Dorp, having forgotten that favor, would wish to injure once more a friend so honorably disposed toward him. I am confirmed in that opinion by this in particular: that when his feelings cooled down he decided to suppress that harsh letter which he had dictated in the heat of the moment; and on this basis I, too, suppressed mine in turn, since I am always more eager to silence and bury such quarrels, which can do little good and a great deal of harm, than to foster them. Since that time I have loved and esteemed Dorp so much that when you were about to depart for Louvain I urged you to form an especially close tie with him out of all the Louvain academics. I would certainly never have done so if I had not assumed that he was definitely the right man to make you start loving Erasmus (for to be truthful with you, my dear Lee, we knew you were not any too fair in your view of Erasmus even then), since Erasmus has such love for him. And by nature Erasmus is certainly so quick to forgive that I doubt you could find anyone anywhere who would have shown so much patience in bearing so many conspicuous affronts if he had had the same power to retaliate or who would have refrained from indulging his grief now and then by repaying abuse with abuse.<sup>194</sup> For not even when some selected various passages from his minor works as a basis for slander, so that there could be no doubt about whom they were attacking, and then slandered his reputation with all sorts of shameless abuse, not even then did Erasmus repay them with the insults that such men deserve, but dissembling their malice he thought it enough to defend his own writings. He was so generous in sparing their honor that he not only left it unimpaired but to some extent actually enhanced it. And yet this same immoderate modesty of his is undoubtedly the main reason that this hydra is constantly growing new heads<sup>195</sup> after losing so many already. Otherwise I am sure some would not have attacked him so wantonly if they had seen others like them repulsed now and then with a bit more asperity.

Now I come to the end of your first letter, where you indicate that, with the agreement or professed agreement of Erasmus, you have submitted this entire quarrel to the judgment of the reverend father, the bishop of Rochester, to whom you have forwarded the volume of your annotations. This is one action that everyone praises greatly, whether you acted with Erasmus or alone, both because you have turned your attention to peace and because you have chosen a peacemaker who is not only a particularly well-qualified judge because of his singular learning, which he now has the world to attest, but is also unlikely, because of his extraordinary piety, to let anything good in either book go to waste; a man who moreover loves both of you so much that he will devote all his energies<sup>196</sup> to concord, and a man of such skill and resourcefulness that he will easily find a way to satisfy both of you.

<sup>193</sup> See EE 2: 90–114. <sup>194</sup> abuse with abuse: See 1 Pt 2: 23. <sup>195</sup> hydra . . . heads: See Adages 290 (CWE 32: 238).

But indeed (to move on to your second letter) to the extent that this wholesome proposal of yours was a holy idea in the first place, whether it was a mutual plan or — as you write — entirely your own, to this same extent whichever of you is to blame for subverting the plan deserves serious reproach. I myself neither blame nor exonerate either one of you. I will merely state how the affair looks to others, who begin by observing that while you want it to look as if you were alone in soliciting the bishop's judgment it looks as if you were the first to decline it again, indeed first to the point of being virtually alone in declining it. For it is still unconfirmed that Erasmus has rejected it, since he sent his book first and has written no letter recalling it from a judge he could not shun in any case, since by publishing the book he had made everyone his judge. On the other hand, some time ago you sent the book over here secretly to others, but you completely concealed the affair from the bishop; and only now, when he offers you fatherly advice not to get involved with this work, you appoint him your judge. But you do so in such a way that he did not learn that he had been given this office before learning that it had been taken away. For your book did not reach him, and neither did your letter declaring him judge, before another letter arrived to deprive him of his judgeship and to announce your independent decision to publish without waiting for anyone's judgment. When people compare these and other observations, they certainly begin to suspect you were never sincere about that plan of choosing a judge.

This suspicion is certainly strengthened by your own defense, among other things, a defense many view as exceedingly weak, in which you want to make it appear that you were the target of a passage in Erasmus's Apology which no one considers has anything to do with you. For you do not find your name in the passage, nor do you acknowledge the characteristics described there. Furthermore, there are many other people who have done him some wrong and who are more intimate colleagues of Latomus; indeed there are some whom those who frequently travel here from there describe in a hardly more flattering light<sup>197</sup> than the person in that passage, whoever he may be. Thus though there is no pretext for linking the passage to you, there may be certain traces which might lead the reader to any of those men who are cunningly dissembling the matter and exploiting your own credulity to dissociate themselves from that role by conferring it on you, who so gladly accept it. And in this mask they lead you onstage and dishonor you publicly with their applause while your friends pity you, your enemies laugh, and these men feel especially pleased with themselves and rejoice in having been wily enough to trick you into acting their part as a stand-in.

"But," you say, "I have caught him red-handed. For when I complained to him through my brother about this injury, even though he denied he had written those statements against me, he refused when I asked him to testify to that effect with at least an apology."<sup>198</sup> My dear Lee, what you demanded would not have been easy for him or beneficial to you. For then when one person after another made such a demand of him, he would either have had to hurt someone by turning him down and provoke open hostility against himself in the place of a secret feud, or else he would have had to damage his own cause by praising someone publicly whom he might soon be forced to attack in an explicit way. But you think it will safeguard your honor if he testifies in writing that not one of those statements he wrote was directed against you, as if otherwise they might seem to fit you. Would it not be a fine way to clear you indeed if he promptly appended a note to that passage saying, "I hereby admonish everyone not to let undue suspicion cause him to suspect that these statements were written or intended against Lee"? How much better you would have safeguarded yourself by not applying to yourself statements that had nothing to do with you, and by rejecting as a malicious and spiteful interpreter anyone who attempted to transfer them to you, than by taking the matter upon yourself in such a way that you either appear to confess to the statements he wrote or you lack anything to complain about!

196 all his energies: Adages 326 (CWE 31: 328) 197 describe . . . light: See Adages 306 (CWE 31: 323–24). 198 See EE 4: 161, 4: 200; Apologia qua respondet 262–63.

