), which is dedicated to More. Thomas More kept a fool, Henry Patenson, in his household; Patenson appears in Holbein’s sketch of More’s family and is

mentioned by More in his Confutation of Tyndale’s Answer (CW 8.2: 900–901). <sup>63</sup> More says he dreamed of himself as a Utopian princeps, carrying just this symbol of authority; see More’s Letter to Erasmus of December 4, 1516 (p. 279). <sup>64</sup> An error in the 1516 edition is corrected differently in the editions of 1517 and 1518, in both cases probably by More himself. One correction could mean that only crafty lawyers are excluded; the other must mean that all lawyers are excluded because all lawyers are crafty. The latter interpretation seems preferable.

understand it); on the other hand, the simpler and more obvious meaning of the laws is clear to everyone. Otherwise, as far as ordinary people are concerned (and they constitute the largest group that 5 needs to be informed), it would make no difference if you formulated no laws at all or if, after you have formulated them, you interpret them in such a way that no one can understand them without great intelligence and long analysis. The dull judgment of 10 ordinary people is not adequate to that task, and they do not have enough time, occupied as they are in making a living.

Inspired by the virtues of the Utopians, those of their neighbors who are free and can choose as they 15 please (for the Utopians themselves have long since liberated many of them from tyranny) ask for and obtain Utopians to act as their magistrates, some for a year, some for five years; when they have served their term, they bring them back to Utopia with 20 great honor and praise, and take replacements with them back to their own country. And certainly these countries are providing very well and very effectively for the public welfare, which depends, for good or bad, on the character of the magistrates.
25 What persons could they choose more wisely than those whose honesty cannot be undermined by bribes (since they will soon return to a place where money is useless) and who cannot be swayed by some person or faction, since they have no connections among that people? Wherever these two vices, 30 favoritism and greed, get a hold on judicial decisions, all justice, which is the mainstay of the commonwealth, is immediately undermined. The peoples who recruit magistrates from them are called 35 allies by the Utopians; the others on whom they have bestowed benefits are called friends.

Treaties

They do not make treaties with any nation—such 40 treaties as other nations so often make, break, and remake. What good is a treaty, they say, as if nature did not sufficiently bind one human being to another? And if someone scorns nature, do you think he will be concerned with mere words? They are especially drawn to that view because in that part of 45 the world treaties and agreements between princes are not usually observed with very much good faith.

In Europe, of course, and especially in those parts which follow the faith and religion of Christ, the authority of treaties is everywhere holy and inviolable, partly because of the goodness and justice of 50 the princes themselves, partly out of reverence and respect for the popes, who themselves undertake nothing which they do not carry out most scrupulously and likewise command all princes to keep their promises to the letter; if any prince reneges,
55 the pope makes him comply by pastoral censure and sharp reproof.<sup>65</sup> Certainly they are right in thinking that it is quite shameful for those who are specifically called the faithful not to be faithful to their treaties.

But in that new world, which is as far from us in customs and way of life as it is removed from us by the distance the equator puts between us, no one has confidence in treaties: the more ceremoniously and solemnly the knot of a treaty is tied, the 65 more quickly it is untied; it is easy to find some defect in the wording, which they often intentionally devise with some clever loophole, so that the language can never bind them so tightly that they cannot somehow escape, breaking both the treaty and 70 their word. If such craftiness, or rather downright fraud and deceit, occurred in a private transaction it would be contemptuously decried as sacrilegious and deserving of the gallows—and that by the very same persons who are proud of having advised the
75 prince to do the same. Thus it happens that justice seems either to be nothing more than a plebeian and humble virtue, far beneath the exalted dignity of a king, or at least there seem to be two kinds of justice: one is fit for ordinary people, lowly and 80 creeping along the ground, fenced in on all sides, totally encumbered with chains and unable to escape; the other kind is a virtue proper to princes, which is more august than the ordinary virtue and hence much freer—85 forbidden, in fact, to do only what it does not wish to do.

Such behavior on the part of the princes there, who have so little respect for treaties, is the reason, I think, that the Utopians make no treaties; perhaps they would change their minds if they lived 90 here. But even if treaties were strictly observed, they still think the practice of making them at all is

<sup>65</sup> The rulers and popes of More's time were notorious for breaking treaties or making them with the deliberate intention of breaking them. This was especially true of the popes Alexander VI and Julius II. Machiavelli said Alexander VI "never did anything, never thought of anything other than to deceive men. . . . And never was there a man who had greater success in asserting, and with greater oaths in affirming a thing, who observed it less" (The Prince 18).

a bad custom because it implies that nations think they are natural-born enemies to each other (just as if there were no natural ties between two peoples separated only by a little distance, a hill or a creek) and that they would rightly try to destroy one another if they were not bound by treaties; and that even if they have entered into a treaty, they are not united in friendship but rather have permission to prey upon each other, insofar as nothing which the treaty forbids is couched with sufficient care because of some oversight in the language. On the other hand, the Utopians think that no one should be considered an enemy if he has done no harm, and that the natural bond which unites us should replace treaties, and that men are more adequately bound to one another by good will than by agreements, more strongly joined by their hearts than by their words.

MILITARY PRACTICES

They loathe war as positively bestial (though no sort of beast engages in it as constantly as mankind), and unlike almost all nations they consider nothing more inglorious than glory won in warfare.<sup>66</sup> Therefore, though they regularly devote themselves to military training on certain appointed days so that they will not be incapable of fighting when circumstances require it — and not only the men do so but also the women — they are reluctant to go to war and do so only to defend their own territory, or to drive an invading enemy from the territory of their friends, or else, out of compassion and humanity, they use their forces to liberate an oppressed people from tyranny and servitude. When they come to the aid of their friends, it is not always to defend them but sometimes also to requite and avenge injuries inflicted on them. But they do this only if they have been consulted before any steps are taken and if, after they have verified the facts, demanded restitution, and been refused, they themselves declare war.<sup>67</sup> They decide to do this not only when an enemy has invaded and plundered one of their friends, but also, and even more fiercely, when their friends' merchants in any part of the world have been unjustly accused under some pretext of justice, either by using unjust laws speciously or by interpreting good laws perversely.

This was the only reason for the war which the Utopians fought a little before our time on behalf of the Nephelogetes against the Alaopolitans:<sup>68</sup> some Nephelogete merchants among the Alaopolitans had been treated unjustly under some pretext of justice (or so the merchants thought). Certainly, whether the cause was just or unjust, it was avenged by a hideous war, in which the surrounding nations also added their energy and resources to the hostile forces of the major opponents so that some prosperous peoples were ravaged, others were badly shaken. One disaster followed upon another until finally the surrender and enslavement of the Alaopolitans put an end to the war. The Utopians, who sought nothing for themselves, subjected the vanquished to the Nephelogetes — a people hardly to be compared with the Alaopolitans in their heyday.

So fierce are the Utopians even when they are punishing only monetary injuries against their friends; but they are not so when the injury is against themselves. If they should be cheated out of their property, as long as they are subjected to no physical force, they set limits to their anger: they merely refrain from trade with that nation until restitution is made, not because they care less for their own citizens than for their allies but rather they are more offended by their friends' loss of money than by their own because their friends' merchants are severely injured by such a loss, since it comes from their own private possessions. But their own citizens lose nothing but public property, goods which were abundant at home, even superfluous, for otherwise they would not have been exported. So the loss is hardly perceived by anyone. Hence they feel that it would be cruel to punish an injury by killing many people when it causes no inconvenience to any of the Utopians in their lives or livelihood. But if any of their citizens is unjustly disabled or killed, wherever it may be, whether it be done by a public decision or by a private citizen, they send ambassadors to ascertain the facts, and if the malefactors are not handed over to them they cannot be put off but declare war immediately. If the guilty persons are

<sup>66</sup> A common false etymology derived “bellum” (war) from “belua” (beast) — or the other way around. For a full account of pacifism in More and his humanist contemporaries, see R. P. Adams, The Better Part of Valor: More, Erasmus, Colet, and Vives on Humanism, War, and Peace, 1496–1535 (Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1962). <sup>67</sup> One of the key texts giving the rules for fighting a “just” war was Cicero,

De officiis 1.11.34–1.13–40. <sup>68</sup> Greek compounds meaning “cloud-born” and “citizens of a country without people” handed over for punishment, they are sentenced to death or servitude.

They are not only grieved by a bloody victory but also ashamed of it, thinking
 5 Victory dearly bought that it is stupid to pay too much for merchandise, however valuable it may be. But if they conquer and crush an enemy by skill and cunning, they glory mightily in the victory, holding public parades to celebrate it and putting up a monument as if for a hard-won victory. For they boast
 10 that they have acted with courage and fortitude only when they have won the victory as no other creature but man is able to win it, that is, by the power of his wits. For bears, lions, boars, wolves,
 15 dogs, and other animals (they say) fight with the power of their bodies; and though most of them surpass us in strength and ferocity, we outdo them all in intelligence and reasoning.

Their one and only aim in warfare is to gain the objective which, if they had obtained it beforehand, would have kept them from going to war at all. Or, if circumstances make that impossible, they seek to punish those they consider culpable so severely that fear will keep them from daring to do such a thing 20 in the future. These are the goals they set for their undertaking, and they try to achieve them quickly, but yet in such a way that a concern for avoiding danger takes precedence over winning praise and glory.

And so, immediately after declaring war, they see to it that many notices certified by their official seal are put up secretly and simultaneously in the most conspicuous places in the enemy's territory, promising a huge reward to anyone who does away with 30 the enemy's prince; they also assign lesser, but still very substantial, sums for the deaths of those individuals they list in the same notices. These are the persons who, apart from the prince himself, were responsible for plotting against the Utopians. They 35 double the reward assigned to the assassin if he brings them any of the proscribed persons alive; in fact, they offer the same rewards to the proscribed persons themselves, and throw immunity into the bargain, if they turn against their comrades. Thus 40 their enemies quickly suspect all outsiders and even among themselves they are neither trusting nor trustworthy so that they live in a state of utter panic and no less peril. For it has very often turned out (as is well known) that a good number of them, and among them the prince himself, have often been betrayed by those they trusted the most. So easy is it 50 to get someone to commit any crime whatsoever by means of bribes, and for that reason the Utopians set no limits to their bribes. Keeping in mind the great risks they are urging people to take, they take 55 care to balance the magnitude of the danger with the lavishness of the reward; hence they promise not only enormous quantities of gold but also personal and perpetual title to rich estates in the safe and secure territory of their friends, and they faithfully keep their promises.

Other nations condemn this practice of bidding for and buying off an enemy as a barbarous, degenerate crime, but the Utopians think it does them
 60 great credit: it shows them to be wise, since in this way they win great wars without fighting at all, and also humane and compassionate, since by killing a few malefactors they spare the lives of many innocent persons who would have fallen in battle, both 65 their own soldiers and those of the enemy; for they pity the rank-and-file of the enemy's soldiers almost as much as their own citizens because they know they do not go to war of their own accord but are driven to it by the madness of princes.

If this procedure is not successful, they sow and cultivate the seeds of dissension by encouraging the brother of the prince or some nobleman to have 70 hopes of gaining the throne. If such internal factions languish, they stir up neighboring peoples and set them against their enemy by digging up some ancient claim such as is never lacking to kings.

When they have promised resources for war, they supply money lavishly, but their citizens very sparingly. They hold their own people so very dear and value each other so highly that they would not be 75 willing to exchange a single one of their own citizens for the enemy's prince. But they are not at all reluctant to pay out gold and silver, since they keep it only for this purpose and would live no less comfortably if they spent all of it. Then too, apart from 80 the wealth they have at home, they also have a limitless treasure abroad, since many nations, as I said before, owe them money. And so they hire mercenaries from everywhere and send them to war, especially 85 the Zapoletes.<sup>69</sup>

A people not unlike the Swiss

69 from a Greek compound meaning "busy sellers" — that is, sellers and resellers of their military services

These people live five hundred miles to the east of Utopia. Rough, rude, and fierce, they prefer to live in the forests and rugged mountains where they were brought up. They are a hardy people, able to endure heat, cold, and hard labor. They have no interest in agriculture, no acquaintance with refinements, no concern about their houses or clothes; they care only about their flocks. They live mostly from hunting and plundering. They are born only for warfare; they zealously seek opportunities to fight and when they find one they embrace it eagerly. They set out in great numbers and offer themselves cheaply to whoever needs soldiers. The only skill they have to live on is one that aims at death.

They fight fiercely and with complete loyalty for whoever pays them. But they bind themselves for no fixed period. They sign on with the stipulation that if an enemy offers them higher wages tomorrow they will take his side, and if they are lured with slightly higher pay they will return to the side they abandoned. There are very few wars in which a great many of them are not fighting in both armies. And so it happens every day that blood relatives who were hired by the same side and lived together amicably are separated a little later in opposing armies and fight each other as enemies. Forgetting both kinship and friendship, they run each other through with violent hostility, trying to kill each other for no other reason than that they were hired for a pittance by opposing princes. They reckon their wages so strictly that adding one penny to their daily pay can easily cause them to change sides. They have quickly become greedy through and through, and yet it does them no good for what they gain with their blood they immediately squander on debauchery, and wretched debauchery at that.

These people fight for the Utopians against any mortals whatsoever because they hire their services for more than they can get anywhere else. And just as the Utopians seek good men in order to use them, so too they also enlist these wicked men in order to use them up. When they need to use them, they urge them on with great promises and expose them to the greatest dangers so that most of them do not return to claim what they were promised. To the survivors they faithfully keep their promises so as to make them eager to undertake similar exploits. Nor do they have any qualms about doing away with so many of them, since they believe the human race would owe them a great debt of gratitude

if they could purge the whole world of such loathsome and wicked scum.

Apart from the Zapoletes, they use the forces of those for whom they have taken up arms, and after that the auxiliary troops of other friendly nations. As a last resort they add their own citizens, from whom they choose a man of proven valour to command the whole army. Under him they appoint two men who remain private citizens as long as he is safe, but if he is captured or killed, one of the two succeeds him, and in case of a mishap he himself is succeeded by the third, so that if the commander is in danger (and the fortunes of war are quite various) the whole army does not panic.

In each city they choose troops from a list of volunteers. No one is sent out to foreign wars against his will, for they are convinced that if someone is by nature fearful he will not only not fight vigorously himself but he will also inspire fear in his comrades. But if their country is invaded during a war, cowards of this sort, as long as they are physically fit, are dispersed among better troops in the ships or they are spread out here and there on the walls so that they have no place to run away to. Thus shame in the presence of their friends, the confrontation with the enemy, and the absence of any hope of escaping overcome fear, and often they make a virtue out of extreme necessity.

Though no one is sent to a foreign war unwillingly, if women are willing to accompany their husbands to battle the Utopians are so far from preventing them that they exhort them to do so and encourage them with praise. Each accompanies her husband to the front and is stationed shoulder to shoulder with him in the battle line. Moreover, each soldier is surrounded by his children and relatives by blood or marriage so that they all have help close by from the persons who are by nature most highly motivated to help one another. It is a great disgrace for one spouse to return without the other or for a son to come back after the loss of a parent. The result is that once it comes to hand-to-hand combat, if the enemy stands his ground, the battle is so long and grim that it ends in a general slaughter.

Certainly they take every precaution to avoid having to fight themselves, as long as they can wage war using mercenaries to take their place. But when they can no longer avoid entering the fray, the courage with which they fight matches the prudence with which they avoided fighting as long as they could. They do not give their all in a first furious attack but rather they grow stronger gradually and over a period of time, and they are so resolute that they would rather die than retreat. For one thing, 5 they are certain that everyone at home is provided for, and they do not need to worry about their children (such concern generally breaks the spirits of lofty souls); so their courage is proud and contemptuous of defeat. Moreover, their skill in the arts of war gives them confidence. Finally, sound ideas, 10 instilled in them from childhood on, both by instruction and through the institutions of the commonwealth, give them courage: they hold life neither so cheap as to throw it away recklessly nor so perversely dear as to cling to it greedily and shamefully 15 when honor requires them to give it up.

When the battle is at its fiercest everywhere, a picked group of sworn and dedicated young men seek 20 Above all the commander should be assailed so as to end the war sooner out the enemy commander. Sometimes they attack him openly; sometimes they try to ambush him. They assail him from close by and from a distance and they attack him in a wide, unbroken phalanx, 25 continuously replacing the exhausted men with fresh troops. And unless he saves himself by running away, it rarely happens that he is not killed or captured alive by his enemies.

If they win a victory, they do not slaughter the defeated; they would rather capture than kill those they 30 have put to flight. And they never pursue retreating troops without keeping in reserve at least one battalion drawn up under its colors. They do this so regularly that if the rest of their own forces have been defeated and they win the victory with their last 35 battalion, they would rather let the whole enemy army escape than get into the habit of pursuing the fugitives with their own forces in disarray. They remember something that happened to them more than 40 once: when the main body of the whole Utopian army had been overwhelmed and put to flight, while the enemy was exulting in the victory and pursuing them as they ran away in all directions, a few of their own troops held in reserve and on the lookout for 45 opportunities suddenly attacked the enemy troops, who were scattered and straggling and careless from overconfidence, and thus changed the whole outcome of the battle; snatching certain and undoubted victory from their enemies' hands, the conquered 50 turned the tables and conquered the conquerors.

It is not easy to say whether they are more clever in laying ambushes or more cautious in avoiding them. You would think they are preparing to flee when that is the last thing they intend; on the other 55 hand, when they do intend to flee, you would imagine that is the last thing they have in mind. For if they feel they are at a disadvantage either in numbers or location, then they either move their camp silently at night, or escape by some stratagem, or 60 withdraw gradually by day, keeping their ranks in such good order that they are no less dangerous in retreat than when they attack. They fortify their camp very carefully with a wide and very deep moat; the earth they dig up is piled up on the inside. In such work they do not use the services of 65 common laborers. It is done by the hands of the soldiers themselves, and the whole army joins in the work except for the armed soldiers outside the rampart who keep watch against sudden attacks. With 70 so many soldiers pitching in, they build massive fortifications around a large area with incredible speed.

They wear armor which is strong enough to ward off blows but does not hinder movement and gestures — so much so that 75 Types of arms they feel no inconvenience even in swimming. For swimming in armor is one of the ordinary rudiments of their military training. At long range their weapon is the arrow which they shoot with great force and accuracy, not only on 80 foot but also from horseback. At close quarters they strike not with swords but with battle-axes, which are deadly because of their sharp blade and their weight, whether used to hack or thrust. They are very skilled in devising siege engines. Once they are made, they conceal them very carefully, lest they 85 become known before it is time to use them and turn out to be more ridiculous than useful. In designing them their primary concern is to make them easy to move and aim.

When they make a truce with their enemies, they 90 keep it so religiously that Truces they do not violate it even under provocation. They do not lay enemy territory waste or burn their crops; they even do what they can to keep the grain from being trampled by men 95 and horses, for they think it may be of some use to them. They injure no unarmed civilians except for spies. They offer amnesty to cities that surrender and even those taken by siege they do not sack; instead they execute those who prevented the surrender; 100 they enslave the rest of the defenders, but the civilian populace they leave unharmed. If they find persons who urged the town to surrender, they grant them a share in the property of the condemned; they divide up the rest and give it to their auxiliaries, for none of the Utopians takes any of the booty.

When the war is over, they assess the costs not

But today the victors pay the greatest share against the friends for whom they incurred them but against the losers; they demand part of it in money, which they reserve for similar use in warfare, and part in estates within enemy territory, from which they forever enjoy a not inconsiderable income. They now have revenues of this sort in many nations; it accumulated gradually in various ways and now amounts to 700,000 ducats a year.<sup>70</sup> To take care of it they send out collectors of revenue, who live there in grand style and play the part of great lords. But there is plenty left over to put into the treasury,<sup>71</sup> unless they choose to give credit to the nation that owes it, which they often do until they need it, and even then it rarely happens that they demand all of it. They also bestow some of these estates on those whom they have persuaded to place themselves in great danger, as I mentioned before.

If some prince takes up arms against them and is preparing to invade their domain, they immediately confront him with a huge force outside their own boundaries, for they are reluctant to wage war within their own territory and no exigency could ever induce them to allow foreign auxiliaries on their island.

THE RELIGIONS OF THE UTOPIANS

There are various religions not only throughout the island but also within individual cities: some worship the sun as god, others the moon, others a different planet. Others worship some ancient paragon of either virtue or glory, venerating such a person not only as a god but as the supreme god. But the vast majority, and those by far the wiser ones, accept none of those gods and believe there is a certain single deity, unknown, eternal, infinite, inexplicable, diffused throughout this whole universe not physically but by his power, in a manner that is beyond human comprehension; him they call their parent. To him alone they attribute the origin, increase, progress, changes, and goals of all things; him and no other they honor as divine.

Actually, though all the others hold different beliefs on some points, they agree with the monotheists in thinking that there is some one supreme being who made and rules the universe, and in their native language they all agree in calling him Mythras,<sup>72</sup> but they differ in that they identify the supreme power variously, each asserting that whatever he considers to be supreme is in fact that single nature to whose divine majesty, by the consensus of all nations, the whole creation is attributed. But gradually they are all abandoning these superstitious variations and joining together in that one religion which seems more reasonable than the others. And there is no doubt that the other beliefs would have vanished long ago if it were not that, whenever something untoward happened to someone who was considering changing his religion, fear made him think that it was not accidental but was sent from heaven, as if the divinity whose cult he was forsaking were avenging a wicked affront to himself.

But after they had heard from us the name, the teaching, the behavior, and the miracles of Christ, and the no less miraculous constancy of so many martyrs who freely shed their blood and thus brought many peoples, from far and wide, over to their religion, you would not believe how eagerly they also were converted, whether through the secret inspiration of God or because Christianity seemed closest to the sect which is predominant among them, although I think it was a matter of no small moment with them to hear that Christ approved of life in common for his disciples and that it is still practiced among the most genuine Christian communities.<sup>73</sup> But certainly, whatever the reason, no small number of them were converted to our religion and were washed clean in the sacred waters of baptism.

But because there was, I am sorry to say, no priest among the four of us (for only that number

<sup>70</sup> A ducat was a gold coin minted primarily by Venice and worth about a quarter of a pound sterling at that time. The 700,000 ducats mentioned here would be worth many hundred times that much

today. <sup>71</sup> The Utopians would not have an ordinary treasury; perhaps deposits owed the Utopians and placed in the treasuries of other countries are what is meant here.

<sup>72</sup> Among the ancient Persians, Mithras

was the supreme deity, identified with light. <sup>73</sup> Communism was practiced by religious orders in More's time, as it still is; on communism among the early Christians, see Acts 2:44–45 and 4:32–37.

remained after two of us had given up the ghost), they received the other sacraments but still lacked those which among us are conferred only by priests.<sup>74</sup> But they know about them and long for them most intensely. In fact, they also earnestly discuss among themselves whether someone chosen from among their number could receive the sacerdotal character<sup>75</sup> without the dispatch of a Christian bishop. And in fact it seemed they were about to choose someone, but when I left they had not yet done so.

Even those who do not agree with the Christian religion still do not frighten anyone away from it; they do not oppose anyone who has embraced it, except that one of our community was repressed while I was there. Shortly after he was baptized, over our objections, he harangued publicly about Christianity with more zeal than prudence, and he began to get so carried away that he not only ranked our religion above all the rest but condemned all the others outright. He cried out against them as profane; he denounced their worshipers as wicked, sacrilegious, and worthy to be punished in eternal fire. When he had preached like this for a long time, they arrested him and tried him, not for despising their religion but for exciting riots among the people. They convicted him and sentenced him to exile, for it is one of their oldest policies that no one should come to any harm because of his religion.

For Utopus had learned that before his arrival the inhabitants squabbled incessantly about religion and he had noticed that the sects, which generally disagreed with each other and fought for their country in separate groups, provided the opportunity for him to conquer all of them. Hence, from the very beginning, after he had obtained the victory, he decreed first of all that everyone could practice the religion of his choice and could also strive to convert others to it, but only so long as he advocated it calmly and moderately with rational arguments. And if he could not win others over by persuasion, he was not to assail their religions bitterly nor use force against them, and he was to refrain from insults. Anyone who quarrels insolently about religion is punished with exile or enslavement.<sup>76</sup>

Utopus laid down these rules not only for the sake of peace, which he saw was completely undermined by constant strife and implacable hatred, but also because he thought such a decree would benefit religion itself. In religious matters he did not venture to dogmatize rashly because he was uncertain whether or not God wishes to have varied and manifold kinds of worship and hence inspires different people with different views. Certainly he thought that to use force and threats to make everyone accept what you believe to be true is both arrogant and absurd. Then too, if one religion should be actually true and the rest false, still he easily foresaw that in the long run the truth would sooner or later emerge and prevail by its own force as long as the matter was handled reasonably and moderately. But if the struggle is conducted with arms and uprisings, since the worst people are always the most headstrong, the best and holiest religion, embroiled among empty superstitions, will be choked like grain among thorns and briars. And so he left the whole matter open and left everyone free to believe whatever he wanted, except that he solemnly and strictly forbade that anyone should sink so far below the dignity of human nature as to think that the soul dies with the body or that the world is ruled by mere chance and not by providence.

And for this reason they believe that after this life punishments are ordained for vices and rewards for virtues. Anyone who thinks otherwise they do not even include in the category of human beings since he has degraded the lofty nature of his soul to the base level of a beast's wretched body. Still less will they count him as one of their citizens, since he would set no store whatever by all their laws and morality if it were not for fear. For who can doubt that someone who has nothing to fear but the law and no hope of anything beyond bodily existence would strive to evade the public laws of his country

<sup>74</sup> Of the seven sacraments, only baptism and matrimony can be administered by laymen. <sup>75</sup> In sacramental theology "character" is a technical term meaning the indelible quality bestowed on a soul by sacraments that cannot be repeated: baptism, confirmation, and holy orders.

<sup>76</sup> In Christian England, More approved of punishing religious dissent or heresy, but that was because the true religion had been revealed there, as it had not in Utopia; as More said in A Dialogue Concerning Heresies (CW 6: 345–46), "if it were now doubtful and ambiguous whether the church of Christ were in the right rule of doctrine or not, then were it very necessary to give them all good audience that could and would anything dispute on either party for it or against it, to the end that if we were now in a wrong way, we might leave it and walk in some better."

by secret chicanery or to break them by force in order to satisfy his own personal greed? For that reason they bestow no honors on such a person, they assign him to no office, they put him in charge of no public responsibility. He is universally looked down on as a lazy and spineless character. But he is not subjected to any punishment because they are convinced that it is not within a person's power to believe whatever he wishes; they neither compel him by any threats to mask his opinion nor accept any pretexts or lies, which they utterly despise as next door to deliberate malice. Still they do forbid him to argue for his opinion, but only among the common people. Otherwise, in private, among priests and prudent men, they not only permit him to argue but also encourage it, confident that in the end his madness will yield to reason.

There are also others, and they are by no means few (since their position is not forbidden as completely unreasonable or wicked) who go to the opposite extreme and believe that the souls of brute beasts are also immortal, although not comparable to ours in dignity nor destined for the same happiness.

A remarkable opinion about the souls of animals

Almost all of them are certain and fully persuaded that human happiness will be so boundless that they mourn for everyone who is sick but not for anyone who dies, unless they see that he is torn from life anxiously and unwillingly. For they take this to be a very bad sign, as if such a soul, despairing and conscious of guilt, fears to leave life because of some secret presentiment of future punishment. Moreover, they think God will hardly be well pleased when someone who is summoned does not come running eagerly but is dragged off reluctant and unwilling. Therefore when they see such a death they are dismayed and they carry out the dead persons with grief and in silence; after praying that God in his mercy will kindly forgive the infirmities of such souls, they cover the body with earth. On the other hand, when someone dies joyfully and full of good hope, they do not mourn him, but rather they conduct his funeral with song; commending his soul to God with great affection, they finally cremate his body with reverence, not grief, and erect on that spot a column inscribed with the virtues of the dead person. After they have returned home, they tell of his character and deeds, and no part of his life is rehearsed more often or more eagerly than his cheerful death.

They think this commemoration of his uprightness is a very strong inducement to virtue for the living and the most acceptable form of veneration to the dead, whom they also believe to be present when they are talked about, though invisible to us because the eyesight of mortals is too dull to see them. For it would not be suitable to the condition of the blessed to lack the liberty of going wherever they want, and it would be ungrateful of them to have no desire whatever to visit their friends, to whom they were united in mutual love and charity while they were alive; such charity they suppose, like other good qualities, is increased, not diminished, in good men after their death.<sup>77</sup> Thus they believe that the dead are present among the living, observing what they say and do, and for that reason they go about their business more confidently because of their trust in such protectors; their belief in the presence of their ancestors also deters them from secret wrongdoing.

They have nothing to do with fortune-telling and other vain, superstitious divinations, which other people take quite seriously but which they consider ridiculous. But miracles which happen apart from any natural cause they revere as works and witnesses which manifest the presence of a deity. They say such miracles often happen there, and sometimes, during great crises, they pray publicly for a miracle with great confidence and they do obtain it.

They think the worship which pleases God is the contemplation of nature and the praise which springs from it. But there are others, and they are by no means few, who neglect learning in the name of religion, who do not strive to attain any knowledge, and who allow themselves no leisure at all. They are determined to earn happiness after death solely by keeping busy in the service of others. And so some tend the sick, others repair the roads, clear out and charity to men that need their help, when they be now in heaven, than they had when they were here in earth. . . . When saints were in this world at liberty and might walk the world about, ween we that in heaven they stand tied to a post?"

<sup>77</sup> In A Dialogue Concerning Heresies (CW 6: 211, 213), More wrote concerning saints: "For if their holy souls live, there will no wise man ween them worse and of less love

ditches, rebuild bridges, dig turf, sand, or stones, fell and cut up trees, cart lumber, crops, and other provisions into the cities. They perform their services not only for the public but also for private citizens, and they work even harder than slaves. They willingly and cheerfully undertake any tasks which are rough, difficult, dirty, and shunned by most people because of the toil, disgust, and hopelessness they entail. They see to it that others have leisure, while they themselves are continually engaged in labor and toil, but nevertheless they take no credit for it. They neither censure the lives of others nor extol their own. The more they conduct themselves like slaves the more everyone honors them.

They are divided into two sects. The one is celibate and not only abstains from any sexual activity but also eats no meat (and some of them no animal products at all), totally rejecting the pleasures of this life as harmful, longing only for those of the world to come, which they strive to obtain by toil and vigils. Meanwhile, confident that they will soon obtain them, they are cheerful and energetic. The other group, no less devoted to labor, prefers to marry: they do not spurn the consolations of marriage, and they think that just as they owe such activity to nature, they owe children to their country. They do not refuse any pleasure which does not interfere with their work. They like to eat the flesh of animals precisely because they think such food gives them the strength to do all kinds of work. The Utopians consider this group more prudent; the other they regard as holier. If they claimed on rational grounds to prefer celibacy to marriage and a hard life to a comfortable one, the Utopians would laugh at them; but since they profess to be motivated by religion, the Utopians respect and revere them. On no other subject are they more cautious about making any rash pronouncements than on matters concerning religion. In their language these persons are given the special title “Buthrescae,” which could be translated into Latin as religiosi.<sup>78</sup>

Their priests are extremely holy and therefore very few. For each city has no more than thirteen, one for each church, except during wartime, when seven of them set out with the army and are replaced by substitutes for the time being. But when the priests return, each assumes his former position. Until the time when the substitutes, in an orderly succession, replace priests who have died, they become attendants of the high priest (for one priest has authority over the others). They are elected by the people in the same way as other magistrates, that is, by secret ballot, in order to avoid partisan strife. Once elected, they are consecrated by their own college of priests.

They preside over divine worship, attend to religious matters, and act as guardians of morality. To be summoned by them and rebuked for dishonorable conduct is considered to be a great disgrace. But their role is to exhort and admonish; to repress and punish wrongdoers is the function of the ruler and other magistrates. The priests, however, do excommunicate those they find to be thoroughly vicious. There is almost no other punishment which they fear more, for such persons are both dejected by their infamy and tormented by a bad conscience. They may not even be physically safe for very long. For unless they quickly convince the priests that they are repentant, they will be seized by the senate and punished for their impiety.

Children and young people are educated by the priests, and they devote no more attention to learning than to character and virtue.<sup>79</sup> They take the greatest pains from the very first to instill in the tender and impressionable minds of children sound opinions conducive to preserving the common good. When such ideas are thoroughly absorbed in childhood, they persist throughout all of manhood and they are extremely useful in protecting the status of the commonwealth, which decays only because of vices which spring from perverse attitudes.

The wives of the priests are the very finest women in the country, unless the priests themselves are women, for that sex is not excluded; but they are rarely elected and must be widows of advanced years.<sup>80</sup>

No magistrates are held in greater honor among the Utopians, so much so that even if they commit a crime they are not subject to a public tribunal but are left to God and their own consciences. For they

<sup>78</sup> “Buthrescae” is a Greek word meaning “extraordinarily religious.” In More’s Europe, the adjective “religious” was applied to members of religious orders, who differed, however, from the Buthrescae

in that they combined labor with prayer, study, and contemplation. <sup>79</sup> Hythlodai must mean that the priests supervise the education of children, for in each city there are many thousands of children and only thirteen priests. <sup>80</sup> In The Confutation of Tyndale’s Answer (CW 8.1: 260–61), More accepts the traditional view that women may not be ordained as priests.

do not think it is right to lay human hands on anyone, however vicious, who has been dedicated to God in such a special way as a holy offering, so to speak. It is easier for them to observe this custom because priests are so few and are chosen so carefully. For it is very unlikely that someone who is the cream of the crop and is elevated to a position of such dignity only because of his virtue should degenerate into corruption and vice. And even if that very thing should happen—for human nature is changeable—nevertheless there would certainly be no reason to fear that the public would be in any great danger, because the priests are so few and have no power beyond what derives from the honor paid them. In fact the very reason they have so few and scattered priests

Excommunication

But what a flock of them we have!

is to keep the dignity of the order, now held in such high esteem, from being cheapened by bestowing the honor on many, especially since they think it is hard to find very many who are equal to the dignity of the office, for which merely mediocre virtues are insufficient.

Their reputation at home is no greater than the esteem in which they are held by foreign nations. This becomes quite clear, I think, if we note the reason for it. When troops are engaged in battle, the priests kneel at a distance but not very far away, dressed in their sacred vestments; lifting up their hands to heaven, they pray first of all for peace, and then for victory for their own forces, but without bloodshed on either side. When their soldiers win they rush into the battle line and restrain the fury of their forces against the routed troops. Merely to see them and make oneself known to them by calling out is enough to save anyone's life; to touch their flowing garments also protects the remaining goods of fortune from any damage due to the war. Hence they are venerated by the countries all around them, who attribute to them such genuine majesty that oftentimes they provide as much protection for their own citizens as they do for their enemies. For sometimes it has happened that, when their battle line was thrown back in despair and had turned to flee, as the enemy was rushing in to kill and plunder, the intervention of the priests has stopped the slaughter and separated the two armies so that a peace was devised and established on equitable terms. For nowhere is there a nation so savage, cruel, and barbarous that they do not hold their persons to be sacrosanct and inviolable.

O these priests are far bolier than ours!

The first and last days of each month and likewise of each year are celebrated as feastdays; the months are marked off by the orbit of the moon, just as the year is established by the course of the sun. In their language they call all of the first days “cynemerni,” the last days “trapemerni,”<sup>81</sup> names that are equivalent to “first-feastday” and “last-feastday.” Their churches are remarkable not only for their workmanship but also for their capacity to hold immense crowds—which is necessary because there are so few of them.<sup>82</sup> They are all dimly lit, and they say this resulted not from lack of skill but from the deliberate policy of the priests, who believe that too much light distracts our thoughts, whereas dim and doubtful lighting concentrates the mind and intensifies religious devotion.

Observance of holy days among the Utopians

What their churches are like

Since religion is not the same for everyone there, yet all the forms of it, however varied and different, converge from various directions on one goal, the worship of the divine nature, nothing is seen or heard in the churches which is not held in common by all the religions. If any denomination has a rite peculiar to it, they provide for it in their own homes. Public worship is conducted according to a ritual which does not at all detract from any of the private devotions. Therefore no images of the gods are seen in churches so that everyone can be free to imagine the form of God as he wishes according to his own religion. They invoke God by no other name than Mythras, a name they all apply to the one divine nature, whatever it may be. No prayers are devised which everyone cannot say without offending his own denomination.

And so on the last-feastdays they gather in church in the evening, still fasting and ready to give thanks to God for the success they enjoyed during the year

<sup>81</sup> The first Greek compound means “dog days” (or perhaps “starting days”); the second means “turning days.” <sup>82</sup> There may be more than one service on every feast day, but even so the churches would have to be very large indeed: only thirteen of them serve about one hundred thousand inhabitants of each city.

or month just coming to an end. On the next day, which is the first-feastday, they flock to church in the morning to pray for success and happiness in the following year or month which begins on that feastday. But on the last-feastdays, at home, before

The confession of the Utopians

they go to church, wives throw themselves at the feet of their husbands, and children do the same before their parents; they confess that they have sinned either through commission or negligence, and they beg forgiveness for their offenses. In this way if some little cloud of strife has arisen in the household, it is dispelled by such atonement so that they can attend the sacrifices with clear and untroubled minds, for they are

But among us the most defiled strive to get closest to the altar

too conscientious to worship with a disturbed conscience.<sup>83</sup> Therefore those who feel anger or hatred toward someone do not intrude on the sacrifices unless they are reconciled and purged of such feelings, for fear of some swift and severe punishment.

When they get there, the men sit on the right side of the church, the women separately on the left. Then too, they position themselves so that the male members of each household sit in front of the master of that household, and the matron of each household sits in the last row of the women. Thus they see to it that all the actions of everyone are observed in public by the persons whose authority maintains discipline at home. Moreover they are also very careful to intermingle everywhere young persons with their elders; otherwise, if children were entrusted to children, they might spend in childish tomfoolery the time that they should devote to cultivating a religious fear of the heavenly beings,<sup>84</sup> the greatest and practically the only incitement to virtue.<sup>85</sup>

In their sacrifices they do not kill any animals; they do not think that a merciful God, who bestowed life on animals precisely that they might live, takes any pleasure in bloodshed and slaughter. They burn incense and other fragrant substances. They also display many candles, not because they do not know that such things add nothing to God's nature, no more than human prayers do, but they like this harmless mode of worship and people feel that somehow such perfumes, lights, and other ceremonies lift up the human heart and make it rise more eagerly in divine worship.

In church the people wear white garments; the priests are clothed in vestments of various colors, marvelous in both workmanship and design, though the materials are not especially expensive, and they are not woven with gold threads or encrusted with rare gems; rather they are fashioned out of the feathers of various birds, so elegantly and skillfully that the costliest material would not match the value of the workmanship.<sup>86</sup> Moreover, these feathers and plumes of birds and the set patterns in which they are arranged on the priests' garments are said to contain certain secret mysteries which, if rightly understood (and the interpretation is carefully handed down by the priests), remind them of the benefits bestowed on them by God and of the devotion they owe him in return, as well as their duty to each other.

When the priest, dressed in this way, comes out of the sacristy, everyone immediately prostrates himself on the ground out of reverence; on all sides the silence is so profound that the spectacle itself inspires a certain fear, as if in the presence of some divinity. They remain on the ground for a while and then arise at a signal from the priest. Then they sing the praises of God, accompanied by musical instruments, which are mostly shaped differently from those seen in our part of the world. Most of them surpass ours in sweetness of tone, but some of them are incomparably superior to ours. But in one respect their music is undoubtedly far ahead of ours: whether instrumental or vocal, it imitates and expresses natural feelings so well, the sound matches the sense of the words so closely (whether they express supplication or joy, peace or turmoil, sadness or anger), and the shape of the melody matches the meaning so well that it quite wonderfully stirs up, pierces, and inflames the hearts of the hearers.<sup>87</sup> Finally the priest and the people recite together

<sup>83</sup> Cf. Mt 5:23–24. <sup>84</sup> Latin superos, which includes the one God, the other gods believed in by some of the Utopians, and their ancestors who are in heaven. <sup>85</sup> A startling idea, but perhaps Hythloday (or the Utopians) means that for children this tends to be true. <sup>86</sup> In his Four Voyages, Vespucci mentions that the American Indians made vestments of feathers. <sup>87</sup> Fr. Surtz notes that many of More's contemporaries, especially Erasmus, objected to the elaborateness of church music and urged that it be composed so as to emphasize the meaning of the words (CW 4: 555–56).

certain customary and fixed forms of prayer, composed in such a way that everyone can apply to himself what they all recite together.

In these prayers each one recognizes God as the creator and ruler of the universe and also the source of all good things. He thanks God for bestowing so many benefits on him, but especially because through God's kindness he was placed in the happiest form of commonwealth and has been allotted the religion which he hopes is the truest. If he is mistaken in this matter or if there is some form of commonwealth or religion which is better and more approved by God, he prays that God in his goodness will cause him to recognize it, for he is prepared to follow wherever God leads him. But if this form of commonwealth is the best and this religion is truest, he asks that God will both make him steadfast and lead other mortals to the same way of life and the same idea of God—unless there is in fact something in this variety of religions which pleases his inscrutable will.

Finally he prays that by an easy death God may take him to himself, how soon or late he certainly does not dare to determine. But, provided that God's majesty is not offended by it, he would much rather go to him by a very difficult death than be kept away from him any longer, even by a prosperous way of life. After saying this prayer they once more prostrate themselves on the ground and after a little while they get up again, go to eat lunch, and spend the rest of the day playing games or doing military exercises.

I have described to you as accurately as I can the plan of their commonwealth, which I certainly consider to be not only the best but also the only kind worthy of the name. For elsewhere they always talk about the public good but they are concerned with their own private welfare; here,<sup>88</sup> where there is no private property, everyone works seriously for the public good. And for good reason in both places, for elsewhere is there anyone who does not know that unless he looks out for his own personal interest he will die of hunger, no matter how flourishing the commonwealth may be; therefore necessity causes him to think he should watch out for his own good, not that of others, that is, of the people. On the other hand, here, where everything belongs to everyone, no one doubts that (as long as care is taken that the public storehouses are full) nothing whatever will be lacking to anyone for his own use. For the distribution of goods is not niggardly; no one is a pauper or a beggar there, and though no one has anything, all are rich.

For what greater wealth can there be than to be completely spared any anxiety and to live with a joyful and tranquil frame of mind, with no worries about making a living, not vexed by a wife's complaints and demands, not fearing a son will end up in poverty, not concerned about a daughter's dowry, but secure about the livelihood and happiness of himself and his own, his wife, children, grandchildren, great-grandchildren, great-great-grandchildren, and however long a line of descendants noblemen presume they will have. Indeed those who worked before but are now disabled are no less provided for than those who are still working.

At this point I wish that someone would venture to compare with this equity the justice to be found in other nations, where I'll be damned if I can find any trace whatever of justice or equity. For what sort of justice is it for some nobleman or goldsmith<sup>89</sup> or moneylender or, in short, any of the others who either do nothing at all or something that is not very necessary for the commonwealth, to live luxuriously and splendidly in complete idleness or doing some superfluous task? And at the same time a laborer, a teamster, a blacksmith or farmer works so long and so hard that a beast of burden could hardly sustain it, performing tasks so necessary that without them no commonwealth could survive at all for even a single year, and yet they earn such a meager living and lead such miserable lives that beasts of burden seem to be better off, since they do not have to work so incessantly, their fodder is not much worse (and to them it tastes better), and in the meantime they are not afraid of what will happen to them. These workers are driven to toil without profit or gain in the present; they are crushed by the thought that they will be poverty-stricken in their old age, for their daily wages are not enough for that very day, much less can they accumulate any surplus which might be put aside every day to provide for their old age.

<sup>88</sup> Hythloday is so carried away that he speaks as if he is still in Utopia.

<sup>89</sup> Goldsmiths often functioned as bankers.

Is a commonwealth not unjust and ungrateful if it lavishes so many benefits on noblemen, as they are called, and goldsmiths, and the rest of that crew who are either idle or else merely flatterers and providers of empty pleasures, but makes no proper provision for farmers, colliers, laborers, teamsters, and blacksmiths, without whom there would be no commonwealth at all; unmindful of their sleepless labors and forgetting their many and great contributions, it first uses up the labors of their flourishing years, and then, when they are worn down by old age and diseases, it is totally ungrateful and rewards them with a miserable death. And how about this: every day the rich scrape away something from the wages of the poor, not only by private chicanery but also by public laws. Before, it seemed unjust that those who deserve the most from the commonwealth should receive the least, but now, by promulgating a law, they have transmuted this perversion into justice. From my observation and experience of all the flourishing nations everywhere, what is taking place, so help me God, is nothing but a conspiracy of the rich, as it were, who look out for themselves under the pretext of serving the commonwealth. They think up and devise all ways and means, first of keeping (and having no fear of losing) what they have heaped up through underhanded deals, and then of taking advantage of the poor by buying their labor and toil as cheaply as possible. Once the rich have decreed in the name of the public (including the poor) that these schemes must be observed, then they become laws.

But after these depraved creatures, in their insatiable greed, have divided among themselves all the goods which would have sufficed for everyone, they are still very far from the happiness of the Utopian commonwealth; there, once the use of money was abolished, and together with it all greed for it, what a mass of troubles was cut away, what a crop of crimes was pulled up by the roots! Is there anyone who does not know that fraud, theft, plunder, strife, turmoil, contention, rebellion, murder, treason, poisoning, crimes which are constantly punished but never held in check, would die away if money were eliminated? And also that at the very instant when money disappeared, so would fear, anxiety, worries, toil, and sleepless nights? Indeed, poverty itself, which seems to be merely the lack of money, would itself immediately fade away if money were everywhere totally abolished.

To make this clearer, imagine some barren year of bad harvests when many thousands of people die of hunger. I maintain it is clear that at the end of this famine, if you examined the barns of the rich, you would find so much grain that if it had been divided among those swept away by starvation and disease, no one would have noticed any effect at all of the failure of weather and soil. It would have been easy to provide food if that blessed money, that invention very clearly designed to open the way to what we need to live, were not the only barrier to keep us from it. I have no doubt that the rich also understand this and are not unaware how much better it would be to lack no necessities than to abound in so many superfluities, to be relieved of so many troubles than to be hemmed in by such great wealth. And in fact I have no doubt that everyone's concern for his own well-being or the authority of our savior Christ (who is so wise that he cannot be unaware of what is best and so good that he would never advise what he knew was not the best) would long since have easily drawn the whole world to adopt the laws of this commonwealth, if it were not held back by one and only one monster, the prince and parent of all plagues, pride.

Pride measures prosperity not by her own advantages but by the disadvantages of others. She would not even wish to be a goddess unless there were some wretches left whom she could order about and lord it over, whose misery would make her happiness seem all the more extraordinary, whose poverty can be tormented and exacerbated by a display of her wealth. This infernal serpent, pervading the human heart, keeps men from reforming their lives, holding them back like a suckfish.<sup>90</sup>

Since pride is too firmly fixed in the minds of men to be easily plucked out, I am glad that this form of commonwealth, which I would gladly see adopted by everyone, is at least enjoyed by the Utopians; they have followed ethical principles which the ancients thought it could impede the progress of a ship.

<sup>90</sup> The remora has a suck-disk on top of its head, by which it attaches itself to larger fish or ships; impressed by its tenacity,

enabled them to lay the foundations of a common-wealth that is not only most happy but also, so far as human prescience can foresee, likely to last forever. For now that they have eradicated factional strife and ambition at home, along with the other vices, there is no danger that they can be disturbed by domestic discord, which has been the sole reason for the downfall of many prosperous and splendidly fortified cities. But as long as their domestic tranquility and wholesome social structure is preserved, the envy of all the surrounding princes cannot shock or unsettle their dominion, though in the past they have often unsuccessfully tried to do so.

When Raphael had ended his tale, there occurred to me quite a few institutions established by the customs and laws of that nation which seemed to me quite absurd, not only in their way of waging war, their religious beliefs and practices, and other institutions as well, but also (and above all) in the very point which is the principal foundation of their whole social structure, namely their common life and subsistence with no exchange of money. That one fact entirely undermines all nobility, magnificence, splendor, and majesty, which are (in the popular view) the true adornments and ornaments of a commonwealth.<sup>91</sup> Nevertheless, I knew that his talk had worn him out, and I was not sure whether he could endure to listen to an opinion contrary to his own — especially since I remembered that he had reproached some persons precisely because they thought they would not be considered wise unless they could find some way of picking apart the ideas of others — and so, having praised their regimen and his own exposition, I took his hand and led him in to dinner, though first I said we would have another time to consider these matters more thoroughly and to confer more fully. I only wish this would happen someday!

Meanwhile, just as I can hardly agree with all the points he made (even though he is a person of unquestionable learning and wide experience of human affairs), so too I readily confess that in the Utopian commonwealth are very many features which in our societies I would wish rather than expect to see.

THE END OF THE SECOND BOOK

The end of the afternoon discourse of Raphael Hythloday about the laws and institutions of the little-known island of Utopia recorded by the most illustrious and learned gentleman Master Thomas More citizen and undersheriff of London

<sup>91</sup> What “More” says here is in keeping with his earlier Aristotelian arguments against community of property. Aristotle continually associates nobility and the highest virtue with wealth; he defines magnificence as “suitable expenditure on a grand scale” (Nicomachean Ethics 4.2.1.1122a). But many readers get the impression that More lets the mask of the character “More” slip to reveal a hint of irony.

JEROME BUSLEYDEN
TO THOMAS MORE, GREETINGS.

It was not enough for you, most distinguished
More, to have long devoted all your pains, labor, and 5 energy to the interest and advantage of individuals, but your kindness and generosity have prompted you to bestow them also on the general good. You thought that this service of yours, whatever it might be, deserved the greater popularity, sued the greater 10 favor, and sought the greater glory in proportion as it was likely to profit the greater number when extended more widely and conferred on more recipients. Though you have always aimed at this goal on other occasions, yet you have recently secured your 15 object with wonderful success by putting down in writing that afternoon conversation by which you have given to the world a description of the good and just constitution, which all must desire, in the commonwealth of Utopia.

In your happy description of that most excellent system we cannot miss anything either of consummate learning or of complete knowledge of the world in which we live. Both meet so perfectly on an equality and parity that neither confesses itself beaten but 25 both contend on equal terms for the palm of glory.
You are so well equipped with varied learning as well as with wide and unerring experience of the world that whatever you write you assert on the grounds of experience and whatever 30 you have determined to assert you write with the greatest learning. This is truly a wonderful and rare felicity, which is the rarer the more it jealously withholds itself from most and gives itself only to a rare few. The latter are chiefly those men who not 35 only want sincerely to serve the common good but who also have the learning to know how, the trust of others to be able, and the prestige with the corresponding power, and who consequently can serve as loyally and honestly and wisely as you are now nobly 40 doing. Regarding yourself as born not for yourself alone but for the whole world, you have thought it worthwhile by your most glorious merit to lay even the whole world itself under an obligation.

In no other way could you have better or more 45 rightly secured this object than by holding up before reasonable mortals themselves that ideal of a commonwealth, that pattern and perfect model of morality, whose equal has never been seen anywhere in the world for the soundness of its constitution, for its perfection, and for its desirability. It far sur-50 passes and leaves a long way behind the many celebrated and much lauded commonwealths of the Spartans, Athenians, and Romans. If these latter had been founded under the same auspices and regulated 55 by the same institutions, laws, decrees, and customs as this state of yours, assuredly they would not yet lie ruined and leveled to the ground — and now, alas, annihilated beyond any hope of restoration.

They would, rather, still be intact, prosperous, 60 happy, and most fortunate — all the while mistresses of the world, sharing their wide dominion by land and sea.

You pitied the pitiable fate of these commonwealths, and you wished to save those which today hold the hegemony from a like vicissitude of fortune by using this perfect commonwealth of yours as a 65 means. The latter has devoted its energies not so much to framing laws as to training the most qualified officials. It has not done so without reason, for otherwise, if we are to believe Plato, even the best 70 laws would all be counted dead. After the likeness of such officials, the pattern of their virtue, the example of their conduct, and the picture of their justice, the whole setup and proper course of a perfect commonwealth should be modeled. Above all 75 else, there should be a combination of wisdom in the administrators, bravery in the soldiers, temperance in individuals, and justice in all.

Since this commonwealth of yours, which you praise so highly, is obviously an excellent blend of 80 these virtues, it is no wonder if on this account it comes to be not only formidable to many nations but also revered by all of them, and likewise worthy to be celebrated through all the centuries. This is the more so because, all wrangling over private 85 possession having been eliminated, no one has any property of his own. Moreover, with a view to the common interest, all men have all things in common so that every object and every action, whether public or private, regards not the greed of the many or the 90 caprice of the few, but, however small it is, is totally directed to the maintenance of one uniform justice, equality, and communion. The necessary result of this absolute singleness of purpose is the complete elimination of everything that causes, 95 promotes, and fosters intrigue, luxury, jealousy, and injustice. Into these evils mortals are sometimes driven, even though reluctant, by the private ownership of property, or the burning thirst for gain, or that most pitiable of passions, ambition, to their immense and unparalleled loss. From these causes often suddenly arise clashes of minds, military preparations, and wars worse than civil. By the latter misfortunes not only is the prosperous condition of most flourishing commonwealths completely destroyed, but their old renown, their past triumphs, their glorious trophies, and their rich spoils, so often won through the conquest of enemies, are totally blotted out of memory.

If in these points this letter of ours should perhaps win less credit than I should wish, certainly there will be at hand the most reliable witnesses to which I can refer you, to wit, all the great cities laid waste, the states destroyed, the commonwealths overthrown, the villages fired and consumed. Today there are scarcely any remains or ruins to be seen of their great catastrophe. Hardly are their names properly recorded by any history, however old and far-reaching. Such notable disasters, devastations, destructions, and calamities of war our commonwealths one and all will easily escape provided that they organize themselves exactly on the one pattern of the Utopian commonwealth and do not depart from it, as they say, by a hair's breadth. By doing so, they will at last most fully recognize by the successful reality how greatly they have benefited by the service you have rendered them. Especially will they have learned thereby how to keep their own commonwealth safe, unharmed, and triumphant. Accordingly these states will owe you a great debt for saving them in their hour of need—a debt such as is rightly merited by one who has reserved not an individual member of the commonwealth but the entire commonwealth itself.

Meanwhile, farewell, and continue successfully to devise, execute, and perfect ever fresh benefits for the commonwealth. They will make the commonwealth eternal and you immortal. Farewell, most learned and most beneficent More, glory of your Britain and of this world of ours.

From our house at Mechlin, 1516

GERHARD GELDENHAUER OF NIJMEGEN ABOUT UTOPIA

Reader, do you like what is pleasant? In this book is everything that is pleasant. Do you hunt what is profitable? You can read nothing more profitable. If you wish both the pleasant and the profitable, this island abounds in both. By them you may polish your expression and improve your mind. In this book the very sources of right and wrong are revealed by the eloquent More, the chief glory of his native London.

CORNELIS DE SCHRIJVER TO THE READER

Do you want to see new marvels now that a new world has been discovered not long ago? Do you want to learn ways of living different in nature from our own? Do you want to know the sources of the virtues? Do you want to uncover the original causes of the world's evils and to experience the great emptiness lying concealed at the heart of things? Read these pages which the celebrated More has given us in variegated color—More, the honor of London's famous men.

JOHN DESMARAIS<sup>1</sup>
OF CASSEL TO MASTER
PETER GILES, GREETINGS.

I have read the Utopia of your friend More, together with his Epigrams, whether with greater pleasure or greater admiration I cannot decide. O happy Britain which now flourishes with men of such talent as to be able to contend with antiquity itself! O we dullards, nay, more than blockheads, if precedents so close to us cannot rouse us to strive for like praise. "It is disgraceful to keep silent," said Aristotle, "if Isocrates still speaks." We should be ashamed to have time only for lucrative transactions and for pleasures when among the British at the ends of the earth learning flourishes highly on account of the favor and kindness of kings.

Although praise for learning has belonged almost exclusively to Greece and Italy, nevertheless Spain, too, has some shining names among the ancients to boast of. Savage Scythia has her Anacharsides, Denmark has her Saxo, France has her Budé. Germany has numerous figures famous for learning, England has very many and these pre-eminent. What conjectures should we make about all the rest if More is so outstanding—in spite of the fact that he is, first, still a young man; next, much distracted by public and domestic affairs; and, finally, professing any activity other than scholarship as his calling.

We alone seem in our own eyes sufficiently happy if proper provision has been made for our bodily pleasure and our money coffer. Indeed, even we, shaking off our lethargy, are girding ourselves for this most noble contest. To be conquered in it is not shameful, and to conquer is most glorious.

Countless examples on all sides summon us to the contest. Charles,<sup>2</sup> the best of princes, who rewards nothing more highly than learned virtue, summons us to it. The one and only Maecenas or patron of every noble pursuit, Jean le Sauvage, Chancellor of Burgundy, summons us.

With greater urgency, I beg you, most learned Peter Giles, to see, as soon as feasible, to the publication of Utopia. Whatever pertains to the good constitution of a commonwealth may be seen in it as in a mirror. Would that, just as the Utopians have begun to receive our religion, so we might borrow from them their system of public administration! This perhaps might happen easily if a number of distinguished and invincible theologians would betake themselves to the island. They would promote the faith of Christ already sprouting there and at the same time bring home to us the customs and laws of the Utopian people.

Utopia owes much to Hythloday who has made known a country unworthy of remaining unknown. Its debt is even greater to the very learned More whose pencil has very skillfully drawn it for us. In turn, not the least part of the thanks which are due to both must be shared with you: it is you who will bring into public view both Hythloday's discourse and More's written account. It will serve as a great delight for all—and bring even greater profit if they weigh all its elements carefully.

Utopia has so stirred my soul that, although unaccustomed to their company for a long time, I have again summoned the muses—how happily, you must judge. 50

Farewell, most honest Peter Giles, you who are both votary and patron of the fine arts.

From our house in Louvain, December 1.

POEM ON THE NEW ISLAND 55 OF UTOPIA BY THE SAME AUTHOR,
JOHN DESMARAIS, ORATOR OF THE UNIVERSITY OF LOUVAIN

Brave men were the gift of Rome, eloquent men
the gift of lauded Greece, frugal men the gift of famous Sparta, uncorrupted men the gift of Marseilles, hardy men of Germany. Courteous and witty men were the gift of the land of Attica.

Pious men were once the gift of renowned France, wary men of Africa.

Munificent men were once the gift of the land of Britain.

Examples of the different virtues are sought in different peoples,
and what is lacking in one abounds in another.

The total sum of all virtue once for all is the gift of the island of Utopia to earth-born men.

THOMAS MORE 60
TO HIS FRIEND PETER GILES, WARMEST GREETINGS.

My dear Peter, I was thoroughly delighted with the judgment you know about, delivered by that very sharp fellow in the form of a dilemma directed against my Utopia: if the story is being presented as true, I find some things in it rather absurd; if it is a fiction, then I think that More's usual good judgment is lacking on some points. I am very grateful to this man, my dear Peter, whoever he may be, who 70

<sup>2</sup> the future Emperor Charles V

I suspect is learned and whom I see as a friendly critic. I do not know whether any other critique since the book came out has pleased me as much as this one. For, first of all, motivated either by his regard for me or for the work itself, it seems that he did not begrudge the effort of reading it all the way through, and that not cursorily and hastily the way priests read the divine office (if they do so at all) but deliberately and carefully so as to weigh the details thoughtfully. And then, after criticizing some points, and not very many at that, he declares that he approves of the rest, not thoughtlessly but judiciously. Finally, even in the language with which he castigates me he praises me more highly than those who deliberately set out to praise me. For he gives a clear indication what a splendid opinion he has of me when he complains that he is disappointed when he reads a passage that is not as precise as it should be, whereas I myself exceed my own hopes if I happen to be able to publish something in the whole lot that is at least not absolutely absurd.

But in fact, to deal with him no less frankly in turn, I do not see why he should consider himself so eagle-eyed and, as the Greeks say, sharp-sighted, if he discovers some things rather absurd in the institutions of the Utopians or finds that in setting up a commonwealth I have not thought through some matters in a sufficiently practical way, as if there were no absurdities elsewhere in the world, or as if any of all the philosophers everywhere had so devised a commonwealth, a ruler, or a household so perfectly as to propound nothing that could not be improved. On that point, if it were not that I consider as sacred the memory of the most extraordinary men who have been hallowed from ancient times, I could certainly point out features from each of them which everyone would undoubtedly agree in condemning.

But when he is in doubt whether the work is true or fictitious, on this point I think his own usual good judgment is lacking. Nevertheless, I do not deny that if I had decided to write about the commonwealth and a story such as this had occurred to me, I would not have shrunk from a fictional presentation which would make the truth slip more pleasantly into the mind like medicine smeared with honey. But certainly I would have managed it so that, even though I might have wanted to deceive the ignorant mob, I would at least have inserted some pointed hints which would have let the more learned discover what I was about. Thus even if I had done nothing more than assign to the ruler, river, city, and island such names as would have informed learned readers that the island is nowhere, the city is a phantom, the river has no water, the ruler no people—which would not have been hard to do and would have been much more elegant than what I actually did, for if I had not been forced by historical accuracy, I am not so stupid as to use those barbarous and meaningless names Utopia, Anyder, Amaurot, and Ademus.<sup>3</sup>

But my dear Giles, since I see that some people are so cautious, wary, and sagacious that they can hardly be induced to believe what we simple and credulous souls wrote down at Hythloday's dictation, lest such persons should mistrust not only the accuracy of the story but also my own credibility, I am glad that I can say for my brainchild what Mysis in Terence says to keep Glycerius's boy from being considered a changeling: "By heaven, I thank goodness that there were some freeborn matrons present at the birth."<sup>4</sup> For luckily for me it so happens that Raphael told his tale not only to you and me but also to many very respectable and upstanding men. I do not know whether he related more numerous or notable details but I am sure he told them no fewer and no less remarkable matters than he did to us.

But if these incredulous persons will not take even their word for it, they can visit Hythloday himself, for he has not yet died. I just heard from some persons who recently returned from Portugal that on the first day of last March he was healthy and vigorous as ever. Therefore let them ask him for the truth or question him to ferret it out, as long as they understand that I am responsible only for my own work, not for the trustworthiness of others.

Farewell, dearest Peter, to you and your charming wife and pretty little daughter, to whom my wife wishes long life and good health.

<sup>3</sup> This sentence is incomplete in the Latin and has been left so in the translation. <sup>4</sup> Andria 4.4.770–71

Α. Δ. Τ. Η. Ο. Λ. Μ. Ο. Ρ. Β. Α. Μ. Ε. Ρ. Ι. Σ. Τ.
ἵνα ὡς φιδῶνι μοι ὡς δι' ὄφιδε,

Prudens simplicitas amorq̄ recti.

עוֹשֵׂי טוֹב לְפָנֶיךָ יְיָ אֱלֹהֵינוּ וְלֹא עוֹשֵׂי רָעָה ἄκέραιοι ὡς αἱ περιστεραι.

IN INCLYTA GERMANIAE BASILEA.
M. D. XVIII.

This illustration by Hans Holbein the Younger is the last page in the 1518 editions of Thomas More's Utopia. The Greek at top and bottom is Matthew 10:16: "so be wise as serpents and innocent as doves." The Latin at the left is from Martial 10.47 (regarding what constitutes a happy life): "shrewd simplicity and love of doing right." The Hebrew at the right is from Psalm 125:4: "Do good, O Lord, to those who are good, to those who are upright in their hearts."

Epigrams

More wrote almost all his Latin poetry from 1500 to 1520. With the help of Erasmus, the Epigrams were first published in March 1518 by Froben in a volume that contained More's Utopia, his epigrams, and Erasmus's epigrams as well. Another edition followed from Froben in December 1518, and in 1520 the Epigrams were printed as their own volume, with More himself involved in the editing (CW 3.2: 7). The Epigrams were also later printed in the 1563 Lucubrations and the 1565, 1566, and 1689 Opera omnia. As their correspondence indicates, More and Erasmus discussed the publication of the Epigrams before June 1516 (see Letters 19 [EE 424: 81], 20, 87, 90).

More's major source for his Epigrams is the Planudean Anthology, a collection of 2,400 Greek epigrams. At least 106 of More's poems are translations from this source; other sources for his Epigrams include Aesop, Plutarch, Seneca, Cicero, Aristotle, Martial, and Lucian, along with proverbs, English songs, and the work of a few contemporaries such as Bebel and Poggio (CW 3.2: 12). The prefatory letter from Beatus Rhenanus explains that good epigrams must display "wit combined with brevity," and must "end promptly with a witty point," to the delight of the reader. More's epigrams, Rhenanus observes, are seasoned by the author's mirth and sharp wit, displaying his learning and keen judgment as well.

More's Epigrams opens with the "Progymnasmata," preparatory exercises composed by Thomas More and William Lily, who was appointed high master of St. Paul's School in 1510. As the Yale editors observe, "More and Lily may be credited with the invention of the variorum translation of selected Greek epigrams that was to have a brilliant history in the schools and beyond" (CW 3.2: 13). These exercises were likely composed before 1510.

The rest of the poems in Epigrams address a rich array of subjects and human experiences, in a variety of tones and forms. There are poems on friendship, folly, family, law, philosophy, theology, politics, social life, death, and tyranny; there are personal poems on More's children, and on his meeting with an older woman, now a mother, with whom he had been infatuated as a young man; there is the "Coronation Ode," through which More addresses

England and the newly crowned Henry VIII in the fashion of a friendly, yet challenging, orator; there are poems on animals and other earthy subjects, which kindled More's comic muse throughout his life, to the occasional dismay of friends and readers.

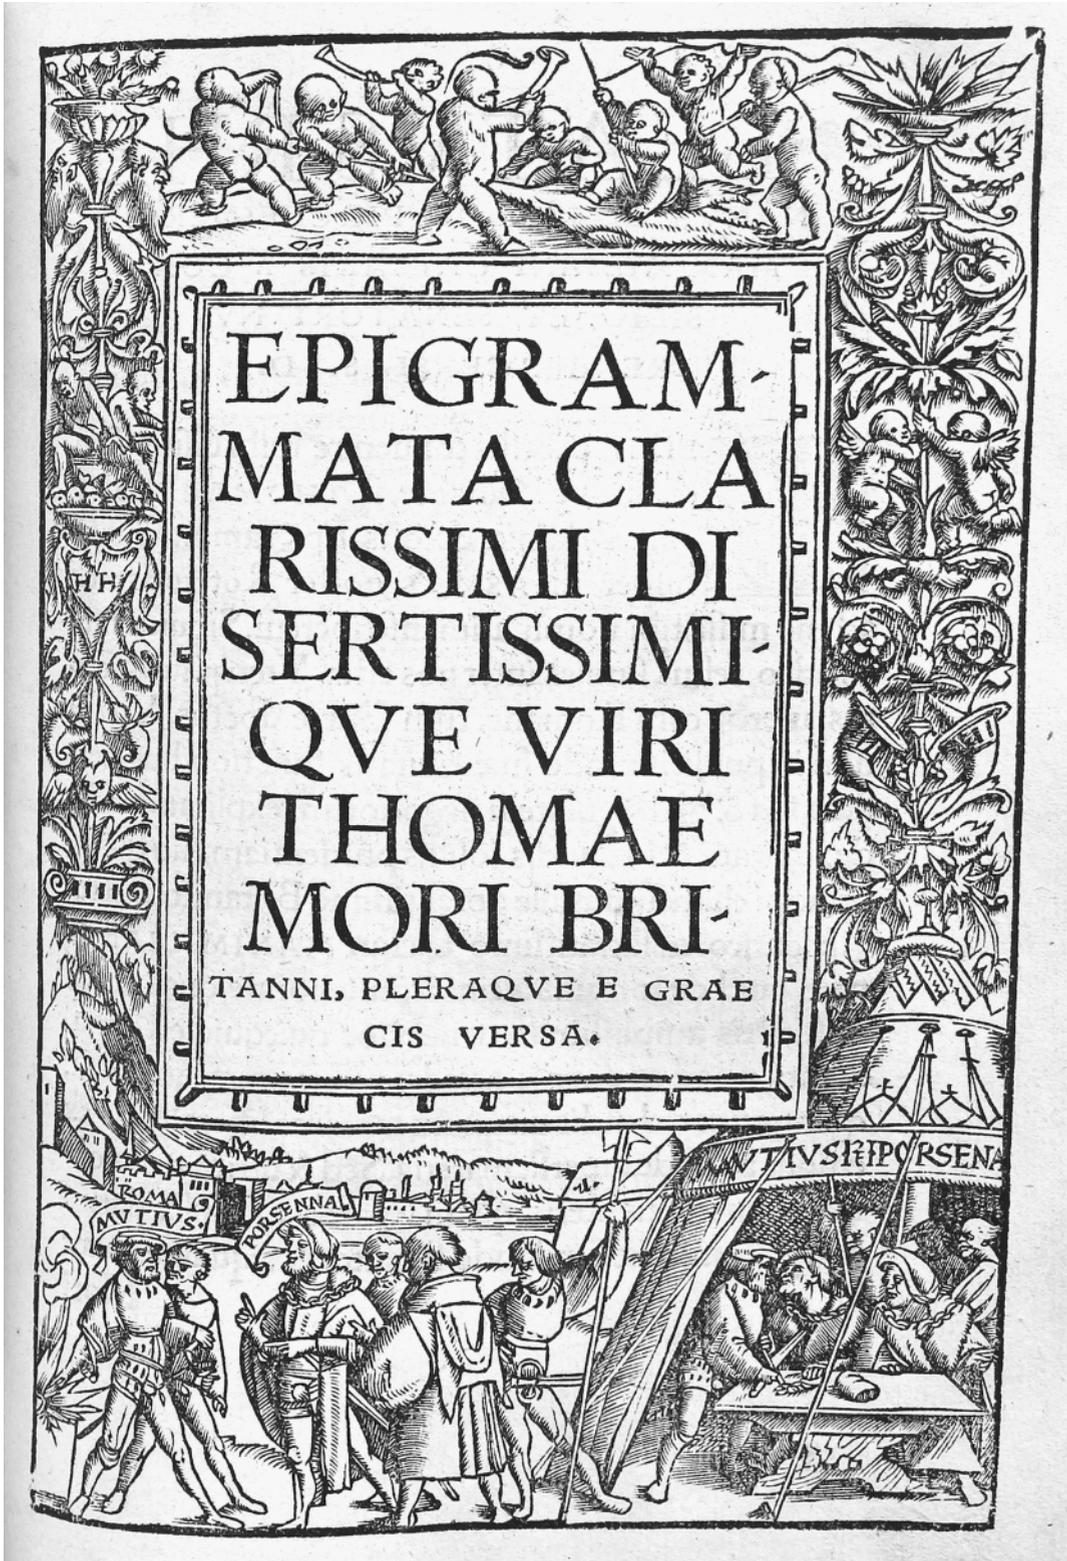

More's international quarrel with Germanus Brixius began with the publication of More's satirical epigrams in 1518. These poems occasioned Brixius's counterblast, the Antimorus, which in turn prompted additional epigrams from More, as well as his "Letter to Brixius," printed in the "Humanist Letters" section below. The quarrel ended only through the intercessions of Erasmus, and More agreed to recall and destroy copies of his letter.

Among More's writings, few provide as many angles on the author, or reveal as much of his complex mind, as this collection of his poetry. Yale editors Leicester Bradner and Charles Lynch see More's work as "incomparably the best book of Latin epigrams in the sixteenth century," displaying a poetic style that is "never inflated or pompous, and almost always endowed with the virtues of his prose—logical energy, muscular realism, and penetrating intelligence" (CW 3.2: 63, 41). Regarding More's style and rhetoric in the Epigrams, Elizabeth McCutcheon points out that "More characteristically subverts, questions, or reopens an initial claim, inverts an old proverb, or otherwise renders an epigram open-ended, by juxtaposition, by ambiguity of language and allusion, by exploiting different points of view and incongruities of situation, and by innumerable other rhetorical strategies" (Moreana nos. 201–2: 219–20).

Among the groups of poems in the Epigrams, the political poems are particularly striking and reveal something of More's mature political philosophy. Bradner and Lynch see these political poems as a uniquely Morean contribution to the epigram genre (CW 3.2: 62).

Much work remains to be done studying these poems and relating them to More's other works, especially their companion piece in the early editions, Utopia, the Latin vocabulary of which connects to the Epigrams in rich and mutually illuminating ways.

The translations provided are from Yale CW 3.2; they are prose translations of the Latin poetry.

This title page appeared in the first publication of More's Epigrams (in the March 1518 edition of Utopia) and again in a 1520 edition of More's Epigrams alone. At the bottom, left, is pictured the Roman hero Gaius Mucius Scaevola holding his right hand in the fire while defiantly opposing King Porsenna, who is invading Rome. (See Livy 2.12.)

The Epigrams

of the very famous and learned Englishman
THOMAS MORE printed to agree with the author's own corrected copy

5 Beatus Rhenanus<sup>1</sup> greets Willibald Pirckheimer,<sup>2</sup> councilor to the Emperor Maximilian and member of the Nuremberg Senate.

10 It has seemed to me, most renowned Willibald, exquisitely fitting to inscribe to you in particular this book that our friend Erasmus of Rotterdam recently sent to me, the Epigrams of Thomas More, that ornament of Britain, since you and More resemble each other in so many respects. You are both 15 skilled in the law, both learned in Greek as well as Latin. Not only are you both occupied in the public duties of your respective states, but, because of your unusual skill in resolving problems and your wisdom in council, you are both very dear to your 20 rulers, the one to the very powerful King Henry of England, the other to the most holy Emperor Maximilian. Why mention wealth, which you both have in great plenty, so that neither of you lacks whatever distinction is thought to accrue from riches, or rather so that you both have the means in plenti-25 ful abundance for setting examples of good deeds, particularly deeds of generosity. Both of you had fathers noted no less for their learning than for their distinguished birth. And so, since likeness and equality are the source of friendship, I have decided 30 that it is very appropriate to dedicate this work of More's to you so that, although for many other reasons you already honor the author with your affection, you may as a result of these Epigrams embrace, love, and esteem him even more. And furthermore, 35 there is no one to whom these most delightful diversions can be sent more fittingly than to one who has himself been wont from time to time to descend, as they say, into the same arena. That is to say, if anyone has himself at one time or another 40 tried out his ingenuity at this kind of composition, he is the very man who will know how remarkable a thing is a learned epigram. Truly an epigram, as you know, must have wit combined with brevity;

it must be lighthearted, and then it must end promptly with a witty point which the Greeks call ἐπιφώνημα. Surely one may find all these proper-45 ties in these Epigrams of More, especially in those which he himself composed; in the others, which are translated from the Greek, the credit for originality belongs to the ancients. Still, here too, More deserves to be rated as high for translating well from 50 a foreign tongue as for his own work. Undoubtedly the labor of a translator is often greater. This is so because the author is unfettered and freely at liberty to use whatever occurs to him, but the translator is required to keep something else continually 55 in sight; that is, of course, what he has chosen to translate. Whenever this is the case, his skill is much more severely taxed than when he produces something of his own. 60

In both these fields Thomas More is very remarkable, for he composes most tastefully and translates most happily. How pleasantly his poetry flows!
How utterly unforced is his work! How adroit it all is! Here is nothing harsh, nothing rough, nothing 65 obscure. He is bright, sharp, a master of Latin. Furthermore, he seasons all his work with a certain very delightful humor so that I have never seen anything more charming. I could believe that the Muses conferred upon him all there is anywhere of mirth, 70 charm, and wit. How gracefully he pokes fun at Sa-binus<sup>3</sup> for bringing up another's children as his own.
How wittily he ridicules Lalus,<sup>4</sup> who went to such lengths in his desire to seem French. And yet his witticisms are by no means ill-natured, but rather 75 are honest, sweet, mild, anything but bitter. He provokes laughter, but in every case without pain; he ridicules, but without abuse.

<sup>1</sup> Rhenanus (1485–1547), also known as Beatus Bild, was a German humanist and editor of Seneca, Tacitus, and Livy.

<sup>2</sup> Pirckheimer (1470–1530) was a humanist and city councilor of Nuremberg before he was appointed imperial councilor to

Emperor Maximilian I in 1499. <sup>3</sup> See Epigrams 196, 205, 220. <sup>4</sup> See Epigram 95.

At present Italy admires Pontanus and Marullus<sup>5</sup> more than most epigrammatists, but I would wager my life that there is just as much inherent skill in this author of ours and more profit, unless it is possible that someone think it very profitable when Marullus celebrates his Neaera and in many places speaks in riddles, acting like another Heraclitus, or when Johannes Pontanus revives for us the lewdness of the ancient epigrammatists; and nothing could be more uninteresting or less worth reading for a man of principles, not to mention a man of Christian principles. Of course, they longed to imitate antiquity. To preserve the appearance of antiquity untainted, they avoided what was Christian just as Pomponius Laetus, a man excessively Roman, avoided what was Greek, lest he destroy the purity of the Latin language.

Well, just as these amusing trifles of More's demonstrate his natural gifts and his unusual learning, so the very keen judgment he has in politics will be quite apparent from his Utopia. Of that I shall make only brief mention in passing because it was praised in a magnificent preface, as well it might be, by a most exacting scholar, Budé,<sup>6</sup> that supreme master of the nobler learning, that great and even unmatched glory of France. The Utopia contains such principles as cannot be found in Plato, in Aristotle, or even in the Pandects<sup>7</sup> of your Justinian. Its lessons are less philosophical, perhaps, than theirs but more Christian. And yet (listen, by the Muses, to a good story) when the Utopia was mentioned here recently at a certain gathering of a few responsible men and when I praised it, a certain dolt insisted that no more thanks were due to More than to any secretary who merely records the opinions of others at a council, sitting in after the fashion of an "extra," as they say, and without expressing any opinions of his own, because all More said was taken from the mouth of Hythlodoy and merely written down by More. Therefore, he said, More deserved praise only because he had recorded these matters well. And there were some present who approved the fellow's opinion as that of a man of very sound perception. Do you not, then, welcome this elegant wit of More, who can impose upon such men as these, no ordinary men, but widely respected and theologians at that?<sup>8</sup>

Finally, in case you would like to know this too, William Lily,<sup>9</sup> More's companion with whom he contended in the translation from the Greek of the epigrams included in this volume under the title Progymnasmata,<sup>10</sup> is an Englishman, learned in every way, intimately familiar not only with the Greek authors, but also with the customs native to that people, in that he spent some years on the island of Rhodes. He now conducts with great success a grammar school founded by Colet<sup>11</sup> in London.

I have only this left to say: when you have the opportunity, amid the duties which keep you so very busy conferring with embassies and administering the state, pick up this book, read it, and become an admirer of More, whose face, I think, you have not yet seen; but you have known him a long time from his writings. Farewell, most illustrious sir.

Basel, 23 February 1518.

PROGYMNASMATA

EXERCISES BY THE FRIENDLY RIVALS THOMAS MORE AND WILLIAM LILY

I

THOMAS MORE'S, ON A MISER

When Asclepiades the miser saw a mouse in his house, he said, "Friend mouse, what are you doing in my home?" The mouse, with a pleasant smile, replied, "Lay aside your fear, my friend; it is not board but lodging I want here."

WILLIAM LILY'S

Asclepiades the miser saw a mouse in his house and said, "Friend mouse, what are you doing in here with me?" The mouse smiled and said, "Have no fear, friend; what I want of you is not board but room."

<sup>5</sup> Jovianus Pontanus (ca. 1426–1503) and Michael Marullus (ca. 1458–1500) were Italian poets. <sup>6</sup> William, or Guillaume, Budé (1467–1530) was a leading humanist scholar in France. <sup>7</sup> The Pandects (or Digest), commissioned by Emperor

Justinian I, is a collection of writings by Roman jurists. <sup>8</sup> This italicized sentence was originally written in Greek. <sup>9</sup> Lily (ca. 1468–1522) was a classical scholar and the first headmaster of Colet's grammar school at St. Paul's in London.

<sup>10</sup> a classical form of rhetorical exercise (literally "before-exercises") <sup>11</sup> John Colet (1467–1519), dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, was a spiritual influence on More and Erasmus.

2

WILLIAM LILY'S, ON A MISER

You have the wealth of a rich man, but a pauper's spirit—you who are wealthy in your heir's behalf, but poor for yourself alone.

THOMAS MORE'S

You have the wealth of a rich man, but yours is a poor man's mind, unhappy man, rich for your heir and poor for yourself.

3

WILLIAM LILY'S, ON THE UNCERTAINTY OF PROPERTY

We fields recently belonged to Achaemenides, but now Menippus owns us. And we fall now to this one and then again to another, for not long ago that fellow thought he owned us, and now another thinks he does. We are composed of nothing but Chance.

THOMAS MORE'S

Not long ago I belonged to Achaemenides; now, presto, I belong to Menippus. And I shall pass again from one to another. This one thinks he owns me, that one thought he did. But really I am only Luck's field.

4

THOMAS MORE'S, ON EXTRAVAGANCE

To build many residences and to feed many people is surely the direct road to poverty.

WILLIAM LILY'S

To support many persons and to establish numerous residences—that is the road to extreme poverty.

5

WILLIAM LILY'S, ON REASONABLE EXPENDITURE

May you make use of your wealth as if you were marked for death, and conserve your wealth as if you were destined to live. Truly, he is the wise man who, by pondering both these attitudes, conserves his wealth and sets a limit to his spending.

THOMAS MORE'S

As though death were at hand, enjoy the wealth you have acquired. And again, spare your wealth as if you were certain to live. The wise man is he who, by a proper consideration of these alternatives, is both frugal and generous in due measure.

6

THOMAS MORE'S, ON SCORNING LUCK

Now I have reached port; Hope and Luck, farewell. You have nothing to do with me. Now make sport of others.

WILLIAM LILY'S

I have reached port; Hope and Luck, farewell. You have nothing to do with me. Now make sport of others.

7

WILLIAM LILY'S, ON DEATH

Naked I arrive on earth, naked, too, I leave. Why do I strive in vain, knowing as I do that death is naked?<sup>12</sup>

THOMAS MORE'S

Just as surely as I came on earth naked, so surely naked shall I quit it. Why do I struggle in vain, knowing as I do that death is naked?

8

THOMAS MORE'S,
ON SELF-INDULGENCE AND LUST

If anyone is in haste to join the shades of the dead below, then baths and wine and the pleasures of love shorten the journey thither.

WILLIAM LILY'S

It is baths and wine and the pleasures of love which drag us in headlong haste to the domain of the prince of darkness.

9

THOMAS MORE'S, ON A FALSE FRIEND

The man who admits his hatred does less harm than he who pretends unqualified affection. When I am warned, I avoid the man who hates me, but how can I avoid one who pretends to be my friend? Undoubtedly, one's worst enemy is he who in the guise of friend deceitfully works mischief by unsuspected guile.

<sup>12</sup> See Jb 1:21; Eccl 5:14; Proverbs 3:5,14.

WILLIAM LILY'S

10 The man who frankly says, "I hate you," does less damage than the man who pretends innocent friendship. Obviously, you will avoid the one you know is dangerous, but not the one who says, "I am your friend." I say that he is a deadly enemy who delights to do secret injury and still enjoys the confidence of friendship.

10

THOMAS MORE'S,
ON A SPARTAN SOLDIER

A cruel Spartan mother saw her son as he was hurrying home after losing his weapons. She snatched up a spear, confronted him, and thrust him through. Then over her murdered son she spoke these unwomanly words: "Unnatural son of Sparta, go now at last to the abode of the dead. Go, you are a disgrace to Sparta and to your family."

WILLIAM LILY'S

10 When a Spartan mother saw her son, stripped of his arms in battle, returning in haste to his father's house, she leaped upon him and pierced his breast with a spear. Then in a hair-raising speech the maddened creature, more like a man than a woman, addressed the corpse: "Since you have belied your native land of Sparta and your forebears, unnatural son, depart at last to join the dead."

11

THOMAS MORE'S, ON A MAN
BOTH LAME AND STUPID

Your mind is as lame as your leg, and your external condition gives sure signs of your inner state.

WILLIAM LILY'S

5 You are as slow in your wits as you are afoot, for your outward appearance gives a sample of what lies hidden within.

12

THOMAS MORE'S, THE DILEMMA OF THEOPHRASTUS, FROM AULUS GELLIUS

If by merely knowing your appointed troubles you could avoid them, then surely it would be a fine thing to know what troubles you would encounter. 5 But if you do not have the power to avoid the troubles which you know are coming, what help is it to learn in advance of the suffering you must endure in any case?

WILLIAM LILY'S

If it were possible for you to see misfortunes approaching and, with your foresight, to avoid them, then it would be pleasant to know them. But if you must inevitably suffer the misfortunes you seek to discover, what good is foresight, for you must endure them in any case. 15

A POEM IN IAMBIC TRIMETER

BY THOMAS MORE

If you could discover in advance what suffering you must endure, and if you could avoid it, then it would be good for you to know. But if, despite your knowledge, suffer you must, what advantage is there in knowing, for the suffering is inevitable. 20

13

THOMAS MORE'S, ON TWO BROTHERS WHO WERE BORN AND DIED ON THE SAME DAY

This tomb contains four brothers. Two of them a single day brought to birth and to death. 5

WILLIAM LILY'S

This tomb contains four brothers. Two of them were born on the same day and on the same day died.

14

THOMAS MORE'S, ON JUPITER TRANSFORMED

Jupiter was a bull, a swan, a satyr, and gold, for love of Europa, Leda, Antiope, Danae.<sup>13</sup>

<sup>13</sup> Europa became Crete's first queen and mother of Minos and Rhadamanthus. Leda, queen of Sparta and wife of Tyndareus, was the mother of Castor, Pollux, Helen, and Clytemnestra. Antiope was the mother of twin brothers, Amphion and Zethus, who built the walls of Thebes. Danae's father imprisoned her in a tower, on account of a prophecy that her son would kill him. However, Zeus visited her in a shower of gold, and she gave birth to Perseus.

5 WILLIAM LILY'S
Jupiter became a bull, a swan, a satyr, gold, for love of Europa, Leda, Antiope, Danae.

15
THOMAS MORE'S, ON SAPPHO
They say there are nine Muses. Clearly they are mistaken. Now Sappho of Lesbos is the tenth daughter of Pierus.<sup>14</sup>

5 WILLIAM LILY'S
How rashly some have said that the sisters are nine!
Lo, here is Lesbian Sappho the tenth of the Muses.

16
WILLIAM LILY'S, ON A BRONZE
IMAGE OF A SATYR
Either a satyr was applied to the bronze or, induced by artistry, that same bronze was applied to a satyr.

5 THOMAS MORE'S
This bronze, while it was being worked with thoroughly admirable skill, either coated a satyr or was inclosed by a satyr.

10 ANOTHER VERSION BY MORE Either a satyr is fitted to that bronze statue, or a satyr is fitted with that bronze statue.

17
WILLIAM LILY'S,
ON A STATUE OF NIOBE
The gods deprived me of life and turned me to stone. But it was Praxiteles who from stone restored me to life. 5

THOMAS MORE'S
The gods changed me from a living creature to stone; but when I was stone, Praxiteles made me live again.

18
THOMAS MORE'S, ON A STATUE OF NEOPTOLEMUS
The entire city of Cecrops honors you, Neoptolemus, with this statue. It is in part your devotion and in part your loyalty which cause the city to do you 5 this honor.

WILLIAM LILY'S
The people of Athens, Neoptolemus, have honored you with this statue because of your devotion and loyalty. 10

END OF THE PREPARATORY EXERCISES WRITTEN IN FRIENDLY COLLABORATION BY THOMAS MORE AND WILLIAM LILY

<sup>14</sup> Sappho was a Greek lyric poet (ca. 610–570 BC). Although the Muses are often called the “Pierides,” the daughters of Pierus were maidens who challenged the Muses in song, and were changed into magpies for their presumption.

Epigrams

of the very famous and learned Englishman
THOMAS MORE in large part translated from the Greek

[6. To Henry VIII

<London, ca. June 1509>]

I fear, most glorious prince, that while I was trying to win favor for my awkward verses by the addition of color (like maidens who have insufficient confidence in their beauty), I may have robbed them of that characteristic by which they could have given you the greatest pleasure — I mean timeliness. For when I had finished writing them at the time of your coronation and had handed them over to an illuminator for decoration, an attack of the gout, no less, by which the illuminator was most inopportunistly afflicted immediately upon undertaking the task, has caused me to present my verses to you only now, considerably later than the circumstances seemed to require. And so (if, in accord with your inherent kindness, you give me leave to deal informally with the matter) I do not know whether greater charm was given to my verses by the illuminator's hands or taken from them by his feet. In any case it is because of his feet that I am constrained to fear that my expression of joy may seem to you no less late, no less untimely, than, in antiquity, the famous expression of sorrow by the citizens of Troy seemed to the Emperor Tiberius. The Trojans commiserated with the Emperor on the loss of a son who had been dead for a long time. The Emperor with ready wit made fun of their condolences by saying that he too sympathized with them in their loss of that noble warrior Hector.<sup>1</sup> But their effort, directed at a grief that was not merely fading but had wholly passed away, could not be anything but ridiculous. Mine, however, is preserved from this defect by the immeasurable rejoicing occasioned by your thronged coronation; for since that joy has filled the hearts of all with an emotion so strong and lasting that it cannot fade even in a whole lifetime, the result is that this offering of mine seems to have arrived, not late and when the event was past and forgotten, but in time and while the event is still with us. Farewell, most glorious and (although this title is strange and rare for kings) most beloved prince.

19

ON THE CORONATION DAY OF HENRY VIII,
MOST GLORIOUS AND BLESSED KING OF THE BRITISH ISLES, AND OF CATHERINE HIS MOST HAPPY QUEEN, A POETICAL EXPRESSION OF GOOD WISHES BY THOMAS MORE OF LONDON

If ever there was a day, England, if ever there was a time for you to give thanks to those above, this is that happy day, one to be marked with a pure white stone and put in your calendar. This day is the limit of our slavery, the beginning of our freedom, the end of sadness, the source of joy, for this day consecrates a young man who is the everlasting glory of our time and makes him your king — a king who is worthy not merely to govern a single people but singly to rule the whole world — such a king as will wipe the tears from every eye and put joy in the place of our long distress.<sup>2</sup> Every heart smiles to see its cares dispelled, as the day shines bright when clouds are scattered. Now the people, freed, run before their king with bright faces. Their joy is almost beyond their own comprehension. They rejoice, they exult, they leap for joy and celebrate their having such a king. “The King” is all that any mouth can say.

The nobility, long since at the mercy of the dregs of the population, the nobility, whose title has too long been without meaning, now lifts its head, now rejoices in such a king, and has proper reason for rejoicing. The merchant, heretofore deterred by numerous taxes, now once again plows seas grown unfamiliar. Laws, heretofore powerless — yes, even laws put to unjust end — now happily have regained their proper authority. All are equally happy. All weigh their earlier losses against the advantages to come. Now each man happily does not hesitate to show the possessions which in the past his fear kept hidden in dark seclusion. Now there is enjoyment in any profit which managed to escape the many sly clutching hands of the many thieves. No longer is it 40 a criminal offense to own property which was honestly acquired (formerly it was a serious offense).

<sup>1</sup> See Suetonius, Tiberius 52.2.   <sup>2</sup> See Rv 21:14; Is 25:8.

 No longer does fear hiss whispered secrets in one's ear, for no one has secrets either to keep or to whisper. Now it is a delight to ignore informers. Only 45 ex-informers fear informers now.

The people gather together, every age, both sexes, and all ranks. There is no reason why they should lurk in their homes and not take part while the king, after completion of the proper ceremonies, un-50 dertakes, amid happy auspices, the rule of Britain.
 Wherever he goes, the dense crowd in their desire to look upon him leaves hardly a narrow lane for his passage. The houses are filled to overflowing, the rooftops strain to support the weight of spectators.
 55 On all sides there arises a shout of new good will.
 Nor are the people satisfied to see the king just once;
 they change their vantage points time and time again in the hope that, from one place or another, they may see him again. Three times they delight to 60 see him — and why not? This king, than whom Nature has created nothing more deserving of love.

Among a thousand noble companions he stands out taller than any. And he has strength worthy of his regal person. His hand, too, is as skilled as his 65 heart is brave, whether there is an issue to be settled by the naked sword, or an eager charge with leveled lances, or an arrow aimed to strike a target. There is fiery power in his eyes, beauty in his face, and such color in his cheeks as is typical of twin roses. In fact, 70 that face, admirable for its animated strength, could belong to either a young girl or a man. Thus Achilles looked when he pretended to be a maiden,<sup>3</sup> thus he looked when he dragged Hector behind his The-salian steeds.<sup>4</sup>

Ah, if only nature would permit that, like his body, the outstanding excellence of his mind be vis-75 ible to the eye. Nay but in fact his virtue does shine forth from his very face; his countenance bears the open message of a good heart, revealing how ripe 80 the wisdom that dwells in his judicious mind, how profound the calm of his untroubled breast, how he bears his lot and manages it whether it be good or bad, how great his care for modest chastity. How serene the clemency that warms his gentle heart, how far removed from arrogance his mind, of these 85 the noble countenance of our prince itself displays the indubitable signs, signs that admit no counterfeit. But his justice, the skill he has in the art of ruling, his sense of responsibility in the treatment of his people — these can easily be discerned from our 90 faces, these must be perceived from the prosperity we enjoy. In that we are treated thus and are gaining our liberty, in that fear, harm, danger, grief have vanished, while peace, ease, joy, and laughter have returned — therein is revealed the excellence of our 95 distinguished prince.

Unlimited power has a tendency to weaken good minds, and that even in the case of very gifted men.
 But howsoever dutiful he was before, his crown has brought our prince a character which deserves to 100 rule, for he has provided promptly on his first day such advantages as few rulers have granted in extreme old age. He has instantly arrested and imprisoned anyone who by plots had harmed the realm. Whoever was an informer is closely fettered and confined, 105 so that he himself suffers the woes which he imposed on many. Our prince opened the sea for trade. If any overharsh duties were required of the merchants, he lightened their load. And the long-scorned nobility recovered on our prince's first day the ancient rights 110 of nobles. He now gives to good men the honors and public offices which used to be sold to evil men. By a happy reversal of circumstances, learned men now have the prerogatives which ignoramus carried off in the past. Our prince without delay has restored 115 to the laws their ancient force and dignity (for they had been perverted so as to subvert the realm). And although formerly each rank in the state was changing character completely, now at once every rank is restored. What if, in the hope of being kind to his 120 people, he decided to retract certain provisions of the law which he knew his father had approved? In this he placed, as he should, his country before his father. This preference does not surprise me; what could lie beyond the powers of a prince whose nat-125 ural gifts have been enhanced by a liberal education, a prince bathed by the nine sisters in the Castalian fount and steeped in philosophy's own precepts?
 The whole people used to be, on many counts, in 130 debt to the king, and this in particular was the evil

3 See Statius, Achilles 1.335–37; Ovid, Metamorphoses 13.162–70. 4 See Iliad 22.395–404.

they feared. But our king, though he could have inspired fear in this way and could have gathered from this source immense riches, if he had wished to do so, has forgiven the debts of all, and rendered all secure, removing all the evil of distressing fear. Hence it is that, while other kings have been feared by their subjects, this king is loved, since now through his action they have no cause for fear.

O prince, terror to your proud enemies but not to your own people, it is your enemies who fear you; we revere and love you. Our love for you will prove the reason for their fear. And thus it is that, in the absence of sycophants, your subjects' love and your enemies' fear will hedge you round in peace and safety. As for wars beyond the borders — if the French, for instance, join with the Scots — no one is afraid, provided that England is not divided. And internal strife there will not be, for what cause, what reason, is there to provoke it? Most important, concerning your right and title to the crown, there is no opposition, nor can there be. You, all by yourself, represent both sides of the quarrel which usually arises; the fact that both your parents were high-born disposes of this problem. And anyway the anger of the people, a wicked thing, common source of civil disturbance, is even more remote from you. To all your subjects you are so dear that no man could be dearer to himself. But if perchance wrath were to bring powerful chieftains to war, your nod will promptly put an end to that wrath, such reverence for your sacred majesty have your virtues justly created. And whatever virtues your ancestors had, these are yours too, not excelled in ages past. For you, sire, have your father's wisdom, you have your mother's kindly strength, the devout intelligence of your paternal grandmother, the noble heart of your mother's father. What wonder, then, if England rejoices in a fashion heretofore unknown, since she has such a king as she never had before?

And then there is the fact that this joy, apparently as great as it could be, was increased by your marriage — a marriage which the kindly powers above arranged and in which they planned well for you and yours. In her you have as wife one whom your people have been happy to see sharing your power, one for whom the powers above care so much that they distinguish her and honor her by marriage with you. She it is who could vanquish the ancient Sabine women in devotion, and in dignity the holy, half-divine heroines of Greece.<sup>5</sup> She could equal the unselfish love of Alcestis<sup>6</sup> or, in her unflinching judgment, outdo Tanaquil.<sup>7</sup> In her expression, in her countenance, there is a remarkable beauty uniquely appropriate for one so great and good. The well-spoken Cornelia<sup>8</sup> would yield to her in eloquence; she is like Penelope<sup>9</sup> in loyalty to a husband. This lady, prince, vowed to you for many years, through a long time of waiting remained alone for love of you. Neither her own sister nor her native land could win her from her way; neither her mother nor her father could dissuade her. It was you, none other, whom she preferred to her mother, sister, native land, and beloved father. This blessed lady has joined in lasting alliance two nations, each of them powerful. She is descended from great kings, to be sure; and she will be the mother of kings as great as her ancestors. Until now one anchor has protected your ship of state — a strong one, yet only one. But your queen, fruitful in male offspring, will render it on all sides stable and everlasting. Great advantage is yours because of her, and similarly is hers because of you. There has been no other woman, surely, worthy to have you as husband, nor any other man worthy to have her as wife.

England! bring incense, and an offering more potent than all incense — loyal hearts and innocent hands, that heaven, as it has made this marriage, may bless it, that the scepter may be swayed with the help of heaven that gave it, and that these crowns may long be worn by these two, and may at length be worn by their son's son and their descendants thereafter.

20

ON A SUDDEN RAIN-STORM WHICH FORMED DURING THE ROYAL PROCESSION BUT NEITHER OBSCURED THE SUN NOR LASTED LONG, BY THOMAS MORE

While the king and queen, in as beautiful a procession as there ever was, made their way to receive their sacred crowns, a golden sun shone all around, and the day, like the hearts of the people, was

<sup>5</sup> The Sabine women ended the war between the Sabines and the Romans. See Livy 1.13.1–4. <sup>6</sup> Best known from Euripides's Alcestis, she chose to die in the place of her husband. <sup>7</sup> Through her sagacity and foresight, Tanaquil helped her husband Tarquinius Priscus become the king of Rome. See Livy 1.34, 1.39.

<sup>8</sup> Cicero admired the letters of Cornelia, mother of the two Gracchi. See Brutus 58.211. <sup>9</sup> See Ovid, Tristia 5.14.35–36, for praise of Penelope's loyalty.

cheerful. But as soon as the great procession reached 10 midtown, the whole procession was drenched with rain. No cloud, however, obscured the sun's light, and the storm itself lingered only a very short time.
 It was a lucky relief from the heat; whether one re-15 gards the phenomenon itself, or the omen, it could not have been better. To our rulers, days of abundance are promised by Phoebus with his sunshine and by Jove's wife with her rains.

21

TO THE KING, BY THOMAS MORE

Plato foretold that everything which any particular time can produce had often existed and would often exist again some time in the future.<sup>10</sup> "As spring 5 is banished and returns with the swift passage of the year, as winter at regular intervals returns as it was before, just so,"<sup>11</sup> he said, "after many revolutions of the speeding sky all things in countless alternations will be again." The golden age came first, 10 then the silver; after that the bronze, and recently the iron age. In your reign, sire, the golden age has returned. Ah, that Plato should be able to foresee as far as this!

22

TO THE KING ON THE TOURNAMENT

HELD BY HIM, AN IAMBIC EPODE

BY THOMAS MORE

All the tournaments kings have held until now 5 have been marked by some sad mishap or by disaster thrust among the festivities by ill luck. Sometimes the ground has been drenched with the life-blood of a stricken knight; sometimes commoners have been struck by lances or have been trampled by 10 the pounding hoofs of the maddened steeds; sometimes a scaffolding has collapsed and crushed the wretched spectators. But this tournament of yours, sire, the most beautiful we have ever seen, is disfigured by no misfortune; rather it is conspicuous for 15 such freedom from trouble as is appropriate to your character.

23

ON TWO ROSES WHICH BECAME ONE<sup>12</sup>

BY THOMAS MORE

A white rose grew near a red one, and in their struggle to demonstrate superiority each crowded the other. But both roses are combined to become one 5 flower, and the contest ends the only way it can.
 Now only one rosebush grows and buds, but this one has all the qualities of both. In other words, this one rose has the beauty, grace, loveliness, color, and strength which used to belong to both. Therefore, 10 if anyone loved either one of these roses, let him love this one in which is found whatever he loved.
 But if anyone is so fierce that he will not love this rose, then he will fear it, for this flower has its own thorns, too. 15

24

ON AN IGNORANT RHETORICIAN,

FROM THE GREEK

I presented the rhetorician Flaccus with five sole-cisms; promptly he repaid me with fifty. Said he, "Be content now to have these few, reckoned by num-5 ber; you will receive them by the bushel when I get back from Cyprus."

25

ON SUSPICION, FROM THE GREEK

The impression one creates has great influence, great weight, in the affairs of men. You have no desire to do any harm; but, if you seem to have, you are done for. Thus in Crotona they killed Philolaus 5 long ago in the mistaken belief that he wanted to play the tyrant.

26

ON A SKILFULLY MADE PICTURE

OF A SPEECHLESS RHETORICIAN,

FROM THE GREEK

Sextus himself is silent; the picture of Sextus exercises his art. The picture itself is the rhetorician; by 5 means of the picture the rhetorician has become a picture.

<sup>10</sup> Although Plato does not directly propose a doctrine of eternal recurrence, he does discuss political cycles in Republic 8.3, 546a–47c. <sup>11</sup> See Horace, Carmina

4.7.9–12. <sup>12</sup> The Wars of the Roses (1455–85), between the Houses of Lancaster and York, ended when Henry VII took the throne. Henry VIII adopted the Tudor Rose, which united the red and white, because his father was Lancastrian and his mother Yorkist.

27

ON TWO BEGGARS, ONE LAME, ONE BLIND
A blind neighbor carries a lame man about; by a skilful combination he borrows eyes and lends feet.

28

ANOTHER VERSION

A blind man carries a lame man around. They manage the situation with skill; the latter lends his eyes, the former his feet.

29

ANOTHER VERSION

A blind man carries a lame man; and so, by a combined effort, one borrows eyes, the other feet.

30

ANOTHER VERSION

A blind man carries a lame man, a heavy but a useful load: he looks ahead and with his eyes he guides the other's feet.

31

THE SAME TOPIC AT GREATER LENGTH

Very sad misfortune overtook two unhappy men and cruelly deprived the one of his eyes, the other of his feet. Their common misery united them. The lame man rides upon the other. Thus by cooperation they mitigate each other's handicaps. The lame man goes anywhere with the help of the other's feet, the blind man travels a path determined by the other's eyes.

32

ANOTHER VERSION OF THE SAME TOPIC

There can be nothing more helpful than a loyal friend, who by his own efforts assuages your hurts.
Two beggars formed an alliance<sup>13</sup> of firm friendship—a blind man and a lame one. The blind man said to the lame one, “You must ride upon my shoulders.” The latter answered, “You, blind friend, must find your way by means of my eyes.” The love which unites shuns the castles of proud kings and prevails in the humble hut.

33

ANOTHER VERSION

A blind man made with a lame man a mutually helpful arrangement<sup>14</sup> by which the one carried his partner on his shoulders and the other by his own eyes directed his partner's feet.