Even though, my dear Lee, I see you shutting out my opinion before it is offered, since you think that whoever does not urge the immediate release of those annotations of yours either has scant concern for your honor or certainly does not watch out for it well enough, I myself will not hesitate to endanger my own reputation in your eyes on both counts before I would withhold the advice that I think most expedient for your reputation, and that means, above all, the advice to refrain from the publication of this volume, which will do you no good and earn you much ill will. For when you yourself suppose that this step will make everyone recognize either that you deserve all the credit if Erasmus has corrected any errors or that his stubbornness is to blame if he failed to correct them even after you warned him, you are taking something for granted that you will probably have a hard time making others believe, namely that he bought off your scribes and thus found out about all his errors from you. For you undercut your own assertion by deciding to publish your book before you have even seen his second edition; this is something that many believe you would never have done unless you had some hope that he might still have overlooked some of his errors through his ignorance of your annotations. For if you thought that he had already gained access to your annotations, you could have no doubt that either he would already have emended those passages or at least he would see a good way to defend himself: if he does see one, there would be no reason for you to anticipate winning much glory; on the other hand, if he has emended, you could scarcely avoid disrepute for attempting to win glory perversely, as if, backwardly angling for praise, you were uselessly going to point out not the book's present faults but its past ones.

“But,” you say, “I must vindicate my honor, which he has damaged severely by claiming not only that my annotations are trifles but that I support them with the pronouncements of the moderns.” By the way, my dear Lee, I do not see how this is consistent with your other views, since you indict Erasmus — as if it were a capital crime — for conceding the moderns too little authority, though he certainly concedes them enough, whereas I doubt that anyone detracts from them more than you do in considering that it dishonors you if he says you support your annotations with the pronouncements of moderns. But if your honor had been sullied so thoroughly that it had to be vindicated, and if there were no other way to cleanse it but to publish this book of yours at once, even though it is more respectable to bear even some loss of renown than to show such an inordinate regard for our own welfare that it drives us to injure the welfare of many,<sup>199</sup> even so I can easily forgive you, today's morals being what they are,<sup>200</sup> if you care more about your own good than about anyone else's.<sup>201</sup> But in my view your honor has not been so terribly slighted, and even if it had, it could scarcely be salvaged with this publication. For that passage in his Apology has nothing at all to do with you, and in the letters he has written to England the last thing he appeared to be doing, or indeed even thinking of doing, was injuring your reputation. On the other hand, people here have been whispering for almost a whole year about what you have written against him, though I have not yet seen any good man who is pleased with your plan, nor have I yet perceived any signs of his feeling offended with you, unless we count his recent expressions of some grief at your actions against him, though he certainly writes much more temperately about you than you do about him.<sup>202</sup> And if anyone weighs both your stories I am certainly afraid he will convict you rather than Erasmus of being unjust, unless anyone thinks that the tales he has heard about you are untrue. I myself am as eager to think so as you should be to think that those tales which the same scandalmongers tell you about him are untrue, for if you think that these men are liars, which you will if you want other men to absolve you, you will likewise absolve him of the injustice with which you now charge him.

But you talk about some letter or other in which he has attacked you severely. I do not know if you can produce it, but one thing I do know, my dear Lee, is that there is a letter from you — and an autograph 199 regard... many: See Terence, Andria 125–28; Cicero, De legibus 1.18.49.

200 today... are: Terence, Phormio 55

310–11). 202 See EE 3: 459–60.

201 more... else's: See Adages 291 (CWE 31:

letter, at that, which you cannot disclaim—from which one may deduce that you yourself both entered upon and proceeded with those annotations in a far different spirit from the one you profess now, calling on your own conscience so often to vouch for it, and that you actually entered upon them in such a way that before you set out, as they say, you had already come to a verdict,<sup>203</sup> prejudging the whole crop to be worthless before you had even seen the shoots, even though all good men everywhere who knew anything of the farmer were confident that it would come to an excellent and beautiful harvest.

But as I started to say, even if you were called on to vindicate your honor I scarcely think you will achieve that objective with this publication, and I fear that while trying to cleanse it in this way you will actually cover it with more mire and filth.<sup>204</sup> For first of all, I see that you are simply mistaken in a number of passages, and it is not unlikely that you are equally mistaken in several which I have not seen. Furthermore, a number of your points are not very important, as not even you will deny; a number of points, even if they do not openly contradict you, certainly do not afford you much support; and a sizable number are points which have long been controversial and on which the judge has yet to rule.<sup>205</sup> And if you subtract these from your total, the rest of the reckoning will be minuscule, and at any rate not large enough to justify your drawing up a new ledger—not to mention one thing which other people are mentioning, who consider it very untimely to point out mistakes which have already been emended.

This is how your case would stand even if you had found a mute adversary, which you know very well yours is not. As it is, since the case against you will be argued by a consummate master in arguing all kinds of cases, who has also devoted more labor and study to this case than to all the others he has ever prepared, certainly, my dear Lee, you will not believe how many things you will hear that you never expected, and if you could have conceived of them before now you would undoubtedly have chosen to have nothing to do with those ill-omened labors of yours—would that you could simply dispense with them! For any trifles you note he will reduce altogether to nothing; anything that is not very helpful to you he will treat in a way that will even make it hurt you; anything that has so far seemed ambiguous he will clearly resolve against you; and if he has altered anything for the better he will not only not thank you on that account, he will even arraign you for insolence, and a thoroughly ludicrous specimen of it at that, as if you not only glory in playing Epimetheus<sup>206</sup> after the fact and in giving us warnings we no longer need, warning us to shun rough spots and holes which have already been evened out, but you also seek praise which should go to the diligence of others, copying whole in your own annotations every note you could find made by him or by others and presenting the offspring of these other men as if they were your own, some of which you continue to find handsome even though their true parents have thrown them away as amorphous and misbegotten monstrosities. But when he finally comes to the points about which he can clearly prove you are mistaken, you have no cause to expect the same sort of kindness he has always displayed until now in sparing others. Since he sees that this trait has provoked many men to be bold in attacking him, he will undoubtedly alter his tactics,<sup>207</sup> and I fear he will make an example of you so that others will not make more trouble for him in the hope of encountering his usual politeness.