34

A PINE TREE BLOWN DOWN BY THE WIND AND DESTINED FOR SERVICE
AT SEA SPEAKS, FROM THE GREEK

I am a pine tree, easy victim of the winds. And so why, stupid man, are you making me into a ship to roam the seas? Aren't you afraid of the omen? If Boreas<sup>15</sup> hunts me down on land, how will I escape him at sea?

35

ANOTHER VERSION OF THE SAME TOPIC

Why am I, a pine tree laid low by the winds, being sent to sea? I was shipwrecked before I was afloat.

36

ON A SHIP WHICH BURNED UP

A cargo ship had escaped the waves of the sea, but perished on the bosom of her mother, the land. She caught fire, and, as she burned, she wished for help from that which she had escaped—the hostile waters of the sea.

37

COMMENTS OF A RABBIT WHICH,
AFTER ELUDING A WEASEL,
FELL INTO NETS SPREAD BY HUNTERS

The weasel I did escape by darting through an opening off to one side, but—alas for me, miserable creature—then I rushed into the hunting nets of men. Now I cannot save my life or win quick death.
They are saving me, alas, only to throw me to the ravaging hounds. Now, while the hounds tear my flesh to pieces with their wicked teeth, a man looks on and smiles at the bloodshed. Insensate breed, more savage than any beast, to find cruel amusement in bitter slaughter!

<sup>13</sup> formed an alliance: “foedera contraxere” is a legal phrase commonly used in formal treaties or alliances. See Utopia, especially the section on “Treaties” [De foederibus] on p. 198. <sup>14</sup> The Latin is lege paciscitur aequa. This sequence begins with terms of barter in Epigrams 27–29 and ends with terms of law in Epigrams 32–33. <sup>15</sup> the north wind

38

INNOCENCE INVITES INJURY,
FROM THE GREEK

“Even a mouse will dare to bite an evil man,” the old proverb says, but the fact of the matter is utterly different. It is the harmless folk whom even the mouse dares to bite. To touch a criminal even a serpent is afraid.

39

ON BREAKING WIND, FROM THE GREEK

A fart, if you keep it too long in your belly, kills you; on the other hand, it can save your life if it is promptly let out. If a fart can save or destroy you, then is it not as powerful as dreaded kings?

40

ON EQUALITY IN DEATH,
FROM THE GREEK

Though you conquer the world even to the pillars of Hercules,<sup>16</sup> still the amount of earth which ultimately will be yours is the same as any man’s. You will die as Irus’s<sup>17</sup> equal, not a penny richer; and your land (yours no longer) will consume you.

41

ON A MEAN MAN, FROM THE GREEK

Everyone calls you rich; I say you are downright poor, for use makes wealth, Apollophanes, witness as you are. If you use what you have, it is yours; but if you save it for your heir, then you are even now giving it away.

42

THE HUNTING OF A SPIDER

A lurking spider caught a stray fly and entangled it, to its terror, in a sticky web. The spider’s mouth was open for a bite; but, as the old proverb says, much can happen between the mouth and the morsel. Fate, taking pity on the fly and opposing the spider, allotted destruction not to the victim but to the aggressor. Now you, starling, in hungry haste attack both creatures. The web collapses, the fly escapes, the spider perishes. Thus for the wretch under the very blade of the axe there is often some hope, and for the evildoer, even among a thousand armed guards, there is reason to fear.

43

ON A CYNIC WHO PRACTICED RESTRAINT
IN FOOLISH FASHION, FROM THE GREEK

At a dinner we observed the great wisdom of an unshaven Cynic who wandered about with his poor man’s staff. Now this Cynic began by refusing radishes and pulse, lest— he said— his virtue become his belly’s slave. But when he had glimpsed a snow-white onion, he shed his character of unyielding wisdom, asked for it, and with unexpected relish gobbled it all up. “Onions,” he said, “do virtue no harm.”

44

PHYSICIAN’S EPITAPH, FROM THE GREEK

Hippocrates, of Coan descent, who lived in Thessaly and belonged to immortal Phoebus’s line, reposes in this urn. Often he routed disease by the force of his healing art. Great glory was his, not because of his luck, but because of his skill.

45

ON A DEAD SLAVE, FROM THE GREEK

While he lived, this man was a slave. But now, in death, he wields no less power than you, mighty Darius.

46

ON A DEAD SERVING-WOMAN

Before Sosima was a slave only in body. Now even that part of her has been freed by death.

47

ON A BELOVED FISHERMAN,
FROM THE GREEK

While a fisherman was catching fish, the daughter of a rich man saw him and fell violently in love with him. Then she was married to the man. Thus in place of a life of poverty he acquired great store of proud wealth. Venus said, “This is my doing.” Mistress Fortune, throwing back these words, replied, “It is my doing.”

48

ON A MAN WHOSE FORTUNE CHANGED
SUDDENLY FROM BAD TO GOOD,
FROM THE GREEK

It is not because Fortune loves you that she has 5 raised you so high. She merely wishes to demonstrate even in your case how great is her power.

49

ON AVOIDING EXTREMES,
FROM THE GREEK

Pity is worse than envy, Pindar says.<sup>18</sup> The successful man's luxurious life causes envy, but we pity those 5 who are exceedingly unfortunate. May the powers above grant that I be neither too successful nor an object of pity. Obviously, the life that lies between is far preferable to either of the extremes. What is at the bottom is trodden upon; what is at the top, 10 falls suddenly.

50

THAT THERE IS NO POINT IN WORRYING ABOUT FUTURE TROUBLES,
FROM THE GREEK

Fools that we are, why do we permit—our folly lies 5 in permitting—fear unmastered to sear our hearts?
Either the trouble is not going to come, in which case we suffer now from needless fear, or if it is going to come, we are making fear itself a further trouble.

51

ONE LINE IN PRAISE OF HOMER'S POEM,
FROM THE GREEK

It was I who composed the poem, but divine Homer wrote it out.

52

ON A COMICAL TRIAL, FROM THE GREEK

A case was being tried. The defendant was deaf, the plaintiff was deaf, and the judge himself was deafer than either. The plaintiff demanded five months' 5 rent for a house. The defendant replied, "My mill was running all night." The judge looked up at them and said, "What is your quarrel? She is the mother of both of you, isn't she? Both of you, support her."

53

TO A LAMP BURNING AT NIGHT

Thrice my mistress swore by you, lamp, that she would return. She has not come. Mete out your punishment, if you are a god. Some night when she finds you pleasant for her dalliance, go out and de-5 prive her cursed eyes of your blessed light.

54

LAIS, AS AN OLD WOMAN, AT HER MIRROR,
FROM THE GREEK

I am Laïs, who not long ago laughed wantonly at you, Greece, when I had at my doors a throng of 5 youthful lovers. But now I dedicate to Venus this mirror, for the woman I am I do not wish to see, the woman I was I cannot.

55

ON THE DAY OF DEATH, UNKNOWN TO ALL MEN

The dead I do not mourn; I mourn the living, vexed by the lasting fear of death still to come.

56

ANOTHER VERSION

You would be weeping if you knew you had one month to live; you laugh, although you may not have a day.

57

ON THE DILIGENCE OF BEES,
FROM THE GREEK

The bees themselves make their own streams of honey in the air, make the chambers where they 5 dwell. The bee is generous to men, and its fruit is most accessible to the life of men. There is no need for the help of ox or hooked reaping knife. All that is needed here is a jar into which it pours generously sweet cups of honey from its little vessel. Holy creatures, go your way happily; feed upon the variegated
10 flowers, you winged makers of ethereal nectar.

58

ON AN OLD WOMAN WHO USES DYE IN VAIN

You keep dyeing your hair, but you will never dye old age or smooth the wrinkles of your cheeks. Now 5 stop sprinkling your whole face with powder, lest you end up with a mask, not a face. Since you will get nowhere with paint and powder, madwoman, what are you about? These devices will never make a Helen of a Hecuba.<sup>19</sup>

59

ON THE BIRTH OF MEN, FROM THE GREEK

Look here, mortal, if you recall what your father did in engendering you, then pride will vanish from your spirit. Plato, on the other hand, in his dream, puffs you up with vain pride and says your seed is everlasting and celestial.<sup>20</sup> Observe, you are fashioned of mire. What reason have you for high aspirations? But that is what one will say who decks you out in a lofty fiction. Rather, if you want to hear the truth, you were born of coition amid shameful lust and of a pitiful droplet.

60

ON A FOOLISH ASTROLOGER

The prophetess of Cumae in the grip of her sacred frenzy does not with her inspired vision see more clearly the events to come than my astrologer, famous in the art of soothsaying, foresees, after a look at the stars, the events of the past.

61

ANOTHER ON AN ASTROLOGER
WHOSE WIFE WAS LEWD

All the stars explain themselves to you, the prophet of the skies, and inform you of the destiny of everyone. But the fact that your wife gives herself to everyone — of that fact the stars, though they see everything, have not informed you.

62

IAMBICS ON THE SAME MAN

Observer of the stars above, beloved of us heavenly bodies, I myself, Phoebus,<sup>21</sup> would be very glad now to tell you a little secret, most emphatically your concern, which I learned as I passed over the world the day before you came home recently from court. But Venus frightens me off and threatens me with a new love affair that will be no more successful than my earlier one with Daphne if I report to anyone at all such information as I once reported to her husband about her. Therefore, this fact you will not learn. Of all other changes in fortune I shall keep you informed, but as concerns your wife, if anything turns up contrary to your wishes, the whole world will know it before you do.

63

ANOTHER VERSION ON THE SAME MAN

Foolish fellow, why do you search the stars for the character of your wife? Your wife is on the ground. Why do you peer on high? What you are fearful about is down here. While you are asking the heavens what she is doing, she meanwhile managed to do what she liked upon the ground.

64

ANOTHER VERSION ON THE SAME ASTROLOGER

Why, madman, are you always searching among the stars, with suspicious mind, to discover what your wife is up to? If you do not know what kind of wife you have, believe that she is chaste. If you persuade yourself thoroughly that she is, you are well off. Why do you seek to learn what does not hurt you until you learn it? Why do you seek to make yourself miserable by your own persistence? This is madness, and no doubt of it, since you can stop right now anxiously seeking what you fear to find.

65

ANOTHER VERSION ON THE ASTROLOGER

Saturn is far away and long since blind, they say; unable he is to distinguish at close range between a boy and a stone.<sup>22</sup> The lovely moon, as she journeys, is too shy to look and, maiden that she is, can see only the chaste. Jupiter is busy with Europa, Venus with Mars, Mars with Venus, the Sun with Daphne, and Mercury with Hyrce.<sup>23</sup> That is why, astrologer, when your wife takes lovers, the stars give you no hint of the matter.

66

THE DILEMMA OF BEAUTY, IN SCAZONS<sup>24</sup>

I do not know, by Hercules, what beauty contributes. If you are passionately in love, then presto!

<sup>19</sup> Hecuba was King Priam of Troy's aged wife, while Helen was "the face that launched a thousand ships" when she ran away with Paris. <sup>20</sup> See Plato, Timaeus

90a. <sup>21</sup> Apollo, the sun god. <sup>22</sup> See Hesiod, Theogony 485–91. <sup>23</sup> See Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.452–567, 2.708–51, 2.846–75, 4.171–89. <sup>24</sup> a modification of the iambic tetrameter, in which a spondee or trochee takes the place of the final iambus

the ugly woman is beautiful; if you are unmoved, 5 then even the beautiful woman may be repulsive. I do not know, by Hercules, what beauty contributes.

67

ON THE ASTROLOGER MENTIONED ABOVE Candidus — what a prophet he is — after examining the stars, proclaimed his wife's goodness to everyone. When his wife left him for a lover, the prophet 5 took another look at the stars and predicted her badness to everyone.

68

EXHORTATION TO TRUE VIRTUE
 Alas, whatever in this miserable world attracts miserable man withers at once and dies like the spring rose. Fortune has never yet taken anyone into her 5 comforting arms without squeezing him uncomfortably somewhere. Drink in the virtues; abstain from vain joys. True joys are the companions of the noble spirit.

69

ON SCORNING THIS LIFE
 As every wind strikes and bends ears of grain, so hope and grief and wrath and fear drive us where they will. In the affairs of mortals nothing has real 5 weight. You should be ashamed if you are moved by a light touch.

70

THAT ONE OUGHT NOT TO FEAR DEATH
 SINCE IT IS THE END OF SUFFERING,
 FROM THE GREEK
 Is it not stupid to fear death, which is the mother of 5 peace? which banishes disease and dismal poverty?
 Death alone visits miserable mortals only once;
 there is none to whom death has come a second time. But other afflictions, many and varied, take their turns, attacking now this victim and now that, 10 time and time again.

71

ON A CERTAIN MEAN AND STINGY BISHOP
 If I were to live as long as the Sibyl, I should never forget the kindness of the bishop. He is proprietor of many acres of rented land, possesses large cities, and travels with a retinue of a hundred attendants. 5

 And yet, when recently I approached him, although I am a man of very small property, still he received me and addressed me in really agreeable fashion. As a matter of fact, in order that I might taste a cup of his port before leaving, he himself extracted his key 10 from his own purse.

72

ON FICKLE FORTUNE, FROM THE GREEK Slippery Fortune observes no definite method but continually, unseeing, turns her restless wheel. She delights to strike down the highest, to raise the lowest, and, without principle, to produce alternations 5 of man's lot. When your prosperity is greatest, then trouble is closest at hand; contrariwise, when your troubles are at their height, prosperity is nearest.
 Endure your troubles with brave heart; do not by grieving be twice unhappy lest you hurry yourself 10 into the grave just before prosperity comes.

73

LIFE IS SHORT
 Is it not madness for you to count upon an active old age? — since not even an hour of life is guaranteed. Come, imagine you will live to be as old as Nestor<sup>25</sup> — then your long life will teem with num- 5 erous woes. Though you outlive all the troubles of your vigorous years, bent old age will bring you lasting wearisome burdens. And even so, though you live untroubled (as never happens) to a ripe old age, this too is a trifle. Where are Nestor's many years 10 now? Of a life so long there remains not a single day.

74

ENDURANCE Sufferer, endure; Chance will end your sorrow. And what Chance does not do for you Death will do.

75

LIFE ITSELF IS A JOURNEY TOWARD DEATH
 We waste our time and think that death is far, far away. But it lies hidden deep in our entrails. In fact, from the very hour of our birth, life and death steal forward together, step by step. An hour, in the pro- 5 cess of measuring itself out, secretly steals that very measure from your life. Little by little we die, but in a single instant we cease to exist; thus a lamp goes out when its oil is gone. Even when it does not kill, 10 death is present in time itself. Why, even now, while we are talking, we are dying.

<sup>25</sup> the oldest of the Achaean kings in Homer's Iliad and Odyssey

76

THE GREEDY RICH MAN IS POOR
FOR HIMSELF, FROM THE GREEK

The only true riches, in my judgment, are those of the mind which values itself above its possessions.
5 The man we rightly call rich, the man we rightly call wealthy is one who sees how to use his great wealth.
But if anyone is always wretchedly heaping up riches, wretchedly consumed by the need to count money, this man toils like the bee in its little many-10 celled hive. Others eat the honey.

77

THE DILEMMA OF EPICURUS

Let no trouble drive you to misery. If the trouble is lasting, it is easy to bear; if it is hard to bear, it does not last long.

78

THE OPPOSITE OPINION

Alas, both kinds of sorrow drive us to misery and break our hearts: a long sorrow is never light and a heavy sorrow is never brief.

79

ON DEATH

He is dreaming who thinks that in this life he is rich; and when death wakes him up, he sees at once how poor he is.

80

DEATH UNASSISTED KILLS TYRANTS

You who have been cruelly persecuted at the hands of unjust men, no matter who you are, take hope.
Let kindly hope alleviate your sufferings. A turn of 5 fortune will improve your state—like the sun shining through scattered clouds—or the defender of liberty. Death, touched by pity, will put forth her hand, while the tyrant rages, and rescue you. Death will snatch him away too (the more to please you) 10 and will lay him right before your feet. He who was so carried away by his great wealth and his empty pride, he who once upon a time amid his thronging courtiers was so bold, O, he will not be fierce, will not wear an expression of pride. He will be an object of pity, cast down from his high place, abandoned, 15 helpless, penniless. What gift has life ever given you to compare with this gift? The tables are turned: the man once so fearsome deserves only a laugh.

81

A POEM TRANSLATED FROM AN ENGLISH SONG

Break, sad heart, pitiably engulfed in deepest woe.
Let this be the end of your punishment. Show your mistress your bloody wounds. It is she only who will 5 presently part us two. Alas, how long shall I in my misery thus weep and complain? Come, dreaded death, and release me from such monstrous woes.

82

A JESTING POEM TO A FAITHLESS MISTRESS, TRANSLATED FROM AN ENGLISH SONG

May the gods preserve us! What dreams I had last night! The whole universe was overturned and fell 5 to ruin. The sun's light did not survive, nor the moon's; and the swollen deep overwhelmed the land. Even more remarkable—you hear?—a voice seemed to say, "Just look, your mistress has broken the promise she made." 10

83

ON A RABBIT TWICE CAUGHT

They were lifting me out of the net; out of their hands I slipped—back into the net again. Alas, alas, poor me! Escaping once only means captured twice.

84

ON A MAID WITH UNMAIDENLY HABITS

If this maid, who is a seductive, wanton, saucy, footloose, talkative flirt, is a maiden, then so is a woman who has twice borne children.

85

ON WIVES

This is what every man says: "Nature has not produced anything in this life more troublesome, more burdensome, to man than these wives of ours." That 5 is what he says; but still he marries. Yes, when his sixth wife dies, he marries a seventh.

86

ON THE SAME

A wife is a burden, but she could be useful — if she dies betimes<sup>26</sup> and leaves you all she owns.

87

ON A POOR PORTRAIT, FROM THE GREEK

This painting of you which Diodorus recently painted, Menodotus, is anyone's portrait rather than yours.

88

ON THE SAME PORTRAIT

In that portrait of you it is himself the painter has revealed, and so thoroughly that it resembles nobody as little as it resembles you.

89

CHORIAMBICS ON THE PLEASANT LIFE, FROM THE GREEK

I care nothing about Gyges, king of Sardis. My search is not for gold; I do not make myself miserable by competing with kings. My ambition is to have my beard well anointed with agreeable perfumes, my brow wreathed with fragrant blossoms. I am concerned with today, for who can know tomorrow? Now, Vulcan, make me a well-rounded silver cup, make it deep and as inexhaustible as you can. And have it decorated round about, not with chariots, constellations, or doleful Orion<sup>27</sup> — instead make green vines and grapes to charm me, and add a handsome figure of Dionysus.

90

ON A DISHONEST PHYSICIAN WHO SOLD A MERE DROP OF PRETENDED MEDICINE FOR A HIGH PRICE

A physician said to a patient who was suffering from a fever, "If anything will help you, balm will. But only I have it, and I have very little. The price is not less than ten pounds a drop. You give me five now, and the other five when you are well, with the understanding that if you die I shall never try to collect the second five. You will win no advantage in this great crisis if you try to settle for half of the very expensive drop." They agreed, and a drop from a tiny linen-wrapped vial was dropped from a dagger-point into wine. The patient asked the physician to rinse off the point in the wine. But he said, "By no means; the point still holds twice the value of your ten pounds. One drop is enough." And it was enough. Just one drop did it. The patient had hardly drunk the single drop when he died. O, what a very unlucky arrangement! One participant lost half his drop, the other half his life.

91

ON A WOMAN ARTIFICIALLY BEAUTIFIED,
FROM THE GREEK

Madam, you dye your hair; but you ask, "How do you know?" Well, your hair was black when you brought it home from the marketplace.

92

ON A FAULTY PORTRAIT

In this portrait of yours the artist tried to show how unlike you he could make it.

93

ON AN ACCURATE PORTRAIT

Your likeness is so truly portrayed in this picture that it is not your picture, but your mirror.

94

ON THE SAME PORTRAIT

I marvel at the great skill with which the artist painted the portrait of you which you showed me, Posthumus. If anyone who has ever seen you looks at this picture, unless he is prejudiced by envy of the artist, he will confess that the similarity between one egg and another is not so great as the discrepancy between you and your portrait.

95

ON AN ENGLISHMAN WHO AFFECTED TO SPEAK FRENCH

My friend and companion, Lalus,<sup>28</sup> was born in Britain and brought up on our island. Nevertheless, although a mighty sea, their languages, and their customs separate Englishmen and the inhabitants of France, Lalus still is scornful of all things English. All things French he admires and wants. He struts about in French dress; he is very fond of little French capes. He is happy with his belt, his

<sup>26</sup> early <sup>27</sup> Vulcan... Orion: an allusion to Achilles' shield, forged by Hephaestus

in Homer's Iliad 18.480–89 <sup>28</sup> "Lalus" suggests λάλος, "talkative, babbling."

15 purse, his sword—if they are French; with his hat, his beret, his cap—if they are French. He delights in French shoes, French underclothes, and, to put it briefly, in an outfit French from head to toe. Why, he even has one servant, and he is a Frenchman. But France herself, I think, could not, if she tried, treat him in more French a fashion: he pays the servant nothing, like a Frenchman; he clothes him in worn-20 out rags, in the French manner; he feeds him little and that little poor, as the French do; he works him hard, like the French; he strikes him often, like a Frenchman; at social gatherings, and on the street, and in the market-place, and in public he quarrels 25 with him and abuses him always in the French fashion. What! Have I said that he does this in French fashion? I should say rather in half-French fashion.
 For, unless I am mistaken, he is as familiar with the French language in general as a parrot is with Latin.
 Still he swells with pride and is, naturally, pleased 30 with himself if he gets off three words in French. If there is anything he cannot say in French, then he tries to say it—granted the words are not French—at least with a French accent, with open palate, a shrill sort of sound, effeminate, like women’s chat-35 ter, but lisping prettily you may be sure, as though his mouth were full of beans, and pronouncing with emphasis the letters which the foolish French avoid as the cock avoids the fox or the sailor the cliffs.
 And so it is with this kind of French accent that 40 he speaks Latin, English, Italian, Spanish, German, and every language except only French; for French is the one language he speaks with an English accent. But if any native of Britain in this haughty way scorns his native land in an apelike effort to 45 feign and counterfeit the follies of the French, I think that such a man is intoxicated from drinking of the River Gallus. Therefore, since he is trying to change from Englishman to Frenchman, order him, ye gods, to change from cock to capon.

96

ON NICOLAUS, A WICKED PHYSICIAN

Now I understand that names not only of things but also of people are acquired in no haphazard way but with some reason. There is a physician named 5 Nicolaus. You say, “In what way is that appropriate?
 It would make a better name for a general.” Well, it is by arms that a general conquers nations, but by his poisonous potions this physician lays low the nation and brave generals on every hand. A general’s enemies often fight a second battle with him, but 10 no one encounters this physician twice. He is truly named, is Nicolaus.<sup>29</sup>

97

ON THE HANDSOME PORTRAIT OF A VERY UGLY MAN

That picture of you which I saw recently was, in my opinion, superior to the Venus of Apelles.<sup>30</sup> The painter used up all his skill in that one picture; he 5 wanted to show in that one picture what he could do. What beauty of face! that nose! such lips! what eyes! such color everywhere! Just as surely as the picture was in every respect by far the most beautiful of portraits, so surely did it fail to look like you 10 in any respect.

98

ON AN UNSUCCESSFUL PORTRAIT

When I happened recently to enter an artist’s studio, your portrait met my eyes. While the painter thus reproduced all your characteristics, you, I am sure, kept your expression unchanged for a long 5 time. A look at the portrait brought you so completely before me that I knew whose portrait it was the instant the artist told me it was yours.

99

ON A DYING MISER

Alas, rich Chrysalus is dying. He mourns; he groans;
 no one ever died more reluctantly. He is mourning not because he is parting with his life—there is noth-5 ing he holds cheaper than himself—but because he is parting with four coins for a grave.

100

ON A ROTTEN GRAMMARIAN

When I think of the grammarian Heliodorus, my tongue immediately begins to dread solecisms.

101

ON A SILLY SEER

A renowned astrologer predicted, “That noble ruler, the king of the French, this year will be at peace in his realm.” The year had hardly begun when the 5 king died. The seer was defenseless. Someone undertook jokingly to explain the matter by saying,

<sup>29</sup> Nicolaus is derived from the Greek νίκη, “victory,” and λαός, “people.”

<sup>30</sup> famous painter of ancient Greece (ca. 4th century BC)

 “The prophecy is true; is not the king at peace?”
 The story spread and spread; and the people on every hand laughingly said, “Is not the king at peace?” 10 When the seer heard this comment from the people, then he said in earnest, “The prophecy is true; is not the king at peace?”

102

ON A MAN WITH A HUGE NOSE,
 FROM THE GREEK

Proclus, you could never wipe your nose by hand, for your hand, large as it is, is smaller than your 5 nose. When do you cry “Jupiter” upon sneezing?
 For obviously you do not hear anything, since your nose extends out so very far away from your ears.

103

ON A MAD POET, FROM THE GREEK

Even among the Muses there are Furies, and it is they who make you the poet you are and inspire you to write many poems without thought. Come now, 5 I entreat you, write ever so many poems, for I find no greater fury to entreat for you than that.

104

ON A TINY MAN, FROM THE GREEK

To be safe, stay well within the city if you are wise, so that no crane — they love the blood of pygmies<sup>31</sup> — may grab you.

105

COMMON GOSSIP OUGHT TO BE IGNORED, FROM THE GREEK

Just please yourself and scorn the comments of the chattering mob. One among them will praise, an-5 other defame you.

106

ON A FOOL, FROM THE GREEK

When the fleas bite Morio, he puts out his light and says, “These fleas will not see me now.”

107

ON SLEEP, FROM THE GREEK,
 AN ARISTOTELIAN PROVERB

Almost half of life is sleep. During that period the rich and the poor lie equal. And so, Croesus, wealthiest of kings, for almost half a lifetime Irus
 5 the beggar was your equal.

108

ANOTHER VERSION

While you are sleeping and do not perceive that you are alive, you are not happy; but if sleep does not come, you are miserable. And so any happy man, proud of his good luck, haughty, and swollen by 5 fleeting prosperity, must, every night, either cease to be happy or begin to be miserable.

109

THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN A TYRANT AND A KING<sup>32</sup>

A king who respects the law differs from cruel tyrants thus: a tyrant rules his subjects as slaves; a king thinks of his as his own children.<sup>33</sup> 5

110

THAT THE TYRANT’S LIFE IS TROUBLED

Great anxiety wears away the waking hours of the mighty tyrant; peace comes at night if it comes at all. But the tyrant does not rest more comfortably on any soft bed than the poor man does on the hard 5 ground. Therefore, tyrant, the happiest part of your life is that in which you willingly become no better than a beggar.

<sup>31</sup> See Iliad 3.2–7. <sup>32</sup> The Latin term used here is princeps. Etymologically, it means “capturing first [place],” from primus and -ceps, a form of capio. Here and in Epigrams 111 and 115, a general definition is suggested. For its importance in Utopia, see n. 1 on p. 156. When Erasmus writes his

Education of a Christian Prince in 1516, he defines the princeps in Ciceronian terms as the “embodiment of the laws,” ideally selected by the vote of a free and willing people. The custom of having a princeps “born to the office, not elected,” Erasmus comments, “was the custom among some barbarian peoples in the past (according to Aristotle) and is also the practice almost everywhere in our own time” (CWE 27: 206). <sup>33</sup> The term for “children” is liberos, which also means “freemen.”

111

THAT THE GOOD KING IS A FATHER
NOT A MASTER, IAMBICS

A devoted king<sup>34</sup> will never lack children;<sup>35</sup> he is father to the whole kingdom. And so it is that a true king is abundantly blessed in having as many children as he has citizens.

112

ON THE GOOD KING AND HIS PEOPLE

A kingdom in all its parts is like a man; it is held together by natural affection. The king is the head; the people form the other parts. Every citizen the king has he considers a part of his own body (that is why he grieves at the loss of a single one). The people risk themselves to save the king and everyone thinks of him as the head of his own body.

113

THAT OUR ADVANTAGES ARE RECOGNIZED
ONLY WHEN THEY VANISH

Almost all of us recognize our advantages by losing them. While we have them, we ignore them. In this way, also, an evil successor frequently, but too late, enhances the people's memory of a good ruler.

114

THAT THE TYRANT WHILE HE SLEEPS IS NO DIFFERENT FROM THE COMMONER

Well then, you madman, it is pride which makes you carry your head so high — because the throng bows to you on bended knee, because the people rise and uncover for you, because you have in your power the life and death of many. But whenever sleep secures your body in inactivity, then, tell me, where is this glory of yours? Then you lie, useless creature, like a lifeless log or like a recent corpse. But if you were not lying protected, like a coward, unseen indoors, your own life would be at the disposal of any man.

115

ON KINGS,<sup>36</sup> GOOD AND BAD

What is a good king? He is a watchdog, guardian of the flock, who by barking keeps the wolves from the sheep. What is the bad king? He is the wolf.

116

ON A RAPIST AND HIS LAWYER

A girl charged that she had been raped. There was no denying the accusation. The rapist was doomed. But his clever lawyer suddenly opened the defendant's clothing and took out his male organ. Said the lawyer, "My girl, is this the organ that was in your belly?" The girl was so ashamed that she said, "No." The lawyer cried, "Your honor, we have won this case. She is the one, she herself denies the very thing in the absence of which she also denies she was raped."

117

ON A THIEF AND HIS LAWYER

While Snatch was afraid that he would be convicted of theft, he consulted a lawyer — at a considerable price. When the lawyer had pondered, frequently and long, his mighty tomes, he said, "Snatch, you will get off, I hope, if you take off."

118

ON AN ASTROLOGER WHO PROPHESED
AFTER THE EVENT, FROM THE GREEK

Astrologers frequently and unanimously told father that his brother was bound to survive him. Now, only Hermoclidides said the brother would die first, but he said it after seeing that he was dead.

119

ON THE VANITY OF THIS LIFE

We are all shut up in the prison of this world under sentence of death. In this prison none escapes death. The land within the prison is divided into many sections, and men build their dwellings in different sections. As if the prison were a kingdom, the inmates struggle for position. The avaricious man hoards up wealth within the dark prison. One man wanders freely in the prison, another lies shackled in his cave; this man serves, that one rules; this one sings, that one groans. And then, while we are still in love with the prison as if it were no prison, we are escorted out of it, one way or another, by death.

<sup>34</sup> The Latin phrase is actually pius princeps, reminiscent of Vergil's famous hero pius Aeneas. <sup>35</sup> Here More again plans on the dual meaning of liberos:

"children" and "freemen." <sup>36</sup> Here and in the first sentence, More uses princeps.

120

A KING IS PROTECTED, NOT BY A CORPS OF GUARDS, BUT BY HIS OWN GOOD QUALITIES

Not fear (accompanied by hatred), not towering 5 palaces, not wealth wrung from a plundered people protects a king. The stern bodyguard, hired for a pittance, offers no protection, for the guard will serve a new master as he served the old. He will be safe who so rules his people that they judge none 10 other would promote their interests better.

121

THE CONSENT OF THE PEOPLE
BOTH BESTOWS AND WITHDRAWS SOVEREIGNTY

Any one man who has command of many men
5 owes his authority to those whom he commands;
he ought to have command not one instant longer than his subjects wish. Why are impotent kings<sup>37</sup> so proud? Because they rule merely on sufferance?<sup>38</sup>

122

ON A TINY MAN, FROM THE GREEK

Epicurus constructed the whole world out of atoms, Alchimus, since he believed that there was nothing smaller than atoms. If you, Diophantus, 5 had been alive at that time, he would have made the world out of you, for surely you, Diophantus, are much smaller than an atom. Or perhaps in that case he would have taught that everything else is made of atoms, but that the atoms themselves are made 10 out of you.

123

ON LOVE, CHASTE AND UNCHASTE,
FROM THE GREEK

These two conflicting emotions, one sinful and one ennobling, lust on one side and modesty on the 5 other, brought death to two people. A consuming passion for Hippolytus destroyed Phaedra; and as for Hippolytus, alas, his holy chastity killed him.<sup>39</sup>

124

ON THE CITY OF ROME, FROM THE GREEK Hail, Hector, descendant of Mars; if you can hear at all beneath the earth, breathe again and take pride in the name of your native land. A city of Ilium lives, inhabited now by a glorious race—a race 5 less powerful in battle than you, but still beloved of Mars. The Myrmidons have perished. Come, Hector, and tell Achilles that all Thessaly is subject to the descendants of Aeneas.

125

ON AVOIDING EXTREMES,
FROM THE GREEK

Too much of anything is unpleasant. Thus even honey, as the old adage says, is always bitter if there 5 is too much of it.

126

ON AN EXTREMELY UNHAPPY MAN,
FROM THE GREEK

You have never lived, poor man, and you will never die, for, although you seem alive, in your misery you are dead. But death at last does make an end of life
5 for those who have untold success and great wealth.

127

ON PYTHAGORAS'S TACITURNITY,
FROM THE GREEK

In human affairs silence is great wisdom. On this point the wiseman Pythagoras<sup>40</sup> will be my witness:
himself a learned speaker, he taught others to keep 5 quiet, since he found this was a potent drug to promote tranquillity.

128

A JOKE ON GELLIA

Why should we marvel only at the wonders of ages past—that a bull spoke or a stone fell in a rainstorm? There is a new wonder greater than the old.
Just look, Gellia rose from her bed yesterday before 5 the shadowy dusk. I was going to tell you more, but you would think I was joking. Well, just the same,
she did get up before midday. Although ages past

<sup>37</sup> principes <sup>38</sup> As More phrases this same view in the Latin version of his History of King Richard III: “the title and profit and the ownership [of England is] totally

[their] own—as a genuine commonwealth” (CW 15: 480); “absolute and supreme potestas in England is Parliament” (CW 15: 320). <sup>39</sup> See Euripides’ Hippolytus.

<sup>40</sup> For the concept of silence attributed to this famous Greek philosopher (ca. 570–495 BC), see Plutarch’s Life of Numa 8.6; see also Diogenes Laertius 8.10.

often saw those old marvels, though future ages will perhaps be able to see them as often, still, until yesterday no one had ever seen the miracle I describe, and after today no one will be able to see it ever again.

129

ON PALLAS<sup>41</sup> AND VENUS,
 FROM THE GREEK

O Tritonian virgin, why do you wrong me, Venus, so? Why do you clutch my prize in your fingers?
 Remember that on the rocky side of Ida, if I may remind you, it was I, not you, whom Paris judged beautiful. The spear is yours, and the sword; but I claim the apple. Let the ancient contest suffice for the apple.

130

THAT HUMAN LIFE IS NOTHING Breathing the unsubstantial air through narrow openings in our bodies, we live and look upon Phoebus's light. We are, every man alive, mere instruments—but such instruments as drafts of thin air endow with the breath of life. But if your hand should interrupt the delicate process of breathing, then you will tear out a living soul and send it to the underworld. This, then, is why we are nothing. We are all fattened up for Death; and what nourishes us is little breaths of thin air.

131

ON A DULLARD'S DULL DAGGER,
 FROM THE GREEK

This leaden point of yours is blunt and dull. The point is as sharp as your wits.

132

ON FAME AND POPULAR OPINION

Most men congratulate themselves if they attain to fame, empty though it is; and, because they are light-minded, they are lifted to the stars by the fickle wind of opinion. Why do you derive satisfaction from the comments of the populace? In their blindness they often interpret what is best as a failing and thoughtlessly approve what is very reprehensible. You hang everlastingly upon a stranger's opinion for fear that some cobbler will retract the praise he has conferred. Perhaps the man whose praise makes you proud is mocking you. Though he praise you from his heart, that praise is ephemeral.

 What does fame do for you? You may be praised by the whole world, but if you have an aching joint,
 what does fame do for you?

133

JOKE ABOUT A WAITER

A certain guest at a banquet removed some flies from the mixing-bowl before he drank. When he had had his drink he put the flies back. He explained, "I do not like flies; but then, I do not know—some of you may like them."

134

ON A HUNTING DOG

One duck was in the dog's mouth when he opened it to catch another. He missed it, and the one he had already caught escaped from his mouth. In this way, miser, while you wretchedly strive to ensnare the property of another, you more often than not lose your own; and it serves you right.

135

THE MISER IS A DOG IN THE MANGER

The dog in the manger<sup>42</sup> does not himself eat the hay, nor does he let the horse, who wants hay, take any. The miser guards his wealth, does not use it himself. And those who want to put it to some use he keeps at a distance.

136

TO ORESTES, ABOUT TO KILL HIS MOTHER, FROM THE GREEK

Where will you thrust the sword, through the womb or through the breast? The womb bore you, the breasts gave you suck.

137

WHAT WE SHOULD ASK FROM GOD,
 IN FEW WORDS

Give us, God, what is good, whether you are asked or not; and, asked or not, withhold what is evil.

<sup>41</sup> epithet for Athene <sup>42</sup> See Aesop's "Dog in the Manger;" Whit H565; Til D513.

138

ON MEN TWICE MARRIED,
FROM THE GREEK

The widower who marries again is a shipwrecked sailor who a second time sails the stormy sea.

139

ON SLEEP, WHICH MAKES THE POOR MAN THE RICH MAN'S EQUAL

O sleep, peaceful part of life, hope and comfort of the poor, whom by night you make equal to the rich, you soothe sad hearts with the gentle dew of forgetfulness and drive away all awareness of woe. Generously in happy dreams you confer wealth upon the poor man. Why do you, rich man, scorn the poor man's fancied wealth? Real wealth brings to the rich worry, pain, and grief; imagined wealth brings the poor real joy.

140

ON AN UGLY, WICKED MAN,
FROM THE GREEK

It is difficult to represent a soul, easy to portray a body. In your case the opposite is true, for your appearance so reveals your vicious habits that they are easily discernible all over you. But who would paint your ugly bodily parts, the omens of your inner form, since no one would willingly look at them?

141

ON A POISONOUS CAPPADOCIAN,
FROM THE GREEK

A deadly viper bit a Cappadocian: having imbibed the corrosive blood of the Cappadocian, it died at once.

142

ON AN IRON STATUE, FROM THE GREEK

To you, the king who ravaged the world, they set up a statue of iron—as far cheaper than bronze. This economy was the result of starvation, slaughter, wrath, and cruel poverty. These are the instruments by which your greed has ravaged all.

143

TO CANDIDUS: HOW TO CHOOSE A WIFE, A POEM IN IAMBIC DIMETER
BRACHYCATALECTIC

Your time of life, Candidus, is now reaching a point where it suggests that at last you reject temporary attachments, that you cease at last to pursue haphazard love affairs, and that you find a girl to take as wife formally and in mutual devotion. Let her be fruitful and add sweet children to your most splendid line. Your father did as much for you. Hand on with increase to your descendants what you have already received from your ancestors.

Still, do not let your primary concern be how much dowry she brings or how beautiful she is. Weakness marks any love which arises either from a blind impulse roused by mere beauty or from a base love of money.

The man who loves for money's sake loves only money. As soon as he acquires the money, his fleeting love is gone and dies almost before it is born. And the money, which in his miserable selfishness he had coveted earlier, cannot help him in the least later on when he is required, however unwilling, to keep the wife he does not love.

What is beauty? Does it not fail in sickness, perish with time? Like a flower in the sun. Then, when the bloom leaves her cheek, a love secured only by such ties as these breaks free and is gone forever. Only a man of intelligence and foresight, with reason for his guide, can enter upon true love. True love is inspired, with happy promise, by respect for a woman's glorious virtue, a noble gift which endures, does not fail in sickness, does not perish with the years. And so, my friend, if you desire to marry, first observe what kind of parents the lady has. See to it that her mother is revered for the excellence of her character which is sucked in and pressed by her tender and impressionable little girl.

Next see to this: what sort of personality she has; how agreeable she is. Let her maidenly countenance be calm and without severity. But let her modesty bring blushes to her cheeks; let her glance not be provocative. Let her be mild-mannered, not throwing her slender arms wantonly around men's necks. Let her glances be restrained; let her have no roving eye. Let her pretty lips always be free of pointless garrulity and also of boorish taciturnity. Let her be either just finishing her education or ready to begin it immediately. Happy is the woman whose education permits her to derive from the best of ancient works the principles which confer a blessing on life. Armed with this learning, she would not yield to pride in prosperity, nor to grief in distress—even though misfortune strike her down. For this reason your lifetime companion will be ever agreeable, never a trouble or a burden. If she is well instructed herself, then some day she will teach your little grandsons, at an early age, to read.

You will be glad to leave the company of men and to seek repose in the bosom of your accomplished wife, the while she attends to your comfort, and while under her dexterous touch the plucked strings resound, while in a sweet voice (as sweet, Procne, as your sister's) she sings delightful songs such as Apollo would be glad to hear. Then you will be glad to spend days and nights in pleasant and intelligent conversation, listening to the sweet words which ever most charmingly flow from her honeyed mouth. By her comments she would restrain you if ever vain success should exalt you and would comfort you if grievous sorrow should cast you down. When she speaks, it will be difficult to choose between her perfect power of expression and her thoughtful understanding of all kinds of affairs.

I should think that the wife of the bard Orpheus<sup>43</sup> long ago was such a woman; he would never have devoted such enormous effort to recovering from the underworld an uncultivated woman.

Such a woman, I believe, was Ovid's famous daughter,<sup>44</sup> who could rival in poetical composition even her own father.

Such a woman, I suspect, was Tullia<sup>45</sup> — never was daughter more beloved by a father, himself in learning second to none.

Such a woman was the mother<sup>46</sup> of the two Gracchi. She taught her sons right principles; she accomplished no less as their teacher than she did as their mother.

Why do I continue to contemplate ancient times? After all, our age, however rude it may be, does have one maiden, though it has only one, whom it may set above almost all others and compare with any of those women whose stories come down to us from ages past. Borne high upon the soaring wings of fame, she now gives warning even to remotest Britain, the one and only boast and glory of the whole world, not merely the Cassandra<sup>47</sup> of her own country.

Say Candidus, if you were to marry a woman

such as those I have mentioned above, could you, even if she were not beautiful, find her wanting or complain that you gain too little by her dowry? This is the truth of the matter: whatever her looks, she is beautiful enough if her looks give pleasure; and no man possesses more than he who is content with what he has.

May my own wife cease to love me if I am not telling you the truth, my friend. If Nature has denied the gift of beauty to a girl, yes, though she be blacker than coal, still, if she has this virtuous disposition, she would be in my eyes fairer than the swan. If fickle Fortune has denied her a dowry, yes, though she be poorer than Irus, still, if she has this virtuous disposition, she would be in my eyes richer, Croesus, than you.

144

A FUNNY STORY ABOUT A SWAGGERER

While Thraso<sup>48</sup> the soldier was away, a rough herdsman seduced his wife. When the soldier came home and heard the story, he picked up his sword and rushed in savage pursuit. When at length he found the rustic alone in a field, he shouted, "You, say, you there, you rascal." The herdsman stopped and picked up an armful of stones. The soldier, with drawn sword, shouted, "Did you lay hand on my wife, you scoundrel?" The herdsman calmly answered, "I did." "You confess it," said the soldier. "By all the gods and goddesses, you villain, I swear that I would plunge this sword hilt-deep into your heart if you had not confessed."

145

ON AVOIDING EXTREMES, FROM THE GREEK

I have no desire for more spacious fields; I do not want the golden bliss of Gyges. Living enough to sustain life is living enough for me. That saying "Avoid excess" suits me excessively.

146

HECTOR DYING, FROM THE GREEK

Get rid of my body when I am dead, you Greeks, for hares fear the carcass of a lion.

<sup>43</sup> Eurydice. See Ovid, Metamorphoses 10.
<sup>44</sup> Perilla, whom Ovid addresses in Tristia 3.7
<sup>45</sup> Cicero's daughter
<sup>46</sup> Cornelia

Africana
<sup>47</sup> Cassandra, a prophetess and the daughter of King Priam and Hecuba of Troy, was cursed by Apollo with the fate that no one would believe her prophecies.

<sup>48</sup> the soldier in Terence's Eunuchus, proverbial for his self-assurance

147

ON A STUPID POET

The poet who is second to none wrote long ago that in piety Aeneas was second to none.<sup>49</sup> And so a certain fellow who wanted to praise the king said—
 5 in elegant imitation of Vergil, of course—“Here is a king to whom no one is second.” The king does not deserve such praise as this; but the poet himself richly deserves it. So let us give each the praise which is his due: here is a poet, then, to whom no 10 one is second; here is a king who is second to none.

148

ON A CERTAIN AUTHOR WHO IN UNLEARNED STYLE WROTE HYMNS IN HONOR OF THE SAINTS, EXPLAINING IN HIS PREFACE THAT HE WROTE
 5 THEM IN AN OFFHAND WAY WITHOUT OBSERVING THE RULES OF METER AND THAT HIS SUBJECT MATTER
 REQUIRED NO ELOQUENCE<sup>50</sup>

This sacred book of André’s contains within marvelously small compass all the feast days of the year in chronological order. It is credible that all the saints celebrated here took counsel for their poet when he wrote; for he wrote in haste, but even so with all the time in the world he could not have written better.
 15 His subject matter is religious, and his style was untouched by the ancients and kept in reserve by fate for the present work. If he does not anxiously restrict himself to all the usual quantities, this too is not done by mistake but for a reason. The majesty of 20 the work refuses to be subjected to metrical rule. Assuredly, where the Spirit is, there also is liberty.<sup>51</sup> For the unlearned reader the piety of the book alone suffices; but you who are one accustomed to drink from the Castalian spring will receive such pleasure from 25 this book, if you examine it closely, as you have never had before from any other.

149

ON STRATOPHON, A WORTHLESS
 PRIZEFIGHTER, FROM THE GREEK

Ulysses, warrior-king of Ithaca, was away from home for twenty years; when he returned, he was 5 still recognized by his swift dog.<sup>52</sup> Well, prizefighter

Stratophon, now that you have fought for four hours, your dog and your fellow citizens alike could no longer recognize you. As a matter of fact, Stratophon, if you looked at yourself in a mirror, you would yourself under oath deny that you are 10 Stratophon.

150

ON A WORTHLESS PRIZEFIGHTER,
 FROM THE GREEK

Here is Nesimus, a prizefighter, who asks the prophet Olympus if advanced old age is to be his lot. The prophet answers, “Perhaps you will live if 5 you retire; but, as long as you continue fighting, the god who brings the chill of death threatens you with his scythe.”

151

ON A PARASITE, FROM THE GREEK
 When Eutychides runs a race in the stadium, you would think he was standing still; but when he runs to dinner, you would think he was flying.

152

ON A DRINKER, FROM THE GREEK
 Do not offer wreaths and unguents at my tomb. To buy wine and warmth for a stone will be a useless expense. Give me these things while I am alive, for throwing good wine on my ashes gives me no wine;
 5 it just makes mud.

153

ON A DRINKER, FROM THE GREEK
 I was born of earth; when I die, I shall be restored to earth. Therefore, come to me full, earthen bottle.

154

ON AN UGLY WOMAN, FROM THE GREEK
 Your looking glass deceives you, Gellia, for, if you once looked into a true looking glass, you would never look again.

155

ON AN UGLY WOMAN, FROM THE GREEK
 Antipatra would run to Parthia or to the pillars of Hercules if anyone caught a glimpse of her naked.

49 See Aeneid 1.544–45. 50 This poem was first published as a laudatory poem in the front of a book of hymns for the liturgical year by Bernard André.

51 2 Cor 3:17 52 Homer, Odyssey 17.292–310

156

ON AN UGLY WOMAN, FROM THE GREEK

The unhappy man who has an ugly wife will still have darkness when the lamps are lighted in the evening.

157

ON A MAN WHO WAS A PHILOSOPHER
ONLY BY REASON OF HIS BEARD,
FROM THE GREEK

If an untrimmed beard makes a philosopher, why could not a bearded goat be a Plato?

158

ON GRANTING LIBERTIES

Freedom, if unrestrained, exceeds quickly and irrevocably its proper bounds. If you let your wife stamp on your foot tonight, tomorrow upon rising she will stamp on your head.

159

EPITAPH OF ABINGDON, THE SINGER<sup>53</sup>

Let the famed singer, Henry Abingdon, draw your eyes hither; there was a time when he drew your ears with his music. Not long ago he sang in a voice marvelous beyond compare and played the organ with incomparable skill. At first he was the pride of the church at Wells; then the king decided that he should lend his fame to the Chapel Royal. Now God has taken him away from the king and installed him among the stars to add glory to the very inhabitants of heaven.

160

ANOTHER EPITAPH ON THE SAME MAN

Here lies Henry, the constant friend of piety.
Abingdon was his family name, if anyone should want his full name. He was once succentor of the kindly church at Wells; and later he became chanter in the beautiful Chapel Royal. He was the best singer among a million. And besides this he was the best of organists. And so now, Christ, since he served you always on earth, admit him to the Kingdom of Heaven.

161

ON JANUS, ABINGDON'S HEIR

I wrote a poem in elegiac couplets to mark the tomb of Henry Abingdon at the request of his heir, Janus.
Janus did not like it — and it might well have failed to please learned men. But Janus disliked only its better parts. “These verses of yours do not rhyme,” he said. I realized at once what kind of inferior food such lips as his like. With a laugh I blurted out some laughable verses. He clapped his hands with delight and gobbled them up. These are the verses he had inscribed on the tomb. He deserves to be thrust forthwith into the same tomb and to be distinguished by the same epitaph. The two-faced god, Janus, sees everything in front of him and behind him. This barefaced Janus, like a faceless mole, sees nothing before or behind.

162

TO A COURTIER

You often boast to me that you have the king's ear and often have fun with him, freely and according to your own whims. This is like having fun with tamed lions — often it is harmless, but just as often there is the fear of harm. Often he roars in rage for no known reason, and suddenly the fun becomes fatal. The pleasure you get is not safe enough to relieve you of anxiety. For you it is a great pleasure.
As for me, let my pleasure be less great — and safe.

163

TO TYNDAL, HIS DEBTOR

Before I lent you the money, Tyndal, I had the pleasure of your company as often as I liked. But now, if you happen to see me around some corner, you run from me in terror like a man who has just seen a snake. I had no intention of asking for my money back. I had none, but rather than be forced to lose you, I shall. To keep you I am willing to lose the money; but I am not willing to lose both — one or the other is loss enough for me. Therefore, either keep the money and give me back your friendship, or give me back your friendship and the money too. But if neither way pleases you, then at least see that I do not lose my money. And you, lost friend, farewell.

<sup>53</sup> Abingdon (ca. 1418–ca. 1497) was a composer, organist, singer, and choirmaster of the Chapel Royal.

164

ON A BEGGAR WHO PRETENDS
HE IS A PHYSICIAN

You pass yourself off as a physician; we grant you that and more. You are one letter more [mendicus]
5 than physician [medicus].

165

ON AN UNFAITHFUL WIFE

Fruitful, how very fruitful is the wife of my friend Aratus. Yes, three times she has conceived and borne fruit with no help from her husband.

166

ON A TINY MAN, FROM THE GREEK

To escape the dull grind of his miserable life, Diophantus used a spider's thread, used it for a noose.

167

ON A GIRL WHO FEIGNED RAPE

When a young man saw a girl all by herself and thought that this was his chance, the rascal put his eager arms around her — unwilling as she was — and 5 was prepared to give her kisses, and more than kisses too. She struggled against him and angrily cited the law which condemns wretched rapists to have their heads cut off. But still, with a young man's eagerness, the shameless fellow did his best to win her 10 over either by coaxing or threatening. She resisted both coaxing and threats; she screamed. She kicked him, bit him, struck him. The young man's anger grew almost as great as his lust. Savagely he said,
"You wildcat, so that's the way it is. I swear to you 15 by this sword" — and he drew his weapon — "if you do not lie down nice and easy, and shut up, I'll go away." Terrified by so dire a threat she lay down at once and said, "Go ahead and do it, but what you do you do by force."

168

ON CHRYSALUS

When Chrysalus was burying his treasure chest in the forest, he stopped to think what sure marks he could find to locate the spot. And when he saw a 5 noisy crow in the top of a tree he said, "Here is an outstanding landmark," and went away. When he came back, the mere supersufficiency of the sighting he had taken baffled him, for he saw his marks in every tree.

169

ON AN ASTROLOGER

While astrologers (who, through our own mistake, are honored as prophets) are producing your destiny in accordance with the position of a star, while this star is promising and that one threatening, your 5 mind swings back and forth between hope and fear.
If good fortune is to come, it will come, though the astrologers keep silent; and unexpected good luck usually gives more pleasure. If, on the other hand, 10 bad luck is to come, then it is better to know nothing of it as long as possible and to enjoy the time until it arrives. In fact, this is what I advise, in the very teeth of the fates themselves: keep your equanimity and spend your days in good spirits.

170

ON A MAN WHO OUGHT TO BE CRUCIFIED,
FROM THE GREEK

Take away the first two letters of your Mastauron; no one can more richly deserve what is left<sup>54</sup> than you do.

171

AN EPITAPH, FROM THE GREEK

This tomb contains four brothers. To two of them, alas, a single day brought life and death.

172

FROM THE GREEK

Timocritus was brave in battle. That is why he lies here. It is not the brave, but the cowardly whom you spare, brutal Mars.

173

FROM THE GREEK

That urn you see there contains a pair — both sons of Neocles; one freed his fatherland from slavery, the other from vice.

<sup>54</sup> That is, the Greek word for "crosses" is left after taking away the first two letters of Mastauron.

174

ON A MAN WHO HAS A SHREWISH WIFE AT HOME

My friend, your wife is always bad. When you treat her badly, she gets worse, but when you treat her 5 well, she becomes worst of all. But if she dies, she will be a good wife; better if she dies while you are alive; and best of all if she dies soon.

175

ON SOME SAILORS WHO MADE THEIR CONFESSIONS TO A MONK
DURING A STORM AND THEN THREW HIM OVERBOARD

When the heaving sea in a roaring storm was rising high and the anger of the waves was raging against the struggling ship, the frightened sailors were overcome by religious scruples. They cried, “Our ill-spent lives have brought on these ills.” 10 There was a monk among the passengers. Into his ear they hastily unloaded their sins. But when they observed that the sea had not in the least calmed down, that, rather, the ship was just barely afloat on the rushing waters, one of them cried out, “No 15 wonder our ship is barely afloat! All this time it has been weighed down by our cargo of sin. Why not throw overboard this monk on whom we emptied out all our guilt, and let him take our sins away with him?” The sailors approve of what he said; 20 they lay hold of the man; they heave him into the sea. And—so they say—the ship sailed lighter than before. Now the moral of this story: learn from it how heavy is a load of sin, since a ship cannot sus-tain its weight.

176

TO CANDIDUS, A PASTOR WHO LED AN EVIL LIFE

My dear Candidus, you have been made pastor of a large congregation. Therefore, I heartily congrat-5 ulate you and your flock. Either partiality has damaged my judgment, or it is not possible that your flock ever before had such a priest. You do not have knowledge of vain disciplines to make you proud;
clearly, such knowledge is of no use to your congre-10 gation. Moreover, yours are rare virtues; just as rare,
I believe, were men like you among the ancient fathers. Your life can function as a conspicuous model by which your people can decide what to do and what to avoid. All that is needed is to advise them to observe you closely, avoid what you do, and do 15 what you avoid.

177

FROM THE GREEK

In this urn reposes a sailor, in that a farmer. By land or by sea the journey is the same; it ends at the Styx.

178

ON BISHOP POSTHUMUS

You are now a bishop, Posthumus, and it is only proper that you have this extraordinary authority, for in the whole world there never was a more extraordinary man than you. I rejoice that, at last, so 5 important and inviolable an office is no longer conferred at random, as it used to be. I say this because a random impulse is likely to be wrong; but, as for you, it is plain that you were selected with great care. Actually, when just one man is taken from 10 among many, he often turns out, by chance, to be bad or, by deliberate choice, to be the very worst.
But in your case, if one is to be taken from many thousands, he could hardly match you in stupidity and wickedness. 15

179

ON BOLLANUS

Just before Bollanus lay down, his companions strewed his whole bed with stinging nettles. Yet he said he had not been stung; even so, he did not deny 5 that he did find them when he was undressed and in the dark. Therefore it must be that they avoided his flesh and came in contact only with his nails or his bared teeth. And yet, since he encountered the leaves in the dark without being stung, how did he 10 discover that they were nettles?

180

FABLE OF THE SICK FOX AND THE LION

While a fox lay sick in his narrow den, a smooth-tongued lion took his stand at the entrance. Said he, “Tell me, my friend, don’t you feel well? You will 5 soon get well if you let me lick you. You just do not know the power of my tongue.” “Your tongue,” said the fox, “has healing powers; but the trouble is that such a good tongue has bad neighbors.”

181

ON A LION AND LYSIMACHUS

While a tamed lion harmlessly licked his trainer, the trainer invited one and all to put themselves in his place. After a long time, when no one among the large crowd of spectators had come forward, brave-hearted Lysimachus leaped up. Said he, “I am brave enough to endure the touch of the lion’s tongue, but his teeth are so close to his tongue that I shall not do it.”

182

ON FABIAN, THE ASTROLOGER

Now that credulous people, in great numbers, every day, are buying from you great quantities of predictions, if among the many lies you tell there is, by chance, a single truth, then, Fabian, right off, you want me to think you a prophet. But make your predictions invariably wrong. If you can keep this up, Fabian, I might think you a prophet.

183

ON THE KING OF SCOTLAND, WHO ATTACKED NORHAM CASTLE WHICH HAD ALREADY BEEN BETRAYED TO HIM,
PRETENDING THAT IT HAD NOT

Scot,<sup>55</sup> why do you launch an armed attack on Norham Castle, which had already been treacherously betrayed into your hands? Are you ashamed of your deceitfulness? Your vices are so many and so notorious that this one should cause you no shame. Your pleasure in taking the castle by artful deception may have been great, but it was short. Within a few days, after the wretched but richly deserved destruction of you and yours, the captured castle was recaptured. And when the betrayer asked for his reward in your realm, he received the wages worthy of his crime, death. It is the destiny of that invincible castle that not only the man who betrays it should perish but also the man to whom he betrays it.

184

AN EPITAPH FOR JAMES
KING OF THE SCOTS

It is I, James, King of the Scots, brave and ill-starred enemy of a friendly kingdom, who am interred beneath this sod. Would that my loyalty had been equal to my courage. The sequel with its shame for me would not have happened. But, alas, it is shameful to boast and repugnant to complain — therefore, I shall say no more. And I hope, O chattering Infamy, that you may be willing to keep silent. You kings (I was once a king myself) I warn you not to let loyalty become, as it often does, a meaningless word.

185

ON A BAD PAINTER

A painter admired for his extraordinary skill showed in a picture how a frightened hare flees a dog’s cruel jaws. After pondering the innermost secrets of nature, he represented the hare as looking backward in terror during its flight. I hope that the painter who succeeded thus in showing a fleeing hare may himself become a hare and, during his effort to escape, look back.

186

ON THE SAME PAINTER

A hare and a dog were painted in such fashion that no one could determine which was the dog and which the hare. When the artist learned that this was so, with marvelous ingenuity he supplied what his insufficient skill had left out. To make the matter plain and banish ambiguity, he merely wrote at the bottom, “This is the dog; that, the hare.”

187

ON TYNDARUS

While Tyndarus happened to be kissing a girl whose outstanding characteristic was not the smallness of her nose, he felt a sudden impulse to be witty about it. Said he, “I cannot make my lips reach yours, for your nose keeps my mouth at a distance.” The girl immediately blushed and burned with repressed anger, stung by his not very witty witticism. “If my nose keeps your kisses from my mouth,” she said, “then you can kiss me here, where I have no nose.”

<sup>55</sup> James IV of Scotland besieged Norham Castle in August 1513 and held it until he was defeated at Flodden Field in September.

188

ON GERMAN BRIXIUS, WHO WRITES
FALSEHOODS ABOUT THE FRENCH SHIP
CORDELIÈRE AND HER CAPTAIN, HERVÉ

Brixius, while you try to win fame for Hervé,<sup>56</sup> 5 you defeat the purpose of your poetry, for with bad faith you have recorded his good deeds. In the poem, Germanus, you promise us a history, but since it is not at all true, it is not history either. Let historians begin to show either prejudice or favor-10 itism, and who will there be to lend any credence at all to histories? Now this very Hervé of yours has lost his praise because of you, for what praise can he have without belief in the facts?

189

ON THE SAME AUTHOR DEALING WITH THE SAME HERVÉ AND THE SAME SHIP (WHICH WAS BURNED UP IN A NAVAL BATTLE)

I am not at all surprised that Brixius has conferred upon Hervé praise which he did not earn, and has deprived the opposing captain of his due honor, and has celebrated, in his poem on the ship Cord-
elière, a thousand lies which are the very opposite 10 of the facts. Still I don't believe he deliberately set out to write falsehoods because of a perverse prejudice. Rather, it was simply that no survivor has yet been able to come back to tell the bard the truth about the Cordelière. But for him to learn the whole 15 truth, the right thing would have been for him to be aboard himself—amidships.

190

VERSES TAKEN FROM BRIXIUS'S
CHORDIGERA BECAUSE SOME OF THE FOLLOWING EPIGRAMS
MAKE FUN OF THEM

5 Left and right the Britons surround Hervé as he stands alone. Shaft upon shaft flies in a wintry hailstorm toward the head of Hervé alone, but the hero boldly shakes them off with his shield and turns them back against the other side.

A LATER INCIDENT FROM THE SAME POEM CHORDIGERA

Hervé spurs his comrades on and himself presses forward. In the front ranks of a mighty attack, he drives boldly into the enemy. Some he strikes down 5 with a javelin through the temples; through another's ribs he thrusts his sword; he lays open the guts of another; with axe-blows to the neck he cuts off the heads of some, or wounds a flank or shoulder with his sharp spear. 10

MORE'S EPIGRAM MOCKING
THE VERSES ABOVE

As for the statements that Hervé struck some enemies down with javelins through their temples, thrust his sword through the guts or ribs of others 5 severed the heads of some with axe-blows to the neck, pierced the shoulders and flanks of others, and as for his bravely fending off with his shield the hurtled missiles of the enemy and returning them to their source—all this is beyond the reach 10 of understanding, how one man could fight with so many weapons, and that while one arm was burdened with a shield. Unyielding nature herself contradicts this battle. I think that in this passage you omitted something. For when you represented hero- 15 ic Hervé fighting with four weapons and a shield all at the same time, perhaps the fact slipped your mind, but your reader ought to have been informed in advance that Hervé had five hands.

191

ANOTHER ON THE SAME SUBJECT

You wonder how Hervé could carry shield, sword, spear, javelins, and axe and fight with them, too.
Well, his right hand is armed with the merciless battle-ax, his dire left is equipped with a sword all 5 its own. At the same time he boldly holds (with clenched teeth) in his mouth the javelin, and the spear to take the javelin's place. And because missiles thicker than wintry hail fly toward his head, on his head he wears his shield. A dragon would not 10 have so hard a head, nor Celaeno<sup>57</sup> such claws; thus the elephant with his tusks could not equal him.
And so, as he rushed against the enemy, he was a

<sup>56</sup> Germain de Brie (1490–1538), also known as Germanus Brixius, published Chordigeræ Navis Conflagratio in 1513 (see CW 3.2: 429–65). The poem commemorated an engagement with the English on August 10, 1512, honored the French commander, and attacked the English. That same year, More wrote the following epigrams in response. Years later, despite Erasmus's protest, Brixius wrote Antimorus, a satire and in-depth critique of More's epigrams, published in 1519. See Letter to Brixius (pp. 456–72) for More's reply, and Letter 87 to Erasmus (pp. 292–303).

<sup>57</sup> one of the harpies in Aeneid 3.211–17

strange monster, inspiring terror with both his arm 15 and his grin.

192

THE FIRST LINE IN THIS POEM IS BY BRIXIUS WHO PRESENTS A PROPHECY ABOUT HIMSELF MADE BY HERVÉ, WHO WAS SOON TO DIE

5 One not to be despised among the disciples of Phoebus, the poet Brixius celebrated the mighty deeds of Captain Hervé.

One not to be despised among the disciples of Phoebus burned up Hervé, his enemies, his companions, and the ships.

10 How, then, did this poet not to be despised among the disciples of Phoebus — how did he learn what his poem tells?

15 The only conclusion is that one not to be despised among the disciples of Phoebus heard it from the tripod of Phoebus.

193

ON THE SAME WRITER'S THEFT OF LINES FROM THE POETS

No one cultivates the ancient poets more than you or culls from them more diligently, for there is not 5 one among the ancient poets from whose lines, here and there, you have not culled little blossoms and buds by the handful; and you immediately repay the poet by the great honor of being slipped in with what you write. And you do bestow a blessing on 10 the bard, for what you gather proclaims its origin and shines out among your lines more brightly than the stars gleaming in the night sky.

So great an honor you never begrudge to any bard, a friend to them all, so that no one of them, 15 once the glory of an age that is past, now needs to weep at your neglect. Therefore, lest the hallowed measures of the poets perish of long disuse, you save them from the injuries of time and adorn them with new luster. This is by art to give new life to 20 what is old — there is no happier gift than this. O blessed art! — and yet whoever, employing your artistic method, shall insert his antique borrowings in a new context, will by no effort of art, however long he sweats about it, succeed in imparting their antiquity to his own new verses.
25

58 See Livy 8.6.8–13, 8.9.1–2, 10.28.13–18 for the account of Publius Decius (d. 340 BC) and his son (d. 295 BC) of the same name, consuls who both chose death in defense of Rome. 59 mens (intelligence)

194

A MOCKING COMMENT ON THE CENOTAPH OF HERVÉ

According to your judgment, Brixius, our age can match the two Decii<sup>58</sup> in the single person of Hervé. And yet there is this difference: the Decii died of 5 their own free will; Hervé, because he could not run away.

195

PHOEBUS ADDRESSES BRIXIUS

Do you want to know what I think of that grandiloquent little book which recounts the derring-do and the death of Hervé, mighty in battle? Well, then, poet sacred to Phoebus, hear these sacred oracles delivered by Phoebus's tripod. In the whole 5 work one syllable is missing; there are a thousand to spare. The work is full up, for what could be less than what you omitted? The syllable I mean can be 10 picked out of only one month (though it has not been picked out for you) and it contains more than half of mensis<sup>59</sup> [month].

196

TO SABINUS, WHOSE WIFE BECAME PREGNANT IN HIS ABSENCE

Sabinus, hurry home; to you is born a child, the support of your existence, the only hope of your extreme old age. Hurry; you must greet your fruitful
5 wife, see the beloved offspring — hurry home, Sabinus. Hurry, I say, and waste no time about it; and, hurry as you may, you will seem too slow. Hurry home, Sabinus. Now your wife is complaining about you, the baby is crying for you; Sabinus, hurry home.
10 Because you are an ungrateful fellow, you are never there, not at the birth, not even at the conception; hurry home, Sabinus. Hurry to be in time at least for the boy's baptism. Sabinus, hurry home.

197

TO CANDIDUS, WHO PRAISED HOLY MEN
ALTHOUGH HE HIMSELF WAS EVIL

You often praise good men; you never, Candidus, imitate them. You say, "I, Candidus, praise them
5 without envy, for whoever imitates good men also envies them." O Candidus, ingenuous innocent, whiter than milk or snow.<sup>60</sup>

60 See Gn 49:12; Ps 50(51):9; Lam 4:7; Dan 7:9; Mk 9:3; and Rv 1:14.

198

WHAT IS THE BEST FORM OF GOVERNMENT

You ask which governs better, a king or a senate.
Neither, if (as is frequently the case) both are bad.
5 But if both are good, then I think that the senate, because of its numbers, is the better and that the greater good lies in numerous good men. Perhaps it is difficult to find a group of good men; even more frequently it is easy for a monarch to be bad. A sen-10 ate would occupy a position between good and bad;
but hardly ever will you have a king who is not either good or bad. An evil senator is influenced by advice from better men than he; but a king is himself the ruler of his advisers. A senator is elected by 15 the people to rule; a king attains this end by being born. In the one case blind chance is supreme; in the other, a reasonable agreement. The one feels that he was made senator by the people; the other feels that the people were created for him so that, of 20 course, he may have subjects to rule.

A king in his first year is always very mild indeed, and so every year the consul will be like a new king.
Over a long time a greedy king will gnaw away at his people. If a consul is evil, there is hope of improve-25 ment. I am not swayed by the well-known fable which recommends that one endure the well-fed fly lest a hungry one take its place.<sup>61</sup> It is a mistake to believe that a greedy king can be satisfied; such a leech never leaves flesh until it is drained.

30 But, you say, a serious disagreement impedes a senate's decisions, while no one disagrees with a king. But that is the worse evil of the two, for when there is a difference of opinion about important matters — but say, what started you on this inquiry 35 anyway? Is there anywhere a people upon whom you yourself, by your own decision, can impose either a king or a senate?<sup>62</sup> If this does lie within your power, you are king. Stop considering to whom you may give power. The more basic question is whether 40 it would do any good if you could.<sup>63</sup>

199

ON FUSCUS, THE DRINKER

His physician told Fuscus that drinking would destroy his eyes. When Fuscus had considered the matter, he said, “I would rather destroy my eyes by drinking than preserve them to be gnawed out by 5 crawling worms.”

200

TO A FRIEND

I gather from what you write that my letter will come too late. But it won't be too late for you — no more than weapons which arrive after the war is over can be said to arrive too late, if those weapons 5 would have been of no use anyway.

201

ON THE KING AND THE PEASANT

A forest-bred peasant, more naive than Faunus or a satyr, came to town. See there! the inhabitants have taken places on either side to fill the avenue, and throughout the city all one could hear was the cry, 5 “The king is coming.” The peasant was roused by the strange news and longed to see what the crowd was watching for so eagerly. Suddenly the king rode by, in full view, resplendent with gold, escorted by 10 a large company, and astride a tall horse. Then the crowd really did roar: “Long live the king”; and with rapt expressions they gazed up at the king. The peasant cried out, “Where is the king? Where is the king?” And one of the bystanders replied, “There he 15 is, the one mounted high on that horse over there.”
The peasant said, “Is that the king? I think you are making fun of me. To me he looks like a man in fancy dress.”

202

ON THE ILLITERATE BISHOP TO WHOM AN EARLIER EPIGRAM REFERRED UNDER THE NAME OF POSTHUMUS

You, mighty father, exclaim, “The letter kills.” This single phrase “The letter kills” you have always in 5 your mouth. You have taken good care that no letter may kill you; you do not know any letter. And not idle is your fear that the letter may kill; you know that you do not have the spirit which will give you 10 life.<sup>64</sup>

<sup>61</sup> See Aesop's “The Fox and the Hedgehog” and Aristotle's Rhetoric 2.20.6–7, 1393b. <sup>62</sup> See Sallust, Catiline 6.6–7,

where Sallust reports how the Romans did so, choosing a republic with consuls over a monarchy. <sup>63</sup> These last sentences are Clarence Miller's translation; see CW 3.2, p. 50. <sup>64</sup> See 2 Cor 3:6.

203

ON THE PRIEST WHO FOOLISHLY WARNED
HIS PARISHIONERS OF A FAST DAY
WHEN THE DAY HAD ALREADY PASSED

When our priest, as it happened, was advising his parishioners of the saints' calendar for the coming week, he said, "The feast of Saint Andrew the Martyr is a great and memorable feast; you know how dear to God Andrew was. Let austere fasting mortify the wayward flesh; this is the custom, established by the holy fathers. Therefore I forewarn you all that in honor of this martyr you ought to have fasted yesterday."

204

ON A MAN WHO SANG BADLY
AND READ WELL

You sang so badly that you could be a bishop, but you read so well that you could not. Let no one imagine that it is enough to avoid success in the one or the other. No, if you want to become a bishop be careful on both counts.

205

TO SABINUS

Look here, Sabinus, the four children whom your wife has borne up to now do not in the least resemble you; you yourself do not consider them yours.
But, in preference to the four, you take to your heart the little fellow she has most recently borne, the only one who is very like you. You call the four illegitimate, you keep them at a distance, you disown them. You have appointed this youngest one, as the only legitimate son, to be your heir; and, like an ape carrying her young, you carry him in your arms all over town for everyone to kiss and coddle. And yet weighty scholars who direct all their efforts at uncovering the secret effects of nature—weighty scholars, I say, tell us that whatever image dominates the mother's mind when the child is begotten, secretly in some mysterious way imposes accurate and indelible traces of itself upon the seed;
these marks penetrate deeply and grow with the embryo, and thus the child reflects the image inbred in it from the mother's mind. When your wife conceived the four children she was quite unconcerned about you because you were so many miles away.
That is why she bore children who do not resemble

you. But this son, of all your children, looks like you because at his conception his mother was very much concerned about you and had you completely on her mind; she was worried for fear you, Sabinus, might inconveniently arrive on the scene, as we say
"speak of the devil."

206

A FUNNY STORY ABOUT A PRINCE AND A PEASANT FROM ZEELAND

A prince, as he gazed at the water, sat down on a bridge, and his nobles stood respectfully about. A peasant sat down, too, but not near by, and thought himself polite because of the distance he kept. A certain courtier got him up and said, "Peasant, do you dare to sit on the same bridge with the prince?
Aren't you ashamed?" The peasant answered, "Is it wrong to sit on the same bridge? What if the bridge were ten miles long?"

207

A FUNNY STORY ABOUT A COURTIER

A courtier, dismounting from his horse, said to one of the bystanders, "You— whoever you are— hold this horse." The bystander, because he was frightened, said, "My lord, I ask you, is one man enough then to hold this savage horse?" The courtier said,
"One man can hold him." The bystander rejoined,
"If one man can, then you can hold your horse yourself."

208

TO A SOLDIER WHO RAN AWAY AND WHO WAS WEARING A RING

Soldier, why does that golden ring of yours decorate your hands? It would more properly decorate your feet. In that recent fierce battle either one of your feet was more helpful and more successful than both your hands.

209

TO THE POET BRIXIUS

Brixius, such an enigma arises in your book as might be proposed by the Sphinx to Oedipus: you have the whole word Chordigera time and time again, but nowhere in your whole book do you have the first syllable of Cordigera.<sup>65</sup>

210

ON TUSCUS THE DRINKER

“You are ruining your eyes with wine,” said the physician to Tuscus. Therefore, Tuscus took thought what course to follow. He observed, “Sky, land, sea, 5 whatever people usually see, I have seen again and again. And yet many a wine remains to be tasted when the new year brings its many new vintages.” Then he made his decision and said with firm resolve, “Farewell, eyes, for I have seen enough, but to 10 date enough I have not drunk.”

211

TO A PERJURER

Arnus, you have been swearing oaths long enough; you have finally reached such a point that hereafter you need not swear. By this time, you outstanding 5 oathbreaker, there is no place where your word is not as good as your oath.

212

TO THE SAME PERJURER

You are always swearing oaths, Arnus, and threatening everyone. Do you want to know what advantage you win by such conduct? The result of your 5 swearing is that now in the end no one believes you; the result of your threats, that they frighten no one.

213

ON THE SAME ARNUS

All this time no one has been better equipped with feet than Arnus, but some time ago he lost the use of his hands as the result of frostbite. Still he wants 5 to fight. I suppose you know what a man will accomplish in a fight if his feet are swift and both his hands disabled. But if a man's tongue is shameless and his hand inactive, then this man's shameless tongue ought to be cut out by an active hand.

214

ON MARULLUS

His physician warned blear-eyed Marullus, Theodore, not to drink any wine unless he was willing to be blind. To obey his doctor (though reluctantly), 5 for two whole days, mark you, he endured to go without. Thereafter, he grew thirsty at the memory of his accustomed wine and then rushed out of doors despite the truth of the physician's warning.

He had made his way to the wine when he gloomily addressed his eyes (destined to perish now that his wine was before him). “Here my journey ends; here 10 you, my faithful eyes, have led me. Now drink, and, sweet guides, farewell.” The taste and the bouquet remained; he stared at the vanishing color as his sight vanished in utter darkness. He mitigated his 15 misfortune with the comforting thought that it was the least of the wine's benefits which he must forgo.

215

ON RISCUS, AN UNWARLIKE KNIGHT

Riscus, a prudent knight, skilled by long experience, keeps horses of different kinds, and not without reason. For he keeps two, one swifter than a bird, the 5 other slower than a plodding ass. And so the latter mount delivers him, in no haste, to battle; the former, before the trumpet sounds, brings him back.

216

TO GELLIA

Gellia, my dear, he lies who says you are dark; in my estimation, Gellia, you are not dark, you are black.

217

TO THE SAME GELLIA

“I am fair,” you say. I agree. But since you are fair, why does a dark skin conceal this fairness of yours?

218

TO EUPARIPHUS, WHO MORTGAGED HIS FARM TO BUY CLOTHING

I do not wonder that you sweat under the weight of your clothing; this costume of yours contains four acres of land. Not even a man in his grave has so 5 great a mound of earth over him as you will have laid upon yourself, wherever you may be, while still alive.

219

ON GAREMANUS, WHO WAS POOR AFTER SELLING HIS LANDS

Recently Garemanus sold his ancestral estate; now, all of a sudden, rumor says he is living in poverty. It is not that he lacks skill or effort; rather I think that 5 a hostile fate is doing him a bad turn, for he cleverly exchanged his moldy earth for yellow gold, and even so he never makes a profit.

220

TO SABINUS

Two wives are dead; a third wife now is yours. And yet not one of the three has been faithful to you. Hence, Sabinus, in your angry heart you wickedly
 5 condemn not only your own wives but the whole female sex. But if you are willing to weigh this problem on the scales of justice, you will be less severe even on your own wives. For, since all three of your wives treated you the same way, it must be that the 10 stars at your birth imposed this fate upon you. If your destiny requires that you be forever a cuckold, can it be that you expect your wife to control the stars? She would have been faithful to some other man. That with you she is an adulteress she rightly 15 attributes to your fate.

221

ON A SHIPWRECKED SAILOR BITTEN BY A SNAKE WHEN HE REACHED SHORE,
FROM THE GREEK

A shipwrecked sailor escaped the raging waters
 5 of the sea; the sands of Africa provided him with ground more cruel than the sea. While he lay there on the shore, sound asleep, naked, worn out, far from the hostile sea, a deadly snake killed him. In vain poor fellow, in vain did you escape the deep;
 10 your allotted fate awaited you on land.

222

A PHYSICIAN AND AN OLD WOMAN

A physician applied ointment to an old woman's ailing eyes, bandaged them, and assured her that five days of such treatment would be effective. Mean-
 5 while, he stole her napkins, bowls, basins, dishes, and whatever was not protected by its own weight. When she was cured and looked about without the bandage, she perceived that the furnishings of her home were missing. Therefore, when she was asked 10 to pay her bill, she said, "The agreement between us requires that my sight be improved by your efforts. Actually, I see less than before, at least of the utensils in my house. I saw many of them before; now I see none."

223

TO AN UNIDENTIFIED PERSON

If you were as light on your feet as you are in the head, you could outrun a hare on level ground.

224

ON HEROD AND HERODIAS

While the daughter of Herodias was dancing for Herod and pleasing him in a way which ought to have displeased him, King Herod, inebriated with love for his wife, inebriated by his excess of 5 good fortune, and drunk besides with wine, said, "State your wish, maiden; it shall be yours, by my oath, even if it is your pleasure to ask for half this realm." The wicked girl, at the prompting of her evil
 10 mother, replied, "In that case give me, please, the head of John the Baptist."<sup>66</sup>

The favor you ask, maiden (if such dancing girls as you are maidens) — the favor you ask is such a favor as you can hardly bear to look upon. O deadly 15 parent, O cruel stepmother to your own daughter, for you teach her to be a dancer and to cut the throats of men.

The king regrets his promise; reluctantly he yields, forced no doubt by a scrupulous regard for his oath. Here is a king true to his word, but true 20 to it only when to be true is a worse crime than to be false to it.

225

TO AN UNNAMED DRUNKARD

Because I did not make greater haste to arrive for my conversation with you, you rebuke my tardiness and complain. Truly, I confess, I did not meet you
 5 at the proper time. I ought to have chosen an hour either later or earlier. Would that I had arrived either early the same day or early on the next. Now we have started to do business when the day is too far advanced, and because you are drunk it has come 10 to nothing.

226

ON A PICTURE OF HEROD'S TABLE

By the blood of man Herod's table was polluted; polluted, too, the table of Flaminius.<sup>67</sup> These two murders, so much alike, were brought about by two

<sup>66</sup> See Mk 6:17-28. <sup>67</sup> See Cicero, De senectate 12.42, for his account of the Roman consul Lucius Quinctius Flaminius, who executed a prisoner at a harlot's request, similar to the story of John the Baptist's execution.

5 young women of similar characters. A dancing girl accomplished the one, a prostitute the other. But there was this difference: the prostitute's pay was the life of a criminal; that of the dancer, the life of an innocent man.

227

ON THE SAME PICTURE

The king's table bears a severed head and a saint's countenance dripping with hideous gore. So too King Atreus, King Thyestes's brother, served as food to Thyestes the bodies of his two sons.<sup>68</sup> Similarly, to the Thracian king his queen, a loyal sister but a treacherous mother, served their murdered son, Itys.<sup>69</sup> Such delicacies as these mark the tables of kings; I assure you this is not a poor man's fare.

228

TO A MAN WITH AN EXTREMELY LONG NOSE, FROM THE GREEK

5 If your nose should be pointed up toward the sun and your mouth kept open, you could show the time of day on your teeth.

229

TO A MAN COSMETICALLY BEAUTIFIED, FROM THE GREEK

5 Why do you buy rouge, hair, teeth, honey, and wax when at less expense you could buy a complete mask?

230

TO AN ACTOR, FROM THE GREEK

5 Your dancing in all respects but one was in harmony with the stories, but in one way—and that an important one—it was contrary to the story. While you played the part of Niobe, you stood as though made of stone; when you were Capaneus, you fell suddenly; but when you played Canace with the sword and came away alive, that was dancing contrary to the story.

231

ON AN ACTOR, FROM THE GREEK

Memphis danced the parts of Niobe and of Daphne. Daphne he played as though he were made of wood, Niobe as though made of stone.

232

THAT SOBER MEN ARE VERY SURLY,
FROM THE GREEK

In the evening, when we are drinking, we are human beings, and kind ones; but in the morning a man who gets up with a thirst is a savage beast to his fellow man. 5

233

TO ANDREW AS HE VOMITED
INTO THE SEA

You are a grateful and well-deserving person, Andrew, for you pay back the fish, which have so often fed you, by feeding them. 5

234

ON THE SAME ANDREW

You have eaten the fish which belong to the sea; the sea is angry and demands from your mouth her progeny.

235

TO A GIRL WHO RODE HER HORSE ASTRIDE

Well, my girl, no one could deny that you can take a man, since your legs can straddle so large a horse.

236

TO A FRENCHMAN WHO APPROPRIATED
THE POETRY OF THE ANCIENTS

Frenchman, the same insight and even the very same inspiration the ancient poets had now belongs to you. For the poems they wrote, and often the lines too, are the same as what you write. 5

237

ON A POVERTY-STRICKEN JOKESTER

When a jokester saw burglars searching his whole house with great care in the dark of night, he laughed and said, "I wonder what you see here in the middle of the night: I can see nothing in the middle of the day." 5

238

ON THE ANXIOUS LIFE OF RULERS

Immense power always brings miserable worries, tormented as it is by ever-present fears. Such a

<sup>68</sup> See Seneca, Thyestes 691–1006. <sup>69</sup> See Ovid, Metamorphoses 6.620–60.

5 person does not venture out unless surrounded by a large armed guard, does not eat food which has not been tasted in advance. Certainly these precautions are aids to safety; yet they show that a man is not safe if he cannot be safe without them. Thus a bodyguard reveals fear of an assassin's sword. A 10 food-taster manifests fear of poison. And so what place is without fear in such a life? — where even the very means of repelling what is to be feared themselves engender fear.

239

TO A STEPSON, CRUSHED BY THE FALL OF HIS STEPMOTHER'S STATUE,
 FROM THE GREEK

5 Putting wreaths of flowers on your stepmother's monument, you think that her death has put an end to her malicious behavior. But suddenly the column topples and crushes you. Stepson, if you are wise, flee even the tomb of your stepmother.

240

TO A CERTAIN POET WHO WROTE
 EXTEMPORE

5 Why do you inform us that you wrote these verses extempore? Your book, you see, apart from any explanation from you, tells us as much.

241

ON STEPMOTHERS, FROM THE GREEK

Even a loving stepmother is a misfortune to her stepson. Phaedra, so grievous to Hippolytus, proves the point.

242

TO ONE WHO SAID THAT HIS POEMS WOULD NOT LACK GENIUS

5 A witty epigram of the Spanish poet contains this thought: "To live, a book must have genius."<sup>70</sup> Having read this verse, you set your whole mind on writing poetry yourself, but it turns out to be mindless. The subject and style of your song are matters beneath your notice, such is your confidence that whatever you sing is sure to live by its own genius.
 10 For you have no doubt, O man of genius, that presently some sort of genius from somewhere or other will settle on your Muse. Instead you ought to hope

(this hope will be fulfilled) that this book of yours may have no genius, since it has no genuine talent.
 Any genius which might prolong the life of this book will be one of those evil geniuses which you have about you by the thousand. But, even so, your book will not live — if you can take the word of the same poet — for life does not mean merely living; it means living with health and strength. Still, if, for a 20 book, to live is to languish in unending infamy, then may yours also live in eternal death.

243

ON LUST FOR POWER

5 Among many kings there will be scarcely one, if there is really one, who is satisfied to have one kingdom. And yet among many kings there will be scarcely one, if there is really one, who rules a single kingdom well.

244

ON THE SURRENDER OF TOURNAI TO HENRY VIII, KING OF ENGLAND

5 Warlike Caesar vanquished you, Tournai, till then unconquered, but not without disaster to both sides.
 Henry, a king both mightier and better than Caesar, has taken you without bloodshed.<sup>71</sup> The king felt that he had gained honor by taking you, and you yourself felt it no less advantageous to be taken.

245

ON FABULLA AND ATTALUS

5 Recently when Fabulla was angry for some reason with Attalus and wanted to upset him and show how completely she scorned him, she swore to him that if she had a hundred of the parts which are exclusively a woman's she would not condescend to offer so much as one to Attalus. "Wouldn't you?" said he. "What the devil is this new restraint, this new stinginess of yours? Surely you used to be more generous. You couldn't bring yourself, you stingy 10 broad, to put at my disposal a single one from among a hundred? But once upon a time when you had only one, it was your kindly habit to offer that one to a hundred men a hundred times each. What a pity! I fear this unnatural frugality of yours, after 15 so long a time, may mean you have very bad times ahead of you."

246

ON THE FEVERISH PATIENT AND THE DRINKING PHYSICIAN

When a servant boy of mine was suffering from a semi-tertian fever, I chanced on that occasion to call upon the services of a Sarmatian physician. When he had applied his thumb and felt the boy's leaping pulse, he said, "His temperature is high, but it will go down." And so he asked for a cup and drained it to the last drop, as not even Bitias could have done. After his drink he urged the patient to a similar dose, and, in an effort to lend some reason to his conduct, he said, "This man's fever is unusually high; his drinks therefore must be unusually large. A large fire cannot be put out by a little liquid."

247

ON HESPERUS AT CONFESSION

When Hesperus was purging himself of his sins by confessing them to a priest in accordance with sacred usage, the priest, probing Hesperus's conscience, carefully sought for every kind of sin and, among many questions, asked if Hesperus had ever in pagan fashion believed in evil spirits. "What! I believe in evil spirits, Father?" said he; "I still have all I can do to believe in God."

248

ON THE GOD OPPORTUNITY,
FROM THE GREEK

From what place did this sculptor come?
Sicyon.
Well, who was he, tell me.
Lysippus.
Who are you?
I am Opportunity, master of all things.
Why are you standing on tiptoe?
I am always turning about.
But why do you have wings on your feet?
I move like a fleeting breeze.
Well, why is your right hand armed with a sharp razor?
It is symbolic of the fact that no fine edge can be compared with me.
Why does a lock of hair lie upon your brow?
Because if anyone tries to catch me, he must get ahead of me.
Why is the back of your head bald?

Because once I get away in headlong flight on my swift wings,
Anyone behind me who wants to bring me back will have no success whatever.

Thus the talented hand of the sculptor, as you may see,
Has displayed me in such form as to permit you to learn a lesson.

249

ON PHYLLIS AND PRISCUS, WHO LOVED WITH UNEQUAL FERVOR

The wedding of beautiful Phyllis and impatient Priscus is as happy as the mixing of foaming wine and crystal-clear water. Priscus's love for Phyllis is hotter than searing fire, Phyllis's for Priscus colder than ice water. Their union will be safe, for, if she should blaze along with him, what home could withstand two such flames at once?

250

ON ANCIENT COINS PRESERVED IN THE HOME OF JEROME BUSLEYDEN

What Rome once upon a time owed to her leaders, all those leaders, Busleyden,<sup>72</sup> owe to you. Rome was saved by her leaders; you preserve Rome's leaders, now that Rome is dead, for with devotion to antiquity you seek out and collect the old coins which present the features of the emperors or of men famous in imperial times or earlier; and these coins you reckon your only form of wealth. Now when thick dust conceals their triumphal arches, you keep the names and features of the triumphant heroes. The pyramids are not such memorials to their noble dead as your coin-box, Busleyden, has now become.

251

ANOTHER TO BUSLEYDEN

Why, my dear Busleyden, do you still keep your gentle Muse within the confines of your own writing box? Why do you keep her in the dark when she deserves the light? Why do you deny this favor to her? Why deny it to humanity? Your Muse ought to be known all over the world. Why do you refuse her this glory? And the whole world ought to enjoy your charming Muse. You alone thwart all men; why? Does it seem to you that the chaste band of maidens ought to be kept far from the society of men? This, I grant you, is for maidens a source of anxiety, but only for such as can be deprived of their virginity. Have no fear; publish your Muse — she has 15 an unyielding chastity which is neither awkward nor ignorant. Just as surely as your charming Muse will not be inferior to Diana herself in spotless chastity, so surely will she be not inferior to Minerva herself in taste, in wit, and in beauty.

<sup>72</sup> Jerome de Busleyden (ca. 1470–1517) was a distinguished humanist from the Netherlands. See his letter in Utopia, p. 212.

252

TO BUSLEYDEN ON HIS SPLENDID HOUSE AT MECHLIN

While recently I gazed with fascinated eyes at the tasteful decorations in your house, Busleyden, I was 5 amazed: by what incantation have you charmed the fates so as to bring back so many ancient masters? For I think that only the hands of Daedalus could have built that famous house of yours with its artfully winding passages.<sup>73</sup> The pictures here Apelles
 10 seems to have painted. The sculptures one might believe to be the work of Myron. When I looked upon the works modelled in clay I thought them the product of Lysippus's art. The statues made me think of the master Praxiteles. Couplets identify every 15 work of art, but couplets such as Vergil, if he did not write them, might wish that he had. Only the organ which imitates such a range of voices with its pipes is, I think, beyond the powers even of the ancients. And so your whole house is either a noble 20 work of antiquity or a modern work such as to surpass antiquity. But may this house, which is now new, be long and slow to grow old, and even then may it see its master not yet grown old.

253

ON THE FAITHLESS MARRIAGE OF PHILOMENUS AND AGNA

Behold in our time such miracles of Venus as I think were not brought to pass even in the days
 5 of old. Philomenus, flower of the young men, and Agna, flower of the girls, were formally joined by the kindness of the Paphian goddess. But he, unfortunately, was vain of his overrated voice, and she was proud of the praise her gentle disposition had 10 won. Their marriage, for which they had prayed so often, they attributed not to Venus but to themselves. Because of their ingratitude, the goddess changed their shapes, and, lest they come together after the change, she made them into incompatible species. Soon Philomenus was changed to the bird 15 which sings each summer, the cuckoo; and Agna became an insatiable she-wolf.

254

REMEDIES FOR ENDING THE FOUL BREATH
 WHICH RESULTS FROM CERTAIN FOODS

So that your chopped leeks may not waft their loathsome odors, take my advice and eat an onion right
 5 after the leeks. Then again if you want to get rid of the foul smell of the onion, the chewing of garlic will easily accomplish that for you. But if your breath remains offensive even after the garlic, then either it is incurable or nothing but shit will remove it.

255

TO THE READER, ON THE TRANSLATION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT
 BY ERASMUS OF ROTTERDAM<sup>74</sup>

A holy work, an immortal achievement of the learned Erasmus is coming out; and how great 5 are the advantages it brings to men! for the New Law was first marred by the ancient translator and then further damaged by the inaccurate copying of scribes. Jerome long ago may have removed errors, but his readings, excellent as they were, have been 10 lost by long neglect. That is why the whole work has been corrected and translated anew. And Christ's New Law shines with new splendor. Erasmus has not ostentatiously disputed the text word by word; he has considered inviolable whatever is at least 15 passable. And so it is that, if anyone skims over this version in rapid flight, he would perhaps think that nothing of importance is afoot, but, if he retraces his steps closely, he will decide that nothing could be finer or more helpful. 20

256

TO THE MOST REVEREND, ETC.,
 THOMAS, CARDINAL AND ARCHBISHOP OF YORK, ON THE NEW TESTAMENT
 PRESENTED TO HIM BY ERASMUS

Incomparable father and patron of learned men,<sup>75</sup>
 5 you to whose words the Pierian band listens with admiration, you whose honors, despite the respect

73 See Ovid, Metamorphoses 8.159–61.

74 Erasmus's New Testament, which contained the Greek text, a Latin translation, and commentary, was published in 1516.

75 Cardinal Wolsey (ca. 1450–1532) and esteem of the people, fall far short of your 10 worth—this book of yours has come a long way, from your friend Erasmus. I beg that you receive it in the same spirit which prompted him to send it.

 Nor have I any doubt that you will do so, for the au-15 thor will quite rightly win favor for his work, and the work for its author. Erasmus has always been among your admirers; the work itself is the law of Christ, which has ever been your preoccupation.
 That law provides you with the prudence and the authority which enable you to administer justice 20 even in the face of carping critics. For when disputants engage in intricate quarrels, to the amazement of ordinary people, you sort everything out so well that even the loser cannot complain. It is no mere human adroitness which enables you to do this, but the law of Christ, the sole criterion on which your 25 judgments rest. Therefore, most worthy prelate, accept this book with serenity and favor and continue in the future to cherish the author as you do now.

257

TO THE MOST REVEREND, ETC., ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY

That you were right, devout prelate,<sup>76</sup> in bestowing such numerous and generous gifts on your protégé
 5 Erasmus, how far he is from wasting the leisure you provide for him, is shown by many things, but above all by this work. Though he has published many books, and they have exercised a wholesome influence, this new one surpasses all that have pre-10 ceded it. The advantages which this book brings belong to all, but the honor it confers is shared by you and him. He provided the labor; you, kind bishop, provided the support. Yet wholeheartedly he yields his share of the credit to you; whatever he does, he 15 imputes it to your merits. The fruit that he seeks from his labor, kind father, is this: that by this book you win the love of all men, and that he win yours.

258

EPITAPH ON THE TOMB OF JANE, DECEASED WIFE OF MORE, WHO INTENDS
 THE SAME TOMB FOR HIMSELF AND ALICE, HIS SECOND WIFE

5 Here lies Jane, the beloved wife of Thomas More, who intend that this same tomb shall be Alice's and mine, too. One of them, my wife in the years of our vigorous youth, has made me father of a son and three daughters; the other has been as devoted to 10 her stepchildren (a rare and splendid attainment in a stepmother) as very few mothers are to their own children. The one lived out her life with me, and the other still lives with me on such terms that I cannot decide whether I did love the one or do love the 15 other more. O, how happily we could have lived all three together if fate and religion permitted. But the grave will unite us, and I pray that heaven will unite us too. Thus death will give what life could not.

259

TO HIMSELF AS HE REJOICED

AT HAVING ESCAPED FROM A STORM

What good is it to have escaped the raging tempests of the sea? Your joy must be either brief or ground-5 less. It is like the relief which suddenly flashes upon men sick with fever, as the painful fits go away and return in their fixed cycles. How many more troubles await you on the land you yearned for than you would have had to endure on the rushing turmoil of 10 the sea. Your death will be ushered in by the scalpel or various diseases, any one of which is more grievous to bear than death itself. Yes, that same death which you escaped to no purpose on the swelling sea will overwhelm you on your pillow, only more 15 treacherously.

260

TO A CERTAIN FAT PRIEST WHOSE HABIT

IT WAS TO SAY "LEARNING PUFFS UP"

According to you, though others are puffed up with learning, as Paul teaches,<sup>77</sup> you avoid it. How is it 5 then, O substantial father, that you are so swollen?
 You can hardly manage your bloated belly with its flabby paunch, and your mind is puffed up with empty folly.

261

TO CHELONUS

Why is the name of stolid ass so hateful to you?
 Once upon a time a philosopher was great on this account, Chelonus. Still, lest you be thought not to 5 differ from him at all, he was golden, you are more leaden. He had the mind of a man in the body of an ass; you have, in the body of a man, the mind of an ass.

262

ON A CAT AND A MOUSE

When I held out to the cat the mouse I had taken from a trap she did not immediately and ravenously eat her prize. With great restraint she placed her 5 trembling prey on open ground and happily toyed with it in extraordinary fashion. She twitched her tail, watched the mouse with shifty eyes, and playfully turned her head from side to side. Gently, with a paw, she provoked the terrified mouse into mov-10 ing, and when it started to move she stopped it; and alternately she let it go and caught it again. Soon with her paw she tossed it up high and caught it in her mouth. Then she walked away from it and gave it the false hope of still being able to escape. She 15 lay down to watch at a distance, and, as the mouse made off, she joyfully leaped upon it and immediately returned to the spot from which it had fled.
 Again she left it, and, with amazing perception, the wicked creature made tests of the poor mouse's in-20 tentions. While she was repeating this performance and confidently going farther away, the mouse suddenly found a crack and was gone. The cat rushed to the hole and sat on guard — in vain. The mouse, protected in its hiding place, was safe from its enemy.
 25 It would have died in the trap if what ordinarily destroys it had not protected and saved it — a cat.

263

HE EXPRESSES HIS JOY AT FINDING SAFE AND SOUND HER WHOM HE HAD ONCE LOVED AS A MERE BOY

You are really still alive, Elizabeth, dearer to me in 5 my early years than I was myself, and once again my eyes behold you. What bad luck has kept you from me all these many years! When I was just a boy, I saw you first; now when I am almost an old man, I see you again. Sixteen years I had lived — you were 10 about two years younger — when your face inspired me with innocent devotion. That face is now no part of your appearance; where has it gone? When the vision I once loved comes before me, I see, alas, how utterly your actual appearance fails to resemble 15 it. The years, always envious of young beauty, have robbed you of yourself but have not robbed me of you. That beauty of countenance to which my eyes so often clung now occupies my heart. It is natural for a dying fire, though buried in its own cold ashes, 20 to flare up when a gust of air blows on it. And however much you are changed from what you were, you make the old flame glow by giving me this new reminder. There comes now to my mind that distant day which first revealed you to me as you enjoyed yourself amid a band of dancing maidens. Your yel- 25 low hair enhanced the pure white of your neck; your cheeks looked like snow, your lips like roses; your eyes, like two stars, dazed our eyes and through my eyes made their way into my heart: I was helpless, as though stunned by a lightning-stroke, when I gazed 30 and continued to gaze upon your face. Then, too, our comrades and yours laughed at our love, so awkward, so frank and so obvious. Thus did your beauty take me captive. Either yours was perfect beauty, or I lent it more perfection than it had; perhaps the stir- 35 rings of adolescence and the ardor which accompanies the approach of manhood were the reason, or perhaps certain stars we shared at birth had influenced both our hearts. For a gossipy companion of yours who was in on the secret revealed that your 40 heart, too, was moved. On this account a chaperon was imposed upon us, and a door strong enough to thwart our very destiny kept apart a pair whom the stars wished to bring together. And then that nota- 45 ble day after so many years brought us together, far separated though we were in the pursuit of our different destinies, that day propitious in my finding you alive and well — seldom in my life have I met a happier day. Once upon a time you innocently stole 50 my heart; now too, and innocently still, you are dear to me. Our love was blameless; if duty could not keep it so, that day itself would be enough to keep love blameless still. Well, I beg the saints above, who, after twenty-five years, have kindly brought us to- 55 gether in good health, that I may be preserved to see you safe and sound again at the end of twenty-five years more.

264

THOMAS MORE SENDS BEST WISHES TO HIS BELOVED CHILDREN, MARGARET, ELIZABETH CECILIA, AND JOHN

I hope that a single letter to all four of you may find my children in good health and that your fa- 5 ther's good wishes may keep you so. In the meantime, while I am making a journey, drenched by a soaking rain, and while my mount, too frequently, is bogged down in the mud, I compose these verses for you in the hope that, although unpolished, they 10 may give you pleasure. From these verses you may gather an indication of your father's feelings for you—how much more than his own eyes he loves you; for the mud, the miserably stormy weather, 15 and having to urge a small horse through deep waters have not been able to distract his thoughts from you or to prevent his proving that, wherever he is, he thinks of you. For instance, when—and it is often—his horse stumbles and threatens to fall, your father 20 is not interrupted in the composition of his verses.

 Many people can hardly write poetry even when their hearts are at ease, but a father's love duly provides verses even when he is in distress. It is not so strange that I love you with my whole heart, for be-25 ing a father is not a tie which can be ignored. Nature in her wisdom has attached the parent to the child and bound their minds together with a Herculean knot. Thence comes that tenderness of a loving heart that accustoms me to take you so often into my 30 arms. That is why I regularly fed you cake and gave you ripe apples and fancy pears. That is why I used to dress you in silken garments and why I never could endure to hear you cry. You know, for example, how often I kissed you, how seldom I whipped you. My 35 whip was never anything but a peacock's tail. Even this I wielded hesitantly and gently so as not to mark your tender backsides with painful welts. Ah, brutal and unworthy to be called father is he who does not himself weep at the tears of his child. How other 40 fathers act I do not know, but you know well how soft and kind I am by temperament, for I have always intensely loved the children I begot, and I have always been (as a father should be) easy to win over.
 But now my love has grown so much that it seems 45 to me I did not love you at all before. This is because you combine the wise behavior of old age with the years of childhood, because your hearts have been informed with genuine learning, because you have learned to speak with grace and eloquence, weigh-50 ing each word carefully. These accomplishments tug at my heart so wonderfully, they bind me to my children so closely, that what, for many fathers, is the only reason for their affection—I mean the fact that they begot their children—has almost nothing to do 55 with my love for you. Therefore, my dear little troop of children, continue to endear yourselves to your father and, by those same accomplishments which make me think that I had not loved you before, make me think hereafter (for you can do it) that I do 60 not love you now.

265

HE APOLOGIZES BECAUSE WHILE CONVERSING WITH A PROMINENT CLERIC
 HE HAD FAILED TO NOTICE A CERTAIN NOBLE LADY WHO ENTERED THE ROOM AND STOOD BESIDE THEM FOR 5
 SOME TIME AS THEY TALKED

Mighty prelate, on that recent occasion when your Excellency saw fit to pay me a call and to enter my humble house, while you were conversing with me so pleasantly that my attention was entirely focused 10 on your countenance, observe! a lady entered—as my servants informed me too late, yesterday in fact, when the matter was many days past. Her splendid attire was eye-catching, but it was outshone by 15 her beauty, which is in turn surpassed by her virtue. She came right up to our couch and stood very near me for a long time, right at my elbow. She selected and examined some ancient coins, and famous herself, found pleasure in the famous portraits on them. She deigned to take some sweets 20 from my scanty table, and their taste grew sweeter in her own sweet mouth. And yet our eyes failed to observe even so brilliant a beauty as hers. Alas, for my inborn dullness, duller than dull! Now I forgive 25 my servants for not warning me. Surely no one of them thought his master so dull. O eyes, which used to be able to perceive from a distance such splendor radiating from any girl! Have I grown old? And is perception dulled in this body of mine? Or did 30 an evil spirit attend my rising that morning? Or did you beguile me with your charming conversation so that I was unable to be aware of anything but you?
 Orpheus, by his skill with the lyre, entranced wild beasts;<sup>78</sup> I too was cast into a trance by your mellifluous speech. But that charm of yours imposed the 35 great risk that the lady think I had neglected her, a risk that I be reported to have seen her, standing so near to me, out of the corner of my eye and then pretended not to have seen her. But I would that the earth split open and swallow me rather than 40 that there be found in my heart a rudeness so brutal that when a fair nymph, wafted so to speak by some breath of air, enters my room, I fail to look at her at least (if the occasion allows no more) and, if it is permitted, fairly win her favor. How miserable it is 45 not to be able to speak! For whoever cannot deny anything because he does not speak the language, tacitly admits everything. Now, because I have little command of French (my lady speaks only her native 50 French), I shall be innocent in the eyes of all, but not forgiven by the one lady in whose court my plea must stand or fall. He who was wounded long ago by the Haemonian spear, from that same spear won 55 help.<sup>79</sup> Since your gift of charming speech (which made me forget myself and ignore the lady) was the cause of this disgraceful deed, your gift of charming speech ought to wipe away this disgrace and restore me to my lady's good graces.

266

VERSES QUOTED FROM BRIXIUS'S
ANTIMORUS BECAUSE THEY ARE THE SUBJECT OF THE EPIGRAM BELOW

About my ears as I said these things there hovered 5 all the goddesses of vengeance and the Furies, a troop roused from the nethermost depths: Alecto and Tisiphone, her head surrounded by loathsome snakes, and frightful Megaera, with her savage face.

MORE

10 After Brixius heard that many readers had complained that he wrote only lies, in order to correct this defect he then decided to publish something which would be true, which would be unquestioned, which no one would contradict, 15 even though Brixius was the author. It was difficult for him to find anything which his own lack of truth had not robbed of credibility. But when he had looked about, pondered long, and forced his mind to consider everything, then at last he did find 20 one thing which all mankind unanimously agrees is truer than any truth; and, most charming fellow that he is, he wrote that all the Furies surrounded his charming head.

267

ON THE SHIP CORDELIÈRE AND THE ANTIMORUS, A COLLECTION OF POEMS BY THE FRENCHMAN GERMANUS BRIXIUS

Behold, Germanus Brixius, rich in resources on both 5 land and sea, has a forest [sylva] and a raft. Do you want to know what advantage each affords him? His follies ride his raft, the Furies inhabit his forest.

268

ON THE FOLLOWING HENDECASYLLABIC, OR RATHER THIRTEEN-SYLLABLE, VERSE FROM THE ANTIMORUS OF THE FRENCHMAN GERMANUS BRIXIUS

To discover and to offer to the gaze of men. 5

MORE

After being puzzled on frequent occasions over a long period at your writing verses so immoderately long—such verses as no poet, ancient or modern, ever wrote—I set about to discover, Brixius, how 10 this had happened to you. And, finally, I found that it is your custom to measure your verses not by meter or by feet but by the yard.

269

ON THE SAME TOPIC

Reader, forgive Germain for putting thirteen syllables into a poem in hendecasyllabics. He has hardly learned to count well enough to go in order correctly from one to eleven. Let him not count for 5 me the stars or the waves of the sea or—this is a more difficult task—the errors in his own poetry.
 If he can count the years of the siege of Troy or the nine Muses or the eight legs of Cancer or the seven mouths of the Nile or, Ovid, the immortal books of 10 your Fasti; if he can count the regions of the sky or the horses of Phoebus or the three Furies (although he is three times as mad as three Furies could make him); if he can count his own—but I won't gamble without stakes, if I lose I want it to be a big loss—if 15 he can count, I say, his own eyes (though he has just two), then I'll let you gouge out one of his.

THE END

<sup>79</sup> Alluding to Telephus, who was wounded by Achilles' spear. See Ovid, Amores 2.9.7–9; Metamorphoses 13.171–72.

POEMS IN THE 1518 EDITION
BUT NOT IN THE 1520 EDITION

270

ON FATE, FROM THE GREEK

If you are being borne along, then be borne along and bear with it. But if you become angry, then not only will you do yourself harm but also whatever 5 bears you will continue to do so—yes, will even drag you.

271

ON JAMES, KING OF THE SCOTS

While loyal Henry with victorious armies was reclaiming you, France, for the Roman Pontiff, behold! James, King of the Scots, was disloyally try-5 ing to take by armed force the kingdom of the Britons. The treaties he had so often sworn to did not deter him from bearing arms against his own wife's brother, or from joining the French enemy 10 of Peter. It is no wonder that as a man he committed these crimes; before this as a boy he dyed his young hands in his father's blood. Therefore, in accordance with the will of God, he has perished amid the slaughter of his men. And the result of wrong-15 doing was just what it usually is.

POEMS NOT IN THE EDITIONS OF 1518 OR 1520

272

[VERSES FROM THE LAST OF A SERIES OF NINE PAGEANTS PAINTED ON CLOTH]
THE POET<sup>80</sup>

If anyone delights in looking at these imaginary fig-
5 ures, but (because of the painter's marvelous skill) thinks them to be real men, he can feast his mind on the realities themselves, just as he feasts his eyes upon the painted images. For he will see that the elusive goods of this perishable world do not come 10 so readily as they pass away. Pleasures, praise, homage, all things quickly disappear—except the love of God, which endures forever. Therefore, mortals, put no confidence hereafter in trivialities, no hope in transitory advantage; offer your prayers to the everlasting God, who will grant us the gift of eternal life. 15

273

ON THE SCHOLARLY LABORS OF HOLT, AN EPIGRAM BY THE LEARNED YOUTH THOMAS MORE

This gentle book of Holt's<sup>81</sup> which you are reading, these kindly pilferings, whether you are man or boy, 5 you are to call by the name "Milk for Children." In my judgment this book which gives to boys lessons like milk has a pleasant name and an appropriate one, too. Read these lessons, you young men of En-10 gland; it is for your very great advantage that the book, small though it be, appears. The few rules arranged in a tiny book which you read in a few days Holt with sleepless effort has sought out and chosen from countless volumes. He wandered diligently all 15 over the fields. How well he has performed the task of the honey-gathering bee! In his travels whatever tasty honey he gathered into sweet stores he has brought to this little hive. Let this work be the introduction, the door to the rest of grammar, for 20 the English youth who wish to enter. To be sure, learned men built doors before this one, but each of them imposed his limits because he used the Latin language. What good to you is a strong larder if a 25 door which you cannot open keeps you from the sumptuous food? English boy, how will you manage in Latin? You cannot, on the first day, understand Latin words. It is only proper that while you are young you lie under a protector's wings and that you learn the foreign language by means of your na-30 tive speech. A door to grammar in English had been built long before, if we confess the truth. But that door was old, marked by frequent knocking, such a door as barely squeaks open to perpetual pounding.
Our door is new and very easy for the young crowd.
35 How promptly it opens at the slightest tapping of a finger!

274

AN EPIGRAM BY THOMAS MORE

Good boy! Rejoice whoever you are if you have been nourished, to your delight, by Holt's elegant book.

80 An alternate translation of this poem appears in More's English Poetry (see p. 4).

81 John Holt's Lac puerorum, anglice mylke for chyldren, a Latin grammar

He does not offer you meat or the bitter berries of 5 the arbutus tree. He gives you cups aflow with sweet milk. Lumps of meat lie heavy on a tender stomach, and arbutus berries are mere moisture, such as belongs to tasteless water. But milk nourishes without 10 distress even a child, and the taste of milk is sweet in the mouth of the young. That is why you have been fed on this. It was clear that this was the proper way: your constitution, so undeveloped, could not bear great burdens. Now that you have been 15 weaned, we suggest a diet not too bland; take something stouter. That is, dine most elegantly at the un-troubled board of Sulpicius<sup>82</sup> or eat your fill of the helpful nourishment of Phocas; or drink the new wine of Perotti of Siponto<sup>83</sup> or the potions aged in 20 the casks of Diomedes.<sup>84</sup> Or choose any other you may wish to follow, provided that he knows how to combine what is pleasant with what is useful.<sup>85</sup> But you who take Holt's advice and you who take mine will be eager for the teachings of Sulpicius above all.
 Holt has left heteroclitics and the gender of the var-25 ious nouns to be learned from Sulpicius. There you will read what is the right construction, but only after you have studied the past tenses and the su-pines which belong to each verb. And if you are industrious, you will learn finally that by far the most 30 beautiful poems are those which have kept within their boundaries. Therefore, you young men, when you have entered the company of the Muses, when, thanks to Sulpicius, you carry your plectrum and lyre, then say, "When my right hand could not hold 35 the lyre, it was Holt who offered a pap welcome to my lips."

275

THOMAS MORE ON LINACRE'S
 PROGYMNASMATA

Whoever reads with care these rules by the learned Linacre<sup>86</sup> will, if he retains what he reads here, want 5 to say, "After so many huge volumes on grammar, this book, small as it is, has not come out in vain.
 The book is very small, but, like a sparkling jewel, with its diminutive size it has high value."

276

Verses on a two-part picture, in which Erasmus and Peter Giles are portrayed together by the outstanding artist Quentin<sup>87</sup> in such a way that near Erasmus, as he begins his Paraphrase of the Epistle to the Romans, the books in the picture reveal their titles, 5 and Peter holds a letter written to him in More's hand — even this the painter has put in the picture.<sup>88</sup>

THE PICTURE SPEAKS

I show Erasmus and Giles, friends as dear to each other as were Castor and Pollux of old. More grieves to be absent from them in space, since in affection he is united with them so closely that a man could scarcely be closer to himself. They arranged to satisfy their absent friend's longing for them: a loving letter represents their minds, I their bodies. 15

MORE HIMSELF SPEAKS

I think you recognize from their faces those whom you see here if you have ever seen them before. If not, then the letter written to the one will identify him; and notice, so that you should know the name 20 of the other, he is writing it himself. To be sure, the books which bear his name — so well known and widely read all over the world — could tell you who he is, even if he himself were not doing so. Quentin, 25 reviver of an ancient art, not less an artist than great Apelles, marvelously gifted to lend life by a mixture of colors to lifeless shapes, alas, why were you satisfied to paint on perishable wood portraits so painstakingly, so beautifully, done — portraits of such 30 men as antiquity produced but seldom, such men as our own day produces less frequently still, such men as the future, I suspect, may not produce at all.
 These portraits you have done ought to have been entrusted to a more enduring medium which could 35 preserve through the years what it had received.
 O, if you could only have looked out for your own fame and the desires of posterity; for if future ages preserve any love of the fine arts and if savage warfare does not obliterate the arts, then what a price 40 posterity would pay for this picture!

<sup>82</sup> Johannes Sulpitius Verulanus, a fifteenth-century humanist <sup>83</sup> Niccolo Perotti (1429–80), Archbishop of Siponto

<sup>84</sup> the fourth-century grammarian
<sup>85</sup> pleasant . . . useful: See Horace, Ars
Poetica 343. <sup>86</sup> Thomas Linacre

(ca. 1460–1524). The Progygnasmata was an elementary Latin grammar. <sup>87</sup> Quentin Metsys <sup>88</sup> See Letters 46 and 47.

277

[ON A FRIAR WHO OBJECTED TO COMPARING FRIENDS WITH BROTHERS]

To show that two men were great friends, I recently said in a few lines of verse that they were as great 5 friends as Castor and Pollux were of old. A foolish friar said, “It is foolish to compare friends to brothers.” “Why not?” I answered. “Do you think that any man can be a better friend to another than brother is to brother?” He laughed at my extraordi-10 nary ignorance — that I should be unaware of so obvious a fact. He said, “We have a large and crowded monastery with more than two hundred brothers, but from among the two hundred I’d wager my life
you won’t find two brothers who are friends.”

278

A QUATRAIN OF SIR THOMAS MORE,
WRITTEN THREE YEARS BEFORE HE DIED

You are playing the fool if you expect to stay long here below. Even a fool, More,<sup>89</sup> can tell you that 5 much. Stop playing the fool and contemplate staying in heaven. Even a fool, More, can tell you that much.

ANOTHER DISTYCH BY
THE SAME AUTHOR WRITTEN AT THE SAME TIME

10

You who remember More,<sup>90</sup> may your lifetime be long and your death an open gate to eternal life.

279

A QUATRAIN BY THOMAS MORE

If your taste is for poetry or for prose, if piety or learning delights you, then read these works by Bus-leyden, who is inspired by Apollo and the Muses, and who is the precious glory of his native land. 5

280

The things you sent me to read I have read, but I read them with both pleasure and pain, happy to see nothing utterly horrible. The author himself corresponds to these writings of his: a man never good, and always the best, a man truly bad, the best of the 5 bad.

281

[A MATHEMATICAL MNEMONIC]

Subtract more from more. Subtract less from less.
Add less to more. Add more to less.

<sup>89</sup> In Greek, “More” means “fool.”

<sup>90</sup> The Latin reveals a pun on memento mori, an adage meaning “remember death,”

such that Mori here means both “More” and “death.”

Thomas More's Chelsea Manor, recreated here from existing records by Michael Hall, was a working farm and a place of government that More built in 1525 while serving as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. Situated on the River Thames, the Manor provided More quickest access downstream to Westminster, London, and Greenwich; upstream to Hampton Court and Windsor. For the "arrangement of the original garden space within the manor's layout," see C. Paul Christianson, The Riverside Gardens of Thomas More's London (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2005).

Letters: 1501 to March 1534

Composed in Latin and English, Thomas More's correspondence is divided into three sections in this book: (1) Letters from 1501 to March 1534; (2) Letters on humanism from 1505 to 1520; and (3) Letters from More's imprisonment, from April 1534 to July 5, 1535, the day before his execution on Tower Hill, by nine o'clock in the morning, as the King's order directed.

More's letters display the remarkable range of his many relationships and offices, both public and private, as well as the author's rhetorical art. As Judith Henderson points out in "On Reading the Rhetoric of the Renaissance Letter," Erasmus's Opus de conscribendis epistolis "classifies letters under the traditional causae of the oration: deliberative, demonstrative, and judicial." The scheme is his own, but it continues the medieval tradition by recognizing the letter as an exercise of persuasion. To this classification, he adds two other classes which might be said to incorporate the special contribution of the humanists: familiar letters and letters discussing issues of scholarship (Renaissance-Rhetorik, NY: Gruyter, 1993, p. 150). More writes all five of these types of letters, and ranges, as Elizabeth McCutcheon observes, from "his defensive postures and his commitment to Erasmian humanism" to "the young intellectual, the wit and jokester, the man of letters, the educator, the father and family man, the mature scholar-critic, the patron, the busy administrator, the tenacious opponent of heresy, the man facing his own immanent death" (Moreana nos. 201-2 [Dec. 2015]: 382). Addressees of More's letters include King Henry, More's fellow humanists, More's professional colleagues and associates, and More's family.

One common theme informing these letters is friendship in a variety of forms, from civic to intimate. As Erasmus writes in his 1519 letter to Ulrich von Hutten, More "seems born and designed" for friendship, and the record of More's correspondence supports this claim of a life rich in friendship.

Surveying the letters, Elizabeth Rogers writes: "The letters we read may sometimes be disappointingly few or tantalizing in their brevity, but they nevertheless show the wide circle of his friends, not only in England, but also in the Low Countries and in France" (Corr xiii). Regarding the preservation of the letters, Rogers remarks that it is primarily "through the deep regard of his friends that More's letters have come down to us," with another source being the State Papers archive (xiv). Of course, friendship is not the only concern in More's letters. The letter to the University of Oxford, for example, addresses liberal education, while other letters address scholarly achievements and theological controversies, and later, the drama of More's arrest, imprisonment, interrogations, and last days.

More's letters remain as varied and complex as the public and private life of Thomas More; they constitute indeed something like a "life in letters" of the author. As Moreana's founding editor, Germain Marc'hadour, wrote in 2004, "No likeness of More can be truer than his own works, especially his letters," texts which disclose "every facet of More's many-sided personality."

Regarding the composition of letters at the time, Elizabeth Rogers explains, "A letter was usually written on a sheet of rag paper about eight by eleven inches. The top of that letter was folded down, and the lower part folded up so that the edges just overlapped. The sides were folded in, deeply overlapping. A pen-knife then cut slits through these folds. A wedge of paper was inserted and its narrow end caught with sealing wax. The wide end of the wedge was wrapped around the letter to prevent its being opened, and that end was sealed with wax. The writer's die (More sometimes used an antique gem) was pressed into the wax. The folded letter was then a rectangle about three by five and a half inches. Even so, letters were often broken open by unauthorized persons, perhaps destroyed, perhaps re-sealed and sent on" (Corr xv-xvi).

ABBREVIATIONS

CW	The Complete Works of St. Thomas More , followed by volume and page numbers
CWE	The Collected Works of Erasmus , followed by volume and page numbers
Corr	The Correspondence of Sir Thomas More , followed by page numbers
EE	Erasmi Epistolae , followed by letter number
SL	Selected Letters , followed by page numbers
Stapleton	Thomas Stapleton's The Life and Illustrious Martyrdom of Sir Thomas More , trans. Philip E. Hallett (London: Burns and Oats, 1928), followed by page numbers

CONTENTS

The prefatory number of each letter corresponds to The Correspondence of Sir Thomas More, ed. Elizabeth Rogers.

The symbols < > indicate uncertainty about the date or place.

* These letters were written in English; the others, in Latin.

LETTER NUMBER	SOURCE TEXT
2. To John Holt. <ca. November 1501, London>	SL 1-3, from Corr 3-5
3. To John Colet. 23 October <1504>, London	SL 3-6, from Corr 5-9
4. To Sister Joyce Leigh. <ca. 1 January 1505?, London>	CW 1: 51-52. See Life of Pico , p. 63.
5. To Thomas Ruthall. <1506, London>	CW 3.1: 2-8. See Lucian Tran. , p. 20.
6. To Henry VIII. <ca. June 1509, London>	CW 3.2: 97-99. See Epigrams , p. 224.
7. From Erasmus. 9 June 1510	Praise of Folly , Yale UP, 1979; EE 222
8. To John Colet. <ca. March 1512? London?>	SL 6, from Corr 15
15. To Martin Dorp. 21 October <1515>, Bruges	CW 15: 3-127. See Hum. Letters , p. 391.
16. To Erasmus. <ca. 17 February 1516, London>	SL 64-73, from EE 388
17. To Cuthbert Tunstall. <1516?, London>	Stapleton 84-85
20. To Erasmus. 3 September <1516>, London	SL 73-75, from EE 461
22. To Erasmus. <ca. 20 September 1516, London>	SL 75-76, from EE 467
23. To Erasmus. <22 September 1516>, London	SL 76-77, from EE 468
25. To Peter Giles. <1516, London>	CW 4: 39-45. See Utopia , p. 152.
26. To Erasmus. 31 October <1516>, London	SL 78-81, from EE 481
28. To Cuthbert Tunstall. <ca. November 1516, London>	SL 81-82, from Corr 84-85
29. To Erasmus. <ca. 4 December 1516, London>	SL 83-85, from EE 499
30. To Erasmus. 15 December <1516>, London	SL 85-88, from EE 502
31. To William Warham. <January 1517, London>	SL 88-89, from Corr 85-87
32. To a Member of the Royal Court. <January 1517, London>	SL 90, from Corr 87
33. To Erasmus. 13 January <1517, London>	CWE 4: 182-83, from EE 513
34. To Antonio <Bonvisi?>. <January 1517?, London>	SL 90, from Corr 87-88
37. To Cuthbert Tunstall. <1517?, London>	SL 90-91, from Corr 88-89
40. To Erasmus. 16 July <1517>, London	CWE 5: 16-18, from EE 601
41. To Erasmus. 19 August <1517>, London	CWE 5: 67-68, from EE 623
41a. To Peter Giles. <1517, London>	CW 4: 249-53. See Utopia , p. 214.
43. To His Daughters and to Margaret Giggs. <1517?>	SL 91-93, from Corr 96-98
46. To Erasmus. 7 October <1517>, Calais	CWE 5: 147-49, from EE 683
47. To Peter Giles. 7 October <1517, Calais>	CWE 5: 149-51, from EE 684
52. To Erasmus. 25 October <1517>, Calais	CWE 5: 157-58, from EE 688

LETTER NUMBER

54. To Erasmus. 5 November <1517>, Calais
 57. To Bishop John Fisher. <ca. 1517-18>
 60. To the University of Oxford. 29 March <1518>, Abingdon
 62. To Erasmus. <ca. May 1518, England>
 63. To William Gonell. 22 May <1518?>, at Court
 65. To William Budé. <ca. August 1518>
 69. To Margaret More. <1518>
 70. To Margaret More. <1518>
 71. To Reginald Pole and John Clement. <1518>
 72. To Erasmus. <1518?, London>
 74. To Bishop John Fisher. <1519?>
 75. To Edward Lee. 1 May 1519
 76. To His Beloved Children. <ca. 1519>
 82. To Martin Dorp. <1519, London>
 83. To a Monk. <1519-20>
 86. To Germanus Brixius. 1520
 87. To Erasmus. <March-April 1520, Greenwich?>
 88. To Erasmus. <End of February-April 1520, Greenwich?>
 90. From Erasmus. 26 April 1520, Antwerp
 91. To Erasmus. <Early May> 1520, <Greenwich?>
 93. To Erasmus. 26 May <1520>, Canterbury
 96. To William Budé. <ca. June 1520, Calais>
 97. To William Budé. <ca. June 1520, Calais>
 101. To His School. 23 March <1521>, at Court
 103a.* From Henry VIII. 23 July <1521>, Windsor
 103b.* From Henry VIII. 23 July <1521>, Windsor
 105. To Bishop John Fisher. <1521>
 106. To Margaret Roper. <1521?>
 106a. To Francis Cranevelt. 13 February <1521>, at Court
 106b. To Francis Cranevelt. 9 April <1521>, London
 106c. To Francis Cranevelt. <September 1521, London>
 106d. To Francis Cranevelt. 12 November. <1521>, <Chelsea?>
 107. To His Children and Margaret Giggs. 3 Sept. <1522?>, at Court
 108. To Margaret <Roper>. 11 September <1522?>, at Court
 108a. To Francis Cranevelt. <March? 1522, Chelsea?>
 110.* To Cardinal Wolsey. 21 September <1522>, New Hall
 111. From Bishop Cuthbert Tunstall. <ca. October 1522>, London
 113. To Conrad Goclenius. <ca. November 1522>, London
 117.* To Cardinal Wolsey. 1 September <1523>, Woking
 128. To Margaret Roper. <Autumn 1523, Woodstock?>
 133. To the University of Oxford. 26 July <1524>, London
 135. To Francis Cranevelt. 10 August <1524>, London
 136.* To Cardinal Wolsey. 29 November <1524>, Hertford
 138. To Francis Cranevelt. 16 May <1525>, London
 139. To Francis Cranevelt. 6 June <1525>, London
 142. To Francis Cranevelt. 22 February <1526>, London
 142a. From Dr. Johann Eck. <ca. February 1526>, Ingolstadt 143. To John Bugenhagen. <ca. 1526>

SOURCE TEXT

- CWE* 5: 188-90, from EE 706
SL 93-94, from Corr 110-11
CW 15: 131-49. See Hum. Letters, p. 427.
 Stapleton 57
SL 103-7, from Corr 120-23
SL 107-9, from Corr 124-25
SL 109, from Corr 134
SL 109-10, from Corr 134-35
 Stapleton 45-46
SL 110-11, from EE 907
 Stapleton 48
CW 15: 153-95. See Hum. Letters, p. 421.
CW 3.2: 279-83. See Epigram 264 above.
SL 111-14, from Corr 164-65
CW 15: 197-311. See Hum. Letters, p. 431.
CW 3.2: 595-659. See Hum. Letters, p. 456.
CWE 7: 237-54, from EE 1087
CWE 7: 256-57, from EE 1090
CWE 7: 261-65, from EE 1093
CWE 7: 272-77, from EE 1096
CWE 7: 290-95, from EE 1106
SL 144-45, from Corr 245-46
SL 145, from Corr 246
SL 145-47, from Corr 249-51
Moreana nos. 79-80: 37
Moreana nos. 79-80: 38-39
SL 147, from Corr 253-54
SL 147-49, from Corr 254-55
Moreana no. 117: 7-10
Moreana no. 117: 17-19
Moreana no. 117: 23
Moreana no. 117: 25
SL 149-51, from Corr 255-57
SL 151-52, from Corr 257-58
Moreana no. 117: 29-31
Corr 261-65
Corr 265-67
SL 152-54, from Corr 272-73
Corr 279-82
SL 154-55, from Corr 301-2
SL 155-57, from Corr 306-7
Moreana no. 117: 35-39
SL 158-61, from Corr 311-14
Moreana no. 117: 41
Moreana no. 117: 43
Moreana no. 117: 47-49
Moreana no. 8: 54, newly translated
CW 7: 13-105; Corr 323-65

LETTER NUMBER

148. To Erasmus. 18 December <1526>, Greenwich
 150.* To the Univesity of Oxford. 11 March <1527?>, Richmond
 155. To Francis Cranevelt. 14 July <1527>, Calais
 160. From Bishop Cuthbert Tunstall. 7 March 1527/28, <London>
 162. To John Cochleaeus. <1528?>
 163. To Francis Cranevelt. 10 June 1528, Chelsea 163a. To Francis Cranevelt. 8 November <1528>, London
 174.* To Lady More. 3 September <1529>, Woodstock
 174a. From Bishop Cuthbert Tunstall <1529, London>
 178. To Erasmus. 28 October <1529, Chelsea>
 182.* To Sir John Arundel. 5 April <1530>, Chelsea
 182a.* To George Guildford. 8 July <1530>, Westminster
 183a. From Emperor Charles V. 11 March 1531, Brussels
 188. To Erasmus. 14 June 1532, Chelsea
 189. To John Cochlaeus. 14 June <1532>, Chelsea
 190.* Against John Frith. 7 December <1532>, Chelsea
 191. To Erasmus. <June? 1533>, Chelsea
 192.* To Elizabeth Barton. Tuesday <1533?>, Chelsea
 192a.* To John Harris. Sunday <January–April 1534?>, Willesden
 194.* To Thomas Cromwell. 1 February <1533/4>, Chelsea
 195.* To Thomas Cromwell. Saturday, <Feb–March> 1533/4, Chelsea 197.* To Thomas Cromwell. <March? 1534>
 198.* To Henry VIII. 5 March <1534>, Chelsea
 199.* To Thomas Cromwell. 5 March <1534>, Chelsea

SOURCE TEXT

- SL* 161–65, from EE 1770
SL 165–66, from Corr 374
SL 166–67, from Corr 380–81
Corr 386–88, newly translated
SL 167–69, from Corr 394–96
Moreana no. 117: 55
Moreana no. 117: 13–16
SL 170–71, from Corr 422–23
 Stapleton 15
SL 171–72, from EE 2228
Corr 430
Moreana nos. 79–80: 40
 Vienna Archives, newly translated
SL 172–77, from EE 2659
SL 177–78, from Corr 438–39
CW 7:231–58; Corr 439–64
SL 178–83, from EE 2831
SL 183–85, from Corr 464–66
SL 185–88
SL 189–91, from Corr 466–69
SL 192, from Corr 469–70
SL 193–201, from Corr 480–88
SL 202–5, from Corr 488–91
SL 205–15, from Corr 491–501

Letters

1501 to March 1534

2. To John Holt

<London, ca. November 1501>

Thomas More sends his greetings to John Holt.<sup>1</sup>

5 I have sent you everything you wanted, except the additions I have made to the comedy about Solomon; those I could not send you at the moment, as I did not have them with me. I shall arrange for you to get them next week, along with any other of my materials you wish.

10 I am glad you have left Smarden, an unhealthy spot, and have moved to Chichester, which is a healthier location, with more sunshine. I suppose you will be glad you made the move; the local bishop, I hear, is very fond of you.

15 As for myself, thanks be to God, I am feeling quite well; and—something few people can say for themselves—I am living my life just as I desire; so please God, may my desires be good. You ask how I am doing in my studies. Wonderfully, of course; things could not be better. I have shelved my Latin books, to take up the study of Greek; however, while dropping the one, I have not as yet completely caught up with the other. But enough on that point.

20 Grocyn,<sup>2</sup> my instructor, recently made a very successful start on his lectures, at Saint Paul's, on the text of the "Celestial Hierarchies," the famous work of Saint Dionysius the Areopagite. It would be hard to tell which is greater—the acclaim for himself, or the profit for his listeners. His audience includes a group of students, whose numbers, unfortunately, are more impressive than their learning; but it also includes very many of the educated class. Several illiterates too are flocking to the lectures, some drawn by curiosity, some out of a desire to appear a little erudite. But the majority of self-styled intellectuals are not attending, so as not to give the impression of admitting their ignorance on matters of which they are ignorant.

35 Catherine, the illustrious daughter of the King of Spain and bride of our distinguished Prince, lately made her entry into London, amid a tremendous ovation; never, to my knowledge, has there been such a reception anywhere. The magnificent attire of our nobles aroused cries of admiration. But the Spanish escort—good heavens!—what a sight! If you had seen it, I am afraid you would have burst with laughter; they were so ludicrous. Except for three, or at the most four, of them, they were just too much to look at: hunchbacked, undersized, barefoot Pygmies from Ethiopia. If you had been there, you would have thought they were refugees from hell. Ah, but the lady! take my word for it, she thrilled the hearts of everyone; she possesses all those qualities that make for beauty in a very charming young girl. Everywhere she receives the highest of praises; but even that is inadequate. I do hope this highly publicized union will prove a happy omen for England. Farewell.

3. To John Colet<sup>3</sup>

London, 23 October <1504>

Thomas More to his John Colet, greeting.

As I was walking in the law courts the other day, unbusy where everybody else was busy, I met your servant. I was delighted to see him, both because he has always been dear to me, and especially because I thought he would not have come without you. But when I heard from him not only that you had not returned, but that you would not return for a long time, I cannot tell you from what rejoicing I was cast into what dejection. For what could be more grievous to me than to be deprived of your most pleasant companionship, whose prudent advice I enjoyed, by whose most delightful intimacy I was refreshed, by whose powerful sermons I was stirred, by whose example and life I was guided, in fine, in whose very countenance and nod I was accustomed to find pleasure? And so when encompassed by these defenses I felt myself strengthened;

<sup>1</sup> John Holt (d. ca. 1504) was a schoolmaster and grammarian who published Lac puerorum, the first major Latin

Grammar in English, which More praises in Epigrams 273–74 (see pp. 261–62).

<sup>2</sup> William Grocyn (ca. 1446–1519)

<sup>3</sup> John Colet (ca. 1466–1519), appointed dean of St. Paul's Cathedral in 1504, was a spiritual influence on More and Erasmus.

now that I am deprived of them I seem to languish and grow feeble. By following your footsteps I had escaped almost from the very gates of hell, and now, driven by some force and necessity, I am falling back again into gruesome darkness. I am like Eurydice, except that she was lost because Orpheus looked back at her, but I am sinking because you do not look back at me.

For in the city what is there to move one to live well? but rather, when a man is straining in his own power to climb the steep path of virtue, it turns him back by a thousand devices and sucks him back by its thousand enticements. Wherever you betake yourself, on one side nothing but feigned love and the honeyed poisons of smooth flatterers resound; on the other, fierce hatreds, quarrels, the din of the forum murmur against you. Wherever you turn your eyes, what else will you see but confectioners, fishmongers, butchers, cooks, poulterers, fishermen, fowlers, who supply the materials for gluttony and the world and the world's lord, the devil? Nay even houses block out from us I know not how large a measure of the light, and do not permit us to see the heavens. And the round horizon does not limit the air but the lofty roofs. I really cannot blame you if you are not yet tired of the country where you live among simple people, unversed in the deceits of the city; wherever you cast your eyes, the smiling face of the earth greets you, the sweet fresh air invigorates you, the very sight of the heavens charms you. There you see nothing but the generous gifts of nature and the traces of our primeval innocence.

But yet I do not wish you to be so captivated by these delights as to be unwilling to fly back to us as soon as possible. For if the inconveniences of the city so displease you, your country parish of Stepney (of which you should have no less care) will afford you hardly less advantages than where you now dwell, whence you can sometimes turn aside, as to an inn, to the city (where there is so much that needs your service). For in the country, where men are of themselves either almost innocent, or at least not ensnared in great sins, the services of any physician can be useful. But in the city because of the great numbers that congregate there, and because of their long-standing habits of vice, any physician will have come in vain unless he be the most skillful. Certainly there come from time to time into the pulpit at Saint Paul's preachers who promise health, but although they seem to have spoken very eloquently, their life is in such sharp contrast to their words that they irritate rather than soothe. For they cannot bring men to believe that though they are themselves obviously in direst need of the physician's help, they are yet fit to be entrusted with the cure of other men's ailments. And thus when men see that their diseases are being prescribed for by physicians who are themselves covered with ulcers, they immediately become indignant and obstinate. But if (as observers of human nature assert), he is the best physician in whom the patient has the greatest confidence, who can doubt that you are the one who can do most for the cure of all in the city? Their readiness to allow you to treat their wounds, their trust, their obedience, you have yourself proved in the past, and now the universal desire and anticipation of you proclaim it all again.

Come then, my dear Colet, for Stepney's sake, which mourns your long absence as children their mother's; for the sake of your native place which should be no less dear to you than are your parents. Finally (though this will be a weak force for your return), let regard for me, who am entirely devoted to you and hang anxiously upon your coming, move you. Meanwhile, I shall pass my time with Grocyn, Linacre,<sup>4</sup> and our dear friend Lily,<sup>5</sup> the first as you know the sole guide of my life (in your absence), the second my master in learning, the third the dearest partner of my endeavors. Farewell, and love me ever as now. London, 23 October.

7. From Erasmus

<Paris> 9 June <1510>

This is the prefatory letter to Erasmus's In Praise of Folly.

From Erasmus of Rotterdam, greetings to his friend Thomas More.

Recently, when I was returning to England from Italy,<sup>6</sup> to avoid wasting the whole time that I had to ride on horseback in crude and illiterate talk, I decided to devote some of my attention either to the studies we share with each other or to the pleasure of recalling the most learned and charming friends whom I had left in this country. Among them, my dear More, you were one of the first to come to mind, for I have always enjoyed you as much in my memory when we have been apart as I have delighted in your presence when we were together—

<sup>4</sup> Thomas Linacre (1460–1524)   <sup>5</sup> William Lily (ca. 1468–1522)   <sup>6</sup> Erasmus left Rome early in July 1509.

 5 and rest assured nothing in my whole life could be sweeter than your company. Therefore, since I thought I ought to do something at least, and since that time seemed hardly suited to serious thinking, I chose to amuse myself by composing an encomium of Folly. “How did you ever get that idea?”
 10 you will say. First of all, it was suggested to me by your family name “More,” which comes as close to the Greek word for folly [moria]<sup>7</sup> as you yourself are far removed from the fact of folly, and everyone agrees you are far from it indeed. Then too, I suspected that this jeu d’esprit of mine would be especially acceptable to you because you ordinarily take great pleasure in jokes of this sort—that is, those 20 that do not lack learning, if I may say so, and are not utterly deficient in wit—and because you habitually play the role of Democritus<sup>8</sup> by making fun of the ordinary lives of mortals. On the other hand, though your extraordinarily keen intelligence places you worlds apart from the common herd, 25 still the incredible sweetness and gentleness of your character makes you able and willing to be a man for all seasons<sup>9</sup> with all men. And so you will readily accept this little declamation not only as a me-
 30 mento<sup>10</sup> of your friend, but also as an object of your patronage and defense,<sup>11</sup> since it is dedicated to you and henceforth is not mine but yours.

For there will probably be no lack of quarrelsome quibblers who will attack it unjustly, some 35 as too light and frivolous for a theologian, some as more biting than is compatible with Christian moderation. They will cry out that I am reviving the Old Comedy<sup>12</sup> or imitating Lucian,<sup>13</sup> accusing me of ripping everything to shreds. As for those 40 who are offended by the levity and playfulness of the subject matter, they should consider that I am not setting any precedent but following one set long ago by great writers: ages ago Homer amused himself with The Battle of the Frogs and Mice, as Vergil did with the Gnat and the Rustic Salad, and Ovid

 45 with the Walnut-Tree.<sup>14</sup> So too Polycrates and his corrector Isocrates both wrote encomia of Busiris;<sup>15</sup> Glauco praised injustice;<sup>16</sup> Favorinus, Thersites and the quartan fever;<sup>17</sup> Synesius, baldness;<sup>18</sup> Lucian, the fly and the art of the parasite. Seneca amused himself by writing an apotheosis of Claudius.<sup>19</sup> Plutarch wrote a dialogue between Gryllus and Ulysses.<sup>20</sup> Lucian and Apuleius wrote comic tales about an ass, and some writer or other composed the last will and testament of the piglet Grunnius Corrocotta,<sup>21</sup>
 55 which is even mentioned by Saint Jerome.<sup>22</sup>

And so, if they wish, they can imagine that I was simply playing with pawns for my own amusement or, if they prefer, that I was riding a hobbyhorse like a child.<sup>23</sup> But surely, since we grant every other state in 60 life its own recreations, it is quite unfair to allow students no amusement at all, especially if trifles lead to serious ideas and if a frivolous subject is handled in such a way that a reader who has any sense at all can profit by it a good deal more than he can from the 65 forbidding and showy subjects undertaken by some writers. Thus, one man praises rhetoric or philosophy in a speech he has patched together for years. Another sings the praises of some prince or other. Another urges war against the Turks. Another predicts future events. Another fabricates some trifling
 70 questions like “whether goat’s hair may be called

<sup>7</sup> This pun on More’s name was not uncommon. <sup>8</sup> The philosopher Democritus (5th century BC) was said to have laughed at the follies of mankind (Juvenal 10.28–30; Seneca, De ira 2.10.5). <sup>9</sup> omnium horarum: Suetonius, Tiberius 42; Erasmus, Adages 286 (CWE 31: 304–5). In 1520 Richard Whittinton (Vulgaria, ed. Beatrice White, London: Early English Text Society, orig. ser. no. 187, 1932, 64–65), applied omnium horarum homo to More and translated it “a man for all seasons.” <sup>10</sup> Catullus, Carmina 12.13 <sup>11</sup> See More’s 1515 Letter to Dorp in defense of the Folly and of the humanist program. <sup>12</sup> Such comedy, represented primarily by Aristophanes, attacked individuals by name. <sup>13</sup> Lucian of Samosata (ca. 125–90) wrote witty, caustic dialogues, several of which were translated from Greek into Latin by More and Erasmus, working together, in 1505–6 (CW 3.1: xxii–xxx). <sup>14</sup> These four apocryphal poems parody the high style by applying it to low subjects. <sup>15</sup> These two Greek orators (4th century BC) wrote mock-encomia of the mythical Egyptian tyrant Busiris (Isocrates, Busiris 1–4). <sup>16</sup> according to his brother Plato (Republic 357a–62c) <sup>17</sup> According to Gellius (Attic Nights 17.12.2), the rhetorician Favorinus (d. ca. AD 135) praised Thersites, the ugliest Greek at Troy (Homer, Iliad 2.216–19), and the quartan fever. <sup>18</sup> This fifth-century bishop wrote his mock-encomium in reply to Dio Chrysostom’s Praise of Hair. It was often combined with the Folly in early editions. See Genevieve Stenger, “The Praise of Folly and Its Parerga,” Medievalia et Humanistica, N.S., no. 2 (1971): 97–117. <sup>19</sup> Seneca’s Apocolocyntosis or “pumpkinification” of Claudius presents the emperor after his death, not deified but banished to the underworld. <sup>20</sup> Changed to a pig by Circe, Gryllus argues that it is better to remain an animal than to be restored to humanity (Plutarch, Moralia 985d–92e). <sup>21</sup> a school exercise of the third century after Christ <sup>22</sup> Commentary in Isaiam, prol.; Corpus Christianorum: Series Latina 73a, 465 <sup>23</sup> Horace, Sermones 2.3.248 wool.<sup>24</sup> For just as nothing is more trivial than to treat serious matters in a trivial way, so too nothing is more delightful than to treat trifles in such a way that you do not seem to be trifling at all. Whether I have done so others will judge. But unless I am completely deceived by ‘Selflove,’<sup>25</sup> my praise of Folly is not altogether foolish.

But now, to reply to the false charge that the work is too biting, men of wit have always been free to satirize with impunity the ordinary lives of men, as long as this freedom did not degenerate into furious rage. Hence I am all the more amazed how sensitive ears are nowadays: it seems they can hardly bear to hear anything except solemn titles. Then too, you can see some people so perversely religious that they can tolerate the gravest insults against Christ more easily than the lightest joke aimed at pope or prince, especially when “it concerns the pocketbook.”<sup>26</sup> But if someone writes a satire on the lives of men without censuring a single person by name, I ask you, can this be considered scurrilous? Surely it should be taken as judicious and instructive satire. Besides, I beg you to notice on how many counts I indict my own self. Then too, anyone who omits no category of men is clearly not angry at any individual but rather at all vices. Therefore if anyone cries out that he has been injured, he betrays his own bad conscience or at least his fear of exposure. In this sort of writing Saint Jerome took far more liberties and was far more biting; sometimes he did not even refrain from mentioning names. As for me, I not only abstained from mentioning any names at all, but I also moderated my style so that any judicious reader will easily understand that I aimed at giving pleasure, not pain. Moreover, unlike Juvenal, I did not stir up that cesspool of secret vice; I took pains to survey funny rather than filthy vices. And then, if anyone is not satisfied with these explanations, he should at least remember this: it is an honor to be insulted by Folly. Since I made her speak as my persona, I had to preserve decorum by making her speak appropriately. But why am I saying all this to you? — you are such an extraordinary advocate that you can make a strong defense even if the case itself is weak. Farewell, most learned More, and defend vigorously this your Moria.

From the country, June 9

<sup>24</sup> Horace, Epistles 1.18.15; and Erasmus, Adages 253 (CWE 31: 280–81)
<sup>25</sup> Erasmus, Adages 292 (CWE 31: 311)

<sup>26</sup> Aristophanes, Nubes 648 <sup>27</sup> in May 1515 <sup>28</sup> Richard Pace (ca. 1483–1536)

<sup>29</sup> Erasmus, however, did return in July–August 1516.

8. To John Colet

<London?, ca. March 1512?>

I don’t much wonder if they are bursting with jealousy of your excellent school. For they see that, just as the Greeks who destroyed barbarian Troy came out of the Trojan horse, so from your school come those who reprove and overthrow their ignorance.

16. To Erasmus

<London, ca. 17 February 1516>

Thomas More to his Erasmus, greetings.

Since your departure,<sup>27</sup> my dearest Erasmus, I have received altogether three letters from you. If I claimed to have answered all of them I do not suppose you would believe me, no matter how solemnly I lied; especially since you know me very well as being a lazy correspondent and not so scrupulously truthful as to shrink from a little white lie as if it were parricide. Our friend Pace<sup>28</sup> is on an embassy in your locality, although not exactly in the same place as you; he is separated from me without being with you. He can converse with me by letter, but not with you face to face. May he come home soon with his business happily concluded, so that at least one half of me can be with me. For I do not know when to expect you,<sup>29</sup> since you intend to move on into Italy, where, I fear, you will meet people who will not let you get away. For the present, I shall be missing one half of me, while he is gone; and the other half, while you are gone. I hope that some excellent fortune, worthy of the man, soon happens to Pace. I am very much aware that it is the intention of the King and the wish of the Cardinal and the endeavor of all good men to honor and promote him.

As for yourself, I would be entertaining even higher hopes if I were not so constantly disappointed; and yet, why can I not have high hopes for you even now? I have not lost hope for the future, just because my previous hopes have not been realized; rather, I am more confident than ever. No man has the same luck indefinitely, and yours cannot continue to be bad, for you are the idol and the admiration of the Pope, of kings, of bishops, of almost all men throughout Christendom. It would

<sup>24</sup> Horace, Epistles 1.18.15; and Erasmus, Adages 253 (CWE 31: 280–81)
<sup>25</sup> Erasmus, Adages 292 (CWE 31: 311)

<sup>26</sup> Aristophanes, Nubes 648 <sup>27</sup> in May 1515 <sup>28</sup> Richard Pace (ca. 1483–1536)

<sup>29</sup> Erasmus, however, did return in July–August 1516.

be a waste of words to mention the attitude toward you among our own bishops, particularly the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the special favor you enjoy with our King. Your previous failures to receive a benefice corresponding to your worth and to the deep love shown you by eminent men have been caused partly by your disregard of the way which others use to solicit support, partly by some accident of fortune, as, for instance, in the recent case of the Tournay canonry, which Lord Mountjoy<sup>30</sup> had reserved for you. Right now, you do not seem averse to it, for, as you say in your letter, you have sent on to him all the documents necessary for its bestowal upon you. However, if you recall, when I was with you at Bruges,<sup>31</sup> I discussed this topic with you; and after listing the advantages and disadvantages of the benefice, you seemed to be uninterested in it; nor did you conceal your attitude from Sampson, who represents the Bishop of York at Tournai.<sup>32</sup> You were forced into that view not only because of your fear that it would not be a permanent position without the further consent of the other bishop,<sup>33</sup> whose authorization you did not expect for this one action of a man whose every act he endeavors to countermand; but also because of the obligation of making a payment of ten English pounds immediately upon receiving the canonry and an additional two hundred nobles or more to redeem the house. Such is the local custom, and if you fail to comply with it, you will barely realize six nobles a year, and not even that much, as I understand, unless you take up permanent residence there. As a result of these considerations, you gave Sampson and me the impression that you would not accept the canonry.

Shortly after your departure, I went to Tournai. There I found out from Lord Mountjoy and also from Sampson that the Archbishop of York had informed the two of them by letter that the benefice was to be given to another party, to whom apparently he had promised it, without knowing it had been intended for you. Upon hearing this and without disclosing my impression that the benefice did not suit your taste, I urged them to send a return letter saying that it had already been conferred upon you and that the situation was such that no alteration was possible unless some better provision were first made for you. In response, the Archbishop of York said that this post would not at all be suitable for you, as it was not lucrative for one in residence and was totally unproductive for an absentee, and he guaranteed them that he would make you a better offer. So, in my presence and with no dissent on my part, they decided to confer the benefice upon the Archbishop's choice. What happened after that, I do not know. But this I do know: if you are deprived of that benefice, a more profitable one is due to you from the Cardinal, and I hope he makes payment soon. He does often speak of you in very friendly terms.

It was unnecessary for me to ask the Archbishop for your pension. He had thought of it himself, before receiving my letter, and had handled the matter with Maruffo,<sup>34</sup> who, as you know, is regularly employed by him as a broker for such transactions, and at stated times they balance their accounts. The Archbishop was at Otford<sup>35</sup> at the time, and, upon receiving my letter, he wrote again to the fellow urging him to send on to you twenty English pounds with dispatch and promising to make good the payment to Maruffo as soon as he was assured by a receipt from you that the money had been delivered. I had a conference with Maruffo. He said that he would ask you by letter to send back promptly to him a receipt, stating that you had received the money; he would take this receipt to the Archbishop, claim the money, and only then arrange to have it sent on to you. When I learned of that plan, I was afraid there was some danger, if the money were not paid out to him right then, that the delay would also affect you. "This subterfuge is not necessary," I told him; "either send the money immediately, charging it to the account of the Archbishop, or, if it irks you to pay out money without first receiving the equivalent, I shall arrange immediately for you to have the money on hand." "No," he said, "there is nothing to worry about. I shall see to it that Erasmus has the money at once; in fact, it is here right now. For Erasmus has a money draft from

<sup>30</sup> William Blount, Lord Mountjoy (d. 1534), was Erasmus's pupil in Paris ca. 1496, and invited him to England to visit in 1498.

<sup>31</sup> More was a member of an embassy to Prince Charles of Castile, May–October 1515, which had made a treaty renewing the commercial privileges gained in 1495 and

1506. <sup>32</sup> Thomas Wolsey was bishop of Lincoln at the beginning of 1514, received the bishopric of Tournai on the capture of the city, and on the death of Cardinal Bainbridge received the archbishopric of York on August 5, 1514. Richard Sampson (d. 1554) was now at Tournai to further

Wolsey's interests, as the French bishop refused to surrender the diocese. <sup>33</sup> the very young French bishop, Louis Guillard <sup>34</sup> the banker who dealt with Erasmus's pension from the Archbishop <sup>35</sup> in Kent, where the archbishops of Canterbury had a manor house me entitling him to draw, at will, to the amount of one thousand ducats. Whatever amount he draws from this account, must be paid back to me, according to our agreement, out of this pension of his.”

5 That is what he says. But I hardly believe that he has given you a draft entitling you to draw from his account, without the money first being put down on his counter. Consequently, if the arrangements are not as he says, inform me quickly.

10 The Archbishop of Canterbury has finally been relieved of the office of chancellor,<sup>36</sup> a burden, which, as you know, he had tried extremely hard to shake off for several years; at long last he has attained his heart’s desire, a life of privacy, and is hav-
15 ing wonderful leisure amid his books and his memories of duties well done. He has been replaced, at the appointment of the King, by the Cardinal of York,<sup>37</sup> who as an administrator is far exceeding ev-20 eryone’s expectations, which were very high in virtue of his other qualities; it is no easy thing to be the successor of an extraordinary person, and yet to give complete satisfaction.

Our embassy, which like everything else I do is a matter of interest to you, was quite successful, 25 though it dragged on much longer than I had hoped or wanted. When I left home, I expected to be gone at the most two months; but the embassy lasted more than six. However, those long months were crowned by rather gratifying results. So, when I say 30 that my mission was accomplished and also that further complications were arising which, apparently, would lead to greater delay (as regularly happens with administrators), I wrote to the Cardinal and received permission to return, thanks to the as-
35 sistance of my friends, especially Pace, who had not as yet gone. But on my return trip I unexpectedly met him at Gravelines; he was in such a hurry that he hardly had time to stop and exchange greetings. Tunstall came back recently, but was here barely ten
40 days, without spending a single one of them pleasantly as he wanted, for his entire stay was squandered on a bothersome, disgusting review of all the details entrusted to him on his mission, and then, without warning, he has been promptly shoved
45 back again on another embassy.<sup>38</sup> It is very much against his will, I am sure, but he cannot refuse.

The office of ambassador has never held a great attraction for me. It does not suit us laymen as it does you clergy, for you either have no wives and children at home, or you find them wherever you 50 travel. Whenever we are away for a short while, our hearts quickly go back to our wives<sup>39</sup> and children. Then too, when a priest goes on an embassy, he can take along with him wherever he wishes, his entire household and, for the time being, can sup-
55 port them at the expense of the king, while at home he would have to support them at his own expense. But when I am on leave, I must support two households, one at home, the other abroad. A rather generous allowance was granted to me by the King for 60 the benefit of my retinue, but no consideration was made for those whom I had to leave at home; and although I am, as you know, a kindly husband and an indulgent father and a gentle master, still I have never had the least success in persuading the mem-
65 bers of my family to do without food, for my sake, until I came home. Finally, it is easy for sovereigns, without any cost to themselves, to reimburse clergymen for their work and expenditures by means of ecclesiastical preferments; but no such generous
70 and handy provisions are made for us, though the King, it is true, marked me out, on my return, for an annual pension,<sup>40</sup> which, because of the distinction or the revenue involved, is not to be scorned. However, I have not as yet accepted it, and I do not 75 think I ever shall; for its acceptance would mean that I either would have to leave my present post in London, which I do prefer even to a higher one, or, what is not at all to my liking, I would have to retain it and thereby occasion resentment among the 80 townfolk. If any dispute over privileges arises between them and the King, as sometimes happens, they would be skeptical about my sincerity and loyalty to them and consider me under obligation to the King as his pensioner.
85

However, certain aspects of that embassy gave me great pleasure; first of all, the extended and constant association with Tunstall, who is second to none in literary attainments and strictness in life and morals, and yet is a genial companion; secondly, 90 the friendship which I formed with Busleyden,<sup>41</sup> who is extremely wealthy and very generous, and

<sup>36</sup> Warham resigned December 22, 1515.

<sup>37</sup> Wolsey took the oath of office 24

December. <sup>38</sup> Tunstall was “to arrange the treaty lately concluded between England and the Prince of Castile”

(LP 2:1574). <sup>39</sup> His second wife, Alice Middleton <sup>40</sup> More received a pension in 1518, retroactive from Michaelmas 1517

and charged to the little customs of London (LP 2:875, 4247). He then resigned as under-sheriff of London. <sup>41</sup> Jerome de Busleyden (ca. 1470–1517)

therefore a magnificent and gracious host. He gave me a tour of his home, which is very artistically decorated and fitted with exquisite appointments; he also showed me his large collection of antiquities, in which, as you know, I am very interested. Finally, he displayed to me his remarkable well stocked library and a mind even more so than any library, so that he completely filled me with amazement. I understand that he will very soon be sent on an embassy to our King. However, the most pleasant experience of my entire trip was my personal relationship with your host, Peter Giles of Antwerp;<sup>42</sup> his learning, his wit, his modesty, his genuine friendliness are such that, bless my soul, I would be happy to pay a good part of my wealth to purchase the companionship of that one man. He sent me your Apology and also your commentary on the Psalm Beatus Vir, which you dedicated to Beatus Rhenanus, a man truly blessed with this wonderful, lasting memorial of a friend. Dorp<sup>43</sup> has had his letter printed and included as a preface to your Apology. I had hoped to meet him, if I had the chance. Since I did not, I sent him my greetings by letter, just a brief laconic note, as I did not have time for a longer one. I could not pass the fellow by without some word of greeting, as I find him curiously attractive because of his extraordinary scholarliness and for many other reasons too, not the least of which is the fact that his criticism of the Folly provided you with the opportunity for penning your Apology.

I am glad that your works on Jerome and the New Testament are coming along so well. It is remarkable, how eagerly those editions are anticipated by everybody. You can be sure, Erasmus, that Linacre<sup>44</sup> has a very high opinion of you and talks about you everywhere. I recently learned this from some men who were dining with him at the King's table, where he spoke of you in very fond and lavish terms; the King's response, in the course of the conversation, was such as to give my informants the clear impression that you were soon to be the recipient of some unusual bit of good luck. May such be the will of Heaven!

Farewell, my dearest Erasmus, and give my regards to Rhenanus<sup>45</sup> and Lystrius, who, because of your recommendation and their own writings, are dearer and even more intimately known to me than are many of the people with whom I have daily contact. My wife sends you her regards, and so does Clement,<sup>46</sup> whose daily progress in Latin and Greek arouses no little hope in me that one day he will be an honor to his country and to letters.

Again, farewell, and let this one letter satisfy you for several months. In writing this letter, I have tried to mimic a stingy person who seldom entertains, but when he does invite guests to his table, he prepares a banquet that lasts indefinitely, so that the one meal will save him the expense of entertaining every day. For the third time, farewell.

The Bishop of Durham<sup>47</sup> was most gratified by the dedication of your edition of Seneca. Notice how quick I am to copy your habits; this letter has been written to you just as your recent letter to me was, with the help of a secretary; and I copy you so closely, I would not even write these few words in my own hand except that I want to assure you that this letter is from me.

17. To Cuthbert Tunstall<sup>48</sup>

<London, 1516?>

What possible gain is it to me to be employed in embassies, for although my Prince is generously inclined toward me, yet far from seeking advancement at Court I turn away from it with loathing?

20. To Erasmus

London, 3 September <1516>

More sends his very best greetings to Master Erasmus.

I am sending you my Nowhere,<sup>49</sup> which is nowhere well written. I have added a prefatory epistle to my friend, Peter. I know from experience that I do not

<sup>42</sup> Peter Giles (ca. 1486–1533), a humanist friend of More and Erasmus, who figures prominently in Book 1 of Utopia

<sup>43</sup> Maarten van Dorp (1485–1525), a humanist theologian <sup>44</sup> Thomas Linacre (1460–1524) <sup>45</sup> Gerard Lister of Rhenen in Utrecht, who wrote

a commentary on the Praise of Folly

<sup>46</sup> John Clement (ca. 1500–72), one of the first students at Colet's humanist school, St. Paul's, became a page and pupil in More's household about 1514; later he became a distinguished physician.

<sup>47</sup> Thomas Ruthall (d. February 4, 1522/3)

<sup>48</sup> Cuthbert Tunstall (1474–1559), who became Bishop of London, was a close friend of More. <sup>49</sup> More's first choice of title for the Utopia. The latter comes from Greek ou (no) and topos (place).

have to tell you to give proper attention to everything else. I have delivered your letter to the Venetian ambassador,<sup>50</sup> who, it appears, was very well disposed to receive your New Testament, which was intercepted by a Carmelite.<sup>51</sup> He is completely devoted to sacred learning and has finished reading almost all the authors who treat of petty questions; he attributes so much importance to them that not even Dorp could outdo him in that. We conferred with one another like candidates campaigning for votes; we tickled one another with set speeches and lengthy encomia. But, to be honest, I like him very much. Apparently, he is very sincere and very competent in the things of man, and now he is completely dedicating himself to learning the things of God; and last, but not least, he is very interested in you.

I have no news as yet from the Archbishop of Canterbury about the situation. Colet has not had a conference with him about that business of yours,<sup>52</sup> but he did have one with the Archbishop of York and says that he found him so much in your favor and so lavish in his praises of you that all he wants now is to have the Archbishop match his brilliant words with deeds. I expect him to do that soon, with openhanded generosity. The money you left with me will be delivered to Giles by my John,<sup>53</sup> at Michaelmas; he will not reach Antwerp before that feast. If you publish my Epigrams, give some thought to the propriety of printing my remarks about Brixius,<sup>54</sup> as some of them are rather caustic, although it might well seem that I had provocation from his insulting comments about my country. In any case, as I said, examine those expressions carefully and, in general, anything else that seems to you spiteful. As for any silly remarks, handle them all as you know will be for my own good. Quintilian<sup>55</sup> regrets that Seneca did not follow someone else's judgment in using his own ability as a writer; however, it were better for me, when writing, not only to follow someone else's judgment, but also to use someone else's ability. Farewell, and give my regards to Master Tunstall and Master Busleyden. Hurriedly, from London, September 3.

<sup>50</sup> Sebastian Giustinian, ambassador in England from February 1515 to September 1519 <sup>51</sup> Peter de Brescia Carmelianus, luteplayer to the King <sup>52</sup> Evidently these sentences refer to hopes of patronage for Erasmus. <sup>53</sup> his brother, who acted as secretary to More <sup>54</sup> Germanus Brixius.

See More's Letter 86, to Brixius, and also More's Epigrams 188–95, 209, 266–69. <sup>55</sup> Institutia oratoria 10.1.130 <sup>56</sup> George of Theimseke, Provost of Cassel and member of Mechlin Parliament and of the Privy Council, who was often sent on embassies <sup>57</sup> Raffaele Maruffo was a

22. To Erasmus

<London, ca. 20 September 1516>

45

More sends his very best greetings to Erasmus.

I received your letter from Calais, and am happy to hear that you had a pleasant voyage. The Provost of Cassel,<sup>56</sup> now on a diplomatic mission to our country, told me that you had arrived safe at Brussels before he left home. Not long ago I encountered Maruffo,<sup>57</sup> who was moaning that, because of some slip, your money was paid, but to his loss. I have also recently sent you another money draft of his, to the amount of twenty English pounds, from the Archbishop. I expect that you will have the same good luck in cashing this draft, if you act quickly before he issues a countermand to his agents, which seems to be exactly what he has in mind. The bearer of this letter will pay to Giles the twenty pounds you left with me, which, at the rate of exchange, amounts to thirty pounds in your money.

Not long ago I talked with Urswick<sup>58</sup> about the horse for you. He says he will arrange for you to have one soon, but right now he does not have any he would care to send to you. Some time ago I sent you my Nowhere; I am most anxious to have it published soon and also that it be handsomely set off with the highest of recommendations, if possible, from several people, both intellectuals and distinguished statesmen. I want this principally because of one individual,<sup>59</sup> whose name, I think, will occur to you even without my mentioning it, and who, for some strange motive, which you can also guess, regrets that the work is being published before the lapse of nine years. Handle this matter as you think is for my own good. I am also anxious to know if you have shown it to Tunstall, or at least described it to him, as I think you have done, and which I do prefer. For then he will gain a twofold delight; your account will make the work appear to have a more elegant style than it really has, and also you will save him the job of reading it himself. Farewell.

Genoese merchant and banker in England, who dealt with Erasmus's pension from the Archbishop of Canterbury. <sup>58</sup> Christopher Urswick (1448–1522) <sup>59</sup> Jerome Busleyden

23. To Erasmus

London, <22 September 1516>

Thomas More sends his very best greetings to Erasmus.

5 Greetings, my dearest Erasmus. The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury has arranged to have twenty English pounds transmitted to you. So, I have sent you Maruffo's draft, plus the letter I received from the Archbishop; thus you can understand that he is generous with his own money and I am by no means a stingy administrator of other people's money; you can also promptly inform the Archbishop that you have received the money, so that Maruffo can be reimbursed. I have written to one of our countrymen who is to receive the money from me at your exchange market; he can then turn over thirty Flemish pounds to Giles so that he can vouch, in your name, for the payment of the twenty English pounds which you had recently left with me.

20 I have forwarded your letter to Latimer,<sup>60</sup> along with a letter of my own about the Bishop of Rochester;<sup>61</sup> but as yet no word from him, nor from the Bishop. Colet is working strenuously on his Greek, with the solicited help of my boy Clement. I do believe he will persevere until he masters the subject, especially if you keep spurring him on from Louvain; and yet, it might be better to let him follow his own impulse. As you know, he has the habit of disagreeing with suggestions given him, just to have an argument, even when those suggestions correspond with his own ideas. I went to see Urswick; he says he has not forgotten about your horse and will soon arrange for you to have one. When he does, I shall let you know, so you will not be taken in by a fraudulent exchange.

35 Hurriedly, from London, on the morrow of Saint Matthew the Apostle.

26. To Erasmus

London, 31 October <1516>

40 Thomas More sends greetings to his friend, Master Erasmus.

My answer, dear Erasmus, is a little tardy, because I was anxious to get some definite information to send on to you from Urswick about that horse for you; but that has been impossible, since he is gone on a business trip several miles from London and has not as yet returned. I expect him any day now, and as soon as he gets back, the matter will be taken care of. The money you had left with me, I am sure, has been paid over to our friend, Giles, as I have received a communication from my agent in Antwerp, saying that he would make prompt payment. I could not entrust this bearer with the letters from Basel, which you sent me some time ago to peruse; but I will send them shortly, as soon as I hit upon someone to burden with a large bundle. Bedill<sup>62</sup> showed me the letter from the Bishop of Basel to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and also the Archbishop's response; both were the original copies. The latter, however, was much too much the original; it was so smeared with words struck out or written in as to be not at all legible except to the one who wrote it, and perhaps not even to him.

Our two letters encouraging Latimer to spend a month or two with the Bishop of Rochester reached him too late; he had already made up his mind to go to Oxford and could not possibly be persuaded to postpone his trip for the time being. You know how these philosophers regard their own decisions as immutable laws; I suppose from a love of consistency. He does like your rendering of the New Testament very much, although you are too punctilious to suit him. He does not like the fact that you have retained the word "Sabbath," and other similar points, which you did not think necessary to change, or did not dare to do so. However, he does not admit of any word at all that would be foreign to Roman ears. I approved of his criticism insofar as Hebrew customs and practices would permit. However, I urged him to note down the various words for which he prefers a different rendering and to send them on to you, along with his criticism; and I think he will do that. This interest of his, I know, will make you very happy.

There are other people, though, my dearest Erasmus, who have formed a conspiracy here in our country to read through your writings from quite a different point of view; and I find their dreadful plot disturbing. Therefore, do not be in a rush to publish a second edition of your works, as the time is ripe to take stock. Out of my loyalty and my anxiety for you I urge you, and I beg you to do at least this much—to revise and correct everything promptly so as to leave the very least opportunity for slander in any passage. Some very sharp-minded men have set their hearts upon making a careful search for such opportunities and will snap them up greedily. You want to know who these people are? I am reluctant, of course, to mention any names, for fear that your spirit be crushed by the frightening thought of such powerful enemies. However, I shall tell you anyhow, to put you more on your guard. The top-ranking Franciscan theologian, whom you know and to whom you gave honorable mention in your edition of Jerome, has picked a group of men who are of the same Order and made of the same stuff, and has hatched a plot with them, aimed at refuting any errors of yours he can find. To make this operation easier and more effective, they devised a scheme whereby they would divide up your works among themselves, read through each one with a critical eye, and then understand absolutely nothing of it all. So you see what a crisis is hanging over your head! You have got to work hard to condition your troops for facing this monstrous peril. You can be sure, Erasmus, this decision was reached at a council meeting of the elders, late at night, when they were well soaked. But the morning after, as I am told, with the effects of the wine slept off, they forgot, I guess, all about their resolution; since the decree was written in wine, it was now blotted out of their memory, and so they abandoned their proposal, and instead of reading, they went back to their begging, which experience had taught them to be a far more profitable enterprise.

60 William Latimer (ca. 1460–1545) 61 John Fisher 62 Thomas Bedill was secretary to Archbishop Warham.

It is worth noting how much everybody enjoys the Epistolae Obscurorum Virorum; the educated take it as a joke, while the uneducated take it seriously and think that our laughter is caused by the style alone. While not defending the style, they do maintain that it is offset by the weighty contents, and under the crude scabbard lies a very handsome blade. It is unfortunate that the work does not have a different title! Then not even in a hundred years would the silly fools realize that the authors were sneering at them with a snout more obtrusive than that of a rhinoceros.

I am happy that my Nowhere meets the approval of my friend, Peter; if such men like it, I shall begin to like it myself. I am anxious to find out if it meets with the approval of Tunstall, and Busleyden, and your Chancellor;<sup>63</sup> but their approval is more than I could wish for, since they are so fortunate as to be top-ranking officials in their own governments, although they might be won over by the fact that in this commonwealth of mine the ruling class would be completely made up of such men as are distinguished for learning and virtue. No matter how powerful those men are in their present governments—and, true, they are very powerful—still they have some high and mighty clowns as their equals, if not their superiors, in authority and influence. I do not think that men of this caliber are swayed by the fact that they would not have many under them as subjects, as the term is now used by kings to refer to their people, who are really worse off than slaves; for it is a much higher honor to rule over free people; and good men, such as they, are far removed from that spiteful feeling which desires others to suffer while they are well off themselves. I expect, therefore, that those men will also give their approval to my work, and I am very anxious to have it. However, if a deep conviction to the contrary has been implanted in their minds by satisfaction with their present good fortune, then your one vote will be more than adequate to influence my decision. To my way of thinking, we two are a crowd, and I think I could be happy with you in any forsaken spot.

Farewell, dearest Erasmus, more precious to me than my own eyes!

I have succeeded in getting a more favorable letter from Maruffo; that seemed to me to be more convenient and more prudent than to bother the Bishop<sup>64</sup> again about the same matter. Not that he would be unwilling to listen to anything, as long as it concerned you; but I do prefer to approach him with matters of greater import.

Hurriedly, from London, before dawn, All Hallows Eve.

28. To Cuthbert Tunstall

<London, ca. November 1516>

Although all the letters I receive from you, my honored friend, are pleasing to me, yet the one you last wrote is the most pleasing; for besides its eloquence and its friendliness—all your letters abound with these commendations—it gave me especial satisfaction by its praise of my Commonwealth (would that it were as true as it is favorable). I asked our friend Erasmus to describe to you in conversation its theme, but forbade him to urge you to read the book. Not that I did not wish you to read it (nothing would have pleased me more) but I was mindful of your wise resolution not to take in hand any modern authors until you had sated yourself with reading the ancients—a task which, measured by the profit you have derived from them, is fully accomplished, but, measured by the love you bear them, will never come to an end. I feared that when the learned works of so many other authors could not engage your attention, you would never willingly descend to my trifles. Nor would you have done so, surely, unless you had been moved rather by your love of me than by the subject of the book. Wherefore, for having so carefully read through the Utopia, for having undertaken so heavy a labor for friendship’s sake, I give you the deepest thanks, not diminished by your having found pleasure in the work. For this, too, I attribute to your friendship which has obviously influenced your judgment more than strict rules of criticism. However that may be, I cannot express my delight that your judgment is so favorable. For I have almost succeeded in convincing myself that you say what you think, for I know that you are far from all deceit, and I am not important enough to be flattered, and I love you too much to deserve mockery. So that if you have objectively seen the truth, I am overjoyed at your verdict; or if in reading you were blinded by your affection for me, I am no less delighted with your love, for vehement indeed must that love be if it can deprive Tunstall of his judgment.

29. To Erasmus

<London, ca. 4 December 1516>

More sends his special greetings to Erasmus.

I have conferred with Urswick about that horse for you. He insists that he still does not have a horse which he considers suitable to send to you, but is definitely going to send you one by the next market day, if not before. I recently dispatched to you Maruffo’s money draft, along with his letter containing more favorable terms. At least, so he says; but I was unable to decipher it; neither could our friend, Lily,<sup>65</sup> although he knows Italian very well. The money you had left with me has been in the hands of our friend Giles for some time now; my agent, who has returned, told me he had made the payment to him.

Our friend Master Palsgrave,<sup>66</sup> who, as you are aware, has long been very much attached to you, is going to Louvain to study law. But he will retain his devotion to the classics of Latin and Greek literature. He has heard that you will be living there, and while he might expect absolutely anything from you since he is an old friend of yours, still he earnestly begged me for a letter of recommendation to increase the favor which, he believes, he by himself already enjoys with you. Notice how people think I have great influence with you; for me this is as much a triumph as is the friendship of kings, which is the boast of other men. Palsgrave would like to have your advice and assistance, so as to make progress in his studies. I realize, my dear Erasmus, that there is no need of many words when one asks you to help in his studies a person who has a love for intellectual things, who is already a well known scholar, with a great future before him, whose great progress is also known to you, and who, moreover, is your friend and my friend, which means, he is twice your friend. Years ago, you took upon yourself the special task of spending the days and nights of your whole life in advancing the intellectual life of all men. And, if this involves even a further request, I also ask you to be openhanded in bestowing upon our friend, Palsgrave, that which you refuse to no man. I have given him, to deliver to you, all the letters which you received long ago from your friends in Basel and which I had in my possession for some time. This is a fortunate coincidence; you could not find a more reliable letter carrier, nor could he want anything that would assure him a warmer reception than a large bundle of erudite letters written by dear friends of yours, letters which you had missed a long time and had almost despaired of recovering. I have told him, however, not to hand them over to you until you sign the contract and agree to receive him as if every single one of them were a letter of recommendation for him.

Each day I stand by, waiting with eager ears, for news about that business of yours in Sicily. Please

God, it may have a happy ending. Master Tunstall recently wrote me a most friendly letter. Bless my soul, but his frank and complimentary criticism of my commonwealth has given me more cheer than would an Attic talent. You have no idea how thrilled I am; I feel so expanded, and I hold my head high. For in my daydreams I have been marked out by my Utopians to be their king forever; I can see myself now marching along, crowned with a diadem of wheat, very striking in my Franciscan frock, carrying a handful of wheat as my sacred scepter, thronged by a distinguished retinue of Amaurotians, and, with this huge entourage, giving audience to foreign ambassadors and sovereigns; wretched creatures they are, in comparison with us, as they stupidly pride themselves on appearing in childish garb and feminine finery, laced with that despicable gold, and ludicrous in their purple and jewels and other empty baubles. Yet, I would not want either you or our friend, Tunstall, to judge me by other men, whose character shifts with fortune. Even if heaven has decreed to waft me from my lowly estate to this soaring pinnacle which, I think, defies comparison with that of kings, still you will never find me forgetful of that old friendship I had with you when I was but a private citizen. And if you do not mind making the short trip to visit me in Utopia, I shall definitely see to it that all mortals governed by my kindly rule will show you the honor due to those who, they know, are very dear to the heart of their king.

I was going to continue with this fascinating vision, but the rising Dawn has shattered my dream — poor me! — and shaken me off my throne and summons me back to the drudgery of the courts. But at least this thought gives me consolation: real kingdoms do not last much longer.

Farewell, dearest Erasmus.

30. To Erasmus

London, 15 December <1516>

Thomas More to Master Erasmus, best greetings.

I am sure, dearest Erasmus, that you have received my letter, which I gave Palsgrave to deliver to you, along with the letters from your friends in Basel.<sup>67</sup> I am glad that Dorp has come back to his senses;<sup>68</sup> obviously, his feelings were salved by stern language, after soothing words had only exasperated him. That is the way some people are; if you show them a little deference, they become bullies; if you treat them somewhat scornfully, they are crushed and flattened. I am desperately anxious to read the correspondence carried on between the two of you, if that can be conveniently arranged.

Lupset<sup>69</sup> has handed over to me several manuscripts of yours, which had been in his possession for some time. Among them are the Iulii Genius<sup>70</sup> and two declamations, one on the education of children from infancy, the other a consolation; they are entirely in your own handwriting, but only the first draft, and the text is incomplete. Except for this material, he swears that he has nothing else that belongs to you, which you are trying to recover. If you want these sheets forwarded, please let me know.

Right after Christmas Linacre is going to send his translation of Galen to Paris for printing. Lupset will accompany the manuscript and then stay on to correct the proof. You have no idea how happy you made him by mentioning his books in your recent letter<sup>71</sup> to me; believe me, he is all yours, heart and soul. The Bishop of Winchester,<sup>72</sup> who is, as you are aware, a very discreet person, was present at a large gathering of prominent people when the conversation turned upon you and your laborious publications; he testified, to the approval of all, that your rendering of the New Testament was as valuable for him as ten commentaries, for it shed so much light on the subject; he also said that here was a Latin translation that avoided Greek turns of expression, even apart from any other alteration that had to be made in the text of the Vulgate. Your letter has aroused my hopes, which I greedily seize upon; and from day to day I look forward to my Utopia with the feelings of a mother waiting for her son to return from abroad. Farewell, dearest Erasmus.

Hurriedly, from London, December 15.

I have forwarded your letter to Latimer;<sup>73</sup> I am sure he will comply with your wishes, and will be glad to do so. My wife<sup>74</sup> sends you a thousand greetings, and also thanks you for the very thoughtful

<sup>67</sup> See Letter 29. <sup>68</sup> See Letter 15, which helped to change Dorp's mind, and Letter 82, which congratulated him. <sup>69</sup> Thomas Lupset (ca. 1495–1530) <sup>70</sup> Iulii Genius

was one of the three characters in the Iulius exclusus e coelo, probably written in 1513 or 1514, soon after the death of Pope Julius II. <sup>71</sup> not extant <sup>72</sup> Richard Fox

(ca. 1446/7–1528) <sup>73</sup> See Letter 26. <sup>74</sup> Dame Alice More

wish that she may enjoy a long life; she craves that all the more, as she says, so as to have a longer time to pester me.

31. To William Warham<sup>75</sup>

5 <London, January 1517>

I ever judged your Paternity happy in the way you exercised your office of chancellor, but I esteem you much happier now that you have laid it down and entered on that most desirable leisure, in which you 10 can live for yourself and for God. Such leisure, in my opinion, is not only more pleasant than the labors, but more honorable than all your honors. To be a judge is the lot of many, and sometimes of 15 very bad men. But you possessed that supreme office which, when relinquished, is as much exposed to calumny as it formerly conferred authority and independence; and to give this up willingly as your Paternity has with great difficulty obtained permission to do, is what none but a moderate-minded 20 man would wish, and none but an innocent man dare.

I do not know which to admire the most, your modesty in willingly laying down an office of such 25 dignity and power, your unworldliness in being able to despise it, or your integrity in having no fear of resignation; but in any case together with many other men I give to your action my most cordial approval as most excellent and wise. Indeed I can
30 hardly say how heartily I congratulate you on your singular good fortune and how I rejoice in it for your sake, for I see your Paternity retiring far away from secular affairs and the bustle of the courts, and enjoying a rare glory by the honorable repute of your tenure of the Judgeship and your resignation from 35 it. Happy in the consciousness of duty well done, you will pass the rest of your life gently and peacefully in literature and philosophy. This happy state of yours my own wretchedness makes daily more brightly attractive; for although I have no business
40 worth mentioning (yet he was at this time a member of the Royal Council,<sup>76</sup> Under-Treasurer of the realm, and often employed in legations) yet since feeble powers are readily oppressed by paltry affairs,

I am always so distraught that I have not a free moment in which to visit your Paternity or excuse my 45 remissness in writing—indeed I have scarcely been able to get ready this present letter.

Herewith I would beg your lordship to accept a none too witty little book (the Utopia). It was written in undue haste, but a friend of mine, a citizen 50 of Antwerp (Peter Giles) allowed his affection to outweigh his judgment, thought it worthy of publication, and without my knowledge had it printed. Although I know it is unworthy of your high rank, 55 your wide experience, or your learning, yet I venture to send it, relying on the generosity with which you habitually encourage all men's literary endeavors, and trusting to the favor I have always experienced from you. Thus I hope that even if the book 60 pleases you but little, yet your good will may be extended to the author.

Farewell, my Lord Archbishop.

32. To a Member of the Royal Court

<London, January 1517>

I had had it in mind to betroth my Utopia to Cardinal Wolsey alone (if my friend Peter<sup>77</sup> had not, 65 without my knowledge, as you know, ravished her of the first flower of her maidenhood), if indeed I should betroth her to anyone and not rather keep 70 her with me ever unwed, or perhaps consecrate her to Vesta and initiate her into Vesta's sacred fires.

33. To Erasmus

<London>, 13 January <1517>

More to Erasmus, greeting.

I suppose that draft from Maruffo<sup>78</sup> must be in 75 the same style as this letter of mine, which I shall be surprised if you can read. But you will forgive me, my dearest Erasmus, for I am under such a constant pressure of business, I have neither time to write 80 nor energy to think. But if you have received the money from Maruffo, will you write to the Archbishop, so that Maruffo can recover what he has paid. I have written to thank our friend Busleyden.

<sup>75</sup> William Warham (ca. 1450–1532), Archbishop of Canterbury, resigned as chancellor in 1515. <sup>76</sup> More was called councilor in the pension grant of 1516,

but his actual introduction to the Privy Council seems to have been delayed to the summer of 1518. <sup>77</sup> Peter Giles of Antwerp had sent the Utopia to

Th. Martens of Louvain for publication.

<sup>78</sup> See the beginning of Letter 29 above. Raffaele Maruffo was a Genoese merchant and banker in England.

You must thank Desmarez<sup>79</sup> yourself on my behalf no less warmly than Giles, for they wished you to have the credit of what they wrote. You would hardly believe how devoted to you Linacre is, and what a keen champion of your studies. Why Grocyn was so anxious to meet you, I have not yet been able to discover, for he has not yet come to London. Farewell, dear Erasmus.

In haste, on St. Hilary's Day.

10 34. To Antonio <Bonvisi?><sup>80</sup>
<London, January 1517?>

That you have any such esteem of me issues, I suspect, from affection rather than judgment. For love, generally, when it settles deep in men, spreads darkness over their thinking. Which I see has happened to you, especially since my Utopia has pleased you so much, a book which I think clearly deserves to hide itself away forever in its own island.

20 37. To Cuthbert Tunstall
<London, 1517?>

That in your letter you thank me so carefully for my services on behalf of your friends is a mark of your great courtesy. What I did was quite trifling: it is only your goodness that exaggerates it. But you scarcely do justice to our friendship, for you seem to think that what I may do puts you under an obligation, whereas you should rather claim it as your own and service due you. . . .

The amber which you sent me,<sup>81</sup> a precious sepulcher for flies, was most acceptable on many counts. For the material in color and brilliance can challenge any gem, and the form is all the more excellent in that it represents a heart, a sort of symbol of your love for me. For thus do I interpret your meaning: as the fly, winged like Cupid and as fickle, is so shut up and entangled in the substance of the amber that it cannot fly away, so embalmed in the aromatic juice that it cannot perish, so your love will never fly away and always remain unchanged.

40 That I have nothing to give you in return does not greatly trouble me. For I know you do not look for an interchange of gifts and I am quite willing to remain in your debt. But yet I am somewhat distressed that so slender are my small means, I cannot bear myself so dutifully as to appear not unworthy of such proofs of your friendship. Wherefore, since I cannot prove myself to others, I must needs be content with our joint understanding, yours and mine.

40. To Erasmus
London, 16 July <1517?>

Thomas More to Erasmus of Rotterdam, greeting.

You made me very anxious, dearest Erasmus, by your latest letters (for I have had two), which give me to understand that our friend Peter<sup>82</sup> is not yet really restored to health and has something else hanging over him as well. What sort of thing this is you guess rather than know, and I could wish that whatever it is that you guess you had given me a few oracular hints, for even guesswork is beyond me, and affection being full of fears, I am driven to be afraid of many things which may be worse than the truth. Another thing too distresses me, that as though illness and anxiety were not enough, his wife's miscarriage has now been as it were piled on the top. O how unfair are the changes of mortal life! Success creeps on us slowly step by step; adversity descends all at once, and it rarely happens that any misfortune befalls us in isolation. All the same, human affairs are always changing; some days play the stepmother, but not all; and so I hope that all his troubles will be repaid by some great unexpected good fortune, and that I may see this very soon is my dearest wish.

As for that black Carmelite,<sup>83</sup> that he should be so much against you does not surprise me in the least. Two men could not be more unlike: one ignorant, one very learned; one bad, one very good. But that he should inveigh against your Folly is hardly credible, for he is entirely made up of folly himself. The insolence and ingratitude of the man! Is he so much ashamed of his imperial mistress, who has given him her charming daughter Self-conceit<sup>84</sup>

79 Jean Desmarez of Cassel (d. 1526)
80 Antonio Bonvisi (d. 1558) was a wealthy Italian merchant from Lucca and a close friend of Thomas More. 81 Tunstall was abroad in 1517, and would probably have purchased the amber on the continent.

82 Peter Giles 83 Jean Briselot (d. 1520), a suffragan bishop of Cambrai, prior of the Carmelite house near Valenciennes; in 1507 became abbot of the Benedictine abbey of Saint-Pierre de Hautmont 84 a character in Erasmus's In Praise of Folly

“in lasting wedlock bound, to be his wife,”<sup>85</sup> that in her he may take continual delight, for otherwise he could not endure his own company? Does he not realize also how much this bountiful goddess has lately done for him? When he was recently a candidate for so high an office, was it not she alone who wheedled their votes out of the electors? She it was who blinded them by magic arts and “o’er his eyes a godlike splendor spread,”<sup>86</sup> who secured his return with acclamation as worthy holder of that important office by the decisive vote of right honorable men—he being of course “in head and shoulders godlike,”<sup>87</sup> while his rival was cast out in disgrace, for that he skinny was and bald, those depressing marks of a wise man. So this runaway slave with supreme ingratitude now rants at his own mistress; he has donned the lion’s skin of wisdom to conceal the fact that he is only Folly’s ass. Luckily his ears at any rate stick out, and I hope he will one day be dragged by them away from his parade-harness and back to his panniers.

But that good old man<sup>88</sup> on the other hand—I cannot say how much I wonder what he would be at. Why does a pious and modest man strive so immodestly for reputation, of which he will not have a shred left if he goes on like this? How much better is your own policy! When challenged to a fight, you negotiate for peace and make up your mind so to govern your pen as not to leave the truth defenseless, and yet to mollify your opponent so that things do not issue in frenzy. This means in fact that you abandon your triumph when you have won the day and treat the advantage of all lovers of learning as something more important than your own glory, so that disagreement among the Greeks may not strengthen the barbarians, who turn their dissensions to their own advantage. If Caesar in the olden days had combined this moderate way of thinking with his lofty spirit, he would beyond doubt have won more glory by preserving the republic than he got from all the peoples whom he conquered and subdued. Though personally I think this modesty that you display is more than anything the product of a great and lofty heart. What can be more exalted than the humility which despises and derides fame, the very patron goddess of the proud? Yet fame follows you and dogs your steps everywhere however much you seek to escape, and you already have your fill and are almost sick of it.

The panel which is to record for me the likeness of you and our dear Peter<sup>89</sup> I await with indescribable impatience and curse the ill-health that so long keeps my hopes unfulfilled. My Lord Cardinal was speaking warmly to me of you lately and clearly seems to have in mind some great benefaction for you. That letter of mine which you say you do not wish to be done out of was so carefully put away by my man William<sup>90</sup> that he cannot find it. None the less, since you so wish, it shall be found wherever it may be, and I will see that it is sent to you. Farewell. From London, in haste, 16 July.

I send you a bundle of letters from the Venetian envoy and his secretary, and also from the Bishop of Rochester.<sup>91</sup>

41. To Erasmus

London, 19 August <1517>

Thomas More to Erasmus, greeting.

The belated and long-postponed departure of my friend Palsgrave,<sup>92</sup> who is daily expected to leave, has meant that you should receive my letter and other people’s much later than either I desired or you deserved. For I thought that my answer could most conveniently be carried by the man who had brought me yours. So it proved necessary to add this to my previous letter, to explain the reason for the delay and also to bring you up to date with the news here. If ever we were in trouble before, our distress and danger are at their greatest now, with many deaths on all sides and almost everyone in Oxford and Cambridge and London taking to their beds within a few days and the loss of many of my best and most honorable friends; among them (which I am sorry to think will bring you sorrow too) our dear Andrea Ammonio,<sup>93</sup> who is a very great loss to learning and to all right-thinking men. He saw himself very well protected against the contagion by his modest manner of life, thinking it due to this that,

85 Vergil, Aeneid 1.73 86 Vergil, Aeneid 1.589 87 Erasmus’s Adages 266 (CWE 31: 290) 88 Jacques Lefèvre d’Etaples 89 For the two-paneled painting that

Erasmus and Peter Giles sent More, see Plate 9c, Letter 47, and Epigram 276. 90 William Gonell 91 John Fisher 92 John Palsgrave (1468?–1522) returned from Louvain to London between July 10 and 15. 93 d. August 17, 1517. He was secretary to King Henry VIII and a close friend of Erasmus.

though he rarely met anyone whose whole household had not suffered, the evil has so far attacked none of his own people. Of this he boasted to me himself and to many other men beside, not very 5 many hours before he himself was carried off. For this sweating-sickness is fatal only on the first day.

I and my wife and children are still untouched, and the rest of my household have entirely recovered. But of this I can assure you: one is safer on 10 the battlefield than in the city. It has now begun, I hear, to rage in Calais, at the moment when I am obliged to go there on a mission; as though it was not enough to have lived in the midst of contagion, but I must actually go in search of it. But what can 15 one do? What one's lot brings must be endured. I have prepared my mind to face any outcome. Mind you at least keep well.

In haste, from London, 19 August.

43. To His Daughters and to Margaret Giggs

20 <1517?>

Thomas More to Margaret, Elizabeth, Cecilia, his darling daughters, and to Margaret Giggs equally dear, best greetings.

I cannot adequately express, my delightful daughters, how greatly pleased I am by your charming letters and no less by the fact, as I notice, that though 25 you are on the road moving from place to place, you yet abandon none of your habit either of dialectic exercises or writing themes or composing verse. This fully convinces me that you love me as 30 you ought, since I observe you feel so much concern in my absence that you practice zealously what you know gives me pleasure when I am with you. When I return I shall make you realize that disposition toward me is as profitable to yourselves as I 35 realize it is pleasurable to me. For believe me truly there is nothing which refreshes me so much in the midst of this bothersome business as reading what comes from you. Whereby I perceive the truth of 40 what your affectionate teacher writes so affectionately that if your own letters did not declare your extraordinary devotion to literature he might appear to have indulged his affection rather than the truth. But now by what you write you win him
 45 trust and I credit the truth of his almost incredible

boastings about you, the beauty and discernment of your discourses. And so I long with all my heart to hasten home so as to match my pupil in competitive 50 audition with you; he is a bit too lazy in the matter, because he cannot give up the hope that he may find you fall short of your teacher's promise. But I harbor the hope (knowing that you are persistent) that shortly you will surpass even your teacher, if not in 55 discourse at least in not abandoning the suit. Farewell, my darlings.

46. To Erasmus

Calais, 7 October <1517>

Letters 46 and 47 were sent together to Erasmus and express More's joy on receiving the Metsys diptych.

Thomas More to his Desiderius Erasmus, greeting. 60

At last, dearest Erasmus, one-eyed Peter has brought the portraits of you and our dear Giles for which I have waited so long,<sup>94</sup> and how delighted I 65 am with them is easier for anyone to gauge from his own feelings than for me to put in words. Here are men whose faces merely sketched in chalk or charcoal might charm anyone who was not wholly dead to all feeling for scholarship and goodness, while
 70 I in particular might well be deeply moved by the memory of such dear friends however inadequately recorded; and who can either expound in words or fail to feel in his imagination how I must now be ravished by their pictures, drawn and rendered
 75 with such skill that they could easily challenge all the painters of Antiquity? The spectator well might suppose them cast or carved rather than painted, so much do they seem to stand out and project with the proper relief of a man's body. You would hardly 80 believe, my most lovable Erasmus,<sup>95</sup> how my affection for you, which I was convinced would admit of no addition, has been increased by this desire of yours to bind me still closer to you, and how forcibly I exult in the glory of being so highly valued by 85 you; for in this remarkable document you put it on record that there is no one else whose affection you rate so highly. For such is my own interpretation at any rate — conceited it may be, but thus it is: you have sent me this present to remind me of you not merely every day but every hour. You know me well:

<sup>94</sup> See Plate 9c. <sup>95</sup> lovable Erasmus: More plays on the name Erasmus and the Greek erasmios, "charming."

I am sure I need not expend great efforts in proving to you that, although not free from failings in many other ways, at least I am no Thraso;<sup>96</sup> I am entirely free from vainglory. And yet, to tell the truth, this is the one itch in the way of ambition which I find it impossible to shake off, and which tickles me in a most agreeable manner, when it comes into my head that distant posterity will remember me for my friendship with Erasmus, attested in letters and books and pictures and every other way. If only I had some gift that might make it possible to produce something really distinguished, to prove myself not unworthy of such warm affection from a man without peer not only in his own generation but in future ages! But since it lies so far above my meagre capacity to do anything that could make the world understand this, I will at least do all I can<sup>97</sup> to prove myself, on your evidence alone, at any rate not ungrateful.

I have read your Apologia right through with close attention, and its effect on me at least was this: never did I perceive your eloquence more clearly or admire it less. What ruled out admiration was the feeling that in such a simple case<sup>98</sup> anyone might shine, not only you who can make the most difficult case look simple. Really I am quite sorry for the man, who has been led on by the applause of his local audience and encouraged to choose for the display of his powers to hold forth on the most chaotic problem that ever was, for the evidence favours now one side and now the other. I hope that your warning will make him see the light. I admired it all very much, but especially the witty way in which you rebuke his conceit, in suggesting that his second edition was prior to your annotations, although it controverts notes which we are asked to believe did not yet exist.

I sent your secretary<sup>99</sup> on to England with ten gros for his journey-money; to Peter<sup>100</sup> I gave a noble, which was very little indeed for the man who brought me that picture, but he seemed content. I hope for a prosperous and happy outcome to the book<sup>101</sup> on the education of a prince which you have sent to our prince as a present. Busleyden's death, heaven knows, was a heavy blow; he was a scholar above the average, a good friend of mine,<sup>102</sup> and fair and friendly to everybody. As for me, I have to sit here till the beginning of November<sup>103</sup> so continuously that I with difficulty secured two days for a trip to Saint-Omer, especially in hopes of seeing the abbot<sup>104</sup> of Saint Bertin at any rate, whom you described to me long ago. I found him just what you said; he asked me to dinner and gave me a generous welcome. He receives all his visitors at some length, and with me he was positively effusive; but he is a delightful old man and grew young again when he thought of you. Farewell, dearest Erasmus.

Tunstall is back in England. Farewell once more. From Calais, 7 October.

47. To Peter Giles

<Calais> 7 October <1517>

Thomas More to his friend Peter Giles, greeting.

My dearest Peter, greeting. I want passionately to hear whether you are getting strong again, which matters no less to me than any of my own concerns; and so I make careful enquiries and diligently pick up all I can from everybody. A certain number of people have given me a more cheerful account, either (as I hope) because they know it for a fact, or just to give me what they knew I wanted. I have written a letter to our friend Erasmus. This I send you unsealed, and please seal it up yourself, for there is no reason why anything addressed to him need be sealed when it comes to you. I wrote some verses of a sort on that picture; they are as clumsy as it was expert, but I have made a copy for you. If you think them worth it, pass them on to Erasmus; otherwise put them on the fire.

Farewell, this 7 October.

Lines written upon the diptych in which Erasmus and Peter Giles were portrayed together by that excellent artist Quentin,<sup>105</sup> in such a fashion that behind Erasmus, who is beginning his Paraphrase on the Epistle to the Romans, his books were painted each with its title, while Peter held a letter addressed to him in More's hand, which was actually imitated by the painter.

<sup>96</sup> the soldier in Terence's Eunuchus, proverbial for his self-assurance <sup>97</sup> all I can: See Letter 47. <sup>98</sup> in such a simple case: Ovid's Tristia 3.11.21 <sup>99</sup> Jan of Friesland <sup>100</sup> Peter Meghen <sup>101</sup> a presentation copy of the Institutio principis christiani sent to Henry VIII <sup>102</sup> friend of mine: More had met Busleyden during his embassy to the Netherlands in 1515. In Epigrams 250–52, he recalled the refined and hospitable atmosphere of Busleyden's house at Mechelen. <sup>103</sup> This is a guess by the editors: the Deventer Letter-book gives September. <sup>104</sup> Antoon van Bergen <sup>105</sup> Quentin Metsys

THE PICTURE SPEAKS<sup>106</sup>

Castor and Pollux were great friends of old:
 Erasmus such and Giles you behold.
 Far from them, more laments with love so dear
 5 As scarce a man unto himself could bear.
 Yet letters (making naught of envious space)
 Bring near the loved one's mind, and I his face.

NOW I, MORE, SPEAK MYSELF

If you have seen these men before,
 10 Their features will be soon detected.
 If not, to make all safe and sure,
 One holds a note to him directed;
 The other writes his name — which yet,
 Though he say nought, you'll soon discover,
 15 For on the shelf behind are set
 Books that are known the wide world over.
 Quentin, who giv'st new art for old,
 Than great Apelles<sup>107</sup> even greater,
 With mingled colours manifold 20 Lending dead shapes the life of nature,
 If thou canst paint so well such men
 As our forefathers scarce beheld 'em,
 In our day rarer still — and then
 In future they'll be seen more seldom — 25 This fragile wood why didst thou use
 Instead of tablets everlasting,
 Such as posterity might choose
 To keep thy fame and thee from wasting?
 In days to come, if someone cares
 30 For liberal arts somewhere on earth,
 And brutal Mars Minerva spares,
 What will these pictures then be worth?

My dear Peter, marvellously as our Quentin has represented everything, what a wonderful forger above 35 all else it looks as though he might have been! He has imitated the address on my letter to you so well that I do not believe I could repeat it myself. And so, unless he wants it for some purpose of his own, or you are keeping it for your own ends, do please let me have the letter back: it will double the effect if it is kept 40 handy alongside the picture. If it has been lost, or you have a use for it, I will see whether I in my turn can imitate the man who imitates my hand so well.

Farewell, you and your charming wife.

52. To Erasmus

Calais, 25 October <1517>

Thomas More to Erasmus, greeting.

I have had a letter, my dear Erasmus, from Wentford,<sup>108</sup> which I send straight on to you by the same courier. You will easily discover from it that the man 50 is what he always was. I will not ask your pardon for opening a letter to you, for (as you see) though written to you it was addressed to me. I make no doubt that the same mistake has happened and the letter addressed to you was written to me; but such
 55 was my eagerness to read it that I did not choose to break the seal. If you find anything in it which you feel I should wish to know (this I at any rate consider unlikely), pray tell me. You have, I suppose, received the letter in which I reported safe arrival
 60 of the picture;<sup>109</sup> for which let me thank you once again — no, dear Erasmus, again a thousand times. Of your Peter,<sup>110</sup> since he went to England, I have no news. That was a present worthy of a king, and I only hope that in that quarter it will secure you
 65 from the King something worth having. May there be a blessing on the duties entrusted you by the Emperor, for nothing goes well for him at the moment; or rather, all is in God's hand. I am sure you are right to wish not to become immersed in the busy nothings of princes, and you show your affection for me in hoping that I may be released from them; for you cannot believe how unwillingly I spend my time
 70 on them, nor could anything be more tedious than my present mission. For I am exiled to a small seaside town where place and climate are equally unattractive; and as for the litigation, at home I have a natural distaste for it even when it brings in something, and imagine how tedious it must be here
 80 when accompanied by loss. But my lord makes generous promises that the King will make it all up to me. When I get it, I will let you know. Till then, farewell; and I daresay to keep well is all you desire. Give my cordial greetings to Doctor Lee,<sup>111</sup> and to my friend Palsgrave if he has returned. Farewell 85 once more.

<sup>106</sup> See Epigram 276 for an alternate translation. <sup>107</sup> the most famous painter of ancient Greece <sup>108</sup> Roger Wentford was headmaster of St. Anthony's School in London. <sup>109</sup> See Plate 9c, Letter 46, and Epigram 276. <sup>110</sup> Peter Meghen, who brought the Metsys portraits <sup>111</sup> Edward Lee (ca. 1482–1544), who met Erasmus at Louvain. See Letter 75 (pp. 421–30) for More's response to Lee's critical annotations to Erasmus's New Testament translation.

54. To Erasmus

Calais, 5 November &lt;1517&gt;

Thomas More to his friend Erasmus, greeting.

I had a letter from you today, together with letters for Colet<sup>112</sup> and the Bishop of Rochester,<sup>113</sup> and a pamphlet with them. I will see to it that they are delivered as soon as possible, so that the pamphlet may not lose the charm of novelty. As I read your letter, I wondered why you had not written to my Lord of Canterbury<sup>114</sup> as well, to deal with your business with him yourself, for no one else, if I mistake not, carries such weight with him. Though if you would rather do this through me, and think that someone on the spot can be more effective than any writing of letters, it will give me more pleasure to comply than you to command me. But I shall not have the opportunity to complete it as soon as I should wish to complete any business of yours, for it is the regular practice with us that a man returning from a mission must go straight to the King and not turn aside to see anyone on the way. Besides which, my negotiations proceed so slowly that I fear it may be necessary to stay here longer than I hoped and longer than suits my own interests, unless perhaps I find that there is no hope here which makes it worth while to stay. But for the time being, if you wish, the business can be done by letter; and I have no doubt that that will be your wish. I will proceed therefore on the assumption that this year's annuity is to be deposited with Maruffo<sup>115</sup> and the bill dispatched to you. But as for commuting your annuity I at least think that nothing should be done, both because there is no one who could properly commute it except one man<sup>116</sup> who, they tell me, has no funds to do it from, and because I fear the Archbishop will read this as a sign that you have lost all interest in us. So think again about the commutation; if you decide to go ahead, you will not find me wanting. Meantime I will myself take steps about payment, and I think it would not come amiss if you put in a letter too; he perhaps is waiting for that.

I am delighted that the Paraphrase<sup>117</sup> is in the press.

How I envy Louvain! A great blessing has come its way — how great, as far as I can see, it scarcely recognizes. But the man of whom you write,<sup>118</sup> unless I am quite wrong, will never alter. Tunstall<sup>119</sup> just thinks you are too kind-hearted in continuing to trust him after being deceived so often. Pace<sup>120</sup> is still not back, nor can I discover when he will return; for that matter, I cannot imagine what business detains him. At least, as far as I can understand by making inquiries, for a long time there has been nothing afoot either with the Emperor or with the Swiss, yet he is not allowed to pack up and go home, though he has now been stuck in Constance, I believe, for more than a year. I am surprised that he has not returned your book. I will write to him about it to some effect; for there is nothing I would rather achieve, for the cause of good letters or my own sake, perceiving that you intend to set up a monument to our friendship in that work, which I value above all pyramids and mausoleums.

Hermans<sup>121</sup> I must leave to you. For Batt I developed such a penchant long ago from the way you spoke about him that I am almost as keen to see his memory flourish as my own. Only you must consider how you will couple me with him, for he died when I had scarcely reached man's estate, or in fact not even that. But you will contrive all this well enough. Mind you, though: charity begins at home. I insist on a part second only to yours, and no mistake. I am too fond of talking, as you know, to submit to a walking-on part, especially in a comedy from which I promise myself immortality.

Farewell, dearest Erasmus. I am glad you liked my poor lines on the picture.<sup>122</sup> Tunstall thought almost too well of the hendecasyllables, only moderately of the six-line epigram. But a certain friar I could name even had the face to pick a hole in it, because I compared the two of you to Castor and Pollux, and he said you should have been compared to Theseus and Pirithous or Pylades and Orestes, who were friends, as you are, and not brothers. I could not endure the friar, even if he were speaking the truth, and responded to his well-meant interference with an ill-written epigram:

112 John Colet (ca. 1466–1519), dean of St. Paul's Cathedral 113 John Fisher 114 William Warham 115 Raffaele Maruffo, a Genoese merchant and banker in England 116 Richard Master, rector of Aldington 117 Erasmus's Paraphrasis ad Romanos, published in November 1517 118 probably Maarten van Dorp 119 Cuthbert Tunstall 120 Richard Pace (ca. 1482–1536), English diplomat

121 William Hermans and Jacob Batt are interlocutors in the published edition of Erasmus's Antibarbari. 122 See Epigram 276.

Quoth I, of two great friends in brief
The affection to declare,
“Such friends they are as once of old Castor and Pollux were.”

5 An owlish brother takes me up,
Of those who wear the cowl:
“Who friends and brothers thus confounds,
Sure, he must be an owl!”
“How so? What can more friendly be 10 Than brother is to brother?”
He laughed at one who did not know
What’s known to every other:
“A large and crowded house is ours,
Brothers ten score may be;
15 In those ten score (my life upon’t)
Two friends you will not see.”<sup>123</sup>

Farewell then once again. From Calais, 5 November, in haste, the courier being in a great hurry, and under pressure, I dare say, from his driver.

20 57. To Bishop John Fisher<sup>124</sup>
<ca. 1517–18>

Much against my will did I come to Court (as everyone knows, and as the King himself in joke sometimes likes to reproach me). So far I keep my 25 place there as precariously as an unaccustomed rider in his saddle. But the King (whose special favor I am far from enjoying) is so courteous and kindly to all that everyone (who is in any way hopeful) finds a ground for imagining that he is in the King’s good
30 graces, like the London wives who, as they pray before the image of the Virgin Mother of God which stands near the Tower, gaze upon it so fixedly that they imagine it smiles upon them. But I am not so fortunate as to perceive such signs of favor, nor so 35 despondent as to imagine them. But the King has virtue and learning and makes great progress in both with almost daily renewed zeal, so that the more I see his Majesty increase in all the good and really kingly qualities, the less burdensome do I feel 40 this life of the Court.

62. To Erasmus
<England, ca. May 1518>

I have a great affection for Rhenanus and I owe him much gratitude for his extremely kind preface. I should long ago have sent him a letter of thanks had 45 not that fatal disease of laziness held me captive.