Such a reaction is one for which even your judgment should pardon him. For you feel you have cause for a bitter attack on him, whether because you think it wrong to keep silent about anything he left uncorrected or because, even if he left nothing of the sort, you still need to redeem and restore your own honor, which would be totally ruined if all of Europe—as if common folk care for such things<sup>208</sup>—thought that your annotations were trifles. How much more justly you ought to forgive him for answering your freedom with similar freedom, whether his work as it has now been revised retains none of the things that you criticized or the things you reprove as his errors are things that his conscience assures him are perfectly correct (and without any lapse into arrogance he can trust his own judgment no less surely than you can trust yours). Not to mention that all of this agitation

<sup>203</sup> before . . . verdict: See Quintilian 4.5.4; Adages 1206 (CWE 33: 133–34).

<sup>204</sup> cleanse . . . filth: See Adages 967 (CWE 32: 263). <sup>205</sup> the judge . . . rule: Horace,

Ars poetica 78. <sup>206</sup> See Adages 31 (CWE 31: 78–80); Epimetheus was a Titan and Prometheus's brother; true to his name, Epimetheus lacked his brother's foresight.

<sup>207</sup> alter his tactics: Adages 860 (CWE 32: 213) <sup>208</sup> as if . . . things: Terence, Andria 185

on your part is intended to keep him from making people think that any minor points you had annotated were either not right or not very significant, whereas he has to contend against you to escape major notoriety, which he could not escape if your notes on major points were correct, as if he had done something that everyone thinks to be wrong, namely handled holy matters in an unholy way.<sup>209</sup> This being the case, believe me, if you rouse him by publishing those annotations, you can only expect him to forget his customary gentleness and to defend his own rights with all possible rigor.

And so I am very afraid you may seem to impair your own honor in a tactless endeavor to vindicate it at a point when, as far as I can see, he has not yet impugned it. I have seen others suffer the same fate before. Though the outcome must tell whether they were less safe than you are, they were certainly no less convinced of their safety than you are until they had heard his response. Only then did they find out that without the host, as it is said, they had reckoned the cost of their dinner in vain, since whoever does this has to reckon again; for the host generally adds some expense to the bill that they either forgot or conveniently omitted in order to spare themselves.

Therefore, my dearest Lee, I implore you again and again not to stake too much on your self-confidence. Since you implored me in the name of friendship, a name I hold especially sacred, to be fair to you in this episode, may I be as assured, my dear Lee, of retaining your friendship forever as I am convinced that I have no way of showing more fairness than by imploring you in return, as I fervently do, by whatever is even more sacred than friendship, to dispense with these odious reproaches, to resume friendly relations with Erasmus (for I would venture to give you my word that he would not reject them), and to give up the idea of accepting a province<sup>210</sup> which you could not resign once you had entered it, and in which for the rest of your life — which I hope is much less than half finished — amid tumult, reviling, contention, and vexations more vexing than vestments of pitch, my dear Lee, you will feel more as if you are burning than actually living. Recover your own Christian charity instead, and retrieve your serenity. Live this life in contentment and peace. Scorn the loss of one ill-omened book which would even draw down some ill will on your offspring to come, and seek out a more promising theme for yourself to write up in an elegant way, so that when it eventually appears it will benefit and please everyone, it will both endear your fame to your contemporaries and commend it very favorably to posterity, and above all it will be the sort of work for which you can hope God will provide the supreme recompense, for that kind of reward is much richer than all mortal goods. I have no objection, if there happens to be some point germane to that theme where Erasmus or any other writer has made a particularly serious mistake, and it seems clear that the world should be warned of it so that no one else will trip up over the same obstacle<sup>211</sup> — I have no objection, I repeat, if you too let us know of the stumbling blocks we should avoid; nor could any fair person object to it, provided that the point was discussed with enough moderation to prove that the need for a warning had simply presented itself and that you had not sought out a pretext for fault-finding. But who does not see how that other course deviates from this limitation when book is deliberately pitted against book like enemy against enemy? To deter you from starting a fight of this sort, my dear Lee, once again I beseech and implore you with all the force I can muster, by your honor, which is practically dearer to me than my own; by my hopes for you, which are as great as I have ever conceived for any of my countrymen; by your love for your country, which you are about to embarrass by clouding the bright reputation you owe it; and by the solicitude of your friends, who are all apprehensively joining their own prayers to mine: spare yourself and your country alike, and let no one say either that Lee or that anyone English envies Christendom its present advances. But if you are completely obsessed with so noble a passion for glory that you would rather break your own jaw-tooth<sup>212</sup> than pass up a fight with Erasmus, I can do nothing but pity your plight, but for my country's sake I will do everything in my power to establish that this action of yours, which I see invites so much ill will from all virtuous and learned men, is the act of a Briton, not of Britain, though I will always maintain our friendship to whatever extent you permit me to do so. Farewell. 1 May 1519.

<sup>209</sup> as if... way: See Adages 855 (CWE 32: 211–12). <sup>210</sup> accepting a province: See

Adages 1341 (CWE 33: 210–11). <sup>211</sup> no one... obstacle: Adages 408 (CWE 31: 302)

<sup>212</sup> break... jaw-tooth: Adages 1159 (CWE 33: 104–5)

83. To a Monk<sup>213</sup>

&lt;1519–20&gt;

A learned epistle from a man of renown, Master Thomas More, in response to a certain monk's ignorant and virulent letter, a senseless invective, belaboring, among other issues, Erasmus's translation, "In the beginning was Speech, etc."

Dearest brother in Christ, I have received your long letter, fraught with various remarkable tokens of how much you love me. For could any affection be stronger than the one which makes you so inordinately concerned for my well-being as to fear even imaginary dangers? For you fear that I cherish Erasmus so much that his contact is going to corrupt me, that I adore the man's writings so much that (in your words) his new and unorthodox teaching is going to infect me. And lest this should happen, first you fill up a number of pages with an all-out polemic, one might say, against the man's learning and character, and then at length, in the holiest of tones, you pray, plead, and indeed all but conjure me in the name of God's mercy to take care to shun him. First you quote the apostle's reminder that "Bad company corrupts a good character."<sup>214</sup> Then you cite, from Erasmus's Adagia, "A person who lives with a lame man will learn how to limp."<sup>215</sup> Finally you draw on the testimony of a poet as well, doubtless so as to make up a triad: "When we look on another's affliction, our eyes are afflicted, as well."<sup>216</sup> With these arguments and others like them, although there is no danger of the sort that you fear, you have tried hard to drive me away from the place where you think (or at least claim to think) that the danger resides.