63. To William Gonell<sup>125</sup>
At Court, 22 May <1518?>

I have received, my dear Gonell, your letter, elegant 50 and full of affection as always. Your devotion to my children I perceive from your letter, your diligence from theirs. Everyone’s letter pleased me greatly, but above all that I notice Elizabeth shows a modesty of character in the absence of her mother, which not 55 every girl would show in her mother’s presence. Let her understand that such conduct delights me more than all the learning in the world. Though I prefer learning joined with virtue to all the treasures of kings, yet renown for learning, if you take away moral probity, brings nothing else but notorious and noteworthy infamy, especially in a woman.
60 Since erudition in women is a new thing and a reproach to the sloth of men, many will gladly assail it, and impute to learning what is really the fault of nature, thinking from the vices of the learned to get their own ignorance esteemed as virtue. On the other hand, if a woman (and this I desire and hope with you as their teacher for all my daughters) to eminent virtue of mind should add even moderate skill in learning, I think she will gain more real
70 good than if she obtain the riches of Croesus and the beauty of Helen. Not because that learning will be a glory to her, though learning will accompany virtue as a shadow does a body, but because the reward of wisdom is too solid to be lost with riches or 75 to perish with beauty, since it depends on the inner knowledge of what is right, not on the talk of men, than which nothing is more foolish or mischievous.
For as it becomes a good man to avoid infamy, so to lay oneself out for renown is the sign of a man
80 who is not only arrogant, but ridiculous and miserable. A mind must be uneasy which ever wavers between joy and sadness because of other men’s

<sup>123</sup> See Epigram 277 for an alternate translation. <sup>124</sup> John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, who, like More, refused to take the oath to the Act of Succession

<sup>125</sup> William Gonell (d. 1560) was a tutor in More’s home.

opinions. Among all the benefits that learning bestows on men, I think there is none more excellent than that by study we are taught to seek in that very study not praise, but utility. Such has been the teaching of the most learned men, especially of philosophers, who are the guides of human life, although some may have abused learning, like other good things, simply to court empty glory and popular renown.

I have written at length on not pursuing glory, my dear Gonell, because of what you say in your letter, that Margaret's lofty and exalted character of mind should not be debased. In this judgment I quite agree with you; but to me, and, no doubt, to you also, that man would seem to debase a generous character of mind who would accustom it to admire what is vain and low. He, on the contrary, raises it who rises to virtue and true goods, and who looks down with contempt from the contemplation of the sublime, on those shadows of good things which almost all mortals, through ignorance of truth, greedily snatch at as if they were true goods.

Therefore, my dearest Gonell, since I thought we must walk by this road, I have often begged not you only, who, out of your exceptional affection for all my family, would do it of your own accord, nor only my wife, who is sufficiently urged by her truly maternal love for them, which has been proved to me in many ways, but absolutely all my friends, continually to warn my children to avoid as it were the precipices of pride and haughtiness, and to walk in the pleasant meadows of modesty: not to be dazzled at the sight of gold; not to lament the lack of what they erroneously admire in others; not to think more of themselves for gaudy trappings, nor less for the want of them; not to deform the beauty that nature has given them by neglect, nor to try to heighten it by artifice; to put virtue in the first place among goods, learning in the second; and in their studies to esteem most whatever may teach them piety toward God, charity to all, and modesty and Christian humility in themselves. By such means they will receive from God the reward of an innocent life, and in the assured expectation of it will view death without dread, and meanwhile possessing solid joy will neither be puffed up by the empty praise of men, nor dejected by evil tongues. These I consider the real and genuine fruits of learning, and though I admit that all literary men do not possess them, I would maintain that those who give themselves to study with such intent will easily attain their end and become perfect.

Nor do I think that the harvest is much affected whether it is a man or a woman who does the sowing. They both have the name of human being whose nature reason differentiates from that of beasts; both, I say, are equally suited for the knowledge of learning by which reason is cultivated, and, like plowed land, germinates a crop when the seeds of good precepts have been sown. But if the soil of a woman be naturally bad, and apter to bear fern than grain, by which saying many keep women from study, I think, on the contrary, that a woman's wit is the more diligently to be cultivated, so that nature's defect may be redressed by industry. This was the opinion of the ancients, both the wisest and the most saintly. Not to speak of the rest, Jerome and Augustine not only exhorted excellent matrons and honorable virgins to study, but also, in order to assist them, diligently explained the abstruse meanings of the Scriptures, and wrote for tender girls letters replete with so much erudition that nowadays old men who call themselves doctors of sacred literature can scarcely read them correctly, much less understand them. Do you, my learned Gonell, have the kindness to see that my daughters thoroughly learn these works of saintly men. From them they will learn in particular what goal they should set for their studies, and the whole fruit of their endeavors should consist in the testimony of God and a good conscience. Thus they will be inwardly calm and at peace and neither stirred by praise of flatterers nor stung by the follies of unlearned mockers of learning.

But I fancy that I now hear you object that these precepts, though true, are beyond the tender years of my daughters, since you will scarcely find a man, however old and advanced in study, whose mind is so fixed and firm as not to be tickled sometimes with desire of glory. But, dear Gonell, the more do I see the difficulty of getting rid of this pest of pride, the more do I see the necessity of getting to work at it from childhood. For I find no other reason why this inescapable evil so clings to our hearts, than that almost as soon as we are born, it is sown in the tender minds of children by their nurses, it is cultivated by their teachers, it is nourished and brought to maturity by their parents; while no one teaches anything, even the good, without bidding them always to expect praise as the recompense and prize of virtue. Thus long accustomed to magnify praise, they strive to please the greater number (that is, the worse) and end by being ashamed to be good. That this plague of vainglory may be banished far from my children, may you, my dear Gonell, and their mother and all 5 their friends, sing this song to them, and repeat it, and beat it into their heads, that vainglory is despicable, and to be spit upon, and that there is nothing more sublime than that humble modesty so often praised by Christ; and this your prudent charity

 10 will so enforce as to teach virtue rather than reprove vice, and make them love good advice instead of hating it. To this purpose nothing will more conduce than to read to them the lessons of the ancient Fathers, who, they know, cannot be angry with them;
 15 and, as they honor them for their sanctity, they must needs be much moved by their authority. If you will read something of this sort, besides their reading of Sallust — to Margaret and Elizabeth, who are more mature than John and Cecily — you will bind me and 20 them, already in your debt, still more to you. And besides you will make my children who are dear to me first by the law of nature, and then dearer by learning and virtue, most dear by such advancement in knowledge and good character. Farewell.

25 From the Court, on the vigil of Pentecost.

65. To William Budé<sup>126</sup>

<ca. August 1518>

I never skim any of your works, but study them seriously as works of the first importance. To your 30 treatise, however, on Roman Measures I gave a very special attention such as I have given to no ancient author. For that it cannot be understood in any cursory way, you have provided by your careful choice of words, your well-balanced sentences, the studied
 35 gravity of your diction, and not least by the serious and difficult nature of the matters you treat of matters almost lost in antiquity, and requiring the deepest research. But yet if anyone will turn his eyes to what you have written and give it careful and continued 40 attention, he will find that the light you have thrown upon your subject brings the dead past to life again. Whilst he ponders your words, he will live in imagination through all the past ages, and will be able to gaze upon, to count and almost to take into his hands, the hoarded wealth of all kings, tyrants and nations, which is almost more than any 45 misers have been able to do.

I can hardly enumerate the multitude of reasons for which I am attached to you, my dear Budé. You are so exceedingly good to me: whomsoever I love,
 50 you, by good fortune, love also: you possess so many excellent virtues: your temperament, as I judge, hardly differs from mine: you have earned the gratitude of all men for your useful literary labors: though a married man you have happily acquired a 55 degree of learning that was once the exclusive possession of the clergy. Indeed I am hardly content to call you a layman when by your splendid gifts you are so highly raised beyond the level of the laity.

69. To Margaret More

<1518>

I was delighted to receive your letter, my dearest Margaret, informing me of Shaw's<sup>127</sup> condition. Later letters will be even more delightful if they have told me
 65 of the studies you and your brother are engaged in, of your daily reading, your pleasant discussions, your essays, of the swift passage of the days made joyous by literary pursuits. For although everything you write gives me pleasure, yet the most exquisite delight of all comes from reading what none but you
 70 and your brother could have written. [And the letter concludes:]<sup>128</sup> I beg you, Margaret, tell me about the progress you are all making in your studies. For I assure you that, rather than allow my children to be 75 idle and slothful, I would make a sacrifice of wealth, and bid adieu to other cares and business, to attend to my children and my family, amongst whom none is more dear to me than yourself, my beloved daughter. Farewell.

70. To Margaret More

<1518>

You are too bashful and timid in your request for money, from a father who wants to give it and when 80 you have greeted me with a letter such that I would not only repay each line of it with a gold Philippeus

<sup>126</sup> William Budé (1467–1540) was a French humanist and friend of More and Erasmus. <sup>127</sup> Shai (genitive). The English form of the name was probably Shaw, but his identity is unknown. <sup>128</sup> The parenthetical comment is Stapleton's.

(as Alexander did with Choerilos),<sup>129</sup> but, if my means were as great as my desire, I would reward each syllable with two ounces of gold. As it is, I send only what you have asked, but would have added
 5 more, except that as I am eager to give, so I like to be asked and coaxed by my daughter, especially by you, whom virtue and learning have made so dear to my heart. So the sooner you spend this money well, as you always do, and the sooner you ask for more,
 10 the more will you be sure of pleasing your father. Farewell, my dearest daughter.

71. To Reginald Pole and John Clement<sup>130</sup>

<1518>

I thank you, my dear Clement, for being so keenly 15 solicitous about the health of my family and myself that although absent you are careful to warn us what food to avoid. I thank you, my dear Pole, doubly for deigning to procure for me the advice of so skilful a physician, and no less for obtaining from 20 your mother<sup>131</sup> — noblest and best of women, and fully worthy of such a son — the remedy prescribed and for getting it made up. Not only do you willingly procure us advice, but equally evident is your willingness to obtain for us the remedy itself. I love 25 and praise both of you for your bounty and fidelity.

72. To Erasmus

<London?, 1518?>

My Clement<sup>132</sup> lectures at Oxford to an audience larger than has ever gathered to any other lecturer.
 30 It is astonishing how universal is the approbation and the love he gains. Even those to whom classical literature was almost anathema now show attachment to him, attend his lectures, and gradually modify their opposition. Linacre, who, as you know,
 35 never praises anyone extravagantly, cannot contain his admiration for his learning, so that, although I love Clement so much, I am almost tempted to envy him for the high praises heaped upon him.

<sup>129</sup> Choerilos was a worthless Greek poet, whom Alexander thus rewarded beyond his merits. <sup>130</sup> Reginald Pole (1500–1558), a cousin of Henry VIII, later became Archbishop of Canterbury. For his remarks on More's death and appeal to Henry VIII, see p. 1385. John Clement (ca. 1500–1572)

was a page in More's household and later a distinguished physician. <sup>131</sup> Countess of Salisbury and of royal blood <sup>132</sup> John Clement <sup>133</sup> Maarten van Dorp (1485–1525) was a Latin lecturer at the University of Louvain. Here More is referring to Dorp's retraction of what he wrote against

74. To Bishop John Fisher

<1519?>

40

I cannot express in words my delight, both for your own sake and for the sake of our country, that your lordship writes in a style that might well pass for Erasmus's. As for the subject-matter, ten Erasmuses could not be more convincing. . . . Farewell, my Lord 45 Bishop, most highly esteemed for virtue and learning.

82. To Martin Dorp<sup>133</sup>

<London, 1519>

I easily foresaw that you would one day think otherwise than then you thought. But really that you
 50 would not only become wiser, but even in a most elaborate address testify that you had changed, and that so openly, genuinely, and categorically, this indeed went far beyond not only my expectation, but also the hopes and almost prayers of all, for your
 55 action manifested incredible probity and utter self-restraint. For though nothing indeed is more usual than to change one's opinion about a matter, yet nothing is anywhere more rare than, after you have once declared your view and then confirmed it by 60 assertion, and then defended it with vehemence, after all that to reverse course upon realizing the truth and return once again to the harbor from which you sailed, as though your voyage had been
 65 vain. Believe me, my dear Dorp, what you have done with such great humility, you would have asked in vain of those whom the world nowadays considers most humble. Men are almost all so foolish in their 70 misdirected shame that they prefer to proclaim that they are fools now, than own that they ever were. How much more virtuously have you acted, my dear Dorp. Although you are so keen-witted, so learned and so eloquent that if you pleased to defend anything, even what appeared improbable or absolutely 75 paradoxical, you could yet prove it to your readers, yet in your love of truth rather than shams you have preferred to declare to all men that you were once deceived, rather than go on deceiving.

Erasmus. For the context of Dorp's dispute with Erasmus and More's intervention, see the introduction to the Humanist Letters (p. 389) and More's "Letter to Dorp" (pp. 391–420).

But what am I to say of the further act of modesty by which you have surpassed that exceptional modesty? Although it was clue to your own happy talent that you saw the truth, yet you chose to ascribe it to the admonitions of others, and even to mine. Thus although the first rank in wisdom is yours by right, and is given to you by all men's votes, yet you alone thrust yourself down to the second rank. Learned men must thrust you back into first rank, with their elbows if necessary. For that letter of mine was wordy rather than convincing; and when I compare it with your address, so eloquent, so full of close-packed and cogent arguments, I see quite clearly, my dear Dorp, and to my shame that my letter had no power to change you, although out of courtesy or modesty you now yield to it praise which belongs to you and which, the more you avoid it, will all the more surely follow you. So, my very dear Dorp, you must consider that the rarer the occurrence of an act like yours, the more it has gained for you of true glory, which will never die.

If they go on boldly in the path they have chosen, attempting to suppress good learning and to drive it from the schools, in a very short time I expect to see a marvelous change. Learned men will arise everywhere. Those teachers in the public academies who now look on such studies with indifference will themselves be accounted but indifferently learned. It vexes me, my dear Dorp, to think of these things, because I cannot help feeling a certain pity for those who by the action of a few bigoted partisans are undeservedly compromised. But the praise that will be your portion is a far more agreeable thought to me than their opprobrium.

87. To Erasmus

<March–April 1520, Greenwich?>

Thomas More to the excellent and most learned man Erasmus of Rotterdam, greeting.

Did you ever, my dear Erasmus, best of men and scholars—did you ever see a more charming character than our friend Brixius? As soon as he takes a fancy to conceal something, he supposes it is hidden from all other mortals too. For the greatest blockhead could not fail to realize how absurd and offensive and discreditable it was to make quarrelsome and scurrilous attacks on anyone unprovoked, and again and again he asserts and repeats and emphasizes that he was provoked by my epigrams and was purely on the defensive throughout, so that though he found himself the target of curses and execrations he hits back at his assailant with nothing but pleasantries and wit and humor. But of the impudence, the falsehoods, and the insults with which he had previously challenged all England, never a word; not a word either of the fact that the difference between us was a live issue long ago in all the confusions of wartime, and had long been dead, until he revives it now after all this time, when peace is fully restored. Our modern Phormio<sup>134</sup> is inspired with such self-confidence that, though he could easily discover that his case is rejected by everyone with a real knowledge of the facts, he behaves all the same as though he had fully and clearly established it before the appropriate tribunal; and now, being I suppose sure of his position, he lets fly at will against me, and bales out (wit and charmer that he is!) all the bilge-water in his bosom. Having decided that two or three epigrams<sup>135</sup> written for fun are to be regarded as invective, as though he only has to say something to carry universal conviction, he convinced himself at the same time that everyone would approve his action, if he were to take a few lines, humorously directed long ago against a very bad-tempered pamphlet of his, and in wartime too, and reply after all these years, when peace is ratified and established in such a spirit of concord as no two peoples have ever shown before, in a book that is simply poisonous. He hopes no doubt that no one will be either sharp-sighted enough to be able to see something he himself is content to wink at or such an unseasonably severe critic that he will ask for evidence other than Brixius's own story, especially as he boasts of the justice of his cause with such self-confidence.

I at least should have found him somewhat less impertinent, if he had dangled all this tinsel only before the eyes of the ordinary public, among whom he might have found some who still knew nothing of the subject, many to whom both of us were strangers, and some who enjoy a quarrel however unjustly, and if this ox were not flaunting his pack-saddles thus in front of you, who are not only

<sup>134</sup> The proverbial parasite; the hero of Terence's comedy bearing his name

<sup>135</sup> two or three epigrams: See Epigrams 188–95, 209, 266–69.

familiar with the contest from stem to stern (unless you have failed to read Chordigera,<sup>136</sup> for all the rest I know you have read) but also know the contestants themselves under the trappings and through to the skin, as the saying<sup>137</sup> goes. Besides which he knows that quarrels of this kind, even when they arise from just causes, are unpleasant and hateful to a man with your open-hearted and kindly nature. All the more so the very silly, very unjust, and very uncivilized quarrel he is pursuing now, which you have already condemned in a kind of preliminary inquiry, as he could have seen from the letter<sup>138</sup> you sent him, in which you add reasons for your opinion, one of which pays too much respect to us both and was thought up in the interests of courtesy rather than truth, as though he and I were the sort of people whose friendly relations were of any importance to the cause of literature, while the other at least was perfectly justified — that humorous pieces I threw off long ago in the heat of a war ought to be wiped off the slate now that peace is restored. Of your two reasons, the one that was more courteous than true he allows, as concerns me with a touch of scorn, but in his own case he is frank and modest and accepts it;<sup>139</sup> the other, the truth of which could not be denied, he has passed over in silence, and once more tries to throw dust in our eyes with this talk of provocation, claiming<sup>140</sup> that I attacked him first and in a hostile spirit.

And indeed if Brixius, devoted as he is to metaphors from comedy, ordains that the action of this play shall start with the second act, that is to say with my epigram, I cannot deny that I did give him provocation. If he follows normal practice and allows the first act to take its proper place, there will, I think, be no doubt that the confused working-out of the plot has nothing comic about it. To begin with, who would not be astonished at the egregious impudence of a man who protests so often that he is the injured party, when he knows all the time that his Chordigera is on sale everywhere? Nor should I have pursued it with an epigram, had he not attacked my countrymen as a whole with such abusive falsehoods. In this regard I do not see what he can invent to excuse his calumnies. Can he say that my epigrams preceded his book, when their satire is entirely directed at that book's ignorance, plagiarisms, and falsehoods? Can he maintain, like the sharp little attorney that he is, that his Chordigera contains nothing offensive? Let him be as impudent as you like, he will not deny that at the outset of the Chordigera he accuses us of breaking treaties and shamelessly calls us perjured.<sup>141</sup> And yet he dares to open with the remark that he carries an olive-branch in the midst of arms, having presumably such an affection for falsehood that he regards perjurer and treaty-breaker as terms of endearment. Does he suppose it no concern of mine if my countrymen are attacked by him with falsehood and calumny, merely because I myself am not mentioned by name? For so he seems to suggest; as though the same reasoning, and indeed the same eloquent assertions, would not justify the footpad in taking the traveler to court who had withstood him perhaps rather uncivilly, on the grounds that he did not attack the man but merely had designs on his purse.

It may be said perhaps that though I did not attack him first, I did at least write with more bitterness; for there are limits even in self-defense. But I, with the barbarity of a Polyphemus,<sup>142</sup> in furious anger pursued Brixius (our modern Ulysses, of course) with curses and execrations. So he maintains, not stopping to think how grossly he lies. He consoles himself with the hope that there must be many people who have not learnt the whole story and can easily be persuaded to believe him, and that thus he will be victorious without a battle; while with you and those who know he is satisfied if he can secure the modified approval of "I should have thought he was speaking the truth if I did not know the facts." But I shall either defend myself with the truth; or alternatively, I would rather lose the day than owe my victory to the ignorance of my judge. And so in this field at any rate, I shall not follow Brixius's example, who right at the end of his crazy collection printed my lines on Abingdon<sup>143</sup> (which I threw

136 Chordigerae navis conflagratio; see CW 3.2: 429–65. It commemorated the French ship La Cordelière, which burnt and sank in the Atlantic off Brest on August 10, 1512 together with the English flagship. In particular Brixius celebrated the allegedly heroic death of the French captain, Hervé de Portzmoguer, a Breton. 137 the saying:

See Erasmus, Adages 889 (CWE 32: 226). 138 EE 620: 34–45. 139 accepts it: See EE 1045: 11–22; this letter was published with Brixius's Antimorus. 140 See EE 1045: 82–83. 141 breaking treaties . . . perjured: See CW 3.2: 441/18–21. 142 The cyclops of the Odyssey, who eats Ulysses' men; see EE 1045: 39–46. 143 Henry Abingdon

(ca. 1418–97) was a prominent member of the King's Chapel. In his Antimorus (CW 3.2: 508–11), Brixius took issue with one of More's epigrams (160), a cenotaph rewritten in medieval rhymes and unclassical Latin to satisfy the taste of Abingdon's heir. Brixius chose to ignore the explanation of this mockery given in Epigram 161.

off as a joke to tickle the ass's ears of a certain person whom nothing would satisfy unless it rhymed), omitting two epigrams of mine on the same subject which explained the humorous purpose of the lines.
 5 He could hardly do anything more maliciously misleading. I at least will do the opposite. I will get his Chordigera reprinted, and add my epigrams at the end. I will also append his collection,<sup>144</sup> so that he cannot complain that anything has been left out;
 10 and in this way I hope I shall make it downhill work for all educated men to judge whether Brixius has as good a case as he so pompously maintains.

He calls us perjurers and treaty-breakers; he distorts the whole sequence of events to the credit of 15 his own people and to our discredit by what he himself calls fictions but are really brazen lies; he recounts the lot of it in such absurd terms that nothing so absurd was ever seen before; he dresses it all up in other men's verses, so that you might think you
 20 were reading the cento of Valeria Proba,<sup>145</sup> except that she put her material together neatly, and Brixius cobbled his up so ineptly that every seam projects into a kind of knot like a great scar on a wound, or gapes as the ground does in a drought. With all this,
 25 I did nothing in those epigrams, by which he claims he was so grievously injured, except to poke fun at the faults I have mentioned, and at any rate there was, I think, no bitterness in it; so that I wonder very much where in my epigrams he can have found the 30 curses and execrations<sup>146</sup> which this witty man, as he prides himself on being, turns into humor. Does he mean by execrations and curses what I say in one of my epigrams,<sup>147</sup> where I produce a humorous excuse for his having to invent, as if no one had returned
 35 safe home from the Chordigera who could tell him the story of what actually happened?—for I added that Brixius ought to have been in the ship himself, that he might see with his own eyes the events he was to describe, for so he would not be obliged to lie
 40 like this so disgracefully and hand falsehood down to posterity as though it were true. Apart from this one point, I am certain that Brixius will never find anything against which he can direct a trumped-up charge of either curses or execrations.

45 Although on this same point either his charges are egregious inventions, or at any rate he shows himself egregiously ignorant of the meaning of the words execration and curse. There may be someone who also thinks I was rather cutting, though if he 50 were to take a small sample of Brixius's Chordigera I trust he would excuse me without difficulty; but there will be no one to call this execrations or curses, if he knows any Latin at all. That level is not reached even by Martial's remark,<sup>148</sup> which was far more cutting than mine, about the poet Theodorus,

 55 who was perhaps as a poet not unlike Brixius; for when Theodorus's house was burnt down, Martial exclaims that it was an outrage, and the gods ought to be ashamed of themselves, that the same fire did not also consume its owner. Whereas I, though I
 60 did think Brixius deserved to be well and truly present in the Chordigera, so that he could escape the need for such shameless lies, did not wish that that had happened to him; I did not call down upon his 65 head the fire which after all many people escaped who were in the vessel. If one thinks and declares a man worthy of something, one does not in the same breath call that fate down upon his head. For Brixius too, I suppose, thinks thieves deserve to be
 70 hanged, and the same of adulterers, and no doubt of perjurers too, though they are not so very many parasangs distant<sup>149</sup> from liars; and yet I cannot think him so heartless as to call down that fate simultaneously on all these classes, who form a large
 75 part of the human race. A wish of this kind would be most merciless; it would also perhaps be none too safe for Brixius himself.

But besides that epigram there are nine others, in the first of which—and what I say is perfectly 80 true—I point out in simple language that all writers will lose their credibility if by his example they get the habit of following their emotions rather than the facts. In two I make fun of the way in which he describes Hervé<sup>150</sup> fighting like a prodigy. One is a humorous comment on Brixius's combination of 85 boasting and lack of sense, for besides many other utter absurdities he imagines Hervé prophesying about himself as if he were a nursling of Apollo, and to make this possible he has him deliver a long 90 speech in the midst of the flames, as though he were perfectly at his ease. Furthermore, though there were many survivors from both ships, since several

144 Antimorus 145 Probus, wife of the prefect Adelphus of Rome, composed in hexameters a cento or patchwork of borrowed lines on the subject of sacred history, especially as contained in the gospels. 146 curses and execrations: See EE 1045: 49. 147 Epigram 189 148 Martial 11.93.3–4 149 many parasangs distant:

A proverbial expression referring to an ancient measure of length comparable to our miles; see Adages 12.82 (CWE 33: 179). 150 See Epigrams 190–92.

of our smaller vessels came to the rescue, he chose to burn everybody up rather than leave a survivor from whom he might have been thought to have heard a story which he could write up. In one epigram I referred to the lines invented by Brixius for Hervé's cenotaph.<sup>151</sup> Two of them make play with the fact that Brixius had decorated his Chordigera with lines stolen from the poets of Antiquity. In two I showed that I felt a need for more thought and more ingenuity in the Chordigera in both invention and arrangement of the subject-matter.

When I wrote these pieces, I was the injured party, public affairs were in turmoil, and I spoke the truth. Even so, I never published them or showed them to anyone by themselves — always joined with other things, so that the reader's attention was either diverted from them as much as possible or at any rate was not monopolized by them; while his Antimorus on the other hand offers nothing but abuse of me by name, as crazy as it is offensive. Last but not least, when I heard that moves were on foot to print my epigrams in Basel, you know yourself what steps I took<sup>152</sup> to get what I had written against Brixius, and a few other things, omitted; some of them seemed to me not serious enough, although they are far removed from the indecency which is for some people, I perceive, about the only merit some men's epigrams have to recommend them. And at the same time I had no wish to criticize anyone by name even slightly, however much he might deserve it.

If in this respect my efforts, as far as Brixius is concerned, came to nothing, I am delighted; he makes it very clear that he deserves to have quite different things said about him. Take the places where he asserts, so frequently and so falsely, that I began it, and that I gave mortal offense with a string of insults, calumnies, abuse, curses, and execrations. If he has discovered all the things he lists, although — seeing how things then were, and what he had deserved — I could have defended what I had done on principles which every nation recognizes, yet I will admit forthwith that I am as great a barbarian as the Cyclops Polyphemus, which Brixius maintains. If on the other hand he has not discovered in my work the things that he objects to, I think it only fair that Brixius should acknowledge that he has wholly invented the passage where he complains of my curses and execrations in order to provide a place where he can drag in Polyphemus, a giant who to be sure needs plenty of room; for he was so much in love with that elegant fiction that, rather than be obliged to leave it out, he preferred to invent a target at which he could discharge some shafts of humor. If Brixius were not more blind than Polyphemus himself, he would easily discern that there is not much credit in this for him, if he passes over criticisms made of him as though they did not exist and raises up other charges against himself which he can easily shoot down.

I had written an epigram on one of my countrymen<sup>153</sup> who made himself ridiculous by going over entirely to French fashions when we were at war with France. In another passage,<sup>154</sup> Brixius having called us treaty-breakers and perjurers, I had touched in passing on the fact that in the war with France we had a religious cause and did our duty toward the church of Christ, whose vicegerent we were aiding, while the French were the other way round, for they encouraged schism and opposed the pope. This precise point I have no wish now to reopen, nor was it at my wish that it was published long ago. And yet, had Brixius pretended (for he is a great hand at fiction) that he was moved to anger by these passages it might perhaps have been easier to forgive him, as a man who seemed to have been imposed on by a false idea of honor, in fact by an inordinate love of his country, which seemed to make him intolerant even of valid criticisms of it, or at least ready to maintain points which have been abandoned in the treaties. And now, like the blockhead that he is, he has chosen to make a case in which he has the same obstacles to surmount as in the other: that it was he who wrote first, he who provided the occasion for it, that his charges are false, that the point at issue has been decided, or rather, has been rendered void and extinguished by international treaties.

There is another most dishonorable thing which I pass over. In public he first gave cause for offense, and in private he poses like this as the injured party. How this can be, he cannot explain; but the curses and execrations piled on him by me he himself

<sup>151</sup> Hervé's cenotaph: an appendix to the Chordigerae navis conflagratio (CW 3.2: 464–65), ridiculed in Epigram 194 <sup>152</sup> what steps I took: There is no trace of this in More's surviving correspondence.

<sup>153</sup> an epigram . . . countryman: Epigram 195 <sup>154</sup> in another passage: In Epigram 271 on James IV of Scotland; France and her allies were laid under an interdict following the schismatic Council of Pisa in 1511.

clearly shows to be his own invention. And so, since he began it by attacking me in print, and falsely too, while my reaction was confined to epigrams (the subject of which was such that, if he denies their truth, he will achieve nothing except to make every-5 one understand that he has lied twice over), an honorable retreat was not only possible for him, it was his duty. And he would have done so, I am sure, had he not preferred to make his distinguished impudence universally known. His former errors might
 10 have been forgiven to his youth, if nothing else, or blamed on the state of things. And now, all these years later, in all this peace and concord, when our two princes are very nearly bound by ties of hospitality (for this is now in preparation), he must needs
 15 begin again at the beginning and repay the handful of epigrams I threw off against his book with a poisonous pamphlet in which, as he could think of no answer to make on his own behalf, he has turned entirely 20 against me, pouring out nothing but unmixed calumny and abuse that would disgrace a madman.

In the first place, if at any point Froben's workmen, or even the man, whoever he was, who made the copy for the printer, were perhaps not quite up
 25 to the mark, he ascribes it all to me, although he sees that no book ever had such a happy passage through the press that it contains no errors at all, and although he finds in it no list of corrigenda. And yet in their very errors they have generally shown more
 30 felicity than Brixius in his corrections. Look at the mischief-making and the falsehood of his charge that I attack the prince's father!<sup>155</sup> — though I myself speak only of evils which the prince set right with such incomparable success at the outset of his 35 reign, evils which afflicted the body politic for some years before that, thanks to the perfidy of some men on whom the King's father had relied too heavily at a time when ill health prevented him from managing things himself, though he was in other ways
 40 a supremely experienced ruler. And yet Brixius, for all that in his spiteful way he diverts on to the King these evils which came about through other men's villainy, uses this to declaim with astonishing virulence against myself, all whirling fists and buffetings 45 and threats of exile! And as though he felt imprisoned in the constraints of verse and could not range as freely as he wished, he added venomous notes in the margins to direct the reader's attention to these points, in case perhaps he took too little notice of 50 the verses.

And in this fashion, while making it signally clear that he has all he needs for making mischief except power to match his malice, yet the pretty fellow is proud of his witty performance, though his 55 laughter is the laughter of Ajax.<sup>156</sup> Ajax, when the armor was assigned to another man, lost his reason and hung up cattle and belabored them, roaring with laughter all the time and highly delighted with the groans they uttered, madness having convinced him that they were Agamemnon and Ulysses, on whom he longed to wreak vengeance. Brixius is like that: he pursues a vile obstinate invention 60 of his own, hounding it on to destruction, beaming with self-satisfaction because, mindless as he is, he fails to observe that every man — and I mean every single man with any spark either of decency or of 65 common feeling — when he hears this wild Brixius laughter, does not merely scoff at him as a madman but is revolted by this gladiators' spirit of fighting to the death.

And in spite of all this, it is just as though he were writing this stuff for some blockhead Coroebus or Margites<sup>157</sup> and not for Erasmus; as though, with Erasmus ready to overlook the impudence
 70 with which he attacked me first, he had so successfully blinded everyone without exception that what he himself did not choose to see became at once invisible to everyone; as though he had now proved his case that I began it, although the facts prove that
 75 what I wrote came later; as though wartime conditions were still in force, so that it was proper for him to seek revenge with his venomous inventions for a few heedless words uttered long ago and quite harmless too, at this late date when on both sides
 80 princes and peoples alike have so far grown into amity that soldiers actually forget the wounds of which their bodies still bear the scars; as though I myself had assailed him bitterly and rained all sorts of imprecations on him, while he in return had merely sprinkled me with unmixed pleasantries, unmixed 85 humor, unmixed wit, and had not in fact voided over me a flood of crazy invective and ravings for which poisonous would be too mild a word. In the light of all this it is remarkable to see the confidence and 90

<sup>155</sup> prince's father: See Epigram 19. In his Antimorus (CW 3.2: 492–93), Brixius had accused More of slandering the memory of Henry VII. <sup>156</sup> laughter of Ajax: See Sophocles, Ajax; Erasmus, Adages 1646 (CWE 34: 24). <sup>157</sup> Coroebus or Margites:

See Erasmus, Adages 1271, 164 (CWE 33: 1754, 31: 207).

certainty with which he promises himself not merely forgiveness, as though his reply was unavoidable, but actually praise for his moderation; for when attacked (as we are asked to believe) with curses and execrations (which are non-existent), though he had the right to bear equivalent weapons when he entered the lists he shows his amazingly generous nature and admirably versatile talents by snapping with no fangs (such is his boast),<sup>158</sup> by being humorous without calumny and funny without giving offense and sarcastic but stopping short of personal abuse, by rebukes without severity and instruction that needs no rod; to crown all, in fact, by turning my abuse into joking, my offensive remarks into humor, my insults into witticisms, by making irony out of my execrations and mere scoffing out of my curses.

Would not any casual reader think that Brixius had delivered a pretty peroration, provided he knew nothing at all of the case? For should any reader happen on it who has looked into his Chordigera and my epigrams and his idiot Antimorus<sup>159</sup> (should anyone have such abundant leisure that he is able to make such a worthless use of his precious time), he will find in those epigrams of mine neither abuse nor insults nor offensive remarks nor curses nor execrations; while in Brixius on the other hand he will find nothing but undiluted scandals and bad language and poisonous picking of quarrels; he will see teeth, but they are broken on the grindstone, and a teacher's rod, but no learning; he will see that the man's criticism consists in foolish attacks on what he does not understand and his teaching in shameless innuendo against anything he does understand; — and then how he will laugh at that laughter of Brixius's that makes Brixius a laughing-stock! How he will mock at the mockery which recoils so severely on its author! How humorous he will find Brixius's humor, which reminds one of a camel dancing!<sup>160</sup> What a subject for mirth he will find in the mirth of our Germain, in whom he will recognize a true cousin german of Aesop's donkey;<sup>161</sup> for the way the donkey imitated the frisking of that pet dog as he put his muddy feet and claws on his master's shoulders and was chased with sticks back into the kennel was not much less absurd than Brixius's imitations of the poets. With what elegant irony he will outflank Brixius's irony, which is, to be sure, so inelegant that it reminds the reader of that painter who was as much a painter as Brixius is a poet, and having painted a hound and a hare so much alike that no one could tell the difference was careful in the end to make it clear by labeling them which was the hound and which the hare.

Brixius's use of sarcasm is usually such as to fill him with pitiful forebodings that most of the praise he wishes to be taken as ironical will be accepted by many of his readers as serious; and from this danger he saw no escape except to declare that he was being ironical in a marginal note. Being a cautious man, he naturally took precautions to avoid being bound by his own act and deed, as though his praise of me had been seriously meant. There was only one place<sup>162</sup> where he saw no need to warn us in a marginal note that he was being sarcastic, because the elegance of that passage gave him such confidence, although he lists it in the index (as he hopes it will be thought) of my mistakes and (as the facts show) of his own slanderous malice and ignorance. He makes fun of a dialogue in my Utopia<sup>163</sup> in which a friar is having a discussion with a jester: "In reporting and developing this dialogue," says Brixius, "More displays with ease the sharp edge of his wit, the vigor of his language, and his incorruptible judgment."<sup>164</sup> For my part, dear Erasmus, my learned friend, I do not think so poorly of Brixius, nor have I such a good opinion of myself, that I would not readily admit I could never have expressed the elegant diction of friars or the keen logic of a jester so prettily as the living truth with which Brixius could have expressed them. It makes such a difference to be familiar with these niceties of style and to approach the jester yourself, not in name alone (as Brixius so courteously and so often concedes that I do) but in nature (for which a wholly justified claim is presented by his Antimorus).

And then, when he talks about critical judgment, by which I take it he means that it is absurd to introduce the barbarous diction of friars into a book

<sup>158</sup> his boast: See EE 1045: 36–39.

<sup>159</sup> his idiot Antimorus: Latin moricius eius Antimoros ("his idiot anti-fool")

<sup>160</sup> camel dancing: See Adages 1666 (CWE 34: 33). <sup>161</sup> Aesop's donkey: See "The Donkey and the Pet Dog." <sup>162</sup> one place:

In his verse treatment of More's epigram on Abingdon, Brixius praised More's mastery of this peculiar genre, but in the prose commentary following the metric part of Antimorus he calls this epigram ridiculous, speaking elsewhere of More's inexcusable offenses against the meter, solecisms, barbarisms, and so on; see CW 3.2: 346–47. <sup>163</sup> See CW 4: 80–85. <sup>164</sup> See CW 3.2: 534–35.

which you wish to be in Latin (to say nothing for the moment of the fact that the Greeks are thought barbarians by Latin speakers and Latin speakers by Greeks, though all authors so often interlard their Latin with Greek and get praised for it too), I do not foresee, I will not say my own style, in which Brixius detects everywhere such blatant blunders and barbarisms (thanks to his own blatant facility in false accusation and his own blatant ignorance), but Brixius's (which Brixius himself thinks steeped in all the charm of all the Graces) ever reaching the standard of Latinity one finds in Plautus; and yet Plautus thought he was doing nothing absurd and committing no affront on the Latin language when in a Latin comedy he introduced a Carthaginian character from time to time speaking Punic.<sup>165</sup> This precedent, in my opinion, pretty well covers the man who, in a type of composition closely akin to comedy, brings on the stage a friar of this type speaking his own language, which is a sort of pidgin Latin. And yet you yourself know, dear Erasmus, how much I was dissatisfied with that dialogue and how gladly I should have omitted it, had it not given more pleasure than I can say to those persons whom no one with any education and judgment of his own could fail to rate for education and judgment as far above Brixius "as soars man's eye hence to the ethereal heaven."<sup>166</sup>

I would mention some of these people by name here too, but it would be a waste of time, for you know them already, nor have I any wish to expose honorable men, men who indeed deserve honor, to the malignity of this yapping cur, who goes into such a decline when he hears another man well spoken of that I really think it would have finished him off had he not vomited some of his mad rage on Beatus Rhenanus,<sup>167</sup> modeling himself for resentment on Aeschines;<sup>168</sup> though he falls as far short of Aeschines in literary gifts as I do of Demosthenes, of whose reputation Aeschines was so jealous that he brought a public prosecution against Ctesiphon too because he had spoken well of Demosthenes, and was plotting to have him sent into exile, a plot which soon recoiled, and rightly, on his own head. Finding therefore that Beatus Rhenanus has commended my epigrams to Willibald,<sup>169</sup> which was one good scholar and good man commending them to another, Brixius flies into an incredible rage, and with passionate virulence and puny muscles draws his leaden sword with its blunt edge to attack Rhenanus. A toady he calls him, or, if he won't accept that, he is ignorant, uneducated, and stone-blind for not detecting that my verses are what they seemed to Brixius to be as he examined them through the spectacles that envy provided. But the gnat that attacks the elephant<sup>170</sup> is wasting his time; and what sort of creature Brixius is, he makes clear of his own accord.

To sing Rhenanus's praises I have no desire as things are now, for fear they tell me it is one mule scratching another mule's back,<sup>171</sup> and if I had a mind to it I could not do it properly; everyone knows and they all freely admit that fertile as Germany is in men of creative gifts she has no more elegant stylist if it's style you want, no better scholar if you wish for learning, and if you ask for character, no better man. Indeed I do very much wonder why Brixius chose Rhenanus as the sole target of his fury. Is he the only man who differs from Brixius in his estimate of what I write?—as though I had not been highly praised in print,<sup>172</sup> I will not say by you and Peter Giles, for you might be thought somewhat misled by your affection for me, but by Busleyden, Hutten, Desmarez, Nijmegen, Vives, Grapheus, Zasius, and Budé, with whom I was at that time so far from being linked in friendship that we had not yet exchanged a single line; and the same is true of Rhenanus himself, to say nothing of many other people not unknown as scholars. If Brixius were to imagine that they are all flattering me, I'm sure I am much obliged to him for making me such a great man. If he declares them all blind, ignorant, and uneducated because they disagree with him and credit a man whom he so often calls a fool and labels

165 The language of Carthage; see Plautus, Poenulus 982–1029. 166 Vergil, Aeneid 6.579. 167 See CW 3.2: 542–43, where Beatus is censured for his "adulation," although his name is not given. See preface to the epigrams. 168 This Athenian orator and partisan of King Philip of Macedon attacked his rival Demosthenes in public and also attacked Ctesiphon,

who had prepared special honors for Demosthenes (336, 330 BC), but in the end was himself exiled. 169 i.e., Willibald Pirckheimer. See the "Epigrams" section above. 170 See Aesop's "The Lion, Jupiter, and the Elephant." 171 See Adages 696 (CWE 32: 125–26). 172 praised in print: Peter Giles, Jerome de Busleyden, Jean Desmarez, Gerard Geldenhouwer of Nijmegen, and Cornelius Grapheus had all made complimentary contributions to the first edition of Utopia, Guillaume Budé to the second (see CW 4: 4–37). Cornelius Grapheus (Schrijveer) of Aalst (ca. 1482–1558) was secretary of the town of Antwerp and thus a colleague of Peter Giles, More's good friend.

crazy (not to take the list any further) with somewhat more sense at least than anyone, by what I hear, has yet ascribed to Brixius, himself excepted — even so, no one has invested him with such absolute and dictatorial powers that his personal opinion must be universally accepted without at least some remaining right of appeal to public opinion.

Brixius takes it hard, it seems, that Rhenanus should have preferred my epigrams to those of Marullus and Pontano;<sup>173</sup> but he ought to have looked rather more closely in assessing the value of Rhenanus's praise. It is true that he pays me a much more generous tribute than modesty allows me to accept, but the area where Brixius particularly takes offense he does not praise me so effusively that Brixius was bound to be jealous. Rhenanus does not prefer me to Pontano or Marullus in all respects or think me a match for them. He compares us only in respect of natural gifts, not in knowledge of Greek, so there is no call for Brixius to be so indignant at the sight of an Englishman matched against a Greek. Is there any reason in nature why a man actually as good as any Greek should not see the light "in mist and fog, the home of muttonheads?"<sup>174</sup> Though I myself have neither so much pride nor so little self-knowledge that I can accept the tributes paid me by Beatus Rhenanus, who, as I say, matches me in natural gifts against such men as they, but in usefulness puts me above them, at least to the extent of thinking that anything I contribute in the way of sound principles does my readers more good than all the filth and wickedness with which they defile their pages; and he supposes the benefit they get from my simple and straightforward verses greater than the charm of Marullus's riddling lines. Surely all Rhenanus does in this is to prefer any good there may be in me to the bad there is in them.

Praise of this kind does not preclude that their virtues should exceed mine, as they certainly do, and it ought not therefore to appear so partial as to arouse envy. For that matter take Budé (to say nothing of the others), a man whose experience of public affairs is as great as it is in literature, where he holds some kind of primacy: the things he has written about me are such that though I now know them to be due to the courtesy of a man who loves to think well of others — which is equally true of the preface contributed to Brixius's Chordigera by that excellent scholar Aleandro<sup>175</sup> — all the same I would far rather they should prove to be true than that I should be a better poet than Pontano or Marullus, or better at Latin and Greek than the two of them together. And yet it is surprising how suddenly Brixius turns about and devotes himself (of all people) to the care of my reputation; for it is, he says, only from a devoted concern for it that he has called my attention in such friendly and kindly and loyal fashion to all those errors,<sup>176</sup> so many thousand of them and so disgraceful; the idea being no doubt that with his assistance things should be quietly removed which could not circulate any longer without making me a perfect byword and earning me some sort of indelible black mark for ignorance. And on this score he thinks I owe as great a debt to his well-meaning labors as one man can owe another.

This elegant and graceful attitude so forcibly appealed to Brixius that he now repeats as a serious proposition what moved everyone to mockery who read it in the Antimorus, forgetting for the moment those verses<sup>177</sup> in which with astonishing ingenuity he puts forward a scheme by which he now thinks it probable that I could put all this disgrace to rights. And the scheme is that I should arrange to have returned to me from every quarter all the copies of my book which have now been printed anywhere, and having purged them in this way should then re-issue them. And yet Brixius is so much frightened of my doing just this, of my dispatching more than five hundred emissaries to every country under the sun and recalling all the copies, that he threatens to take steps to see that uncorrected copies continue to be available in his possession and that of a number of other persons (a result I think he would find difficult to achieve without sending out emissaries for the purpose in his turn), which can demonstrate my errors to the world, those errors which he now urges me to eliminate privately so that no one can hold them against me in future, in such a way that not all the waves of Ocean could wash my record clean.

Here is another example of his long memory or his self-consistency. In that letter to you he says his

173 Marullus and Pontano: Michael Marullus, a native Greek, and Giovanni Pontano were authors of well-known collections of Latin epigrams. In his preface Beatus Rhenanus suggested that their jokes were unsuited to Christian ears. 174 Juvenal 10.50 175 A complimentary letter by Girolamo Aleandro prefixed to

Brixius's Chordigera praises the poem and the dedication to Queen Anne of Brittany; see CW 3.2: 440–43. 176 See EE 1045: 56–60. 177 CW 3.2: 508–9

Antimorus has no teeth in it, because he snaps in it without fangs;<sup>178</sup> and yet in his eleven-syllable lines<sup>179</sup> (which he turns off so neatly that he can sometimes squeeze thirteen syllables into one line) he says that his elegiacs steep themselves in my blood. The fact is that when he imitates poets he is as absurd as a monkey imitating a man, and his attempts at concealment are as futile as those of any grey mullet or cony that thinks, as soon as it puts its head into the sand, its whole body is sufficiently concealed; so true is it that no wolf ever had a shorter memory than his and no feather, no puff of wind was ever more consistently inconsistent.

Look now at that place<sup>180</sup> where he says he would have taken your advice had not his book been already in the printer's hands. I am greatly surprised that a man to whom Erasmus's lightest nod is of such importance should give so little weight to your letter<sup>181</sup> of warning that he would rather persist in wrecking his own reputation with such a crazy pamphlet (and particularly in his thirst for glory) than write off a small sum of money. He is after all a man, to use his words,<sup>182</sup> who is well off in respect not only of food and clothing but of servants and a horse to ride and a purse with money always in it; who has a house and garden to which Apollo and all the Muses who would like to move in a body and abandon Parnassus, if Brixius does not bolt the door. And yet I'm surprised if he would have done as you told him, considering that after so much good advice, before the trouble started, he was not willing to listen to Budé or Bérault or Lascaris or Deloynes or to his Eminence the Cardinal<sup>183</sup> who died in France lately. Be that as it may, if he thinks it was your goodness of heart that made you dissuade him from publishing the Antimorus, he now thinks all the same that if you do not approve of it now it is published, you are being quite unfair, because you lay down a different set of rules for him in his treatment of me from those you adopted for yourself in dealing with Lefèvre.<sup>184</sup> Nor do I doubt that Brixius regards himself as very sharp and an expert in legal procedure, tying you down as he does with such a weighty precedent that, if you wish to escape the appearance of injustice, you cannot possibly give judgment against him. 45

For my own part, dear Erasmus—and this I say openly to all comers, but to none more readily than yourself, for I have observed that from this aspect at least your mind is entirely one with mine—I have such respect, such admiration, and veneration for Jacques Lefèvre<sup>185</sup> as I ought to have for a man who by his attainments and character has done more to deserve this than anyone for several centuries; and I doubt whether anyone has worked harder, apart from his devotion to Scriptures, to the exposition of which he has made a useful contribution, to bring over our universities at long last from their foolish waste of words and pointless logic-chopping to a sober and strict devotion to philosophy and to the branches of learning they had so long neglected. This fact is so generally admitted that as a rule he receives the most laudatory tributes even from those who differ from him sometimes very widely indeed on individual statements; and yet nothing arouses them more than Lefèvre's habit (as it seems to many people) of asserting somewhat too absolutely things which would have caused no offense had they been laid down and defended with more moderation, and of making definite statements in an unduly contentious spirit—so easily does a sort of pious enthusiasm often carry a good man too far. 60

But how little resemblance there is between your defense<sup>186</sup> and that perfectly absurd complaint of Brixius's is beyond all doubt for anybody unless he is quite ignorant of the facts. I do not propose therefore to develop this aspect of it and compare one case with the other and match pamphlet against pamphlet, as though this were the only way to make it clear that at no point, either when it began or as it has gone on ever since, did Brixius's crazy reactions correspond to what you did; so let me not be thought to rouse controversy over a case which is quite clear, or seem to have stirred up sleeping and buried fires from their ashes to no good purpose, or be obliged in any way to give offense to Lefèvre, for whom I have the greatest respect, or be credited with attempting to suborn the judge before whom 85

178 EE 1045: 36; CW 3.2: 536–39.

179 eleven-syllable lines: "Ad lectorem," CW 3.2: 512–13. 180 EE 1045: 22–27.

181 EE 620. 182 See EE 1045: 121–27.

183 Antoine Bohlier (ca. 1460–1519), Archbishop of Bourges from 1515 and cardinal from 1517. A member of his household was the young poet Jean Salmon Macrin, who contributed some preliminary verses to Brixius's Antimorus and is addressed by Brixius in an answering poem; CW 3.2: 482–85. 184 See EE 1045:

66–69. 185 Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples (ca. 1455–1536) edited St. Paul's Epistles from the Vulgate along with a paraphrase and commentary in 1512. 186 Apologia ad Fabrum

I now plead my case and procure your support by flattery. One thing at least he does say (except that he described himself as light-hearted when he should have said light-headed) which in other ways is not wholly untrue: that you fought at close quarters while he operated at a distance.<sup>187</sup> You went to the heart of the matter, not with a sword as Brixius says (he seems to imagine you as a gladiator) but with the point of a needle, while Brixius is only skirmishing at long range in a lunatic fit, discharging abuse such as any drunken old woman might have poured out at the first comer and most of which was well suited to the man himself, without succeeding in getting anywhere near the target; or if he was sometimes lucky and got close to it, then as often happens on hard ground to a weapon dispatched with insufficient force, it either simply overshot the mark or glanced off it. So his long-range equipment achieved at least this result: it provided evidence that he was a by no means inadequate marksman, granted only that in the kindness of one's heart one was always willing to move the target to the spot where his arrow fell, and a very pretty controversialist, if he could find someone to whom the abuse was applicable which he himself could draw from an un-failing well of scurrilities. And when there is no one on whom this filth will stick, what can he do for the time being except drench himself in it?

But the moment comes when, as though really moved by a letter from you, he begins to take a more pacific line and, if I think fit, now that each of us has come on stage (as he puts it),<sup>188</sup> having donned our tragic masks (as worn by warriors in the olden time when they advanced to do battle) and shown that we can sustain our roles with might and main (I, that is, with a handful of epigrams and Brixius with whole volumes), I as challenger and Brixius as defender (for he is careful to repeat these words lest otherwise someone might not believe them), at long last he does not refuse to clasp hands and, with Erasmus as our pater patratus (a practice in ancient times confined of course to the stage), to sign a treaty, especially as you think me a man whom he ought to know and like. At the same time, for fear that peace so easily achieved might be somewhat too lightly valued, or that it might give me too good a conceit of myself, he qualifies his offer, mindful as ever of his own prestige, to the effect that if I prefer to watch the outcome of the tragedy as it now is, he equally has no objections to its running through to the last act. My acting is not brilliant enough to frighten him off the stage, nor am I such a doughty fighter that if I prefer to join battle he must refuse to meet me, provided I descend into the arena to fight in my own armor, not like Patroclus in the arms of Achilles, and give him fair warning with a blast of the trumpet. Look at the astonishing tricks with which Brixius adorns and glorifies this minuscule dispute, in which it is almost true that he is simply sparring with himself! He matches himself and me together as actors both comic and tragic and gymnasts and warriors, and it is wonderful to see what a skillful mixture he makes of these very different things; how neatly he equips fighting men with masks and comic actors with armor, and brings in a pater patratus to sign a treaty between actors disguised as army commanders. How he brings fighting men onto the stage and warriors onto the playing-field! And so, with a skilled use of the figure they call epimonê,<sup>189</sup> he maintains his simile so elegantly that in about three lines he completes for us a tragical-comical battlepiece.

As for this treaty, dearest Erasmus, you must not put yourself out. Suppose there is a contest between More, that tiny creature, on the one side and on the other Brixius, that noble victor crowned with many a palm<sup>190</sup> and not much more than a palm high himself; this does not threaten the world of letters with such enormous peril that we need Erasmus as our pater patratus to achieve a peace, unless anxiety over the outcome of this heroic duel has the same effect on the princes of the literary world as that famous battle of the frogs and the mice had on the anxious gods in Homer,<sup>191</sup> who found it more formidable than their own conflict with the giants. For when you say in your letter that I am exactly the sort of man who ought to be friends with him,<sup>192</sup> I admire your goodness, for you are campaigning for peace at every opportunity. But, dear Erasmus, "of such an honor all unworthy I,"<sup>193</sup> the honor I mean of being counted among the friends of such a mighty nabob,

187 See EE 1045: 71–73. 188 See EE 1045: 85–98. 189 the rhetorical figure of "dwelling on a subject" 190 In the introductory verses "Ad lectorem" of the Antimorus, Brixius used the image of the resilient palm tree; see Adages 204 (CWE 31: 237–38). 191 The Batrachomyomachia (Battle of Frogs and Mice), a parody of an epic poem, was in antiquity ascribed to Homer. Zeus intervened in the battle, but his thunderbolts failed to achieve their purpose. 192 See EE 620: 35–37. 193 Vergil, Aeneid 1.335

to whose Antimorus I have now written an answer for better or worse, which shows perhaps too little reverence for such a great man but in the light of the facts at any rate is perhaps unduly modest, as others judge. And you, dear Erasmus, what do you think? I long to know. It is true that I had what I wrote printed very promptly, and it might perhaps have been safer to take time to polish it, especially as it has to come before a rival with such keen sight that he can descry a fault where no fault is. But I thought it better to leave him many bones on which to try his teeth and weary them or break them in the end than to fill my head for long with all this nonsense. And I should have thought such a crazy pamphlet simply unworthy of any reply, had I not felt it right to follow the advice of some of my friends, who advised me to protect myself against the man's perfectly ludicrous calumnies. This was my sole object; not to exchange abuse and give him as good as I got. Otherwise, had I not decided to consider what was fitting for me to say rather than what he deserved to hear, however lordly Brixius's contempt for my style as unwarlike, effeminate, and limp, I would at least have made him feel the truth of Ovid's line "An easy case makes all men eloquent."<sup>194</sup>

As it is, though he has not merely let fly at my talents and my character but has taken secret steps to secure my undoing so far as it was in his power, and in the literary way has left nothing of mine alone without getting his teeth into it, I on the other hand have touched on nothing of his except just those volumes in which his target is either myself or my native country. On what he is capable of, taking the question as a whole, I pass no judgment and I make no examination. I know how little weight my opinion of him would carry, though even now I take a kinder view of him than many men whom he has done less to offend. All the same, I have never down to this day heard anyone give a truly favorable verdict on Brixius without feeling at the same time that so far he has produced nothing grand enough to correspond to the airs which that boastful little man gives himself; for at one moment he boasts that poetry is his natural field, what the open plain is to a horse,<sup>195</sup> at another he prides himself on competing with antiquity or robbing Hercules<sup>196</sup> himself of his club by force, or threatens with some lack of modesty that he will breathe forth the thunderbolt. Such are his boasts, and other people who compare them with his poems give as their considered opinion that he is not only insane but incurable.

As for me, although Brixius shows himself in my case a ferocious prophet as well as judge, such that he not only damns everything I have written up to now but asserts that I shall never write<sup>197</sup> anything worth reading hereafter, yet I take a somewhat kinder view of him, basing my judgment mainly on both the Chordigera and the Antimorus, in which he attacked me in a fit of bad temper—for this very fact still gives me some hopes that that sour talent may one day ripen. Though what he writes is so foolish at the age he is now, he is not, I perceive, one of those men whose talents mature so early that he cannot still continue and ripen in another way. Of course, if I thought he had already reached his full development and vigor, his acme (to use the Greek word), I could expect nothing except to see a man whose spring was spent in a coma and his summer in uncontrollable rage enjoy an autumn of unbroke frenzy.

When he says my acting is not brilliant enough to frighten him off the stage,<sup>198</sup> I can at least admit that I neither have nor claim to have anything about me that could frighten anybody. Nor can I deny that Brixius's acting is such a terrifying performance that it might drive from the theatre not only a poor-spirited little creature like myself who am easily frightened by a pale image in its mask<sup>199</sup> but the whole body of spectators, by spectral forms affrighted, if those lines of Brixius's are to be trusted which the silly fool, a second Morychus,<sup>200</sup> inserted in his Antimorus:

As this I wrote, from their infernal marsh;
The Furies rose; there stood Alecto, there Megaera terrible with visage harsh,
Tisiphone with her snake-knotted hair.<sup>201</sup>

If only Brixius would take off those needlessly tragical masks, the rest of his performance at any rate has nothing about it sufficiently remarkable to make any man stiffen to attention as if he'd seen Medusa's head; nor does my experience suggest that his strength is formidable enough to make

194 Tristia 3.11.21 195 See Adages 782 (CWE 32: 169). 196 See Adages 3095 (CWE 35: 498–99). 197 See CW 3.2: 510–11.

198 EE 1045: 94 199 pale . . . mask: See Juvenal 3.175. 200 See Adages 1801 (CWE 34: 89–91). Morychus, the epitome of foolish behavior, provides another allusion to More's name. 201 CW 3.2: 510–11

Patroclus, or Thersites<sup>202</sup> anyhow, run to Achilles to ask help from his armor against a Hector such as this. But if he has made up his mind to bring on stage with him not those pasteboard Furies but his own fury and rage; if he is resolved to let all his thunders roll, and has decided to brandish that portentous thunderbolt which falls (so he boasts) from his lips whenever, in a private and particular fit of resentment I suppose, he conceives “wrath not of Jove unworthy”<sup>203</sup> — why, then, as far as I am concerned, he can play to empty houses, and the amulet to protect me against such threatening apparitions shall be silence. However, there shall arise perhaps some Hercules, helper of those in need, who has had some practice in subduing monsters like this and will take from Brixius’s hands in his turn the club which Brixius forcibly took from him, using as his weapon I fancy a cane or a birch. Brixius’s brand of thunder is such that Strepsiadēs<sup>204</sup> himself would not hesitate to fart in its face. And for this conjuror’s trick, this thunderbolt, very figure to suppress it is Cacus,<sup>205</sup> himself no mean exponent of the art of terrifying; or, if his skill is insufficient, the name of Cacus by itself would remind us of the weapons which he had had to use himself against that kind of thunder. Are hapless mortals to perish by that thunderbolt’s hot breath? No, no! Into that open mouth, agape with three-cleft bolt, “to piss, or worse, we have the right.”<sup>206</sup>

I hope, my dear Erasmus, that we shall see you when the kings meet at Calais, and if you come, both kings, you need not doubt, will make you welcome. Otherwise it would be impertinent for humble friends of yours like me to demand or expect that for our sake you should endure the fatigues of such a journey, when it is more properly our duty to come and see you, as I shall certainly do if the wish to pay your respects to the kings does not bring you there, having asked my prince to allow me a few days leave. Meanwhile, dear Erasmus, farewell; and without any reduction in your usual friendship for Brixius, keep a warm corner as you usually do for More, for you are as dear to me as I could possibly be to myself. Our friend Lupset is lecturing at Oxford to large audiences on the humanities, both Greek and Latin, with great credit to himself and no less profit to his pupils. He has succeeded my friend John Clement,<sup>207</sup> who has devoted himself entirely to medicine, in which one day he will be second to none, unless (which God forbid) the Fates deprive his fellow men of his society.

Farewell once more, and give most cordial greetings in my name to those capital scholars Dorp, Nesen, and Vives.

88. To Erasmus

<Greenwich? End of February–April 1520>

Thomas More to his friend Erasmus, greeting.

Though it was never concealed from me, Erasmus dearest of all my friends, how much better your judgment is than mine, nothing has cast such a bright light on this as the advice we gave you and Lee that that pamphlet of his should be permanently suppressed, while your view on the other hand was that its publication should be allowed at the particular moment when it was so actively expected, so that the whole sad story might one day reach a conclusion, rather than wait till the public interest should have died down and then publish it all the same, stirring up fresh troubles. And so we forced you rather than persuaded you to agree to this truce; but though you say you never broke the agreement, and Lee solemnly swears that he observed it, it was continually broken all the time. Which of you broke it I cannot say for certain, for I was a long way away when it all happened, and you and he were bandying accusations back and forth all the time; I am only bound to regret that my advice carried sufficient weight with the two of you to bring about a truce but would not carry enough to secure that the truce was observed. For I would rather have had the book published then, at a time when feelings were not running so high and its publication would be a milder affair, than that it should come out now after all this time, when resentment has increased and its effect must be exacerbated.

202 Thersites is a foul-tongued soldier, silenced by Odysseus with blows; see Homer, Iliad 2.212–70. 203 See Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.166. 204 reacting in this manner in Aristophanes’s Clouds 293 205 In legend, a brigand who terrorized his neighborhood and was slain by Hercules. More is alluding to the similarity between the name and the verb cacare, “to defecate.” 206 Juvenal 1.131 207 Formerly a tutor in More’s house and later the husband of his adopted daughter, John Clement had preceded Lupset as Wolsey’s reader in the humanities at Oxford. The study of medicine which he had now undertaken would eventually lead him to Louvain.

For it has come out, and is rather more bitter than I might have hoped or than might have been salutary to experts in this field; among whom one looks in vain for the humility which even ignorant men should be ashamed not to display toward one another. But for you surely, my dear Erasmus, it cannot be right—assuming that the complaints he adduces are genuine—to be surprised if he shows a certain bitterness in pouring out his feelings after being so badly hurt; if, on the other hand, he has been misled by some phantom of the truth, you ought to make allowances even so. For what we believe to be true moves us with just as much force as what is proved to be so.

It is, I suppose, hardly necessary to advise or exhort you to display true Christian humility, which in all it undertakes toils solely for Christ's sake, who ought to be the only object before your eyes. The world may be ungrateful and not take the trouble to reward you, it may be grateful but not have the power; so much the more solid the reward you will receive from him. If you have made such sacrifices to secure great advantage for the world, if you have worn out your health by so much toil for the advancement of humane studies, and yet have been repaid evil for good by the jealousy of men who owe you (and you almost alone) what little tincture of a liberal education they may possess, in all this you are made more like unto Christ; and in no way can you more faithfully imitate him than by returning good words for evil, just as it was your good deeds that called them forth. Farewell, Erasmus my heart's dearest friend.

Yours, if he is his own, T. More

90. From Erasmus

Antwerp, 26 April 1520

Erasmus of Rotterdam to Thomas More, greeting.

I was hoping that my letter<sup>208</sup> might have carried some weight with Brixius. But no: his Antimorus has come out, and is on sale here. For the author's own sake, to whom I am attached because of his friendly attitude toward both the humanities and myself, as expressed in what he has written, I wish either that the book might have been kept dark forever, or at least that Brixius might have copied the modest and courteous tone of your epigrams. Yet I could have wished even those had never been published, rather than that this passionate dispute should have arisen between you, from which the cause of the humanities must suffer; for I do not see how they can hold their ground unless they are defended against these obstinate and well-organized barbarians by a band of armed scholars standing shoulder to shoulder.<sup>209</sup> But since what's done can't be undone, my fervent wish, now that this rogue plant has sprung up in an evil hour, is that we may take steps to deal with it, so that if it cannot be pulled out by the roots, at least it may not spread. And this I wish, my dear More, not only for Brixius's sake, to whom I am much attached, but for yours, to whom my attachment is much deeper. Not that I think there is any risk that his Antimorus will do any harm to your reputation—I wish it might not have done more harm to his own—but because I am seriously afraid that if you answer and give him tit for tat, the result will be that what they all now think of him they will think in future of you both.

I know how hard it is, when one is answering a book like this which is all prickles, not to be offensive oneself; and yet if you of all people<sup>210</sup> err in that direction, no one who knows you will think it as easy to excuse you as Brixius. To say nothing for the moment of you both as scholars, the position you hold and your standing and your knowledge of the world mean that you must rise above squabbles of this kind, which are as petty as they are spiteful, and not take pains to recompense one insult with another. I hear every day what educated men are saying of Brixius since he published his book; I do not enjoy hearing these things said of him, and much less would I wish to hear them said of you. And so, though I feel the difficulty, when one has been attacked in such a venomous pamphlet, of moderating one's reply so as to give one's passions no play, yet I think the best course would certainly be to neglect and despise the whole affair as it deserves.

Nor would I give you this advice, my excellent More, if there were anything in the Antimorus which could have cast any aspersion on you such that it might be worth while trying to wipe it off.

208 EE 620, which Brixius claimed did not reach him until his Antimorus was already being printed. See EE 1045: 25–29.

209 shoulder to shoulder: See Juvenal 2.46.

210 See EE 999: 254–56.

It is all the kind of thing to which the reader can see the answer for himself as he goes along. Everyone can see that what Brixius objects to is your having so rashly and hastily published your epigrams, though most of them were written over twenty years ago and almost all of them over ten, and even now it was not you who published them. They can see that he is carping at you for mistakes some of which are the copyist's and some the printer's, and most of them such that they cannot be complained of without condemning the greatest writer. They see that your epigram on the Chordigera was written long ago in the middle of the war, and that Brixius had no reason to revive a wartime dispute now after so many years when peace has been signed and sealed. They see Brixius poking fun at your epitaph on Abingdon, and with unmistakable ill will concealing what cannot be concealed, that the absurdity of that poem was intentional. Apart from that, the passage where he attacks your poem congratulating the prince on his accession leaves every educated man so aware of Brixius's lack of moderation in both feeling and expression that I, who am, as you know, not too bad as a defender of my friends, can find no way of excusing him except that he wrote in complete ignorance of English affairs; had he understood them, he would not have written that, and would have admitted, angry as he was, that you had paid a splendid tribute to the King in really kingly language.

Everybody thinks this, my dear More, and says so: what reason can remain for you to torment yourself into writing a reply, which is only, as they say, to tell a twice-told tale,<sup>211</sup> and nothing to be got from it except that while no one at the moment is suffering from loss of reputation in the eyes of educated men except Brixius, you run the risk of getting some share of that for yourself, if it should happen (and it is not easy to avoid, if one loses one's temper pen in hand, as sometimes happens) that you write without mercy and repay abuse in the same coin. Not the least part of your enviable reputation is your equable temperament and the unruffled charm of your character, and I should be sorry to see any sacrifice of this. But if you have made up your mind to take a different course (and I hear you have a book against him already in preparation), do be content to defend yourself. Reject the charge that you were offensive and began it all by your spite without casting it back at your opponent; fight with reasons and not abuse, and your moderation will magnify his ill will. All the same, even granted that you took that line, I would certainly much prefer you to keep silent and let the whole thing be buried in oblivion. This may be difficult just now, but it will gradually become possible if, as I hope, it is what you wish.

I had written to Brixius telling him to suppress the Antimorus,<sup>212</sup> which I kept hearing at the time that he was planning, and had the courier shown any diligence, I might have succeeded, if Brixius's letter<sup>213</sup> speaks the truth. But, as you can see from his answer, the book was already in the press before he saw my letter. But of you, my dear More, I have far higher hopes than of Brixius; for when I see that I should have persuaded him if my letter had reached him in time, I ought to have no doubt that I shall easily win you over to control your emotions for my sake to the extent of not assailing yet further with fresh pamphlets a man who likes me and whom I like in return. One or the other of you must make the first move to end this controversy, unless you want the contest to go on forever turn and turn about. Your standing and your character demand that the initiative should come from you. Believe me, my dear More, though Brixius has behaved in all this in such a way that even he perhaps is sorry for it by now, and if he could start again he would not do it (no one is so fortunate as to be wise all the time), yet he is a man, if you knew him better, whose character and whose wide reading would delight you, nor would you easily find anyone whom you would be more ready to make friends with. Nor ought you to demand that everyone should keep his emotions under such strict control as we have learnt in view of your record and our long experience of your wisdom to expect without hesitation from you. Brixius had written some things in his Chordigera which gave you, as the injured party, the right to reply even more bitterly, especially as things then were; yet once your epigrams, the charm of which made them universally popular, had made him a public laughing-stock, you ought not to be surprised if, as a spirited young man with a thirst for fame, he was diverted by some degree of resentment from thinking over what he had done and concentrated on your verses, thinking himself the injured party and not realizing that he had neither the right nor the ideal opportunity to seek revenge.

I know you do not set such a high value on the few epigrams you threw off against him that you could not bear for my sake to suppress them; for unless your instructions had come too late, you were arranging to do this of your own accord some time ago, when you heard to your regret that the book was going to be published entire. I shall therefore secure that with your good will they are omitted in future<sup>214</sup> when the book is reprinted, and in return that the Antimorus is given no circulation. Thus it will come about that for want of fuel this fire will gradually die down. If however you have so obstinately resolved to pursue this quarrel, yet in the name of our friendship, which is neither recent nor of any common kind, I beg you again and again to consider very carefully how you propose to treat the business. For my part, if I had the choice, I should prefer, I repeat, for you to say nothing and to despise a topic that really deserves to be despised. If this cannot be, I should hope for the next best thing, that you should do as you have managed to do up to now and continue to show yourself the victor by your scholarship and the goodness of your case, and not by abuse as well. In that way, as I see that one of my two friends has been wounded in this ill-judged engagement, I shall at least be able to preserve the other permanently intact, who is so dear to me that I prefer him alone to all my other friends; though I should be more blest if I might preserve both. For as man can have nothing more precious than a good and faithful friend, it is reasonable to reckon no loss so heavy as the loss of friendship.

I have written this in the midst of the confusion<sup>215</sup> in which you know I live just now. Farewell, most warm-hearted friend.

Antwerp, 26 April 1520.

91. To Erasmus

<Greenwich?, Early May> 1520

Thomas More to Erasmus, that excellent and learned man, greeting.

Brixius's Antimorus, dear Erasmus, had been in London for a long time before your letter reached me. I was wondering a little what you had so much at heart that made you so slow in writing about it, unless either the Antimorus reached your part of the world rather later, maybe, or you were somewhat slow because, until you heard that I was preparing a pamphlet in answer, you supposed I should despise the book of my own accord, as likely to damage its author more than me and clearly unworthy of a reply. And so I should certainly have done, dear Erasmus, had not certain friends, very good scholars and very wise men too, persuaded me otherwise. They thought Brixius an object for mockery rather than resentment, but they had nothing like the affection for him that I see you have.

It is nearly two years ago now that I heard he was getting something of this kind under way and had the idea of writing to him myself, in the most friendly possible terms, and at the same time of giving him some advice which would have been somewhat more in his own interests than his present intemperate behavior. In the meantime, however, I understood from most reliable news from Paris that the man was so much carried away by his feelings that no persuasion from his friends could restrain him, and even advice from Bérault and Lascaris and Budé—men of the highest standing!—could not make him change his mind, while the authority of a great man like Deloynes or of his Eminence the Cardinal,<sup>216</sup> who has lately died over there, had no effect at all, so fast was he wasting away with a passion for revenge and pitifully consumed like Narcissus with some sort of love of his own verses; though fresh ones were born every day, and he used to carry them round like a new-born babe out of its cradle and dandle them at dinner with Deloynes or the cardinal. Nor was he always quite so happy when he took them home again, hearing sometimes from good scholars and men of judgment criticisms which, had he had any sense, he would have made himself. Much of this I have been told in letters from those parts, but in particular a certain John, a Greek by birth but as learned in Latin as he is in his native tongue, a man of high character and reliable beyond any doubt, told me much by word of mouth; and when I realized from this that Brixius was too much carried away to admit of any overtures, I changed my mind and abandoned my wish to write.

At the same time, “He is letting himself go,” I thought, “to the extent of being reluctant to keep quite silent, but he is spending so much effort and so much time on this that it is not unlikely, with the distance and the delay, that the first resentment and a sort of quick reaction that affects us when things happen suddenly are calming down, and he will enjoy himself in wit and humor.” Wrangling and abuse and calumny I thought he would entirely refrain from, for fear that his attacks would rightly be considered ill timed, if he assaulted a man more savagely in peacetime than he had himself been assaulted in time of war. And then I had read his Chordigera seven years before; though it abounded in faults of invention and arrangement and language yet it did offer a sample of his natural gifts, which I thought would ripen someday with the years (and I saw that the years had passed), and therefore I was in hopes that he would publish something scholarly and well finished, which would give pleasure even to me, at whom the publication was aimed. For I am not as a rule much offended if humor is allowed a certain license.

But when Brixius’s famous bantling, the Antimorus, appeared, madder than Morychus,<sup>217</sup> more venomous than any poison, and more illiterate even than the Chordigera, I could do nothing but laugh, which was reasonable enough, murmuring to myself the old saw, “Seeking gold I found live coals.”<sup>218</sup> And indeed, just as the glowing coals of Etna burnt up Empedocles,<sup>219</sup> so did those coals singe Brixius in a similar search for glory, and made him as black as any cinder. And so I had decided to issue no reply at all; but other people whose opinion on my affairs I trusted more than my own took a different view. They admitted that no educated man existed who would not feel sick at the sight of such dull, poisonous, mad stuff; but they gave it as their opinion that his calumnies, absurd and foolish as they were, and besides that, by no means obscure if one attends to the fore and aft of the whole business, would yet not be lucid enough for many people, who might perhaps read his Antimorus when they might have no access to the Chordigera or to my epigrams. They persuaded me therefore to put all this together into a single book<sup>220</sup> and set it all before the reader, and then to write something to throw some light on the story, that the reader might need nothing more but his own critical faculty.

You can see, dearest Erasmus, what drove me to a reply. And so I do not feel it necessary to answer your arguments; for unless other people had pushed me in a different direction I should have agreed with you myself all the time. But I see Brixius has persuaded you that it was only through the courier’s negligence that you did not succeed in getting him to suppress his Antimorus entirely. It greatly surprises me, dear Erasmus, that you should accept this as though you found it proven. “Why should I not believe it,” say you, “when he puts Bérault or Budé in the box,<sup>221</sup> both witnesses of the highest probity?” I agree, Erasmus, he produces men of such integrity that either by himself might convince one of anything. “Then why,” you ask, “should what Brixius says not win the day?” For this one reason, my dear friend: he produces two witnesses, but both give hearsay evidence and neither is an eyewitness; and “one witness with eyes in his head is worth ten who have but ears.”<sup>222</sup> What other evidence can Bérault or Budé possibly give except that on such and such a day they heard from Brixius himself that the Antimorus was in the press? That is what Brixius means when he says that he told them of the publication of the Antimorus some days before he had read your letter. So you will believe Bérault and Budé; but whom will they believe meanwhile? Surely Brixius himself?

Do you see now, dear Erasmus, how that specious bit of evidence, “Whom saw I brought you yesterday at nightfall?”<sup>223</sup> issued eventually in bundling up Canthara? Not to mention in the meantime that he can never produce any witnesses to prove that he had not read your letter before he saw it in print, when he might have received it and concealed the fact, so that he could use this argument to you afterwards without let or hindrance. Besides which, his Antimorus consists of not more than eight quires, which normally take as many days to print, and we cannot infer from Brixius's words that it was half finished when he read your letter; so he compresses into very narrow limits the "some days" in which he says he told Bérault and Budé that the book was being published. "But why," you ask, "should Brixius invent such a thing?" Does it seem to you so surprising if a man of poetic turn invents something to please himself? Though there was also a reason why he should invent. Each of them had often told him not to publish such a foolish book, as full of abuse as any fishwife, and he wanted perhaps to test whether they would receive it, once he had done it, in the same spirit in which they had so often told him not to do it. It sometimes happens that we object strongly to the doing of something as long as the question is open; but when it reaches the point of being too late to put it right, we acquiesce, and gloss over with words what had gone wrong as far as we can.

<sup>217</sup> More uses a hyperbolic play on words: madder even than the madman (who, he thinks, I am). <sup>218</sup> See Adages 830 (CWE 32: 199). <sup>219</sup> According to a classical legend, the philosopher from Agrigentum (5th century BC) had jumped into the crater, hoping his disappearance would be taken for an apotheosis. <sup>220</sup> a single book: Initially More considered reprinting the preceding controversial exchanges together with his Epistola ad Germanum Brixium. Erasmus’s remarks in EE 1117: 43–48, 120–23 suggest that the first part of the project was subsequently abandoned.

<sup>221</sup> Bérault and Budé in the box: See EE 1045: 27–31. <sup>222</sup> See Adages 1554 (CWE 33: 319–20). <sup>223</sup> Terence, Andria 768–70. Canthara was seen entering the house “with something bundled up under her dress” that turned out to be a baby. Brixius resembles her in his endeavor to conceal the true facts.

But I, my dear Erasmus, want you to see in truth how much more truly your friend More is ready to do as you tell him than Brixius is; and so although, when your letter arrived, my book was not actually at press but was entirely printed off (and this I could establish not by a couple of hearsay witnesses who have learnt of it from me, but more than ten with eyes in their heads who have really seen it—in fact on the evidence, I suppose, of your own eyes, for I do not doubt that the book has reached you before this letter), and although the advice of so many friends urged me to publish it, yet when I had had this letter from you, the one man whose opinion weighs more with me than all the votes of everyone else, I did not follow Brixius's example. Though his purse (so he writes) is always heavy with coin,<sup>224</sup> Brixius sets such a high value on your instructions, whose lightest word he obeys (or so he tells us), that he could not face the trifling expense of buying up all those books of his and throwing them on the fire once and for all, so as to conceal from every eye that great nonsense of his by which the great name of Brixius, which the poor dear man so much thirsts to immortalize, will be discredited. Not so I, dear Erasmus: apart from these two, one of which I had already sent to you and the other to Peter Giles, and five more which the printer<sup>225</sup> had sold (for it was just when they were put on sale and had begun to be in great demand that your letter intervened), I bought up the whole lot and keep them shut up, so that before any fresh steps are taken on my side, we may be able—or rather you may be able after taking counsel with yourself—to decide what you wish me to do.

And so, dear Erasmus, it is now your turn: let me urge you to look closely at your decision, for this is the case of a friend who is determined, whatever you decide, to do as he is told. You recommend that any attack of mine on Brixius should be omitted when my Epigrammata are fortunate enough to be reprinted, and that on the other side Brixius's Antimorus should be given no further circulation; but for my part, dear Erasmus, I think I have many reasons, so far as Brixius is concerned, for concluding that he is too tender-hearted toward his own verses to endure to be weaned away from a pursuit by which he expects, so far as it can be in his power, to endow his beloved offspring with immortality. My own Epigrammata never gave me much satisfaction, as you yourself, Erasmus, can testify; and unless that book had had an appeal for you and certain other people greater than the charm it had for me, perhaps it would not exist anywhere today. As it is, see how things are turned inside out! Suppose you and I had made a compact that you should be authorized to condemn such of my epigrams as you might please, provided you had no power over some few that I might choose to exempt: why, the only lines against which you unsheathe your knife under our agreement would be the only ones I should protect by exemption. Such is the charm they begin to have for me, now that I see many men moved to like them by Brixius's bitter and foolish poetizing. Not that I mean by this to stop you from doing what you please with my verses, who can do what you please even with me.

Now when you say that Brixius is a person whom I should find on closer acquaintance to be the sort of man who more than anyone deserves to be my friend, for my part, dear Erasmus, I do not give myself such airs as to think anyone's position too humble to make friends with him, provided he is not the sort of rascal for whom no one ought to feel any affection; and so I readily agree that Brixius is not unworthy to deserve the friendship of greater

<sup>224</sup> EE 1045: 123–24    <sup>225</sup> Richard Pynson (d. 1530) was a Norman by birth who began printing in London by 1490 and

was appointed printer to the King in 1508. In this capacity he printed Henry VIII's

Assertio of the seven sacraments against Luther.

men than I. He does certainly seem to have rather more — I will not call it pride, but a sort of nobility of spirit and grandeur of attitude — than could ever make him in any way suited to a person of humble and modest gifts like myself, unless I were willing to be as unsuitably coupled in friendship as ill-matched oxen drawing the plough awry.<sup>226</sup> And yet, my dear Erasmus, if this is what you advise, I would not reject his friendship, for I can easily adapt myself even to doing as I am told by better men than myself. At least, so far as his scholarship is concerned, I believe him to be keen to learn and not wholly stupid, and also a man who will one day be made different by experience. All the same, in what he has published hitherto, to tell the truth — and this I could demonstrate — he is not free from bad mistakes and has not kept the rules of meter, and in invention he often sinks further than would be acceptable in a child. And yet, with all his faults, I do not think so well of myself as to suppose that I am comparable to him in erudition, though you, my dear Erasmus, either blinded by affection or (which I think nearer the truth) with a sort of courtesy toward me, set me above him. To speak frankly, so far am I from hating him that, my judgment having now been purged, I can even love him in the cause of literature.

But in the case before us, pray consider rather carefully what you wish to be done before you issue your orders. It comes to this: if I do not reply, many people will think that I provided the reason for this most tedious dispute, and without provocation of any kind attacked him with insults, curses, imprecations; and this would have been no less brutal than I have now shown it to be false, if you will let my book come out. As regards the book, your second precept is that if I am absolutely determined to publish it I must take care that (as you say I have done hitherto) I may be seen to defeat Brixius solely by being a better scholar with a better case, and not by abusing him as well. But, my dear Erasmus, while as far as scholarship goes I am content to be level with Brixius, I have no doubt that my case is far stronger than his, however much Brixius may assert that his is valid and demonstrable and sure to win; that is the opening gambit prescribed by the rules in the defense of a guilty party. In abuse I shall gladly let myself be beaten, for I am determined never to fight with that sort of weapon. Yet it can easily happen that something which seems to me, as the victim, to have no bitterness in it, might be judged by a man who sees things rather differently to be somewhat offensive. Should this by some chance ever happen, I shall not be so afraid of my readers' sense of justice as to think they will not, even in my case, dear Erasmus, however serious the character your affection disguises me with, making out everything in me to be larger than life, the fact remains that while I still converse with mortal men and am not yet entirely deified, if I may be flippant on this not wholly serious subject, I am not afraid, I repeat, that my humane and human reader will not make some allowances in me too for those human feelings which no human being has entirely thrown off. Farewell, dearest Erasmus.

When we reach Calais, for which the King is preparing to leave shortly, I hope we shall be able to discuss these things more fully face to face. For I fully expect to see you at this meeting of the Kings, and Brixius too; for the Queen<sup>227</sup> of France will be there, and Brixius being her secretary cannot fail, I suppose, to attend. So, as far as I am concerned, you will easily settle things as you think best. For though without any reason he has behaved toward me in such a way as shows that he would have ruined me had he had the power, nonetheless, since I value you, my dear Erasmus, as more than half of myself, I shall be more influenced as regards Brixius by his being your friend than my enemy. Farewell once more. 1520.

93. To Erasmus

Canterbury, 26 May <1520>

Thomas More to Erasmus, greeting.

The young man whose case you recommended to me I had already discussed with his father before you wrote. The boy himself had asked me in a letter some time ago, being convinced that my opinion would have some weight and influence with him. I did all I could; whether I did any good, I am not sure. His father gave me a not entirely inflexible reply; and yet (for I know the man has an eye to the

<sup>226</sup> ill-matched... awry: Ovid, Heroides 9.29 <sup>227</sup> Claude de France (1499–1524) was the daughter of Louis XII and Anne of Brittany. In May 1514 she married the future Francis I. Brixius had been her mother's secretary. It is not known whether he attended the Calais meeting.

main chance) I think his reply was as forthcoming as it was more from a certain reluctance to oppose me than because he said what he really thought. What it came to was that he would follow my advice about his son; but at the same time he made it clear that he would rather see him rich in coin than in culture. But the boy himself, I can see, is resolved to abandon not only his paternal inheritance but his father too, rather than let himself be torn away from liberal studies; clearly, with a mind like that, he deserves the support of everyone and all the help they can give him.

The schoolmaster<sup>228</sup> from Louvain I have found a place for, such that I do not doubt he will be permanently grateful to you. His master is much pleased with his scholarship; and when he heard that it was you who had recommended him, it was his idea to ask me to let him have the young man, and I complied without hesitation, as that was just what on other grounds I had decided to propose. For in my own household there was no place for any more servants.

In those first days, while he was staying with me, he showed me some things by Luis Vives<sup>229</sup> which were as stylish and as scholarly as anything I have seen for a long time. How few people one can find (indeed one can hardly find one anywhere) who at such a tender age (for you tell me in a letter that he is still quite young) have absorbed such encyclopedic learning! I am positively ashamed, my dear Erasmus, of myself and others like me, who make the best of ourselves with two or three slim volumes and those generally not much good, when I see Vives so young and the author of so much that is penetrating and very well written and shows such abstruse reading. It is a great thing to be good in either of the ancient tongues; but he shows himself a past master of both. It is still greater and more fruitful to be well versed in important subjects; but who can show himself to be equipped in more fields and more important fields than Vives single-handed? But much the greatest thing of all is to have imbibed the humanities so well as a learner that you can in turn pass them on to others as a teacher; and who teaches more lucidly, more attractively, more effectively than he? I cannot sufficiently admire the qualities in his Declamationes which you detected with such insight and expressed so eloquently; but most important of all (for in oratory it is the most important thing), he can not only hold the history of those times in a memory more ready than the memory anyone has of his own experience, but he can invest the stories of men who died so many centuries ago with such lively feeling that he seems not to have got what he is presenting out of books, but to have seen it and felt it and been engaged in events as they happened for better or worse; and he can judge their policies not tepidly, on the basis of an account by someone else, but with fire in the light of his own fears and hopes, his perils and successes. If he were as good as this on one side only, he would still deserve our admiration; but as it is, he shows himself such a master on both that you might think him a chameleon, which changes color as its background changes.

How I wish, my dear Erasmus, that certain people who are now too ambitious and hope to be thought good writers would wake up and reorient themselves by the example of your friend Vives!—and I hope it more because they despise everything else than because they either pursue eloquence or properly attain it; for even in their dreams they never conceive any idea of what style is. These men neglect the other arts, and from what subject do they expect to derive their title to distinction? Orator or advocate are not names anyone will rightly confer on a man who neither pleads causes in real life nor declaims on imaginary themes. He will be a very thin and bloodless poet, whose verses are shaped by no philosophical principles, no precepts of the art of rhetoric, no practice in the conduct of discourse. Vives, after distinguishing himself in rhetoric beyond almost all the men who profess nothing else, goes on to leave untouched none of all the other arts which are worth knowing; there is none in which he is not so well versed that you would think he had spent his life on nothing else.

And so, though there is nothing of his that is not universally popular, I take a special kind of pleasure in his In pseudodialecticos, not only (though this is certainly one reason) because he makes such elegant fun of their absurd quibbling arguments, opposes them with powerful reasoning, digs them up by the roots, and overturns them with inescapable logic, but also since I see him treat some themes in that book on almost the same lines as I had thought of for myself when I had not yet read anything by Vives. I approve of them now in Vives's book not because as my own arguments they had appealed to me before (for we often approve something that we see put forward by other people, if we had already thought of it for ourselves); but it is good for my self-esteem, when I had previously suspected that some point was not receiving the expression it deserves and am now confirmed in my belief that it is by no means foolish, by seeing that Vives too accepts it. And then it attracts me and gives me satisfaction, when I see that the same argument has taken possession of the minds and thoughts of both of us and has been treated by us in such a way that, though he is fuller and writes better, yet in some things we produce not only the same matter but almost the same words. And so I readily flatter myself that something in the way of a kindred star joins our minds with some sort of secret power and sympathy.

I am glad to think that he has such a good position with his eminent master the cardinal.<sup>230</sup> I hope the favor of that deity may set right the injustice of Fortune, who always gives the worst treatment to those who deserve the best and, as though she had a grudge against learning and virtue, often lavishes her favors on the exaltation of ignorant and vicious men. But the Cardinal, for whom it is almost as easy to make any man prosperous as it is for Fortune herself, is sure to show special generosity to such a man, whom he has made a member of his inner circle, and to whom he owes so much of the distinguished learning for which he is now not a little more illustrious than even for his exalted station; such is his well-known goodness, such the credit he will gain with posterity by so doing.

Farewell, dearest Erasmus; I hope we shall soon greet each other face to face in Calais at this meeting of the monarchs. The Emperor lands today. Tomorrow morning early the King will go to meet him, perhaps even this same night which now approaches. You would hardly believe the joy with which not only the King and the nobles but the people too received the news which made it clear that the Emperor is due here. Farewell once more, from Canterbury on Whitsun eve.

There is one point, my dear Erasmus, which I would mention to Vives if I knew him personally. As it is, since I am not certain how he would take such uncalled-for kindness from a stranger, you can tell him at a suitable opportunity. There are in his Aedes legum and also in his Somnium (which in other respects far surpasses what many other people have spent sleepless nights on) some things which are too abstruse to be clear to any except specialists, though it would be for the good of the literary world that everything of his should be as widely understood as possible. It would be easy enough to remedy this, either by adding an explanation or by putting very brief notes in the margin. It will also throw much light on his Declamationes, if he will briefly summarize the story even on a single page at the beginning.

Farewell once more.

96. To William Budé

<Calais, ca. June 1520>

If it were not for the vehemence of my desires, I would not dare to ask you to lessen the pain of your absence by writing to me. For I fear that engaged as you are in the affairs of the Most Christian King, you will not enjoy much leisure, and for my part I am only too conscious of my remissness in this kind of duty, when letters ought to be answered. It is not only my lack of eloquence, my dear Budé, that keeps me from writing to you, but still more my respect for your learning. Shame would even have forbidden me to write this letter, unless another kind of shame had wrung it from me. This is the fear lest the letters that you have received from me should be published along with yours. If they should go forth to the world alone, their defects would be abundantly clear, but if they were side by side with yours their shameful poverty would be exposed as by a light of fierce and unpitiful brilliance. For I remember that in our conversation mention was made of the letters that I had formerly sent you, which you had it in your mind to publish if you thought I would raise no objection. It was only a passing suggestion, and I forget what reply I gave. But now, as I think the matter over, I see that it would be safer if you would wait a while, at least until I revise my letters. It is not only that I fear there may be passages where the Latin is faulty, but also in my remarks upon peace and war, upon morality, marriage, the clergy, the people, etc., perhaps what I have written has not always been so cautious and guarded that it would be wise to expose it to captious critics.

97. To William Budé

5 <Calais, ca. June 1520>

I doubt, my dear Budé, whether it is good ever to possess things which are pleasing and dear unless you can keep them. For I thought I would be completely happy if I had the good fortune ever to see 10 Budé face to face (of whom reading had drawn me a very beautiful image), and after I got my wish I thought I was happier than happiness itself. But when our duties prevented our meeting often enough to satisfy my longing for conversation with 15 you, and within a few days (as our kings were called away by affairs of state) our association only just begun was at once broken off; and we (who had each to follow his own prince) were drawn in opposite directions, perhaps never to see each other again;
20 the happier our meeting had been, the greater was the sadness which assailed me at our parting. This you can somewhat lighten if you will deign sometimes to visit me by letter, which, however, but that eager longing urges me, I would not dare ask.

25 101. To His School

At Court, 23 March <1521>

Thomas More to his whole school, greeting.

See what a compendious salutation I have found, to save both time and paper, which would otherwise have been wasted in listing the names of each one of you in salutation, and my labor would have been to no purpose, since, though each of you is dear to me by some special title, of which I could have omitted none in an ingratiating salutation, no 35 one is dearer to me by any title than each of you by that of scholar. Your zeal for knowledge binds me to you almost more closely than the ties of blood. I rejoice that Master Drew<sup>231</sup> has returned safe, for

I was anxious, as you know, about him. If I did not love you so much I should be really envious of your 40 happiness in having so many and such excellent tutors. But I think you have no longer any need of Master Nicholas,<sup>232</sup> since you have learned whatever he had to teach you about astronomy. I hear you are so far advanced in that science that you can not 45 only point out the polar star or the dog star, or any of the ordinary stars, but are able also — which requires the skill of an absolute Astronomer — among the special and principal heavenly bodies, to distinguish the sun from the moon! Onward then in that
50 new and admirable science by which you ascend to the stars! But while you gaze on them assiduously, consider that this holy time of Lent warns you, and that beautiful and holy poem of Boethius<sup>233</sup> keeps singing in your ears, teaching you to raise your mind
55 also to heaven, lest the soul look downwards to the earth, after the manner of brutes, while the body is raised aloft. Farewell, all my dearest. From Court, the 23rd March.

103a. Henry VIII to the Treasurer and Chamberlains of the Exchequer and to More
60 Windsor, 23 July <1521>

By the King Henry, by the grace of God king of England and of France and lord of Ireland, to the treasurer and chamberlains of our Exchequer and to our 65 trusty and right well-beloved counselor Sir Thomas More, Knight, our undertreasurer, greeting.

We will and command you that for the time ye shall occupy ye do pay and content<sup>234</sup> for costs and expenses which shall behoove<sup>235</sup> us to have and sustain about our household and our great wardrobe
70 out of our treasure<sup>236</sup> and make there assignations to our household and clerk of our great wardrobe according to the act or acts of Parliament, letters, patents,<sup>237</sup> tails,<sup>238</sup> or bills assigned thereof had or made.
75 And that ye also of our said treasure content and pay the fees and rewards of our treasurer, chamberlains, undertreasurer, barons, and chancellor of our Eschequer and to all other officers and ministers of

<sup>231</sup> Drew is not mentioned in the lists of young tutors given by Roper, Cresacre More, or Erasmus. Perhaps he is the Roger Drew (Drewe or Drewys), B.A. Oxford, 1512, M.A. 1514, Fellow of All Souls from

1512. <sup>232</sup> Nicholas Kratzer (1486/7–August 3, 1550) of Munich B.A. Cologne 1509, and also of Wittenberg, went to England late in 1517, became Astronomer to the King in 1519, and held the office for many years. <sup>233</sup> Boethius 5. Metrum 5 <sup>234</sup> satisfy by full payment; compensate <sup>235</sup> be necessary for <sup>236</sup> treasury <sup>237</sup> documents conferring privileges or rights <sup>238</sup> taxes, dues any of our courts, having fees and rewards accustomed.<sup>239</sup> And also all such wages and fees as is accustomed there to be paid to our servants. And also that ye do pay for parchment, paper, ink, wax, bags, canvas, and all other things necessary and behooveful<sup>240</sup> in our said courts as it hath been used and accustomed. And these over<sup>241</sup> letters shall be your sufficient warrant and discharge in this behalf.

Even under our privy seal at our Castle of Windsor, the twenty-third day of July, the thirteenth year of our reign.

103b. Henry VIII to the Treasurer and Chamberlains of the Exchequer

Windsor, 23 July <1521>

By the King Henry, by the grace of God king of England and of France and lord of Ireland, to the treasurers and chamberlains of our Exchequer that now be and for the time shall be, greeting.

Where before this time we have appointed and commanded as well diverse lords spiritual and temporal,<sup>242</sup> as<sup>243</sup> other nobles of our Council, to sit and give their attendance for the hearing, determining, and discussing of many diverse and urgent causes and matters concerning as well the common weal and politic<sup>244</sup> rule and order of this our realm and our subjects of the same, as also our own particular matters and causes by virtue whereof the said lords and nobles of our said Council, from the twentieth day of April, the twelfth year of our reign ending and the thirteenth year beginning and long before, hitherto truly have given and yet do give their attendance with their true diligence for the intent abovesaid. And we in consideration of the premises,<sup>245</sup> the said day and year commanded by our own mouth our trusty and well-beloved counselor Thomas More, now knight and our undertreasurer, to pay and content<sup>246</sup> all manner<sup>247</sup> charges and costs requisited for the diets<sup>248</sup> of our said Council giving their attendance for the causes abovesaid as well at our palace of Westminster and other places, from the said day and year hitherto and from henceforth unto such time as he shall have from us otherwise in commandment by our mouth, according whereunto

the said Thomas More from the said day and year hitherto hath issued and paid diverse sums of money for the diets aforesaid, as we certainly know, for the repayment whereof and also of such sums of money as the said Thomas More by our said commandment hereafter shall pay for the cause abovesaid; the said Thomas hath had of us no sufficient warrant, as we certainly know, we willing him to be truly contented and paid as right would.

Therefore will<sup>249</sup> and charge you that of such our treasure as hath come, is come, and that hereafter shall come to your hands as well of our subsidies,<sup>250</sup> quindeseinez,<sup>251</sup> and dismes<sup>252</sup> to us heretofore granted and hereafter to be granted, as also of all other our revenues, whatsoever they be, and shall be paid at our receipt aforesaid, ye content and pay to the said Thomas More such and as much money as<sup>253</sup> upon the books of parcels signed with the hands of the most reverend father in God Thomas Cardinal and Archbishop of York. And other<sup>254</sup> our said Council shall be found due to the said Thomas More unpaid as also from henceforth upon the showing and delivery of every like book of parcels signet as is abovesaid. From time to time ye and our said treasurer content and pay unto the said Thomas More all manner of sums of money as by any like book or books of parcels shall appear to be due to the said Thomas More unpaid upon the delivery of any such book of parcels signed, as abovesaid, unto such time as ye from henceforth shall have from us otherwise a commandment. And that ye from time to time receive of the said Thomas More all and singular such books and book of the expenses of the said diets and other necessaries incident<sup>255</sup> to the same. And the same book and books ye do accept from time to time for a true account and reckoning of the full employment of and every of the said sums of money. And we will that the said books signed as is aforesaid with these our letters be sufficient warrant and discharge as well unto you for the payment of every and singular of the said sums of money as to the said Thomas More for the employment of the same without any other account thereof to us in any wise<sup>256</sup> to be given and without prest<sup>257</sup> or any other charge to be set upon the said Thomas More for the same or by occasion

239 customary 240 useful; needful, due 241 subsequent 242 of the clergy and laymen 243 as well as 244 prudent 245 aforementioned matters 246 satisfy

by full payment; compensate 247 kind of 248 sustenance; allowance 249 we will 250 financial contributions made or levied to provide assistance, esp. to a lord or sovereign; subsidies 251 fifteenths 252 tenths; tithes 253 as is 254 other matters or expenses relating to 255 related 256 way 257 charge; duty, tax of any the premises. And these our letters shall be your sufficient warrant and discharge in this behalf.

Given under our privy seal at our Castle of Windsor the twenty-third day of July, the thirteenth year of our reign.

105. To Bishop John Fisher

<1521>

As to this priest, Reverend Father, of whom you write that he will soon obtain a prebend if he can obtain a vigorous advocate with the King's majesty, I think I have so wrought that our Prince will raise no obstacle. . . .

Whatever influence I have with the King (it is certainly very little) but such as it is, is as freely available to your Paternity and all your scholars as his own house to any man. I owe your students constant gratitude for the heartfelt affection of which their letters to me are the token. Farewell, best and most learned of bishops, and continue your affection for me.

106. To Margaret Roper

<1521?>

Thomas More to his most dear daughter Margaret.

There was no reason, my darling daughter, why you should have put off writing me for a single day, because in your great self-distrust you feared that your letters would be such that I could not read them without distaste. Even had they not been perfect, yet the honor of your sex would have gained you pardon from anyone, while to a father even a blemish will seem beautiful in the face of a child. But indeed, my dear Margaret, your letters were so elegant and polished and gave so little cause for you to dread the indulgent judgment of a parent, that you might have despised the censorship of an angry Momus.

You tell me that Nicholas, who is fond of us and so learned in astronomy, has begun again with you the system of the heavenly bodies. I am grateful to him, and I congratulate you on your good fortune; for in the space of one month, with only slight labor, you will thus learn thoroughly these sublime wonders of the Eternal Workman, which so many men of illustrious and almost superhuman intellect have discovered only with hot toil and study, or rather with cold shiverings and nightly vigils in the open air in the course of many ages.

I am, therefore, delighted to read that you have made up your mind to give yourself so diligently to philosophy as to make up by your earnestness in future what you have lost in the past by neglect. My darling Margaret, I indeed have never found you idling—and your unusual learning in almost every kind of literature shows that you have been making active progress—so I take your words as an example of the great modesty that makes you prefer to accuse yourself falsely of sloth rather than to boast truly of your diligence; unless your meaning is that you will give yourself so earnestly to study that your past industry will seem like indolence by comparison. If this is your meaning, my Margaret, and I think it really is, nothing could be more delightful to me, or more fortunate, my sweetest daughter, for you.

Though I earnestly hope that you will devote the rest of your life to medical science and sacred literature, so that you may be well furnished for the whole scope of human life, (which is to have a sound mind in a sound body), and I know that you have already laid the foundations of these studies, and there will be always opportunity to continue the building; yet I am of opinion that you may with great advantage give some years of your yet flourishing youth to humane letters and so-called liberal studies. And this both because youth is more fitted for a struggle with difficulties and because it is uncertain whether you will ever in the future have the benefit of so sedulous, affectionate, and learned a teacher. I need not say that by such studies a good judgment is formed or perfected.

It would be a delight, my dear Margaret, to me to converse long with you on these matters: but I have just been interrupted and called away by the servants, who have brought in supper. I must have regard to others, else to sup is not so sweet as to talk with you.

Farewell, my dearest child, and salute for me my beloved son, your husband. I am extremely glad that he is following the same course of study as yourself. I am ever wont to persuade you to yield in everything to your husband; now, on the contrary, I give you full leave to strive to surpass him in the knowledge of the celestial system. Farewell again. Salute your whole company, but especially your tutor.

106a. To Francis Cranevelt

At Court, 13 February &lt;1521&gt;

Cordial greetings from T. More to his friend
Cranevelt.<sup>258</sup>

5 I who would not bear that you should be silent have myself been silent for a long time now, in order to provide something for you to write about, so that you could take your turn at reproaching me — which you have a perfect right to do, since for such 10 a long time I have not repaid the copious letters I received from you. But right after Easter, unless something unforeseen happens, I will be with you and will repay everything in person with the loquacity which you have so often and so wearily been forced 15 to put up with. In the meantime, farewell, together with your most delightful wife, a lady of the highest prudence and honor.

From the Court, on the 13th day of February.

20 Please give some thought to a house, and perhaps the one that I had before would not be the worst, but the price was the worst. Find out at what price it could be rented for two months from May 1 and thereafter by the week. And also what it would cost 25 to rent eight or ten beds, together with the rest of the suitable furnishings. And at your leisure let me know about these things. You can also discuss the matter with the friend who is the dearest of all my friends, Master Nicholas Bonviso.

30 If the candlesticks have not yet been sent, do not send them but keep them there till I arrive. Give my regards to Laurijn, Fevijn, all and our other friends.

106b. To Francis Cranevelt

London, 9 April &lt;1521&gt;

35 Greetings from T. More to his friend
Frans Cranevelt.

40 I have received two letters from you, my dear Cranevelt. From each of them I have perceived that most honest heart of yours and a certain, almost incredible love for me, to which if I should not respond with equal good will, I would certainly be an ungrateful wretch. As for my mistress your wife, or rather your mistress my wife, since I betrothed myself to her there long since — and seriously she is a woman of the highest dignity, completely adorned 45 with the ornaments of all the feminine virtues — I am delighted that she has been unburdened by giving birth and that your family has been increased by offspring. I owe you an immense debt of gratitude for the great effort you have made in look- 50 ing for a house for me. And then, as for your very friendly offer to me of your own home, I find no thanks adequate to it. There is many a slip, my dear Cranevelt, between the cup and the lip, as they say.

Thus it can happen that I myself will not go as a 55 member of the embassy which will shortly be going there — a journey I could comfortably do without, were it not that I would see you friends of mine, to see whom I would willingly go anywhere.
But in a few days I will know for certain and once 60
I know I will write you on the spot. In the meanwhile I have almost made up my mind to stay in your home immediately after my arrival, not to burden you with my presence very long but in order to enjoy for a while the spontaneous kindness of 65
you and my lady, your wife, until I have an opportunity to consider in person what house I could most conveniently move into. In the meantime, my most delightful Cranevelt, farewell, together with your most charming wife, to whom give my warmest re- 70 gards. London, in haste, April 9. Give my regards to Master Laurijn, Fevijn.

106c. To Francis Cranevelt

&lt;London, September 1521&gt;

See, my dear Cranevelt [of the leaves there are no 75 more but] indeed a decent scrap of paper is left.
Even now I am mounting my horse. I am returning your book. Together with it you will receive a bundle of letters which Erasmus sent me to read.
He neither wants them published nor is there any 80 need or usefulness in doing so, unless his adversary continues his insane antics in some way or other.
For which eventuality I deposit them with you for safekeeping, just as Erasmus himself told me to do.
Share them with Master Laurijn, if he wants to read 85 any of them. Give my regards to that most excellent

<sup>258</sup> Francis Cranevelt (1485–1564) was a legal counselor, and in 1522 he was a member of the Grand Council of Mechelen. Erasmus introduced Cranevelt to More in 1520.

lady, your wife. For her and you and your delightful children I pray for lasting health and happiness. I am now being called to my horse. Once more, farewell.

5 Completely at your service, T. M.

106d. To Francis Cranevelt

<Chelsea?,> 12 November <1521>

I recently received a letter from you, my dear Cranevelt. It is just like you: very fine, most affectionate, and thoroughly learned. I got back safe and sound and found my dear ones safe and sound, even though the plague is raging everywhere. I pray that, God willing, they may long remain so. I myself lapsed into a tertian fever immediately after my return, but now I am beginning to get better and am almost well again. My whole school sends you their regards. Give my regards to our mistress and wife. That warfare of yours, I see, does not do very much for your welfare. I pray that someday princes will become of sound mind, at least to the point where some one of them will be willing to be content with a realm more than sufficient for ten of them. But the very weariness of war, I hope, will shortly bring peace. Farewell, my dear Cranevelt—I have never come upon any companion more dear than you. At my little country place not far from London, the 12th of November.

Your servant as much as his own,
Tho. More

30 107. To His Children and Margaret Giggs

At Court, 3 September <1522?>

Thomas More to his dearest children and to Margaret Giggs, whom he numbers among his children, greeting.

35 The Bristol merchant brought me your letters the day after he left you, with which I was extremely delighted. Nothing can come from your workshop, however rude and unfinished, that will not give me more pleasure than the most meticulous writing of anyone else. So much does my affection for you commend whatever you write to me. Indeed, without any recommendation, your letters are capable of pleasing by their own merits, the charm and pure Latinity of their style. There has not been one of your letters that did not please me extremely. But to confess ingenuously what I feel, the letter from my son John pleased me the best, both because it was longer than the others and because he seems to have given it a bit more labor and study. For he not only put out his matter prettily and composed in fairly polished language, but he plays with me both pleasantly and cleverly, and turns my jokes on myself wittily enough. And this he does not only merrily, but with due moderation, showing that he does not forget that he is joking with his father, whom he is eager to delight and yet is cautious not to give offense.

Now I expect from each of you a letter almost every day. I will not admit excuses (for John makes none) such as want of time, sudden departure of the letter carrier, or want of something to write about. No one hinders you from writing, but, on the contrary, all are urging you to it. And that you may not keep the letter carrier waiting, why not anticipate his coming, and have your letter written and sealed, ready two days before a carrier is available? How can a subject be wanting when you write to me, who am glad to hear of your studies or of your games, and whom you will please most if, when there is nothing to write about, you write just that at great length. Nothing can be easier for you, especially for girls, loquacious by nature and always doing it.

One thing, however, I admonish you, whether you write serious matters or the merest trifles, it is my wish that you write everything diligently and thoughtfully. It will do no harm if you first write the whole in English, for then you will have much less trouble and labor in turning it into Latin; not having to look for the matter, your mind will be intent only on the language. That, however, I leave to your own choice, whereas I strictly enjoin you that whatever you have composed you carefully examine before writing it out clean; and in this examination first scrutinize the whole sentence and then every part of it. Thus, if any solecisms have escaped you, you will easily detect them. Correct these, write out the whole letter again, and even then do not grudge to examine it once more, for sometimes, in rewriting, faults slip in again that one had expunged. By this diligence you will soon make your little trifles seem serious matters; for while there is nothing so neat and witty that will not be made insipid by silly and careless loquacity, so also there is nothing in itself so insipid that you cannot season it with grace and wit if you give a little thought to it. Farewell, my dearest children. From the Court, the 3rd September.

108. To Margaret <Roper>

5 At Court, 11 September <1522?>

Thomas More to his dearest daughter Margaret, greeting.

I need not express the extreme pleasure your letter gave me, my darling daughter. You will be able to judge better how much it pleased your father when you learn what delight it caused to a stranger. I happened this evening to be in the company of the Reverend Father, John, Bishop of Exeter, a man of deep learning and of a wide reputation for holiness. Whilst we were talking I took out of my pocket a paper that bore on our business and by accident your letter appeared. He took it into his hand with pleasure and began to examine it. When he saw from the signature that it was the letter of a lady, his surprise led him to read it more eagerly. When he had finished, he said he would never have believed it to be your work unless I had assured him of the fact, and he began to praise it in the highest terms (why should I hide what he said?) for its pure Latinity, its correctness, its erudition, and its expressions of tender affection. Seeing how delighted he was, I showed him your speech. He read it, as also your poems, with a pleasure so far beyond what he had hoped that although he praised you most effusively, yet his countenance showed that his words were all too poor to express what he felt. He took out at once from his pocket a portague<sup>259</sup> which you will find enclosed in this letter. I tried in every possible way to decline it, but was unable to refuse to take it to send to you as a pledge and token of his good will toward you. This hindered me from showing him the letters of your sisters, for I feared that it would seem as though I had shown them to obtain for the others too a gift which it embarrassed me to have to accept for you. But, as I have said, he is so good that it is a joy to have pleased him. Write him your thanks carefully in the nicest letter you can. You will one day be glad to have given pleasure to such a man. Farewell. From the Court, just before midnight, September 11th.

108a. To Francis Cranevelt

<Chelsea?, March? 1522>

I received your letter, my dearest Cranevelt, which delighted me very much, as everything of yours does. I thank you for taking care of my picture. The Virgin herself will thank you, since at your insistence she was finished with greater care. The remaining three crowns which were owed to the craftsman upon completion of the work I had thought I left with one of my friends there, but now I have arranged it that he will receive from Jan van Porter a half crown as a gift of my own over and above our agreement, if he shows that his work deserves it. As for the people of Bruges, my dear Cranevelt, I was disturbed by such meanness in the midst of such extravagance: when they have consumed immense wealth in such a way that whatever is spent is lost, they are forced to set things right by bits and pieces, snatching away precisely where it would be appropriate to add something. But these vices are theirs and let them come to a bad end. But as for you, my dear Cranevelt, your virtue and [diligence] are such that your circumstances will never be found to be anything but honorable. I pray that they may very happily remain so, and if you see anything that could contribute to that on my part I will strive to see to it as if all the resources of all my connections and my own also would be advanced in support of your standing. Farewell, my dearest Cranevelt, together with your wife, the best and most delightful of ladies. Regards from my wife and my whole family.

To the most distinguished and most learned gentleman Master Francis Cranevelt, Counselor of the city of Bruges.

110. To Cardinal Wolsey

New Hall, 21 September <1522>

It may like your good Grace to be advertised,<sup>260</sup> that yesterday in the morning I received from your Grace your honorable letters written unto myself, dated the nineteenth day of this present month and with the same as well the letters of congratulation with the minute<sup>261</sup> of a letter to be written with the King's own hand to the Emperor and the instructions to the King's ambassador there as also those letters which your Grace received from Master Secretary, with the letters by your Grace also devised for the expedition of the gentleman of Spruce.

5 Which things with diligence I presented forthwith unto the King's Grace the same morning, and to the intent that his Grace should the more perfectly perceive what weighty things they were that your Grace had at that time sent unto him and what
10 diligence was requisite in the expediting of the same, I read unto his Grace the letters which it liked your Grace to write to me. In which it much liked his Grace that your Grace so well allowed and approved his opinion concerning the overtures made
15 by the French King unto the Emperor. After your Grace's said letter read, when he saw of your Grace's own hand that I should diligently solicit the expedition of those other things, forasmuch as your Grace intended and gladly would dispatch the premises
20 this present Sunday, his Grace laughed and said, "Nay by my soul that will not be, for this is my removing day soon at Newhall. I will read the remnant at night."

25 Whereupon after that his Grace was come home hither and had dined, being six of the clock in the night, I offered myself again to his Grace in his own chamber, at which time he was content to sign the letters to the Emperor and the other letters for the expedition of the gentlemen of Spruce, putting over 30 all the remnant till this day in the morning.

Whereupon at my parting from his Grace yesternight I received from your Grace a letter addressed unto his, with which I forthwith<sup>262</sup> returned unto his Grace in the Queen's chamber, where his 35 Grace read openly my Lord Admiral's letter to the Queen's Grace, which marvelously rejoiced in the good news and especially in that that the French King should be now toward a tutor and his realm to have a governor.

40 In the communication whereof which lasted about one hour, the King's Grace said that he trusted in God to be their governor himself, and that they should by this means make a way for him as King Richard did for his father. I pray God if it be good
45 for his Grace and for this realm that then it may prove so, and else in the stead thereof I pray God send his Grace one honorable and profitable peace.

This day in the morning, I read unto his Grace as well the instructions most politicly and most prudently devised by your Grace and thereto most eloquently expressed, as all the letters of Master Secretary sent unto your Grace, to whom as well for your speedy advertisement<sup>263</sup> in the one, as for your great labor and pain taken in the other, his Grace giveth his most hearty thanks.

55 In the reading of the instruction among the incommodities that your Grace there most prudently remembereth if the Emperor should leave the estate of Milan up to the French King, the King's Grace said that the Emperor should besides all those incommodities sustain another great damage, that is to wit<sup>264</sup> the loss of all his friends and favorers in Italy without recovery forever which should be fain<sup>265</sup> to fall wholly to the French King, utterly despairing that ever the Emperor leaving the Duchy when he had it would after labor therefor when he had left it. Which consideration his Grace would have planted 60 into the instructions with his own hand, saving that he said your Grace could, and so he requireth<sup>266</sup> you to do better furnish it or set it forth.

70 As touching Master Secretary's letters his Grace thinketh, as your Grace most prudently writeth, that they do but seek delays till they may see how the world is, wherein he much alloweth your most prudent opinion that they should be with good round words to their ambassador and other quick ways pricked forth.

80 And forasmuch as your Grace toucheth an order, that no Venetians should be suffered to ship any of their goods out of the realm, and that it is now showed unto his Grace that one Deodo a Venetian is about to ship, pretending himself to be denizen, which is his pretense whether it be true or not his Grace knoweth not, and also thinketh that he shall under the color<sup>267</sup> of his own send out of the realm
85 the goods of others his countrymen, for which causes his Grace requireth yours to have a respect thereto and cause it to be ordered as to your Grace's wisdom shall seem expedient.

90 Forasmuch as the King's Grace hath not yet written of his own hand the minute to the Emperor which I delivered his Grace in this morning, therefore I suppose that this letter written this present Sunday the twenty-first day of September in the night cannot be delivered to the post till tomorrow about <        >, as knoweth our Lord, who long preserve your Grace in honor and health.

Your humble orator and most bounden beadsman,

Thomas More

To my Lord Legate's good Grace.

111. From Cuthbert Tunstall

London, <ca. October 1522>

Cuthbert Tunstall gives many greetings to Thomas
More.<sup>268</sup>

It was some years ago, my dear More, that I was forced to look a little more closely into some calculations that had not been properly handled (I was doing business with some money changers, and when we didn't quite agree on the result, I needed to escape from the fraud I had very much suspected), and I reviewed the art of calculation that I had once had some exposure to as a youth. As a result of doing this, once I had freed myself from the annoyance of those sharp men, I began to think about how it might prove to be no small advantage during the rest of my life, if I were to acquire so ready a knowledge of the art of arithmetic, that I could not be fooled even when tested by the most skilled practitioner.

Consequently, in order to understand the business more thoroughly, I read through all the works of all the writers who wrote on this subject, whether learned or ignorant, both in Latin and in the barbarous tongues that I could proficiently understand (practically every country has some writing on this art, written in the vernacular), and, in order to avoid having often to re-read, tediously, these little books in their entirety, many of which I did not always like reading, I took notes when anything appeared somewhere in them that I liked.
And so it came to pass, that from many books, written by many authors, I collected many things myself. I kept them stored privately for a little while, but then it occurred to me that it might be useful if I could make them a little clearer by putting them into Latin; while attempting that, but not succeeding too well, and defeated by tiredness, I often put aside those little books, and despaired of attaining what I had hoped to accomplish, not only because the matter was difficult in itself, but also because there were so many things that could not go into the Latin tongue, let alone with eloquence. However, I felt ashamed to give up on a task that had seemed so promising at the outset, just because it was becoming too hard a burden for me to bear. So, I tried some more, in the hope that working on it again would bring me more strength. Sometimes I even enjoyed struggling with the difficulties, so that, contrary to what usually happens, the things that were causing me no small annoyance actually made my mind work more stubbornly. I even began to think that, after I proved unable to accomplish what I really wanted to do — that is, to make everything shine with splendor — it would not be a bad thing at least to render less uncouth whatever seemed to be unkempt with barbarity. And so, at last, I conquered my tedium, and struggling through many difficulties, I made all manner of excerpts out of the many possible, and for a long time purposely kept them unpublished, thinking, when I had the leisure, to follow the example of the mother-bear who licks

her unformed cubs into shape.

But now, having been designated — as unworthy a man as I am of the honor — to the vacant London bishopric by the kindness of a King who is deserving of the regard of all good men, and by me more than can be expressed, and intending to devote the rest of my days to sacred letters, I have decided that all profane writings should be put aside, and especially these notes on arithmetic that I have been saving and which I now think should be thrown out, as more worthy of the bookcases of Vulcan than of Minerva. They are not worthy to be in the hands of learned men, nor do I think it right, that through taking time to polish them, any part of my life from now on be stolen away from sacred writings.
But it came to my mind that these notes might not be without usefulness to those who are intending to study arithmetic, nor that it would make much sense to consign to the flames for destruction what has come into being during so many evenings of study. Nevertheless, I could not convince myself to dedicate this rude and unpolished work to the King, who is learned beyond the typical fortune of 268 This dedicatory epistle to De arte supputandi was translated by Gerald

Malsbary © CTMS 2018. Tunstall's was the first arithmetic book printed in England.

kings, and deserving of my regard beyond that of all other mortals, lest I delay him even the slightest bit from his public duties while he takes time to read these silly things, and lest I seem to ruin the favor 5 (which I would in vain hope ever to repay), by giving him an unpleasant task.

And so, as I looked about me, to see to whom especially out of my cohort of friends I could dedicate this collection, you (thanks both to our long 10 acquaintance and to the honesty of your mind) seemed the most likely one of all to be ready to be pleased (if anything in it is pleasing), to take it in a good sense (if anything seems inadequate), and to forgive (if anything offends). To whom but you are 15 such acts more fitting? You are now completely involved in computations, as the second in command over the Royal Treasury, and can give them to your children to study, whom you are taking care to be liberally educated, and they would be in a position 20 to make the most out of them, if they are worth reading at all, since the minds of young persons are stimulated by nothing so much as by the discipline of arithmetic.

Farewell.

25 113. To Conrad Goclenius

London, <ca. November 1522>

To the very learned professor of Latin, Conrad Goclenius, at Louvain.

Some little time ago my good friend Peter Giles 30 sent me Lucian's Hermotimus, translated by you, most learned Goclenius, and dedicated to me. When I received it I was indeed very greatly pleased both by your kindness to me and by the charm of the work, together with the elegance of its style; in 35 it you seem to me to compete most happily even with the Greek. So our mutual friend Erasmus was quite right—whose frequent enthusiastic statements of your ability and learning made you dear to me before I knew you. And now really since this 40 additional pledge, so to call it, of your affection and good will toward me in turn, although I loved you so much before that I thought I could not love you more, yet somehow or other, to that earlier love for you I feel a considerable increase has accrued.
45 And so by showing your learned essays also to many others among us, I have seen to it that you have here many more friends and admirers of your talents. And if there should occur anything in which I can gratify or serve you or any of yours, I shall make clear <by return> how good and kind has been 50 your service to me. Farewell, my very dear friend; all my friends here in London send their most cordial greetings.

Your (in whatever way I may serve you)
Thomas More

55

117. To Cardinal Wolsey

Woking, 1 September <1523>

It may like your good Grace to be advertised<sup>269</sup> that I have received your Grace's letters directed to myself dated the last day of August with the letters of 60 my Lord Admiral to your Grace sent in post and copies of letters sent between the Queen of Scots and his lordship concerning the matters and affairs of Scotland with the prudent answers of your Grace as well to my said lord in your own name as in the 65 name of the King's Highness to the said Queen of Scots. All which letters and copies I have distinctly read unto his Grace. Who hath in the reading thereof substantially considered as well the Queen his sister's letter with the letters againward devised
70 and sent by my Lord Admiral to her and his letters of advertisement<sup>270</sup> to your Grace as your most politic devices and answers unto all the same among which, the letter which your Grace devised in the name of his Highness to the Queen his sister, his 75 Grace so well liked that I never saw him like thing better, and as help me God in my poor fantasy not causeless, for it is for the quantity one of the best made letters for words, matter, sentence, and couching that ever I read in my life.
80

His Highness in your Grace's letter directed to my Lord Admiral marked and well liked that your Grace touched my said lord and my Lord Dacre in that that their opinions had been to the let<sup>271</sup> of the great rood, which if it had been ere<sup>272</sup> this time
85 made into Scotland, as by your prudent advice it had, if their opinions with other had not been to the contrary, it should as by the Queen's letter appeareth have been the occasion of some great and good effect.
90

His Highness also well allowed that your Grace noteth not only remiss dealing but also some suspicion, in that the Lord Dacre so little esteemed the mind and opinion of the King's sister whereof he had by his servant so perfect knowledge.

Finally his Highness is of the mind of your Grace and singularly commendeth your policy in that your Grace determineth for a final way that my Lord Admiral shall set forth his enterprises without any longer tract of time not ceasing to press them with all the annoyance possible till they fall earnestly and effectually to some better train<sup>273</sup> and conformity. And verily<sup>274</sup> his Highness thinketh as your Grace writeth that for any lack of those things, which as he writeth are not yet come to him, he should not have needed to forbear to have done them with smaller roods as the least way some annoyance in the mean season.

I read also to his Highness the letter of Master Doctor Knight written unto your Grace, with your Grace's letter written to myself, by the tenor whereof his Grace well perceiveth your most prudent answer devised and made, as well to his said ambassador as to the ambassador of the Emperor, concerning the disbursing of such money as his Highness should lay out for the entretènement<sup>275</sup> of the 10,100 lance knights, wherein his Grace highly well approveth as well your most politic foresight so wisely doubting lest this delay of the declaration might happen to be a device, whereby the Emperor might spare his own charge and entreteign<sup>276</sup> the Almain<sup>277</sup> with the only cost of the King's Grace, as also your most prudent order taken therein by which his Highness shall be bound to no charge except the Duke first pass the articles sent by Sir John Russell and that the 10,000 Almain<sup>277</sup> be levied and joined with the Duke and he declared enemy to the French King.

I read also to his Highness the copy of your Grace's letter devised to Master Doctor Sampson and Master Jerningham, wherein his Highness well perceived and marked what labor and pain your Grace had taken as well in substantial advertising his said ambassadors at length of all occurrences here, with the goodly rehearsal<sup>278</sup> of the valiant acquittal of his army on the sea not only there done but also descending on the land with all his preparations and armies set forth and furnished as well toward France as Scotland as also in your good and substantial instructions given unto them for the semblable advancing of the Emperor's army and actual invasion to be made on that side for his part.

His Highness hath also seen and signed the letters by your Grace devised in his name as well to Don Ferdinando and to the Duke of Mecklenburg in answer of their late letters sent unto his Grace as also to the Duke of Ferrara in commendation of the King's orators in case the Duke accept the Order.

In the reading and advising of all which things his Highness said that he perceived well, what labor, study, pain, and travail your Grace had taken in the device and penning of so many, so great things, so high, well dispatched in so brief time, when the only reading thereof held him about two hours; his Highness, therefore, commanded me to write unto your Grace that for your labor, travail, study, pain and diligence, he giveth your Grace his most hearty and not more hearty than highly well-deserved thanks. And thus our Lord long preserve your good Grace in honor and health. At Woking the first day of September.

Your humble orator and most bounden beadsman,<sup>279</sup>

Thomas More

To my Lord Legate's good Grace.

128. To Margaret Roper

<Woodstock?, Autumn 1523>

I cannot put down on paper, indeed I can hardly express in my own mind, the deep pleasure that I received from your most charming letter, my dearest Margaret. As I read it there was with me a young man of the noblest rank and of the widest attainments in literature — one, too, who is as conspicuous for his virtue as he is for his learning, Reginald Pole. He thought your letter nothing short of marvelous, even before he understood how pressed you were for time and distracted by ill health, while you managed to write so long a letter. I could scarce make him believe that you had not been helped by a teacher until he learned truly that there was no

273 order 274 truly 275 upkeep, maintenance 276 maintain, support

277 Germans 278 account 279 one who prays for another teacher at our house, and that it would not be possible to find a man who would not need your help in composing letters rather than be able to give any assistance to you.

5     Meanwhile, something I once said to you in joke came back to my mind, and I realized how true it was. It was to the effect that you were to be pitied, because the incredulity of men would rob you of the praise you so richly deserved for your laborious 10 vigils, as they would never believe, when they read what you had written, that you had not often availed yourself of another's help: whereas of all the writers you least deserved to be thus suspected. Even when 15 a tiny child you could never endure to be decked out in another's finery. But, my sweetest Margaret, you are all the more deserving of praise on this account. Although you cannot hope for an adequate reward for your labor, yet nevertheless you continue 20 to unite to your singular love of virtue the pursuit of literature and art. Content with the profit and pleasure of your conscience, in your modesty you do not seek for the praise of the public, nor value it overmuch even if you receive it, but because of the great love you bear us, you regard us—your husband and myself—as a sufficiently large circle of 25 readers for all that you write.

In your letter you speak of your imminent confinement. We pray most earnestly that all may go happily and successfully with you. May God and 30 our Blessed Lady grant you happily and safely to increase your family by a little one like to his mother in everything except sex. Yet let it by all means be a girl, if only she will make up for the inferiority of her sex by her zeal to imitate her mother's virtue and learning. Such a girl I should prefer to three 35 boys. Goodbye, my dearest child.

133. To the University of Oxford

London, 26 July <1524>

40 To his very dear friends, the congregation and masters of the University of Oxford.

After the death of the distinguished Sir Thomas Lovell, who was the late High Steward and Agent of your University, your Proctor acting as your representative, most learned Gentlemen, came to me to 45 inform me of your deep regret at the death of that eminent Gentleman, and, furthermore, that, having met to select his successor, you chose me, out of your friendliness and great love, as the best qualified candidate for that office. This office, conferred upon 50 me with such sincere and friendly approbation, I have very gladly and happily accepted, with the realization that, out of a large group of extremely talented men whose wisdom and prestige could be of great service to you, I was the first choice to whom 55 you would entrust the complete handling of your business affairs and law suits. This appointment has clearly indicated to me your opinion of my devotion to duty and the high value that you have ever set upon my services. Consequently, illustrious Gentlemen, while heretofore I have had from your indulgence the greatest possible pleasure, such that it 60 seemed I could not have greater, while, on my part, I have ever regarded you with such affection that I thought I could not add to it; still, as a result of this recent kindness toward me, I am so moved by affection for you and so filled with new joy by your favor that I seem almost not to have been loved by you before 65 nor to have loved you. For your previous favors were at all times such as can proceed only from the noblest love, and I have welcomed each one of them as such kindnesses should be welcomed by a sincere mind and grateful heart. Your most recent display of good will, however, has placed the crown upon all the rest, and it brought before my mind's eye, in 70 momentary flashes, all your previous favors; and yet the recollection of each of them stirred my heart no less than on the day they were bestowed and made me realize that I should be, as I really was, as grateful as if I were then receiving all of them for the first time. These reflections were caused, not by any desire of mine to occupy this office, but by the recurrent thought that those men before whom I have 75 stood in awe since my youth, and whom I have respected, and whose gratitude I have always endeavored to earn, and whose affection I have prayed to win, were vying with one another in honoring me as if that were their one concern. Therefore, most 80 esteemed and cultured Gentlemen, I extend to you all the sincerest gratitude of which I am capable. And I want you to promise yourselves and to expect from More, who is and will always be yours wholeheartedly, all that you would desire, either as a group from a most devoted patron and friend, or 85 individually, from a very dear comrade or brother. I, for my part, will strive with all zeal, care, and diligence so to prove myself to you—both as a group and individually—that not a single one of you may 90 think that he has been deceived in his expectations. Farewell, most cherished Gentlemen. From London, July 26.

Entirely yours from the bottom of my heart,
Thomas More

135. To Francis Cranevelt

London, 10 August <1524>

Cordial greetings! I see and I recognize, my dear Cranevelt, how deeply I am in your debt, so unceasingly do you do what to my mind is the most pleasant thing of all—writing about what is happening with you and our friends. For to Thomas More what either should or could be more agreeable in adversity or more pleasant in prosperity than to receive letters from Cranevelt, the dearest of all men?<sup>280</sup> Unless someone could provide the opportunity to speak with the man himself in person—although whenever I read what you have written, I am so affected by it that while I am reading I seem to be talking with you face to face. Therefore nothing grieves me more distinctly than that your letter is not longer, although for that defect I could also find a sort of remedy: I read the ones I receive over and over, and slowly at that, so that quick reading does not take away the pleasure too quickly. So much for that!

As for what you write about our friend Vives,<sup>281</sup> and I say it in a discussion of bad women, I agree with your opinion so completely that I think it is not possible to live even with the best of them without any inconvenience at all. For if you happen to have a wife you will not be free of care, and, so far as I can tell, Metellus Numidicus told the truth about wives.<sup>282</sup> But I would say it all the more emphatically if we were not to blame for causing many women to become worse. Nevertheless, Vives has such character and prudence, and has acquired such a wife, that he will not only avoid all the vexation of marriage, in so far as that is possible, but he will even find great pleasure from it. In fact everyone's mind is now so totally caught up in concern for the welfare of the public, while everywhere war rages and burns in such a way, that no one is free to pay attention to private worries. Hence whatever domestic concerns once vexed anyone are obscured by the collective disasters. But enough of such matters.

I come back to you: whenever I think of your kindness and your friendship toward me (and I do so very often), I shake off all sadness. I am grateful for the little book you sent me. And I offer hearty congratulations that your family has been increased by new offspring, and indeed I do so not only for your sake but also on behalf of the commonwealth, to which it is very important which parents enlarge it with the most numerous progeny, for from you only the best can be born. Farewell, and greet your most excellent wife from me most diligently and obligingly. From the bottom of my heart I pray for her a happy state of health and well-being. My wife and children also pray for your well-being, for through my eulogies you are no less known and dear to them than to me myself. Once more, farewell. At London, August 10.

Yours with all my heart and more,
Thomas More

136. To Cardinal Wolsey

Hertford, 29 November <1524>

It may like your good Grace to be advertised<sup>283</sup> that yesternight at my coming unto the King's Grace's presence, after that I had made your Grace's recommendations and his Highness showed himself very greatly glad and joyful of your Grace's health; as I was about to declare further to his Grace what letters I had brought, his Highness perceiving letters in my hand, prevented<sup>284</sup> me ere<sup>285</sup> I could begin and said, "Ah! ye have letters now by John Joachim<sup>286</sup> and I trow<sup>287</sup> some resolution what they will do." "Nay verily, sir," quoth I. "My lord hath yet no word by John Joachim nor John Joachim, as far as my lord knew, had yet no word himself this day in the morning when I departed from his Grace." "No had?" quoth he, "I much marvel thereof for John Joachim had a servant come to him two days ago." "Sir," quoth I, "if it like your Grace,<sup>288</sup> this morning my Lord's Grace had nothing heard thereof, for yesterday his Grace at afternoon dispatched me to

280 These italicized phrases are in Greek in the original. 281 Juan Luis Vives (1492–1540) 282 See Aulus

Gellius, Noctes Atticae 1.6. 283 informed 284 anticipated 285 before 286 John Joachim de Passano was secretary to

Fregoso, governor of Genoa, and resident at the Court of France. 287 trust 288 if it like your Grace: if your Grace like your Grace with a letter sent from Master Doctor Knight<sup>289</sup> and the same night late his Grace sent a servant of his to my house and commanded me to be with his Grace this morning by eight of the clock, where at my coming he delivered me these other letters and advertisements<sup>290</sup> sent unto him from Master Pace, commanding me that after that your Highness had seen them, I should remit<sup>291</sup> them to him with diligence, as well for that he would show them to other of your Grace's Council as also to John Joachim, for the contents be such as will do him little pleasure." "Marry,"<sup>292</sup> quoth his Grace, "I am well apaid thereof."<sup>293</sup>

And so he fell in merrily to the reading of the letters of Master Pace and all the other abstracts and writings, whereof the contents as highly contented him as any tidings that I have seen come to him, and thanked your Grace most heartily for your good and speedy advertisement; and forthwith he declared the news and every material point, which upon the reading his Grace well noted unto the Queen's Grace and all other about him who were marvelous glad to hear it. And the Queen's Grace said that she was glad that the Spaniards had yet done somewhat in Italy in recompense of<sup>294</sup> their departure out of Provence.

I showed his Highness that your Grace thought that the French King passed the mountains in hope to win all with a visage<sup>295</sup> in Italy and to find there no resistance and his sudden coming upon<sup>296</sup> much abashed the countries, putting each quarter in doubt of other and out of surety<sup>297</sup> who might be well trusted, but now since he findeth it otherwise, missing the help of money, which he hoped to have had in Milan, finding his enemies strong and the fortresses well manned and furnished and at Pavia, by the expugnation<sup>298</sup> whereof he thought to put all the remnant in fear and dread, being now twice rejected<sup>299</sup> with loss and reproach, his estimation<sup>300</sup> shall so decay and his friends fail, his enemies confirmed and encouraged, namely, such aid of the Almaignes<sup>301</sup> of new<sup>302</sup> joining with them, that like as the French King before wrote and boasted unto his mother<sup>303</sup> that he had of his own mind passed into Italy, so is it likely that she shall have shortly cause to write again to him that it had to be much better and more wisdom for him to abide at home than to put himself there whereas he standeth in great peril whether ever he shall get thence. The King's Grace laughed and said that he thinketh it will be very hard for him to get thence, and that he thinketh the matters going thus the Pope's Holiness will not be hasty neither in peace nor truce.

Upon the reading of Master Knight's letter his Grace said not much, but that if Bewreyn<sup>304</sup> come to his Grace he will be plain with him. And if he do not, but take his dispatch there of your Grace, which thing I perceive his Highness would be well content he did, except he desire to come to his presence, his Grace requireth yours so to talk with him as he may know that his Grace and yours well perceive how the matters be handled by the Emperor's agents in the enterprise.

The King's Grace is very glad that the matters of Scotland be in so good train<sup>305</sup> and would be loath that they were now ruffled<sup>306</sup> by the Earl of Angwish<sup>307</sup> and much his Highness alloweth the most prudent mind of your Grace, minding to use the Earl of Angwish for an instrument to wring and wrest the matters into better train if they walk awry,<sup>308</sup> and not to wrestle with them and break<sup>309</sup> them when they go right.

It may like your Grace also to be advertised<sup>310</sup> that I moved his Grace concerning the suit of Master Broke in such wise as your Grace declared unto me your pleasure, when Master Broke and I were with your Grace on Sunday. And his Grace answered me that he would take a breath<sup>311</sup> therein and that he would first once speak with the young man and then his Grace departed, but I perceived by his Grace that he had taken the young man's promise not to marry without his advice, because his Grace intended to marry him to some one of the Queen's maidens. If it would like your good Grace in any

289 Dr. William Knight, ambassador at the court of Margaret of Austria-Savoy, the Emperor's aunt and regent in the Netherlands 290 notifications 291 send back 292 originally, the name of the Virgin Mary, but by the sixteenth century a common interjection 293 apaid thereof: paid for it 294 in recompense of: as an equivalent for 295 all with a visage: merely by showing his face 296 attack 297 uncertain 298 taking by storm 299 repulsed. Pace reported the failure of two assaults on Pavia by Francis I. 300 repute 301 Germans 302 newly 303 Louise of Savoy was regent for Francis I. 304 Florys d'Egmont, Lord of Iselstein, the

Emperor's lieutenant; afterwards Count de Buren 305 order 306 disordered 307 Archibald Douglas, Earl of Angus, second husband of the Queen of Scotland 308 walk awry: go perversely 309 ruin 310 informed 311 respite letter which it should please your Grace hereafter to write hither, to make some mention and remembrance of that matter, I trust it would take good effect. And thus our Lord long preserve your good 5 Grace in honor and health.

At Hertford the twenty-ninth day of November.

Your Grace's humble orator<sup>312</sup> and most bounden beadsman,<sup>313</sup>

Thomas More

10 To my Lord Legate's good Grace.

138. To Francis Cranevelt

London, 16 May <1525>

I was pleased, my dear Cranevelt, to receive the quite delightful letter which you sent me from 15 Ghent, from which I understood that both you and all of yours are well, and that news gave me great joy. To let you know in turn about me, I, too, and all of my people are in excellent health, thank heavens.

When I got your letter, our friend Vives had de-20 parted to rejoin his wife. For some time now we have had the booklet you wrote about, the one published against our friend Erasmus.<sup>314</sup> To me and to many others it seems that it was put out with an assignment to a false author. Hence I would like you 25 to inquire who the real author was, who brought it to the printers, for perhaps it can be learned from them. But if that can be found out, please inform me, so that I too many know who that ass is that has covered himself with the hide of another beast. I 30 am as glad to hear that Fevijn has recovered as I was sorry to learn that he had suffered an illness. Please give him, and your excellent wife, my best regards.
As for me there is nothing new. I am sending you and your spouse a number of consecrated rings as 35 a little gift and together with them my best regards.
London May 14. Farewell, my good man and dearest friend.

Yours with all my heart and more,

Thomas More

40 To the very eminent gentleman, Frans Cranevelt, at Ghent

139. To Francis Cranevelt

London, 6 June <1525>

Greetings, my dear Cranevelt. I received your short letter, to which I am compelled to respond in an 45 even shorter one. What you heard about Luther is true. My arrival was delayed but I hope that I will be with you in August. In the meantime farewell, together with the wife who is mine by day and yours by night but the mistress of us both. London, in 50 haste, June 6.

Yours, Thomas More

To the most distinguished gentleman Master
Frans Cranevelt, at Bruges

142. To Francis Cranevelt

London, 22 February <1526>

I was delighted, my dearest Cranevelt, with your letter, which Harst<sup>315</sup> delivered to me. Comparing the pictures of the spouses with your description,
I could clearly see (and I was glad to see, precisely 60 for the sake of the mistress) that you are not yet growing old, since you are still such an outstanding judge of beauty. The monarchs have agreed on peace—God knows how long it will last. I wish it would last forever, and I do not entirely despair of 65 that. For they have learned enough of the evils of war to see very well that to enter into it again is not to their advantage. I would hope with more confidence if the terms under which the agreement was concluded were a little gentler than they are said 70 to be (how accurately I do not know). The scound-rels who conspired to produce the trumpery of Taxander,<sup>316</sup> like serpents who have spit out their venom, have hidden themselves in darkness, but the 75 infamy of buffoons comes to light. By the death of Dorp true learning has suffered a great loss indeed.
I cannot praise you enough, indeed. I cannot praise you enough, my dear Cranevelt, for the very elegant poem in which you paid your last respects. On my 80 behalf please give best regards to your mistress, and likewise mine. Farewell, Cranevelt, most learned

312 suppliant 313 one who prays for another 314 Apologia in eum librum quem ab anno Erasmus Roterdamus de confessione edidit, per Godefridum Ruysium Taxandrum theologum. Eiusdem libellus quo taxatur Delectus Ciborum sive

Liber de Carnium Esu, ante biennium per Erasmus Roterdamum enixus (1525), a pamphlet attacking Erasmus's writings on confession. The dedication to "Taxander" was to Edward Lee, but the identities of the authors are uncertain. 315 Karl Harst (1492–1563), Erasmus's messenger 316 See Letter 138 for More's discussion of the pamphlet against Erasmus, which was dedicated to "Taxander," or Edward Lee.

and most dear to my heart. London, February 22, in great haste.

To Master Cranevelt of the Council of Mechelen

142a. From Dr. Johann Eck<sup>317</sup>

5 Ingolstadt, <ca. February 1526>

Johann Eck sends greetings to the most illustrious man Thomas More, Knight.<sup>318</sup>

Perhaps you accuse me of ingratitude because I have not written to you after returning to Germany. I am now writing so that you might not continue to accuse me. Although, we should measure gratitude by the mind, not by epistles. For your humane service toward me will never lose its force.<sup>319</sup> As surety, I am sending you my Enchiridion, now enriched. I have entrusted to the printer's press the very agreeable book of William Ross, your countryman (which I think you've seen).

Goodbye, and love me.<sup>320</sup>

In Ingolstadt, Bavaria

143. To John Bugenhagen<sup>321</sup>

20 <ca. 1526><sup>322</sup>

As I was returning home from a trip, one of my servants gave me a letter which he said he had gotten from someone he had never seen before. When I opened it, Pomeranus,<sup>323</sup> I found that it was written in your name, but whose hand it was in I do not know. And it was written in such a way as to seem addressed to me neither personally nor generally. For you addressed it, "To the Saints in England." I am, against my will, as far removed from those who truly deserve such a noble title as I am glad to remove myself from the only ones you regard as saints, Pomeranus. For I see that nothing is sacred to you except the Lutheran sect.

35 And so I was puzzled at first as to how it had come into his head — whoever he was — to want to force such a letter on me, especially me, for I had never got mixed up in the Lutheran business. But when I thought about it more carefully, I began to suspect that maybe that was it: someone thought I was the right person to try such a letter on precisely because I had not really become involved in the controversy up to that point. When everyone here was crying out everywhere against Luther's foul heresies, I said almost nothing about it. I was not a theologian, and the part I played in the world did not require me to deal with corruption of that kind. I suspect some Lutheran hoped that such a letter — one that seemed on the surface so devout — would easily lure me from my impartial stand and make me take sides with him.

I turned these things over in my mind. Although your letter needed no reply and although I had firmly resolved to avoid all contact with that dangerous disease of yours, I nevertheless decided that it was forced on me against my will. And besides, by keeping quiet, I might perhaps increase the misplaced hope of the person who gave it to me. So I decided to reply to your letter and make it clear to everyone that no matter how ignorant I am of theology I am still too loyal a Christian ever to be a Lutheran. And so I will answer the parts of your epistle one by one, and let you see readily enough what you have accomplished in each. You begin, then, like this:

65 Grace be to you and peace from God our Father and our Lord Jesus Christ.<sup>324</sup>

There is nothing wrong with that, but you would have seemed more modest if you had imitated the conduct of the apostle rather than the apostolic style. For this is almost apostolic too:

We could not but rejoice when we heard that in England, too, the Gospel of the glory of God has been well received by certain persons.<sup>325</sup>

On reading these words are we not reminded of the apostle congratulating the Church when it was still a suckling babe in the cradle? How cleverly you imitate him! Just as the Gospel was first preached to the Corinthians or Galatians in the time of the

<sup>317</sup> Translated by Bradley Ritter, © CTMS 2018. <sup>318</sup> The title used here by Eck, equus auratus, is for those given an honorary knighthood by the king (see E. E. Reynolds, "Equus Auratus," Moreana nos. 65–66: 131). <sup>319</sup> See Cicero, Epistulae ad familiares 6.16. <sup>320</sup> A similar vaediction

is found often in Cicero (see Epistulae ad familiares 7.5, 15.19, 16.8, 16.26, and 16.27). <sup>321</sup> a Protestant humanist (1485–1558) from Pomerania, a region near the Baltic Sea in present-day Germany and Poland <sup>322</sup> Although written in 1525–26, this letter was put aside and not published until after

More's death, in 1568. <sup>323</sup> Bugenhagen was called Pomeranus because he was born in Pomerania. More addresses him only by this name. <sup>324</sup> CW 7: 398; see Eph 1:1. <sup>325</sup> CW 7: 398 apostles, so too, now that you are preaching, you would have us believe, the Gospel finally begins to be heard and welcomed by the British. But this is all so new, you say, and occurs so infrequently that the 5 Gospel of God is still not well received in Britain except among a few people.

I do not know what you call the “gospel.” But I know this: if you agree that the Gospel is what Christ revealed to the world, and what the four 10 Evangelists—Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John—wrote in the past, and what all the ancient leaders of the Church interpreted as the Gospel, and what the whole Christian world for more than fifteen hundred years has understood and taught as the 15 Gospel—this “gospel,” I say, has been well received in England continuously for a thousand years, more or less. In fact the faith of the Gospels was welcomed everywhere in this nation and accepted even by those who were too weak and frail to act in a way
20 that was worthy of the Gospels. But if you want us to take as “gospel” those new, destructive, absurd doctrines that Luther, like another Antichrist, recently introduced among the Saxons—those doctrines that you, Karlstadt, Lambert, and Oecolampadius<sup>326</sup> (Luther’s cacangelists)<sup>327</sup> foment and scatter throughout 25 the world—if that is what you mean by the “gospel,” then there is hardly anyone in England who welcomes that gospel of yours. And for that we are very glad indeed.

30 But we have also been told that many weaklings still reject us because of vague rumors reported of us there by those who oppose the gospel of God. This is our glory. I consider it unnecessary to refute the lies told about those who proclaim the 35 gospel. How else could we experience in our own lives the beatitude, “Blessed shall you be when men have reviled you?”<sup>328</sup>

As a matter of fact it is not the weaklings who turn away from you, but those who are much firmer 40 in faith. They turn away not because of any lies told against those who profess the gospel (as you call the Lutherans), but because of the unending sins which you perverters of the Gospel all too truly perpetrate. I ask you, what lies are you talking about? Or 45 how do you profess the Gospel? Would you call it a lie if someone says your sect has destroyed a good part of Germany in riots, murder, looting, and arson? Do you dare call people liars who testify that your unholy doctrine is the cause of so many crimes, 50 so many injuries, so much desolation? Inciting riots, setting laymen against clergy, arming the people against magistrates, inflaming the people against princes, plotting battles, disasters, wars, massacres—do you call that preaching the Gospel? Since you are

55 a distinguished preacher of the Gospel, tell us, I beg of you, whether one who destroys the sacraments of Christ, rejects the saints of Christ, blasphemes the mother of Christ, scorns the cross of Christ, makes light of vows made to Christ, renounces celibacy
60 dedicated to Christ, defiles virginity consecrated to Christ, urges marriage (that is to say, everlasting defilement) on monks and virgins veiled for Christ—and who urges these things not just with words, foul as they may be, but who provokes them as well
65 with his filthy example—tell us, I say, you famous preacher of the gospel—or evangelist of Luther, if you like, for Luther himself is your Christ—tell us whether doing and teaching these shameful things is what you call preaching the Gospel.

There is no doubt, then, just as I said: it is not 70 the weaklings who turn away from you, but those who are much firmer in faith. They turn away from you not only because of the truth told about you—I mean the vicious evils your faction is responsible 75 for, which is why God pursues your vicious sect with manifest vengeance—they also turn away from you because they see that your doctrines are opposed to the teaching of Christ in a fight to the finish.

And speaking of doctrines—in almost every instance they have clear scriptural evidence to oppose 80 to your efforts. Still, to be certain they are not deceived about the meaning of Scripture, they have first of all everyone of the fathers to set against your wild yawns. (But of course that is all you want, to prove your points by yelling.) They have all the 85 ancient fathers who were enlightened by God and not only interpreted Scripture, but also provided an example of noble behavior and thus increased the piety of the Christian people. They also have the support of an unshaken consensus of the whole 90 Christian world through all the ages, from the Passion of Christ down to your own time. But perhaps

326 Andreas Bodenstein von Karlstadt (ca. 1480–1541), François Lambert (ca. 1486–1530), and Johannes

Hussgen or Oecolampadius (1482–1531) 327 Cacangelist is More’s invention, a combination of the Greek καχός (“bad, evil”) and ἀγγέλλειν (“to announce”).

328 CW 7: 398; Mt 5:11

you object that this consensus came about without the help of the Holy Spirit, who makes all men of one mind in his house. Or you may want to pretend that the devil deceived the whole Church through 5 all those centuries and brought it together in a consensus against Christ's Gospel. If that is the case, you are simply denying the possibility of any faith in the Gospel of Christ whatsoever. For unless the 10 Church had shown you the Gospel in the first place, you would have had no way of knowing what it is. You admit that yourselves.

They also score this against you, that almost everything you currently teach was previously taught by men whose errors have long since been condemned 15 by the fathers of the Church. Whenever heretics gather together, the Church has always driven them out, and God has revealed their wickedness by the punishment inflicted on them. But you, on the other hand, have nothing whatsoever to insinuate against 20 the lives of the blessed fathers, whose memory the Church has venerated for so many ages past. All of them fight for our faith and overthrow yours. A person, therefore, would have to be mad to follow the founders of your faith down where their errors have 25 drowned them. Anyone would prefer to join himself to those who reign with Christ, and you have no doubt that they do reign with him, even though out of hatred and envy you do whatever you can to disparage them. At first you wrongly persuaded
 30 yourselves somehow that you were the only ones who knew anything and that learned men among orthodox Christians never read anything except scholastic controversies. And so, relying on the ignorance of others (as it seemed to you), you stated 35 that you would take your stand on the opinions of the holy fathers. Afterward, however, you saw that your hope and expectations were all wrong. The testimony of those saintly men refuted all your basic principles. Then in truth your pride led you to such 40 monstrous hatred that, since you are ashamed to submit to heaven, you have decided to damn everything to hell. And so, you gave birth to this ungodly and completely insane blasphemy: "I care not for ten Jeromes, I care not for a hundred Cyprians, I care 45 not for a thousand Augustines, nor for ten thousand Chrysostoms."<sup>329</sup>

And finally, for fear the glorious majesty and splendor of the saints who reign with Christ will dim your lights, you have begun to destroy the received opinion about them. You attack their reputation, disparage their authority, and take away as 50 much of their veneration and honor as you possibly can. But they are powerful and invulnerable, Pomeranus. They stand at this moment on a lofty rock and laugh at your feeble attacks as at the arrows of 55 children.<sup>330</sup> For the friends of God are accorded honor and they always will be.<sup>331</sup> Their memory will live forever. But the memory of all those will perish together with the sound of their words,<sup>332</sup> all those who created the labyrinths of your deceptions, from 60 the time of the very first heretic, whoever that was, through all the ages. Although thousands of orthodox books have been preserved over the centuries, increasing in value with age, the works of all the heretics have disappeared shortly after their deaths.

 65 No work of any ancient heretic exists today. And yet when those heretical works disappeared in ages past, there was no law that said they had to be consigned to the flames. It was thus clearly demonstrated that God destroyed them himself by his 70 own hand so that the snares of heretics might give way like spiderwebs and disappear completely, neglected like dirt and filth. No doubt just as quick a destruction threatens and overhangs your labors, for they constitute a far greater danger to Christian
 75 piety. Envy may well bare its teeth and snarl, but the memory of those holy fathers will be revered, their works will grow in popularity, and the faithful will ever draw from them an antidote against the poisons with which you infect the life-giving well-spring of Scripture. The fathers of the Church stand firmly in consensus against you, but you also stand 80 just as firmly in opposition to yourselves because of your own internal dissension. You not only contend against one another, but each of you also disagrees with himself, over and over again. No doubt Catholics turn away from you because of the things I have mentioned and many others like them. I also have no doubt that you alienate thoughtful people by the 85 unspeakably wicked crimes your faction commits.
 90

God love me, I am amazed, time and again, at this: how you can have the gall to write that people are lying about you and that that is all your glory? Have you no shame? How can you stand yourself

<sup>329</sup> See Luther's Contra Henricum (WA 10.2: 215).

<sup>330</sup> arrows of children: See Ps 63:8(64:7).

<sup>331</sup> the friends . . . be: See Ps 138(139):17.

<sup>332</sup> memory . . . words: See Ps 9:7.

when you say that the murderers belonging to your sect are falsely accused when you know yourself they are guilty as charged, witness the uprisings all over Germany and the slaughter of so many thousands. Unbridled license rages to such an extent under pretext of freedom of the Gospel that there is hardly a city in most of Germany, hardly a town, countryside, house, or farm where your sect has not left bitter reminders of looting, rape, bloodshed, sacrilege, slaughter, fire, ruin, and devastation. When your sect commits such monstrous, sacrilegious crimes, Pomeranus, how can you chant to us so evangelically that this is our glory? You do not bother to make a rebuttal, you simply proclaim that you are blessed when men curse you. And you would be right if people were making up lies about you. You would be right if you were cursed because you did what was right. But no one could possibly invent anything about you worse than what you already teach and do, and so your argument is completely beside the point. How splendidly you preen yourself! You put it, of course, that you are blessed because men curse you for the sake of righteousness, when in fact both man and God curse you with perfect justice because of your iniquities, because of your crimes, your sedition, slaughter, pillaging, heresies, and pernicious schisms.

You are obviously encouraged because such things do not happen at Wittenberg, for it is remarkable how you seem to qualify your language by immediately adding:

But we make no defense if men elsewhere perform unchristian acts under the pretext of Christian liberty, since not everyone who claims for himself the name of Christ has put on Christ.<sup>333</sup>

How discreetly, how cautiously you put all that, Pomeranus—“if anyone” . . . “if anything” . . . “if elsewhere” . . . “if unchristian”—when you are well aware that it is almost everywhere and everything and everyone—everyone, that is, who belongs to your sect. You do things that are not only unchristian, but absolutely diabolic. If Wittenberg refrains from participating in those crimes, do you think that is sufficient reason for people to attribute any authority to your beliefs? After all, we can see that your beliefs stir up, endanger, and destroy all the rest of Germany. Who could believe that Wittenberg is pure and innocent when he sees that it is the fountain from which flows all the sewage and filthy muck that carries foul corruption and broadens out through all the earth?

But of course Wittenberg is innocent. It is simply the place where Luther pitched his camp—Luther, captain of evildoing, architect and artificer of evil, leader of an army of savages. In council with you and his other lieutenants he makes plans hour by hour, devising nothing but how to incite rebellions, subvert the faith, uproot religion, profane holy things, corrupt morals, prostitute virgins, and destroy virtue. Just as if it were a council of war, the signal is given, passwords devised, commands issued, and reinforcements dispatched. You hurled a burning torch on all of Germany. You lit the wildfire that is now consuming the world, and you keep on fanning the wicked flames with your poisonous breath. All this is too well known to be concealed, too widely circulated to be denied, and too destructive to be tolerated. So how can you write so sanctimoniously, Pomeranus, and say:

What surprises us is this: why is it that some people there are afraid to receive the holy Gospel of Christ because evil is spoken of us, not remembering that it behooves the Son of Man to be reproved by the world and the preaching of the cross to be esteemed foolishness?<sup>334</sup>

Stop wondering, Pomeranus. All of you, stop being so immensely and mistakenly pleased with yourselves. Do not be so insane as to want to form an opinion of all the people in Britain from two or three apostates and deserters of the faith of Christ. You know little about the common people. If you did, you would think differently. You know little about the bishops. If you understood what sort of men they are, you would abandon your audacious hopes. And because of his learning, you should at least have known that you could not take over and corrupt the authority of the King of this glorious realm. For he is as devout as he is invincible—completely invincible. He defeated your master long ago when Luther was warring against the sacraments. He defeated him by using overt scriptural evidence and irrefutable logic. So how can you be so confident as to hope to seduce his people? Is it because you dare to claim for yourself the title of Bishop of Wittenberg without the laying on of hands — which is contrary to Sacred Scripture, contrary to the teaching of the saints, contrary to the custom of the entire Church through all the ages? Besides bringing in other heresies, you dared to instruct the people of Wittenberg to ignore vows made to God, acting as if your instruction were wholesome and suited to your holy office. For although you were a priest and had taken the vow of chastity, you joined yourself to a female companion in lust. Did you think that opened the door and cleared the way for you to assume the office of Pope of the English, and to do it so grandly too! You speak as though every success the Gospels enjoy here depends completely on you. You would have us believe that the Gospel prospers when you are well received here, and that when you fall in disgrace, the cause of the Gospel is likewise set back.

You certainly are wrong about that! For the Gospel is not taken so lightly here, nor are you so highly regarded that it is either accepted or rejected because of you. Nor is the Son of Man reproved by us and the preaching of the cross esteemed as foolishness. In fact the cross of Christ is glorious to us Christians, though a stumbling block to the Jews and foolishness to the gentiles. It is utterly ridiculous to hear the Lutherans speak so highly of the cross when their christ (that is, Luther — a man deserving a few crosses himself) vomits such ungodly blasphemies against the cross of Christ, which bore his holy and venerable body during his Passion — or rather, our redemption. If anyone thinks I am inventing all this, he has only to read Luther's detestable sermon on the cross,<sup>335</sup> which is on sale almost everywhere, along with other still more sinful tracts by the same author and others, exuding their foul odor and hellish stench. But you act as if all your books fluttered down from heaven smelling of pure nectar, pure ambrosia, and so you are not ashamed to write:

What if the lies that men tell about us for Christ's sake were true? Would they therefore not accept the Gospel of salvation offered to them by God? What could be more foolish than to be more concerned with my wickedness than with your own salvation! Will you therefore be no Christian because I am a sinner?

Wonderful! You put that so well and so cleverly! Is it a lie to say that although you were a priest and had vowed to God never to marry, you have nevertheless taken a wife? Or to say that, although you want to be regarded as a bishop, you are a common fornicator every day of your life? Or is it a lie to say the same thing about your friend Lambert, who was a Franciscan, and many other Lutherans as well? Or is it a lie to say that Luther himself, when he was an Augustinian monk, engaged in whoredom, not marriage, with a nun dedicated to God for many years and then stolen from him? Or is it a lie to say that all of you introduce wicked, crazy heresies or to proclaim that your sect commits many disgraceful things throughout the world? Would that the miserable devastation of so many places and the pitiful destruction of so many thousands of people seduced by your teaching did not prove how true all these statements are.

But these manifold sins of yours should not be an obstacle to our receiving the Gospel of salvation from you. Would you have us believe that through you God first offered us the Gospel of salvation? The Gospel of Christ, the Gospel that the Evangelists wrote, the apostles preached, and the holy fathers of the Church interpreted, was not that the Gospel of salvation? Was no one saved from the time of Christ's Passion until this present moment, when God finally chose you to save the world and preach the Gospel of salvation to wretched mortals, corrupted and led astray until now by the apostles and Evangelists? You lie, Pomeranus, when you say that we lie about you and that the things we say are not true, for they are true indeed. Is it so odd, then, considering your wickedness, that we do not trust you enough or think you are the right sort of people to bring others health and salvation when you yourselves suffer from such horrible running sores? For if after all these years Christians still did not possess the true Gospel of Christ and if the whole Church were mistaken about the faith of Christ for so many generations, God would have undoubtedly chosen some good, holy men for his work of recalling the world from the flesh to a renewal of the spirit. In something as important as that God would undoubtedly also have performed miracles to encourage belief in what was being preached. He would not have been so careless as to choose to preach his faith those very men, and only those men, to whom he had already forbidden that right. For through the prophet God spoke to the sinner: “What right have you to speak of my laws and take my covenant upon your lips?”<sup>336</sup> Since God wanted all men to believe his holy preachers, why would he be so careless as not to do anything whereby people could or should believe them?

Luther claims it is a miracle that in such a short time so many Christians deserted the faith of Christ and went over to his heresies. To be sure, his heresies are absurd and crazy enough to make it seem like a portent of some sort that anyone with a spark of human intelligence would entertain such wild beliefs. As for people rushing headfirst into the life of freedom and sensual gratification he offers them—that seems about as much like a miracle as rocks falling downhill.

Now as for that question of yours, Pomeranus, why people do not follow Paul’s rule: “Test all things, and hold fast to what is good.”<sup>337</sup> That one sentence of Paul’s subverts everything you say. When we test all things, we discover that what you write is the worst, and we hold fast to the good. And the good we hold fast to is the writings of those men whose life and faith God indicates were pleasing to him. We reject your writings because they are contrary to the deeds and teaching of the holy fathers and, what is even more important, because they are contrary to the faith of the people of the whole Church through so many centuries. If God did not guide the faith of his Church, the authority of the Gospel would waver, and there would truly be no truth in the words whereby Truth promises he will be with her even to the end of the world.<sup>338</sup>

It would be useful now to consider a bit how carefully and tenderly you touch the sore spot in your teaching.

But, the less educated will say (you assert), “Who is able to understand all these different arguments? Men dispute about free will, about vows and monastic orders, about works of satisfaction, abuse of the holy Eucharist, the worship of saints, the whereabouts of the dead, and purgatory.”

Others say, “We are afraid that poison is hidden under all this disagreement.”<sup>339</sup>

You do not have it right, Pomeranus. No one is afraid that poison is hidden under all this disagreement. On the contrary, we see and we know that the poison is there, very real and apparent. You do not bother to discuss it soberly and rationally. You simply pontificate about it impudently and arrogantly. You always mock scholastic theology on the pretext that it is dangerous because it brings truth into doubt. But you assert that falsehood is absolutely true, even against the truth. The only thing you accept as truth is what theology proposes in the schools merely for the sake of argument.

In the schools men raise such questions as whether the will has any freedom, whether all things occur at random, whether they are ruled by fate, whether the unchanging will of the divine majesty has decreed all things from eternity in such a way that in the whole natural order he allows no possibility for anything to follow one alternative rather than the other, whether man’s free will and God’s foreknowledge contradict one another, whether Adam’s sin removed our free will, or whether it is removed by Christ’s grace. When these questions and others like them are proposed in the schools and are discussed calmly and for a pious purpose, the debate produces results that are quite useful. For theologians enter into debate together with no doubt as to the final outcome. They always carry around in their heads firm and unshakable conclusions about everything they discuss—the same conclusions that are impressed on the hearts of all the faithful by the teachings of the Christian faith, and many of them also by some public pronouncement of the the ordinary belief. Take people who have some shred of human intelligence. They are convinced that God, who makes all things, foresees all things. At the same time they also know from experience that they do what they do by their own free will and not from some external compulsion. Now when theologians bring reason or Scripture to bear on what they hold to be true and infallible, then they use their talents to advantage. They solve many problems by the inspiration of God, who assists devout endeavors, for which they give him thanks. They not only take an intellectual pleasure in this—one that is most pleasant, most honest, and I might even add most holy—they also give others the fruits of their teachings, which are not only sound, but well worth knowing. They shed light on passages of Scripture by comparing those that seem contrary to truth with other passages that are more easily understood. But suppose someone thinks a particular text in Sacred Scripture is so hard and difficult that no one, neither ancient nor modern, can interpret it satisfactorily so as to make it seem not contradictory to some common article of the Catholic faith. Then all of a sudden he recalls the advice of the holy father Augustine that there is either a mistake in the text or he hasn't followed the sense of the passage well enough. For no passage in Sacred Scripture ought to disturb me like that. If it seems to contradict what the Catholic Church of Christ has embraced as sure and undoubted articles of faith, I should not allow it to separate me and drive me away from the genuine, legitimate teachings of the Christian faith, since I am convinced that these teachings were written in the hearts of the faithful by the same Spirit who was present to the Evangelists as they wrote. And so whatever they wrote is consistent with the faith of the Church so long as it remains as it was written and can be understood in the same sense in which it was written. Even if there is a corrupt reading in the text or if the text itself is somewhat obscure, there is no reason to believe less firmly in what Christ taught his Church. Through the Holy Spirit he instructed the Church in all truth<sup>340</sup> and promised that he would be with her even to the end of time.<sup>341</sup> Christ will certainly see to it that the faith of the Church will not falter. This was a promise he obtained from the Father through prayer.<sup>342</sup> It will not falter through errors in the text, for he corrects these day after day through the devout labor of dedicated men; nor through ambiguities in the literal sense, for he explains these, at such times as he finds appropriate, through the pens of learned men; nor through the persecutions of tyrants, for he has subdued them through the victories of his martyrs; nor through the endeavors of heretics, for he has stopped their mouths through the books of the orthodox fathers; nor from the machinations of the devil, for on the cross he laid him low.

Reverence is not lost if in the course of a dispute reason seems to run counter to truth, for it is absolutely certain that since faith is sustained by divine revelation, it far surpasses the reason of mortal men. The less we are able to understand the nature and causes of things, the more pleasure we take in observing them. And so it is with the divine majesty: we are all the more caught up in sweet wonder at it, the more some things seem to disagree and conflict with one another, at the same time as we realize that they undoubtedly agree with one another and come together in harmony. So you see, Pomeranus, the schools are capable of examining these things harmlessly and not without profitable results. But you attack scholastic disputation as something that opposes truth and violates mystery. At the same time, however, you command everyone to believe without any serious discussion your own absurd conclusions and crazy heresies in opposition to all men and to God himself. And you demand that whatever foolishness Luther chooses to utter be considered irrefutable, and as the Greeks say, ἀκίνητον.<sup>343</sup> If anyone asks why you believe the dogmas of this crazy, impious man, he has to be satisfied with the answer αὐτὸς ἔφα, <sup>344</sup> and no wonder either, since Luther proclaims he is certain he got his dogmas from heaven. And though you have nothing to bring to bear against the judgment of the entire Church through all the ages except Luther's own inane inventions, nevertheless, Pomeranus, to make it seem that you have neatly built up your conclusions, you pretend that you have proved them all by the indisputable evidence of Sacred Scripture.

As if (you say) we deal in the enticing words of human wisdom and not the palpable evidence of Scripture, against which even the gates of hell have not yet been able to prevail. Or as if our adversaries brought forth anything against us except human statutes and traditions, which the Lord condemns in Isaiah 29 and Christ in Matthew 15.<sup>345</sup> What poison, then, are you afraid of, since we do nothing in secret and set all our works before the whole world to be judged?<sup>346</sup>

You put that very nicely, Pomeranus. As if there were no traditions of God, on which the Church of God relies in the sacraments and articles of faith.

<sup>340</sup> See Jn 16:13. <sup>341</sup> See Mt 28:20.

<sup>342</sup> See Jn 14:16. <sup>343</sup> "immovable, steadfast" <sup>344</sup> "He himself said it" is a proverbial expression, attributed to the disciples of Pythagoras when asked to give a reason for their beliefs. See Quintilian

11.1.27; Cicero, De natura deorum 1.5.10.

<sup>345</sup> Is 29:14; Mt 15:8–9 <sup>346</sup> CW 7: 398–400

Or as if the most illustrious King of England and other learned men as well had not proved this clearly to you by reason, Scripture, and the universal opinion of the orthodox fathers, to which no man among you as yet has uttered one word of reply. Or as if you proved everything by Scripture and not by your own fantastic glosses, twisting the authority of Sacred Scripture into your own sacrilegious dogmas against the opinions of all the most learned and most holy ancients. Or as if all heretics had not always done the same thing you do now: they administered their poison to the whole world and openly handed around the cup anointed with the honey of Scripture, which they proclaimed, just as boldly as you do now, to be perfectly clear.<sup>347</sup> For the Arians<sup>348</sup> once proclaimed the same thing the Lutherans do now: that Scripture was clearly with them, while their opponents depended only on human statutes which the Lord condemned. And all the other heretics proclaimed the same thing, especially the Pelagians.<sup>349</sup> You Lutherans are so stupid that when you try to avoid their Scylla, your error snatches you straight off to Charybdis.<sup>350</sup> You do not even try to understand that the Church relies in matters of faith on the traditions of God, not on the traditions of men. And so I am not certain I understand you well enough when you write that you deal in the palpable evidence of Scripture against which the gates of hell have not yet been able to prevail. When you say that you do not deal in the enticing words of human wisdom, that I understand quite well and confess it is absolutely true. But I am not certain how you want the rest of the statement to be taken. Do you mean that the gates of hell have not yet been able to prevail against the Scriptures themselves? Or do you mean that they have not yet been able to prevail against your propositions, which you trick out and clothe in Scripture so that they will be regarded as the Gospel of salvation, which is now first offered by you from on high, rejoicing that it is well received by some people even in Britain?

Actually it does not matter a great deal which one you mean, since it amounts to the same thing either way. The Church of Christ has never yet believed what you teach. It has always rejected it, cursed it, destroyed it by fire. If, then, your doctrines are true and confirmed by clear texts in Scripture, you have to admit that the gates of hell have continuously prevailed against God's Scripture. But if, on the other hand, what you say is true, that the gates of hell have never prevailed against the Scripture of God, then you admit that the faith of the Church has always been in agreement with God's Scripture.

But the faith of the Church has always been opposed to the sort of things you teach. And so, Pomeranus, you see, do you not, it follows that your famous beliefs are contrary to Scripture. Moreover, if you argue that the Church has always thought and believed the same thing you now believe (or rather what you now preach, for so help me God, I cannot imagine you believe what you preach) — tell me, I beg of you, what Church are you talking about? When did it exist before you came along? Where on earth was it located? Tell me that, and I will take you for great Apollo himself. For although some of your heresies had various champions at different times and different places, no one — no one people and no one individual — was ever so fundamentally irreligious and so stupid as to believe so many different, completely absurd heresies as you do. No one, that is, until Luther.

But perhaps you argue that there was always a scattered remnant who, though dispersed, nevertheless constituted the true Church even though they were so few as to be hidden from the world, so scattered as never to meet, so illiterate as never to write, and so dumb as never to speak. If so, you have to admit that the fathers, whom the Church of Christ venerates among the saints, always wrote against this Church of yours.

Or do you hope, Pomeranus, that all Christians are such clods that you can convince them of anything? In the Jewish synagogue God saw to it that the holiest men among them were held in esteem after their death so that the people would not be left in doubt about what models to imitate. That being so, would you have us believe that now, in the Church of his Son, God would allow all his holy and faithful people to lie in dishonor while he saw to it that those who were worshiped as saints should be men

<sup>347</sup> See Hilary, De Trinitate 4, and Liber ad Constantium Augustum 1.3 (PL 10, 559) <sup>348</sup> The heresy of Arianism, which maintained that Christ was created by the Father, was condemned at the Council of Constantinople in 381. <sup>349</sup> Pelagianism, which arose in the fifth century, promoted the belief that human will is capable of a sinless life without divine aid, minimizing man's need for Christ's sacrifice.

<sup>350</sup> Scylla . . . Charybdis: a mythological monster living on one side of a narrow channel and a whirlpool on the other side of the same narrow channel. See Homer, Odyssey Book 12.

who were heretics and fundamentally irreligious, who had seduced the whole world with their writings, who had drawn it away from the true meaning of the Gospel by their false preaching? Would 5 you have us believe that he adorned some of these men with martyrdom, distinguished them all with integrity of life, and never failed to render them illustrious through miracles, demonstrating their piety to the world through wholesome signs and tokens so that no one could doubt that their faith was
 10 pleasing to God? Tell me, do you really think God purposely did all this to deceive his own Church? Like it or not, Pomeranus, you have to admit that this is God's Church and that it had within it and 15 as its teachers the holy fathers whom we venerate. If you argue that they were all mistaken in matters of faith, then you have to admit what you denied before, that the gates of hell have prevailed against the Scriptures for more than a thousand years. But if
 20 you think you have to stick with what you said before, that the gates of hell have never been able to prevail against the Gospel, then you must also admit that the holy fathers were right in matters of faith. Once you have granted that, then no matter
 25 how much you squirm about, you are going to have to admit that what you bullheadedly force on us as the Gospel is completely wrong. For you are unable to deny that the fathers of the Church have already condemned what you teach.

30 It may be worth our while to learn how you rake up the diverse and far flung rubbish of your teachings in a neat little pile. For you go on to say:

And lest you plead as an excuse the variety of our teaching, let me say briefly that we teach but one 35 article of faith no matter how much we preach every day, no matter how much we write against our opponents so that they too may be saved. And this is that one article: Christ is our righteousness. For God made him our wisdom, right-
 40 righteousness, satisfaction, redemption. Whoever does not grant us this is no Christian; whoever agrees with us in this will soon give over all righteousness of man.<sup>351</sup>

45 The soul of brevity! You do not write anything, then, you do not teach anything except that Christ is our righteousness? Does this one holy pronouncement encompass all your dogmas, varied as they are, discordant with one another, absurd, and impious? If one were to grant you this, that Christ is our right-

 50 ousness, does he also have to admit that the bread in the Eucharist remains bread? That the Mass is of no use to anyone? That the whole Church has performed the sacrifice incorrectly up till now? That up to now it has used an impious and sacrilegious canon, and that the sacrament of ordination is an 55 empty lie? And will this follow logically: Christ is our righteousness, therefore a woman is fit to hear sins in the sacrament of confession? And a woman can consecrate the Body of Christ? And this: Christ is our righteousness, therefore there is no purgatory? And no free will? And no human law a Christian has to obey? Christ is our righteousness, therefore faith
 60 alone is sufficient for salvation, and there is no need for good works? And nothing can damn a Christian except his lack of faith alone? Christ is our righteousness, therefore a monk ought to take a wife? Do all these beliefs and many others just as absurd necessarily follow from the fact that Christ is our 65 righteousness? Why not? For if God made Christ your righteousness, what need have you to seek out and follow righteousness? If he was made your wisdom, what need have you to be as cunning as a serpent?<sup>352</sup> If he was made your satisfaction, what need have you to deliver your limbs as servants to right-
 70 ousness unto holiness as you delivered your limbs as servants to uncleanness unto iniquity?<sup>353</sup> If he was made your redemption, what need have men to ransom their souls by using their wealth?<sup>354</sup> After mentioning this article of faith, you explained it so well, believing you had proved it to the judges' satisfaction, that you immediately add:

Whoever agrees with us in this will soon give over all righteousness of man. There will be no trace left here of the Pelagian heresy, by which 85 (although the words are changed) they have been infected who boast that they are the only ones who are Christians. The sects that exist today will count for nothing, nor will all their trust in good works, which our self-justifiers have thrust upon us, rejecting the stumbling block of Christ's cross, peddling works instead of Christ. Against them 90 and against the entire kingdom of Satan we bring forth with Paul this most powerful argument: If we are made righteous by works and by our own free will, then Christ died in vain.<sup>355</sup> This righteousness which is Christ is testified to by the law and the prophets (Romans 3).<sup>356</sup> A man who follows his own righteousness, will, like the Jews, not arrive at true righteousness (Romans 9).<sup>357</sup> They are not able to submit to God's righteousness (Romans 10).<sup>358</sup> This righteousness of God is yours when you receive Christ through faith. For he did not die for his own sake or for his own sins, but for your sake and for your sins. Whatever else, therefore, you have tried in order to arrive at righteousness—that is, to become righteous and free from the judgment of God, from sin, death, and hell—will be hypocrisy, lies, and wickedness, no matter how it shines with a semblance of piety. For it will strive against the grace of God and deny Christ.<sup>359</sup>

I have no doubt, Pomeranus, that you think you put that extremely well. But you fail to see that all this brilliant discussion of yours is based on two fundamental lies. You use them shamelessly to slander the Church and make that sacrosanct preaching of yours seem like the true Gospel. In the first place you are absolutely incorrect to imply that we are infected by the Pelagian heresy, though our terminology is different.

You also lie when you say that we refused the stumbling block of Christ's cross, introduced a reliance on works and sects, and peddle works instead of Christ. To amuse yourself you call us at times self-justifiers and at other times braggarts who boast that they alone are Christians. Although nothing is more opposed to the teaching of the Church than to attribute anything to oneself, nevertheless Catholic Christians are permitted in the name of the whole Church in general to claim justifiably with a kind of holy pride that they are the only ones who are righteous, that they are the only ones who are Christian. For among men there is no holiness outside the Church, nor any Christian either.

But let me return to the subject at hand. The Church does not hold with Pelagius when he says that the strength and power of nature, along with some general influx of grace, are enough to enable a man to do good. The Church holds instead that special grace is needed for every good act. Similarly, the Church disagrees with you even more when you cunningly try to exalt the grace of God in order to destroy completely the force of man's free will. You say nothing about the freedom of the will except that "it exists only in name,"<sup>360</sup> to use your own words, that it accomplishes nothing, but is simply passive, that it is shaped by God in the same way wax is shaped by the hand of an artist. The Pelagians were completely wrong about all this, but you Lutherans are even more perniciously mistaken. Although the Pelagians attributed too much to nature, they nevertheless attributed the ultimate honor to God since they recognized him as the creator of nature. Moreover, they kept the need to pray for grace since they admitted that it is extremely difficult for nature to function alone and that it works more smoothly supported by grace. But you, on the contrary, leave no reason why we should give thanks to God for the gift of our nature. Our nature is such (if we were to believe you) that we would be better off without it, even after the gift of grace in baptism. For although our nature is such that we constantly slip and fall, it is not capable of rousing itself sufficiently to rise to God's offer of grace. It is not even able to make the effort. Then too, since you preach that our will is merely passive and does nothing whatsoever on its own, do you not destroy the possibility of all human endeavor and all attempts at virtue? Are you not obviously ascribing everything to fate? According to your sect, the will is not only evil in itself, it is not even able to turn toward the good. It is simply God's will that fashions one person for good while another remains evil. There is no reason other than that of one's nature, which one receives through no fault of his own. One who is elected to be good is so shaped and formed by grace that he does not do anything himself, not even cooperate. Just as a tree produces leaves and fruit, so when God works within the elect and nature, which is also his creation, works within the reprobates, the elect bring forth good and the reprobates evil. Now anyone can see that it follows according to your line of reasoning that free will is not free will. With no freedom of choice a man is no different from a tree. No evil can be imputed to man but rather God is necessarily the cause of all deeds, evil as well as good. God's most merciful nature is thought to punish the very sins it has committed. This concept of God is so wicked and so sacrilegious that I'll be damned if I would not rather be Pelagius ten times over than believe for a moment what Luther teaches. But the Church you condemn avoids the errors of both these heresies and condemns them both in turn. The Church believes that without grace man's will is incapable of performing good acts, but that grace is available to all like the light of the sun. Evil men neglect it when it is offered, good men embrace it, and both do what they do according to their own free will. Thus a man who is saved is saved by grace, and yet free will is not inoperative. I do not see anything except by light, and yet I assist the light to some extent when I open my eyes and focus them. If someone lowers a rope in a well and pulls out a man who could not get out by himself, would it not be true that the man in the well did not get out through his own power? And yet he contributed something of his own by hanging onto the rope and not letting it get away. The freedom of the will is similar to that. It can do nothing without grace. But when the divine goodness bestows grace liberally, the free will of a good man clings to it and cooperates with it properly. The free will of an evil man does not accept it and wears itself out in malice. This is what we believe, Pomeranus, and not the lie you tell of us, that we believe Pelagius, nor do we believe you, who are worse than Pelagius. We preserve the respect owed to divine grace and cut off the opportunity you afford vicious men to blame the stubborn malice of their own will on the unavoidable necessity of the divine will.

355 See Gal 2:21. 356 Rom 3:21
357 Rom 9:31 358 Rom 10:3

359 CW 7: 400 360 See Luther's Heidelberg theses of 1518 (WA 1: 354, 7: 142).

Now we will treat good works for a while. You are wicked and wrong on this point, and you wantonly, falsely slander the Church. You lie and say that she has given up the stumbling block of Christ crucified and teaches that one should have confidence in sects and good works, peddling works instead of Christ. First, concerning the religious orders, which you call sects and schisms, I do not think it a major crime if under Christ, as under a single general, different men serve under different leaders — military tribunes, as it were. While all of them lead a good life according to the rule and precepts of the Gospel, different religious orders nevertheless spend their time differently. Each in its own way is rich in various kinds of virtue, especially when one realizes that those rules of life which you condemn were discovered and handed down by saintly men. Religious orders have produced a great many men of extraordinary sanctity. Although some monks have not always lived up to their order and some orders have degenerated to the behavior of the world around them, nevertheless the purest segment of the Christian people have always been found in religious orders. The members of these orders are far from following anyone other than Christ, for they are the ones primarily who sell what they have and give it to the poor and take up the cross and follow Christ. Dedicating their entire lives to vigils, fasts, and prayer, and following the Lamb in chastity, they crucify the vices and desires of the flesh.

If this kind of life is contrary to the Gospel, as you would have it, then the life according to the Gospel would have to be contrary to it — a life, that is, in which one tenderly takes care of himself, eats well, drinks well, sleeps well, satisfies his lust, and melts with pleasure. If that is living the life of the Gospel, we certainly agree that your people lead a most Gospel-like life, except that they add to those splendid virtues a tyrannical violence and brutality worse than that of a wild beast. They rage against Christian friars dedicated to God more ferociously than any pagan tyrant ever did.

But now, as I said, let us come to good works. You put it that we peddle them instead of Christ. You are not embarrassed to write such things even when you know that we believe and teach that our works are not made good without God's mercy and bring no merit without the faith of Christ. And even then they are not in themselves deserving of heaven. (For the sufferings of this present time are not worth comparing with the glory that is to be revealed to us.)<sup>361</sup> It pleased the great kindness of the Creator, however, to place such a high value on our good works, which are cheap in themselves. Even when we have done everything, we are still unprofitable servants and have not done anything other than what we ought to do.<sup>362</sup> And yet he hires our labors at a high salary.

If, moreover, our works have no value at all — no matter if performed in faith, imbued with charity, aided by grace (for you know full well we admit that otherwise they are nothing) — if even so our works have no value, then why does the owner of the estate hire idle men to work in the vineyard for one denarius a day?<sup>363</sup> If works are of no help in freeing man from wrath, judgment, sin, death, and hell, why did the Baptist say, “Generation of vipers, who showed you how to flee the wrath to come? Bring forth fruits worthy of repentance”?<sup>364</sup> Why did the wise man say, “As water puts out fire, almsgiving puts out sin”?<sup>365</sup> Why did the apostle say, “If we judge ourselves, surely we would not be judged”?<sup>366</sup> And again, “As you have yielded your limbs to serve uncleanness and iniquity, so now yield your limbs to serve justice”?<sup>367</sup> Why did Christ say, “Do this and you will live”?<sup>368</sup> And finally, at the last judgment why will he reward those who performed works of mercy with heaven and reproach the wicked for omitting and neglecting them?<sup>369</sup>

If these things are not lies, Pomeranus (and I do not think they are if the Gospel is true), then you cannot escape the fact that what you write is a lie: you call it hypocrisy, untruth, impiety, a struggle against the grace of God, and an utter denial of Christ, no matter how it shines with the semblance of sanctity, if anyone makes any effort beyond faith — that is, if he joins to faith the works of charity, without which faith is dead, and if through both faith and works together he attempts to live a life of righteousness. A person who acknowledges that he cannot do good works without grace does not struggle against grace in trying to do good works. He does not, like the Pharisee, rely on works, for he knows they are worthless without faith and purchase no reward except through God’s sheer generosity. Those who are clearly opposed to grace and utterly deny Christ are the ones who exalt grace and trust in the faith of Christ only to make men lukewarm in doing good. They completely deny that good works have any goodness or merit in them whatsoever, whereas we condemn only the sinful reliance on works. When men are slow to do good, they quickly lose both faith and grace, especially in the present state of the world, when men have to be urged to see the value in good works almost more than in faith, without which works are of no avail. For you find far more who would rather believe well than do well.

But your complete inconsistency is enough to indicate what an evil cause you support. You speak in such confusion that you seem intentionally to guard against anyone’s understanding you. Each succeeding word contradicts the one before. For after a bit you go on to say:

But perhaps you will ask what we think and teach about morals, the worship of God, the sacraments, and things of that sort. I answer that Christ is our righteousness and also became our teacher. Whatever he has revealed to us with his own mouth, this we teach, even as he commanded [in the] last chapter of Matthew.<sup>370</sup>

So do we, Pomeranus. We profess that and teach it too. But tell me, is that all you will teach? I mean, will you unteach everything except what Christ taught with his own mouth? Will you unteach whatever God taught before the birth of Christ through Moses and the prophets except for those portions Christ taught again with his own mouth? Will you unteach whatever Christ taught the Church through so many holy fathers, evangelists, martyrs, and apostles unless he taught it with his own mouth?

But tell me, where did Christ with his own mouth teach you that we should believe only what he taught with his own mouth? Tell me, where did he teach with his own mouth the beliefs you teach to the whole world? Tell me where he taught with his own mouth that man has no free will. Where did he teach with his own mouth that one who has sworn a vow of chastity has to take a wife? Where did he teach with his own mouth that Luther’s girlfriend is equal to the mother of Christ? Where did he teach with his own mouth that the Mass is of no use to the dead? Where did he teach with his own mouth that there is no purgatory, but that the souls of the dead sleep until the day of the last judgment? Where did he teach with his own mouth that his cross should be taken down and hidden away in the shadows somewhere lest gold be wasted in adorning it — gold which otherwise, of course, would go directly to the poor?

I think Christ did not teach these things to Luther with his own mouth when he said, “The poor you will always have with you.”<sup>371</sup> But Brother Judas, Luther’s brother, taught it with his own mouth

363 See Mt 20:1–16. 364 Lk 3:7–8
365 Eccles 3:33(30) 366 1 Cor 11:31

367 Rom 6:19 368 Lk 10:28
369 See Mt 25:31–46.

370 CW 7: 402; see Mt 28:20.
371 Mt 26:11

when he said, “What is the sense in all this waste? It could have been sold for a lot of money and given to the poor.”<sup>372</sup>

5 See here, Pomeranus, when you insist that people believe only what Christ taught with his own mouth, you take away everything else God taught the Church through the Holy Spirit and you end up teaching things Christ never taught, things no decent man can tolerate.

10 For you go on to say, “First of all Christ taught that this is the work of God, that we believe in him whom the Father sent us.”<sup>373</sup> We allow that that is perfectly true. But we do not allow the truth of the conclusion which you draw from it and which is 15 the only reason you bring it up. For you mention it in order to persuade people covertly that faith alone is sufficient. You touch it timidly, concealing the greater part of your mystic teaching. You conceal it in vain, however, since it has been spread 20 abroad through the whole world in the books of your master. Luther treats this opinion of your school more openly and explains it somewhat more boldly. He writes plainly that no sin can damn a Christian except the sin of unbelief. According to 25 the promise of God, we will be saved by faith, and if faith remains or if faith returns, all sins are immediately swallowed up by faith. It is not necessary to confess one’s sins or be sorry for one’s transgressions or compensate for evil by doing good, for Luther has obviously done away with all these things.
30 As I said, you touch on this more timidly than Luther and shrewdly try to avoid the odium of such an assertion. You hide the fact that you preach the doctrine of faith so as to lure people to vice and unteach virtue. When you say that faith alone is sufficient, you want it to seem as though you mean that 35 if one has faith he will naturally shun vice and embrace virtue.

40 Even if that were the case, this uproar of yours and this raging against good works would still be extremely stupid. If faith necessarily produces works that are good, what do you think you are doing when you argue against good works? Are you not running on at the mouth against the product of 45 faith? But if there is no possibility of good works—a position your faction obviously holds—then you are not consistent when you say that one who has faith is like a good tree that necessarily bears good fruit in its season.

But if it is so true that one who has faith will necessarily produce good works, why does the apostle
50 say, “If I have such faith as will move mountains but have not charity, I am as nothing”? Why did he say, “If I have such faith as to deliver my body to be burned but have not charity, I gain nothing”?<sup>374</sup> 55

All that would have been said in vain if faith did not exist apart from charity. Thus, “Faith without works is dead” and “Demons believe, and shudder”<sup>375</sup> . . . but there is no sense in my quoting from 60 the Epistle of James. Since it inconveniences you, you no longer consider it to be apostolic. But Adam, I suppose, believed in God, for as the apostle said, “Adam was not deceived,”<sup>376</sup> and yet he sinned. If it is consistent with faith to do evil, it is no doubt consistent with faith not to do good. 65

But perhaps you do not believe the apostle, since you believe only what Christ said with his own mouth. Very well then. Did Christ not say with his own mouth that many people would come to him
70 someday and say, “Lord, Lord, did we not prophesy in your name and in your name cast out demons and do many mighty deeds in your name?” “And then I will declare to them,” he said, “I never knew you. Depart from me, all you evildoers.”<sup>377</sup> Is it not clear from 75 this passage that faith—even a faith great enough to perform miracles—does not bring forth good fruit in certain people? Such people are not through their great faith good trees. They are fig trees, utterly dry, ready to be cut down to the root and cast in the fire. Thus, Pomeranus, it is not true that faith alone is 80 sufficient and that whoever has faith will necessarily bring forth the fruit of good works.

But why do I quote Christ to you? Why not quote Luther to a Lutheran? Since you think his authority is infallible, listen to what he says: “Nothing can 85 condemn a man to hell except the sin of unbelief. If faith remains or if faith returns, all other sins, he says, will be swallowed up by faith.”<sup>378</sup>

If he had thought about it for ten years, I do not see how he could have explained it more clearly. He 90 believes that as long as faith remains whole and unharmed, one can commit any sort of sin he wants to. I certainly do not see what words he could have used to explain this more clearly. For you cannot twist these words—if faith remains—to mean anything other than that he thinks a man can commit sins and still have faith. And you can easily see how it follows that faith does not necessarily produce good works, since it is capable of existing side by side with evil.

Get out of here, then, with your pretexts, Pomeranus, trying to trick out your ungodly beliefs so that it seems as though when you command faith alone you are issuing a command to perform all the good in the world, as though you believed that faith necessarily not only prevents sin but also produces virtue. As you heard, Luther quite openly teaches that a person can commit sin and still have his faith remain unharmed. Not only that, but he himself remains unharmed because of the inherent merit of his faith. “For if faith remains,” Luther says, “all sins will be swallowed up by faith.”

Perhaps now you are embarrassed by your teacher when you see his evil belief stripped bare of its cover and revealed for what it is. Perhaps you want to appear to believe something more pious than that. If so, Pomeranus, you have certainly not expressed it cleverly enough, for it is clear as day that you are at least equal to him in impiety, if you do not surpass him. For first you run on at the mouth against good works, using some statements from Scripture, such as: “If we are made righteous by works and by our own free will, Christ died for us in vain.” You used a little free will of your own in that verse when you added the business about free will. After all, you had to keep up your role as a sacrilegious forger of Sacred Scripture. Anyone can see that that particular passage does not denigrate the value of good works. It simply means that Christ would have died in vain if we were made righteous by works without faith. For Christ did not die in vain if works avail nothing without faith, even if they are worth a great deal when united with faith. I need not mention that the apostle said this about the works of the Mosaic Law.

Then you went on to add that “a man who follows his own righteousness, will, like the Jews, not arrive at true righteousness.” And this: “they are not able to submit to God’s righteousness.” You added the phrase “like the Jews” on your own hook once again for fear of quoting Scripture more truthfully than a Jew. Now, the words of Paul apply to those who believe that righteousness comes only from the works of the law without the faith of Christ, or to those who are lifted up by vain pride in their own works. But what do these words matter to Christians, who believe that no works, no matter how good or how many, can make a person partaker of heaven unless those works are performed in faith? Even so, good works cannot be performed without grace, and they cannot earn eternal happiness in and of themselves. It is God’s generosity alone that grants the immense reward of heaven, which is so far beyond what men deserve. He freely agrees to give it and he bestows it on us.

Now that you have attacked good works with such skillful weapons, thinking you have overwhelmed what you have not even touched, you pass on to the righteousness of God, which is Christ. You collect testimony from the law and the prophets, as if anyone ever denied it. And why do you do that? Just to get rid of and destroy the concept of good works and lure everyone over to your doctrine of faith alone.

“This righteousness of God,” you say, “is yours when you receive Christ through faith.” Very true. There is nothing wrong with what you say except that you reject good works just as earnestly as you commend faith.

Now we admit that what you set down after that is absolutely true: “For he did not die for his own sake or for his own sins, but for your sake and for your sins.” In your case, though, we are afraid that you bring it up only to encourage, by reliance on faith alone, man’s freedom to sin and the desire to avoid the sanctity of a more disciplined life. I do not deny that I would seem eager to interpret you incorrectly, were it not that what you write immediately following suggests something more than a slight hint of this suspicion. You make it perfectly obvious. For you say:

Whatever else, therefore, you have tried in order to arrive at righteousness—that is, to become righteous and free from the judgment of God, from sin, death, and hell—will be hypocrisy, lies, and wickedness, no matter how much it shines with a semblance of piety. For it will strive against the justice of God and deny Christ.<sup>379</sup>

Those words make it obvious that you teach faith in order to unteach good works. On this point I shall make it perfectly clear that although Luther alone exceeds everyone else in impiety, you alone surpass him by far. As I said before, for fear that people would think there was anything to care about except lustful living, he wrote that faith swallows up all sins.

You vote for that notion by mentioning some virtues you claim to teach (which I will deal with a little later on and show how false your claim really is), and then immediately adding:

And because we are still in the flesh, whatever good we do not do or do not do well enough, whatever sins we still commit, we teach with Christ that one should pray constantly that his sins will be forgiven, just as he taught us to pray: forgive us our trespasses.<sup>380</sup> And because of this trust in God, we teach that whatever sin still remains in the flesh will not be imputed to us. For I discover in me—that is, in my flesh—no good thing. But I give thanks to God that Christ came not for the righteous, but for sinners. And publicans and prostitutes will enter into the kingdom of heaven before self-righteous Pharisees.<sup>381</sup>

You say the same thing Luther did, Pomeranus: that a man cannot be damned except through unbelief, since faith alone swallows up all other sins. You explain the same thing another way by saying that a person's sins are not imputed to him if he has such trust in God that he believes that because of his faith alone his sins will not be imputed to him. But you also say you teach that prayer is united with faith, namely this prayer: Forgive us our trespasses.

And so by these two things, by faith alone along with the briefest possible prayer, you have established that the sum total of all sin will either not be imputed to you or else will be absolved. And so you have opened up for mortals a wonderful shortcut to heaven by means of a completely debauched life on earth. In fact you are such compassionate people that you take away all need for men to weep with sorrow for their sins or endure the irksomeness of confession and the unpleasantness of satisfaction. I am not distorting any of this or twisting its interpretation. That is clear from your own words and the words of your master when he writes about the sacrament of penance in his Babylonian Captivity.<sup>382</sup> You both prove what I say plainer than day.

It is clear to everyone, then, that in Luther's opinion and in yours also, Pomeranus, faith alone is sufficient for salvation not only without good works, but even when accompanied by immorality and sin. But as I began to say a little before, you were not satisfied with that amount of impiety. You decided you had to go on and not stop until you taught not only that good works were completely negligible, but also that they should be carefully avoided because they would be harmful and would alienate us from God. Here are your words, which I have already referred to:

This righteousness of God is yours when you receive Christ through faith. For he did not die for his own sake or for his own sins, but for your sake and for your sins. Whatever else, therefore, you have tried in order to arrive at righteousness—that is, to become righteous and free from the judgment of God, from sin, death, and hell—will be hypocrisy, lies, and wickedness, no matter how it shines with a semblance of piety. For it will strive against the grace of God and deny Christ.<sup>383</sup>

I will not use rhetoric to attack the wickedness of your words. For there is no need for rhetoric to make a good man hate someone who is so full of the breath, so full of the hissing of the ancient serpent, so full of the raging fury of hell that he would not hesitate to blaspheme openly, shamelessly, and maliciously against all other virtues except faith alone by designating and calling them hypocrisy and wickedness, no matter how much they shine like piety, and by contending that they not only oppose Christ's grace but completely deny Christ himself.

I ask you, Pomeranus, when you say these things, are you not simply telling us that God the Father sent his only begotten son to earth to teach men that he came to free them from all work and worry about virtue? That he came to grant them permission and complete freedom to give themselves up to all kinds of debauchery? And then, after they had led that sort of life on earth, he would give them eternal happiness in heaven, only demanding in return that no one hesitate to trust that promise of his, for fear perhaps that if anyone trusted less, he might become either a better or a less bad person?

5 These beliefs of yours, Pomeranus, are not only wicked, they are absurd. If you had not expressed your opinion explicitly, no one would believe you could be so beastly, since you are, after all, a man, not a beast. I actually put in a good bit of thought and effort trying to find anything that would make
10 it at least seem as though you believe something different, something neither good nor honest but still a good deal less destructive and sacrilegious.

I applied myself to it diligently, for your sake as well as my own: for your sake, because I was extremely ashamed for you and because I pitied you; for mine, because I wanted to make it perfectly clear to everyone that I still have the same disposition I have always had—I would like to interpret everyone's writings in the best and kindest light 20 possible. But I could neither discover nor imagine anything to mitigate what is not in fact merely an opinion about your absurd impiety but rather positive knowledge of it fixed in men's minds by your own explicit language.

25 While I was trying everything I could, leaving no stone unturned, I thought to myself, what about this? When Pomeranus says, "it is hypocrisy to seek anything other than faith," suppose he does not mean that it is hypocrisy to possess other virtues besides faith. Suppose he means it is hypocrisy to put 30 some other virtue in the place of faith, some virtue in which an individual places his trust and reposes his hope without the faith of Christ.

But right away this interpretation seemed to me so shameless that I could never bear the shame of 35 defending it. I saw that everyone would immediately contradict me and say that I had wasted my time in thinking up a dishonest and ridiculous way of explaining it. They would want to know right
40 away, Pomeranus, how you could mean that when you know that everyone you criticize believes the same thing.

For they would say, of all the people he writes against, whom he calls self-justifiers, whom he criticizes as Pharisees, is there anyone who believes that 45 virtue is of value without faith? And so, whether we want to or not, we have to admit, Pomeranus, that that is the last thing you believe.

But perhaps you will want it to seem as though this is what you meant: you did not forbid anyone 50 to pursue any virtues other than faith alone. You simply wanted to warn people against convincing themselves that any of all the other virtues or any work of man, however well performed, however shaped and formed by faith, will be of any impor-
55 tance at all in attaining salvation or avoiding the punishment of hell. On the contrary, if someone decides to do good with the idea that it will help him either obtain heaven or avoid the flames of hell, he not only undoes himself and deceives himself
60 completely, but he will also lose felicity and fling himself headlong into hell precisely because of that belief. For it is as though he had denied Christ.

If that is what you want us to think, Pomeranus, are you not leaping, as they say, from the frying pan into the fire?<sup>384</sup> For I ask you straight off, Pomeranus, if someone fails to do good works and commits sin, does that not close the gates of heaven and open to him the gates of hell? If you deny this, you leave no one in doubt (though you 70 would very much like to conceal it) that you are the one who beckons the whole world to vice by leaving sins unpunished. If you grant that, as you must, then you will never be able to deny that if the wickedness of our actions plunges us down into 75 hell, then the goodness of our actions, which we perform with the assistance of God, helps us out of hell and makes us more or less suitable for the reward of heaven promised to us. For it would be completely absurd to persuade yourself that God, 80 whose nature is so merciful, would punish sin but offer no reward for virtue.

But we have already shown how foolish this heresy is and how it overtly contradicts several passages of Holy Scripture. We admit that no one should 85 be proud of his virtue. He should recognize that good works are rewarded not in and of themselves because of their own nature, but because of the value God generously places on them. For no one is able to perform good works through his own nature alone without a special gift of grace. Even then
90 one should fear that what he does may be infected by some secret vice. We can, however, be hopeful about our good works, and we ought always to try not to be saved by faith alone, but to avoid evil and do good and in that way to come to life eternal. 95

God did not promise that infinite and inconceivable reward to anyone lacking faith, and by the same token he did not promise it to anyone who has faith alone. There are more places than one where 5 more than one apostle states that faith alone (no matter how great) is of no use, and that without good works it must be considered completely dead.

Moreover, does not the following passage of Scripture show clearly that when good works are performed in faith they receive an eternal reward? For it is written, “the ransom of a man’s soul is his wealth.”<sup>385</sup> And what about this passage from the gospels, “Give alms and all things are clean unto you”?<sup>386</sup> What about Christ’s words concerning the 15 judgment to come, where he says he will give the wages and reward of eternal bliss for acts of generosity to the poor?<sup>387</sup>

You see, Pomeranus, the witness of Holy Scripture is so self-evident that no matter how you twist 20 it, you will never be able to find anything to contradict it. But perhaps you are such a holy person that you cannot bear to hear the words “wages” and “reward.” You would prefer man to serve God freely and expect no reward in return. Otherwise one 25 would be a hireling and not a son. For hirelings do not willingly work for nothing. They render service only for a price.

Who would not confound heaven and earth, sea and sky when he sees a Lutheran bishop—a man
 30 who has broken his vow, shattered his faith, violated the chastity of his priesthood, who wallows in continual incest, which he prefers to call marriage, who shakes his ass as he preaches about virtue—suddenly pontificate about the grave and weighty
 35 rules and regulations concerning the worship of God as if he were sent down to us from heaven? No one, he says, should expect or look for any reward for his good deeds. If anyone desires or hopes for reward, he should not be regarded by Christ as a 40 Christian because he is a hireling and not a son.

Pomeranus is such a holy little saint, far beyond the ordinary measure of saintliness! I see that he is ashamed to be included among those hired hands 45 the house-holder pays a denarius to work in his vineyard.<sup>388</sup> His spirit is so truly highborn that he would rather die on the gallows outside the vineyard than work inside it for one denarius. See how he looks down from his perch and despises the prophet for having the ignoble mentality of a slave because he 50 was not ashamed to say in public that he served God for what he hoped to receive in return.<sup>389</sup>

Meanwhile our foresighted father does not see what a tight place he has squeezed himself into and gotten himself stuck. For he either hopes for no reward and expects no return for his faith, thus proclaiming that faith is just as unprofitable and unrewarding as the good works he spoke about earlier, 55 or else he expects a reward for his faith and thus falls into the same danger that made him shudder at the idea of a reward for good works—the fear, that is, of putting his faith out to hire. 60

Pomeranus, perhaps, would reply that the reward of heaven is not granted even to faith in its own nature, but proceeds entirely from the generosity of God: since God has so ordained and promised,
 65 there is no doubt that heaven awaits us. Nevertheless one should not believe in God merely to seek the reward he has promised to those who believe in him. We should approach him with the idea that even if we were to obtain no advantage we would 70 still have faith in his Word and worship his ineffable majesty. If this is what Pomeranus were to answer, I would have to admit that his reply was as truthful and reverent as it was completely beside the point.

I imagine, however, he is not such a fool as not 75 to understand that nothing he said in this discourse about faith would not apply equally as well to works. For we do not say that works are capable of laying claim to heaven in and of themselves, but rather that God has generously promised the same 80 thing for our works that he has promised for our faith. That is to say, he will give the gift of heaven to those who have the capacity for both faith and good works and in whom both are joined together.

On the other hand, those who are assisted by 85 God’s grace and have the capacity for both, but rely on only one or the other—that is, either faith alone or works alone—do not proceed on the path of life. They have lost their way and go backward.

Besides, Pomeranus, it does not hurt someone to 90 busy himself with fasting, chastity, prayer, and the other virtues which you and your friend Luther try to demolish and destroy. There is no reason why that should prevent him from reaching, at times, such piety that it seems as though he would do all those things even if he knew God would not reward his constant efforts.

That is certainly a pious attitude. I confess that such thoughts are holy and greatly to be desired. And I not only contend that they apply both to faith and good works, I also claim that anyone who preaches as you do, Pomeranus, that good works are of no avail, that good works are not rewarded, that good works are of no help in avoiding hell, and that they obstruct grace and utterly deny Christ—anyone who preaches that, I say, not only tries to make people cold and slack toward good works, regarding them as useless and sterile. He also cuts the desire to do good out of men’s hearts and casts it away as if it were deadly, diseased tissue. And in order to seduce the common people to his beliefs, he panders to them with lust and licentiousness, allowing them a safe berth and easy opportunity to perform all sorts of shameful things.

That is evidently what you have in mind, Pomeranus. But since you saw yourself bringing it out in the open by the language you use, quoted above, you began to be afraid. Your intentions were becoming too transparent and perhaps too odious. You were afraid that even the wicked and evil might think it unbearable that an absurd, good-for-nothing wretch like you has finally appeared on the scene and has dared, against the common understanding of all these many centuries, to promote vice and assault virtue so violently. So you have been forced to contradict yourself by teaching that, in addition to your obvious persuasions to vice and dissuasions from virtue, you Lutherans have some virtues of your own. You do this to hide your poisoned sting, though it sticks out now clearly enough for everyone to see.

Your falsehoods will become even more obvious as soon as we have had a chance to winnow your words, but they are clear enough from the doctrines of your sect. Your own words, which we have examined above, permit no ambiguity. At the moment it may be worthwhile to see how you clothe with a handsome, beautiful rind the rotten, totally decayed flesh of your fruit. For you speak thus:

Whoever believes in him is a good tree, and cannot fail to bear good fruit in its season: not the fruit imagined by hypocrisy, but the fruit which the spirit of Christ produces there of its own accord.<sup>390</sup> For those who are moved by the spirit of Christ are the sons of God.<sup>391</sup> Such a one will adore God soberly, piously, and justly, in spirit and truth, not in the elements of this world, in food, clothing, and other hypocrisy. About the sacraments he will believe what Christ taught and established. He will influence his neighbors with instruction, advice, prayer, material possessions, even at the cost of his life. And this not only for friends, but also for enemies. Such are the things Christ taught us; the nature of the spirit draws the hearts of believers to these things; and these are the things we teach must be performed. And because we are still in the flesh, whatever of these we do not do or do not do well enough, and whatever sins we still commit, we teach with Christ that one should pray constantly that his sins will be forgiven, just as he taught us to pray: forgive us our trespasses. And because of this trust in God, we teach that whatever sin still remains in the flesh will not be imputed to us. For I discover in me—that is, in my flesh—no good thing. But I give thanks to God that Christ came not for the righteous, but for sinners. And publicans and prostitutes will enter into the kingdom of heaven before self-righteous Pharisees, despite the fact that wicked backbiters grumble that we teach otherwise. God says through Moses, “Whoever will not hear that prophet (meaning Christ), I will take vengeance on him.”<sup>392</sup> Let the enemies of the Gospel hear this judgment of God against them. And the Father cries aloud over Christ, “Hear him.”<sup>393</sup> And Christ, “My sheep will hear my voice and not the voices of strangers.”<sup>394</sup>

We will see a little further on whether these words that seem so saintly are in fact as saintly as they seem. That one must pray for forgiveness for his sins—it amazes me that you bring that up as part of this new teaching of yours. You insult us quite often by calling us Pharisees and self-justifiers. You sound as though we never said the Lord’s Prayer or admitted that we are sinners. But it amazes me even more that you advise people to pray and do the sort of things you mention when you say, “And these are the things we teach must be performed.”

Why do you persuade people to do anything if there is no free will? Why do you urge me to pray, to give my neighbor good advice, enlarge his mind with learning, assist him with material goods, and not spare my own life if I can be of help to others? Why recommend all this if I am not able to do any of it? You simply ought to pray to God to perform all this in me. You should not even ask me to try to do these things, for according to you, even with the help of grace, I do not cooperate. I simply accept it all passively.

Who urges a stone to shape itself into a statue, the clouds to rain, or the earth to bear crops? If everything is caused by fate and nothing accomplished by man himself, as you Lutherans firmly hold, then there is no reason at all for you to rouse men to virtue and castigate wrongdoing. You also have no grounds for objecting to your opponents, since they have no free will and are driven by fate to do what they have to do. But perhaps you would reply that what you write is not voluntary but dictated by the promptings of fate.

I am also amazed, Pomeranus, that you urge people to do so many of the same things that we urge them to do. If you really do what you claim to, you recommend that they perform good works. So why pick out good works as your specific target to babble on about? If you despise them, why recommend them? If you recommend them, why despise them?