Thus, of course, I could rightly be seen as an ingrate for failing to greet such a gracious concern for my welfare with unbounded gratitude. I would be even more of an ingrate, in view of the way that your own fervid transports of love made you fear I would stumble when you saw me walking on even terrain, if I looked on without the least qualm as you ran on the rim of a precipice or if I did not shout you a warning that you ought to watch your own step and begin your own wary and cautious descent from where you are in danger of falling. Thus I will start by going over my own position, showing everything here to be safe, and then I will go on to show you that that lofty stronghold of yours from which, smug and secure, you look down upon our friend Erasmus is dangerously shaky.

For, first of all, how is it dangerous for me to believe that Erasmus has translated many New Testament passages better than the old translator, or for me to believe that Erasmus knows more about Greek and Latin literature than he did? Nor do I just believe it, I see it and know it for a fact; nor could anyone doubt it who has any command of both languages. How is it dangerous for me to enjoy reading those books which the most learned and most pious people are virtually unanimous in praising, and which the Pope, best and greatest of primates, has twice now declared to be useful to scholars?<sup>217</sup> How can I learn such dangerous doctrines from a teacher who himself never takes a definitive position, who presents both his own views and those of others in such a way that the reader remains free to judge them?<sup>218</sup> And even if he made assertions which were utterly false, I am not so stupid that I cannot tell what will square with true faith or with soundness of morals, nor am I so committed to anyone's opinions that I will not freely disagree with him where I have good cause.

As I said, then, Erasmus's opinions are no threat to me, even if (as you write) there were some unsound opinions in what he has written. But you, on the other hand, as I see to my sorrow, are sadly in danger, through some trick of fortune, of having his numerous volumes, replete with both learning and true piety, more such volumes than anyone else has produced for the last several centuries, transformed by some wily magician from a health-giving cure to a poison. Believe me, for the love that I bear you I was unable to read without profound sorrow your shockingly heated attack, in which you so intemperately vomit abuse by the wagonload<sup>219</sup> onto a man who has done you no wrong and has publicly done all a service, whereas you belittle his learning, rave against his life-style, call him "vagrant" and "pseudo-theologian," cry "slanderer" at him, and brand him with charges of heresy and schism, going

<sup>213</sup> The anonymous addressee has been identified as John Batmanson, a London Carthusian. <sup>214</sup> 1 Cor 15:33 <sup>215</sup> Adages

973 (CWE 32: 266–67) <sup>216</sup> Ovid, Remedia amoris 615 <sup>217</sup> See EE 3: 387–88, 2: 436–38. <sup>218</sup> See EE 3: 324. <sup>219</sup> abuse

by the wagonload: See Adages 673–74 (CWE 32: 110–11).

so far in your scurrility that you even proclaim him a “herald of Antichrist,” even though you do hedge that insult very tactfully indeed: as you make such an outrageous accusation, you say you do not want 5 to make it.

My old, dear friend, tell me, what sly, crafty demon has managed to plant so much guile and insidious subterfuge in a heart as sincere and as candid as yours was while you were still a layman, in the 10 heart of a monk and (a word which deserves much more reverence) a priest of so many years’ standing, to the point where you are able to say, “I do not call him a heretic, but whoever acts thus is a heretic. I do not proclaim him schismatic, but whoever 15 acts thus is schismatic. I do not pronounce him a herald of Antichrist, but what if this very assertion concerning Erasmus had come straight from God? But I will forbear, lest your hopes for me should surpass what you see me or hear me to be.” By all
20 that is sacred in this world and the next, what do I hear you saying? At this point I appeal to your conscience: does it not make you blush, does it not make you tremble all over, when you trick out such an impious charge with such monstrous extravagance, when you take up some nobody’s criminal
25 lie and recite it to us with such sanctimony, as if by divine revelation, and when you take defamation of character, the manifest work of the devil, and call God its author? Now as for your saying, as if out
30 of modesty, that you would forbear lest I look for great things from you, would to God it were as certain that each of us felt truly humble as it is that your tale would not have raised my opinion of you in the least, even if you had openly stated that it was 35 your own revelation, even if you had mentioned the name of the angel or demon who brought you the message, it being one I would not have believed even from a sworn witness.<sup>220</sup> Rather, I would have warned you against being too quick to believe every 40 spirit,<sup>221</sup> especially that one, for however brightly he had shone with false light he would still have betrayed himself as an angel of darkness by his buzz of detraction and slander, a sure mark of Satan. I would rather have countered by echoing that verse 45 from Paul, “In the latter times some shall depart from the faith, hearkening unto spirits of error and the doctrines of devils who speak lies in hypocrisy and have consciences seared with a hot iron,”<sup>222</sup> and also that other verse of his, “Let no man lead you astray in a voluntary humility and worshiping of 50 angels, intruding vainly into things he has not seen, puffed up by his carnal conceit.”<sup>223</sup> For these verses would be more to the point than the one which you foolishly transfer to yourself from the apostle. As it is, though, since you indicate that this revelation 55 was not yours but some other fellow’s, I am even less impressed. For though I do not doubt that God does now and then bestow some revelations on mortals, I am nonetheless not so foolishly credulous as to be frightened out of my wits by what-60 ever some madman dreams up, some impostor invents, or else some evil spirit suggests to the man he possesses.

I do not doubt that your other informant owes his inspiration to similar unholy rituals, the one 65 who you write warned you as follows: “Be assured that Erasmus, who has such a fine train of words to attend him, has unorthodox opinions regarding the Catholic faith and Holy Scripture. He frequently 70 shows this is so whenever he can get a private hearing. I speak from repeated experience.” So much for that fine fellow’s report to you about Erasmus, though you say that, whoever he is, he has also 75 thought up a distinguished apology against Erasmus; then you warn me not to suspect that the fellow is Lee. Rest assured, I do not suspect Lee, since I feel quite convinced that though he has been carried 80 away by some passion or other to the point that he now feels ashamed to retreat, his own mind is endowed with such virtue and shaped with such learning that even though he may quarrel about scholarly issues he will not break out into abuse. But some people describe this informant of yours as a man very different from Lee. For though you
85 call him a man of good faith, a man clearly both serious and (using your own pretty phrase) genial-mannered, honorable by the standards of secular dignity, and as conspicuous for personal integrity as for his illustrious learning, he is drawn in a 90 quite different light by the people who know him the best: not a man of good faith, far from genial in character, and actually churlish, though honored by some — honored rather than honorable. But the extent of his learning is shown in the apology you
95 praise, whereas some learned men who have seen it and wish the man well, and for that reason urged him to burn it or suppress it forever, insist that the man is deranged to the point of sheer lunacy, though he does have a few lucid intervals. And as they were sketching him thus I could not get them 5 to say who he was; they themselves did not want to disgrace him by name before that illustrious apology came forth to provide a definitive sample of his wit and learning.

But if you please, let us ponder a little just how 10 much good faith that perfidious fellow can claim whose good faith makes you think that Erasmus's opinions regarding the faith are unorthodox, a fellow who goes on to say (lest you doubt the good 15 faith of so faithless a man) that Erasmus repeatedly shows this is so, whenever he can get a private hearing, and that he himself speaks from experience, and repeated experience at that, so that you could be sure that he heard the fact frequently from none other than Erasmus himself. How the truth never 20 fails to assert itself! How contrivers of falsehoods are either exposed through some chance event, balked by the facts of the matter, or given away by their own indiscretion, like shrew-mice!<sup>224</sup> For supposing Erasmus did have wrong opinions regard-25 ing the faith, how likely is it that he would be too stupid to see how dangerous this would be for him, and how likely is it that he would always be looking for people, or begging them even, to let him inform them in private that he was a heretic? For as that 30 good-faith witness attests, a private hearing was all the inducement he needed.

But how long did Erasmus live with Colet?<sup>225</sup> How long with the reverend father, the bishop of Rochester?<sup>226</sup> How long with the most reverend primate of Canterbury?<sup>227</sup> Not to mention Mountjoy, Tunstall, Pace, and Grocyn,<sup>228</sup> with whom he has associated long and often. I would rightly look silly if I tried to put into words any part of the praise that is due to these men, since everyone knows that 40 no one can praise any one of them richly enough. Which of them has not spoken with him in the most perfect privacy a hundred times? Which of them, even once, has heard anything which could foster the slightest suspicion that Erasmus's opinions regarding the faith are not perfectly orthodox?
45

For if they had detected the least indication of any such fault, they are certainly too good to have concealed such a monstrous discovery. But which one of them all has not always cherished Erasmus and yet come to love him all the more upon longer and 50 deeper acquaintance?

But I suppose he did not dare trust men such as these, having too much respect for their piety. Naturally, then, he was looking for someone whose conscience he need not respect, and from whom he 55 need not fear betrayal, a person whose face, words, and lifestyle plainly showed him to be an initiate of the same cult. Such a one must your much-praised informant have been — yes, that man of good faith, serious, genial, honorable, learned, and full of integrity, to whom you now see that Erasmus would never have confided his secret so often unless, besides all the remarkable gifts you assign him, he were also a heretic. Though he says that he speaks
60 from repeated experience, if we ask him to prove that he had even one such experience I think he will confess that it cannot be proved, since he maintains that the secret was vouchsafed him only in private. But whoever accuses a man of a crime yet confesses that he cannot prove it is undoubtedly either
70 a slanderer<sup>229</sup> or something close to it. But then too, since he speaks from repeated experience, let us ask where they talked over their heresies or when they had any dealings with each other at all. It must have been some time ago, since Erasmus has long been 75 away. Now then, why did the man hold his tongue when Erasmus was here and when it would have done much more good to expose him, so that we would have shunned the offender, than it can do now, when Erasmus is gone and when we are not 80 in as much danger? For in books no secret is buried too deep for sharp eyes to uncover it. But I am taking more time than I should in refuting this sham revelation and exposing this singular witness, accuser, and self-declared suspect all rolled into one, 85 who you now see is either a fraud and a criminal liar or, if he were telling the truth, a still worse sort of criminal, namely a long-standing partner in crime and a tardy informant — in sum, whether lying or 90 telling the truth, a man wholly perfidious. There

<sup>224</sup> See Adages 265 (CWE 31: 289).

<sup>225</sup> John Colet (ca. 1466–1519), dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, was a spiritual influence on More and Erasmus. <sup>226</sup> John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester (1459–1535)

<sup>227</sup> William Warham (ca. 1450–1535), Archbishop of Canterbury <sup>228</sup> William Blount, Lord Mountjoy (1478–1534), Erasmus's patron; Cuthbert Tunstall (1474–1559), Bishop of London; Richard

Pace (ca. 1483–1536); William Grocyn (ca. 1446–1519) <sup>229</sup> Adages 1281 (CWE 33: 178–79)

can certainly be nothing obscure about Erasmus's own faith, which has been brightly illuminated by the many exertions and vigils, the many dangers and material and physical hardships that he has sustained for Sacred Scripture, the very supply-house of faith, nor indeed is there anything new in fabricating a charge of heresy, something that can be done against every good man. Long ago Satan's followers launched the same charge at the saintliest of men with such violence and craft that the same men whose labors had made the faith flourish were compelled to give an account of their faith by publishing their own creeds.

Now I will turn away from the testimony of that good-faith witness of yours, and from those dreams which were sent down from heaven through the gate of horn mentioned by Homer,<sup>230</sup> and I will proceed to the points in Erasmus's own books which you use as a pretext to charge him with blatant impiety. The most serious of your indictments is this, that "that impudent fellow Erasmus does not hesitate to make the outrageous assertion in many places in his writings that even the holiest and most learned fathers, those illustrious instruments of the Holy Spirit, Jerome, Ambrose, Hilary, Augustine, and others like them, whose light has illuminated the Catholic church well enough that it has no need of this obscure fellow to darken and stain it anew, were occasionally wrong." Does it really strike you as outrageous for anyone to say that the very men you singled out were occasionally wrong? What if those very men, whose unbidden defender you are, should agree with Erasmus? Will it not make a joke of your vehemence on their behalf if they scorn your support?