But perhaps you permit people to do good works, but forbid them to call them that. If so, why disallow the term when even God uses it? “This woman,” he says, “has performed a good work for me.”<sup>395</sup> Or perhaps you object because it is called the work of man, even though it is good. Let us call Christ to witness, since you write that you believe only what he says. Did he not say, “the woman has done a good work”? Did he not say the same to the Jews, whom you resemble: “If you are the children of Abraham, do the works of Abraham”?<sup>396</sup>

You require clear evidence from the Scripture for all your beliefs; so why do you keep shifting ground in the face of these perfectly plain passages of Scripture? How often does Christ command and forbid? What good are these passages if we do nothing? “I was hungry,” he says, “and you gave me to eat. I was thirsty, and you gave me to drink. I was a stranger, and you welcomed me.”<sup>397</sup>

Christ says people gave him these things and welcomed him. But you deny it. You say God did it all, and the people simply permitted God to work in them. Christ reproached cruel people for their harshness, saying they did not feed the hungry, disregarded the thirsty, and despised the stranger under the open sky. How stern Christ is to make those charges if they are not able to do any of these things even when assisted by grace or when, through no fault of their own, grace is withheld.

What do you Lutherans say to that? Nothing at all. You simply collect certain passages of Scripture, whatever seems to strip man of freedom and imply that God is the source of our sins! Then, either misquoting the verses or misunderstanding them, you trumpet your victory over the Pharisees and the self-justifiers. At the same time, you dishonestly ignore all the other passages of Scripture that overwhelm your order of battle and destroy it, constantly chanting about the places that support what you believe. You have nothing at all to say about the scriptural quotations that either explain the ones you gathered or are cited in opposition to them. A person would have to be crazy to think that Luther did a good job in responding to the passages cited by the author of the Treatise in Favor of Free Will—an extremely learned man<sup>398</sup> who deserves much thanks from the Church of Christ. Luther’s reply, in the book entitled The Slavery of the Will, did no more than reveal clearly how his own will was enslaved to a raving demon when he wrote that book.

For what does Luther say in reply to this perfectly obvious passage in Scripture, “If you would enter into life, keep the commandments”?<sup>399</sup> Or what does he say about other passages everywhere in Scripture, perfectly transparent in meaning, that testify to the freedom of the will? Only that they were all said ironically. That God commanded man to do something precisely because he knew man could not do it is such a crazy idea that you would be hard put to find someone who would not laugh at a stupid answer like that. The only ones who could possibly take it seriously are those who want to be free to seek their own destruction, gladly embracing the idea of fate to defend their sinfulness. Anyone else would mock and scorn that vain man’s insane boasting. And all the while he runs around with a sardonian laugh trumpeting victory, trophies, triumphs, claiming his reply is so perfect that neither devil nor angel could talk him down. It is easy for a wretch who babbles insane nonsense to shout in his madness that he has argued so brilliantly that no one could possibly refute him.

What he replies to the Treatise seems absurd even to Luther himself. He knows ahead of time that it will be condemned. He knows it is capable of provoking only laughter or anger in anyone other than the partisans of his own heresy. He demonstrates this most clearly when he admits in his reply to the Treatise that no one can be won over or persuaded of anything unless he has drunk in the Spirit by reading his books.<sup>400</sup> What is that if not admitting that to all others his reply will clearly appear to be what it is in fact, namely absurd, insane, sacrilegious? Only those who have had the wool pulled over their eyes by their love and affection for the Lutheran heresy will find anything very pretty about it. By reading Luther's books they become possessed by the same spirit that makes him tremble with raging madness and, once they have rejected the faith of Christ, drives them mad too.

So you see, Pomeranus, how well you handle the passages of Scripture cited against you in favor of free will. You either dissemble completely or reply to them in the craziest way, while citing other passages that support you against the Church. Some of these are hyperbolic, but all of them taken together (as the holy fathers of the Church persistently attest in their interpretation) simply indicate that certain people are finally deprived of grace because of some enormous depravity of the will. God is said to make these people hard because he has decided never again to offer them grace, which softens hearts of stone. The Scripture you cite also means that no mortal is capable of anything without God — all of which we obviously agree with.

For who would deny what truth itself affirms when it says, "Without me you can do nothing,"<sup>401</sup> and "No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him."<sup>402</sup> But you are so far gone into madness that you contend that man is capable of absolutely nothing, even with God's help. You contend that man does not come to the Father by being drawn to him, but only by being dragged involuntarily. You say that man does not even make an effort to rise up with the one who draws him. Christ, on the other hand, clearly states that he is always ready to draw men to him, but not someone who is not willing to be drawn. "How often would I have gathered your children together," he says, "as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, and you would not."<sup>403</sup>

But even where Christ seems to make the least of human activity, so as to put a check on human arrogance — even there he indicates the strength and freedom of our will. "When," he says, "you have done all that is commanded of you, then say, 'We are unworthy servants. We have done only what was our duty.'"<sup>404</sup> See, you brag that you believe in Christ alone, and now you do not even believe in him. He tells us that we act, and you on the contrary deny what he says and assert that we are merely passive.

Go and brag now, Pomeranus, that you teach whatever Christ said with his own mouth. But this is what really puzzles me. You teach that a person should influence his neighbors with prayer and advice, that he should assist them with material possessions and even at the cost of his own life. But what do you mean by this teaching if everything you mention is not only completely worthless so far as judgment, sin, death, and hell are concerned, but leads straight down to hell? For that is what you wrote a little above: "It is hypocrisy, lying, and wickedness, and a striving against grace, and a denial of Christ for a man to attempt anything to free himself from sin, death, and hell except faith alone."

If that is how things are, why not teach the doctrine of faith alone? If faith alone is sufficient or if good works necessarily proceed from faith, why bother to teach good works at all? Take a man standing in the sunlight. Who would urge him to cast a shadow, since he will cast one whether he wants to or not as long as he stands in the sun?

So you see, Pomeranus, this teaching of yours is in many ways so horribly at odds with itself that one part contradicts the other. But you want it to seem harmonious so as to be accepted unconditionally as the new gospel. The problem is you are teaching one thing from the heart while wanting to seem as though you are really saying something else.

You seriously preach and contend as strongly as you can that everyone should be convinced the only true freedom is in reliance on faith alone — freedom

400 See Luther's letter to Erasmus in De servo arbitrio (WA 18: 601–2). 401 Jn 15:5

402 Jn 6:44 403 Mt 23:37; Lk 13:34–35
404 Lk 17:10

from every care and worry about all the other virtues, safe and sure of heaven despite a life of license and sin. Still, in order to deflect a little of the hatred inspired by such insane teaching, you insert in passing now and then something contrary to what you wrote before, thus raising the question of whether your true beliefs are as crazy as what you write. But you have not handled it all that cleverly, Pomeranus. The cosmetic coating of virtue you carefully applied can easily be wiped off. To let you see that this is no sooner said than done, we will consider right now what kind of fruit the people of your faction cannot but bring forth, for they are, as you say, such good trees.

Whoever believes in Christ (you say) is a good tree and cannot fail to bear good fruit in its season. Not the fruit imagined by hypocrisy, but the fruit which the spirit of Christ produces there of its own accord. For those who are moved by the spirit of Christ are the sons of God.

Many of these are Christ's own words, Pomeranus, and if they were published by someone of orthodox faith, they would be wholesome enough. But since you mix them all up with your own opinions and turn everything to your own advantage by twisting them into Lutheran doctrine, we are properly led to suspect even honey itself when offered by a Lutheran for fear it is poisoned. Take, for example, what you say about the spirit of Christ producing good fruit of its own accord in those who believe.

Although we agree that what you say is true, we do not agree that it is true in the sense in which you seem to take it. For Christ does not of his own accord produce good fruit in a man of faith without the individual's own will and volition. But that is precisely what you think, as is clear from your heretical denial of free will.

Now what you say next shows what fruit you are thinking about. "He will adore God," you say, "soberly, piously, and justly, in spirit and truth." That much is perfectly all right. But go on a little farther, and see what happens. "Not in the elements of this world, in food, clothing, and other hypocrisy. About the sacraments he will believe what Christ taught and established."

That is the place; that is where it really hurts. For you spiritual men have decided to obey the counsel Christ set forth when he said, "One who desires to worship God must worship him in spirit and in truth,"<sup>405</sup> in such a way as to destroy completely the obedience of the flesh to God. But this, Pomeranus, is to worship in spirit and not in truth. One who fools himself with talk of the spirit and fails to subdue and tame the wantonness of the flesh with fasting does not truly worship God.

You think all obedience of the body offered to God is hypocrisy. But it was not hypocrisy to Mary, who washed Christ's feet with her tears and dried them with the hair of her head.<sup>406</sup> Coarse clothing is hypocrisy to you, but it was not hypocrisy to John the Baptist, who dressed in the skin of camels. Abstinence from food is hypocrisy to you, but it was not hypocrisy to John, who ate only locusts.<sup>407</sup> And it was not hypocrisy even to Paul, who wanted to be able to fast all day. It is hypocrisy to you when the faithful pour out their devotion to God in the churches. But the prophet did not believe it was. The dignity of his kingship did not keep him from singing and dancing with the people before the ark of the covenant. And that proud and foolish woman did not go unpunished when she reproached him for worshiping God in that fashion.<sup>408</sup> But now you Lutherans — no less foolish and more proud than she — jeer at the Christian flock for doing the same thing.

Actually, Pomeranus, the true hypocrite is one whose piety is so lukewarm that he does not feel his flesh grow warm when he worships God, and yet he says that he still adores God ardently in spirit.

"About the sacraments he will think," you say, "what Christ taught and established." Short enough, certainly, but not very clear. For you bring into question what Christ taught. We do not doubt that Christ taught whatever the Church of Christ believes, since it cannot err without injury to Christ. Otherwise Christ would have deceived us in promising that he would be with the Church even to the end of time.<sup>409</sup>

You deny everything except what is clearly mentioned in Scripture, and what is clearly mentioned there you call obscure, or, more boldly, you shout that what is obviously against you is obviously for

<sup>405</sup> John 4:24 <sup>406</sup> See Lk 7:38; Jn 12:3.
<sup>407</sup> See Mt 3:4; Mk 1:6. <sup>408</sup> David dances before the ark in 2 Sm 6:14–15. His wife Michal, the daughter of Saul, rebukes him and as a result bears no children.

<sup>409</sup> Mt 28:20

you. And then you wrangle about what constitutes the Church, and you make it so ambiguous that you come to the conclusion that there is no Church at all on earth. Finally, you manage it so that either you
 5 would have to be fundamentally irreligious (which is most likely) or else all those would have to be so, who from the time of Christ's Passion until this very day were believed to be devout.

What good man ever believed that the sacrament of orders<sup>410</sup> is a mere fiction? Who ever babbled against contrition? Who, in fact, ever urged us not to feel sorrow for our sins? Who allowed women to hear confession? Who argued against good works? Who belittled fasting? Who held the prayers of the 15 Church in contempt? Who pulled down the decorations in churches? Who has envied the saints their worship? Who denied the fire of purgatory? Who failed to believe that in the Mass the Eucharist is a sacrifice? Who believed that bread remains bread
 20 along with Christ's flesh?

Some of the important leaders of your faction, however, have recanted that last statement — Lutheran fashion. For Luther always changes his beliefs for the worse, as he did with indulgences, the power of the pope, and the Eucharist itself.
 25 And now Karlstadt, Zwingli,<sup>411</sup> and Oecolampadius, who finally joined the rest, have completely removed Christ's flesh from the Host and left only bread. Luther was already working on the idea and 30 no doubt would have carried it off himself if Karlstadt and Zwingli had not beaten him to it.

That is where it was tending when he permitted people to believe without danger that the Eucharist consists of both, bread and Christ's body. At that point Luther did not condemn those who believed that the bread was turned into flesh. But after a while he considered anyone who held that belief a heretic.

Where do you think Luther was heading when he changed the canon of the Mass, forbidding it to be termed a sacrifice or offering? Or when he pulled down ritual and ceremony, allowed laymen to handle the Host, permitted women to consecrate it, and refused to allow it to be kept in the tabernacle and venerated in the church? He said that Christ did not institute the Eucharist for it to be venerated, 45 but only for it to be received. In fact, it should not even be received, as Luther says in the Babylonian

Captivity, except once, when a person is leaving this life, just as he receives baptism only once, when he is entering it.<sup>412</sup> 50

All this proceeded step by step until eventually Luther would have undoubtedly taken the body of Christ right out of the Eucharist. He had smoothed the way and was obviously about to proceed with it.
 55 But just as he was about to start, one sin kept him from committing another. It was only envy that restrained him from going ahead and preaching that ungodly heresy in public. For he envied Karlstadt and Zwingli the honor of seeming more irreligious than he. And afterward he envied Oecolampadius too. He preferred to dismantle what he had formerly built up (as anyone could see he was doing) rather than allow anyone else to become the heresiarch of any godless sect. 60 65

But what does it really matter what Luther thinks about the Eucharist when his writings show clearly enough the sacrilegious ideas he has about Christ? How can anyone doubt how he feels about Christ when he blasphemes Christ's saints, defiles Christ's cross, and equates Christ's venerable mother with his own whore? But what does it really matter what he thinks about Christ when his filthy heresy testifies to the revolting ideas he has about the sublimity of the divine nature? When he did away with the freedom of the will, Luther made our all-good, all-merciful God not the avenger, but the originator of sin. One can hardly imagine a more impious and sacrilegious heresy against God's holy majesty and a more deadly temptation to commit all sorts of disgraceful acts. At the same time you go about teaching these absurd, ungodly things, you are not embarrassed by speaking as though Lutherans only had a right to influence their neighbors by teaching. The reason you think so, I suppose, is that Luther teaches that all Christians are above all law. And you are well advised to think so, since he advises, in his holy, austere fashion, that one who has taken a vow of celibacy can forget all about it and snatch up a wife. He also very obligingly advises that if a husband is impotent he should hire some man to commit adultery with his wife.<sup>413</sup> 70 75 80 85 90

Now as for the Lutherans helping their neighbors at the cost of their own lives, and this not only for friends, but also for enemies — who could listen to that and not burst out laughing, even though the 95

410 ordination to the priesthood 411 Ulrich Zwingli (1484–1531)

412 See WA 6: 572, 11: 445. 413 See WA 11: 250–51, 6: 555–58.

thought of it is very sad and depressing? One sees the savage troops of your sect massing together on every side, destroying beautiful homes, burning sacred buildings, plundering holy churches, casting 5 out the pitiful and innocent friars, stripped of all their goods and fortune, bereft of all means of support, and many of them with serious bodily injuries. Is that what you call helping your neighbors even at the cost of your own life? And this not only 10 for friends, but also for enemies? I suppose so. No doubt you always treat the best people the worst.

For you take in with open arms any flea-brained, shifty wretch who is willing to cast off the rigors of a disciplined life. He is your holy brother in Christ, 15 and thus another godless soldier is added to the godless troop. But take someone who is truly pious and pursues his purpose without wavering and despises the freedom enjoyed by criminals, you immediately regard him as a Pharisee and self-justifier.
 20 He is scorned as a hypocrite by the Lutherans. He is abused, driven off, and harassed just as the innocent martyrs were by pagan tyrants. And yet, so help me God, you speak as though you are the only Christians and gravely rebuke the Church as if she had 25 never heard of Christ. You yelp like a dog the Father's words about God the Son, "Hear him"—out of context. Note, however, that God did not say, "Hear Pomeranus" or "Hear Luther."

For the passage you quote from Moses threatens 30 to ruin you: "Whoever will not hear that prophet, I will take vengeance on him, says the Lord."<sup>414</sup> The Church hears Christ's voice speaking from within itself and thus maintains the same faith that from the time of Christ's death through the apostles, 35 martyrs, and holy confessors even to this present age flowed without interruption from Christ's own breath, and it will endure despite all heretics and all the demons allied to them even to the end of time.

But you condemn the Church of Christ, and thus 40 Christ commands us to regard you as pagans and publicans.<sup>415</sup> At one time or another you will experience the vengeance of God for rejecting Christ in his Church and refusing to listen to Christ speaking to his Church.

45 The divine goodness uses at times such agents of demons to test the patience of good men in the Church or to punish the sins of the faithful. But God will be true to his word and along with the temptation provide a way out,<sup>416</sup> and eventually he 50 will wipe away every tear from the eyes of those who have mended their ways.<sup>417</sup> But his wrath and indignation, you—you, I say, you ungodly, cruel slayers of the faithful—with the breath of his anger he will blow you to ashes and drive you like dust from the 55 face of the earth.<sup>418</sup>

God recently gave a horrifying instance of this vengeance when those pitiful wretches, the peasants who were led astray by your teaching, destroyed so many monasteries and roamed about aimlessly for a while killing and looting wherever they wanted.<sup>419</sup>
 60 When they believed they had achieved almost unlimited and unrestricted license to commit all kinds of crime, behold, the God of glory thundered and destruction suddenly came over them.<sup>420</sup> A sea of misery overwhelmed them like sheep.<sup>421</sup> All told,
 65 more than seventy thousand perished. And the rest, whatever the number, were all reduced to bitter servitude.

Are you not disgraced by the part Luther played 70 in this? He was your general and changed from the wickedest commander in the world to the most dishonorable deserter. He was the one who inflamed the peasants to every crime they committed; he armed them and egged them on. Then, when he 75 saw that fortune had deserted them, he grimly cut them down by writing his vicious pamphlets against them. He outlawed them and turned them over to the nobles to be hacked to pieces. And that unspeakable politician did all this in order to extinguish with the blood of those pitiful wretches the 80 fires of hatred directed against himself. He first stirred them up, and then he sacrificed them.

If Luther had a drop of human blood in his heart, he would have preferred to die ten times over rather than by such filthy maneuvering and horrible cringing live a life loathsome to God and man. But perhaps he will find that the nobles are not stupid 85 enough to be softened up with one letter and forget that he was the one who brought them to the brink of destruction. As for the peasants, I suspect they 90 will never forget the man who destroyed them twice over. Godless and blind as he is to divine vengeance,

<sup>414</sup> Dt 18:19   <sup>415</sup> Mt 18:17   <sup>416</sup> 1 Cor 10:13   <sup>417</sup> Rv 7:17   <sup>418</sup> 2 Thes 2:8; Ps 1:4   <sup>419</sup> More is referring to the Peasants' Revolt of 1524–25.   <sup>420</sup> Ps 28(29):3   <sup>421</sup> 1 Thes 5:3

Luther worked to ingratiate himself with both parties. But he failed to gain the one, and he obviously lost the other.

Yet it is my sincere hope that the nobles and peasants will forgive him, provided that he decides to act in such a way that God above all can forgive him. I mean, if he recovers from heresy, if without deception he recants his evil beliefs, if he seeks Christ's glory through his own disgrace and does not allow his insatiable pride to keep him from confessing his insanity for the honor of God.

But if Luther has fallen into such despair that he pays no attention to his own salvation, you, Pomeranus, must consider yours. Abandon that ungodly sect, the most shameful that ever existed on earth. Return and rejoin the Catholic Church. Then, in every way you can, correct what you corrupted for so many years with your preaching. Give up your illegitimate bishopric. Send away that unfortunate girl you whore with in the name of marriage. And spend the rest of your life in repentance for what you have done.

If you do these things, Pomeranus — and I pray to God you will — then will you truly joy in us, and instead of feeling sorrow that you are lost, we in turn will rejoice that you are found.

148. To Erasmus

Greenwich, 18 December <1526>

Best greetings: I have received two letters<sup>422</sup> from you, dearest Erasmus, and have also read the one you addressed to the Reverend Father, the Bishop of London.<sup>423</sup> We, who are your dear little friends, are very much disturbed to hear that the stone disorder which gave you terrible pains for so long has now been followed by the disease which proved fatal to Linacre; though God's goodness and your own virtue are turning such evils into good for you, still our joy at your spiritual blessings does not preclude all concern, on our part, for the human frailty of your body; our uneasiness is caused not only by concern for you personally — for whom as for ourselves we do hope and pray for every blessing — but also, and more especially, by concern for all of Christendom; we are afraid that this illness will interrupt the brilliant works you have been writing to promote Christian piety. I pray God that you may bring them to a speedy and happy conclusion, especially the remaining part of the Hyperaspistes;<sup>424</sup> for you could have no other work in mind that would be more profitable for others, more satisfying to your friends, and more notable or more urgent for your own self. You would find it hard to believe the eagerness with which all good men are looking forward to that work; there are, on the other hand, some wicked persons, either partisans of Luther or your jealous rivals, who apparently are gleeful and growing in numbers as a result of your delayed response. However, I can sympathize with your delay, if the interruption has been caused by your desire to complete other writings first — as, for instance, your work on Christian Marriage,<sup>425</sup> which her Majesty the Queen correctly regards as being of supreme importance — and I hope that fact will shortly be brought home to you in a concrete way. And I am very contented, too, if the delay has been caused by your desire to handle the subject in a leisurely, thoughtful fashion; for I am anxious to see that part handled with the utmost care. But if, according to some reports, the delay is due to the fact that you have been terrorized, and have lost all interest in the work, and have no courage to go on with it, then I am thoroughly bewildered and unable to restrain my grief. You have endured, dearest Erasmus, many, many struggles and perils and Herculean labors; you have spent all the best years of your life on exhausting work, through sleepless nights, for the profit of all the world; and God forbid that now you should so unhappily become enamored of your declining years as to be willing to abandon the cause of God rather than lose a decision.

I am not afraid that you will now throw up to me that quotation from the comic poet: "When we are well, everybody," etc., or, "If you were here, you might think differently."<sup>426</sup> Indeed, I am incapable of making any such promises, nor is anybody else capable of offering such prospects as the whole world is waiting with expectation to receive from you, because you have given extraordinary proof of a heart that is valiant and trusting in God. It is impossible for me to doubt that you will continue bravely to exhibit such strength of spirit right up to your dying breath, even if there were a disastrous

<sup>422</sup> not now extant <sup>423</sup> Cuthbert Tunstall <sup>424</sup> Defender of the Diatribe against Martin Luther's The Unfree Will. It was finished ca. August 1527 and published in time for the Frankfort Fair. <sup>425</sup> The Institution of Christian Marriage, August

1526, dedicated to Queen Catherine of Aragon <sup>426</sup> Terence, Andria 309–10 catastrophe. For you could never fail to trust that God in his merciful kindness would intervene to calm the disturbance. Right now, as far as I can see, you are far from being terrorized; in fact, there is 5 little cause for fear at all. If the Lutherans planned to make any threatening moves, very likely they would have made them before your reply. Then they might have forestalled any answer from you; or if they wanted to gain vengeance on you for your 10 writings, they would have given vent to their rage at the time you published your first volume; for, in that work, you drew such a vivid description of the monster, and you pointed out so accurately the spirit that goads it on, that you displayed, for all the 15 world to see, that fuming, hellish demon, as if you had dragged Cerberus up from the infernal regions.

At present I certainly fail to see any peril beyond that which would threaten you even if you did not write another line. You have replied to the 20 false charges he made against you; you have stabbed him with the point of your pen; all that remains for you is a discussion of Scripture, and, by issuing, like so many promissory notes, a thousand copies of the first volume, you have solemnly promised the 25 whole world that you would faithfully go through with the second volume. Therefore, not even Luther is such a fool as to hope, or such a wretch as to dare to demand, that you would now not carry out God's cause, having accomplished your own, or that 30 you would not fulfill the promise you made publicly, especially since that would be so easy for you to do. Luther, I am sure, would rather have you say nothing, even though, in his letter to you, he pretends to have a supreme contempt for you; it is hard 35 to tell whether that letter is marked more by boastful exaggeration or stupidity. In any case, he is fully conscious that his worthless comments, which laboriously obscure the most obvious passages of Scripture while being frigid enough in themselves, would 40 become, under your criticism, a mass of sheer ice.

Since you, however, are present at the scene of action, while I am some distance away, if you notice that your reply involves some danger which you cannot elude and which I cannot foresee, then,
 45 please, do at least this much: write me a confidential note and have it delivered to me by a reliable carrier.

Not only the Bishop of London, an absolutely honest person, as you know, and extremely devoted to you, but also I myself will conscientiously see to it that the note will never be made public, unless that 50 can be done safely.

Your painter,<sup>427</sup> dearest Erasmus, is a remarkable artist; but I am afraid he will not find England as fertile and fruitful as he expected. Still, I shall do my best to see that he does not find it altogether
 55 barren. Your pamphlet was a very neat refutation of the rumor spread abroad by some malicious persons that you favored the heresy of Carlstadt;<sup>428</sup> you thus foiled the sly attempts of the clown who had planted that story in some German work. If God
 60 ever grants you the free time, I would like eventually to see a treatise in support of our Faith flow from that heart of yours, so perfect an instrument for defending the truth; however, right now I am very much concerned about the Hyperaspistes and 65 I would not want you to become absorbed in anything that might turn your interests elsewhere and thus prevent you from completing this work at the earliest possible date.

Farewell, Erasmus, dearest of all men. From the Court at Greenwich, December 18. 70

Sincerely and more than wholeheartedly yours,

Thomas More

To the excellent and most learned Master Erasmus of Rotterdam. 75

150. To the University of Oxford

Richmond, 11 March <1527?>

Right worshipful<sup>429</sup> sir, in my most hearty wise<sup>430</sup> I recommend me<sup>431</sup> unto you.

Signifying unto you the King's pleasure is that 80 for certain considerations moving his Highness, ye shall forthwith upon the sight of these my letters send up to me one Henry the manciple<sup>432</sup> of White Hall, in so sure keeping that he do not escape, and that ye shall by your wisdom handle the matter
 85 so closely that there be of his apprehension<sup>433</sup> and sending up as little knowledge abroad as may be. And this his Grace's commandment, his high pleasure is that ye shall with all diligence and dexterity

<sup>427</sup> Hans Holbein the Younger, who painted the portrait of More, a picture of the whole family, and drawings of the group and of each member <sup>428</sup> Andrew Bodenstein von Carlstadt (1480–1541) <sup>429</sup> distinguished, honorable <sup>430</sup> manner <sup>431</sup> recommend me: commend myself to your benevolent remembrance or regard <sup>432</sup> an officer or servant chiefly concerned with provisioning <sup>433</sup> arrest put in execution, as ye intend the continuance of his gracious favor toward you and that his University, the privileges whereof, his Grace of his blessed mind intendeth to see conserved. And for that intent his Highness hath ordered that ye shall send up the said Henry to me, being Steward<sup>434</sup> of this his University. And thus heartily fare ye well, at Richmond the eleventh day of March.

Assuredly your own,
Thomas More

155. To Francis Cranevelt

Calais, 14 July <1527>

Cordial greeting from T. More to his very charming friend Cranevelt.

Indeed I would be utterly heartless, my very dear friend Cranevelt, if I refused to repay the many letters I have received from you with a single letter in return, especially at this time when I have obtained such a reliable letter-carrier that I am completely deprived of the excuse I usually take as a pretext for my laziness, namely that I lack someone to carry my letter. This carrier is a servant of Erasmus, now returning directly to him, highly commended by him as very loyal and close-mouthed. If you want to communicate to Erasmus anything that you do not wish to commit to a letter, you can very safely entrust it to this man. If there is anything else I wish you to know, you will learn it from this letter-carrier. Calais, in haste, July 14.

Give a thousand greetings from me to that pre-eminent lady, your mistress-wife. Farewell, my good man, most distinguished and most dear to your friend More.

To the most illustrious gentleman Francis Cranevelt, Councilor to his Imperial Majesty, at Mechelin

160. From Bishop Cuthbert Tunstall

<London> 7 March 1527/8

Cuthbert, by divine permission bishop of London, sends greetings and blessings in the Lord to that most illustrious and excellent man, his brother and dearest friend, Lord Thomas More.<sup>435</sup>

Now that the Church of God has been assailed throughout Germany by heretics, not a few sons of iniquity have been discovered trying to import into our land the old and condemned Wyclifite heresy as well as its foster child, the Lutheran heresy, by translating into our vernacular language all their corrupt works and publishing them in great numbers; they are striving with huge efforts to defile and stain our country with what are clearly most pestilent teachings, opposed to the truth of the Catholic faith. It is greatly to be feared that the Catholic truth will be completely at risk unless good and erudite men strenuously counter the malignancy of such incorrigible persons. This can be done in no more fitting and excellent way than if truth—in the Catholic language and totally defeating these crazy teachings—be published (and thus brought to light) at the same time as those. This will make it possible for people who, untrained in the Sacred Scriptures but having, alongside these new heretical books, other Catholic books as well which refute them, will now be able either to discern the truth themselves or be rightly advised and instructed by others whose judgment is more insightful.

And, since, dearest brother, you are able to play the part of a Demosthenes in both our native vernacular and in the Latin tongue, and have become a most experienced and keen assessor of Catholic truth in every arena, you will have no better way to spend your excess hours—if you can manage to steal some time from your occupations—than if you were to compose something in our own language that could lay bare the hidden malice of heretics for simple, non-expert individuals, and make them better instructed against such impious supplanters of the Church. You have a most outstanding example to imitate in our most illustrious Lord King Henry VIII, who, undertaking to assert the sacraments of the Church against Luther who was subverting them with all his might, earned therewith the immortal name of Defender of the Church to all eternity.

And so, lest you fight with these specters without knowing what you fight against (like the Andabatae, those blindfolded gladiators of antiquity), I am sending you the insane dirges they have written in our language, and, along with that, some books

<sup>434</sup> at Oxford and Cambridge a judicial officer, in whom is vested the jurisdiction

belonging to the university in cases of treason and felony

<sup>435</sup> Translated by Gerald Malsbary, © CTMS 2017.

of Luther, from which these monstrous opinions have come forth. Once you have diligently read them through, you will the more easily understand the twisty places where the snakes hide themselves, and the intricate paths by which they seek to escape once they have been caught. For it is a great boost to victory to know thoroughly the enemy's plans, to be deeply acquainted with what they believe and where they are aiming. If you prepare to tear apart what they will claim they do not believe, you waste all your efforts. So then, blessings be upon you for undertaking such a holy labor, by which you both come to the aid of the Church and secure eternal glory in heaven for yourself; we greatly beseech you in the Lord, and we grant and concede you, to this end, the right and the license to keep and read books of this kind.

Given the seventh day of March, the year of our Lord 1527,<sup>436</sup> and the sixth year of our consecration.

20 162. To John Cochlaeus<sup>437</sup>
<1528?>

It is impossible, most honored sir, to express my feelings of debt to you for your kindness in keeping me informed on the incidents occurring in your locale. Germany has become our breeding ground for such things; its brood is as numerous as that once produced by Africa, and much more monstrous. The past centuries have not seen anything more monstrous than the Anabaptists, or more numerous than such baneful curses. Indeed, my dear Cochlaeus, when I view the present situation with its rapid deterioration, from day to day, I imagine that, in the near future, someone will rear his head and preach the utter rejection of Christ. And if some senseless clown does rear his head, with the present frenzied state of the masses, there will be no lack of supporters. I have never laid eyes on anything more foolish or more malicious than the Edict of Bern.<sup>438</sup> And, I am told, they have so dignified the disputation as to put it almost on the same level with their Edict. I wish, my dear Cochlaeus, I had the requisite knowledge in Scripture and theology to be able to write an effective rejoinder to those baneful curses. Thanks to the goodness of God, most distinguished sir, you do possess that knowledge, with a fullness as few other men do. Nor has God's favor proved ineffectual in your case; you have ever used the talent entrusted to you so that one day you could return it, with abundant interest.<sup>439</sup> This makes me very happy, and God, in his turn, has begun to manifest his pleasure with your loyal services. After all your misfortunes, including a severe personal disaster, he has begun to look upon your sorrows with sympathy. Through his inspiration, your most illustrious Prince has attached you to his service, to the great advantage of our religion and to your own financial profit, and thereby he has chosen a replacement who is the perfect image of your excellent and scholarly predecessor.<sup>440</sup> I extend my congratulations to both of you — to your Prince for his good judgment, to you for having so noble a patron.

163. To Francis Cranevelt
Chelsea, 10 June 1528

As surely as I hope God loves me, your enormous kindness toward me, my dear Cranevelt, makes me ashamed of myself, for you send me such frequent, loving, and elaborate greetings, though I reply so rarely, especially since you have no fewer occupations than I do which you could since you have no fewer occupations than I do which you could give as pretexts, nay rather as genuine reasons. But you are so open-minded, so steadfast that, though you forgive everything in your friends, you yourself are always so persevering in pursuing your undertakings that you have no faults to be forgiven. But be sure of this, my dear Cranevelt, if something should happen which would seriously require that the services of a friend should be manifested, in that matter you would never find me at fault. Please give my regards to my mistress, your wife (for I do not dare to reverse the order again) and also to your whole household, to which mine sends heartfelt greetings. From my little country place, June 10, 1528.

<sup>436</sup> 1528 since, by old-style dating, the "new year" did not begin until March 25.
<sup>437</sup> John Dobneck (1479–1552)

<sup>438</sup> The disputation at Bern was held January 7–26, 1528. <sup>439</sup> 1 Cor 15:10,

Mt 25:14 ff. <sup>440</sup> Hieronymus Emser (1477–1527)

163a. To Francis Cranevelt

London, 8 November &lt;1528&gt;

That most eminent gentleman Master Hacket, our most serene King's ambassador to your country, has sent me your letter, which was as pleasant to me as is proper for a letter from someone who is so dear to my heart that no one else could be dearer. I congratulate you heartily on the peace which has been restored among you, and would that someday I could offer congratulations on a general peace, for which Christendom has so long been miserably yearning. I am delighted you have become so Homeric that you can command such fitting verses from him for any occasion, which you have also translated into Latin that is in no way inferior to the Greek. I pray that your spouse, a lady of the highest dignity, will have a happy journey, complete her business exactly as she wishes, and swiftly return, though I remember that you once wrote to me that the most pleasant sleep is in a bed without a wife, but these are the words of husbands on the first nights after their wives have been sent away, for on the remaining nights desire comes creeping back and, unless the wife has left a proxy, it makes sleep unpleasant. As for your wife, I think she is so prudent that she has taken away all her maidservants with her. Farewell, most delightful of all men. London, November 8

Such as he is, yours with all his heart,

Thomas More, Knight

To a gentleman very distinguished for his character and learning, Master Frans Cranevelt, Counselor to his Imperial Majesty, at Mechelen

174. To Lady More

Woodstock, 3 September &lt;1529&gt;

Sir Thomas More was made lord chancellor of England in Michaelmas<sup>441</sup> term in the year of our Lord 1529, and in the twenty-first year of King Henry the VIII. And in the latter end of the harvest then next before, Sir Thomas More then chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster being returned from Cambrai in Flanders (where he had been Ambassador for the King) rode immediately to the King to the Court at Woodstock.

And while he was there with the King, part of his own dwelling house at Chelsea and all his barns there full of corn<sup>442</sup> suddenly fell on fire and were burnt and all the corn therein by the negligence of one of his neighbors' carts that carried the corn, and by occasion thereof were diverse of his next neighbor's barns burned also. Upon which news brought unto him to the Court, he wrote to the lady his wife this letter following. [Workes 1418–1419]

Mistress Alice, in my most hearty wise<sup>443</sup>I recommend me<sup>444</sup> to you.

And whereas I am informed by my son Heron of the loss of our barns and our neighbors' also with all the corn that was therein, albeit<sup>445</sup> (saving God's pleasure) it were great pity of so much good corn lost, yet since it hath liked him<sup>446</sup> to send us such a chance, we must and are bounden not only to be content but also to be glad of his visitation. He sent us all that we have lost and, since he hath by such a chance taken it away, again his pleasure be fulfilled; let us never grudge<sup>447</sup> thereat but take in good worth<sup>448</sup> and heartily thank him as well for adversity as for prosperity and peradventure<sup>449</sup> we have more cause to thank him for our loss than for our winning, for his wisdom better seeth what is good for us than we do ourselves. Therefore I pray you be of good cheer and take all the household with you to church and there thank God both for that he hath given us and for that he hath taken from us and for that he hath left us, which if it please him he can increase when he will and if it please him to leave us yet less, at his pleasure be it.

I pray you to make some good ensearch<sup>450</sup> what my poor neighbors have lost and bid them take no thought therefor, for and<sup>451</sup> I should not leave myself a spoon there shall no poor neighbor of mine bear no loss by any chance happened in my house. I pray you be with my children and your household merry in God and devise somewhat with your friends what way were the best to take for provision to be made for corn for our household and for seed this year coming, if ye think it good that we keep the ground still in our hands, and whether ye think it good that we so shall do or not, yet I think it were not best suddenly thus to leave it all up and to put

<sup>441</sup> the fall term beginning September 29
<sup>442</sup> grain <sup>443</sup> manner <sup>444</sup> recommend me: commend myself to your benevolent remembrance or regard <sup>445</sup> although <sup>446</sup> it hath liked him: it has pleased God

<sup>447</sup> be unwilling <sup>448</sup> part <sup>449</sup> perhaps <sup>450</sup> search <sup>451</sup> even if away our folk off our farm, till we have somewhat advised us thereon; howbeit<sup>452</sup> if we have more now than ye shall need and which can get them other masters, ye may then discharge us of them, but I 5 would not that any man were suddenly sent away he wot nere whither.<sup>453</sup> At my coming hither I perceived none other but that I should tarry still with the King's Grace but now I shall, I think, because of 10 this chance get leave this next week to come home and see you, and then shall we further devise together upon all things what order shall be best to take.

And thus as heartily fare you well with all our children as ye can wish, at Woodstock the third day 15 of September by the hand of Your loving husband,

Thomas More, Kg.

174a. From Bishop Cuthbert Tunstall<sup>454</sup>

<London, 1529>

20 When I looked round to see to whom, from among all my friends, I might dedicate this composition, you seemed to me the most fitting of all both on account of our intimacy and on account of your frankness; for I know that you will be pleased at 25 whatever good it may contain, warn me of whatever is imperfect, and forgive whatever is amiss.

178. To Erasmus

<Chelsea>, 28 October <1529>

30 Best Greetings. My thoughts and heart had long been set upon a life of retirement, when suddenly, without any warning, I was tossed into a mass of vital business affairs.<sup>455</sup> The nature of these affairs you will discover from your man Quirinus.<sup>456</sup> Some people here, friends of mine, are jubilant and heap 35 congratulations upon me. But you are usually a prudent and shrewd judge of human affairs; perhaps you will sympathize with my lot. I am adapting myself to circumstances, and I am very happy at the extraordinary favor and kindness shown me by our excellent King; lacking the talent and other gifts re- 40 quired for this position, I intend to try seriously to meet his optimistic expectations by making every effort I am capable of, by complete loyalty, and by utter devotedness.

The rest of the details you will get from Quiri- 45 nus, as I have given him thorough instructions. The more I realize that this post involves the interests of Christendom, my dearest Erasmus, the more I hope it all turns out successfully, for your sake rather than my own. Farewell, dearest Erasmus, more than half 50 of my soul. From my country home, October 28.

More than wholeheartedly yours,

Thomas More

To the excellent and most learned Master Erasmus of Rotterdam, at Freiburg. 55

182. To Sir John Arundel

Chelsea, 5 April <1530>

Master Arundel, in my right hearty wise<sup>457</sup> I recommend me<sup>458</sup> unto you. And whereas I understand that ye be one of the coparishioners of the manor 60 of Sharshell Barton in the parish of Steeple Barton in the county of Oxford and the farm of Darneton in the same county, and that your part of the same manor and farm amounteth by year to four marks<sup>459</sup> or thereabout, so it is that a servant of mine, one 65
Edward Jones, a man right honest and whom I especially favor, hath obtained of my Lord South and other your partners their good wills and grants for a lease of their parts in the same. Wherefore and for-asmuch as the said manor and farm cannot be well 70 occupied but by one tenant without great unquietness of either part if it were occupied by diverse,
I therefore heartily require<sup>460</sup> you to be good unto my said servant, which shall be as good a tenant unto you as any other shall, and as much to your 75 profit, of which I will not for any friend of mine require any part of your loss. And in being thus good unto my said servant for my sake, ye shall bind him to pray for you, and me to do for any friend of yours

<sup>452</sup> however <sup>453</sup> wot nere whither:
knows not where <sup>454</sup> As Stapleton explains in his biography, this short letter is from the mathematics book Cuthbert
Tunstall wrote and then dedicated to More.

<sup>455</sup> More was appointed lord chancellor on October 25, 1529. <sup>456</sup> Quirinus Talesius (1505–73) of Haarlem was educated in Cologne and became servant-pupil to Erasmus ca. 1524. <sup>457</sup> right hearty wise:

most hearty manner <sup>458</sup> recommend
me: commend myself to your benevolent remembrance or regard <sup>459</sup> In England a mark was equivalent in value to two-thirds of a pound sterling. <sup>460</sup> ask any such lawful pleasure as shall lie in my power.

And thus heartily fare you well.

At Chelsea the 5th day of April.

Your assured lover,

5 Thom. More, Kg, Chancellor
To the right worshipful<sup>461</sup> Sir John Arundel, Knight

182a. To George Guildford

Westminster, 8 July <1530>

10 I commend me unto you. And whereas a commission was dutied<sup>462</sup> unto you and to others for the examination and hearing of a matter in variance between Richard Bramble and others of Cranbrook, complainants, and Richard Barr of Cranbrook, 15 aforesaid defendant. So it is that the said Richard Bramble hath made petition to me and to others of the King's Council that ye and the other commissioners should make your certificate here unto us what ye with the others do find or perceive therein.
20 Wherefore it is ordered that ye and others of the said commissioners do certify<sup>463</sup> me and others of the said Council what ye with the others have done therein. Or else that ye the said commissioners according to the said commission call before you the 25 said parties, and further to take such order and direction<sup>464</sup> with them, as<sup>465</sup> they or any of them have no further cause to trouble me and others of the said Council concerning the same matter. And if so 30 be that ye the said commissioners can make none end nor determination between the said parties, that then ye with the others to<sup>466</sup> certify me and others of the said Council in the first day of the next term ensuing, certifying us what ye have done about the premises.<sup>467</sup>

35 From Westminster, the eighth day of July

Your lover and friend,

Tho. More, Kg

Chancellor

To Master George Guildford be this delivered in 40 haste.

183a. From Emperor Charles V to the Chancellor of England<sup>468</sup>

Brussels, 11 March 1531

My Cousin,<sup>469</sup>

Besides the good, honest, and virtuous desire 45 which I know you have always had toward me and my subjects, of entertaining all good neighborly and friendly relationships between them and the subjects of the King of England, my dearest uncle, cousin, and good brother, I have been acquainted 50
by my ambassador Doctor Eustace Chapuys, overseas resident, of the good office that you daily, constantly, and cleverly provide toward my said subjects regarding things and business they have with the said Lord King my uncle, for which I would like 55 to thank you with very good words, and to inform you that, concerning whatever may please you, you will find me very agreeable and affectionate. I have ordered that my ambassador should give you what you desire. Written in Brussels on the 11th day of 60
March, in the year 1531.

From the Emperor to the Chancellor of England.

188. To Erasmus

Chelsea, 14 June 1532

Thomas More sends his greetings to Erasmus of 65
Rotterdam.

It has been my constant wish almost since boy-hood, dearest Desiderius, that some day I might enjoy the opportunity which, to my happiness, you have always had, namely, of being relieved of all 70 public duties and eventually being able to devote some time to God alone and myself; at long last this wish has come true,<sup>470</sup> Erasmus, thanks to the goodness of the supreme and almighty God and to the graciousness of a very understanding Sovereign. 75
I have not, however, attained exactly what I had wished for. My prayer had been to reach the crowning point of my life healthy and vigorous, no matter how old, or at least without sickness and suffering,

<sup>461</sup> honorable, distinguished <sup>462</sup> put under an obligation to take a certain action
<sup>463</sup> inform; attest to <sup>464</sup> take... with them: arrange matters regarding them in such a way
<sup>465</sup> so that <sup>466</sup> are to

<sup>467</sup> aforementioned matters <sup>468</sup> The manuscript of this letter is in the Vienna State Archives, England Varia, Fz. 2. The translation is by Marie-Claire Phélippeau.
<sup>469</sup> Kings and emperors often used the term "cousin" in a symbolic sense as a sign of respect in addressing noblemen, lords, heads of state, cardinals, etc. <sup>470</sup> More had resigned May 16, 1532.

as far as one could expect at that age. Perhaps that was a little too bold; in any case, the answer to that prayer is at present in God's hands. For some sort of chest ailment has laid hold of me; and the discomfort and pain it causes do not bother me as much as the worry and fear over the possible consequences. After being troubled with this ailment continually for several months, I consulted the doctors, who said that such a lingering disease could be dangerous; in their view there was no speedy cure possible; healing would be a long, slow process, requiring proper diet, medicines, and rest. They did not predict the length of convalescence, nor did they even give me assurance of a complete cure.

So, while turning these thoughts over in my mind, I realized that I would either have to resign my office or be inefficient in discharging it, as I would be unable to carry out the responsibilities which my position entailed, except at the risk of my life; and in the case of death, I would have to give up office as well as life. Therefore I decided to do without the one rather than without both. Out of concern, then, for affairs of state, as well as for my own health, I humbly prevailed upon the generosity of our most noble and excellent Sovereign to condescend to have pity on me and to relieve me of the overwhelming burden of that office, the highest in the realm, with which, as you know, he had shown favor for me and marked me with a distinction far beyond any merit or even ambition or wish on my part. My prayer, then, to all the saints of Heaven is that God, who alone has the power, may repay adequately these acts of fond affection shown me by our most noble King, and, to prevent me from spending whatever time he will add to my life in idleness and inactivity, that God may also grant me both the spirit to employ those good hours well and, in addition, strength of body to do so. For when my health is weak, I am so listless that I accomplish nothing at all.

My dear Erasmus, we are not all Erasmuses; the gracious gift which God has granted to you, practically alone of all mankind, that gift all of us must wait to receive. With the exception of yourself, who would dare to promise what you produce? Though burdened by the weight of your years and constantly suffering from illnesses that would prove exhausting and overwhelming for a healthy young man, still never all through the years of your entire life have you failed to give an account to all the world with outstanding publications, as if neither the weight of years nor ill health could in any way diminish that record. While this one fact alone is, in the judgment of all men, like a miracle, still, amazingly, the miracle is magnified by the fact that the host of brawling critics surrounding and attacking you have in no way deterred you from publishing, though apparently they had the power to crush the heart of a Hercules. Such men are constantly stirred up against you, because they are envious of your unparalleled gifts and also of your learning, which outmatches even those gifts; they readily realize that such unique qualities of native talent and hard work are far beyond their reach; still, almost bursting with envy, they cannot endure being far inferior to you; therefore, of course, they contrive together and strive with might and main by incessant personal abuse to see if they can drag your high honor down to their own shameful level.

However, all during the many years that they have been shouldering this rock of Sisyphus, what have they accomplished by their fruitless and wicked efforts except to have the rock come tumbling down again and again upon their own heads? Meanwhile you have kept surging ever upwards. And does it really matter that on occasion even good men, with a certain amount of learning, have been unsettled because, in their view, you perhaps handled some point with too little restraint? After all, every author has been guilty of that, including your own critics, who, while branding your works, could not refrain from committing the same defect—a defect, in this instance, that was too obvious for men of their rank, and of too frequent occurrence for any type of writing. There is much less reason for excusing them, as they are surely aware of the open confession you made before the outbreak of these pestilential heresies, which are now spreading like wildfire and wreaking utter havoc; you admitted that you had handled some points with too little restraint, but, had you been able to foresee the eventual cropping up of these treacherous enemies of religion, you would have treated those same points more gently and more delicately. The rather strong statements you made in those days were evoked by the defects of certain people—defects which were quite the opposite of your own, and which those people hugged to their bosoms as if they were virtues. Anyone who would consider your vigorous spirit a defect will have a difficult time trying to justify the holiest of the ancient doctors of the Church; if those doctors had had the same view of the modern age as they had of their own, I am absolutely sure that some of the statements they made in their day would have been more guarded and more carefully modified. But they did not do that, because they were trying to cure current evils and did not have in mind future ones. To be sure, they suffered the same experience as you now are suffering, in being the target for the slanderous charges of those fellows, for the heretics that mushroomed in a later age have boasted of their borrowings from the works of the ancients; this experience you have in common not only with those very holy Fathers and most ancient guardians of the orthodox Faith, but also with the apostles and evangelists, and even with our own Savior, for their words have been used by all heretics as the chief, or almost the sole, basis upon which they have attempted to lay the foundation of teachings utterly false.

Congratulations, then, my dear Erasmus, on your outstanding virtuous qualities; however, if on occasion some good person is unsettled and disturbed by some point, even without a sufficiently serious reason, still do not be chagrined at making accommodations for the pious dispositions of such men. But as for those snapping, growling, malicious fellows, ignore them and, without faltering, quietly continue to devote yourself to the promotion of intellectual things and the advancement of virtue.

Concerning the person<sup>471</sup> whom you recommended to me for scholarly reasons, not for religious ones, I have been very prudently and politely warned by friends to be on my guard so as not to be taken in by him. I shall certainly do all I can to handle the situation. I am keenly aware of the risk involved in an open-door policy toward these newfangled erroneous sects. Even though they have been held in check up to now in our country, thanks to the vigilance of the bishops and the influence of our Sovereign, still it is remarkable what tricks they use in their first attempts to sneak into a place, and then the pertinacity with which they try to crash their way through. And one or two of our own fellow countrymen, with a steady stream of books written in our vernacular and containing mistranslations, and worse, misinterpretations of Scripture, have been sending into our land every brand of heresy from Belgium, where they have sought refuge. I have written replies to several of these books, not however out of any great worry for one who would examine the works of both men thoroughly, but because some people like to give an approving eye to novel ideas, out of superficial curiosity, and to dangerous ideas, out of deviltry; and in so doing, they assent to what they read, not because they believe it is true, but because they want it to be true. However, one will never in any way succeed in satisfying that breed of humans who have a passion for wickedness. All my efforts are directed toward the protection of those men who do not deliberately desert the truth, but are seduced by the enticements of clever fellows. Farewell, most learned Erasmus, you who have been of great service to genuine intellectual life.

From my home at Chelsea. June 14, 1532.

189. To John Cochlaeus

Chelsea, 14 June <1532>

My excellent and most affectionate Cochlaeus — our man George<sup>472</sup> has returned with your letter, also with a bundle of books including, among other things, your polemical works in which, as a valiant champion of the Gospel and religion, you do battle with that mighty opponent of the Church, Luther; your learning and piety are the equal of your fighting heart. Since George's return to England, I have received several letters from you dated at various times. The latest of them contained the information about Zwingli and Oecolampadius,<sup>473</sup> and I was glad to hear the news of their deaths. Unfortunately, however, they have left in their wake many very real reasons for being sad, which I cannot mention without a shudder and which are known to everybody and which pious men ought not hear without a heavy sigh. Still, it is right for us to rejoice that such savage enemies of the Christian

<sup>471</sup> Simon Gryner (Grynaeus) (ca. 1494–1541) <sup>472</sup> not identified <sup>473</sup> Zwingli as chaplain was killed in the battle of

Kappel, October 11, 1531, and his body, as a heretic's, was burned. Oecolampadius, the first Protestant pastor at the Minster in Basel, died November 24, 1531.

faith have been removed from our midst, enemies that were so fully equipped for the destruction of the Church and so eager for every opportunity to uproot piety.

5 For the past several months the condition of my health has aroused strong feelings of fear within me, although outwardly I have not appeared very ill. Not even since my release from all public duties have I succeeded in shaking off this ailment. It was 10 a fact that I was incapable of carrying out my duties as chancellor effectively without aggravating the malady, and the doctor held out no hope for my recovery unless I retired to private life. Not even then could he give me any definite assurance. My decision, then, was influenced by a desire to regain my 15 health, but much more so by my regard for the common good, which I would hinder in many ways if, while handicapped by bad health, I would myself be a handicap to affairs of state. I have resolved to 20 devote to intellectual things and to God the leisure graciously granted to me, at my request, by the sympathetic kindness of our Most Illustrious Sovereign. Give me your help, dearest Cochlaeus, by praying to God that this plan may turn out successfully for me.
25 Good luck and farewell; from my home at Chelsea, June 14.

190. Against John Frith<sup>474</sup>

Chelsea, 7 December <1532>

30 In my most hearty wise<sup>475</sup> I recommend me<sup>476</sup> to you,<sup>477</sup> and send you by this bringer the writing again<sup>478</sup> which I received from you, whereof I have been offered since a couple of copies more in the meanwhile as late<sup>479</sup> as you wot<sup>480</sup> well it was, whereby men may see how greedily that 35 these new-named brethren write it<sup>481</sup> out, and secretly spread it abroad. So that whereas the King's gracious Highness like a most faithful Catholic prince, for the avoiding of such pestilent books as sow such poisoned heresies among his people, hath 40 by his open<sup>482</sup> proclamations utterly forbidden

all English printed books to be brought into this land from beyond the sea, lest our English heretics that are lurking there might there print their heresies among other matters, and so send them hither unsuspected, and therefore unperceived till more 45 harm were<sup>483</sup> felt than after were well remediable, the devil hath now taught his disciples, the devisers of these heresies, to make many short treatises, whereof their scholars may shortly<sup>484</sup> write out copies, but in their treatises to put as much poison in 50 one written leaf as they printed before in fifteen, as it well appeareth in this one writing of this young man's making, which<sup>485</sup> hath, I here say, lately made diverse other things, that yet run in huggermugger<sup>486</sup> so close among the brethren, that there 55 cometh no copies abroad.

And would God for his mercy that since there can nothing refrain<sup>487</sup> their study from the device and compassing<sup>488</sup> of evil and ungracious<sup>489</sup> writing, that they could and would keep it so secret, that 60 never man should see it but such as are already so far corrupted, as never would be<sup>490</sup> cured of their canker. For less harm were it if only they that are already bemired were as the Scripture saith mired
65 on more and more,<sup>491</sup> than that they should cast their dirt abroad upon other folks' clean clothes. But alack this will not be. For as Saint Paul saith, the contagion of heresy creepeth on like a canker.<sup>492</sup> For as the canker corrupteth the body further and 70 further, and turneth the whole parts into the same deadly sickness, so do these heretics creep forth among good simple souls, and under a vain hope of some high secret learning, which other men abroad either willingly did keep from them, or else could
75 not teach them, they daily with such abominable books corrupt and destroy in corners<sup>493</sup> very many before those writings come unto light, till at the last the smoke of that secret fire beginneth to reke<sup>494</sup>
80 out at some corner, and sometimes the whole fire so flameth out at once, that it burneth up whole towns, and wasteth whole countries, ere<sup>495</sup> ever it can be mastered, and yet never after so well and clearly<sup>496</sup> quenched, but that it lieth lurking still in

474 Thomas More is responding to A Christen Sentence (CW 7: 427–33) by John Frith (1503–33), a Cambridge scholar, English priest, and follower of William Tyndale. 475 manner 476 recommend me: commend myself to your benevolent remembrance or regard 477 The person addressed here is unknown. 478 back 479 recent 480 know 481 Frith's book 482 public 483 would be 484 quickly 485 who 486 secret 487 there can nothing

refrain: nothing can keep 488 device and compassing: devising and contriving 489 wicked, graceless 490 would be: wish to be 491 See Rv 22:11. 492 See 2 Tm 2:17. 493 secret 494 shoot 495 before 496 completely some old rotten timber under cellars and ceilings, that if it be not well waited on and marked, will not fail at length to fall on an open fire again, as it hath fared in late<sup>497</sup> years at more places than one, both the one fire and the other. And therefore I am both

 5 sure, and sorry too, that those other books as well as this is now of this young man's will once come unto light, and then shall it appear wherefore<sup>498</sup> they be kept so close.<sup>499</sup> Howbeit, a worse<sup>500</sup> than this is, though the words be smooth and fair, the devil, I
 10 trow,<sup>501</sup> cannot make. For herein he runneth a great way beyond Luther, and teacheth in few leaves<sup>502</sup> shortly, all the poison that Wycliffe,<sup>503</sup> Hussgen,<sup>504</sup> Tyndale,<sup>505</sup> and Zwingli<sup>506</sup> have taught in all their 15 long books before, concerning the Blessed Sacrament of the altar, affirming it to be not only very<sup>507</sup> bread still as Luther doth, but also, as those other beasts do, saith it is nothing else, and that there is neither the blessed body of Christ, nor his blood,
 20 but for a remembrance of Christ's Passion only bare<sup>508</sup> bread and wine. And therein goeth he so far in conclusion that he saith it is all one unto us in a manner<sup>509</sup> whether it be consecrated or unconse-
 25 crated. And so that Blessed Sacrament, that is and ever hath in all Christendom been held of all sacraments the chief, and not only a sacrament but the very self<sup>510</sup> thing also which other sacraments beto-30 ken,<sup>511</sup> and whereof all other sacraments take their effect and strength, he maketh in manner (taking the consecration so slight and so light) no manner<sup>512</sup> sacrament at all, wherein he runneth yet beyond Tyndale and all the heretics that ever I remember before.

And now the matter being of such a marvelous 35 weight, it is a great wonder to see upon how light and slight occasions he is fallen unto these abominable heinous heresies.

For he denieth not nor cannot say nay but that 40 our Savior said himself, "My flesh is verily<sup>513</sup> meat, and my blood is verily drink."<sup>514</sup>

He denieth not also that Christ himself at his Last Supper, taking the bread into his blessed hands, after that he had blessed it said unto his disciples, "Take you this and eat it; this is my body that shall 45 be given for you." And in like wise gave them the chalice after his blessing and consecration, and said unto them, "This is the chalice of my blood of the New Testament, which shall be shed out for many; do you this in remembrance of me."<sup>515</sup>

The young man denieth not nor can deny but 50 that our Savior here himself said that it was his own body, and said that it was his own blood, and there ordained that it should be in remembrance of him continually consecrated. So that he must needs 55 confess that all they which believe that it is his very body and his very blood indeed, have the plain words of our Savior himself upon their side, for the ground and foundation of their faith.

But now saith this young man against all this that 60 our Savior in other places of Scripture, called himself a very vine, and his disciples very branches.<sup>516</sup> And he calleth himself a door also,<sup>517</sup> not for that<sup>518</sup> he was any of these things indeed but for certain 65 properties for which he likened himself to those things. As a man for some properties saith of his neighbor's horse, "This horse is mine up and down," meaning that it is in everything so like. And like<sup>519</sup> as Jacob built an altar, and called it the God of Israel,<sup>520</sup> and as Jacob called the place where he wrestled with the angel the face of God,<sup>521</sup> and that 70 the paschal lamb was called the passing by of the Lord,<sup>522</sup> with infinite such other phrases as he saith, not for that they were so indeed, but for certain similitudes in the properties; so saith this young man that Christ, though he said by his plain words, "This 75 is my body," and "This is my blood," yet for all that he meant not that it was his body and his blood indeed no more than that he meant that himself was a very door or a very vine indeed though for certain 80 properties he called himself both. And he saith that

497 fared in late: happened in recent 498 why 499 secret 500 Howbeit... worse: However, a worse book 501 believe 502 pages 503 John Wycliffe (ca. 1320– 1384), best known for translating the Vulgate into Middle English, was declared a heretic posthumously at the Council of Constance (1415). For his views on the Eucharist, see Tractatus de apostasia and De eucharista tractatus. 504 better known as Johannes Oecolampadius (1482–1531), a prominent German Protestant 505 William Tyndale (ca. 1494–1536), known for his translation of the English Bible from Hebrew and Greek, maintained a close friendship and collaboration with Frith during their exile from England.

 Tyndale was executed for heresy one year after More's death. 506 Ulrich Zwingli (1484–1531), leader of the Swiss Reformation, denied the real physical presence of Christ in the Eucharist in De vera et falsa

religione commentarius. 507 actual, true 508 mere 509 in a manner: so to speak 510 same 511 typify, symbolize 512 kind of 513 truly 514 Jn
 6:56 515 Mt 26:26–28; Mk 14:22–24;
 Lk 22:19–20; 1 Cor 11:23–25 516 Jn
 15:1–6 517 Jn 10:7 518 for that: because 519 just 520 Gn 33:20 521 Gn 32:30
522 Ex 12:11, 21

Christ meant in like wise here, not that it was or should be his own body and his blood indeed but that it should be to them and us as a remembrance of him in his absence, as verily as though it were his very body and his very blood indeed as the Paschal lamb was a token and a remembrance of the passing by of the Lord, and as a bridegroom giveth his bride a ring if he hap to go into a far country from her, for a remembrance of him in his absence, and as a sure<sup>523</sup> sign that he will keep her his faith and not break her his promise.

In good faith it grieveth me very sore<sup>524</sup> to see this young man so circumvented<sup>525</sup> and beguiled by certain old lines of the devil, as we now see that he is, when he is fain,<sup>526</sup> for the defense of this error, to flit in conclusion<sup>527</sup> from the faith of plain and open Scripture and so far fall to the new-fangled fantasies of foolish heretics that he will for the allegory destroy the true sense of the letter, in maintenance<sup>528</sup> of a new false sect, against the holy true Catholic faith so fully confirmed and continued in Christ's whole Catholic Church this fifteen hundred years together. For these dregs hath he drunken of<sup>529</sup> Wycliffe and Oecolampadius, Tyndale and Zwingli and so hath he all that he argueth here besides; which four what manner folk they be, is meetly<sup>530</sup> well-perceived and known, and God hath in part with his open vengeance declared.<sup>531</sup> And ever hath God and ever will, by some way, declare his wrath and indignation against as many as fall into such damnable opinions against the blessed body and blood of his only begotten Son. From which perilous opinion and all his other errors, the great mercy of our sweet Savior call home again, and save this young man in time.

As for his allegories I am not offended with, nor with similitudes neither where they may have place, though<sup>532</sup> he take one of his neighbor's horses as he doth, and another if he list<sup>533</sup> of his own cows— provided always for a thing<sup>534</sup> which he list to call like he misconstrue not the Scripture, and take away the very thing indeed as he doth here.

Now his example also of his bridegroom's ring I very well allow.<sup>535</sup> For, I take the Blessed Sacrament to be left with us for a very token and a memorial of Christ indeed. But I say that whole substance of the same token and memorial is his own blessed body, whereas this man would make it only bread.

And so I say that Christ hath left us a better token than this man would have us take it for, and therein fareth<sup>536</sup> like a man to whom a bridegroom had delivered a goodly gold ring with a rich ruby therein, to deliver over to his bride for a token, and then he would, like a false shrew,<sup>537</sup> keep away that gold ring, and give the bride in the stead thereof a proper<sup>538</sup> ring of a rush and tell her that the bridegroom would send her no better; or else like one that, when the bridegroom had given such a gold ring to his bride for a token, would tell her plain and make her believe that the ring were but copper or brass, to diminish the bridegroom's thanks.<sup>539</sup>

If he said that the words of Christ might besides the literal sense be understood in an allegory, I would well agree with him. For so may every word almost through the whole Scripture, calling an allegory every sense, whereby the words be translated unto some other spiritual understanding, besides the true plain open sense that the letter first intended. But on the other side, because that<sup>540</sup> in some words of Scripture is there none other thing intended but an allegory, to go therefore and in another place of Scripture to take away with an allegory the very true literal sense as he doth here— this is the fault that we find in him, which if it may be suffered,<sup>541</sup> must needs make all the Scripture, as touching<sup>542</sup> any point of our faith, of none effect or force at all. I marvel me<sup>543</sup> therefore much that he is not afraid to affirm that these words of Christ, of his body and his blood, must needs be understood only by way of a similitude or an allegory as the words be of the vine and the door.

Now this he wotteth<sup>544</sup> well, that though some words spoken by the mouth of Christ written in Scripture be<sup>545</sup> to be understood only by way of a similitude or an allegory, it followeth not thereupon that of necessity every like word of Christ in other places was none other but an allegory. For, such kind of sophistication<sup>546</sup> in arguing was the

523 certain; secure 524 greatly 525 entrapped 526 obliged, forced; inclined 527 the end 528 support 529 from 530 fairly 531 Zwingli had died in battle in 1531. 532 even if 533 desires 534 provided... thing:

provided that given any thing 535 approve 536 acts 537 false
shrew: deceitful villain 538 attractive 539 credit; gratitude owed (to the bridegroom) 540 because that: because 541 allowed, permitted 542 as touching:

that touches upon 543 marvel me:
am amazed 544 knows 545 are 546 sophistry

very cavillation and shift<sup>547</sup> that the wicked Arians<sup>548</sup> used, which like as this young man taketh away now from the Blessed Sacrament the very<sup>549</sup> body and blood of Christ, by expounding his plain words with an allegory under color<sup>550</sup> of some other places where such allegories must needs have place, and were none otherwise meant, so did they take from Christ's blessed person his omnipotent Godhead, and would not grant him to be equal with almighty God his Father, but the plain texts of Scripture which proved his Godhead they expound wrong and frowardly,<sup>551</sup> not only by some other texts that seemed to say otherwise, but also as this young man doth here by some allegories, affirming that he was called God and the Son of God in Holy Scripture, by such manner of speaking, or as this young man calleth it, by such a manner of phrase as the Scripture for some property calleth certain other persons gods and God's sons in other places, as where God saith to Moses, "I shall make thee the god of Pharaoh";<sup>552</sup> and where he saith, "thou shalt not backbite the gods";<sup>553</sup> and where he saith, "I say you be gods and the sons of the high God be you all."<sup>554</sup>

And thus against that — that Christ was God and the Son of God — such cavillations these Arians lay<sup>555</sup> in expounding the plain places with false allegories, resembling<sup>556</sup> them to other places in which like allegories must needs have place, as this young man by the necessary allegories of Christ's words, used in the vine and in the door, would in like wise with like cavillations as the Arians used against Christ's Godhead, pull away the true literal sense of Christ's words concerning the truth of his very body and blood in the Blessed Sacrament.

And surely if this manner of handling of Scripture may be received and brought in ure<sup>557</sup> — that because of allegories used in some places every man may at his pleasure draw every place to an allegory, and say the letter meaneth nothing else — there is not any text in all the Scripture but a wilful person may find other texts against it, that may serve him to trifle out<sup>558</sup> the truth of God's words, with cavillations grounded upon God's other words, in some other place, wherein if he may be heard as long as he list<sup>559</sup> to talk — be it but a woman — yet shall she find chat<sup>560</sup> enough for all a whole year. And so did those old Arians, of whom God forbade that this young man should follow that evil example.

If every man that can find out a new-found fantasy upon a text of Holy Scripture may have his own mind<sup>561</sup> taken, and his own exposition believed, against the expositions of the old holy cunning doctors<sup>562</sup> and saints, then may you surely see that no article of the Christian faith can stand and endure long. For, as holy Saint Jerome saith of himself,<sup>563</sup> if the exposition of other interpreters and the consent<sup>564</sup> of the common<sup>565</sup> Catholic Church, were of no more strength but that every new man might be believed that could bring some texts of Scripture for him, expounded as it pleased himself, then could I, saith this holy man, bring up a new sect also, and say by Scripture that no man were a true Christian man nor a member of the Church that keepeth two coats. And in good faith if that way were allowed, I were able myself to find out fifteen new sects in one forenoon, that should have as much probable hold of Scripture as this heresy hath. Against which, besides the common faith of all Catholic Christian regions, the expositions of the old holy doctors and saints be clear<sup>566</sup> against this young man's mind in this matter, as whole<sup>567</sup> as against any heresy that ever was hitherto heard of. For, as for the words of Christ of which we speak touching<sup>568</sup> the Blessed Sacrament, though he may find some old holy men that besides the literal sense doth expound them in an allegory, yet shall he never find any of them that did as he doth now, after<sup>569</sup> Wycliffe, Oecolampadius, Tyndale, and Zwingli, deny the literal sense, and say that Christ meant not that it was his very body and his very blood indeed; but the old holy doctors and expositors besides all such allegories, do plainly declare and expound that in those words our Savior, as he expressly spoke, so did also well and plainly mean that the thing, which he there gave to his disciples

547 cavillation and shift: frivolous quibble and fraudulent stratagem 548 Arianism, which subordinates Christ to the Father, was condemned as heresy by the Council of Nicaea in 325. 549 true 550 pretext 551 perversely 552 Ex 7:1 553 Ex 22:28

554 Ps 81(82):6 555 alleged 556 likening 557 in ure: into use, practice 558 trifle out: dismiss with mockery 559 wants 560 idle prattle 561 opinion; judgment 562 cunning doctors: learned theologians 563 Dialogus adversus

Luciferianos 28 (PL 23: 181–82), referring to Mt 10:10 564 consensus 565 belonging to all mankind alike 566 entirely 567 completely 568 touching upon, concerning 569 following in the Sacrament, were in very deed his very flesh and blood. And so did never any of the old expositors of Scripture expound any of those other places in which Christ is called a vine or a door. And therefore it appeareth well that the manner of speaking was not like.<sup>570</sup> For, if it had,<sup>571</sup> then would not the old expositors have used such so far unlike fashion in the expounding of them.

And over<sup>572</sup> this, the very circumstances of the places in the Gospel, in which our Savior speaketh of that Sacrament, may well make open the difference of his speech in this matter and of all those others, and that as he spoke all those but in an allegory so spoke he this, plainly meaning that he spoke of his very body and his very blood besides all allegories. For, neither when our Lord said he was a very vine, nor when he said he was the door, there was none that heard him that anything<sup>573</sup> marveled thereof. And why? For because they perceived well that he meant not that he was a material vine indeed, nor a material door neither. But when he said that his flesh was very meat, and his blood was very drink,<sup>574</sup> and that they should not be saved but if<sup>575</sup> they did eat his flesh and drink his blood, then were they all in such a wonder thereof, that they could not abide.<sup>576</sup> And wherefore?<sup>577</sup> But because they perceived well by his words and his manner of circumstances used in the speaking of them, that Christ spoke of his very flesh and his very blood indeed. For else<sup>578</sup> the strangeness of the words would have made them to have taken it as well for an allegory as either his words of the vine or of the door. And then would they have no more marveled at the one than they did at the other. But now whereas at the vine and the door they marveled nothing,<sup>579</sup> yet at the eating of his flesh and drinking of his blood, they so sore<sup>580</sup> marveled, and were so sore moved, and thought the matter so hard, and the wonder so great, that they asked, how could that be, and went almost all their way, whereby we may well see that he spoke these words in such wise<sup>581</sup> as the hearers perceived that he meant it not in a parable nor an allegory, but spoke of his very flesh and his very blood indeed.

Many other plain proofs<sup>582</sup> might a man gather upon the circumstances of the very texts, where this thing is spoken of in the Scripture, but that it is not my purpose now to stick<sup>583</sup> in argument of this matter, that is of itself so clear<sup>584</sup> out of all question, but only a little to touch it, that ye may see how little pith<sup>585</sup> and substance for his matter is in all those examples of allegory, which Wycliffe, Oecolampadius, Tyndale, and Zwingli have brought out against the Blessed Sacrament, and wherewith those old shrews<sup>586</sup> have with their false similitudes piteously deceived either the simplicity<sup>587</sup> or the lightness of this seely<sup>588</sup> young man, which might if he had not either of lightness<sup>589</sup> overrun himself, or of simpleness been deceived, or of pride and high mind in putting forth heresies willingly beguiled and blinded, easily have perceived himself that the more such allegories that he found in the Scripture in like manner of phrases or speech the worse is his part, and the more clear is it that these places speaking of the Blessed Sacrament were plainly meant as they were spoken, besides all such allegories. For else had never both the hearers at the time and the expositors since, and all Christian people besides this fifteen hundred years, taken only in this one matter the plain literal sense being so strange and marvelous that it might seem impossible, and decline from the letter<sup>590</sup> for allegories in all such other things, being as he saith and as indeed they be, so many far in number more.

Howbeit,<sup>591</sup> as for this point—that an allegory used in some place is not a cause sufficient to make men leave the proper significations of God's Word in every other place, and seek an allegory and forsake the plain common sense and understanding of the letter—this perceived the young man well enough himself. For, he confesseth that he would not so do save<sup>592</sup> for necessity, because he seeth as he saith that the common literal sense is impossible. For, the thing he saith that is meant thereby cannot be true: that is to wit,<sup>593</sup> that the very body of Christ cannot be in the Sacrament, because the Sacrament is in many diverse places at once, and was at the Maundy<sup>594</sup>—that is to wit, in the hands of 570 similar 571 had been 572 in addition to 573 at all 574 Jn 6:54–56 575 but if: unless 576 remain there 577 why? 578 otherwise 579 not at all 580 greatly; grievously 581 a manner 582 evidence 583 persist 584 completely 585 force 586 villains 587 ignorance; foolishness 588 pitiable

589 frivolity, unsteadiness 590 literal meaning 591 However 592 except 593 say 594 Last Supper

Christ and in every of his apostles' mouths, and at that time it was not glorified. And then he saith that Christ's body, not being glorified, could no more be in two places at once than his own can. And yet he goeth after further, and saith that no more it can neither when it is glorified too. And that he proveth by the saying of Saint Augustine, whose words be, as he saith, that the body with which Christ rose must be in one place, and that it continueth in heaven, and shall do till he shall come to judge both quick<sup>595</sup> and dead. And yet at the last he proveth that the body of Christ cannot be in many places at once. For if it might be in many places at once, then it might, he saith, be in all places at once. But in all places at once he saith it cannot be, and thereof he concludeth that it cannot be in many places at once. And thus for this impossibility of the thing that riseth upon the common literal sense of Christ's words, he is, he saith, of necessity driven to fall from it unto some allegory, which he confesseth that he would not do, if the plain literal sense were possible. But alas for the dear mercy of God if we should leave the letter and seek an allegory with the destruction of the literal sense, in every place where we find a thing that reason cannot reach unto, nor see which way it were possible, and therefore would take it for impossible; fain<sup>596</sup> would I wit<sup>597</sup> what one article of all our faith this young man could assign me spoken of in the Scripture, from which his reason shall not drive away the strength of his proof in making him leave the literal sense, wherein his proof should stand and send him to seek an allegory that may stand with reason and drive away the faith, where he should believe the letter and make his reason obedient unto faith.

I marvel me very much why the consideration of this impossibility should of necessity drive this young man from the plain open literal sense of Christ's words spoken of the Blessed Sacrament, since so many good and holy men so long together this fifteen hundred years together have believed the literal sense well and firmly, and could not be driven from it for any such consideration of such impossibility, and yet being as natural men, as wise men, as well-learned men, as studious in the matter, and men of more age, and more sure, sad,<sup>598</sup> and substantial judgment than this young man is yet, and men at the least as likely to see what were possible and what were impossible as this good young man is. And therefore as for all his reasons grounded upon impossibility, since I may be bold to think as all those old holy men have thought, and as all wise men I ween yet<sup>599</sup> think, that nothing is impossible to God,<sup>600</sup> I esteem all those reasons very little worth.

Howbeit, one thing he bringeth in by the way that I would<sup>601</sup> he had showed in what place we might find it—that is to wit, the saying of Saint Augustine. For why<sup>602</sup> to seek out one line in all his books were to go look a needle in a meadow. But surely if we may see the place where the young man found it, we shall I doubt not make a clear answer to it. And yet even as himself hath rehearsed<sup>603</sup> it, that saying maketh nothing for the proof of his purpose. For Saint Augustine saith<sup>604</sup> no more but that the body in which Christ arose must be in one place, and that it continueth in heaven, and shall do till the Day of Doom.<sup>605</sup> As help me God, except<sup>606</sup> this young man in these words of Saint Augustine see further with his young sight than I can see with mine old eyes and my spectacles, I marvel me much that ever he would for his purpose once bring them in. For when Saint Augustine saith that the body in which Christ arose, must needs be in one place, he might mean by those words, for anything that here appeareth to the contrary, not that his body might not be in two diverse places at once, but that it must be in one place—that is to say, in some place one or other, or that he must have one place for his special place, and that place must be heaven, as we say God must be in heaven, and angels must be in heaven. He speaketh nothing of the Sacrament, nor saith not his body with which he rose must needs be so in one place that it can by no possibility be in any more.

Also this word “must” which is in the Latin tongue called oportet, which word Saint Augustine here useth as this young man rehearseth him, doth not always signify such a necessity, as excludeth all possibility of the contrary. For, our Savior said himself to the two disciples, Nonne haec oportuit pati Christum, et ita intrare in gloriam suam?<sup>607</sup> Was it

595 living 596 gladly, willingly 597 know 598 serious 599 ween yet:
believe still 600 Lk 1:37 601 wish

602 because 603 related 604 See Augustine's Tractatus in Iohannem 30.1.
605 Day of Doom: Judgment Day

606 unless 607 “Was it not necessary that the Christ should suffer these things and enter into his glory?” (Lk 24:26).

not so that Christ must die, and so enter into his glory? And yet himself said also that he might for all that have chosen whether he would have died or no.<sup>608</sup> For, himself saith that to depart with his soul and to take his soul again, both twain<sup>609</sup> were things put in his own power. And the prophet Isaiah saith of him, “He was offered up because he so would himself.”<sup>610</sup> And therefore this Latin word oportet, which Saint Augustine hath in that place, is many times in the Latin tongue taken not for full and precise necessity, but for expedient and convenient.<sup>611</sup> And therefore it is translated also into English, not only by this word “must” which yet signifieth not always an impossibility of the contrary, but oftentimes by this word “it behooveth” which word signifieth that it is to be done for our behalf and commodity,<sup>612</sup> and not that it can in no wise<sup>613</sup> be avoided, but that it must needs be. And therefore since all that driveth this young man from the literal sense is as he saith the impossibility of Christ’s body to be at once in diverse places, and proveth that thing impossible by the words of Saint Augustine, that saith no more but that it must be in one place, and saith not that it may be in no more but one, nor speaketh not of any such necessity whereof he putteth the contrary for impossible, nor speaketh no word at all there of the Sacrament; since Saint Augustine I say saith no further than this, I marvel much in my heart, what thing this young man seeth in his words worthy the bringing in for any proof of his purpose.

And that ye may the more clearly see that Saint Augustine speaketh here of no necessity, he not only saith that the body of Christ with which he rose must be in one place, but also he determineth that one place in which he must be, if this young man rehearse him right—that is to say, in heaven, there to continue still unto the Day of Doom.

But now I trow<sup>614</sup> this young man thinketh not that Saint Augustine for all his determining that Christ’s body in which he rose must be still in the one place—that is to wit, in heaven until the Day of Doom—he meaneth, for all that, that it is so fast bound to abide<sup>615</sup> only there, but that he may when it pleaseth him, in the selfsame body, be beneath here in earth a hundred times before the Day of Doom. And good stories are there, testifying that he so hath been diverse times ere<sup>616</sup> this, since the time of his ascension.<sup>617</sup>

And therefore this young man may perceive plainly that Saint Augustine in those words, though he say that Christ’s body with which he rose must be in one place—that is to wit, in heaven—yet he meant no such precise necessity as should drive this young man from the literal sense of Christ’s words unto the allegory. He meant not by this word, it must be in one place—that is to say in heaven—that it must so be in that one place till Doomsday, that it might in the meanwhile be in none other beside, and that it must be so of an immutable necessity by no power changeable, whereof the contrary were by no power possible. And therefore as for these words of Saint Augustine to this purpose here, I marvel much in good faith, but if<sup>618</sup> he show more hereafter, that ever this young man would speak of them.

Now as for his natural reasons be<sup>619</sup> not worth the reasoning. For first, that the body of Christ glorified could no more be in two places at once than his own can, because he is a natural body as Christ’s was, and Christ’s body a natural body as his is, I will not examine any comparisons between their two bodies. But if Christ would tell me that he would make each of both their bodies to be in fifteen places at once, I would believe him I, that he were able to make his word true in the bodies of both twain, and never would I so much as ask him whether he would glorify them both first or not. But I am sure, glorified or unglorified, if he said it, he is able to do it. When our Savior said that it was as possible for a camel or a great cable-rope to enter through a needle’s eye as for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven, and after told his apostles that though those two things were both impossible to men, yet all things were possible to God,<sup>620</sup> I think that he meant that neither the example nor the matter was to God impossible. Now since then at the leastwise that it is not impossible for him to convey the camel or the cable-rope through the needle’s eye, what shall me need to study now whether he can bring them through such as they be, or else must of fine force be fain<sup>621</sup> to glorify the camel or

608 Jn 10:18 609 together 610 Is 53:7
611 appropriate 612 advantage 613 way
614 believe 615 remain 616 before

617 See Acts 7:54–56, 9:3–15; 1 Cor 15:8.
618 but if: unless 619 they be 620 Mk

10:25; Mt 19:24; Lk 18:25 621 fine... fain: simple necessity be forced the cable first, as this young man saith of his body that it were impossible for God to bring about to have it in two places at once such as it is now, because it is yet somewhat gross<sup>622</sup> and unglorified, and then by the comparison of his own, he argueth the like of the blessed body of Christ, being like his at his Maundy no more glorified than he. But I say yet again of their bodies both twain, if he said that he would do it, I would not doubt but he could do it. And if he could not do it but if he glorified them first, then were I sure that he would glorify them both. And therefore if it were true that he could not make his own body to be in two places at once at Maundy but if<sup>623</sup> it were then glorified, then since I am sure that he there did it, I am thereby sure also that he then for the time glorified it. For that thing was in his own power to do as oft as he would, as well before his death as at his resurrection, and yet to keep his glorification from perceiving,<sup>624</sup> as he did from his two disciples, which for all his glorified body took him but for a pilgrim.<sup>625</sup> And therefore as I say, if Christ said unto me that he would make both his body, and this young man's too, each of them to be in a thousand places at once, I would put no doubt therein, but that by some manner<sup>626</sup> means he were able enough to do it.

But here would this young man peradventure<sup>627</sup> say, "Ye say very well if God so said, and by his so saying so meant indeed. But ye wot<sup>628</sup> well I deny that he so meant though<sup>629</sup> he so said. For I say that in so saying he meant but by an allegory, as he did when he called himself a vine and a door." But now must this young man consider again that himself confesseth that the cause for which himself saith that Christ in so saying did not so mean is because that if he should have meant so, it was impossible for God to bring his meaning about — that is to say, that Christ's body might be in two places at once. And therefore but if<sup>630</sup> he prove that thing impossible for God to do, else<sup>631</sup> he confesseth that God not only said it, but also meant it indeed.

And yet over<sup>632</sup> this, if Christ had never said it, yet doubt I nothing but that he is able to do it, or else were there somewhat<sup>633</sup> that he could not do, and then were God not almighty.

Now if this young man will say that to make one body to be in two places doth imply repugnance,<sup>634</sup> and that God can do no such thing, I dare be bold to tell him again that many things may seem repugnant both to him and me, which things God seeth how to make them stand together well enough.

Such blind reasons of repugnance induceth many men into great error, some ascribing all things to destiny without any power of man's free will at all, and some giving all to man's own will, and no foresight at all unto the providence of God, and all because the poor blind reason of man cannot see so far as to perceive how God's presence and man's free will can stand and agree together, but seem to them clearly repugnant.

And surely if the seeming of our own feeble reason may drive us once to think that one man to be at once in two places is a thing so hard and so repugnant, and therefore so impossible, that God himself can never bring it about, the devil will within a while set us upon such a trust unto our own reason, that he will make us take it for a thing repugnant and impossible that ever one God should be three persons.

I wot well that many good folk have used in this matter many good fruitful examples of God's other works — not only miracles written in Scripture, but also done by the common course of nature here in earth, and some things made also by man's hand, as one face beholden in diverse glasses, and in every piece of one glass broken into twenty, and the marvel of the making of the glass itself such matter as it is made of, and of one word coming whole to a hundred years at once, and the sight of one little eye present and beholding a whole great country at once, with a thousand such other marvels more — such as those that see them daily done and therefore marvel not at them shall yet never be able (no, not this young man himself) to give such reason by what means they may be done, but that he may have such repugnance laid against it that he shall be fain<sup>635</sup> in conclusion for the chief and the most evident reason to say that the cause of all those things is because God that hath caused them so to be done is almighty of himself and can do what him list.<sup>636</sup>

622 material; solid 623 but if: unless 624 being perceived 625 Mk 16:12;
Lk 24:18 626 kind of 627 perhaps 628 know 629 even if 630 but if:

unless 631 otherwise 632 in addition to 633 something 634 contradiction;

incompatibility 635 forced 636 him
list: he wishes

And also I cannot see why it should be more repugnant that one body may be by the power of God in two places at once than that two bodies may be together in one place at once. And that point I think 5 this young man denieth not. And I verily<sup>637</sup> think there is unto man's reason neither more semblance of difficulty nor of repugnance, neither in the being of one body, be it never so gross and unglorified in twenty diverse places at once, than in the 10 making of all that whole world, in which all the bodies both glorified and unglorified have all their rooms<sup>638</sup> and places—to make, I say, all that whole world of right nought.<sup>639</sup> Which article of our faith we shall find folk within a while not greatly force<sup>640</sup>
 15 to deny, if men fall to<sup>641</sup> this point, that for impossibilities of nature, they think the things impossible also to God that is the master and the maker of nature, and that they will upon that imagination do as this young man doth: flee from the literal sense of 20 the Scripture, and seek some allegory in the stead, and say they be driven thereto by necessity, by cause of the impossibility of the matter. For thus shall, as ye may well see, by this means none article of our faith stand.

25 Now his last argument with which he proveth it impossible for one body of Christ to be in two places at once is this. You can, saith he, show no reason, why he should be in many places at once and not in all. But in all places he cannot be, wherefore
 30 we must conclude that he cannot be in many places at once. This is a marvelous concluded argument. I am sure a very child may soon see that this consequent can never follow upon those two premises of his antecedent. For he can no further conclude 35 upon them but that we can show no reason why he should be in many places at once. Now if I should grant him that no man could show a reason why he should be in many places at once, what had he won by that? Might he then conclude thereupon that he 40 could not be in many places at once, as though that it were not possible for God to make his body in two places at once but if<sup>642</sup> we were able to tell how, and why, and whereby, and show the reason? Now in this argument he beginneth with “should” in the 45 major, and then in the minor and the conclusion turneth into “can” and so varyeth his extremities that the argument can never be good if it were but for that. If he would induce the conclusion which he concludeth here, he must rather have argued 50 thus. If it might be in many places at once, then might it be in all places at once. But in all places at once it cannot be, and therefore it cannot be in many places at once. Thus or in some such manner

 55 must he argue, if he will aught<sup>643</sup> prove. But here now both the parts of his antecedent be very weak. The first is this, that if the body of our Savior may be in many places at once, it may be in all places at once. Though I would grant this causal proposition for the truth of the second part, yet would I deny it
 60 him for the form. For though I grant it to be true, yet the first part is not the proof of the second, but rather contrariwise the second inferreth well the first. For the reason is good: he may be in all places, ergo he may be in many. But argue the contrariwise as this young man argueth, and then is the form
 65 very faint. For this hath little strength—he may be in many places, ergo he may be in all; many men run, ergo all men run; men run in many places, ergo men run in all places—but if<sup>644</sup> the matter maintain the argument, either by the possibility of the antecedent or by the necessity of the consequent; as one man is a stone, ergo all men be stones, one man is a living creature, ergo all men be living creatures. But let this first proposition pass and come now to 70 the second, upon which all his argument hangeth: that is, that the body of Christ cannot be at once in all places. This he saith, but how doth he prove it? If he will bid me prove the affirmative, I may answer that I need not, for it is not the thing that we have in hand. For, we do not say that he is in all places,
 75 for the Sacrament is not at once in all places. And we be not bound for this matter to go any further, and that point for<sup>645</sup> so far I prove by the Gospel that saith it is so. And therefore this young man that saith it cannot be, let him prove that it may 80 not be. For if it may be, he then confesseth that the words of Christ do prove that it must be. But because it cannot be, saith he, therefore he is driven to construe these words by an allegory. And now that it cannot be in many places, he proveth by that that 85 he cannot be in all places, and therefore must he prove that, or else give over the argument.
 90

637 truly 638 offices 639 of right nought: out of completely nothing

640 hesitate 641 fall to: take to, start in with 642 but if: unless 643 anything

644 unless 645 in

Howbeit,<sup>646</sup> as for me, though I be not bound to it, I am content yet to prove that God may make the body of Christ to be in all places at once. And because this young man coupleth that proposition
 5 with the other, so will I do too. And I prove therefore that God can make his body be both in many places, at once, and in all places at once, by that that he is almighty, and therefore can do all things. And now must this young man tell us either that this is 10 nothing, or else deny that God can do all things. And then must he limit God's power how far he will give God leave to stretch it. But when this young man shall come to that point, every wise man will, I ween,<sup>647</sup> suppose and think in themselves that 15 this young man hath yet in his youth gone too little while to school, to know all that God can do, but if he bring good witness that he hath learned up the uttermost of all God's cunning, which thing the apostle Paul for all that he was ravished up into 20 the third heaven, reckoned yet so far above his reach that he cried out, "Oh, the altitude of the riches of the wisdom and the cunning<sup>648</sup> of God."<sup>649</sup>

But yet this young man goeth about to prove that point by Scripture. For except<sup>650</sup> we grant him that 25 point to be true, he saith that else<sup>651</sup> we make the angel a liar that said, "He is not here,"<sup>652</sup> and also that else we make as though Christ's body in his ascension did not go up in the cloud into heaven from the earth,<sup>653</sup> but only hid himself in the cloud, and 30 played bo-peep and tarried beneath still.

I am in good faith sorry to see this young man presume so far upon his wit<sup>654</sup> so soon ere<sup>655</sup> it be full ripe. For surely such liking of themselves maketh many wits wax<sup>656</sup> rotten ere they wax ripe.
 35 And verily<sup>657</sup> if it do decrease and go backward in this fashion, it may not last long. For even here in the end he forgetteth himself so foul that when he was a young sophist, he would, I dare say, have been full sore<sup>658</sup> ashamed so to have overseen<sup>659</sup> himself
 40 at Oxford at a parvis.<sup>660</sup> For, ye wot<sup>661</sup> well that thing which he saith, and which he must therefore prove, is that the body of Christ cannot be in every place at once, by no means that God could make. And the texts that he bringeth in for the proof say 45 no further but that he was not in all places at once, and say not that by no possible power of his Godhead it could not be in every place at once. And therefore this point is as ye see well of this young man very youngly handled. And therefore ought 50 every man abhor as a plain pestilence all such unreasonable reasons made for nature by more than natural follies, against the possibility of God's almighty power. For we may know it verily that against these follies hath specially a place the good

 55 ghostly<sup>662</sup> counsel of Saint Paul, where he warneth us and saith, "Beware that no man beguile you by vain philosophy."<sup>663</sup>

God forbid that any man should be the more prone and ready to believe this young man in this 60 great matter, because he saith in the beginning that he will bring all men to a concord and a quietness of conscience. For, he bringeth men to the worst kind of quietness that can be devised, when he telleth us, as he doth, that every man may in this matter without peril believe which way he list.<sup>664</sup> Every 65 man may in every matter, without any counsel of his, soon set himself at rest, if he list to take that way to believe as he list himself and care not how. But and if that way had been sure, Saint Paul would never have showed that many were in peril of sick-
 70 ness and death too, for lack of discerning reverently the body of our Lord in that sacrament, when they came to receive him.<sup>665</sup>

And against this doctrine of this young brother is the plain doctrine of the old holy Fathers, interpreters 75 of the Scripture. And what fashion is this to say that we may believe if we list that there is the very body of our Lord indeed, and then to tell us for a truth that such a faith is impossible to be true, for God himself can never bring it about to make his 80 body be there?

I am very sure that the old holy doctors which believed Christ's body and his blood to be there, and so taught others to believe, as by their books plainly 85 doth appear, if they had thought either that it could not be there, or that it was not there indeed, they would not for all the good in this world have written as they have done. For, would those holy men, ween you, have taught that men be bound to believe 90 that the very body and blood of Christ is there, if

646 However 647 believe 648 wisdom; knowledge 649 2 Cor 12:2; Rom 11:33 650 unless 651 otherwise 652 Mk 16:6 653 Acts 1:9

654 intelligence, reason 655 before 656 become, grow 657 truly 658 greatly 659 deluded, mistaken 660 public disputation 661 know

662 spiritual 663 Col 2:8 664 wishes 665 1 Cor 11:29-30

themselves thought they were not bound thereto? Or would they make men honor and worship that thing as the very body and blood of Christ, which themselves thought were not it? This gere<sup>666</sup> is too childish to speak of.

Yet one great pleasure he doth us, in that he putteth us all at liberty, that we may without peril of damnation believe as we believed before: that is to wit,<sup>667</sup> that in the Blessed Sacrament the whole substance of the bread and the wine is transmuted and changed into the very body and blood of Christ. For, if we may without peril of damnation believe thus as himself granteth that we may, then granteth he that we may also without any peril of damnation believe that himself lieth, where he saith the truth of that belief is impossible.

And therefore I shall therein conclude with him, as our sovereign Lord the King's Highness in his most famous book of assertion of the Sacrament<sup>668</sup> concludeth in one place against Luther, which in his Babylonica confessed that though men in the Sacrament of the altar believed after<sup>669</sup> the common faith as they did before, there was no peril therein. Well then said the King's Grace, ye do yourself grant that in our belief is no peril. But all the Church believeth that in your way is undoubted damnation. And therefore if ye will, as wisdom would ye should, deal surely<sup>670</sup> for yourself, ye should rather leave your unsure way which ye believe, and come yourself and counsel all others whom ye would did well, to believe as we do. Lo, this reason of the King's Grace clearly concludeth this young man upon his own confession, and plainly proveth that except<sup>671</sup> he leave his belief which all good Christian folk hold for damnable, and come home again to his old faith, the common faith of all the Church, in which as himself agreeth there is no peril, I will not for courtesy say he is stark mad, but surely I will say that for his own soul the young man playeth a very young wanton pageant.<sup>672</sup>

Now whereas for another quietness of every man's conscience, this young man biddeth every man be bold, and whether the Blessed Sacrament be consecrated or unconsecrated (for though he most specially speaketh for the wine yet he speaketh it of both) and biddeth care not but take it for all that, unblest as it is, because the priest, he saith, cannot deceive us nor take from us the profit of God's institution, whether he alter the words or leave them all unsaid — is not this a wonderful doctrine of this young man? We wot well all that the priest cannot hurt us by his oversight or malice, if there be no fault upon our own part. For, that perfection that lacketh upon the priest's part, the great mercy of God doth, as we trust, of his own goodness supply. And therefore as holy Saint Chrysostom saith, no man can take harm but of himself.<sup>673</sup> But now if we see the thing disordered our own selves by the priest, and Christ's institution broken, if we then wittingly<sup>674</sup> receive it unblest and unconsecrated, and care not whether Christ's institution be kept and observed or no, but reckon it is as good without it as with it, then make we ourselves partners of the fault, and lose the profit of the Sacrament, and receive it with damnation, not for the priest's fault but for our own. Howbeit,<sup>675</sup> as for his belief that taketh it no better but for bare bread and wine, it maketh him little matter consecrated or not, saying that the better it is consecrated the more is it ever noyous<sup>676</sup> unto him that receiveth it, having his conscience cumbered<sup>677</sup> with such an execrable heresy, by which well appeareth that he putteth no difference between the body of our Lord in the Blessed Sacrament, and the common bread that he eateth at his dinner,<sup>678</sup> but rather he esteemeth it less: for the one yet, I think ere he begin, if he lack a priest he will bless it himself; the other he careth not, as he saith, whether it be blessed or no. From which abominable heresy and all his other, our Lord for his great mercy deliver him, and help to stop every good man's ears from such ungracious incantations<sup>679</sup> as this man's reasons be, which are unto such simple people as will be with the wind of every new doctrine<sup>680</sup> blown about like a weathercock much more contagious a great deal than was that evil doctrine which Saint Paul so sore reprovet, with which the false prophets had bewitched the Galatians.<sup>681</sup> But as for those that are

666 transient fancy 667 say 668 Assertio septem sacramentorum (Defense of the Seven Sacraments) 669 according to 670 securely; certainly 671 unless 672 wanton pageant: reckless performance

673 See In Johannem homiliae, PG 59: 268. 674 knowingly 675 However 676 harmful 677 burdened; vexed 678 1 Cor 11:29–30 679 an allusion to Odysseus, who seals his men's ears with wax to block out the song of the Sirens (Homer, Odyssey 12.165–200) 680 See Eph 4:14. 681 See Gal 3.

good and fast faithful folk, and have any grace or any spark of any reason in their heads, will (I verily think) never be so far overseen<sup>682</sup> as in this article (the truth whereof God hath himself testified by as many open miracles as ever he testified any one) to believe this one young man upon his barren reasons, against the faith and reason both of all old holy writers, and all good Christian people this fifteen hundred years, all which, without any doubt or question, believed against his doctrine in this Blessed Sacrament, until Berengarius<sup>683</sup> began to fall first unto this error, which when he better considered he fell from it again and forsook it utterly, and for because he had once holden it, the good man did, of his own good mind uncompelled, great penance willingly all his life after, as ye may read in Cronica cronicarum the 190th leaf. And also Friar Barnes,<sup>684</sup> albeit that,<sup>685</sup> as ye wot well, he is in many other things a brother of this young man's sect, yet in this heresy he sore abhorreth his heresy, or else he lieth himself. For at his last being here, he wrote a letter to me of his own hand, wherein he writeth that I lay that heresy wrongfully to his charge, and therein he taketh witness of God and his conscience and showeth himself so sore grieved therewith that any man should so repute him by my writing that he saith he will in my reproach make a book against me, wherein he will profess and protest his faith concerning this Blessed Sacrament, by which book it shall, he saith, appear that I have said untruly of him, and that he abhorreth this abominable heresy, which letter of his I forbear to answer till the book come. By which we may see, since he forsaketh this heresy, what faith he will profess, whether the true faith or some other kind of heresy. For, if he will profess the very<sup>686</sup> Catholic faith, he and I shall in that point be very soon agreed, and I shall then make him such answer therein as he shall have cause to be well contented with.

But in the meantime, it well contenteth me that Friar Barnes, being a man of more age, and more ripe discretion and a doctor of divinity, and in these things better learned than this young man is, abhorreth this young man's heresy in this point as well as he liketh him in many others.

And so I trust will every wise man, and not be so enchanted with such childish reasons as his be that they would thereby do as the hearers of Christ did, that<sup>687</sup> for marvel of this matter, as this young man doth now, refused our Savior and went their way from him,<sup>688</sup> but will rather let them go that will go, and abide themselves with our Savior still, as with him that hath, in the stead of this young man's vain childish foolosophy, not false apparent sophistry but the very words of eternal life. Which words I beseech our Lord give this young man the grace, against his own froward<sup>689</sup> fantasies to believe, and to the same life bring him and us both, where we shall, without the veil or covering of any manner<sup>690</sup> sacrament, behold our blessed Savior face to face, and in the bright mirror of truth the very one Godhead of the three like mighty and each almighty persons; clearly behold and perceive both that it may and indeed is, and also how it may be, that Christ's one body may be in many places at once. Which thing many that will not come there of foolish frowardness affirm to be plain impossible.

Lo, instead of a letter have you almost a book, longer than I trust good Christian folk shall need in so clear an article of the faith, and to all fast faithful people so far out of all doubt, saving that in sending you your copy again, methought I must needs write you somewhat what I myself thought of his writing. In which when I once began, albeit not very well at ease, the abomination yet of that pestilent heresy and the peril of his colorable<sup>691</sup> handling drew me forth further and further, and scant<sup>692</sup> could suffer<sup>693</sup> me now to make an end, but that I was half in mind to have touched also the schism of the Bohemians which he setteth forth here in his writing,<sup>694</sup> saving that it requireth some length, and that I am in mind to make answer once in that matter unto Friar Barnes, which hath made therein, ye wot<sup>695</sup> well, a whole treatise, wherein I wonder if himself ween<sup>696</sup> he have said well.

And as for that holy prayer that this devout young man, as a new Christ, teacheth to make at the receiving of the Blessed Sacrament all his congregation, I would not give the paring of a pear for his prayer though<sup>697</sup> it were better than it is, pulling

682 mistaken 683 Berengarius of Tours (ca. 1000–1088) 684 Robert Barnes (1495–1540), an Augustinian friar and prior in Cambridge who became a reformer and was executed for heresy in 1540 685 albeit that: although 686 true 687 who 688 Jn 6:66–68 689 unruly, perverse; untoward 690 kind of 691 having an appearance of truth 692 scarcely 693 allow 694 See Frith's A Christian Sentence (CW 7: 432/14–20). 695 know 696 thinks 697 even if

away the true faith therefore as he doth. Howbeit,<sup>698</sup> his prayer there is such devised, and penned, and painted, with leisure and study, that I trust every good Christian woman maketh a much better prayer at the time of her housel,<sup>699</sup> by faithful affection and God's good inspiration suddenly. For she, besides God's other goodness, thanketh him, I think, for his high singular benefit there presently given her, in that it liketh him to accept and receive her so simple and so far unworthy of herself to sit at his own blessed board,<sup>700</sup> and there, for a remembrance of his bitter Passion suffered for her sin, to suffer her receive and eat not bread though it seem bread, but his own very precious body in form of bread, both his very flesh, blood and bones, the selfsame with which he died and with which he rose again, and appeared again to his apostles, and ate among his disciples, and with which he ascended into heaven, and with which he shall descend again to judgment, and with which he shall reign in heaven with his Father and their Holy Spirit in eternal glory, and all his true faithful believing and loving people with him, whom as the mystical members of his glorious body he shall then, and from thenceforth forever, pleasantly nourish and feed and satiate their insatiable hunger with the beholding of his glorious Godhead, whose hunger to heavenward he comforteth and feedeth here by hope, and by the sure<sup>701</sup> token and sign of salvation, the giving of his own very blessed body under the sign and likeness of bread to be eaten and received into our bodies, that our souls by the faith thereof, and our bodies by the receiving thereof, may be spiritually and bodily joined and knit unto his here in earth, and with his holy soul and his blessed body, and his Godhead both with his Father and their Holy Spirit gloriously live after in heaven.

This lo, in effect though not in words, can Christian women pray, and some of them peradventure<sup>702</sup> express it much better too. For God can, as the prophet saith, make not only women that have age, faith, and wit,<sup>703</sup> but the mouths also of infants and young sucking children to pronounce his laud and praise,<sup>704</sup> so that we need not this young man now to come teach us how and what we shall pray, as Christ taught his disciples the Paternoster.<sup>705</sup> Frith is an unmeet<sup>706</sup> master to teach us what we should pray at the receiving of the Blessed Sacrament, when he will not acknowledge it as it is, but take Christ's blessed body for nothing but bare bread, and so little esteem the receiving of the Blessed Sacrament that he forceth<sup>707</sup> little whether it be blessed or not. I pray God bless these poisoned errors out of his blind heart, and make him his faithful servant, and send you heartily well to fare. At Chelsea the seventh day of December by the hand of more than all your own,

Tho. More, Knight

191. To Erasmus

Chelsea, <June? 1533>

Thomas More sends his greetings to Erasmus of Rotterdam.

I have received two letters<sup>708</sup> from you; the one was dated February 7th last; the other was delivered by Quirinus, who beside the letters also brought me some valuable information about the happenings in your locale. Many thanks for wanting me to have this information.

You can learn all details about your affairs from Quirinus, who strikes me as being honest and devoted. I am happy for your sake, and, since I love you, also for my own, that the present Archbishop of Canterbury<sup>709</sup> manifests as much affection for you as did Warham in days gone by; no man ever showed you greater affection, and if he appeared somewhat niggardly in his gifts toward the end of his life, it was evidently due to lack of money, not lack of heart; for he died unbelievably poor, leaving enough to cover his debts; he did not owe very much, but when all the funeral expenses were paid, there was not very much left. The Bishop of Durham<sup>710</sup> is surely being impoverished by this war, or rather, by the raids carried on by ourselves and the Scots; his diocese borders on Scotland and is such a distance from us that I hear as rarely from him as I do from you. There was a rumor afloat here that N.<sup>711</sup> and Melanchthon had held a lengthy

698 However 699 reception of the Eucharist 700 table 701 secure; certain 702 perhaps 703 reason, intelligence

704 See Ps 8:3. 705 The Lord's Prayer is given in Mt 6:9–13. 706 unfit 707 cares 708 not now extant clandestine conference here through the arrangements of some unnamed persons and that later they secretly parted; this rumor, however, has gradually faded away, and it has been found out that the story was absolutely false. The King appears to be more antagonistic toward heretics than even the bishops are.