Now then, you deny that any of these men was ever wrong. Tell me this: when Augustine maintains that Jerome has mistranslated some places in Scripture, while Jerome vindicates his performance, is neither one wrong?<sup>231</sup> When Augustine asserts that the fidelity of the Septuagint version should not be impugned, while Jerome denies this and contends that the Septuagint translators made mistakes, is neither one wrong?<sup>232</sup> When Augustine adduces that tale of their perfect consensus according to which all of them were guided by the Holy Spirit to produce the same version in their separate cells, while Jerome derides that silly fiction, is neither one wrong, though their viewpoints are diametrically opposed?<sup>233</sup> When Jerome interprets the letter to the Galatians as if Paul were only pretending to rebuke Peter, while Augustine denies this, is neither one wrong?<sup>234</sup> When Jerome disapproves of Augustine's work on the Psalms, while Augustine approves of it, is neither one wrong?<sup>235</sup> When Augustine regards every lie as a sin, while Jerome praises an opportune lie, is neither one wrong?<sup>236</sup> When Augustine denies that a man who divorced his first wife for fornication can marry again in her lifetime, while Ambrose affirms he can do so, is neither one wrong?<sup>237</sup> Jerome maintained that to marry one wife before baptism and another thereafter does not count as two marriages; the Church now maintains he was mistaken. Augustine asserts that all demons, and all angels too, are corporeal substances; no doubt you deny it.<sup>238</sup> He asserts that infants who die without baptism are condemned to an eternity of physical suffering; how many believe that today besides Luther, who they say clings fast to the teachings of Augustine, and is reviving this obsolete notion?<sup>239</sup> Did not most of the ancient saints believe that the Blessed Virgin was conceived in original sin?<sup>240</sup> But some recent writers sprang up to deny it, and most of Christendom has sided with these men against all the ancients.

There would be no end to it if I tried to list all the points on which it is quite clear that the most learned and holiest men had mistaken ideas, and if you read their books you could not overlook their mistakes if you understood what you were reading. Thus though you call him impudent, you prove to be not a little more reckless than he is when you

<sup>230</sup> See Homer, Odyssey 19.562–67.

<sup>231</sup> See Jerome, Epistolae 104.45, 112.21–22 (PL 22: 833–34, 929–31). <sup>232</sup> See Augustine, De doctrina Christiana 2.15.22 (PL 34: 46); De civitate dei 18.42 (PL 41: 602–3); Jerome, Praefatio in Pentateuchum (PL 28: 150). <sup>233</sup> diametrically opposed: Adagia 945 (CWE 32: 254). <sup>234</sup> See Jerome, Epistolae 56.3–4, 67.3–7, 112.4–7, 116.4–30 (PL 22: 566–67, 648–50, 917–27, 937–50).

<sup>235</sup> See Jerome, Epistolae 105.5, 112.20 (PL 22: 836–37, 928–29). <sup>236</sup> See Augustine, De mendacio (PL 40: 505–16); Jerome, Commentarii in epistolam ad Galatas 1.2 (PL 26: 339–40). <sup>237</sup> See Mt 5:32, 19:9; Mk 10:11; Lk 16:18; 1 Cor 7:11–15; Augustine, De sermone Domini in monte 1.14 (PL 34: 1248–49), De coniugiis adulterinis 1.1 (PL 40: 451); Ambrose, Commentaria in epistolam ad Corinthios primam 7 (PL

17: 218C). <sup>238</sup> See Jerome, Epistolae 69 (PL 22: 653–59). <sup>239</sup> See Augustine, De divinatione daemonum 4 (PL 40: 584–86). <sup>240</sup> See Augustine, Sermones 294.2–3 (PL 38: 1336–37); Enchiridion 93 (PL 40: 275); De peccatorum meritis et remissione 1.16 (PL 44: 120–21); Opus imperfectum contra Iulianum 2.117, 3.199 (PL 45: 1191, 1333); Luther, Sermon von dem sakrament der Taufe (WA 2: 727–37).

make the reckless assertion that those men were never wrong, an assertion you cannot defend without showing that you either did not read their books or did not understand them. Worse yet, how 5 can you be so brazen as to rebuke him for saying just what you say? For no doubt you yourself say Augustine was wrong in asserting that demons have bodies and in damning infants, Jerome was wrong
 10 were wrong about the Virgin's conception. And yet, even though this is so, and though those holy fathers disagreed with each other so often in interpreting Sacred Scripture, and though this is too obvious for anyone to deny it, it is amazing how 15 childishly you storm and turn heaven and earth upside down<sup>241</sup> every time someone detects either error in Hugh of Saint Cher<sup>242</sup> or delirium in Nicolas de Lyra.<sup>243</sup> Augustine was not afraid to say he granted no man besides the apostles so much au-
 20 thority that he would accord an unquestioning faith to what he said except insofar as he could prove it clearly either from Scripture or from reason.<sup>244</sup> You think you put all the saints forever in your debt by protesting that they were never wrong.
 25 But they either laugh at your ignorance or deplore your misguided devotion. Nor do they want defenders like you, since their charity has more regard for the diligence of those who warn others about it if the saints ever made a mistake than it does for 30 the superstitious piety of those whose misguided defensiveness propagates such mistakes to the peril of others.

But when you go so far as to pit your style against his, you will have to forgive me, I simply cannot 35 keep from laughing. For when you say he lacks that facility of speech which is intelligible to any reader and you censure and mock him for the way he at times mixes Greek words with Latin, you are so very clever that you never notice that this stricture
 40 of yours applies equally well to Jerome, on whom, whether you like it or not, those fine quips of yours also reflect, since he too intersperses Greek words in his Latin, while some of what he wrote for vir-45 gins is too learned for many theology professors to understand it today. What if Erasmus had written some treatise entirely in Greek? Would you not then have much better reason to mock him than now, when he merely throws in some Greek words here and there? But our women could give the same reason for mocking all those who have written in 50 Latin. What of this, that of all those who have in fact written in Latin, not one has ever written more plainly than he or perfected an easier style, to the point that Budé, a most learned man with regard

 55 to most things, did not hesitate to criticize Erasmus for an excessively easy style?<sup>245</sup> No one is more careful to shun far-fetched terms, though you charge he affects them, whereas those men who you say use a more modest style make up virtually every third 60 word, men from whom I imagine you yourself must have learned those pet phrases of yours, “genial-mannered,” “vagabond life-style,” “tenebrosity,” “identity,” and other such gems.

But look here, though you make many other unjustified charges against Erasmus besides affectation
 65 of eloquence, he will confess to them all if he has ever affected as much eloquence in an entire volume as you sometimes affect in one line, when you ask, for example, “Then how will they answer
 70 these points, they who spend all their years on such short-lived, quick-withering, prettified flowerlets of rhetoric?” Out of all you profess to have read in the works of Erasmus, produce anything you have read as pretentious as this line of yours, which is ungrammatical as well. Nor am I mentioning this
 75 because I think you ought to be blamed for a solecism. I neither expect nor demand pure speech from you; I am not unaware that you never had free time to learn it, and even if you had had the time, you would still have lacked teachers to instruct you in 80 it. I am mentioning these points to show that, since you think it is seemly for you to engage in such a strained affectation of eloquence before you even master your grammar, you should not take Erasmus to task for refusing to spurn the refinement which 85 he made his own long ago and which waits on him now uninvited.

When you argue against studying languages it is not unamusing to hear you lament that in learning
 90 Greek and Hebrew we tend to lose the purity of our Latin, when you have just finished your merciless tirade against graceful Latin, as if there were such a

<sup>241</sup> turn . . . down: Adages 281 (CWE 31: 300) <sup>242</sup> Cardinal Hugh of St. Cher (1200–1263), author of Concordantia.

<sup>243</sup> Nicolas de Lyra (1270–1340), author of Postillae perpetuae in universam Sacram Scripturam <sup>244</sup> See Augustine, Contra Faustam Manichaeum 11.5 (PL 42: 249).

<sup>245</sup> See EE 2.396–401, 464–70. Guillaume

Budé (1467–1540) was a French humanist and friend of More and Erasmus.

vast difference between pure and graceful speech.<sup>246</sup> Besides, in the passage you cite, Jerome really complains of the harm done to the gracefulness of his speech, and he does so with no other aim than to recommend even more strongly his own study of Hebrew writings, since he thought them worth mastering even at the expense of Latin. But Greek writings are patently more useful still, whether we consider the New Testament (for it takes the same precedence over the Old that a substance has over a shadow or a reality over a figure), or the interpreters of Sacred Scripture (for almost all the finest and holiest of them wrote in Greek), or finally those arts we call liberal, as well as philosophy (for on these topics speakers of Latin wrote practically nothing). Furthermore you can scarcely deny that those Latins who knew the most Greek were also the most fluent in their own tongue, and that this was not only the general rule in the past but is still so today. Nor did Jerome himself write less gracefully after he mastered Hebrew than he did before, as his later works prove, even though he saw fit to apologize for his own style, whether for the reason I mentioned or else because he continually strives to sustain the impression that he never courted the eloquence which now attends him.

This is surely your most splendid touch: you finally come to the point of saying that you approve of a moderate acquaintance with languages and merely condemn too much study of them, as if the study of them had already been pushed well past the mean, while in fact it is still stopped well short of it. You profess that we ought to embrace pure speech with open arms,<sup>247</sup> as they say, yet you thunder with tragic extravagance against a graceful and elegant style, and you lament most pathetically that now a large portion of Christendom has been pitifully ensnared by its charms, though they once appealed only to heathens, as if all of the most ancient holy fathers had not been illustrious for their graceful style, whereas those who discuss Sacred Scripture today virtually desecrate the venerable majesty of that noble office with their impure speech.

But you think you have spoken so well on this topic that even later on, having bravely concluded the fight for that viewpoint, you crow like a victor, demanding, “So what is the point of adorning the verity of Sacred Scripture with flowerlets of speech, which both the apostles and the other doctors completely avoided as wholly absurd, especially since such ornaments seemed to be altogether at odds with the humble capacities of the modestly learned?” Finally, after staging this marvelous display of your rhetoric, you tie up your whole epilogue, ever so wittily, by borrowing a tag from the Gospels: “Older is better.”<sup>248</sup> (One touch in these words is especially splendid: you link the apostles and those fathers of the early Church as if both groups employed the same style.) Augustine ventured to attribute eloquence also to the apostles<sup>249</sup> — an eloquence so proper to them that it cannot suit anyone else, nor can anyone else’s suit them, though their own eloquence also teems with all sorts of rhetorical figures. Certainly those holy fathers — Jerome, I mean, Cyprian, and Ambrose — were a match for the most fluent speakers of their times.

Nor is eloquence an obstacle to lucidity of style. To the contrary, no obscure speaker is eloquent:<sup>250</sup> one of the cardinal precepts of rhetoric is that we should express ourselves clearly. If the apostles avoided refined speech especially because, as you put it, it seemed to be especially at odds with the humble capacities of the modestly learned, why are they still so obscure that neither the modestly learned nor the very learned understand them without making a great effort, and occasionally not even then? The most ancient and holiest fathers wrote both eloquently and clearly, and yet they are not clear to many theology professors today. Why is this so? Because no light, of course, can shine brightly enough to illuminate even the blind. For those fellows are not (as you put it) modestly learned, but rather, not learned at all. For one fact makes it quite clear that what keeps them from understanding the holy fathers is blindness on their part and not any darkness in what they are reading: young girls once understood what today’s proud professors cannot.