709 Thomas Cranmer 710 Cuthbert Tunstall 711 N. is perhaps Grynaeus; see Letter 188.

The heretic Tyndale, a fellow Englishman, who is nowhere and yet everywhere an exile, wrote here recently that Melanchthon was a guest of the King of France and, on the direct word of an eyewitness, had been welcomed in Paris with a cavalcade of one hundred and fifty horses; Tyndale further expressed his fear that, if the French were to receive the word of God from Melanchthon, they would be confirmed in their belief in the Eucharist in opposition to the teaching of the Wycliffites. How those people fret over this matter, as if God had commissioned them to give the whole world its fundamental instructions in the faith!

Concerning the remark in your earlier letter that you were hesitant about publishing my letter<sup>712</sup> in spite of motives for wanting to have it published, there is no reason, my dear Erasmus, for hesitation on your part. Some chatterboxes around here began to spread the rumor that I had resigned my office<sup>713</sup> unwillingly and that I had kept that detail a secret. So, after making arrangements for the construction of my tomb, I did not hesitate to make, on my Epitaph, a public declaration of the actual facts, to allow anyone a chance to refute them, if he could. As soon as those fellows noted the Epitaph, since they were unable to deny its truth, they charged it with being boastful. However, I preferred this charge rather than allow the other rumor take hold, not for any selfish reason, since I do not have a high regard for what men may say, provided I have the approval of God; but having written several pamphlets in English in defense of the Faith against some fellow countrymen who had championed rather perverse doctrines, I considered it my duty to protect the integrity of my reputation; and so that you can find out how boastful I was, you will receive a copy of my Epitaph; you will notice, in reading it, that, out of confidence in my own position, I do not bait those fellows at all, so as to prevent them from making whimsical remarks about me. After resigning my office, I waited until the opening of the new term, and, so far, no one has advanced a complaint against my integrity. Either my life has been so spotless or, at any rate, I have been so circumspect that, if my rivals oppose my boasting of the one, they are forced to let me boast of the other. As a matter of fact, the King himself has pronounced on this situation at various times, frequently in private, and twice in public. It is embarrassing for me to relate—but on the occasion of the installation of my most distinguished successor, the King used as his mouthpiece the most illustrious Duke, I mean the Duke of Norfolk, who is the Lord High Treasurer of England, and he respectfully ordered the Duke to proclaim publicly that he had unwillingly yielded to my request for resignation; the King, however, was not satisfied even with that extraordinary manifestation of good will toward me; at a much later date, he had the same pronouncement repeated, in his presence, at a solemn session of the Lords and Commons, this time using my successor as his mouthpiece, on the formal occasion of his opening address to that assembly which, as you know, we call Parliament. Therefore, if you agree, there is no good reason for holding back the publication of my letter. As to the statement in my Epitaph that I was a source of trouble for heretics—I wrote that with deep feeling. I find that breed of men absolutely loathsome, so much so that, unless they regain their senses, I want to be as hateful to them as anyone can possibly be; for my increasing experience with those men frightens me with the thought of what the world will suffer at their hands. I shall follow your advice and make no reply to the person about whom you wrote, although I have held a lengthy letter in readiness for some time now. My reason for holding back is not that I have any regard for what he, or all of his co-workers, may think or write about me, but because I do not want to be burdened with the obligations of writing replies to outsiders, when I feel the more immediate responsibility of answering our own associates. Best wishes, my dear Erasmus, and a long farewell; the best of luck always.

From my rural home at Chelsea.

<sup>712</sup> See Letter 188. In EE 2750, Erasmus enclosed a copy of More's Letter 188 and explained that it had arrived to him after a delay of some months.

<sup>713</sup> His successor was Sir Thomas Audley.

INSCRIPTION ON THE TOMB
OF THOMAS MORE.<sup>714</sup>

Thomas More was born in London of respectable, though not distinguished, ancestry; he engaged to 5 some extent in literary matters, and after spending several years of his youth as a pleader in the law courts and after having held the office of judge as an under-sheriff in his native city, he was admitted to the Court by the Unconquerable Henry the 10 Eighth, who is the only King to have ever received the unique distinction of meriting the title “Defender of the Faith,” a title earned by deeds of sword and pen; he was received at Court, chosen member of the King’s Council, knighted, appointed under-treasurer and then chancellor of Lancaster, and finally 15 chancellor of England by the special favor of his Sovereign. Meanwhile he was elected speaker of the House of Commons; furthermore, he served as the King’s ambassador at various times and in various 20 places, last of all at Cambrai, as an associate and colleague of Cuthbert Tunstall, then bishop of London and shortly after bishop of Durham, a man whose equal in learning, wisdom, and virtue is seldom seen in the world today. In that place he witnessed, 25 in the capacity of ambassador, to his great joy, the renewal of a peace treaty between the supreme monarchs of Christendom and the restoration of a long-desired peace to the world:

May heaven confirm this peace
30 and make it a lasting one.

He so conducted himself all through this series of high offices or honors that his excellent Sovereign found no fault with his service, neither did he make himself odious to the nobles nor unpleasant to the 35 populace, but he was a source of trouble to thieves, murderers, and heretics. His father, John More, was a knight and chosen by the King as member of the group of judges known as the King’s Bench; he was an affable man, charming, irreproachable, gentle, 40 sympathetic, honest, and upright; though venerable in age, he was vigorous for a man of his years; after he had lived to see the day when his son was chancellor of England, he deemed his sojourn upon earth complete and gladly departed for heaven.
45 The son, all through his father’s lifetime, had been compared with him, and was commonly known as the young More, and so he considered himself to be; but now he felt the loss of his father, and as he looked upon the four children he had reared and his eleven grandchildren, he began, in his own mind, 50 to grow old. This feeling was increased by a serious chest ailment, that developed soon after, as an indication of approaching old age. Now sated with the passing things of this life, he resigned office and, through the unparalleled graciousness of a most indulgent Sovereign (may God smile favorably upon 55 his enterprises), he at length reached the goal which almost since boyhood had been the object of his longing – to have the last years of his life all to himself, so that he could gradually retire from the affairs of this world and contemplate the eternity of the life to come. Then he arranged for the construction of this tomb for himself, to be a constant reminder of the unrelenting advance of death, and had the remains of his first wife transferred to this place. That 60 he may not have erected this tomb in vain while still alive, and that he may not shudder with fear at the thought of encroaching death, but may go to meet it gladly, with longing for Christ, and that he may find death not completely a death for himself but rather the gateway to a happier life, I beg you, kind 65 reader, attend him with your prayers while he still lives and also when he has done with life.

My beloved wife, Jane, lies here.
I, Thomas More, intend that this same 75 tomb shall be Alice’s and mine, too. One of these ladies, my wife in the days of my youth, has made me father of a son and three daughters; the other has been as devoted to her stepchildren (a rare attainment in 80 a stepmother) as very few mothers are to their own children. The one lived out her life with me, and the other still lives with me on such terms that I cannot decide whether I did love the one or do love the 85 other more. O, how happily we could have lived all three together if fate and morality permitted. Well, I pray that the grave, that heaven, will bring us together. Thus death will give what life could not. 90

<sup>714</sup> The monument was much damaged in the bombing of Chelsea Old Church, but has been carefully restored.

This tomb, with epitaph, Thomas More had erected in 1532 at his parish church in Chelsea within months of his May 16 retirement from royal service. He sent the text to Erasmus for publication, as seen here in Letter 191.

192. To Elizabeth Barton<sup>715</sup> Chelsea, Tuesday <1533?>

Good Madam, and my right dearly beloved sister in our Lord God.

5 After my most hearty recommendation,<sup>716</sup> I shall beseech you to take my good mind<sup>717</sup> in good worth, and pardon me that I am so homely<sup>718</sup> as of myself unrequired,<sup>719</sup> and also without necessity, to give counsel to you, of whom for the good inspirations, 10 and great revelations that it liketh almighty God of his goodness to give and show, as many wise, well learned, and very virtuous folk testify, I myself have need, for the comfort of my soul, to require and ask advice, for surely, good Madam, since it pleaseth God 15 sometime to suffer<sup>720</sup> such as are far under and of little estimation, to give yet fruitful advertisement<sup>721</sup> to other as are in the light of the Spirit, so far above them, that there were between them no comparison;
as he suffered his high prophet Moses to be in some 20 things advised and counseled by Jethro,<sup>722</sup> I cannot for the love that in our Lord I bear you refrain to put you in remembrance of one thing, which in my poor mind I think highly necessary to be by your wisdom considered, referring the end and order thereof, to 25 God and his Holy Spirit to direct you.

Good Madam, I doubt not, but that you remember that in the beginning of my communication with you, I showed you that I neither was, nor would be, curious of any knowledge of other 30 men's matters, and least of all any matter of princes or of the realm, in case it so were that God had, as to many good folks before time he hath, any things revealed unto you, such things, I said unto your ladyship, that I was not only not desirous to hear of, but also would not hear of. Now, Madam, I consider well that many folk desire to speak with you, 35 which are not all peradventure<sup>723</sup> of my mind in this point, but some hap to be curious and inquisitive of things that little pertain unto their parts; and some might peradventure happen to talk of such 40 things as might peradventure after turn to much harm, as I think you have heard how the late Duke

<sup>715</sup> Elizabeth Barton (ca. 1506–34) was a maidservant who claimed to have visions and denounced the King's divorce. In 1534, she was arrested, required to do public penance, and hanged. <sup>716</sup> commendation of myself to your benevolent remembrance or regard <sup>717</sup> opinion; judgment <sup>718</sup> familiar,

rude <sup>719</sup> unasked <sup>720</sup> allow; permit <sup>721</sup> admonition <sup>722</sup> Ex 18:12–27 <sup>723</sup> possibly <sup>724</sup> Edward Stafford, 3rd Duke of Buckingham, was executed for treason in 1521. <sup>725</sup> disinherit <sup>726</sup> any such manner things: any things of such kind <sup>727</sup> converse <sup>728</sup> one who prays for another <sup>729</sup> More's of Buckingham<sup>724</sup> moved with the fame of one that was reported for a holy monk and had such talking with him as after was a great part of his destruction and disheriting<sup>725</sup> of his blood, and great slander and infamy of religion. It sufficeth me, good Madam, to 45 put you in remembrance of such thing, as I nothing doubt your wisdom and the spirit of God shall keep you from talking with any persons, specially with lay persons, of any such manner things<sup>726</sup> as pertain 50 to princes' affairs, or the state of the realm, but only to commune<sup>727</sup> and talk with any person high and low, of such manner things as may to the soul be profitable for you to show and for them to know. 55

And thus my good Lady, and dearly beloved sister in our Lord, I make an end of this my needless advertisement unto you, whom the blessed Trinity preserve and increase in grace, and put in your mind to recommend me and mine unto him in your devout 60 prayers. At Chelsea this Tuesday by the hand of Your hearty loving brother and beadsman,<sup>728</sup>

Thomas More, Kt.

192a. To John Harris<sup>729</sup>

Willesden, Sunday, <January–April 1534> 65

Neomenia,<sup>730</sup> the first day of the new moon next after the equinoctial in Vere,<sup>731</sup> that is to wit after the entering of the sun into Aries,<sup>732</sup> which is the eleventh or twelfth day of March, the day of next change of the moon after that, is the first day of the year 70 with the Jews. And the fourteenth day after, which is Quartadecima Luna,<sup>733</sup> is the eating of their paschal lamb at night, and that day is not holy day till night. And on the morrow is their great feast day, that is to wit,<sup>734</sup> the first day of the unleavened bread, 75 but it beginneth in the evening before, and so do all their feasts, and their Sabbath days begin in the evening, and endure to the evening following, A vespere ad vesperum servabitis sabbata vestra: Levitici 23.<sup>735</sup> 80 The year in which our Savior was crucified, Quartadecima Luna fell in feria quinta,<sup>736</sup> that is to wit upon the Thursday. And therefore in the evening secretary, who married Dorothy Coly, Margaret Roper's maid <sup>730</sup> new moon <sup>731</sup> spring <sup>732</sup> the ram, a sign of the zodiac <sup>733</sup> fourteenth day (of the moon) <sup>734</sup> say <sup>735</sup> From evening to evening ye shall keep your sabbaths. <sup>736</sup> the fifth ferial day that Thursday Christ made his Maundy, and so did all the Jews, for that was the very day appointed by the Scripture in Exodus.<sup>737</sup> And on the morrow (which was Good Friday, and which was Quintadecima Luna)<sup>738</sup> was the first day and the chief day of the unleavened bread, which feast began in the evening before, that is to wit, on Shere<sup>739</sup> Thursday, when the eating of the paschal lamb was, and therefore was eaten with unleavened bread. And so consequently Christ did consecrate in unleavened bread, for in that evening began Primus dies Azimorum,<sup>740</sup> as appeareth plainly by Saint Matthew, Saint Mark, and Saint Luke. But the posterior Greeks say that Christ did not eat his paschal lamb in the day appointed by the law, that is to wit, in vespere quartadecimae Lunae,<sup>741</sup> but they say he did prevent<sup>742</sup> the time by a day, and did eat it in vespere decimae tertiae Lunae.<sup>743</sup> But yet they said not that he ate it on the Wednesday, for in that I mistook them. But they say that the Thursday was decimatertia Luna,<sup>744</sup> and that Quartadecima Luna (in which the paschal<sup>745</sup> should be eaten by the law) was on Good Friday, and that the Jews did eat it then, and that in that evening upon Good Friday (in which day Christ died) the Jews did eat the paschal lamb, and that on the morrow (which was the Sabbath day) was Quintadecima Luna, and so therefore on that day was their great feast, that is to wit the first day of the unleavened bread, which began they say on Good Friday in the evening at the rising of the moon. And for that cause they say that Christ did consecrate in leavened bread, because he consecrated on the Thursday, which was they say not Quartadecima Luna, but decima tertia, and that the unleavened bread came not in until the evening in Quartadecima Luna, that was, they say, not till Good Friday in the evening, which they prove by the words of Saint John cap. 13. Ante diem festum paschae,<sup>746</sup> and they say festum paschae was the feast of eating of the paschal lamb. And so our Lord, say they, made his Maundy before the feast of the eating of the paschal lamb, that is to wit, the day before Quartadecima Luna. And so Shere Thursday they say was decima tertia Luna. And therefore say they that the very day thereof (that is to wit, Quartadecima Luna) was they say on Good Friday. And the Jews they say did eat that day after Christ's death, and that therefore they would not come in praetorium, ut non contaminarentur, sed ut manducarent pascha.<sup>747</sup> And that Christ (because he knew that he should that day be crucified) did prevent the day, and did eat it the day before, and therefore they had no one unleavened bread.

I put you in remembrance of this because I have mistaken it in the paper that you have, and have said that the Greeks held that Christ held his Maundy on Tenebrae Wednesday. I pray you, gentle John Harris, amend that fault of mine. Ante diem festum Paschae,<sup>748</sup> is meant by the first day of the feast of the unleavened loaves which was on Good Friday, that was Quinta decima Luna, and the feast was called festum Paschae,<sup>749</sup> because it began in the evening on Shere Thursday, wherein the paschal lamb was eaten. Quod abstinebant a praetorio (ut mundi manducarent Pascha)<sup>750</sup> upon Good Friday, was for the unleavened bread which was also called by the name of Pascha, and continued seven days.

Burgensis<sup>751</sup> maketh another manner of reckoning, with which we shall not need to meddle; thus much is perplex enough.

From Willesden<sup>752</sup> this present Sunday, by Your lover Thomas More, Knight

194. To Thomas Cromwell

Chelsea, 1 February <1533/4>

A letter written by Sir Thomas More to Master Thomas Cromwell (then one of the King's Privy Council) the first day of February in the year of our Lord God 1533, after the computation of the Church of England and in the twenty-fifth year of the reign of King Henry the VIII. [Workes 1422]

737 Ex 12:43 ff. 738 the fifteenth of the month 739 Sheer ("Shere") was applied to Maundy Thursday, alluding to the purification of the soul by confession, and perhaps also to the practice of washing the altars on that day. The usual name Maundy Thursday comes from the Latin mandatum, referring to the new "commandment," Jn 13:11-14. 740 first day of unleavened bread 741 in the evening of the fourteenth of the month 742 act in anticipation of 743 in the evening of the thirteenth of the month 744 the thirteenth 745 the paschal lamb 746 before the day of the feast of the Passover 747 "and they themselves entered not into the Praetorium, that they might not be defiled, but might eat the Passover" (Jn 18:28) 748 before the feast of the Passover 749 the feast of the Passover 750 Because they kept away from the Praetorium so that they might eat the Passover undefiled. 751 Paul de Santa Maria, born in Burgos, ca. 1351. 752 A parish adjoining the county of London on the northwest. More may have gone there to visit the pilgrimage church of Our Lady of Willesden. His wife's son-in-law, Sir Giles Alington, had a country home in Willesden.

Right Worshipful,<sup>753</sup> in my most hearty wise<sup>754</sup>
I recommend me<sup>755</sup> unto you.

Sir, my cousin William Rastell hath informed me that your Mastership of your goodness showed him 5 that it hath been reported that I have against the book of certain articles (which was late put forth in print by the King's honorable Council) made an answer, and delivered it unto my said cousin to print.
And albeit that<sup>756</sup> he for his part truly denied it, yet 10 because he somewhat remained in doubt, whether your Mastership gave him therein full credence or not, he desired me for his farther discharge<sup>757</sup> to declare you the very truth, sir, as help me God neither my said cousin nor any man else, never had 15 any book of mine to print, one or other, since the said book of the King's Council came forth. For of truth the last book that he printed of mine was that book that I made against an unknown heretic which hath sent over a work that walketh in over 20 many men's hands<sup>758</sup> named the Supper of the Lord, against the Blessed Sacrament of the altar. My answer whereunto, albeit that the printer (unaware to me)<sup>759</sup> dated it anno 1534, by which it seemeth to be printed since the Feast of the Circumcision, yet was 25 it of very truth both made and printed and many of them gone before Christmas. And myself never espied the printer's oversight in the date, in more than three weeks after. And this was in good faith the last book that my cousin<sup>760</sup> had of mine. Which being 30 true as of truth it shall be found, sufficeth<sup>761</sup> for his declaration in this behalf.

As touching mine own self, I shall say thus much farther, that on my faith I never made any such book nor ever thought to do. I read the said book 35 once over and never more. But I am for once reading<sup>762</sup> very far off from many things, whereof I would have meetly<sup>763</sup> sure knowledge, ere<sup>764</sup> ever I would make an answer, though the matter and the book both, concerned the poorest man in a town, 40 and were of the simplest man's making too. For of many things which in that book be touched, in some I know not the law, and in some I know not the fact. And therefore would I never be so childish nor so play the proud arrogant fool, by whomsoever

the book had been made, and to whomsoever the 45 matter had belonged, as to presume to make an answer to the book, concerning the matter whereof I never were sufficiently learned in the laws, nor fully instructed in the facts. And then while the matter 50 pertained unto the King's Highness, and the book professeth openly that it was made by his honorable Council, and by them put in print with his Grace's license obtained thereunto I verily<sup>765</sup> trust in good faith that of your good mind toward me, though I 55 never wrote you word thereof, yourself will both think and say so much for me, that it were a thing far unlikely, that an answer should be made thereunto by me. I will by the grace of almighty God, as long as it shall please him to lend me life 60 in this world, in all such places (as I am of my duty to God and the King's Grace bounden) truly say my mind, and discharge<sup>766</sup> my conscience, as becometh a poor honest true man, wheresoever I shall be by his Grace commanded. Yet surely if it should hap-65 pen any book to come abroad in the name of his Grace or his honorable Council, if the book to me seemed such as myself would not have given mine own advice to the making, yet I know my bounden duty, to bear more honor to my prince, and more 70 reverence to his honorable Council, than that it could become me for many causes, to make an answer unto such a book, or to counsel and advise any man else to do it. And therefore as it is a thing that I never did nor intended, so I heartily beseech 75 you if you shall happen to perceive any man, either of evil will or of lightness,<sup>767</sup> any such thing report by<sup>768</sup> me, be so good master to me, as help to bring us both together. And then never take me for honest after, but if you find his honesty somewhat im-80 paired in the matter.

Thus am I bold upon your goodness to encumber you with my long rude<sup>769</sup> letter, in the contents whereof, I eftsoons<sup>770</sup> heartily beseech you to be in manner aforesaid good master and friend unto me, whereby you shall bind me to be your beadsman<sup>771</sup> 85 while I live, as knoweth our Lord, whose especial grace both bodily and ghostly<sup>772</sup> long preserve and keep you.

753 Distinguished, Honorable 754 manner 755 recommend me: commend myself to your benevolent remembrance or regard 756 albeit that: although 757 acquittal
758 walketh . . . hands: is in the hands of too many men 759 unaware to me: without my knowledge 760 Rastell was the son of John Rastell by his wife Elizabeth, More's sister. 761 is adequate 762 But . . .

reading: Because I read the book only once 763 suitably 764 before 765 truly 766 clear 767 inconstancy 768 of 769 inelegant 770 a second time 771 to be one to pray for him 772 spiritually

At Chelsea in the Vigil of the Purification of our Blessed Lady by the hand of Assuredly all your own,

Thomas More, Knight

5 195. To Thomas Cromwell
Chelsea, Saturday, <February–March> 1533/4

Another letter written by Sir Thomas More to Master Thomas Cromwell in February or in March in the year of our Lord God 1533, after the computation<sup>773</sup> of the Church of England, and in the twenty-fifth year of the reign of King Henry the Eighth. [Workes 1423]

Right Worshipful.<sup>774</sup>

After right hearty recommendation,<sup>775</sup> so it is that 15 I am informed, that there is a bill<sup>776</sup> put in against me into the higher house before the Lords, concerning my communication with the Nun of Canterbury,<sup>777</sup> and my writing unto her, whereof I not a little marvel, the truth of the matter being such as 20 God and I know it is, and as I have plainly declared unto you by my former letters, wherein I found you then so good, that I am now bold eftsoons<sup>778</sup> upon your goodness to desire you to show me that favor, as that I might the rather by your good means, 25 have a copy of the bill. Which seen, if I find any untrue surmise<sup>779</sup> therein as of likelihood there is, I may make mine humble suit unto the King's good Grace, and declare the truth, either to his Grace or by his Grace's commandment, wheresoever the 30 matter shall require. I am so sure of my truth toward his Grace, that I cannot mistrust his gracious favor toward me, upon the truth known, nor the judgment of any honest man. Nor never shall there loss in this matter grieve me, being myself so inno-35 cent as God and I know me, whatsoever should happen me therein, by the grace of almighty God, who both bodily and ghostly<sup>780</sup> preserve you. At Chelsea this present Saturday by the hand of 40 Heartily all your own,

Tho. More, Knight

197. To Thomas Cromwell
<March? 1534>

Right Worshipful.

After my most hearty recommendation, with like thanks for your goodness in the accepting of my 45 rude<sup>781</sup> long letter, I perceive that of your further goodness and favor toward me, it liked<sup>782</sup> your Mastership to break with<sup>783</sup> my son Roper of that, that I had had communication, not only with diverse that were of acquaintance with the lewd<sup>784</sup> Nun of Can- 50 terbury, but also with herself; and had, over<sup>785</sup> that,
by my writing, declaring favor toward her, given her advice and counsel; of which my demeanor,<sup>786</sup> that it liketh you to be content to take the labor and the pain, to hear, by mine own writing, the truth, I very 55 heartily thank you, and reckon myself therein right deeply beholden<sup>787</sup> to you.

It is, I suppose, about eight or nine years ago since
I heard of that huswife<sup>788</sup> first; at which time the Bishop of Canterbury that then was, God assoil<sup>789</sup> 60 his soul, sent unto the King's Grace a roll of paper in which were written certain words of hers, that she had, as report was then made, at sundry times spoken in her trances; whereupon it pleased the King's Grace to deliver me the roll, commanding 65 me to look thereon and afterward show him what I thought therein. Whereunto, at another time, when his Highness asked me, I told him, that in good faith
I found nothing in these words that I could anything regard or esteem, for saving that some part 70 fell in rhyme, and that, God wot,<sup>790</sup> full rude, else for any reason, God wot, that I saw therein, a right simple<sup>791</sup> woman might, in my mind, speak it of her own wit<sup>792</sup> well enough; howbeit, I said, that because it was constantly reported for a truth, that God 75 wrought in her, and that a miracle was showed upon her, I durst not nor would not, be bold in judging the matter. And the King's Grace, as methought, esteemed the matter as light as it after proved lewd.<sup>793</sup>

From that time till about Christmas was twelve- 80 month,<sup>794</sup> albeit that continually, there was much talking of her, and of her holiness, yet never heard
I any talk rehearsed,<sup>795</sup> either of revelation of hers,

773 reckoning 774 Distinguished,
Honorable 775 commendation of myself
to your benevolent remembrance or regard 776 A Bill of Attainder, February 21, 1534, against the Nun of Kent and her colleagues, included More and Fisher, but for misprision not for treason. 777 Elizabeth Barton. See Letter 192. 778 again 779 suspicion 780 spiritually 781 unskilled 782 pleased 783 break with: reveal to 784 villainous or ignorant 785 in addition to 786 conduct

787 obliged 788 worthless or pert woman 789 absolve 790 knows 791 unlearned 792 intellect 793 evil
794 Christmas was twelvemonth:
Christmas a year ago 795 recounted or miracle, saving that I had heard some times in my Lord Cardinal's days, that she had been both with his lordship and with the King's Grace, but what she said either to the one or to the other, upon my faith, I had never heard any one word.

Now, as I was about to tell you, about Christmas was twelvemonth, Father Resby, Friar Observant, then of Canterbury, lodged one night at mine house; where after supper, a little before he went to his chamber, he fell in communication with me of the Nun, giving her high commendation of holiness, and that it was wonderful to see and understand the works that God wrought in her; which thing, I answered, that I was very glad to hear it, and thanked God thereof. Then he told me, that she had been with my Lord Legate in his life and with the King's Grace, too, and that she had told my Lord Legate a revelation of hers, of three swords that God hath put in my Lord Legate's hand, which if he ordered not well, God would lay it sore<sup>796</sup> to his charge, the first he said was the ordering of the spirituality<sup>797</sup> under the Pope, as Legate, the second the rule that he bore in order of the temporalty<sup>798</sup> under the King, as his chancellor. And the third, she said, was the meddling<sup>799</sup> he was put in trust with by the King, concerning the great matter of his marriage. And therewithal I said unto him that any revelation of the King's matters I would not hear of, I doubt not but the goodness of God should direct his Highness with his grace and wisdom, that the thing should take such end, as God should be pleased with, to the King's honor and surety<sup>800</sup> of the realm. When he heard me say these words or the like, he said unto me, that God had specially commanded her to pray for the King; and forthwith<sup>801</sup> he broke again<sup>802</sup> into her revelations, concerning the Cardinal that his soul was saved by her meditation;<sup>803</sup> and without any other communication went into his chamber. And he and I never talked any more of any such manner of matter, nor since his departing on the morrow, I never saw him after to my remembrance, till I saw him at Paul's Cross.<sup>804</sup>

After this, about Shrovetide,<sup>805</sup> there came unto me, a little before supper, Father Rich,<sup>806</sup> Friar Observant of Richmond. And as we fell in talking, I asked him of Father Resby, how he did? and upon that occasion, he asked me whether Father Resby had anything showed me of the Holy Nun of Kent? and I said yea, and that I was very glad to hear of her virtue. I would not, quoth he, tell you again that you have heard of him already, but I have heard and known many great graces that God hath wrought in her, and in other folk, by her, which I would gladly tell you if I thought you had not heard them already. And therewith he asked me, whether Father Resby had told me anything of her being with my Lord Cardinal? and I said yea. Then he told you, quoth he, of the three swords; yea verily,<sup>807</sup> quod I. Did he tell you, quoth he, of the revelations that she had concerning the King's Grace? Nay, forsooth, quoth I, nor if he would have done I would not have given him the hearing; nor verily no more I would in deed, for since she hath been with the King's Grace herself, and told him, methought it a thing needless to tell the matter to me, or any man else. And when Father Rich perceived that I would not hear her revelations concerning the King's Grace he talked on a little of her virtue and let her revelations alone; and therewith my supper was set upon the board<sup>808</sup> where I required<sup>809</sup> him to sit with me, but he would in no wise tarry but departed to London. After that night I talked with him twice, once in mine own house, another time in his own garden at the Friars, at every time a great space, but not of any revelation touching the King's Grace, but only of other mean<sup>810</sup> folk, I knew not whom, of which things some were very strange and some were very childish. But albeit that he said that he had seen her lie in her trance in great pains and that he had at other times taken great spiritual comfort in her communication, yet did he never tell me she had told him those tales herself; for if he had I would, for the tale of Mary Magdalene<sup>811</sup> which he told me, and for the tale of the Host, with which, as I heard, she

796 grievously 797 the clergy
798 temporality 799 action 800 security
801 immediately 802 broke again: began to speak again of 803 intercession on behalf of. This the nun claimed in 1531.
804 The nun and the clergy who had helped her were forced to read their confessions in public penance before St. Paul's Cathedral, November 1533. 805 days of shiving just before Lent 806 Hugh Rich was included in the Act of Attainder but was not executed at Tyburn. We do not know whether he had died or had been pardoned. He had been Warden at Canterbury, in which post Resby had succeeded him. 807 truly 808 table 809 asked 810 of low degree 811 Dr. Bocking, a Benedictine monk at Canterbury, kept a book, in his own handwriting, of the nun's revelations. In 1534 the nun "confessed that the letter purporting to have been written by Mary Magdalene in Heaven, and sent to a widow in London, was written by a monk of St. Augustine's in Canterbury, named Hawkeherst" (LP 7:72).

said she was houseled,<sup>812</sup> at the King's Mass at Calais;<sup>813</sup> if I had heard it of him as told unto himself by her mouth for a revelation, I would have both liked him and her the worse. But whether ever I heard
 5 that same tale of Rich or of Resby or of neither of them both, but of some other man since she was in hold,<sup>814</sup> in good faith I cannot tell. But I wor<sup>815</sup> well when or where so ever I heard it, methought it a tale too marvelous to be true, and very likely that she 10 had told some man her dream, which told it out for a revelation. And in effect, I little doubted but that some of these tales that were told of her were untrue; but yet since I never heard them reported, as spoken by her own mouth, I thought nevertheless 15 that many of them might be true, and she a very virtuous woman too; as some lies peradventure<sup>816</sup> written of some that be saints in heaven, and yet many miracles in deed done by them for all that.

After this I being upon a day at Syon talking 20 with diverse of the Fathers together at the grate, they showed me that she had been with them, and showed me diverse things that some of them misliked in her and in this talking, they wished that I had spoken with her and said they would fain see
 25 how I should like her; whereupon, afterward, when I heard that she was there again, I came thither to see her and to speak with her myself. At which communication had, in a little chapel, there were none present but we two. In the beginning whereof I showed 30 that my coming to her was not of any curious mind, anything to know of such things as folk talked, that it pleased God to reveal and show unto her, but for the great virtue that I had heard for so many years, every day more and more spoken and reported of
 35 her, I therefore had a great mind to see her, and be acquainted with her, that she might have somewhat the more occasion to remember me to God in her devotion and prayers; whereunto she gave me a very good virtuous answer that as God did of his goodness far better by her than such a poor wretch was 40 worthy, so she feared that many folk yet beside that spoke of their own favorable minds many things for her, far above the truth, and that of me she had many such things heard, that already she prayed for 45 me and ever would, whereof I heartily thanked her.

I said unto her, "Madam, one Helen, a maiden dwelling about Totnam, of whose trances and revelations there hath been much talking, she hath been with me late<sup>817</sup> and showed me that she was with 50 you, and that after the rehearsal of such visions as she had seen, you showed her that they were no revelations, but plain illusions of the devil and advised her to cast them out of her mind, and verily she gave therein good credence unto you and thereupon hath left to lean<sup>818</sup> any longer unto such
 55 visions of her own, whereupon she saith, she findeth your words true, for ever since she hath been the less visited with such things as she was wont to be before." To this she answered me, "Forsooth, sir, there is in this point no praise unto me, but the goodness
 60 of God, as it appeareth, hath wrought much meekness in her soul, which hath taken my rude warning so well and not grudged to hear her spirit and her visions reprov'd." I liked her in good faith better for this answer than for many of those things that 65 I heard reported by<sup>819</sup> her. Afterward she told me, upon that occasion how great need folk have, that are visited with such visions, to take heed and prove well of what spirit they come of, and in the communication she told me that of late the devil, in likeness of a bird, was fleeing<sup>820</sup> and flickering about her in a chamber, and suffered himself to be taken; and being in hands suddenly changed, in their sight that were present, into such a strange ugly fashioned 70 bird, that they were all afraid, and threw him out at a window.

For conclusion, we talked no word of the King's Grace or any great personage else, nor in effect, of any man or woman, but of herself, and myself, but after no long communication had for or ever we 80 met,<sup>821</sup> my time came to go home, I gave her a double ducat,<sup>822</sup> and prayed her to pray for me and mine, and so departed from her and never spoke with her after. Howbeit,<sup>823</sup> of truth I had a great good opinion of her, and had her in great estimation as you 85 shall perceive by the letter that I wrote unto her. For afterward because I had often heard, that many right worshipful folks as well men as women used to have much communication with her, and many folk are of nature inquisitive and curious, whereby
 90

812 communicated 813 "When the King was at Calais, she saw the Host taken from the priest with the blessed blood, and angels brought it to her to receive"

(LP 6.1466). 814 custody 815 know 816 perhaps 817 lately 818 left to lean: stopped leaning 819 of 820 flying 821 but . . . met: i.e., we did not talk for very long because I had to leave shortly after we met. 822 Venetian gold coin 823 However they fall sometime into such talking, as better were to forbear, of which thing I nothing thought while I talked with her of charity, therefore I wrote her a letter thereof, which since it may be peradventure, that she brake<sup>824</sup> or lost, I shall insert the very copy thereof in this present letter.

Good Madam and my right dearly beloved Sister in our Lord God. — [Here More inserted a copy of his letter to Elizabeth Barton, Letter 192.]

At the receipt of this letter she answered my servant that she heartily thanked me. Soon after this there came to mine house the proctor<sup>825</sup> of the Charterhouse at Sheen and one brother William with him, which nothing talked with me but of her and of the great joy that they took in her virtue, but of any of her revelations they had no communication. But at another time brother William came to me, and told me a long tale of her, being at the house of a Knight in Kent, that was sore troubled with temptation to destroy himself; and none other thing we talked of nor should have done of likelihood, though we had tarried together much longer. He took so great pleasure, good man, to tell that tale with all the circumstances at length. When I came again another time to Syon, on a day in which there was a profession,<sup>826</sup> some of the fathers asked me how I liked the Nun? And I answered that, in good faith, I liked her very well in her talking; “howbeit,” quoth I, “she is never the nearer tried by that, for I assure you she were likely to be very bad, if she seemed good, ere I should think her other, till she happed to be proved naught;”<sup>827</sup> and in good faith, that is my manner indeed, except I were set to search and examine the truth upon likelihood of some cloaked evil; for in that case, although I nothing suspected the person myself, yet no less than if I suspected him sore,<sup>828</sup> I would as far as my wit would serve me, search to find out the truth as yourself hath done very prudently in this matter; wherein you have done, in my mind, to your great laud and praise, a very meritorious deed in bringing forth to light such detestable hypocrisy, whereby every other wretch may take warning, and be feared<sup>829</sup> to set forth their own devilish dissimuled<sup>830</sup> falsehood, under the manner and color of the wonderful work of God; for verily, this woman so handled herself, with help of the evil spirit that inspired her, that after her own confession declared at Paul’s cross, when I sent word by my servant unto the Proctor of the Charterhouse, that she was undoubtedly proved a false deceiving hypocrite; the good man had had so good opinion of her so long that he could at the first scantily<sup>831</sup> believe me therein. Howbeit it was not he alone that thought her so very good, but many another right good man beside, as little marvel was upon so good report, till she was proved naught.

I remember me further, that in communication between Father Rich and me, I counseled him, that in such strange things as concerned such folk as had come unto her, to whom, as she said, she had told the causes of their coming ere themselves spoke thereof; and such good fruit as they said that many men had received by her prayer he and such other as so reported it, and thought that the knowledge thereof should much pertain to the glory of God, should first cause the things to be well and surely examined by the ordinaries,<sup>832</sup> and such as had authority thereunto; so that it might be surely known whether the things were true or not, and that there were no lies intermingled among them or else the lies might after hap to away<sup>833</sup> the credence of those things that were true. And when he told me the tale of Mary Magdalene, I said unto him, “Father Rich, that she is a good virtuous woman, in good faith, I hear so many good folk so report her, that I verily think it true; and think it well likely that God worketh some good and great things by her. But yet are, you wot well, these strange tales no part of our creed; and therefore before you see them surely proved, you shall have my poor counsel not to wed<sup>834</sup> yourself so far forth to the credence of them, as to report them very surely for true, lest that if it should hap that they were afterward proved false, it might diminish your estimation in your preaching, whereof might grow great loss.” To this he thanked me for my counsel, but how he used it after that, I cannot tell.

Thus have I, good Master Cromwell, fully declared you, as far as myself can call to remembrance, all that ever I have done or said in this matter

824 destroyed 825 Henry Man, professed and proctor at Sheen, which was renamed Richmond by Henry VII 826 day of taking vows 827 bad, wicked 828 grievously 829 afraid 830 dissembled 831 hardly 832 one who has immediate ecclesiastical jurisdiction — archbishop, bishop or bishop’s deputy 833 (take) away 834 be obstinately attached to wherein I am sure that never one of them all shall tell you any farther thing of effect,<sup>835</sup> for if any of them, or any man else, report of me as I trust verily no man will, and I wot well truly no man can, any word or deed by me spoken or done, touching any breach of my loyal troth<sup>836</sup> and duty toward my most redoubted<sup>837</sup> sovereign and natural liege<sup>838</sup> lord, I will come to mine answer, and make it good in such wise as becometh a poor true man to do; that whosoever any such thing shall say, shall therein say untrue; for I neither have in this matter done evil nor said evil, nor so much as any evil thing thought, but only have been glad, and rejoiced of them that were reported for good; which condition I shall nevertheless keep toward all other good folk, for the false cloaked hypocrisy of any of these, no more than I shall esteem<sup>839</sup> Judas the true apostle, for Judas the false traitor.

But so purpose I to bear myself in every man's company, while I live, that neither good man nor bad, neither monk, friar nor nun, nor other man or woman in this world shall make me digress from my troth and faith, either toward God, or toward my natural prince, by the grace of almighty God; and as you therein find me true, so I heartily therein pray you to continue toward me your favor and good will, as you shall be sure of my poor daily prayer, for other pleasure can I none do you. And thus the blessed Trinity, both bodily and ghostly,<sup>840</sup> long preserve and prosper you.

I pray you pardon me, that I write not unto you of mine own hand, for verily I am compelled to forbear writing for a while by reason of this disease of mine, whereof the chief occasion is grown, as it is thought, by the stooping and leaning on my breast, that I have used in writing. And this, eftsoons,<sup>841</sup> I beseech our Lord long to preserve you.

198. To Henry VIII

Chelsea, 5 March <1534>

It may like your Highness<sup>842</sup> to call to your gracious remembrance, that at such time as of that great weighty room and office of your chancellor (with which so far above my merits or qualities able and meet<sup>843</sup> therefor, your Highness had of your incomparable goodness honored and exalted me), ye were so good and gracious unto me as at my poor humble suit to discharge and disburden me, giving me the license with your gracious favor, to bestow the residue of my life in mine age now to come, about the provision for my soul in the service of God, and to be your Grace's beadsman<sup>844</sup> and pray for you; it pleased your Highness further to say unto me, that for the service which I before had done you (which it then liked your goodness far above my deserving to commend), that in any suit that I should after have unto your Highness, which either should concern mine honor (that word it liked your Highness to use unto me) or that should pertain unto my profit, I should find your Highness good and gracious lord unto me. So is it now, gracious Sovereign, that worldly honor is the thing whereof I have resigned both the possession and the desire, in the resignation of your most honorable office. And worldly profit I trust experience proveth, and daily more and more shall prove, that I never was very greedy thereon.

But now is my most humble suit unto your excellent Highness, partly to beseech the same somewhat to tender<sup>845</sup> my poor honesty, but principally that of your accustomed goodness no sinister<sup>846</sup> information move your noble Grace, to have any more distrust of my truth and devotion toward you, than I have or shall during my life give the cause. For in this matter of the wicked woman of Canterbury<sup>847</sup> I have unto your trusty counselor Master Thomas Cromwell, by my writing, as plainly declared the truth as I possibly can, which my declaration of his duty toward your Grace and his goodness toward me he hath, I understand, declared unto your Grace. In any part of all which my dealing, whether any other man may peradventure<sup>848</sup> put any doubt, or move any scruple of suspicion, that can I neither tell, nor lieth in mine hand to let,<sup>849</sup> but unto myself is it not possible any part of my said demeanor<sup>850</sup> to seem evil, the very clearness of mine own conscience knoweth in all the matter my mind and intent<sup>851</sup> so good.

835 essential importance 836 loyalty 837 feared 838 entitled to feudal allegiance 839 hold 840 spiritually 841 again 842 It may like your Highness:
Your Highness may like 843 fit

844 one who prays for another 845 to offer formally for acceptance; to treat with affectionate care 846 darkly suspicious 847 Elizabeth Barton. See above, Letter
192. Rastell changed "wicked woman of Canterbury" to "nun of Canterbury" when he printed this letter in the 1557 Works.

848 possibly 849 prevent 850 conduct
851 intention, purpose

Wherefore most gracious Sovereign, I neither will nor well it can become<sup>852</sup> me with your Highness to reason and argue the matter, but in my most humble manner prostrate at your gracious feet, I only 5 beseech your Majesty with your own high prudence and your accustomed goodness consider and weigh the matter. And then if in your so doing, your own virtuous mind shall give you, that notwithstanding the manifold excellent goodness that your gracious
 10 Highness hath by so many manner ways used unto me, I be a wretch<sup>853</sup> of such monstrous ingratitude as could with any of them all, or with any other person living, digress from my bounden duty of allegiance toward your good Grace, then desire I no
 15 further favor at your gracious hand, than the loss of all that ever I may lose in this world, goods, lands, and liberty and finally my life withal,<sup>854</sup> whereof the keeping of any part unto my self could never do me pennyworth of pleasure, but only should
 20 then my recomfort<sup>855</sup> be, that after my short life and your long, which with continual prosperity to God's pleasure<sup>856</sup> our Lord for his mercy send you I should once meet with your Grace again in heaven, and there be merry with you, where among mine
 25 other pleasures this should yet be one, that your Grace should surely see there then, that (howsoever you take me) I am your true beadsman now and ever have been, and will be till I die, howsoever your pleasure be to do by me.<sup>857</sup>
 30 Howbeit,<sup>858</sup> if in the considering of my cause your high wisdom and gracious goodness perceive (as I verily trust in God you shall) that I none otherwise have demeaned<sup>859</sup> myself, than well may stand with my bounden duty of faithfulness toward your royal
 35 Majesty, then in my most humble wise<sup>860</sup> I beseech your most noble Grace that the knowledge of your true gracious persuasion in that behalf may relieve the torment of my present heaviness,<sup>861</sup> conceived of the dread and fear (by that I hear such a grievous
 40 bill put by your learned Council into your high Court of Parliament<sup>862</sup> against me) lest your Grace might by some sinister information be moved anything to think the contrary, which if your Highness do not (as I trust in God and your great goodness

the matter by your own high prudence examined 45 and considered, you will not) then in my most humble manner I beseech your Highness further (albeit that<sup>863</sup> in respect of my former request this other thing is very slight) yet since your Highness
 50 hath herebefore<sup>864</sup> of your mere<sup>865</sup> abundant goodness heaped and accumulated upon me (though I was thereto very far unworthy) from time to time both worship<sup>866</sup> and great honor, too, and since I now have left off all such things and nothing seek
 55 or desire but the life to come and in the meanwhile pray for your Grace, it may like your Highness of your accustomed benignity<sup>867</sup> somewhat to tender<sup>868</sup> my poor honesty and never suffer by the means of such a bill put forth against me any man
 60 to take occasion hereafter against the truth to slander me; which thing should yet by the peril of their own souls do themselves more hurt than me, which shall, I trust, settle mine heart, with your gracious
 65 favor, to depend upon the comfort of the truth and hope of heaven, and not upon the fallible opinion or soon spoken words of light<sup>869</sup> and soon changeable people.

And thus, most dread<sup>870</sup> and most dear sovereign Lord, I beseech the blessed Trinity preserve your most noble Grace, both in body and soul, and all 70 that are your well willers,<sup>871</sup> and amend all the contrary, among whom if ever I be or ever have been one, then pray I God that he may with mine open shame and destruction declare it. At my poor<sup>872</sup> house in Chelsea, the fifth day of March, by the 75 known rude hand of Your most humble and most heavy<sup>873</sup> faithful subject and beadsman,

 Tho. More, Kg.

199. To Thomas Cromwell 80
 Chelsea, 5 March <1534>

Right Worshipful.<sup>874</sup>

After my most hearty recommendation,<sup>875</sup> it may please you to understand that I have perceived 85 by the relation<sup>876</sup> of my son<sup>877</sup> Roper (for which I

852 be fitting for 853 despicable person
 854 besides 855 comfort, consolation
 856 service 857 your pleasure be to do by me: it please you to do by me 858 However 859 conducted 860 way, manner 861 sadness, grief 862 Parliament as a court of law or administration 863 albeit that: although 864 in time past 865 pure, unmixed 866 distinction

 867 kindness of disposition 868 esteem
 869 irresponsible 870 held in awe, revered 871 well willers: well-wishers

872 of little worth 873 sad, grieved
 874 Distinguished, Honorable 875 commendation of myself to your benevolent remembrance or regard 876 report 877 the son-in-law who had married Margaret More beseech almighty God reward you) your most charitable labor taken for me toward the King's gracious Highness, in the procuring at his most gracious hand, the relief and comfort of this woeful heaviness<sup>878</sup> in which mine heart standeth, neither for the loss of goods, lands, or liberty, nor for any respect either, of this kind of honesty<sup>879</sup> that standeth in the opinion of people and worldly reputation, all which manner things (I thank our Lord), I so little esteem for any affection<sup>880</sup> therein toward myself that I can well be content to jeopard,<sup>881</sup> lose, and forgo them all and my life therewith, without any further respite than even this same present day, either for the pleasure of God or of my prince.

But surely good Master Cromwell, as I by mouth declared unto you, some part (for all could I neither then say nor now write) it thoroughly pierceth my poor heart, that the King's Highness (whose gracious favor toward me far above all the things of this world I have evermore desired, and whereof both for the conscience of mine own true faithful heart and devotion toward him, and for the manifold benefits of his high goodness continually bestowed upon me, I thought myself always sure), should conceive any such mind or opinion of me, as to think that in my communication either with the nun or the friars, or in my letter written unto the nun, I had any other manner mind,<sup>882</sup> than might well stand with the duty of a tender loving subject toward his natural prince, or that his Grace should reckon in me any manner of obstinate heart against his pleasure in any thing that ever I said or did concerning his great matter of his marriage or concerning the primacy of the Pope. Never would I wish other thing in this world more lief,<sup>883</sup> than that his Highness in these things all three, as perfectly knew my dealing, and as thoroughly saw my mind, as I do myself, or as God himself, whose sight pierceth deeper into my heart, than mine own.

For, sir, as for the first matter, that is to wit<sup>884</sup> my letter or communication with the Nun (the whole discourse whereof in my former letter I have as plainly declared unto you as I possibly can), so pray I God to withdraw that scruple<sup>885</sup> and doubt of my good mind, out of the King's noble breast and none other wise, but as I not only thought none harm, but also purposed good, and in that thing most, in which (as I perceive) his Grace conceiveth most grief and suspicion, that is to wit in my letter which I wrote unto her. And therefore sir, since I have by my writing declared the truth of my deed, and am ready by mine oath to declare the truth of mine intent,<sup>886</sup> I can devise<sup>887</sup> no further thing by me to be done in that matter, but only beseech almighty God to put into the King's gracious mind, that as God knoweth the thing is indeed, so his noble Grace may take it. Now touching the second point concerning his Grace's great matter of his marriage, to the intent that you may see cause with the better conscience to make suit unto his Highness for me, I shall as plainly declare you my demeanor<sup>888</sup> in that matter as I have already declared you in the other, for more plainly can I not.

Sir, upon a time at my coming from beyond the sea,<sup>889</sup> where I had been in the King's business, I repaired as my duty was unto the King's Grace being at that time at Hampton Court. At which time suddenly his Highness walking in the gallery,<sup>890</sup> broke with me of<sup>891</sup> his great matter,<sup>892</sup> and showed me that it was now perceived, that his marriage was not only against the positive laws of the Church and the written law of God, but also in such wise against the law of nature, that it could in no wise by the Church be dispensable.<sup>893</sup> Now so was it that before my going over the sea, I had heard certain things moved against the bull of the dispensation concerning the words of the Law Levitical and the Law Deuteronomical to prove the prohibition to be de iure diuino, but yet perceived I not at that time but that the greater hope of the matter stood in certain faults that were founden in the bull, whereby the bull should by the law not be sufficient. And such comfort was there in that point as far as I perceived a good season,<sup>894</sup> that the Council on the other part

878 sadness 879 honorable position

880 good disposition 881 risk

882 manner mind: kind of intention

883 dearly 884 that is to wit: namely

885 hesitation 886 intention 887 contrive 888 conduct 889 from Calais, late September 1527 890 now called the Haunted Gallery 891 broke with me of: disclosed to me 892 The divorce was commonly spoken of as the "King's matter." There was much controversy over two passages: Lv 20:21 and Dt 25:5. Queen

Catherine said that there was a papal brief in Spain granting dispensation for the marriage with Henry, even if the marriage with Arthur had been consummated. The latter point, in any case, Catherine denied.

893 subject to dispensation, the granting of a license by a pope, archbishop or bishop to do what is forbidden by ecclesiastical law 894 a good season: for a good while were fain<sup>895</sup> to bring forth a brief,<sup>896</sup> by which they pretended those defaults<sup>897</sup> to be supplied, the truth of which brief was by the King's Council suspected, and much diligence was thereafter done for the trial of that point, wherein what was finally founden either I never knew or else I not remember.

But I rehearse<sup>898</sup> you this to the intent you shall know that the first time that ever I heard that point moved, that it should be in such high degree against the law of nature, was the time in which as I began to tell you the King's Grace showed it me himself, and laid the Bible open before me, and there read me the words that moved his Highness and diverse other erudite<sup>899</sup> persons so to think, and asked me further what myself thought thereon. At which time not presuming to look<sup>900</sup> that his Highness should anything take that point for the more proved or unproved for my poor mind in so great a matter, I showed nevertheless as my duty was at his commandment what thing I thought upon the words which I there read. Whereupon his Highness accepting benignly<sup>901</sup> my sudden unadvised answer commanded me to commune<sup>902</sup> further with Master Fox, now his Grace's Almoner,<sup>903</sup> and to read a book<sup>904</sup> with him that then was in making<sup>905</sup> for that matter. After which book read, and my poor opinion eftsoons<sup>906</sup> declared unto his Highness thereupon, his Highness like a prudent and a virtuous prince assembled at another time at Hampton Court a good number of very well learned men, at which time as far as ever I heard there were (as was in so great a matter most likely to be) diverse opinions among them. Howbeit<sup>907</sup> I never heard but that they agreed at that time upon a certain form in which the book should be made, which book was afterward at York Place in my Lord Cardinal's chamber read in the presence of diverse bishops and many learned men. And they all thought that there appeared in the book good and reasonable causes that might well move the King's Highness, being so virtuous a prince, to conceive in his mind a scruple against his marriage, which, while he could not otherwise avoid, he did well and virtuously for the acquieting<sup>908</sup> of his conscience to sue<sup>909</sup> and procure<sup>910</sup> to have his doubt decided by judgment of the Church.

After this the suit began, and the Legates sat upon the matter,<sup>911</sup> during all which time I never meddled therein, nor was a man meet to do,<sup>912</sup> for the matter was in hand by an ordinary process of the spiritual law, whereof I could little skill. And yet while the Legates were sitting upon the matter, it pleased the King's Highness to send me in the company of my Lord of London now of Durham<sup>913</sup> in embassy<sup>914</sup> about the peace that at our being there was concluded at Cambrai, between his Highness and the Emperor and the French King. And after my coming home his Highness of his only goodness (as far unworthy as I was thereto) made me, as you well know, his chancellor of this realm, soon after which time his Grace moved me again yet eftsoons, to look and consider his great matter, and well and indifferently<sup>915</sup> to ponder such things as I should find therein. And if it so were that thereupon it should hap me to see such things as should persuade me to that part, he would gladly use me among other of his councilors in that matter, and nevertheless he graciously declared unto me that he would in no wise that I should other thing do or say therein, than upon that that I should perceive mine own conscience should serve me, and that I should first look unto God and after God unto him, which most gracious words was the first lesson also that ever his Grace gave me at my first coming into his noble service. This motion was to me very comfortable and much I longed beside anything that myself either had seen, or by further search should hap to find for the one part or the other, yet specially to have some conference in the matter with some such of his Grace's learned Council as most for his part had labored and most have found in the matter.

Whereupon his Highness assigned unto me the now most reverend fathers Archbishops of 895 glad 896 short letter from the pope on matters of discipline 897 defects 898 tell 899 well-instructed, learned 900 expect 901 graciously 902 converse 903 an official to a prince or a bishop, who distributes his alms 904 The Determinations of the most famous and most excellent universities of Italy and France,

that it is unlawful for a man to marry his brother's wife, that the pope hath no power to dispense therewith (London, 1531), by Stokesley, Bishop of London, Edward Fox, the King's Almoner, and Dr. Nicholas de Burgo, an Italian Augustinian friar. 905 in making: in course of being written 906 again 907 However

908 quieting 909 put in suit 910 cause 911 Cardinals Campeggio and Wolsey held a legatine court from May 31 to July 23, 1529. 912 nor... do: nor was it fitting for a man to do so 913 Cuthbert Tunstall, at the head of the embassy to negotiate the Treaty of Cambrai, 1529 914 embassy 915 without prejudice

Canterbury and York with Master Doctor Fox, now his Grace's Almoner and Master Doctor Nicholas the Italian friar,<sup>916</sup> whereupon I not only sought and read, and as far-forth as my poor wit and learning served me, well weighed and considered every such thing as I could find myself, or read in any other man's labor that I could get, which anything had written therein, but had also diligent conference with his Grace's councilors aforesaid, whose honors and worships<sup>917</sup> I nothing mistrust in this point, but that they both have and will report unto his Highness that they never found obstinate manner or fashion in me, but a mind as toward<sup>918</sup> and as conformable<sup>919</sup> as reason could in a matter disputable require.

Whereupon the King's Highness being further advertised<sup>920</sup> both by them and myself of my poor opinion in the matter (wherein to have been able and meet to do him service I would as I then showed his Highness have been more glad than of all such worldly commodities<sup>921</sup> as I either then had or ever should come to) his Highness graciously taking in gre<sup>922</sup> my good mind in that behalf used of his blessed disposition in the prosecuting of his great matter only those (of whom his Grace had good number) whose conscience his Grace perceived well and fully persuaded upon that part, and as well myself as any other to whom his Highness thought the thing to seem otherwise, he used in his other business, abiding (of his abundant goodness) nevertheless gracious lord unto any man, nor never was willing to put any man in ruffle<sup>923</sup> or trouble<sup>924</sup> of his conscience.

After this did I never nothing more therein, nor never any word wrote I therein to the impairing<sup>925</sup> of his Grace's part neither before nor after, nor any man else by my procurement,<sup>926</sup> but settling my mind in quiet to serve his Grace in other things, I would not so much as look nor wittingly<sup>927</sup> let lie by me any book of the other part, albeit that I gladly read afterward diverse books that were made on his part yet, nor never would I read the book that Master Abell<sup>928</sup> made on the other side, nor other book which were as I heard say made in Latin beyond the sea, nor never give ear to the Pope's proceedings in the matter.

Moreover, whereas I had founden in my study a book that I had before borrowed of my Lord of Bath,<sup>929</sup> which book he had made of the matter at such time as the Legates sat here thereupon, which book had been by me merely gently cast aside, and that I showed him I would send him home his book again, he told me that in good faith he had long time before discharged his mind of that matter,<sup>930</sup> and having forgotten that copy to remain in my hands, had burned his own copy that he had thereof at home, and because he no more minded<sup>931</sup> to meddle anything in the matter, he desired me to burn the same book too. And upon my faith so did I.

Besides this, diverse other ways have I so used myself that if I rehearsed<sup>932</sup> them all, it should well appear that I never have had against his Grace's marriage any manner demeanor<sup>933</sup> whereby his Highness might have any manner cause or occasion of displeasure toward me, for likewise as I am not he which either can, or whom it could become,<sup>934</sup> to take upon him the determination or decision of such a weighty matter, nor boldly to affirm this thing or that therein, whereof diverse points a great way pass my learning, so am I he that among other his Grace's faithful subjects, his Highness being in possession of his marriage<sup>935</sup> and this noble woman really<sup>936</sup> anointed Queen, neither murmur at it nor dispute upon it, nor never did nor will, but without any other manner meddling of the matter among his other faithful subjects faithfully pray to God for his Grace and hers both, long to live and well and their noble issue too, in such wise as may be to the pleasure of God, honor and surety to themselves, rest, peace, wealth, and profit unto this noble realm.

916 Thomas Cranmer, Edward Lee, Edward Fox, Nicholas de Burgo

917 formal titles for holders of certain offices 918 favorable 919 compliant

920 informed 921 profits, interests 922 in gre: in good part 923 confusion

924 perplexity 925 impairment

926 instigation 927 knowingly

928 Thomas Abell, Queen Catherine's chaplain, was sent to Spain to procure the papal brief, but secretly showed the Emperor that the Queen most earnestly desired the original should not be sent, lest it be destroyed. Abell was imprisoned in the Tower as if he had been an accomplice of Elizabeth Barton and after six years' confinement was hanged as a traitor in July 1540. The book was his Invicta Veritas, 1532. 929 John Clerk, Bishop of Bath and Wells, 1523, became one of Catherine's counselors in 1528, but later joined in pronouncing the King's divorce. 930 discharged... matter: dismissed that matter from his mind 931 intended 932 recounted 933 manner demeanor: kind of conduct 934 whom it could become: to whom it could be fitting 935 Rastell omitted everything from here to the end of the paragraph. 936 Perhaps More wrote "rially," i.e., royally, to be ambiguous.

As touching the third point, the primacy of the Pope, I nothing meddle in the matter. Truth it is, that as I told you, when you desired me to show you what I thought therein, I was myself sometime not
 5 of the mind that the primacy of that see should be begun by the institution of God, until that I read in that matter those things that the King's Highness had written in his most famous book<sup>937</sup> against the heresies of Martin Luther, at the first reading whereof I moved the King's Highness either to 10 leave out that point, or else to touch it more slenderly<sup>938</sup> for doubt of such things as after might hap to fall in question between his Highness and some pope as between princes and popes diverse times
 15 have done. Whereunto his Highness answered me that he would in no wise anything diminish of that matter, of which thing his Highness showed me a secret cause<sup>939</sup> whereof I never had anything heard before. But surely after that I had read his Grace's book
 20 therein, and so many other things as I have seen in that point by this continuance of these ten year since and more have found in effect the substance of all the holy doctors from Saint Ignatius,<sup>940</sup> disciple to Saint John the Evangelist, unto our own days both
 25 Latins and Greeks so consonant and agreeing in that point, and the thing by such general councils so confirmed also, that in good faith I never neither read nor heard anything of such effect on the other side, that ever could lead me to think that my conscience
 30 were well discharged, but rather in right great peril if I should follow the other side and deny the primacy to be provided by God, which if we did, yet can I nothing (as I showed you) perceive any commodity that ever could come by that denial, for that primacy
 35 is at the leastwise instituted by the corps<sup>941</sup> of Christendom and for a great urgent cause in avoiding of schisms<sup>942</sup> and corroborate<sup>943</sup> by continual succession<sup>944</sup> more than the space of a thousand year at the least, for there are passed almost a thousand year
 40 since the time of holy Saint Gregory.<sup>945</sup>

And therefore since all Christendom is one corps,

I cannot perceive how any member thereof may without the common assent of the body depart from the common head. And then if we may not 45 lawfully leave it by ourself, I cannot perceive (but if the thing were a treating<sup>946</sup> in a general council) what the question could avail whether the primacy were instituted by God or ordained by the Church. As for the general councils assembled lawfully, I never could perceive but that in the declaration of
 50 the truths to be believed and to be stood to,<sup>947</sup> the authority thereof ought to be taken for undoubtable, or else were there in nothing no certainty, but through Christendom upon every man's affectionate reason, all thing might be brought from day to day to continual ruffle<sup>948</sup> and confusion, from which 55 by the general councils, the spirit of God assisting, every such council well assembled keepeth and ever shall keep the corps of his Catholic Church.

And verily since the King's Highness hath (as 60 by the book of his honorable council appeareth) appealed to the general council from the Pope, in which council I beseech our Lord send his Grace comfortable speed, methinketh in my poor mind it could be no furtherance there unto his Grace's
 65 cause if his Highness should in his own realm before, either by laws making or books putting forth, seem to derogate and deny not only the primacy of the see apostolic,<sup>949</sup> but also the authority of the general councils too, which I verily trust his Highness intendeth not, for in the next general council it may well happen that this Pope may be deposed and another substituted in his room<sup>950</sup> with whom the King's Highness may be very well content; for albeit that<sup>951</sup> I have for mine own part such opinion of 70 the pope's primacy as I have showed you, yet never thought I the Pope above the general council nor never have in any book of mine put forth among the King's subjects in our vulgar tongue, advanced greatly the Pope's authority. For albeit that a man
 75 may peradventure<sup>952</sup> somewhat find therein that after the common manner of all Christian realms

937 Assertio septem sacramentorum, 1521
938 more slenderly: less emphatically
939 Full papal power was necessary for the dispensation that had allowed his marriage. Perhaps the "secret cause" was that the King thought he had evidence that the marriage of Arthur and Catherine had been consummated. If it were a marriage only in name, dispensation would have been more readily granted. 940 Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, martyred in Rome ca. AD 115 941 body 942 breaches of the unity of the church not due, according to Augustine and other Fathers, to heretical belief 943 corroborated, strengthened 944 continual succession: succeeding to the episcopate by authority in an unbroken line from St. Peter, the first pope 945 Gregory the Great, Pope 590–604 946 a treating: to be discussed 947 stood to: obeyed 948 disorder 949 see apostolic: Rome, the see of the apostle St. Peter 950 place. Stapleton omitted "yet never thought I the Pope above the general council." 951 albeit that: although 952 possibly

I speak of him as primate, yet never do I stick<sup>953</sup> thereon with reasoning and proving of that point. And in my book against the Masker,<sup>954</sup> I wrote not I wot<sup>955</sup> well five lines, and yet of no more but only
 5 St. Peter himself, from whose person many take not the primacy,<sup>956</sup> even of those that grant it none of his successors, and yet was that book made, printed, and put forth of very truth before that any of the books of the council was either printed or spoken
 10 of. But where as I had written thereof at length in my confutation<sup>957</sup> before, and for the proof thereof had compiled together all that I could find therefor, at such time as I little looked<sup>958</sup> that there should fall between the King's Highness and the Pope such 15 a breach as is fallen since, when I after that saw the thing likely to draw toward such displeasure between them, I suppressed it utterly and never put word thereof into my book, but put out the remnant without it, which thing well declareth that I
 20 never intended anything to meddle in that matter against the King's gracious pleasure, whatsoever mine own opinion were therein.

And thus have I, good Master Cromwell, long troubled your Mastership with a long process<sup>959</sup> of these matters, with which I neither durst<sup>960</sup> nor it could become me<sup>961</sup> to encumber the King's noble Grace, but I beseech you for our Lord's love, that 25 you be not so weary of my most cumbrous<sup>962</sup> suit but that it may like you<sup>963</sup> at such opportune time or times as your wisdom may find to help that his 30 Highness may by your goodness be fully informed of my true faithful mind, and that in the matter of that wicked woman there never was on my part any other mind<sup>964</sup> than good, nor yet in any other

 35 thing else never was there nor never shall there be any further fault found in me, than that I cannot in everything think the same way that some other men of more wisdom and deeper learning do, nor
 40 can find in mine heart otherwise to say than as mine own conscience giveth<sup>965</sup> me, which condition hath never grown in anything that ever might touch his gracious pleasure of any obstinate mind or misaffectionate<sup>966</sup> appetite, but of a timorous
 45 conscience rising haply<sup>967</sup> for lack of better perceiving,<sup>968</sup> and yet not without tender<sup>969</sup> respect unto my most bounden duty toward his noble Grace, whose only favor I so much esteem that I nothing
 50 have of mine own in all this world, except only my soul, but that I will with better will forgo it than abide of his Highness, one heavy displeasent<sup>970</sup> look. And thus I make an end of my long, trou-55 blous process, beseeching the blessed Trinity for the great goodness ye show me, and the great comfort ye do me, both bodily and ghostly<sup>971</sup> to prosper<sup>972</sup> you, and in heaven to reward you. At Chelsea the fifth day of March by

Your deeply bounden,
 Tho. More, Kg.

953 dwell 954 The Answer to a Poisoned Book, 1533 955 know 956 from... primacy: not many take the primacy away from St. Peter 957 More's Confutation of Tyndale's Answer,

1532–33 958 expected 959 discussion 960 dared 961 become me: be fitting for me 962 distressing 963 it may please you 964 intention 965 prompts 966 evil-disposed 967 perhaps, by chance 968 understanding 969 careful 970 displeased, angry 971 spiritually 972 to prosper: to be propitious to Humanitas reads serenely in her triumphal chariot, pushed by Vergil and Cicero (Tully) and pulled by Demosthenes and Homer. Below on the left is Time; on the right is Fate; the Greek plaques indicate that "Humanitas triumphs over Time & Fate." This is the frontispiece of the 1515 edition of Seneca that Erasmus edited while living in Thomas More's home in London.

Letters: On Humanism, 1505–20

Thomas More, throughout the first half of his career, publicly addressed and defended what we now call the new humanism, especially Erasmian humanism. The letters included in this section—those to Dorp, Oxford University, Edward Lee, a Monk (John Batmanson), and Germanius Brixius—are examples of what Daniel Kinney calls “the Renaissance ‘public letter’ or letter-essay,” works notable for their rhetorical character, even as they manifest “constant attentiveness to a personal addressee” (CW 15: xciii). Subjects addressed here include the controversies over new approaches to theology, the relationship between Christianity and learning, and the nature and function of poetry. In Kinney’s judgment, “these bold and ambitious” letters are “a singularly valuable resource for any reader who seeks to gain a balanced and reasonably complete understanding of More’s life and works” (xvii).

Composed around the same time as Utopia, the “Letter to Dorp” is More’s intervention in the dispute between Martin Dorp (1485–1525), a theologian at Louvain, and Erasmus. More’s letter, addressing both Dorp’s criticisms of Erasmus and Dorp’s rhetoric, succeeded in persuading Dorp, who “returned to his senses,” according to Erasmus, with More’s help, something Dorp also acknowledged in later writings (xxiv–xxv). The letter is a public example of More’s approach to important contemporary controversies and his commitment to working for peace, even among occasionally warring intellectuals.

In “The Letter to Oxford University,” More addresses the “Trojan War” of wits that had broken out in Oxford between critics of the new learning, especially the study of Greek and its supporters. In Erasmus’s account, a young English scholar had been teaching Greek with good success when “some barbarian or other in a public sermon began to inveigh against Greek studies with monstrous great falsehoods” (xxix). In the course of addressing the tense situation, More articulates his understanding of the relationship between theology and secular learning that in More’s judgment “prepares the soul for virtue.” Appealing to the prudence of his addressees throughout, More ends the letter by revealing that King Henry supports the new learning as well. More would later become Chancellor of Oxford, where he had studied as a young man.

More’s “Letter to Edward Lee” defends Erasmus’s Greek New Testament against one of its English critics. Educated in Oxford, Cambridge, and Louvain, Edward Lee (ca. 1482–1544) wrote and eventually circulated a manuscript detailing over 300 problems with Erasmus’s first edition, and he attacked the Dutch humanist for being “too proud” to accept counsel and correction (xxxiii–xxxiv). More’s attempt to stop Lee’s war on Erasmus succeeded—at least publicly—and the two scholars eventually made peace at Calais in 1520, in the company of their fellow humanists (xxxvi). Lee would go on to become Archbishop of York. More’s “Letter to a Monk” is another defense of Erasmus’s New Testament, and the anonymous addressee has been identified as John Batmanson, a London Carthusian (xli).

The last letter in this section, More’s “Letter to Brixius,” was published in 1520. Earlier, while England and France were at war, More had satirized Brixius’s poem Chordigera in his epigrams; later, in peacetime, Brixius responded with his Antimorus, which among other things dangerously criticized More’s “Coronation Ode,” particularly the section where More praises the young King Henry VIII, and daringly finds fault with King Henry VII—a criticism so dangerous that More’s friends counseled a strong response. Regarding this fiery exchange, More wrote in a letter to Erasmus that he hoped “humane readers will exhibit some tolerance for those human emotions which no man has ever been able to banish entirely.” In his letter to Brixius, More blames Brixius for the quarrel, gives a rather weak defense of his treatment of Henry VII, and makes his own critiques of the French poet’s work. In doing so, he also shares his understanding of poetry and rhetoric, leading scholars such as Richard Sylvester and Germain Marc’hadour to call this letter More’s ars poetica (CW 3.2: 551–52). At Erasmus’s urging, and to end this strife between poets prudently, More bought all unsold copies of the letter soon after its publication.

CONTENTS

The prefatory number of each letter corresponds to The Correspondence of Sir Thomas More, ed. Elizabeth Rogers.

The symbols < > indicate uncertainty about the date or place.

LETTER NUMBER	SOURCE TEXT
4. To Sister Joyce Leigh. <ca. 1 January 1505?, London>	CW 1: 51–52. See above p. 63.
5. To Thomas Ruthall. <1506, London>	CW 3.1: 2–8. See above pp. 20–21.
6. To Henry VIII <ca. June 1509, London>	CW 3.2: 97–99. See above pp. 224–26.
15. To Martin Dorp. 21 October <1515>, Bruges	CW 15: 3–127. See p. 391.
25. To Peter Giles. <1516, London>	CW 4: 39–45. See above pp. 152–55.
41a. To Peter Giles. <1517, London>	CW 4: 249–53. See above pp. 214–15.
60. To the University of Oxford. 29 March <1518>, Abingdon	CW 15: 131–49. See p. 416.
75. To Edward Lee. 1 May 1519	CW 15: 153–95. See p. 421.
83. To a Monk. <1519–20>	CW 15: 197–311. See p. 431.
86. To Germanus Brixius. 1520, London	CW 3.2: 595–659. See p. 456.

Letters on Humanism

15. To Martin Dorp<sup>1</sup>

Bruges, 21 October <1515>

Thomas More sends his heartiest greetings to Martin Dorp.

5 If I were at liberty to visit you, my dear Dorp, as I very much wish that I could, first of all I would discuss with you personally in a more fitting way all that I now entrust in a less fitting way to a letter. I would also have liked nothing better than to get
10 to know you face to face, since Erasmus, who feels great affection for both of us, and who is, I hope, equally dear to us both, has instilled in my heart a remarkable longing to see you, to make your acquaintance, and to show you my love. In fact nothing gives him more pleasure than to praise absent
15 friends to friends present, and since his learning and his delightful disposition have endeared him to so many people in various parts of the world, he is constantly trying to make all of them share with each other the same special attachment which 20 binds them to him. Thus he never stops mentioning each of his friends one by one to the rest or describing the gifts for which each merits love, so that each gains a share in the friendship of all. Though
25 he regularly commends all his friends in this way, he commends none more often, more lavishly, or more heartily than he commends you, my dear Dorp, whom he has been celebrating for so long in England that there is no learned man in that country
30 who does not know and honor the name Dorp the same way that the scholars of Louvain themselves do; and they, as they should, honor it very greatly indeed. He has portrayed you so well to me personally that my mind's eye has long since conceived a 35 most flattering image of your mind,<sup>2</sup> the same image, in fact, that I found to illuminate your elegant minor works after I arrived here.

For this reason, as soon as I learned from our most invincible king that I was to serve on an embassy here, believe me, my Dorp, one of the main compensations to which I looked forward in making so lengthy a journey was that I thought it would offer me some opportunity to meet with you. But the nature of the business assigned to us has detained me in Bruges and prevented me from visiting you 45 as I had hoped, for it had previously been agreed that our negotiations with your magnificent prince's most distinguished ambassadors would be conducted here. Thus I deeply regret that though I have enjoyed many other aspects of this embassy I have 50 been disappointed by fortune precisely where I had most hoped for her favor.

But let me finally get down to the issue that has induced me to write this letter. During my stay here I happened to meet several people who to me seemed 55 no strangers to literature. I started a conversation with them about Erasmus and also about you. They knew him from his writings and reputation, but they knew you in other ways as well. They told me something that was as unpleasant as it was incredible, 60 namely that you do not feel any too friendly toward Erasmus and that your letters to him confirm the fact. They promised to bring me the letters the next day, since they saw I was hardly convinced.

They came back the next day, bringing three letters with them.<sup>3</sup> One of these you had written to Erasmus, even though I infer from his answer that he had not received the original of your letter, but rather, like me, he had read it when someone else showed him a copy. In this letter you criticize the 70 Folly and exhort him to a Praise of Wisdom. You show so little approval and advise such repressive constraints for his project of emending the New Testament from Greek that you virtually oppose the whole enterprise. The second of these letters 75 was written by Erasmus while he was still weary with traveling, and indeed still engaged in his journey, as a cursory response to your criticisms; he also promised to write a fuller response when he had reached Basel. Then there was the third letter, your 80 answer to that of Erasmus.

<sup>1</sup> Maarten van Dorp (1485–1525), initially a humanist and Latin lecturer at the University of Louvain, turned primarily to scholastic theology. Between 1514 and 1515,

he wrote letters to Erasmus in which he criticized the Praise of Folly, as well as Erasmus's plans to publish discrepancies between the Vulgate and the Greek New Testament.

<sup>2</sup> mind's eye . . . mind: See Erasmus, Praise of Folly (ASD 4/3: 74); Adages 550 (CWE 32: 36–37). <sup>3</sup> For the contents of each letter, see EE 2: 10–16, 90–114, 126–36.

When I read these letters in the presence of those men, although none of your statements convinced me, at any rate, that you were an enemy to Erasmus (for what would suffice to convince me of that?), there were nonetheless some which convinced me that you were somewhat more agitated than I had expected. But as I wished rather to banish this thought from their minds than to reinforce it, I asserted that I had read nothing in your letters which did not seem to me to be written with the friendliest intentions.

“But,” said one of them, “even discounting what he wrote, it was no friendly gesture on his part to write in the first place. For suppose that anyone was so terribly upset by the Folly—and I have never heard anyone anywhere say so, not even in Louvain, a place where I have spent many long periods of time since the Folly was published, apart from one or two infantile old grumblers<sup>4</sup> that even the boys there make fun of, whereas otherwise both here and there everybody takes such delight in the Folly that many people have learned many passages from it by heart—but as I started to say, suppose that anyone was so terribly upset by the Folly that it actually seemed necessary to ask for a palinode from Erasmus. Even so, since, as Dorp himself writes,<sup>5</sup> he had recently been summoned for a private visit with Erasmus, what was the purpose of writing to him? If he thought that some matter required his advice, why not give the advice face to face? As the scene goes in Terence, why not give his instructions in person instead of waiting to step out the door and then shouting them up from the street,<sup>6</sup> when Erasmus was so far away that, though he should have been either the first or even the only person to hear the advice, he was not only the last to find out about it but he learned of it only through others? Consider how candidly Dorp is conducting this business: first of all he pretends that he is defending against everyone a person whom no one accuses, and then, though I am not sure that anyone listens to the arguments that he offers in Erasmus’s defense, everyone is reading publicly (except for the one man who ought to) the things Dorp alleges against him.”

After he had said this and the others had said various other things which I think it as well to omit here, I answered them and then I dismissed them in such a way as to make it quite clear that I do not want to hear any slighting remarks about you and that I am almost as fond of you as I am of Erasmus, of whom I am so fond that I could not be fonder of anyone. Indeed, whatever motives you had for writing to Erasmus when you could have talked over the matter in person, they were certainly not bad ones; of this, my dear Dorp, my esteem for you makes me quite sure, while Erasmus, secure in his notion of your feelings toward him, has no doubt about it.

But as for that second letter of yours, a very poor second, which is being read everywhere, I could easily believe that you had no intention at all of releasing it to the public but that it got out completely by accident. The main reason that drives me to think so is that there are some passages in your letter which I am convinced you would have changed had you chosen to publish it, passages unworthy of being written either to him or by you. For you would not have written in certain passages so acerbically to such a great friend or so shoddily to such a great scholar; indeed I am sure that you would have written more mercifully in accordance with your modest character and more carefully in accordance with your uncommon learning. Furthermore, as for the jokes and the taunts that are too much in evidence throughout your composition, I have no doubt that you would have introduced them either somewhat more sparingly or at any rate, my dear Dorp, more wittily.

I am not particularly troubled by the way that you carp at the Folly, inveigh at the poets, snarl at all the grammarians, disapprove of his annotations on Scripture, or judge that a training in Greek literature is simply irrelevant.<sup>7</sup> In these matters, without offending anyone, everyone has a right to his own point of view. Besides, you have so far presented your case on these topics in such a way that I have no doubt that many arguments occur to everyone while reading your letter which ought to be stated for the opposite viewpoint. In fact, far from considering that you have said too much on any of these topics, on a number I find a good deal left unsaid, with which I would have liked to see your composition come forth better armed so that Erasmus would have had greater occasion to fortify his opposing position with more massive fieldworks.

<sup>4</sup> infantile old grumblers: See Erasmus, Praise of Folly (ASD 4/3: 82–85); Adages

436 (CWE 31: 414–15). <sup>5</sup> See EE 2: 11.

<sup>6</sup> See Terence, Andria 490–96.

<sup>7</sup> See EE 2: 127–29, 133.

On the other hand, it certainly disturbed me a good deal that you seem to handle Erasmus in a way that is worthy of neither of you. You treat him sometimes as if you despise him, sometimes as if you regard him with haughty derision,<sup>8</sup> sometimes as if you are not so much offering advice as chastising him like a stern uncle<sup>9</sup> or humorless censor, and lastly as if you are deliberately twisting the meaning of his words to get all the theologians and even all the universities, as they are called, up in arms against him.

I do not want you to regard this composition of mine as if it were directed against you, for I do not believe you have done any of this out of ill will toward him, or as if I, who could use a defender myself, plan to mount a defense for a man whom I know to be too great in all men's esteem and in actual fact to be relegated to the ranks of the accused. But since I love you and cherish your fame, I did want to advise you about certain things which those persons who fail to appreciate fully the modesty and the veritably swanlike candor of your nature are making a pretext for thinking that you are too keen to enhance your own fame and are treacherously attacking another's.

Would that, just as Aeneas in Vergil stood hidden by a cloud in the midst of the Carthaginians and there looked at himself and his deeds represented in tapestries,<sup>10</sup> would that you too could stand by unobserved and observe the expressions with which people read this last letter of yours. I am sure you would conclude that you owe me a good deal more gratitude for advising you to change what you wrote (for by changing it you can make everyone judge, as I do, that you did not issue this letter but let it slip forth) than you owe to your flatterers, since even they themselves criticize in your absence the very things that they praise to your face.

Yet I wonder indeed if anyone is so bent on flattery that he can praise some of your flourishes even in your presence; as I started to say, would that you could observe through a lattice<sup>11</sup> the faces, the voices, the feelings with which people read your expressions as you harp away more than once at Erasmus, "Our theologians, Erasmus, and your grammarians,"<sup>12</sup> as if you yourself, sitting on high in the ranks of the theologians, cast him down among grammar-school tyros. You do indeed rightfully sit among the theologians, nor do you merely sit; you preside. Nonetheless he is not to be banished from the theologian's throne to the grammarian's footstool.

Yet I suspect that Erasmus will by no means spurn the title "grammarian" which you ridicule more frequently than cleverly. Or rather, modest as he is, even though he deserves it more than anyone, he may still hesitate to accept it, since he knows that "grammarian" means precisely the same thing as "man of letters," whose area of study extends across every variety of literature, that is, every discipline. For this reason, though anyone who has studied dialectic may be called a dialectician, anyone who has studied arithmetic may be called an arithmetician, and so on in the rest of the arts, no one, in my opinion at least, may be styled a man of letters who has not pored through each and every one of the sciences;<sup>13</sup> otherwise you could confer the title of grammarian even upon infants who know merely the letters of the alphabet. But if you claim that there are no grammarians besides the ones who, as you put it, play king in low dives where the air rings with blows, wielding hickory sticks for their scepters, and who, even though they are more foolish than Self-Love<sup>14</sup> and Folly, suppose that they know every science just because they have mastered the mere words and syntax,<sup>15</sup> on my honor, my dear Dorp, though I admit that grammarians of that sort are far from being learned, I believe even they come considerably closer to learning than those theologians who have not even mastered the syntax and mere words. I myself know of several who fit this description, and you know (I suspect) of still more, though we each do our best to conceal the fact.<sup>16</sup> Erasmus is certainly not one of those grammarians who have mastered no more than mere words, nor is he one of those theologians who know nothing at all outside a tangled labyrinth of petty problems.<sup>17</sup> He is a grammarian of the same stamp as Varro<sup>18</sup> and Aristarchus<sup>19</sup> and a theologian of the same stamp as you, Dorp, that is, of the best. For he is not

8 haughty derision: See Adages 180 (CWE 31: 215). 9 stern uncle: See Adages 1339 (CWE 33: 210). 10 See Aeneid 1.439–40, 488–89. 11 observe... lattice: See Adages 2049 (CWE 34: 199–200). 12 EE 2: 128

13 no one... sciences: See Cicero, De oratore 1.6.20. 14 Self-Love is a favorite attendant of Folly; see Praise of Folly (ASD 4/3: 78). 15 See EE 2: 131. 16 though... fact: See Praise of Folly (ASD 4/3: 82).

17 tangled... problems: See Praise of Folly (ASD 4/3: 144, 148); EE 2: 101; Adages 1951 (CWE 34: 147–48). 18 Roman scholar (116–27 BC) 19 Greek grammarian (ca. 220–143 BC) ignorant of those petty problems, and he has gone on to do what you too have done in such depth; he has gained something vastly more useful, a general command of sound literature, which means sacred letters especially but not at the expense of the rest.

But I will proceed with your letter, in which this innuendo is pretty much more of the same, “If you should ever see the Decretals, Erasmus,”<sup>20</sup> as if he might never get a glimpse of the decretal epistles which you indicate you have seen. So is this slur against him: “Herons muddy the water wherever they go, and beginners too muddle up everything whenever they enter the arena of debate.”<sup>21</sup> So is this one: “You cannot figure out what distinguishes a dialectician from a sophist if you know nothing about either of those arts.”<sup>22</sup> And then a little later, “Unless you think that everyone is a sophist who shows more skill in disputing than you do, that is, every dialectician.”<sup>23</sup> Do you honestly think, Dorp, that Erasmus muddles up everything whenever he disputes, that he has not an inkling of what dialectic is or even what a sophist is, or that he alone is ignorant of something that is known to almost every schoolboy?<sup>24</sup>

But I believe that even you grant him an uncommon and virtually unique skill in rhetoric.<sup>25</sup> If you do give him that, then I fail to see how you can deny him any dialectical skill whatsoever. After all, not the least of philosophers had reason to think dialectic and rhetoric as closely akin as a fist and a palm,<sup>26</sup> since dialectic infers more concisely what rhetoric sets out more elaborately, and where dialectic strikes home with its dagger-like point rhetoric throws down and overwhelms the opponent with its very weight.

But suppose dialectic has nothing in common with rhetoric. Just because he does not dispute in the schools, just because he does not brawl for an audience of boys, just because he now dispenses with those petty problems (as you too will hereafter), do you think that he never learned them, and do you imagine that he has less skill in disputing than any dialectician? On this point see how thoroughly we differ: by my reckoning not even a typical illiterate of average intelligence, but far less intelligent than Erasmus, not even an illiterate, I say, will prove less skilled than every dialectician in any dispute where both parties are familiar with the subject of the argument and where intelligence can make up for what is lacking in artifice. For what else are the very precepts of dialectic but a particular product of intelligence, that is, the particular formulas of rational conjecture which reason perceives to be useful in learning about the real world? So unlikely it is that Erasmus, whose intellect and learning are admired by everyone, should prove less skilled at disputing than every dialectician, mere schoolboys included.

But I will leave these points alone; they are relatively minor affairs, since they merely involve disagreement about the importance of literature. But that other slur is certainly much more offensive, where you recklessly drag in the names of the Hussite Jerome<sup>27</sup> and the grammarian Cresconius,<sup>28</sup> both heretics, of course; for you seem to be trying to link them with those in whose company you name them. What of this, that you treat several points so invidiously that it seems you would like nothing more than to turn first the Louvain theologians, then all the other theologians in the world, and finally all the universities against him by twisting the meaning of some of his words in the most irresponsible way?<sup>29</sup>

To begin with the last point: he said that not all theologians find fault with the Folly, but only the ones who resent the rebirth of sound learning, and then, since you had written that his new edition of Jerome pleased the theologians, he said that the ones who found fault with the Folly would dislike the edition as well.<sup>30</sup> Here you snatch up this elegant theme for a joke and exclaim, “What a novel achievement, to edit a text few will like,”<sup>31</sup> as if there remain only a few who will like it once we eliminate from the great crowd of legitimate theologians one or two grumbling old men who have not the slightest legitimate claim to the title they profess. And yet, pressing ahead with the same charming joke, you say,

Well, then, theologians will not like it (doubtless those were his words); then please tell us, who will? lawyers, or doctors, or even philosophers, so that they can encroach on an alien field? No, you are preparing that text for grammarians.

20 EE 2: 132; the Epistolae decretals is a text of canon law. 21 EE 2: 133 22 EE 2: 134 23 EE 3: 135 24 that . . . schoolboy: See Adages 1042 (CWE 33: 40). 25 See

EE 2: 127. 26 See Cicero, De oratore 32.113–14; De finibus 2.6; Brutus 309. 27 Jerome of Prague (ca. 1365–1416), a follower of John Hus 28 a Donatist opponent of Augustine 29 See EE 2: 102–3. 30 See EE 2: 108. 31 EE 2: 130

Then make ready a throne for the grammarians to be arbiters of all the sciences; let them breed us a new kind of theology which will finally be born like a ludicrous mouse. Nor do we need to worry lest scholars refuse to bow down to their scepters. For scepters they have hickory sticks, and with these they play king in low dives where the air rings with blows, and though they are more foolish than Self-Love and Folly, they suppose that they know every science just because they have mastered the mere words and syntax.
And so there is no need for universities: schools like Zwolle and Deventer<sup>32</sup> will suffice us. And certainly this is the opinion of that great man, the Hussite Jerome, that God's church derives as much benefit from universities as it does from the devil; nor does it worry the grammarians in the least that this opinion was condemned in the Council of Constance,<sup>33</sup> since it was surely attended by no one who was not quite uncultured and ignorant of Greek.<sup>34</sup>

It would be wrong of me, Dorp, to break in on your joking too often, although it is amazing how long it has kept you so very amused. But if you have finished your joking, now, Dorp, it is your turn to listen.

No one reading your own words could fail to perceive that you had no occasion at all for this tangential comment about universities or that no matter how copiously or eloquently you declaimed your set-piece it has nothing to do with the argument and does not require any answer. Nonetheless I think there should be no room for doubt as to how Erasmus feels about universities, in which he has both studied and taught, and not only what you label grammar, but also (along with much else of considerably more use to all Christians) even those petty problems you presently value so much and will ultimately value so little. Everyone knows how long and how highly regarded he was at Paris, and then later at Bologna as well, to say nothing of Rome for the moment, even though I consider it the foremost of all universities. Oxford and Cambridge now cherish Erasmus, as they clearly should,

for he was active for long periods in both, winning praise for himself as immense as the good he conferred on their scholars. They both urge him to join them, and since he was awarded his doctorate in theology elsewhere, they both seek to adopt him as one of their own theologians.

Yet I am not at all sure that you have much respect for our universities, since you confer so much importance on Louvain and Paris that it seems you leave nothing at all for the rest of mankind, especially in dialectic. You say, after all, that if the theologians of Louvain and Paris were not dialecticians there would be no dialectic on earth nor would there have been any for these many centuries.<sup>35</sup> I was in both universities seven years ago;
not long, to be sure, but while there I tried hard to learn what things are taught in each university and what method of teaching is used there. And indeed, though I honor them both, I have so far discovered no reason, either in what I heard while I was there or in what I have learned since I left, why, even for dialectic, I ought to prefer either one of them to Oxford or Cambridge for the education of my own children, for whom I want strictly the best.

And yet I will admit (for I would not like to deny anyone his fair share of praise) that we Englishmen owe a great debt to the Parisian, Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples.<sup>36</sup> All of our better minds and sounder judgments acknowledge in him a restorer of true dialectic and true philosophy, especially Aristotelian.
Through this man it seems Paris is paying us back, in a way, for a benefit received long ago, since through him they restore to our country the same sciences
we originally taught them. This last point is so generally acknowledged that even Gaguin,<sup>37</sup> no belittler of France's prestige and no patron of England's, includes it in his Annals. And would that the scholars of Louvain and Paris alike would accept Lefèvre's commentaries on Aristotle's dialectic. Unless I am mistaken, in both universities that science would then be less contentious and not quite so corrupt.

But I wonder why you linked the scholars of Louvain and Paris in your comment about dialectic:
they are so thoroughly at odds with each other that they do not even agree on a name, since the former

<sup>32</sup> considered the best schools in the Low Countries at the time <sup>33</sup> Jerome was condemned as a heretic and executed at the Council of Constance (1414–18) for maintaining the teachings of Wycliffe and Hus. <sup>34</sup> EE 2: 130; uncultured... Greek: See Adages 1518 (CWE 33: 299–300). <sup>35</sup> See EE 2: 134. <sup>36</sup> Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples (ca. 1455–1536) edited St. Paul's Epistles from the Vulgate along with a paraphrase and commentary in 1512. <sup>37</sup> Robert Gaguin (1433–1501), a French humanist affect the name “realists,” the latter the name “nominalists.” But suppose that they both accept Aristotle, that both are engaged in interpreting him, and that all their contentions concern nothing else but his meaning; since the scholars of Louvain and Paris interpret him in two different, or rather in two contradictory senses, how do you know which party you ought to join? On the other hand, if this sort of quarrel is actually relevant to dialectic but not at all relevant to Aristotle, either one party or both are professing not only the logic of Aristotle, as you say they do, but some other, as well. But if the points which give rise to such controversy are not even relevant to dialectic (which they certainly are not, if you hold that he taught dialectic perfectly and if they have no relevance to him), it would be highly absurd to endeavor to learn dialectic by feuding for so many years over things which have nothing to do with it.

Indeed, Dorp, I am tempted to think that many of the theories over which battles are constantly raging as if home and hearth were at stake either have little to do with logic or are not very useful for learning it well. In the study of grammar, for instance, it should be enough to learn those empirical precepts which prepare you to speak Latin yourself and to read it intelligently, but not anxiously to seek out innumerable rules of speech or to squander your life over letters and syllables. In dialectic, by the same token, I should have thought it sufficient to master the nature of words, the force of propositions, and the forms of syllogisms, and at once to apply dialectic as a tool to the other branches of learning. With this very thing in mind Aristotle restricted his own dialectic to the ten ultimate classes of real entities or of predicables, to a treatise on propositions, and to the forms of the syllogism, the demonstrative, the probable, and the captious. To these Porphyry added a kind of entrance or introduction in his five universals, which may be construed either as entities or as words. Certainly neither propounded, and Porphyry flatly refused to propound, those sophistical problems that do more to stunt than to foster young intellects in need of more wholesome instruction.<sup>38</sup>

But there have sprung up of late certain monstrous absurdities, the bane of sound learning in general, which have muddled up subjects which were clearly distinguished by the ancients and have corrupted all subjects by sullyng the oldest and purest traditions with their foul accretions. In grammar, for instance, to say nothing of Alexander<sup>39</sup> and others like him (for they did teach grammar somehow, no matter how crudely), a certain Albert, professing to expound grammar, has presented us instead with some sort of logic or metaphysics, or rather with out-and-out drivel and nonsense;<sup>40</sup> yet this unsurpassed trifling is not only accepted in the universities but is even admired so much by some that according to them no one who has not earned the title of Albertist is worth anything as a grammarian.<sup>41</sup> So great is the power of a conviction to pervert even sound minds and judgments once it has been planted by incompetent teachers and reinforced by the passage of time.

For this reason I am not so astonished that the same kind of supersophistical trifling has crept in to supplant dialectic; this trifling affords such delight to its votaries, because of its “subtlety,” that in a talk which I recently had on this topic with a certain dialectician who passes for very learned, he claimed (I will use his own words; I cannot see how else to achieve the same brilliant perfection of eloquence) that “how Aristotle wrote was real vulgar,” and “these days,” he said, “schoolboys get so wonderfully grounded in their Little Logic that I am pretty well certain that if Aristotle rose again out of his grave and picked an argument with them they would shut him up good, not only in sophistry but in his logic, too.” I was as sorry as I could be to take leave of the fellow, but as things stood just then I was rather too busy for play.

But as for that book, Little Logic, so called probably because it contains little logic, it is worth having a look at its chapters on so-called suppositions, on ampliations, restrictions, and appellations, and everywhere else, to see all of the pointless and even false little precepts it does contain, such as those which oblige one to draw a distinction between these propositions (and other ones like them): “The lion than an animal is stronger” and “The lion is stronger than an animal,” as if they did not mean the same thing; and admittedly both are so pointless that each of them means almost nothing,

<sup>38</sup> See Porphyry’s introduction to his Commentaria in Aristotlem Graeca.

<sup>39</sup> Alexander de Villa Dei (fl. 1200), author of Doctrinale, a Latin grammar 40 out . . . nonsense: See Praise of Folly (ASD 4/3: 138).

<sup>41</sup> More is referring to Grammatica

speculativa, now attributed to Thomas of Erfurt.

though if anything, then doubtless the same. There is just as much difference between “Wine I drank twice” and “Twice I drank wine”; that is to say, a great difference according to those logic-choppers, but in actual fact none at all. Now if anyone eats meat which is not just well-done, but half-charred, they insist he is telling the truth if he asserts, “Raw meat I ate”; not, however, if he asserts, “I ate raw meat.” Then if someone leaves one part for me but appropriates the rest of my money for himself, I will supposedly be lying if I say, “He has robbed me of cash,” but lest I should lack words to file my accusation in court I can say, “Of cash he has robbed me.” And in one hypothetical instance, which they call a “posited possible,” the statement “The pope I have beaten” will be true, while the statement “I have beaten the pope” will be false for the same hypothetical instance, namely, given that whoever is now pope long ago as a boy took a beating from me. By Jove, those who teach this sort of thing as old men should be given a beating themselves for every lesson that they teach to boys.<sup>42</sup>

What about this? They say that the statement “Every man is a father who has a son” is false unless all men already have sons, since of course it amounts to the same thing as saying “Every man is a father, and every man has a son.” But at the same time, they affirm that this statement is true, “A father will Socrates be when Socrates will not be a father,” and this one, “A father will John go on being when John will not go on being a father.” Who can listen to that without thinking that what he is hearing is a riddle?

But the words “AM” and “CAN” simply rule the world, and because, as the saying goes, they are “expansive,” they extend their domain far and wide beyond nature’s own bounds. Indeed, those men maintain that this statement is true: “Everything which will be, is.” But, of course, they interpret it shrewdly. For according to them, “Everything that will be, is,” means “Everything that is something that will be, is”; and in this way they see to it that Antichrist, who will be eventually, may not be just yet. For even though “Everything that will be, is,” and even though “Antichrist will be,” it still does not follow that “Antichrist is,” since of course “Antichrist is not a being-that-will-be.” And had we not been furnished with this hyperacute exposition of that proposition by theologians adept in dialectical subtleties, Antichrist would doubtless have invaded Christendom long ago, not without immense danger for everyone else. For I fail to see how the theologians themselves could feel threatened at all, since they hold that these too are true statements: “Antichrist is lovable” and “Antichrist is receptive to love.”

But indeed neither Antichrist nor the final day of judgment itself could upset nature’s order as thoroughly as this dialectic, which teaches that these propositions are true: “The living was dead”; “The future was past”; whence of course it results that the resurrection of the dead seems to be (as they themselves say) not just “in progress,” but rather “in fact.” And there are others which are no less remarkable, but these are delightful, besides, and appealing as well as undoubtedly true: “The virgin was a whore” and “The whore will be a virgin” and “The whore is potentially a virgin.” It is hard to say which of the two, virgins or whores, owe more thanks to such generous dialecticians; certainly both of them owe a great deal. So the poets are busy with trifles, dialecticians with serious affairs. Poets feign and tell lies; dialecticians speak only the truth, even when they affirm this proposition to be indisputably true: “A dead man is able to celebrate Mass.” But although I dare not disbelieve this when the dialecticians assert it, and indeed almost swear to it, for to controvert such an assembly of incontrovertible doctors is out of the question, nonetheless to this day, to the best of my memory, I have never met anyone who professed to have served a Mass said by a dead celebrant. Is this really the same dialectic that Aristotle teaches? That Jerome recommends? That Augustine esteems?<sup>43</sup> Dialectic that even “mad Orestes,” in Persius’s phrasing, “would swear was the work of a madman”?<sup>44</sup>

I wonder, by Jove, how these petty adepts ever reached the conclusion that those propositions should be understood in a way that no one on earth but themselves understands them. Those words are not technical terms on which these men can claim a monopoly, as it were, so that anyone wishing to use them must go and ask them for a loan. Such expressions are actually common language, though these men do return some of them in a worse state than they were in when they were appropriated from ordinary craftsmen. They have borrowed their words from the public domain; they abuse public property.

<sup>42</sup> Plato makes a similar joke in Euthydemus 298c–299a. <sup>43</sup> This answers a passage in Dorp’s second letter (EE 2: 133). <sup>44</sup> Persius 3.118

But the so-called rule of logic teaches that this is the right way to construe propositions like those. Damn it, since when can some rule slapped together in some corner<sup>45</sup> by men who themselves barely know how to speak impose new laws of speech on the entire world? Grammar teaches the right way to speak, and yet it invents no laws of speech in defiance of custom; instead, it simply sees which constructions appear the most often in speech and points these out to those who are unschooled in speech so that their speech will not flout common usage.<sup>46</sup> Nor does sane dialectic, at least, do its work any differently. For example, this syllogism, “Every animal runs; man is an animal; therefore man runs,” is a syllogism not because it is duly set up in accordance with the norm of dialectic and constructed in the figure of “barbara,” but because reason teaches that the last statement follows from the premises; and this is precisely why reason made the rule as it did. Otherwise, should it set out to make that rule differently, it would swerve off in every direction from the structure of nature itself. By the same token, let those men also stop insisting that we must interpret the proposition “The whore will be a virgin” as “The whore (who is still or was once a virgin) . . .” just because a rule orders that it should be so; let them bring us a reason from the fact of the matter why such a rule should have been made. For if that interpretation is right then it must emerge either from the fact of the matter being stated or from the particular force of the idiom employed.

Now, then, since so many of those who spoke Latin long ago lacked neither intelligence nor erudition, nor were they, I think, any less versed in their idiom than these fellows are, how does it happen that none of the ancients could understand this statement to be true, “The whore will be a virgin,” or distinguish between these two, “Not a penny have I”<sup>47</sup> and “I have not a penny”? Although no one would deny that transpositions of words often produce different meanings, nor does “Drink before you go” mean the same thing as “Go before you drink.” But I do affirm this, that when meanings do vary in this way, all mortals agree on the fact; for they are guided to do so by reason and not coerced rather than persuaded by the rule of the dialecticians, whose real task is to press us along with true reasoning, to any conclusion, by using the same language we do; to lure us along with insidious trumpery to the point that we wonder how we ever got there is a task, not for them, but for sophists. For this is the dullest kind of acumen and the most foolish finesse in the world, for these men to declare themselves champion debaters and crown themselves victors just because we do not know in what sense, against all common sense, they have secretly agreed to construe our own words.

Yet these quibbles, which do not even merit the label “sophistic,” are not seen as sophistical trifles; instead, they are numbered among the most recondite treasures of dialectic. They are not learned by boys as things to be unlearned later on; instead, they are introduced even by old men into the innermost shrine of theology. Some of them use these quibbles to pad out perplexed theological inquiries; from these quibbles they contrive such ridiculous propositions that nowhere on earth could you find such a rich crop of laughing matter, although I would much rather see those who talk this sort of drivel converted to sanity than take pleasure myself in the drivel they talk while insane. And yet why am I saying this to you, Dorp, since I know you would approve of this nonsense as little as I do if you were able to change it? And with the help of men like you, perhaps you can do so, unless you have resolved to be ruled by the driveling of people who should in all fairness defer to your judgment.

But I will return to your letter to show that Erasmus’s words gave you no pretext for saying (as you do say) that he charges the Louvain theologians with ignorance, much less all the other theologians in the world. He said he could dispense, not with all theologians, of course—he had already said in the same letter that many of them were outstandingly qualified—but only with those theologians (if some happen to fit the description, and some certainly do) who have never learned anything but sophistical trifles. Here you interject, “I think ‘those theologians’ refers to the ones in Louvain.”<sup>48</sup> Why so, Dorp? As if it were hard to find some theologians of this stamp, or rather this stripe,<sup>49</sup> anywhere in the world? You certainly do have a pretty impression of those in Louvain if you think that they all,

<sup>45</sup> in some corner: Adages 3467 (CWE 36: 187–88). <sup>46</sup> Grammar . . . usage:

See Quintilian 1.6.16. <sup>47</sup> See Plautus, Pseudolus 365. <sup>48</sup> See EE 2: 133.

<sup>49</sup> of this . . . stripe: See Adages 2444 (CWE 35: 94).

and they alone, fit this sort of description, whereas he neither says so nor thinks so.

But a bit further along you construe what he said as if it were said not just against those in Louvain but against all the theologians found anywhere in the world, whereas he spoke it neither against all the rest nor against the Louvain theologians themselves. And yet then, as if you were not listening to him, or even to yourself, you seem not so much to proceed to the following words as to burst out with them, carried away in a violent explosion of feeling:

Do we not see the humblest artisans, or even the basest servants, endowed with the most splendid intellects? Then what is the meaning of those epithets you misapply to all theologians, “stupid,” “ignorant,” “pestilential,” and “senseless”? It takes no skill to throw insults at whomever you please, but it is neither an honorable practice nor something a good man would do, if we take careful note of our Savior’s stern sentence: “A man who says ‘Racha’ to his brother will be liable to the Council, but a man who says ‘fool’ will be liable to the fire of Gehenna.”<sup>50</sup> Here Jerome writes, “If we are to give an accounting for each idle word, how much more must we give for an insult! A man who says ‘fool’ to a believer in God shows contempt for religion.”<sup>51</sup>

Here, at any rate, your words are replete with both gravity and sanctity, and truly worthy of a stern theologian; if only they were spoken in their proper place! They are certainly too good to waste, and if they were hurled down at the people from high in the pulpit, they would never go so far astray as to fail to hit someone or other in whom their points might seem to stick. As things are, though, it pains me to see you declaim all these things at Erasmus alone when he alone is a quite inappropriate target for each of the things you declaim. For the verse that you cite from the Gospel, “A man who says ‘fool’ to his brother will be liable to Gehenna,” has nothing to do with a man who names no names but merely asserts that in a great number of men there are one or two fools. Otherwise, ten hells would not be enough for the man who said, “Infinite is the number of fools.”<sup>52</sup>

Furthermore, as for you asking him, “What is the meaning of these epithets that you misapply to all theologians?” I am going to have to ask you the same question, Dorp. For you alone have misapplied to them all what he said about only a few. But I find it completely amazing that you sought to do so, for if—as you say—it takes no skill to throw insults at whomever you please, it certainly requires no skill to pervert things well said by reporting them badly, as you yourself do when you try to make fair criticism seem unfair by deflecting it from those who deserve it to those who do not. Just how easy it is to do this in any circumstances at all you can easily see for yourself.

Honestly, suppose someone subjected your writings to this kind of scrutiny; not a one of your written productions, meticulous as they all are, is meticulous enough to be wholly immune to misrepresentation, not even your latest, most polished epistle, written as an editor’s preface for the Quodlibetica of that most worthy man, Adriaan Floriszoon of Utrecht.<sup>53</sup> Even though your epistle confers fine and copious praise on that work and its author, praise which I, at least, think to be equally earnest and truthful, nonetheless if a slightly more unsympathetic interpreter came along he might feel you were holding out bread in one hand and a stone in the other.<sup>54</sup> First of all, no enthusiasm on your part, indeed nothing but the prayers and the tearful entreaties of others could induce you to take on the project of editing that work, as if you yourself did not think much of it and accepted the task just to gratify others who liked it. Secondly, you write that you set aside your serious studies for the short time it took you to correct those Quodlibetica, as if they had no place among serious studies, even though Master John of Ath,<sup>55</sup> a man as learned as he is judicious, freely lavished his attention on that work, often, as you say, even in the dead of night; for as midwives are commonly summoned by night to help women give birth, it seems that that work could not be emended by day. And then what about this? You praise Adriaan for being unbiased, yet you seem to suggest he is no more unbiased than a Lesbian rule, a rule made out of lead which, as Aristotle reminds us, is not always unbiased, since it bends to fit uneven shapes.<sup>56</sup> My dear Dorp, you must not think that I

<sup>50</sup> Mt 5:22 <sup>51</sup> EE 2:134; Jerome, PL 26:37a <sup>52</sup> Eccl 1:15 <sup>53</sup> future Pope Adrian VI <sup>54</sup> holding . . . other:

See Adages 729 (CWE 32:139); Mt 7:9. <sup>55</sup> John Briart of Ath (d. 1520), an influential Louvain professor say these things because I think you meant anything of the sort or were actually joking around in this way when you praised such a man and such a work. For I hear that the man has won much splendid praise for his manifold accomplishments, and I judge that, at least in its genre, the work is a masterpiece. I say all these things merely to prove that not even sheer trifles are immune to misrepresentation, since even your own meticulous and carefully polished writings require that we read them indulgently.

<sup>56</sup> See Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics 5.10.7; Adages 493 (CWE 31:465).

But it seems that Erasmus took care to give no one the slightest excuse to say he spoke of all theologians when he said the things you hold against him, even when he declares, “Every day I find out by experience just how senseless those men are who have never learned anything else but sophistical trifles.” He does not say “how senseless all theologians are,” or even “those who have learned sophistry,” but “those who have learned nothing else.” And so when you write, “Moreover, Erasmus, when you make the assumption that our theologians are busy with nothing but studying sophisms you are far off the mark,”<sup>57</sup> here you are the one, my dear Dorp, who is far off the mark, since you make the assumption that Erasmus made such an assumption about all of your theologians when he actually makes it about only one or two, and says nothing which has to be taken to include all theologians.

Thus the next point you added is equally irrelevant: “So tell me then—what is to prevent even those who know nothing at all about poetry from perusing the Gospels, the letters of Paul, and the whole of the Bible?”<sup>58</sup> Nothing at all, Dorp, if they did not prevent themselves, as some do who devote their whole lives to those petty problems but certainly never deign to examine the Bible, as if it were simply irrelevant.<sup>59</sup> And Erasmus thinks some to be like this, not all. Thus, you see, you had no cause to tack on that other point, either: “I can produce many theologians from here who will put aside their books and then, strictly from memory, debate with whomever you please on the text of Scripture. Do not make the mistake of believing that theologians are sleeping the sleep of Endymion<sup>60</sup> while you are awake studying literature or that all are deficient in intellect who do not play the poet or orator.”<sup>61</sup>

No one denies, Dorp, that there are some who can put aside their books and debate on the text of Scripture. Indeed, you can everywhere find all too many who not only have put aside their books but have never examined them, men prepared to debate very stubbornly with true Scripture scholars on any text from Scripture at all, not from memory but rather from folly. Neither will I deny that there are some in Louvain, as indeed there are everywhere, who have memorized many passages from Scripture, and of these men whoever has focused his energies not only on memorizing—even illiterate monks and friars do as much—but far more on absorbing the meaning, and has gained sufficient linguistic ability to measure up to the challenge of fully understanding the works of Jerome, Augustine, Ambrose, and other men like them, such a man, in my view, has an unsurpassed right to be registered among theologians, even if he has never written a verse; yes, and even if he has not spent a whole century on those petty disputes or has even ignored them completely.

But you, too, if you wish to acknowledge the truth, will admit that among those who are called theologians there are also some men who put aside the books of Scripture in such a way that they never take them up again; men who give themselves up so completely to this disputatious theology that not only do they not “play the poet or orator,” they apparently care next to nothing about all the holiest fathers and most ancient interpreters of Scripture, and (this much is quite obvious) they definitely neglect both the fathers’ expositions of Scripture and the study of Scripture itself; finally, men who shrug off as mere “positive” doctrine whatever is most valuable, most pious, most Christian, and most worthy of true theologians, although these men think none of it worthy of any exertion on their part;<sup>62</sup> they are born to debate petty problems, as matters of much greater import, though the problems that these men pursue most of all are the ones that pertain least of all to sustaining the faith or encouraging virtue.

Now then, just as I revere and admire that first kind of theologian, even so I have really very little respect for the second, against whom, nonetheless, I myself do not plan to defend either poetry or rhetoric, since I am almost as far removed from

57 EE 2: 133 58 EE 2: 133 59 See Praise of Folly (ASD 4/3: 154). 60 sleep of

Endymion: Adages 863 (CWE 32: 216–17) 61 EE 2: 133–34 62 worthy... part: See

Terence, Eumuchus 312.

poetry and rhetoric as they are themselves. But they are almost as far removed from those arts as they are from theology proper; and from nothing, apart from ordinary common sense, are they further removed than from that. The main reason for this is precisely that on top of their blatant and general ignorance they are perversely convinced of their total omniscience, on which they flatter themselves to the point that whatever they hear being cited, in whatever context, without ever reading the passage or seeing the book it appears in, without knowing what has preceded or what is to follow the words of the quotation, and without even knowing whether or not the text quoted appears in the quoted location, they think they alone can interpret the writings of all men, and even Sacred Scripture itself, in whatever sense happens to suit them.<sup>63</sup> Having run across many of this kind, I will not hesitate to describe at least one, using him as a sample to show what we can expect from the rest.

I recently dined with a certain Italian merchant<sup>64</sup> as learned as he is rich (and he certainly is rich). There also happened to be a theologian at dinner, a member of a religious order; a distinguished disputant, he had recently come from the Continent to London in order to dispute various problems which he had prepared and brought with him. In that arena of disputation he intended to test at first hand what the English could show for themselves and to make his name generally acclaimed among our theologians as it was already renowned among those at home. Though it would take a while, I would certainly not hesitate to tell you what theses he posted and how smartly the whole disputation came off for the fellow if it were as pertinent as it was amusing. Anyway, nothing anyone said at that dinner was guarded well enough or supported meticulously enough to keep that man from toppling it over with one of his syllogisms as soon as the speaker had uttered it, even when the topic of the discussion had nothing to do with theology and as little to do with philosophy, indeed even when it had not the slightest connection with that man's profession. At the start of the dinner, however, he had made it clear that nothing could lack a connection with his profession, for he professed he was ready to dispute pro and contra upon any topic at all.

Gradually the merchant began to get down to more theological problems. He stated some views about usury, about tithes, and about friars hearing confessions in parishes where they were not authorized. It never made a bit of difference to the theologian which side he was defending, but whatever anyone asserted he himself took to task, and whatever anyone else denied he immediately defended.

Finally, as a joke, the merchant brought up the subject of mistresses. He began to defend the position that it was not so evil to have one woman at home as to run through a number away from home. Here again the theologian closed in and ferociously took him to task, not that he appeared to have any real grudge against mistresses but that he hated agreeing with anyone on anything, or perhaps the man just liked variety. Anyway, he asserted that it was the conclusion of a certain Most Translucent Doctor, who wrote that most singular book entitled A Directory for Men Who Keep Mistresses,<sup>65</sup> that a man who has one mistress at home is more sinful than a man who has ten whores away from home, not only because of the evil example it sets but also because there are more opportunities to sin with a woman at home.

Though the merchant's responses were certainly learned and acute, it would be time-consuming and idle to list them for you. But as soon as he noticed that the theologian was not such an expert in Scripture as in those petty problems, he started to play with the fellow and draw various arguments from authority. As he went along, he made up various brief texts which appeared to support his position, and even though he had arbitrarily contrived them all out of thin air he would quote one as if from some epistle of Saint Paul, another as if it were from an epistle of Peter, and still another as if it were straight from the Gospel. Indeed he was so diligent in doing so that he always included a chapter citation for what he was quoting, except that if a book was divided into sixteen chapters he would purposely quote from the twentieth.

Meanwhile what of that good theologian? He made brisk work of the other points, certainly, and wrapped himself up like a hedgehog in prickly retorts, but on my word, for all his evasions he barely escaped those fictitious authorities. Yet he did escape; such is the efficacy of art and experience in close friend of Thomas More <sup>65</sup> anonymous, published in 1508

<sup>63</sup> See Cicero, De oratore 2.4.18, 2.18.76; Erasmus, Praise of Folly (ASD 4/3: 184).

<sup>64</sup> most likely Antonio Bonvisi (d. 1558), a wealthy Italian merchant from Lucca and

discourse. For even though he knew nothing at all about the contents of Sacred Scripture, and though he did not doubt that the words being quoted from Scripture were actually there, and though he thought it wrong to oppose or defy the authority of Scripture but at the same time considered it shameful to give up the field in defeat, even when he was caught in such desperate straits, please observe with what cunning that Proteus<sup>66</sup> slipped out of the net. As soon as some supposedly scriptural text was quoted against him right out of thin air, “You quote well, sir,” he said, “but I understand that text as follows.” And then he would interpret it, not without some bipartite distinction in which he would first say that one meaning supported his opponent and then he would evade it by finding another. But whenever the merchant closed in too intently and claimed that the theologian was not giving the true sense of the text, then the fellow would swear so devoutly that anyone could have believed him that Nicolas de Lyra<sup>67</sup> interpreted that text the same way. Honestly, my dear Dorp, at that one dinner, over the drinks, and indeed from the drinks, just like those earthborn<sup>68</sup> brothers who sprang from the teeth of the serpent, more than twenty of these drunken texts and as many drunken glosses sprang up and at once passed away.

Now, Dorp, what do you say? Do you really think fellows of this sort with their meager knowledge of Sacred Scripture, however puffed up they may be with those theological problems, deserve to be called theologians? I suppose not, but I must say that these comments of yours leave me not at all sure what you think:

Do not let yourself be persuaded, Erasmus, that anyone with a literal understanding of the text of the Bible or even someone with Origen’s knack for discovering a moral significance is already a perfect theologian. There are many things yet to be learned which are not only more difficult to understand but also more useful to the flock for whom Christ died. How else are we to know how we ought to administer the sacraments, what their forms are, when we ought to absolve and when we ought to refuse absolution to a sinner, how much restitution we must make and how much we can keep, and innumerable things of that sort? Unless I am very mistaken you can learn a good deal of the Bible by heart much more easily than you can learn to unravel even one of those perplexities which crop up by the score every day, in which even four words can detain one indefinitely—unless what you call theological trifles includes all that pertains to the sacraments, though without them, according to God’s Holy Catholic Church, man’s salvation is endangered.<sup>69</sup>

Believe me, Dorp, if you had not written this yourself nothing in the world could have made me believe that you held this opinion. So those problems made up by the moderns (for those are the real issue) are not only more difficult to understand but also more useful to the flock for whom Christ died? My word, what a huge elephant you make out of such a small gnat!<sup>70</sup> For at first you consider that subject so difficult that Erasmus could learn a good deal of the Bible by heart more easily than he could learn to unravel even one of those perplexities they contrive by the score every day,<sup>71</sup> in which four words as sticky and squalid as mud can detain you so long that in the same length of time you could have read the whole Bible and strolled through its delightful and life-giving meadows step by step from one side to the other.<sup>72</sup> So then, the danger thus far was that he had not learned those problems. Now I see there is something still worse to be feared, that they may so transcend his capacity that he will not even be able to grasp them. I do not raise the question of what he can do. But of this I am sure: I know some who in other matters are absolute blockheads, as dull as the dullest of pestles,<sup>73</sup> while in this sort of subtlety they have not only been quick to progress but have also outstripped—at a gallop,<sup>74</sup> as they say—their own far more intelligent and no less industrious comrades in the art of disputing. Indeed, reckless and impudent folly will always leap in where good character and sound judgment will generally hold back out of shame at the prospect of trifling.<sup>75</sup>

<sup>66</sup> See Adages 1174 (CWE 33: 113–14); Proteus is also known as the Old Man of the Sea in Homer (Odyssey 4.365–480).

<sup>67</sup> Nicolas de Lyra (1270–1340) was a Franciscan known for his Postillae perpetuae in universam Sacram Scripturam, an exposition on the literal sense of Scripture.

<sup>68</sup> See Ovid, Metamorphoses 3.102–3, 115–25. <sup>69</sup> EE 2: 135 <sup>70</sup> huge . . . gnat: See Adages 869, 2027 (CWE 32: 219, 34: 191–92). <sup>71</sup> unravel . . . day: Adages 1376 (CWE 33: 229) <sup>72</sup> step . . . other: Adages

137 (CWE 31: 178–79) <sup>73</sup> dull . . . pestles: Adages 2521 (CWE 35: 135); Jerome, Epistolae 69.4 (PL 22: 657) <sup>74</sup> Adages 321 (CWE 31: 335–36) <sup>75</sup> reckless . . . trifling: See Praise of Folly (ASD 4/3: 102–4); Adages 3454 (CWE 36: 178–79).

Dorp, you honestly ought to rejoice in this rare gift of yours, which you owe not to your personal powers but to God, the bestower of every good thing;<sup>76</sup> for it is through his unusual kindness to you that everything in Scripture should strike you as so easy. For you would scarcely have found everything openly expressed in this book, which has been closed by seven seals,<sup>77</sup> if it had not been unsealed for you by that same Lamb who “opens the book, and none closes it, who closes the book, and none opens it.”<sup>78</sup> Mind you, Dorp, this same book which strikes you as so easy struck Jerome as exceedingly difficult.<sup>79</sup> Augustine considered it impenetrable.<sup>80</sup> Not one of the ancients, indeed, dared to claim that he understood it, for they thought that God, in his unfathomable wisdom, deliberately hid its meaning far from the surface precisely in order to challenge the sharpest eye and to stimulate minds with the promise of buried and hard-to-reach treasure which their very assurance might otherwise render indifferent to riches set plainly in view.

I will not dwell just now on what uncommon learning and what rare intelligence are needed to take texts which at first may seem quite incompatible with morality and to reconcile them with morality so neatly and skillfully that they seem to be made for the purpose and not dragged in from elsewhere to serve it. Some now practice this art so ineptly that since they get no further than dragging a text from its previous context without fitting it into their own and since there is no sense in their matter or charm in their words, it naturally turns out that their moralization (as they call it), devoid of all spirit and grace, leaves us perfectly cold. I will not dwell on this, as I said. But in any case, even the literal sense is in my view a matter of such immense difficulty that I am not sure any mortal can quite comprehend it. For example, I think no one comprehends the literal sense of the words, “The Lord said to my Lord, ‘Sit at my right hand,’”<sup>81</sup> unless he understands that in these words the prophet is making a mystical prediction about Christ himself. And apart from the prophets, not one of the Jews, even though they were constantly studying these books, understood those words thus before Christ revealed this as their literal meaning. And even if he did interpret the Scriptures for his apostles and disciples

(for so far as I know he never disputed those petty problems with them), I would still hesitate to affirm that he either taught them the whole meaning of Scripture in person or conveyed it to them by the Holy Spirit after his ascension. For just as the meaning of many of the things that the prophets had foretold about Christ escaped everyone else until all was made plain by Christ’s life, Passion, and resurrection, even so I think that the powers of mortals are not equal to settling the question of whether there may still lie hidden in Scripture mysterious truths about either the Last Judgment or other things we cannot even imagine, mysterious truths none has discerned before now or will ever discern before they are unfolded in actual events at a date and a time foreseen only by God<sup>82</sup> in his inscrutable providence.

But so be it, Dorp: Scripture is easy, petty problems are difficult. That by no means keeps a knowledge of Scripture from being more worthwhile than a training in problems. So, too, vaulting and tying one’s body in knots the way certain acrobats and mountebanks do are more difficult feats than to walk, and it is easier to chew bread than to grind up potsherds with your teeth, but I think no one would be willing to trade these normal and commonplace functions for such vain displays. Hence it does not matter much to me which of the two is more difficult. But that you should pretend that those problems are even more useful than a knowledge of Scripture to the flock for whom Christ died, this I honestly cannot endure. For if you claimed that those problems were worth knowing, I would certainly not disagree; if you set them alongside the works of the ancients, I would say you were going too far; since in fact you rank those kitchen-maids of yours not just as high as but indeed even higher than the Bible itself, holy queen of all genres of literature, you must pardon me, Dorp, but by Jove I cannot keep from sending them packing with that line from Terence, “Get lost, you tramps, and take those grand airs with you!”<sup>83</sup>

Indeed, I am dumbfounded when I read the passage where you make such grand claims for those problems, as if the whole weight of the Church were sustained by perplexed problems of this sort—that is, by a reed—just as the poets say heaven is sustained on the shoulders of Atlas,<sup>84</sup> as if the Church would be in immediate danger of collapsing into a heap of ashes if it lacked such a prop. For you ask, “How else are we to know how we ought to administer the sacraments, what their forms are, when we ought to absolve and when we ought to refuse absolution to a sinner, how much restitution we must make and how much we can keep?”<sup>85</sup> Dorp, do you really think all the old holy fathers, who were as learned as they were devout, were completely ignorant of all those points which you suppose to be found only in modern compilers of problems? Were Jerome, Ambrose, and Augustine stark blind when it came to the form and matter of the sacraments? And so for more than a thousand years—note that more than a thousand years separate the Passion of Christ and the time of Peter Lombard, whose Sentences,<sup>86</sup> like the Trojan horse,<sup>87</sup> poured forth this entire army of problems—for so many years, no, for so many centuries, was the Church without sacraments? Did it not have the same ones? Was it so long unknown when we ought to absolve a sinner and when we ought to refuse absolution? Were they ignorant, too, of how much restitution we are taught to make? For I will concede that the ancients were not so acute as those men in disputing how much we can keep. Rather, just as Zaccheus, afraid of returning too little of his ill-gotten gains, publicly promised to make a fourfold restitution,<sup>88</sup> just so those ancient fathers urged everyone to repay even more than enough. In this area they were not, I confess, as precise as the moderns in defining and hair-splitting. Still, as Terence puts it, I would rather emulate the negligence of the former than the pedantic diligence of the latter,<sup>89</sup> who dispute the case over-intently and ask rather what we can keep than what we should give back, rather how close we can get to a sin without sinning than how wide a berth we should give it. And indeed, when one of them gives a thief advice about restitution, like a careful steward of someone else’s money, he takes more care to prevent him from going a finger’s breadth too far,<sup>90</sup> as they say, than from stopping too short by a mile.

<sup>76</sup> gift . . . thing: See Js 1:17. <sup>77</sup> See Rv 5:1–6. <sup>78</sup> Is 22:22. <sup>79</sup> See Jerome, Epistolae 49.4, 53; 105.5 (PL 22: 512, 540–49, 836). <sup>80</sup> See Augustine, De doctrina Christiana 2.67 (PL 34: 38). <sup>81</sup> Ps 109(110):1; Mt 22:41–46; Mk

12:35–37; Lk 20:41–44. <sup>82</sup> See Mt 24:36; Acts 1:7. <sup>83</sup> Terence, Phormio 930–32

I myself would contend, as I think even you would concede, my dear Dorp, that whatever is necessary for salvation—that is, the things without which we cannot be saved—have been abundantly transmitted to us, first of all through Sacred Scriptures themselves, then through their first interpreters, then too by the customs transmitted to us from hand to hand,<sup>91</sup> as it were, by the ancient fathers, and finally through the sacred decrees of the Church. And if those acute moderns have subjoined any more precise precepts to those which make up this tradition, I will grant that a number of these innovations are advantageous and useful, but I certainly think not a one is so vital that people cannot live without it.

But perhaps you will say that not everything in the works of the ancients is as easy to find or as neatly classified as it is in the works of these moderns, who have assembled all sorts of related and seemingly parallel passages into chapters as if splitting them up into their proper clans. On this point, Dorp, perhaps I concur with you, and I grant that there is some advantage in having the contents of written works, like domestic supplies, thoroughly sorted and clearly distinguished so that you can immediately put your hand on whatever you want without any mistake. This is indeed, as I said, an advantage. But some use this considerable advantage to such disadvantage that it almost appears that, advantage or not, we would be better off without it. For I think that the principal reason that all of the most ancient interpreters of Scripture have been neglected for so long by so many is simply that the corrupt judgments of less gifted intellects persuaded first themselves and then others as well that no honey remains to be found beyond what is amassed in the beehives of those compilations, and therefore, content with the hives alone, they neglect and scorn everything else.

Long ago I myself met a man with this attitude in a certain bookseller’s shop. He was an old man, with one foot in the grave,<sup>92</sup> as they say, and both feet before long, I am certain. He had been awarded the distinction of a doctorate, as they call it, more than thirty years before. I happened to say in his presence that Saint Augustine once thought that all demons

84 See Adages 67, 3493 (CWE 31:110, 36:204); EE 2: 11; Praise of Folly (ASD 4/3: 154). 85 EE 2: 135 86 Peter Lombard (ca. 1100–60), Bishop of Paris and author of the scholastic textbook Sententiarum libri quatuor 87 For the simile, see Cicero, De oratore 2.22.94. 88 See Lk 19:2–10. 89 Andria 18–21 90 finger’s...

far: Adages 406 (CWE 31: 390–91) 91 transmitted... hand: Adages 3428 (CWE 36: 160–61) 92 See Adages 1052 (CWE 33: 47–48); Praise of Folly (ASD 4/3: 108).

were corporeal substances,<sup>93</sup> whereupon he at once wrinkled his forehead and checked my temerity with his furrowed brow.<sup>94</sup> Then I said, “I myself do not say this is so, father, nor do I defend Augustine for saying so. Being a man, he could make a mistake. I take his word as seriously as anyone’s, but I take no one man’s word unconditionally.” Now the man really started to seethe, most of all because I had tried to foist so great a misrepresentation on so great a father. For “You think,” he exclaimed, “I have not read Augustine? Quite the contrary,” he said, “before you were born.” His sharp words would have put me to flight had there not been a counterproof ready and waiting. For since all this occurred in a bookshop, I picked up Augustine’s tract On the Divination of Demons, turned to the passage, and showed it to him. When he had read the passage once, and then once more, and at last, on the third reading, with me to assist him, he had begun to understand what he read, he finally said in bewilderment, “I certainly am amazed that Augustine puts it that way in this book when he certainly does not put it that way in the Master of the Sentences, which is a more masterly book than this one.”

Men of this motley crew, men who never read any of the ancients or anything out of the Scriptures except in the Sentences and their commentaries, seem to me to be acting like someone who neglects all the authors who actually wrote Latin, takes his syntactical precepts from Alexander,<sup>95</sup> and then tries to learn the rest of the Latin language from Perotti’s Cornucopia<sup>96</sup> and Calepino<sup>97</sup> since he thinks he will find all the words of that language contained in their books. And indeed he will find a great many, and choice ones, at that; and just as one can read sayings of earlier theologians introduced as authorities in the works of more recent ones, so too in these glossaries one can read various ancient poets and orators, including a few who are not even extant today. But these scraps can no more make a Latin-speaker than those alone can make a theologian, not even if he is armed with ten thousand of the prickliest problems on earth; and when I see a theologian of this sort, I wonder just what useful service such problems can ever equip him to do for the Church.

Perhaps to dispute against heretics; for this is their principal selling point. But the heretics are either learned or unlearned. If they are unlearned, as the great majority of them are, then they would understand neither those subtleties which are his only weapon nor the outlandish words which are his only means of expression. Necessarily, then, this sort of disputation would be just as productive as if someone delivered an elaborate oration in French (for the French think no other tongue elegant) exhorting some Turk versed in no other language but Turkish to convert to our faith. But if the heretics are learned, indeed learned in those very problems (for they are almost never heretics with reference to anything else), when will they be refuted? Will there be any end to disputing? For the very problems with which they are assaulted afford them no end of material with which to strike back, so that the plight of both parties is very much like that of men fighting naked between heaps of stones: neither one lacks the means to strike out; neither one has the means to defend himself. Indeed, some of the principal authors they read in the schools — authors fully as subtle as they are reported to be — not to mention that they have dreamt up certain problems about God so ridiculous you might think they were raising a laugh and so blasphemous you might feel they were laughing directly at him, they are certainly so zealous in raising objections to the faith and so backward in answering them that they seem to be in collusion with the opposition, defending the faith in jest and assaulting it in earnest. Now then, pitted against the sort of theologians I have mentioned, how soon are the heretics going to succumb, since they have been trained in the same school of tactics?<sup>98</sup> Not very soon, to be sure, in my view, were they not more intimidated by one little bundle of faggots than daunted by many large bundles of syllogisms.

But he will at least be well suited to preach to the people. Good lord, talk about drafting an ox as a boxer! For since the man has learned nothing but problems which are totally unfamiliar and extremely ill suited to the ears of the people, naturally he must learn some sermon by heart out of The Disciple’s Sermons, The Preacher’s Companion, or The Sleep-Well; those sermons are silly affairs in themselves, and when the man who delivers them is sillier still, having never prepared for that task and declaiming that whole mass of words from another man's stomach, the whole sermon perforce leaves us cold.

<sup>93</sup> See De divinatione daemonum (PL 40: 584–86). <sup>94</sup> furrowed brow: See Adages 748, 2471 (CWE 32: 150–51, 35:

107–8). <sup>95</sup> Alexander de Villa Dei (fl. 1200) <sup>96</sup> Niccolo Perotti (1430–80) <sup>97</sup> Ambrogio Calepino (1430–1510)

<sup>98</sup> trained... tactics: Adages 1750 (CWE 34: 68)

5 Therefore I simply fail to see what those problems can do for a man who knows nothing besides but to render him useless for everything else, since if some-
 10 one advances some topic from those disputations, more subtle than solid, which he has already practiced a thousand times, now he feels right at home,
 15 now he ruffles his feathers like a cock riding high on his dunghill,<sup>99</sup> but if he is led a bit further away from his native preserve, all at once the unknown look of everything buries him in confusion and 20 darkness. Nor does dialectic, no matter how powerful and acute, rescue him as he stumbles about in his blindness to actual things: just as dialectic elicits various species and numerous patterns of argu-
 25 ments from the nature of things once it is known, even so when the things themselves remain a mystery dialectic necessarily falls silent, of no use at all. Furthermore, once this fellow, by now an old man, 30 has for whatever reason made off from the camp of the schoolmen, where those problems are constantly being argued, within two years the same problems which he has explored both intensively and exclusively for so many years, all those subtleties, too many to keep track of, slip easily away into
 35 nothing, unrestrained by connections with actual things, and disappear like a cloud of smoke, and predictably he himself suffers in practice what Aristotle is frequently quoted as saying holds true for the soul of a child, namely that his soul finally becomes, as it were, a clean slate,<sup>100</sup> on which nothing
 40 at all is depicted, and it turns out, through a wondrous reversal, that he who once thought the sum total of wisdom consisted of argumentative loquacity has become an old man with the tongue of an infant, a man all would laugh at if he did not use 45 haughty silence in place of wisdom to cloak his own folly; but in fact he is all the more laughable precisely because the same man who was lately more clamorous than Stentor<sup>101</sup> has now, by the opposite defect, been rendered more dumb than a fish,<sup>102</sup> and now sits among speakers as if he himself had not a tongue in his head,<sup>103</sup> like “a player without any lines,”<sup>104</sup> as they say, and “a truncated statue of Hermes.”<sup>105</sup>

Finally, so that you may understand once and for all how I feel about this whole affair, I neither criticize all theologians nor condemn all the problems
 50 of the moderns; but the kind that are wholly irrelevant, the sort that contribute nothing to erudition and detract a good deal from piety, this sort I believe should be not merely censured but thrown out
 55 entirely. As for those that remain, those that treat human concerns seriously or divine concerns reverently, always using a modest approach which will show that their goal is the truth and not winning a quarrel, given that they must not monopolize any-
 60 one's attention or take up too much of anyone's time, given that they must acknowledge their own limitations and not rank themselves as high as their betters (let alone even higher), these problems, presented like this, I repeat, I am perfectly glad to embrace,
 65 although only so far as to grant that such inquiries do have their use as a method of intellectual exercise even as I deny that they furnish an essential and central support for the salvation of the Church as a whole.
 70

Now then, I do not castigate those theologians who have had a good taste of these problems; indeed, I even praise those who have complemented a loftier training in Sacred Scripture and a nobler education in the earliest, holiest, and most learned fathers with these not contemptible accessory studies.
 75 But in all honesty I do not praise the sort of theologians who do not merely squander their youth over problems of every variety, but even expire over them; who, hampered by some intellectual deficiency or spurred on by the childish applause of the schoolmen, have neglected the writings of all of the ancients, slighted even the very Gospels of which they profess themselves doctors, and learned nothing at all except those petty problems, which are 80 partly barren in their own right and partly barren for those who are barren of everything else; who, still worse, are already old men, given up for dead losses, since they cannot treat Scripture aptly without knowing the works of the ancients, and they
 85 cannot come to know those with the poor Latin that they now possess, while to go back to grammar

99 cock . . . dunghill: See Adages 3325 (CWE 36: 76); Praise of Folly (ASD 4/3: 72). 100 clean slate: See Aristotle, De anima 3.4.14. 101 See Praise of Folly

(ASD 4/3: 144); Adages 1237 (CWE 33: 150). 102 dumb . . . fish: See Adages 429 (CWE 31: 408). 103 not . . . head: Adages 979 (CWE 32: 270) 104 See Adages 978 (CWE 32:

270). 105 See Adages 1910, 3299 (CWE 34: 132, 36: 60).

and learn among boys, indeed from boys, is not merely a disgraceful proposal but also comes too late to do any good. My dear Dorp, I am so far from praising such men that I even think these theologians in name, not in fact, should be forced, as the Romans compelled bad officials to give up their public employments, to resign from the office they occupy so undeservingly.

And yet it is no wonder that there are some like this among so great a number of theologians. For what order of men can be cordoned off so strictly that not even one unworthy person may ambitiously worm his way in with a bribe or a favor or other machinations and then, once he has gained a high standing, raise as many like himself as he can into the same high position by giving them his support? This is why there is no order of men that is not rife with unworthy members. For just as there were men in the Roman senate whose majesty no kings could equal, even so there were several so base and inglorious that they died a miserable death in the course of a festival, crushed by the press of the crowd.<sup>106</sup> And yet even as the lowliness of some senators did not lessen the brilliance of the rest, nor did the senatorial title rescue the baseness of the unworthy from being exposed to contempt, so their title does not exempt unworthy theologians from being reviled, nor does any contempt they provoke derogate in the slightest degree from the honor of true theologians or impair in the slightest the reverend majesty of theologians in general, something which I myself am as keen to protect and enhance as any man that has ever lived. For it would be foolish to make the same claim for Erasmus, since everyone knows that whatever is said or imagined unjustly against the sacred order of theologians is Erasmus's own special and personal concern.

There you have my opinion about this affair, my dear Dorp, and by heaven I am convinced that (if you are the man I imagine you are) there you have your opinion, as well; if it meets your approval, consider it that of Erasmus, as well as my own, but if not, then not even my own any longer than you would so have it. For I do not hold any opinion so stubbornly that I am not ready to change it at the command of a person who will never, I know, command anything without a good reason. But so much for that.

Concerning the rest of your letter I will be just as brief as, regarding this part, I have been disproportionately verbose — rightly so, on both counts. For Erasmus, who never saw what you have written concerning the points I have so far discussed, has both written and promised to write more precisely concerning the points I am planning to talk about next. Moreover, a number of these bear on issues in which Saint Jerome himself not only sides with Erasmus by way of his personal example, as if in a judicial precedent, but has also in effect published his verdict in writing and ruled on Erasmus's behalf.<sup>107</sup> For everything that you say to prevent any changes in Scripture on the basis of Greek textual authorities was urged long ago against Saint Jerome and very powerfully refuted by him, unless you claim to be making a new point when you say that long ago there were many translations, but that all of these were rejected so that textual variations would not cause the faithful to waver, whereas this one, the same one adopted by the holy fathers, emended by Jerome, and passed on all the way down to us, is the only translation the Church has approved, not in some single council but through an unvarying custom of referring to this text whenever any council has faced some perplexity concerning the faith. For it could not have happened that all the rest should have vanished while this one alone has come down to us unless that was the work, not of chance, but of our forefathers' deliberate planning.

First of all, my dear Dorp, I think everyone knows that this very edition, even before Jerome's time — for why else would he have emended this one in particular? — was both accepted by the Church and approved through the regular practice of quoting its text, which I think was indeed the sole reason why it is the only one that has come down to us. Now then, why did Jerome dare to make any changes? But not only did other most virtuous and holy men give their approval to what he had done; even Augustine himself urged him to do it.<sup>108</sup> And Jerome himself states that the changes he made were at points where the sense of the Latin text differed from that of the Greek.<sup>109</sup> He thought this more useful than that which you counsel Erasmus

<sup>106</sup> See Suetonius, Divus Iulius 40.4.

<sup>107</sup> See Jerome's biblical prefaces in

PL 28–29. <sup>108</sup> See Jerome, Epistolae

116.31 (PL 22: 95). <sup>109</sup> See PL 29: 528.

to do, namely to annotate only those points where the translator could have rendered the meaning more aptly and pointedly, but to leave the sense just as it is, if the texts ever differ, and not point out an obvious corruption to readers of Latin.<sup>110</sup> What Jerome felt to be barely worth troubling about you think ought to get more attention than anything else; what he judged most important you declare to be most ill advised.

10 But responding to this, you concede that Jerome was right to do what he did, since there was still a need for such work when the Vulgate had not yet been completely corrected, but now that it has been emended it is pointless to try to emend it again.<sup>111</sup>
 15 For if the need were as great now as it was then, there is no reason why anyone who did again now what Jerome did then should get any less credit than he did.

20 First of all, to speak boldly, I think no human being, not even Jerome, has been so bold or so self-assured as to claim that he never missed anything at all as he translated; indeed, even average translators who come along after their betters will now and then find something on which they can make 25 useful refinements. “Then will there be any end to translating?” you ask; yes, the easiest of ends, once it turns out that someone has translated so aptly or corrected another’s imperfect translation so well that as long as his work stays intact no one later will 30 find anything he thinks should be changed.

But meanwhile there is a risk that these differing translations may render the minds of the faithful unsure about which they ought to believe the most trustworthy, and you think that this is precisely why
 35 all the rest were deliberately rejected, while this one was saved, so that they would not cause the faithful to waver.<sup>112</sup> On this point I disagree with you so completely that what you attribute to the care of our forefathers I assign to the carelessness of 40 the times, which indeed allowed much else besides those translations to perish. Otherwise, even if our forefathers had required that only one be chanted in the churches, still, why was it necessary to throw out the others? There was no risk that these might 45 cause the faithful to waver; indeed, just as now, through the differing accounts of the evangelists, the real sequence of events comes to be understood more distinctly, even so by comparing various translations the studious reader would be given the chance to note points where equivocal words or ambivalent syntax or the particular force of an idiom had misled some translator, and then, by consulting the others, to grasp the true sense by conjecture. What a useful procedure this is has been noted by Augustine,<sup>113</sup> learned through personal experience by Origen, and confirmed by Jacques Lefèvre d’Etaples, the editor of the Quincuplex Psalter.

I have said this much in order to show that even if Saint Jerome’s work were intact to this day there would still be no reason to censure whoever found something Jerome overlooked and then gathered it up like the ears left behind by a reaper. But as things actually stand, who can doubt that the need to correct Latin texts from the Greek is as great as it was in Jerome’s day, since those texts are so choked with corruptions again that not even the traces<sup>114</sup> of Jerome’s emendation are still to be found? This is so generally acknowledged that even you, who deny it most stoutly, admit it yourself. For though your stoutest argument for claiming that there is no point in attempting to correct what we have is that the great diligence of our forefathers has kept Jerome’s emendations intact, in the next line, almost, you go on to say: “Tell me this, now, Erasmus, which edition has the Church’s approval, the Greek, which it does not use, or the Latin, which is the only text it quotes every time that it has to resolve some point according to Holy Scripture, not even deferring to Jerome if at times he has a different reading, which indeed often happens?”<sup>115</sup> Rather you tell me this now, Dorp: if, as you rightly say, Jerome often has readings different from those of the Vulgate edition, how can what you said before be right, namely that this edition is still as correct as it was after he had corrected it? For I think no one is going to believe that he would have proposed any reading against his own correction. Thus the need for correction is just as great now as it was in his day. Whether it should still be as permissible has yet to be argued, even though it appears there is no room for argument or doubt as to whether emended texts are as useful today to the Church as they formerly were.

But you say, “Now the Church has approved this edition.” But the same Church, as I already said, had 110 See EE 2: 14–15. 111 See EE 2: 131–32.

112 See EE 2: 132. 113 See De doctrina

Christiana 2.12.17–18, 2.14.21 (PL 34: 43, 45–46). 114 not . . . traces: See Adages

3832 (CWE 36: 439–40). 115 EE 2: 132–33

approved the same edition in the same way even before Jerome's corrections. But I will not hesitate to examine your reasoning again, which you find so invincible, lest you think I am glossing over anything. Now then, you seem to be making the following inference: Augustine maintained that the Gospel itself would not merit belief if the Church's authority did not decree that it must be believed.<sup>116</sup> But the Church has approved the position that the true Gospel is in this translation. Thus it follows that if the Greek texts ever differ from ours the true Gospel cannot be in them. As it seems to me, this is the gist of your argument, which to me seems the sort that is not going to be hard to refute. For first of all, the Church believes that the Gospel is contained in the Latin rendering—in such a way, however, that it grants that the Gospel was translated from Greek. Therefore it believes in the translation, but even more in the archetype. It believes that the true Gospel is in the Greek texts; it believes that the Gospel in the Latin texts is actually the true one to the same extent that it has faith in the translator, in whom I suppose it will never have so much blind faith that it forgets that he could have erred through human frailty.

But in councils they quote from the Latin text, not from the Greek. Well, how strange that Latin-speakers should quote from a Latin text, as if they did so in order to lessen our confidence in its Greek archetype! Did not the apostles occasionally set aside the authentic Hebrew text and cite passages from the prophets according to the Septuagint translation while writing for Greeks? Yet Jerome did not think that this set any precedent, as if the Greek translation ought to be judged more reliable than the letter of the Hebrew on the basis of the apostles' authority.

I for one am persuaded (and rightly, I think) that whatever contributes to building the faith has not been translated better by anyone than it was written by the apostles themselves. This is why every time a passage crops up in the Latin that apparently undermines faith or morality, the interpreters of Scripture either tease out the meaning of the dubious passage from various statements found elsewhere or evaluate such dubious phrases according to that living Gospel of faith which has been infused into the hearts of the faithful throughout the whole

Church, the same Gospel which, even before it was written by anyone, was preached to the apostles by Christ and by them to the whole of mankind; and then if these interpreters, bringing to bear on such phrases the inflexible standard of truth, cannot make them conform to it properly, they readily grant they have either mistaken the sense or the text is corrupt, for which they think it best (though you think it so dangerous) to solicit a cure from several different translations, like doctors, or else to obtain one direct from the source,<sup>117</sup> so to speak, from the language whence all Latin texts of the Scriptures derive.

But, my dear Dorp, you grant that back then men were right to emend, from the Greek, Latin texts which the Church had already received and approved, yet you claim it is not right to do so today on account of the likelihood that the Greeks' own books were either deliberately tampered with when the Greeks broke away from the Roman church many years ago or have at any rate grown faulty since then out of negligence, since you say it is hard to believe that the texts of the Latins have gradually deteriorated, even though they have never stopped caring for the faith, while the texts of the Greeks still remain uncorrupted though they let their faith itself grow corrupt many years ago.<sup>118</sup> This argument, Dorp, did not keep Jerome from translating the Old Testament from Hebrew, though if it ought to have any weight with Erasmus it should have had much more weight with Jerome, since everyone knows that the Jews are avowedly more bitter enemies to all Christians, with whom they are thoroughly at odds, than the Greeks are to the Latins, with whom they agree in the shared name of Christians even though on some points they think differently. And indeed, in all honesty, I find it simply impossible to believe that any people has ever purposely conspired to tamper with its own books, not to mention that none could have done so. For could they have hoped that no one at all would object to the scheme, or that their plan would go undetected? Could they not all foresee that if it were revealed (and it would be, perforce, since every day some deserted the Jews to join Christ or the Greeks to join the Latins) they would not only not gain by the scheme, they would also discredit their own faction if they showed they supported a cause which they knew they could defend only by tampering with texts? But let Jerome deal with the Jews. The Greeks at least have this to clear them from that charge of falsehood: in the texts which gave rise to their controversy with us their books are consistent with ours; there was never any question about the text, but only about what the text means. Although no one can doubt that if they had wanted to change anything they would have changed first—indeed, only—those passages which support our position against theirs, and that if they had falsified those passages there would still be no reason to think they would do the same to others. But in actual fact can you imagine any reason why they might want to falsify others, since they left intact the very passages which are actually the only ones they would have wanted to change?

But one may still believe that their texts have at any rate grown faulty through negligence, especially if our own texts have done so, since it is plausible to assume that we have always devoted more care to the books of the faith just as we have to the faith itself. I could cite for the opposite viewpoint not only Jerome, but Augustine as well, who both think that Greek texts are not as corrupt as the Latin. But I wish to argue my case from reason and not from authority. I certainly maintain that no one cares so little about any book as to order a copy without feeling any concern about whether the copy he gets is a faulty or a sound one, since otherwise he could save himself time and expense by not ordering a copy at all. Therefore I am persuaded that the Greeks, too, took care to have their books copied diligently—which no one will doubt who inspects their books diligently. Furthermore, I assert that their vowel markings, punctuation, and accents make it harder for them to make scribal mistakes, and I will not be deterred from asserting this by the fact that you twisted this argument around for the contrary thesis, since you say it is easier to make a mistake where many things need attention. But I think, to the contrary, that it is harder to make a mistake where it is easy to make a mistake, if I too, like the dialecticians, may here pose a riddle. But I have the impression, or rather I know by experience, that just as we often fall down when we are hastening boldly along level ground, where no one expects to fall, whereas we do not fall when we climb down a slope very slowly, carefully weighing our steps, even so when a scribe has to copy from a difficult original he copies more accurately because he must copy more carefully, whereas he falls into error from sheer overconfidence when the text he is copying is neat. Another fact also makes it clear that our texts have grown faulty, whereas theirs have remained reliable: in ours one can now find the same faults that Jerome thought required emendation long ago, but in theirs you will still see the same words on which Jerome's emendations were obviously based. Thus, shall we be forbidden today to expel from the same texts the very corruptions Jerome expelled then, and though it is accepted procedure to reform all religious orders (as they are called) as often as vices reappear in them, if corruptions reappear in books which have been corrected once before, shall we think it improper to correct them again?

Next you ask why it is that Latin texts grow corrupt, and you answer yourself, "Is it not the combined negligence and ignorance of the printers?" Then at once you proceed, "Look and see which are rarer, those fit to print Greek or those fit to print Latin, and then you will know which texts you ought to think sounder."<sup>119</sup> I do not understand what you mean by these words, Dorp; I do not believe you can suspect that Erasmus may use printed books in his scriptural annotations, for there is no shortage of manuscript texts, nor in what he is doing could he use printed texts even if he wanted to, since (so far as I know) the New Testament, on which he is working so hard, has never yet been printed by any press in Greek. But if you meant to say that since printers print Greek worse than Latin, ancient scribes of both languages did likewise, Dorp, let us forget about those who print Latin so that it looks more like Greek and print Greek so that it looks more like Arabic; in both areas let us compare those who are competent in both, among whom Aldus Manutius the Roman<sup>120</sup> was one of the greatest, as Johann Froben of Basel<sup>121</sup> is today. I venture to assure you of what I myself know through daily experience: these printers and others like them reproduce Greek more accurately and reliably than they do even Latin.

Your own reading would give you a much better understanding of this fact than hearsay does now, and indeed of much else that pertains to this topic, if someday, of your own accord, you would turn to the serious study of Greek. This is something I 5 very much long for, but I can scarcely hope to persuade you to do so where Erasmus himself has failed,<sup>122</sup> against whom — or rather, against your own interests — you so earnestly defend yourself against having to benefit from the knowledge of Greek. Accordingly, even though, since you have such a stubborn aversion to Greek, it is pointless for me to exhort you to learn it, I continue to long, indeed still dare to hope, for the day, none too far in the future, when the debates on this topic have ceased,

 10 when your long winning-streak in the schools has stopped making you loath to give way on this point, and when you will do what I see no one else can do, namely, persuade yourself to learn Greek. For by then you will either use your better judgment and ignore those same generals whose cause you now serve, and whose favor you prize more than such an important department of learning, or else you will persuade even them that your Greek will prove useful for their ends as well as to you, in that it will enable you to rout those Grecophiles with their own weapons<sup>123</sup> and to argue against them with greater authority than you now do by debating an issue about which you know nothing at all.

Even so, when you write on this issue as if you 30 think it is quite pointless to spend time on Greek, you do not persuade me, at least, that you mean what you write. For it is not likely that you, with your good sense, should not see the advantages of that language, or that you, with your zeal for all forms of sound learning, should not wish to acquire it, especially since you yourself all but advance the most excellent reasons for wanting to learn it even as you are arguing that we ought to ignore it. For you said, very truly and wisely indeed, that any language excels and takes precedence over others primarily according to how great a treasure of sound learning it keeps housed in the vaults of its literature.<sup>124</sup> Is not this by itself quite enough to convince anyone that all mortals, and especially Christians, should eagerly 40 embrace Greek, since it is from Greek that the rest of mankind has received every variety of knowledge and that we have been fortunate enough to receive nearly all the books of the New Testament? Unless you think that Greek is worn out and exhausted at last by this steady outpouring of translations as if by 50 continuous childbearing.

First of all, among those very commentators on Aristotle whom you mentioned in that elegant speech which you wrote to praise Aristotle<sup>125</sup> (or was it to castigate Valla<sup>126</sup> you are equally vehement
 55 about both), among these very commentators, Alexander, I mean, Themistius, Ammonius, Simplicius, Philoponus, and Olympiodorus,<sup>127</sup> how many of them (I say) apart from Themistius and the Problems of Alexander (for these have made their way
 60 into Latin) are yet read in any language but Greek? Anything by the rest of these authors that can be read in Latin (for I know that we do have some fragments of Alexander and Simplicius) is in such poor Latin that it is almost more obscure to Latin 65 readers than the Greek is. I will say nothing here about poets or orators, nor will I say a word about other philosophers, or even about other commentators on Aristotle, although John the Grammarian,<sup>128</sup> all by himself, displays so much subtlety and 70 learning, particularly in Aristotle, that I know that if you could converse with him in his own language that single grammarian would reconcile you with all the grammarians, toward whom you now seem ill disposed. But then, even among ancient writers of 75 Christian doctrine, the great majority of whom certainly wrote their works in Greek, only a very small fraction of these have been translated, while some have been translated so badly that it seems they have rather been travestied. I will come straight to Aristotle himself, whom I too esteem more than many 80 but along with many others, whereas in the speech I have mentioned you seem to cherish him not only more than many but instead of many, and even instead of all. Now then, not even he will be totally 85 accessible to you if you have not learned Greek. I will overlook the fact that none of his works has been translated so well that it does not make a greater impression when couched in his own words, and also the fact that even today there are Greek works
 90 believed to be his of which I do not think that the Latins have even the titles; but certainly out of those

122 EE 2: 106–7 123 rout... weapons: See Adages 51 (CWE 31: 101). 124 EE 2: 128 125 More is referring to Dorp's Oratio in laudem Aristotelis. 126 Lorenzo

Valla (1406–57) criticized Aristotle in his Dialecticae disputationes. 127 Themistius (fl. 350 BC), Ammonius Hermiae (fl. ca. 490 BC), Simplicius (fl. ca. 535 BC),

Joannes Philoponos (fl. ca. 530 BC), Olympiodorus (fl. ca. 550 BC) 128 sobriquet of Joannes Philoponos very works that they do have today they have some as if they did not have them at all.

It is as certain as it is regrettable that even the Meteorologica of Aristotle belongs to this category, though I do not think that any of his labors can yield more valuable knowledge or that any province of nature itself is more admirable than that which is closest to us and surrounds us, though about it we know so much less than about the position of the stars and the motions of heavenly bodies which are so far away from us. But I hope that this work will be made available shortly in Latin by my countryman Thomas Linacre, physician to our most illustrious king,<sup>129</sup> for he has recently finished two books of it and would already have completed and published the work as a whole had not Galen,<sup>130</sup> as leader and prince of physicians, prevailed on him to put Aristotle aside for a while and to teach him to speak Latin first. Thus Aristotle will appear somewhat later, but by no means less polished; furthermore, he will not be alone. For Linacre is also translating the commentary on that work by Alexander of Aphrodisias; for all this he will earn lasting thanks from all readers of Latin, whom he will have done no common service by issuing this excellent work by that brilliant philosopher, along with this brilliant interpreter, so that his efforts will at last make it possible for readers of Latin to understand what I personally suspect no one has understood so far without knowing Greek. For some time ago, while I was studying the Greek text of that work by Aristotle under the tutelage of Linacre, I myself felt an urge to examine the common translation, as well, to see what it was like. What I read instantly made me recall that philosopher's saying about his own Physics: he said that work had been made public, but in such a way that it was not in fact public,<sup>131</sup> whereas this work, it seemed, had been translated in such a way that it was not actually translated at all, to the point that the very ideas I grasped easily in Greek I could not understand in the translation.

Nor is there any help to be had from the Latin interpreters, since even Albert,<sup>132</sup> whom they call "the Great" in emulation of Alexander the Great, and who claims to be giving us a paraphrase of Aristotle, might more truly be said to have given us a parody of this work, for though it is his job to express Aristotle's meaning in different words, what he actually does is to introduce meanings which are (as they say) diametrically opposed to it.<sup>133</sup> And Gaetano<sup>134</sup> (for he too wrote a commentary) tells us how many handfuls of water we get when we liquefy one handful of earth, and how many handfuls of air when we evaporate one handful of water, and so on, with no end in sight; yet these measureless measures he measures<sup>135</sup> do not add one iota<sup>136</sup> to our understanding of Aristotle.

My dear Dorp, it would take me forever to list all that anyone lacks who lacks Greek. Nonetheless I am not unaware that without any Greek many others, and you above all, have advanced even higher toward the very citadel of learning than many can climb who do know Greek, however hard they strain and pant. Even so, I would dare to say this much is certain: if you would add Greek to the rest of your attainments you would then surpass even yourself<sup>137</sup> by as much as you now surpass others regardless of their skill in Greek.

Since Erasmus, who once put me in charge of defending the Folly, has now undertaken to defend it himself, I do not need to argue its merits at length, for that task, which was already easy, is easier still now that we have divided the work.<sup>138</sup> Thus, while I have no doubt that what he will say, indeed what he has already said in that short letter of his, ought to satisfy everyone, I also believe that what I have to say, which may not carry much weight with others, must carry at least some weight with you. And first, I wonder what you mean by saying, "And now all of a sudden, like Davus,<sup>139</sup> this inopportune Folly is upsetting everything."<sup>140</sup> But in what sense "now all of a sudden," as if the Folly had just now appeared, when in fact it has been circulating openly for more than seven years, known and cherished by all, going through seven new editions already? Or how is it "inopportune"? Is this not quite enough to show what an auspicious appearance it made, that it could not have been issued so often in so many copies had it not found so many whom it could delight? Nor did these readers come from

129 Linacre (ca. 1460–1524) did not publish this translation. 130 Linacre translated Galen's De sanitate tuenda. 131 See Aulus Gellius 20.5. 132 Albertus Magnus (ca. 1200–1280) 133 See Adages

945 (CWE 32: 254). 134 Gaetano da Thiene (1387–1465) 135 measureless... measures: See Adages 344 (CWE 31: 354). 136 one iota: Adages 703 (CWE 32: 129–30). 137 surpass even yourself: See Adages 158

(CWE 31: 198). 138 easy... work: See Adages 1295 (CWE 33: 187) 139 a slave in Terence's Andria 140 EE 2: 13

the common herd of humanity (for I would not be surprised to see wares easily sold which pleased ignorant people, since there is a crowd of these everywhere)<sup>141</sup> but rather from among the most learned.

5 For one proof that Folly pleases only the learned is simply that only the learned understand her, which indeed was perhaps why those two or three theologians that Folly upset became angry: on the basis of what others told them, they thought she said more

10 than she did, while perhaps if they themselves understood what was actually said they would not feel provoked.

But, my dear Dorp, you think she should not have laughed at any theologians, though you all

15 but acknowledge in earnest that some are as Folly described them in jest when you say, “Biting quips which contain a large element of truth leave a bitter memory behind them.”<sup>142</sup> By heaven, what you say is true: those sham theologians would not be

20 so embittered by those quips if they were not as true as they are biting. Now then, if those theologians are what you acknowledge them to be, do you prize them? I think not. Well, then, do you castigate them? I am sure that you do so in private, at least,

25 and would do so in public if you had not made up your mind never to cross anyone and to behave in such a way as to make everyone praise you, of whatever character, learned and unlearned, good men and bad, since you say that you like even puppies

30 to signal their friendship by wagging their tails at you.<sup>143</sup>

Though I grant you are acting more cautiously, Dorp, that does not make it any less just to attack bad men simply and openly, the way Gerard of Nijmegen<sup>144</sup> does, let alone to do what Erasmus does

35 when he jokes about them both more decorously and less violently by assuming the character of Folly. Yet though you cannot tolerate his jokes and witticisms and you want him to issue a palinode, you

40 write that you found nothing in Nijmegen’s satires you would want him to change, even though those satires are more cutting at their gentlest than Folly is at her most cutting; and so they might well be. For that is prescribed by the nature of the poetry

45 itself, which is not satire if it is not acerbic. And so it is worth seeing how satirically he always attacks monks and friars and how he describes their pride, luxury, ignorance, drinking bouts, gluttony, lust, and hypocrisy, in a manner as elegant, and indeed as appropriate, as it is acerbic. For though many

50 may not have deserved those reproaches, there are still some who are open to all of them. Therefore I do not wonder that you found nothing in his satires you would want him to change; in fact, neither did I. But I do wonder why Folly could not get your

55 permission to joke freely about theologians when those satires have your permission to aim such harsh reproaches at members of religious orders and even at the theologians among them.

But, putting aside Gerard’s satires, if anyone

60 pored through your letters, my dear Dorp, could he not find any passage in which you score some class of people with some cutting word? Do you think there is no bite at all in the passage from your letter, which I have mentioned already, to the lord abbot

65 Menard, in which you heap scorn on religious superiors? While you praise him, you lament the rest thus: “Oh, alas, alas, for those miserable monks who do not live like monks. Surrounded by horses, they re-stage the triumphs of Caesar, though they would

70 do better to creep on the ground than to gallop on horseback to hell, unless they are afraid they cannot get there as quickly on foot.”<sup>145</sup> Cutting as it is, my dear Dorp, this quip seems to have charmed you so much that you seem to have brought up the subject

75 of horses expressly in order to keep that fine saying from going to waste. Otherwise, I think you are aware that it is not such a terrible outrage for abbots to ride and use animals as they were designed to be used. Besides, I have heard that not all other

80 religious superiors ride about all the time, and that Abbot Menard rides occasionally, so that your joke very nearly recoils on the very man you wish to spare when you aim it at others. But so charming

85 does everyone find his own notions,<sup>146</sup> so fragrant does everyone find his own farts,<sup>147</sup> that while we wrinkle our foreheads at other men’s jokes and condemn them as bitter we cherish our own even when they are not as amusing and more bitter still.

But you will deny you were joking about religious superiors and will say you were rather lamenting them, especially since you start out under the

90

141 See EE 4: 190. 142 EE 2: 13; Tacitus, Annales 15,68.4 143 See EE 2: 13; Adages 3032 (CWE 35: 460–61). 144 Gerard

Geldenhouwer (ca. 1482–1542) 145 See De Vocht, Monumenta 118–19. 146 so charming . . . notions: See Adages 2902 (CWE

35: 357–58); Praise of Folly (ASD 4/3: 94). 147 so fragrant . . . farts: Adages 2302 (CWE 35: 4)

auspices of that inauspicious interjection, “Alas.” I personally regard anything as a joke—in whatever figure of speech it is couched—which is said in such a way that no one can help laughing who hears it. Although what difference does it make if you are being cutting in jest or in earnest? Or rather, it does make a difference: virtually no one refuses to laugh at a jocular saying aimed at him; no one stands for a serious one.<sup>148</sup> Otherwise, if you think it all right to lament, but forbidden to joke, it will be easy for Folly to preface her whole joking discourse with one interjection of woe and thus, changing the figure of speech, use the same words again to lament the very theologians that she originally ridiculed. Nor indeed could you easily tell whether they are more lamentable or laughable.

But perhaps we should think it permissible to say anything we like against religious superiors, even average ones, but forbidden to say even a word against any theologians, no matter how bad. After all, you write words to almost that effect in your most recent letter to Erasmus. For you say, “You are surprised that your Folly, who pleases so many, not only theologians but also bishops, has provoked such an angry reaction. But Erasmus, I myself am amazed that you value the judgment of bishops in this regard more highly than that of theologians, since you are well acquainted with the life-style, the character, and the learning (or should I call it the ignorance?) of the bishops of today; for although there are certainly some who are worthy of such a high place there are actually amazingly few.”<sup>149</sup> Here, Dorp, even as you refuse to let theologians be touched with the most harmless joke, you yourself pour down open abuse on the bishops, with all your authority; for you not only find them deficient in learning and carp at their ignorance, but you furthermore savagely criticize their life-style and character. But you say it is very important that the authority of theologians should not be impaired in the eyes of the people, as if it is not at all important how bishops are looked on by the people, even though you are not unaware what position they hold in Christ’s church or how much higher than your theologians they stand, since you know very well that bishops are the successors of the apostles themselves. Nor should you think you have made yourself any safer just because you acknowledge that there are some bishops who are worthy of such a high station, since not even you believe that Folly is imputing the defects of unworthy theologians to worthy ones. Indeed, Folly outdoes you in tact: nothing she says denies that there are many worthy theologians, whereas you say not merely that there are few good bishops but even that there are amazingly few.

But suppose that we grant you that there is no harm in attacking bishops with either mockery or slander provided that you do not aim one word at the sacrosanct office of theologians. How will you answer this, that you yourself treat those very theologians so cuttingly that you practically tear them apart—not by name, I concede, but by describing them so plainly that, even by name, they could not have been indicated more clearly—in the elegant prologue you wrote for Plautus’s play, the Pyrgopolynices?

But meanwhile Plautus’s name has reminded me of the words you excerpt from Saint Augustine<sup>150</sup> and turn against poets a number of times in your letter.<sup>151</sup> This subject calls for a more thorough discussion, and I will not debate it in this letter. Still, I will ask you this: does it seem to you that by these words Augustine himself meant that Christians ought not to read Terence? For if he is not warning us against making a thorough study of Terence, then that passage affords no support for an argument against reading poets. But if you think that Augustine was trying to make Christians abandon the study of poetry, my next question is this: do you personally feel that Terence still ought to be taught? If you feel that he should, why keep quoting a warning which you do not think we ought to obey? But if, following Augustine’s advice, of course, you maintain that Terence ought not to be taught, then I certainly do wonder why it took you so long to accept his advice, which you doubtless had read long before, even though in the meantime you did not refrain from the reading, the teaching, or the public production and staging of Plautus, a poet no chaster than Terence, or rather, not even as chaste. What of this, that you furnished the Miles gloriosus with a most charming prologue and supplied for the Aulularia not only a prologue but also that comedy’s missing ending, a supplement which seems to me not inferior to any other part of the comedy for either its elegant language or its true Plautine wit?

<sup>148</sup> virtually . . . one: See Praise of Folly (ASD 4/3: 116), EE 2: 96. <sup>149</sup> EE 2: 127 <sup>150</sup> See Confessions 1.16.26. <sup>151</sup> See EE 2: 129–30.

What I mean may be illustrated by those very verses in which, as I said, you provide such a handsome description of those uncultured theologians, whom now you defend, that no one could mock them more wittily and no one could attack them more forcefully. For what could be more charming or elegant than the verses which I shall now quote?

To start with, all of those uncultured louts
Whose erudition ends with uncouth books
Can beat it, Plautus says, and go to hell<sup>152</sup>
Should they, malicious snarlers that they are,
Do any more of what they do continually,
Bellowing out their windy disapproval,
Venting the poison of their chronic envy,
Bad-mouthing, snapping, sinking grisly fangs
In everything, and, just the way that dogs do,
Barking like mad at everyone they meet.
This sort of men (if they are really men, Illiterates and bumpkins that they are)
Plautus told me to drive away on sight;
Should any stay to hoot and interfere,
He promised them a beating for a greeting
When they become his fellow guests in Hades.<sup>153</sup>

Observe, my dear Dorp, just how little you thought about shunning the poets and just how well you painted those uncultured theologians in their natural colors. But if you deny that you were a theologian yourself then, since you wrote these lines seven years ago, certainly no more than a year and a half has elapsed since you published them in a new collection; and by then you were certainly a theologian, four years after you gave your brilliant speech on the assumption of the Virgin Mother of God. Now, then, what difference does it make if you wrote these lines as a theologian or if, having become one, you gave your blessing to lines written earlier by choosing to publish them?

Well, then, my dear Dorp, when you found nothing you thought should be changed in Gerard's mordant satires describing the filthiest vices of the religious orders, when you yourself mocked as you pitied religious superiors and mocked in a way that would wound, when you acerbically castigated the ignorance, life-style, and character of all but "amazingly few" bishops, when you yourself called the very theologians whose folly you think it improper for Folly to joke about "uncultured louts," "malicious snarlers," men "whose erudition ends with uncouth books," who "bellow out their windy disapproval," who "vent the livid poisons of their envy," who "bad-mouth, snap, and sink their grisly fangs in everything," who "bark like dogs at everyone they meet," and who, "illiterate bumpkins," barely men, at last you said should simply go to hell, when you did all this, my dear Dorp, just how was it that you never thought of the same cautious counsels on which you now base your most friendly and prudent advice to Erasmus? What had become of that saying from Jerome, "It is totally insane to work hard just to make people hate you"?<sup>154</sup> What had become of the one from Cornelius Tacitus, "Biting quips which contain a good deal of truth leave a bitter memory behind them"?<sup>155</sup> What had happened to the one from Epictetus, "Do not suppose everyone will enjoy hearing what you enjoy saying"?<sup>156</sup>

Indeed, my dearest Dorp, we are naturally prone to require self-restraint from other people as a matter of course while we give ourselves license to do as we please. I myself know of some who could simply not stand it when Reuchlin<sup>157</sup> (good lord, what a man he is!), confronting his personal detractors, that is, a most learned, most prudent, most honorable person confronting the most ignorant, most fatuous, most worthless wretches alive, who had done him so great an injustice that not even a physical act of revenge on his part would have seemed altogether excessive, I know of some, I repeat, who though they actually favored his cause could not stand it when freely, but still no more freely than truthfully, he vented his anger against his detractors in writing. I know, too, that before long the same men who could not stand for Reuchlin's response themselves grew much more violently irate over things which both had less intrinsic importance and did not affect them so directly. So much easier it is to prescribe self-control for the anger of others than it is for our own. "Did I not have the right, then," you ask, "either to approve of Gerard's satires or to speak against uncultured theologians, and religious

152 Casina 611; Menaechmi 66 153 prologue to Plautus's Miles gloriosus 154 EE

2: 12; Jerome, PL 28: 1403 155 Tacitus, Annales 15,68.4 156 EE 2: 127; Epictetus,

Enchiridion 33,14 157 Johann Reuchlin (1455–1522)

superiors and bishops, too, either in jest or in earnest, provided that I spoke the truth and did not mention anyone's name?" Quite the contrary, my dear Dorp, I think that you had so much right to do what you did that it seems to me you have never done anything better in your life, provided that you will also be fair enough not to find fault with others for something you praise in yourself.<sup>158</sup>

To conclude, my dear Dorp, in my view none of all your advice on the Folly has any real point: no advice is in order, and even if it were, after so many years your advice comes too late. For honestly, I could not keep from chuckling when I read what you wrote at the end of your earlier letter to the effect that Erasmus could pacify those theologians whom the Folly upset if he would counter his praises of Folly with a praise of Wisdom. They certainly are wise if they think this encomium of Folly by Folly affords her such exemplary praise that they want Wisdom also to be praised in this mode of address. If this is how they feel, why are they so aroused, since they themselves have been praised at such length by this Folly who gets so much praise?<sup>159</sup> Furthermore, I do not see how Erasmus could ease their resentment against him by writing true praises of Wisdom or how he could even avoid making them resent him all the more, whether he wanted to or not,<sup>160</sup> since he would then feel just as compelled to exclude them from the company of Wisdom as he now does to give them a place in the first rank of Folly's initiates.

As I was writing these last words a letter arrived from my prince summoning me to return to him. His letter has forced me to stop writing at last, though I do not want to stop, and makes me finish this letter, however unwillingly; even though it is already so long that an "interminable Orestes, spilling off the page,"<sup>161</sup> might well be shorter, I was somehow so eager to speak with you that it wanted to keep right on growing. But though I do not find it unpleasant to have to fold up my letter at this point, since I am afraid it is already so long that you may find it tedious, even so it does not make me happy that I will not have any chance to refine it or to lick this ungainly and amorphous offspring of mine into shape by degrees. I was certainly planning to do so in order to make it seem somewhat more polished when it got to you, learned Dorp, since I want you to look with approval on me and on all that is mine. You will pardon my letter's ungainliness not only because in my haste to depart I could not even stop to reread it, but also because I had no store of books, indeed virtually no books at all, to consult as I wrote it.

Still, I hope, even such as it is, you will not find my letter displeasing, for although I rely first of all on your humane indulgence I also rely on the thoroughness of my own effort to guard against writing one word in this letter that might give you just cause for offense, unless through human weakness esteem for my own works misleads me. If this does ever happen, and I am advised of it, I will freely acknowledge my fault and not try to defend it. Indeed, just as I am not slow to advise those I love, should it be in their interest, so too, on my honor, I am delighted to have my friends advise me. Nor am I unaware that on a number of points you are not leveling your own charges at Erasmus but rather reporting what you heard from others, so that you too should understand that at a number of points in this letter I have rather been answering those men through you than addressing you personally, whom I not only prize as an excellent friend and respect as an excellent scholar but also revere as an excellent man. Farewell, my dearest Dorp, and be assured that no one, not even in your own Holland, regards you more highly than More does in the land of the faraway Britons,<sup>162</sup> since you are no less dear to him than you are to Erasmus. Than that you can never be dearer, not even to me. Once more, farewell. Bruges, 21 October.

Farewell. Bruges, 21 October. Once more, farewell.

60. To the University of Oxford

Abingdon, 29 March <1518>

Thomas More sends his heartiest greetings to the Reverend Fathers, the Vice-Chancellor, the Proctors, and the other members of the Masters' Guild of the University of Oxford.

Learned gentlemen, I felt some misgivings about whether it would be proper for me to address you concerning the issues I presently mean to discuss. My 158 fair... yourself: Adages 2833 (CWE 35: 330). 159 See Praise of Folly (ASD 4/3:

69, 76). 160 wanted to or not: Adages 245 (CWE 31: 274) 161 Juvenal 1.6

162 land... Britons: Vergil, Eclogues 1.6.6

misgivings arose not so much from concern about my style (although I am embarrassed about that, too, in the face of so eloquent an assembly) as from fear of appearing presumptuous if an insignificant person like myself, with little prudence, less experience, and only a modicum of learning, were so brash and so bold as to offer my personal advice about anything, but especially about anything literary, to a group of men each of whom is sufficiently learned and prudent to advise many thousands of men. But on the other hand, reverend fathers, this same singular wisdom of yours, which intimidated me so at first glance, reassured me on closer examination, for it occurred to me that whereas foolish and arrogant ignorance refuses to listen to anyone, the wisest and most learned men are the least self-assured and the least prone to scorn anyone's advice. Something else that encouraged me greatly was the thought that fair judges like you never think any less of a man, and indeed always honor and thank him, for offering even imprudent advice which is heartfelt and friendly. Finally, when I consider that next after God this university of yours should be given the credit for whatever learning I do have, since it was there that I came by its rudiments, I seem bound by my duty and loyalty to you not to pass over anything in silence that I think you would do well to hear. And so when I saw that the only risk in my writing was that some people might think me arrogant, whereas my silence could make many people condemn my ingratitude, I was more willing to let all mortals call me a little too bold than to let anyone call me ungrateful, especially toward this school of yours — for I feel very strongly obliged to stand up for its honor — and particularly since I believe that the matter at hand is so crucial that no other problem has arisen in quite a long time which deserves more of your serious attention than this one if you wish to safeguard the honor and welfare of your university.

Let me tell you what matter I mean. I have recently heard it reported by a number of people in London that certain scholars of your university, prompted either by hatred of Greek learning, by a misguided devotion to some other sort, or (as I think more likely) by a shameless addiction to joking and trifling, have formed a deliberate conspiracy to call themselves Trojans. One of them, who is said to be riper in years than in wisdom, has assumed the name “Priam,” another the name “Hector,” another the name “Paris” or else that of some other ancient Trojan, and the rest have been doing the same, for the sole purpose of jokingly setting themselves up as a faction opposed to the Greeks to make fun of the students of Greek learning. And so, they say, these men have seen to it that no one who has even a passing acquaintance with that language is allowed to appear either at home or in public without being pointed at, laughed at, and scoffed at by one of those laughable Trojans, who are not laughing at anything but what they know nothing about, namely sound learning in general. Thus it seems that these Trojans are eminent witnesses to the aptness of that ancient adage, “Trojans grow wise too late.”<sup>163</sup>

Though I continually heard many different reports on this matter from many different people, and although it irked everyone and upset me especially that some of your scholars were wasting their time and disrupting the sound studies of others with this sort of impertinence, nonetheless, since I saw that no measures, however elaborate, could ever ensure that every member of such a large group of people would sensibly mind his own business I began to think light of the matter. But after I arrived here in Abingdon in the company of our invincible king, I was further informed that this impertinence had started to turn into sheer lunacy. For I learned that one of those Trojans, to show off what he views as his wisdom, what his partisans excuse as his humor and wit, and what others who look at his actions condemn as his madness, chose this holy season of fasting<sup>164</sup> and the medium of a public sermon to blather all too liberally not only against Greek learning and stylistic refinement in Latin but also against all the liberal arts. To avoid any inconsistency in his performance and to make sure that the heading of his sermon was as mad as its body was stolid, he did not expound either a whole chapter of Scripture, as the ancients used to do, or a single short passage from Sacred Scripture, which is the prevalent practice among moderns. Instead, he took as his text various old wives' proverbs in English.<sup>165</sup> And so I have no doubt that so trifling a sermon was very offensive to those who were actually present, since I see how it outrages everyone who has heard even a scrap of it. For could anyone with the least spark of Christian devotion in his heart not lament how the majesty of the sacrosanct office of preaching, which won the world over to Christ, is now being violated by the very men who are officially most responsible for upholding the authority of that function? Could anyone imagine a more blatant affront to the office of preaching than for a person who styles himself a preacher to step forth in the holiest season of the year and before a large audience of Christians, in the very temple of God, in the loftiest pulpit — in Christ's very throne, as it were — and in sight of Christ's venerable body, to turn his Lenten sermon into a bacchanalian travesty? How do you think those who stood listening received it when they saw their preacher, from whom they had come to hear lessons of spiritual wisdom, cavorting, guffawing, and monkeying around in the pulpit, and when those who had gathered there piously expecting to hear the words of life went away not recalling that they had heard anything but slurs against literature and impertinent preaching which had dishonored the office of preacher?

But as for his tirade against all types of secular learning, if that good man had withdrawn from the world altogether and had lived many years as a hermit, and if he then abruptly stepped forth and declared that we ought to concentrate on vigils, prayer, and fasting, that this is the right way to get to heaven, and that all other things are mere trifles, or even that study and learning are actually a hindrance, since simple and unlearned people have an easier time rising heavenward, such a sermon might perhaps have been tolerated from a person like this, whose simplicity would earn him indulgence; for his generous hearers would construe it as saintliness and even the most critical hearers as an ignorance which was at any rate pious and devout. But as it is, when they see a man climb to the pulpit clad in an academic gown, with a furred hood on his shoulders — dressed, that is, as a man of learning — and there, in the middle of the university, a place no one frequents except for the sake of learning, they see him rage openly against virtually all branches of learning, certainly no one who sees this considers it anything but blind and egregious malice and proud envy directed at his betters.

In fact many are utterly amazed how the man got it into his head that he ought to be preaching either about the Latin language, of which he understands only a little, or about liberal studies, of which he understands even less, or especially about the Greek language, of which he understands not one iota, when he had such a rich, handy store of material in the seven deadly sins, an appropriate topic for sermons and one with which he seems to be not at all unfamiliar. For he feels more inclined to condemn anything he knows nothing about than to learn it; if this is not sloth, then what is? And he openly slanders anyone he has found to know anything he himself has omitted to learn, whether through laziness or through sheer despair of his own intellectual powers; is this not clearly envy? Finally, he tries to deny any value to any aspect of knowledge but the one he is falsely convinced he has mastered, and he arrogantly lays claim to more praise for his ignorance than the modesty of some will accept for their knowledge; is this not the summit of pride?

Now then, as for secular learning, no one denies that a person can be saved without it, and indeed without learning of any sort. But even secular learning, as he calls it, prepares the soul for virtue. And however that may be, certainly no one disputes that learning is virtually the one and only incentive that draws people to Oxford, inasmuch as that rude and illiterate virtue is something which any good woman can teach well enough to her children at home. Furthermore, not everyone who comes to Oxford comes just to learn theology; some must also learn law. They must also learn prudence in human affairs, something which is so far from being useless to a theologian that without it he may be able to sing well enough for his own pleasure,<sup>166</sup> but his singing will certainly be ill suited for the people. And I doubt that any study contributes as richly to this practical skill as the study of poets, orators, and histories. Indeed, some plot their course, as it were, to the contemplation of celestial realities through the study of nature, and progress to theology by way of philosophy and the liberal arts (all of which he condemns under the name “secular literature”), thus despoiling the women of Egypt<sup>167</sup> to grace their own queen. But since theology is the only subject he seems to allow (if he actually allows even this), I do not see how he can pursue it without any skill in either Hebrew or Greek or Latin, unless perhaps the fine fellow has convinced himself that there are enough books on that subject in English, or unless he thinks that all of theology falls within the confines of those problems which they dispute about so assiduously, for I grant that one needs little Latin to learn those. But I certainly deny that theology, that venerable heavenly queen, is so pent up in those narrow limits that she does not also inhabit and dwell in Holy Scripture as her proper home, from which she makes her pilgrimage through all the cells of the oldest and holiest fathers, Augustine, I mean, Jerome, Ambrose, Cyprian, Chrysostom, Gregory, Basil, and other men like them, whose “positive” writings, as they are now called with contempt, were the mainstay of theological studies for more than a thousand years after the Passion of Christ, before those subtle problems which now command almost exclusive attention were even invented. But whoever boasts of understanding the works of the fathers without considerable skill in the language of each of them will be making that unskillful boast a long time before those who are skilled will believe him.

<sup>166</sup> sing . . . pleasure: See Adages 1030, 2480 (CWE 33: 33–34, 35: 113–14). <sup>167</sup> despoiling . . . Egypt: See Ex 3:22, 11:2, 12:36.

But if that preacher now tries to cover up for his impertinence by pretending that what he condemned was not secular learning but rather the immoderate study thereof, I do not see that that vice is so widespread that the whole populace needed to be chided or warned about it in a public sermon as if they were all falling head-over-heels over the brink. For I do not see that many have made so much progress in this branch of learning that they might not advance somewhat further while still stopping short of the mean. Furthermore, that fine fellow made it perfectly clear he was far from conveying such a moderate message: he openly called everyone a heretic who wished to pursue Greek learning, and he went on to brand lecturers in Greek as “archdevils,” and students of Greek (in a more modest and wittier vein, as he thought) as “underdevils.” And in the heat of this passion, or rather this frenzy, that holy man used the term “devil” to label a man who, as everyone knows, is the sort of man who would cause the real devil a great deal of grief by becoming a preacher; and though he did not actually name the man, he referred to him in such an obvious way that everyone was as quick to discern who was meant by that label as they were to label the man who had labeled him that way a madman.

Learned gentlemen, I am hardly so foolish as to take it upon myself to defend Greek learning before prudent judges like yourselves, since I am well aware that you must have already perceived and acknowledged its usefulness. For can anyone fail to perceive that not only in all other arts, but in theology as well, the most original thinkers and the most diligent interpreters of their thoughts were Greek? For in philosophy, apart from the works left by Cicero and Seneca, the schools of the Latins have nothing to offer that is not either Greek or translated from Greek. I will say nothing about the New Testament, which was first written almost entirely in Greek. I will say nothing of the fact that all the most ancient and most skilled interpreters of Sacred Scripture were Greeks and wrote in Greek. But I will say this much, not without the agreement of all learned men: though some works were translated long ago, and though many have recently been translated better, not even half of the volumes in Greek have been translated into Latin, and virtually none has been translated so well that the Greek text is not less corrupt or at least more expressive. And for this reason all the ancient doctors of the Latin church, Jerome, Augustine, Bede, and many others besides, made a strenuous effort to learn the Greek language, doing so at a time when more books had already been translated than many men of today who consider themselves very learned would normally read; nor did they merely learn it, they also advised later scholars, especially those who were going to become theologians, to do the same thing.<sup>168</sup>

Therefore, as I have said, my intention is not to defend the study of Greek before prudent judges like yourselves, but rather to do as my own sense of duty directs me: to urge you to let none be deterred from the pursuit of Greek learning in your university whether by public sermons or by private impertinence, since that language is one which the Church has decreed should be taught in all universities. Hence men of your prudence will easily discern that not everyone in your community who has devoted his energies to Greek is completely obtuse; indeed, some of these men have distinguished themselves so highly that their own fame for learning has won a good deal of real glory for your school not only in this realm but also abroad. You will also discern that a large number of people, whose precedent others will follow, have lately begun to make large contributions to your university with the aim of promoting both literary studies in general and, most recently, Greek in particular.<sup>169</sup> But their present enthusiasm for you will undoubtedly wane if they find that their pious intentions are mocked there in Oxford, particularly since in Cambridge, which you have always been wont to outshine, even those who are not learning Greek are each moved by a common devotion to their school to make a handsome personal contribution for the salary of a lecturer to teach others Greek. You will discern all these arguments, I repeat, and a number of others, as well, which my own humble intellect is too weak to discover. But my purpose is rather to tell you what others are saying and thinking than to give you advice about what you should do. You perceive much more sharply than I do that unless you suppress such unsavory factions at once as they arise, more and more will contract this disease until the worse party may grow to outnumber the better, so that others will be forced to step in and help those of you who are virtuous and sensible. For I certainly think that no one who has ever belonged to your number feels any less personal concern for the status of your university than you yourselves do who live there today.

<sup>168</sup> See Augustine, De doctrina Christiana 2.11.16 (PL 34: 42–43); Jerome, Epistolae 39.1, 85.3 (PL 22: 465, 753).

There is no room for doubt that the most reverend father in Christ, the Archbishop of Canterbury,<sup>170</sup> who is the primate of all our clergy as well as your chancellor, will do all that he can in this matter, both for the clergy's sake and for your own, since he realizes how important it is both for the clergy and for you that your system of studies should not go to ruin. But it will go to ruin if the university is racked by contention and if the foolish and slothful are allowed to flout sound learning everywhere with impunity. And what about the most reverend father in Christ, the Cardinal of York,<sup>171</sup> both a patron of learning and a most learned bishop in his own right? Is he going to stand by and permit sound learning and the study of languages to be mocked among you with impunity? Or is he not more likely to launch all the darts of his learning, his virtue, and his authority to punish those witlings who are treating sound learning with contempt? Finally, what of our most Christian Prince? His sacred majesty has shown as much favor for all sound learning as any prince ever did, while in erudition and judgment he is more than a match for any previous prince. With his limitless prudence and great piety toward God he will undoubtedly never permit the endeavors of wicked and slothful individuals to abolish the pursuit of sound learning in a place where his own most illustrious forebears established a most illustrious university, which is not only one of the oldest, with a long roll of learned alumni who have been ornaments not only to England but to the entire Church, but can also boast so many colleges with perpetual endowments for the support of students that in this one respect there is no foreign university which can compete or compare with your own. And the sole purpose of all of these colleges and the one reason for which you have all those endowments is so that a great number of scholars, free from having to worry about earning a living, can study the liberal arts there.

But I have no doubt that prudent men like yourselves will easily devise your own plan to suppress those disturbances and impertinent factions and that you will make sure that all types of sound learning will not only be safe from derision and mockery but will also be valued and honored. By your diligence in this regard you will do a great service to sound studies at Oxford, and it is hard to express how much thanks you will earn both from our most illustrious Prince and from those reverend fathers in Christ I have named. And although the great love that I bear you already is what led me to write all these things at this time, and with this my own hand, you will also endear yourselves more intensely than ever to me personally, whose devotion and energies your whole assembly and each of its members will perceive to be always at your service. May God keep and preserve this illustrious university of yours and may he grant it perpetual increase of all honest learning and virtue. Abingdon. 29 March.

Thomas More

169 More is referring to the 1516 founding of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, by Richard Pace. 170 William Warham

(ca. 1450–1532), chancellor of England from 1504 to 1515 and chancellor of Oxford University from 1506 until his death 171 Thomas Wolsey (1472/73–1530)

75. To Edward Lee

1 May 1519

Thomas More sends his heartiest greetings to Edward Lee.<sup>172</sup>

5 My dearest Lee, I have received two letters through your brother Wilfred,<sup>173</sup> a most virtuous and amiable young man; both were written in Louvain, one on the tenth day of April and the other on the twentieth. The first one contains three main points, which are these. First of all, you have heard a report which is being spread everywhere by certain Erasmusians to the effect that I was more than a little upset by your having prepared a work challenging Erasmus, and that this had turned me against you to the point that I had not only struck you from my list of friends but was also preparing to do you a bad turn. And if you were quite certain of this you would either resolve, if your feelings would bear it, to spurn such a friend altogether,<sup>174</sup> or if you could not bring yourself to do that you would freely indulge your own grief, since nothing grieves you as much as ingratitude, while to you death itself would be preferable to the loss of so great a friend, whom you have loved with an uncommon fervor and constantly praised to the skies<sup>175</sup> with your utmost devotion; thus, it is not surprising that you would consider it an intolerable hardship if I were in turn so ungrateful and even so unfair as to pass hasty judgment on my friend before even hearing him out. Therefore you write that you neither can nor will believe that I have done so, even though the Erasmusians steadily insist that I have, before you receive definite news of the fact in a letter directly from me.

35 Secondly, you try to prove to me that you are not to blame for anything that has happened in this controversy and that all the credit for this tragedy should go to Erasmus. You rehearse the whole course of events more completely and circumstantially and you detail the origins of the entire quarrel from birth to full growth, claiming first that you would never have undertaken that project of annotation if you had not been prevailed upon by your love and his persistent requests, that he then rejected your annotations as hairsplitting trifles, that he nonetheless had your scribe copy them out for him secretly and took from them any corrections he made in his second edition, and that now, not content with this, he has made your name infamous throughout Europe as if you gathered nothing but trifles and as if you supported them with the doctrines of modern thinkers and refused to let him see your work so that he could either retract any errors or defend himself.<sup>176</sup>

Thirdly, you add that even though you could have disgraced him by publishing your annotations you have so far suppressed them, having resolved not to go any further in this controversy until you had delivered them to the reverend father in Christ, the Bishop of Rochester,<sup>177</sup> to weigh and examine, who would allow me to see them too, if I wanted to do so. Here you beg me to give your behavior a fair, balanced assessment, confident that if I do so I will see how straightforwardly you are dealing with him, how unaffectedly, how unobsequiously, how inoffensively, only noting what he writes and in what respect you disagree. But if you ever criticize him more sharply and freely, you ask me also to be fair in weighing the question of whether he deserves it. You assert that (unless your opinion completely misleads you) I will then find that he has made serious and shameful mistakes.

I think this is the gist of your first letter; now on to your second, written just ten days later, which suggests you have gone through a sudden and complete transformation. For in this one you write that now is the time for me to prove myself the sort of man you always supposed I was, namely a fair one, a man whom, in your words, “no partisan feelings have ever deceived.” For though you—even after Erasmus had treated you badly—had left it to your common friends to remedy the situation for as long as that policy might safeguard your honor, and though you had already sent the book to the reverend father of Rochester, whose judgment you had decided to stand by, and though even Erasmus himself had approved of this plan when you mentioned it to him, his actual intentions were totally different

172 Edward Lee (ca. 1482–1544), future Archbishop of York, met Erasmus while he was studying Greek and Hebrew in Louvain. Shortly afterwards, Lee began to circulate a manuscript of abusive annotations to the first edition of Erasmus’s New Testament. 173 These letters are not extant. 174 spurn . . . altogether: Adages 706 (CWE 32: 131). 175 constantly . . . skies: See Adages 550 (CWE 31: 570). 176 See Lee, Annotations in Annotationes Novi Testamentum Desiderii Erasmi (Paris:

1520); EE 3: 424, 471; 4: 160. Erasmus answered in his Apologia qua respondet (Erasmi opuscula, ed. Wallace K. Ferguson, The Hague: 1933). 177 Erasmus and Lee agreed to let John Fisher (1459–1535), Bishop of Rochester, arbitrate their dispute.

from those he professed, and within a few days of agreeing to your plan he suddenly spewed out a barrage of utterly insane abuse, wantonly and inappropriately and with no provocation from you, in his Apology against Latomus,<sup>178</sup> in which even if he did avoid mentioning your name he was still not discreet enough to keep everyone from shouting immediately that that shot had been aimed straight at you.<sup>179</sup> And so even if your name does not appear in the passage, and even if what he said there does not match your character at all, nevertheless, since all of Europe has been interpreting it this way, you take it as if you had been mentioned expressly by name, especially since he refused your request to relieve you of this suspicion with any apology. Thus, since he has behaved in this way and the business has now gone so far, you feel you would be doing me an injustice if you did not think me fair enough that I would not merely allow you but actually urge you to make every effort to protect your own honor; and since you cannot safeguard it except by publishing your annotations, this is the way you will have to proceed. Finally, you are so firmly persuaded of this that you feel no good or prudent person will try to dissuade you. And you beg me again and again to be your steadfast friend in this matter as you have always been and will always be mine.

Even though, my dear Lee, the subject matter of your letters is so varied and complex that I can make no brief response, I will still respond as briefly as I possibly can, since I do not wish to occupy much of your time and I myself have too little to spare to spend much of it writing a letter of this sort. And besides, as the matter now stands, there might seem to be no point at all in my doing so, since you have already fixed on your own plan of action with Stygian<sup>180</sup> finality, not delaying at all for your brother's return and thus forestalling all the advice of every one of your friends. I do not know what they are going to say now; perhaps some of them will take the old advice, "Make the most of what cannot be changed."<sup>181</sup> But I would venture to give you my strongest assurance that, if you had asked their advice beforehand instead of deciding the point by yourself, you would have found very few here who would not have thought you would do better to put away those annotations forever than ever to publish them. And yet these men, who are anxious to stop you from putting your plan into action, can swear with a clear conscience (and I certainly believe, Lee, that you too believe it) that they are no less sincerely<sup>182</sup> and truly yours, just as several of them are (I hope) no less wise, than the most prudent of those over there who are goading you on so insistently to rush into publication.

As for myself, though I would defer to almost any of your friends in a contest of learning and prudence, when it comes to goodwill and good faith there is none with whom I would not confidently compete, so that you will not think I am thrown for a loss at the point where you write about how much you love and extol me. I can name various eminent men who will testify that I have responded in kind, and two others whose testimony you cannot reject and must have already heard frequently, namely each of your very dear brothers. And yet even if they are your brothers, I would not concede even to them that they feel more sincere good will for you than I myself do. I confess that I am very fond of Erasmus, for practically no other reason than that for which all of Christendom cherishes him, namely that this one man's unceasing exertions have done more to advance all students of sound intellectual disciplines everywhere in both secular and sacred learning than virtually anyone else's exertions for the last several centuries, though on this basis he should be less dear to me than to you, who have derived not a little more profit from him, as your letters show clearly. On the other hand, Lee, I see more than one reason why I should be linked to you personally by a bond of uncommon affection; not to mention the rest, there is devotion to our common fatherland and the friendly, enduring connection between our respective parents, through which I first came to embrace you many years ago, a precocious boy ten years my junior; and I have remained an admirer of yours ever since. Yet meanwhile I have been more of a friend than an intimate colleague, though I would certainly have been happy to be as intimate as possible if our separate professions and stations in life had not drawn us widely apart. And yet they never drew us so widely apart that I ever lost sight of that fine intellect, so well trained and well cultivated for learning, that insatiable thirst

178 Jacobus Latomus (ca. 1475–1544)

179 See EE 4: 1–2 for Erasmus's denial of targeting Lee. 180 The river Styx is where the gods swore binding oaths; see Homer, Iliad 15.37, and Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.188–89, 2.45–46, 101. 181 See Adages

214 (CWE 31: 246–47). 182 no less sincerely: Adages 946 (CWE 32: 254–55)

for knowledge, that fervent passion for studies, or that intense and unwearied drive, traits which easily held my attention and led me to love you more and more by the day, most of all in the hope that, as 5 I very joyfully promised myself, a time would eventually come when your endeavors would make this Britain of ours famous throughout the rest of the world.

My own feelings for you until now have been just 10 as I have described them, and not even now will I take back my love or abandon my hope; that is how far I am from designing or threatening to harm you. But assuredly, my dear Lee, the more vehemently I have loved you, and the greater the glory I thought
 15 you would bring us, the more deeply it hurts me to see you so stubbornly set on a plan which I am not alone in expecting will neither advance your own interests nor add to our country's prestige, since it will be seen as an invidious action on your part
 20 when you alone make such a hostile attack on the very work that another man elaborated for the common benefit of all mortals at no small expense to his personal fortunes and health. Indeed, there is a danger that if you go on as you have begun, all will
 25 judge that you harbor a general hostility toward all of mankind, and not just toward Erasmus, since it is their interests that you will be trying to hurt; you cannot obstruct his. He is not to be cheated of his due reward at God's hand, who requites all good 30 deeds, even if mortal men should either reject his work or allow it to perish completely as their envy or carelessness has allowed many very profitable volumes to perish before now, though their authors have still reaped the same profit in heaven that they 35 tried to bestow on the earth.

But I see that I must now respond to that part of your letter in which you see me as both ungrateful and unjust if I pass a hasty and disparaging judgment on your labor before reading it through. My 40 dear Lee, I certainly do not have so high an opinion of myself as to presume to pass judgment on anyone's works; I have always thought it a sure enough way to avoid accusations of temerity if I voted the way other men vote, particularly if they were men 45 of manifest virtue and undoubted learning. And when I observed that this class of men was unanimous in acclaiming this one work—the one you assail—more than all of his other works combined, although there is not one of his works they do not applaud enthusiastically, I certainly did not think 50 that I would be charged with precipitate judgment or found guilty of ingratitude toward you if before reading even one line of your book I felt I ought to place more trust in all of those men than in you. For 55 if I should have been so fair for your sake as to assume that your judgment in condemning Erasmus's translation was rigorous and irrefutable, I would have had to deliver a very severe and very unfair verdict on all of those men, whom I must have supposed to be either so lazy that they had neglected an 60 issue as important as you contend this one to be, or so stupid that they had not understood something which was so obvious to you, or finally so impious that they had refused to resist for Christ's sake the same man against whom you have pitted yourself,

 65 like a David opposing Goliath for Israel's sake,<sup>183</sup> on an issue they knew would contribute directly to what you describe as “the ruin of the church.” My dear Lee, you will have to forgive me for preferring
 70 to be somewhat tentative in the way I accepted your judgment so that I would not be driven to the ruthless condemnation of so many others in my heart, especially when they are such great men that I am
 75 sure you would consider it an ample distinction for anyone if he were believed even to approximate the virtue and learning of men such as these, though he might still fall several leagues short of them.

You may answer that some learned men side with you. That should not be considered to weigh against me, since I have heard of barely one or two who are 80 not altogether unlearned; and if you heard them blathering their nonsense over here, I am sure, my dear Lee, you would be quite ashamed to be chosen to lead camp followers of this sort instead of 85 real soldiers, unless Caesar's ambition inspires you, which I hope it does not, to prefer the first rank in Mutina (unless that is not the right name) to the second in Rome.<sup>184</sup> But learned civility and unlearned arrogance being what they are, I suspect
 90 that the learned will grant you the first rank before the unlearned will grant you the second or third. But if you are actually being encouraged by certain men over there, they are the very ones who make me
 95 still more reluctant to trust you regarding this issue, since I would have trusted you singly considerably more than I do now that witnesses like these have joined you. It is not that I particularly doubt or, for that matter, acknowledge their learning, since I suspect they are the sort of men who could be black or white for all we know;<sup>185</sup> it is rather that these men are reported to be unequivocally unfair to Erasmus, whether they are egged on by plain human jealousy (for we are all human) or whether, as I think more likely, some demon gave rise to this plague by inciting them, secretly instigating those minions of his to deter the man whom no material expense and no physical illness or danger could tear from the virtuous labors which he was performing for the good of the entire world. With a pretense of holiness they claim to be furthering Christ's work, but they are actually hindering Christ's work as they create work with their irksome slanders for the man who is really pursuing Christ's work and divert him from writing about Sacred Scripture, out of which, as if out of an inexhaustible storehouse, he used to bring something new almost daily for the advancement of scholarship, to writing apologies which are not so much useful to us as compulsory for him.

It is reported that these men get others to run back and forth between you and Erasmus, patching together lies and reporting falsely what each of you has been saying about the other, so that this vile deception will set you at odds and those fellows can serve their own partisan feelings at your peril.<sup>186</sup> They themselves deserve to endure all the hatred which will inevitably be directed against anyone who sets out to do what these men are now urging you to do, not to select just a passage or two in which you can show either that he has made a mistake (which is certainly possible) or that you miss the point (which is also quite possible), but rather to launch an all-out attack<sup>187</sup> on his project by claiming that he ought not to have made the translation at all and ought not to have told us about the discrepancies between the Greek texts and the Latin, and that even if this were worth doing he was not at all competent to do it. Not only do all learned men both in Louvain and here disagree with you on each of these points, but the Pope, best and greatest of primates, who ought to take precedence over all learned men's votes, disagrees with you, too. For at his pious urging Erasmus obediently undertook this task, which with God's help he has now performed twice with success, and thereby he has twice earned the Pope's special thanks and approval, as his solemn missives acknowledge.<sup>188</sup>

Therefore, given that this book contains the teaching of Christ, if I trusted the vicar of Christ to assess it, who has twice now declared the book useful, if I trusted the pope, I repeat, even though you oppose him and write that the book is pernicious, I judge that I have done nothing rash or unjust to you, even if your own book were completely unknown to me. But in fact it is not so totally unknown to me that I have not at least sampled enough of it to guess what the rest is like. For though it never reached me, it did reach certain people through the friendly solicitude of your close associates when they were surveying the judgments of others lest you might be placing inordinate trust in your own. When these people had read and considered the book thoroughly, and had judged the whole matter in such a way that they urged those who had submitted it that, if they wished to protect your reputation, they should write to you, urging you to abandon this task (and no doubt those same friends faithfully relayed this message to you), they then indicated a few of your principal points to me, too, as examples, the very points on which you seemed to feel that your victory was certain. As I said, my dear Lee, I am not presumptuous enough to hand down a verdict in disputes about theological topics lest anyone should rightly admonish me, "Let the cobbler stick to his last."<sup>189</sup> But even so, the notes which they showed me, which they clearly did as if these were the best ones, were mostly the kind that I feel even I can refute without any great effort. Consequently, when I found most of your principal notes were of this sort, I thought that I could fairly size up the rest on the basis of these, like a lion from his claw,<sup>190</sup> as the saying goes. For if a lion's claws do you no harm, there is no point in fearing his whiskers.

Certainly that argument about the term proprium [one's own] which you included in your letter to me, and which seems so substantial to you that in more than one letter you testify that you are amazed at Erasmus's impudence in daring to defend his own views when the truth is so obvious, seems to me, and to others as well, to be such a tenuous bit

185 black . . . know: Adages 599 (CWE 32: 65–66) 186 See EE 4:169. 187 launch

an all-out attack: See Adages 3472 (CWE 36: 190). 188 See EE 2: 114–15, 436–38,

3: 387–88. 189 Adages 516 (CWE 32: 14) 190 lion . . . claw: Adages 834 (CWE 32: 200)

of sophistry that we on the contrary are thoroughly amazed at your willingness to use it against him. For if you hold all mortals to Porphyry's Eisagōgē with such adamantine strictness<sup>191</sup> that, just because he defines proprium as that which is exclusively mine and not common to anyone else, therefore no one should use the same word in the way that all peoples everywhere openly do use it, it will then be a crime every time someone calls the country in which he was born his own country, or the parish in which he resides his own parish, or the father by whom he was sired his own father if he happens to have any brothers who have the same father in common with him. Although not even Porphyry is as troublesome on this point as you are, since he mentions many acceptable ways of employing that term. Nor would I have said anything at all about that term in the present letter if you yourself had not mentioned it in yours, since I indicated some time ago how I felt about this entire matter to your brothers and your closest friends, and I know that they passed on my feelings to you long ago, as I meant for them to, so that there would be no need for you to find out about my feelings now, for the first time, through a rumor being spread by Erasmians.

Now I come to your exposition, in which you rehearse the affair from the outset in an effort to show that Erasmus is wholly to blame for the birth and growth of this tragedy. But when it comes to this topic it is certainly worth seeing how you yourself show off the one and only kind of skill you concede to Erasmus and how you play the orator here, heaping up many words to exaggerate things which are basically petty. If anyone removed that mass of words and assembled the things by themselves, I think he would find nothing which ought to make you feel so mortally offended by Erasmus that for a chance to hurt him you would not even balk at subverting the common good of all men. For if anyone gathered up everything you have mentioned in your letters to me or to anyone else in which you magnify his affronts to you, the upshot of these things amounts to the fact that he has neglected your annotations. And to tell you the truth, many feel that this is not a sufficiently compelling reason for you, a man of Christian modesty, to make such a hostile attack on a work that you grant that you would have promoted if—this is the way they interpret your conduct—his praise of you had met your expectations, though in fact you considered it stingy because of the small number of passages he granted that you had explained to him.<sup>192</sup> But you actually should have considered it an honor for such a great man in all fields of learning to grant he had learned anything at all from you, whether he was telling the truth or simply granted it out of politeness. And yet it is amazing how uncivil you are in denying him any competence at all in Sacred Scripture, whereas you claim a great deal for yourself: you go so far as to predict openly that even in his second edition, on which once again he lavished so much study and effort and for which he compared so many manuscripts, pored through so many authors, and also consulted so many great scholars, he would still have left many glaring errors if he had not corrected it according to your annotations, as if he could not have tracked down for himself, or with anyone else's assistance but yours, the things which you discovered.

My dear Lee, I value your intellect and learning as highly as anyone does; indeed I not infrequently boast of you. But I am sure you consider it a fine enough tribute to your intelligence if anyone merely compares it to that of Erasmus, and I think you do not expect anyone to prefer it to his, whereas it is well known that Erasmus's industriousness and devotion to study since boyhood have been unsurpassed. Thus I think my opinion of you is remarkably high if I do not despair of your one day hereafter becoming a man of the sort that Erasmus is now, but not before you have lived as many years as he has already, nor will I justly be thought to be doing you any injustice if meanwhile I think that he excels you as much in learning as he does in years, since indeed he has spent almost as many years on theology alone as you have spent on your entire literary education since boyhood.

And yet no one is further from the arrogance of which you accuse him. Who makes fewer definitive claims? Who makes rigid assertions more timidly, something many men do all too boldly? He merely points out what the books say. Letting everyone judge for himself, he does not require anyone to agree with him. And if he ever reveals his 191 adamantine strictness: See Adages 643, 1241 (CWE 32: 94–94, 33: 151–52).

192 See Erasmus, Apologia qua respondet 146–47, 260–61; EE 4:142.

own views and takes issue with those who hold different ones, is he doing anything but what writers of all eras have been free to do as a matter of course? And yet he submits all of his views to the judgment of the church. He repeatedly grants that, being human, he may misconstrue many points in that work; whereas you, who fault him for immodesty, profess with a tone of great authority that you have perfected that work, with regard to theology at least (for I think that is what you mean by “your own province”), to the point that no one could find anything else in it that deserved to be criticized if only Erasmus corrected whatever you note. But when you profess this, you claim more for yourself alone than Erasmus’s own modesty would let him accept, even if others freely bestowed it on him, or than I personally would concede to you both put together, even though I concede you a great deal and everyone concedes him almost everything. And though he needs advice less than anyone, no one appreciates advice more than he does. This is quite clear even in the letters he wrote, both to England and to many other countries, to the people whose judgment he trusted the most, some of whom told him what they themselves thought. He thanked them all and accepted the advice some had given, while his written responses led others to see their mistakes so that they themselves thanked him for teaching them even as they were trying to teach him. Certainly I recall no one who created an uproar because not all his counsels were accepted as if they were gospel. For I have no idea what you mean when you write that he would not even let More advise him, since I have never considered myself such a great man that Erasmus should need my advice, whether about any aspect of learning or in his decisions about matters of general importance.

Now as for what you write about the ungracious way he received Dorp’s advice, I have no idea whether there might have been some secret feuding between them, but certainly in the apology in which he replied to Dorp publicly<sup>193</sup> he replied with such modesty and indeed with such reverence, despite being provoked and to some extent rudely berated, that nothing else will ever win so much honor for Dorp as the fact that, even after being offended by him, Erasmus conceded him so much authority. This in itself makes it difficult to convince me that