I have already said that the style of the fathers is very refined; it is perfectly open, as well, to whoever knows Latin. For they reasonably thought that whoever wanted to understand them would either learn Latin or have their works translated into the vernacular, nor indeed could they guess that such monsters would ever ascend to the chairs of theology, men who to cover up for their own sloth would condemn as obscure every text not in Latino-Gothic. Now then, since you tie up your “stitchwork” from the Gospel (for that is your word for it) with “older is better,” I admit that the eloquence of the earliest fathers is better than the stammering of the moderns; so you see that this “stitchwork” of yours, which I see you were marvelously proud of, emphatically strengthens Erasmus’s position and recoils on you.<sup>251</sup>

<sup>246</sup> See Jerome, Commentarii in Aggaeum 2 (PL 25: 1416). <sup>247</sup> with open arms: Adages 1854 (CWE 34: 111) <sup>248</sup> Lk 5:39

<sup>249</sup> See Augustine, De doctrina Christiana 3.29.40, 4.6.9, 4.7.11–13 (PL 34: 80–81).

<sup>250</sup> eloquence . . . eloquent: See Aristotle, Rhetoric 3.4 (1404b1–3).

Of the same stripe is what you regard as a cute little joke aimed at his work on Jerome: “You have spoiled the wine for us by watering it down.”<sup>252</sup> When he purifies Jerome’s works of so many corruptions, when he restores the true reading in so many passages, is this spoiling the wine for you by watering it down? Then why drink it diluted, since you can still get your old vinegar which, to a sick palate, tastes like pure wine? But as for determining what is genuine in that author’s works, since the matter depends largely on considerations of style, I will certainly not hold it against you if you fail to see the reasons for Erasmus’s verdict even when he points them out with his finger.

But then, since you wanted to show that Greek learning is not as necessary for the true understanding of Scripture as some think it is and that there was no need for the work that Erasmus devoted to retranslating the New Testament from Greek, you propose as a solid foundation the thesis that “those holy fathers,” in your words, “Hilary and Augustine, asserted that the Septuagint version was sufficient<sup>253</sup> according to every criterion of scriptural truth; and indeed, if that were not sufficient,” you say, “we also have the edition of Jerome, which all tongues rightly ought to acclaim, and we have many others which are both famous and likewise learned, and yet for some reason all these are supposed to be useless unless we add such a rendering as this one by an upstart translator.”

See here, from the moment I saw you take up this particular task, since I knew you could never have learned what you needed to know to support your own case, I had no doubt that, even if you could blurt out a few general arguments, just as soon as you got down to the specific ones that you ought to use to defend your own claims and refute the opposing ones, you would show how inadequately prepared you were for the business at hand. In the name of your faith I beseech you: since you have so many both famous and learned editions and so many translations of the New Testament that there is no need for the one by Erasmus, why are you keeping this priceless treasure all to yourself? I for one am not unaware that there were many of them long ago, and that Augustine professes that they were most useful, and yet I do not find anyone today who professes to have ever seen any apart from the Vulgate. Valla made useful notes on some passages, but he did not translate. Erasmus published those notes; someone else who himself had decided to discuss the same subject might well not have done so. Lefèvre d’Etaples has translated the Pauline epistles and not the whole Testament. Thus you have yet to exhibit those other translations besides the Septuagint and that of Jerome which are so famous and learned that we should accept them and throw away that of Erasmus.

Now Jerome, whose translation you say that you have, never made one, if you take his word for it; rather, he took what he saw was at that time the most current version and emended it according to trustworthy Greek texts. This is adequately established by his letter, “You compel me to make a new work out of an old one,”<sup>254</sup> for whoever can understand that letter adequately, Jerome’s work was spoiled by the same agents of blight that now threaten that of Erasmus, the ignorance and the envy of those he endeavored to benefit. Certainly in the edition which is now chanted in churches there is hardly a trace of Jerome’s work; indeed, you can still see the very corruptions that he thought should be emended, some of which Erasmus has mentioned in passing in his notes. I am very surprised you never noticed this fact; if you had, then your judgment concerning these facts might have been somewhat sounder. Do not cry out about how the whole Church has sanctioned this translation for so many centuries. It read this one only because this was either the best one it had or (which I think more likely) the first — once this version was generally adopted it would certainly not have been easy to replace it even if someone submitted a better one — but the Church never sanctioned this version: to read and to sanction are not the same thing. On the other hand, it is quite certain that virtually every student of Sacred Scripture who has achieved any competence in both Latin and Greek has found many inadequacies in that translator. And yet he deserves pardon for failing to do what he could not do, even as he deserves thanks for doing all that he could, the same thanks that we owe to whoever adds something that this translator lacks or restores something that someone else garbled. But meanwhile you see that the edition prepared by Jerome which you say that you have, the edition “which all tongues rightly ought to acclaim,” is a version which no tongue reads today.

251 recoils on you: See Adages 3588 (CWE 36: 272–73). 252 Adages 1196 (CWE

33: 126–27) 253 See Hilary, Tractatus in II Psalmum 2 (PL 9: 262–63).

254 PL 29: 528

But you write that the Septuagint version, at least, is sufficient according to every criterion of scriptural truth, and lest anyone should dare to oppose that assertion you bring in as its champions the opinions of the holy fathers Hilary and Augustine. What shall I do? Where shall I turn?<sup>255</sup> I dare not deny what the holiest fathers affirm, but as soon as I grant that whatever Erasmus has recently translated was translated well enough long ago by the Septuagint translators, I must also confess that it was far less useful for Erasmus to translate it again. What if I stall for the time being by denying that those fathers make the assertion you assert that they made? And I will certainly do so until you show me where they have made it. Look to it, then: bring me a passage where they say that the Septuagint translators produced a satisfactory Latin version of the New Testament. But for the time being, while you look around for that passage, I can assume that on this point, at least, you will leave me in peace. And that passage, I think, will not be at all easy to find, since I hear that the Septuagint translators made only one version — in Greek. Now if that is the case, how can their version be sufficient for Latin speakers? And indeed you must also look around for an explanation of how the Septuagint translators could produce a sufficient version of the New Testament when we know that they all died approximately two hundred years before the birth of Christ.<sup>256</sup> When you discover that these are the facts, I am sure you will also discover that the people whose word you have taken up to now concerning these issues have not, up to now, discovered one bit of the truth.

Now I come to what you call his petty and futile remarks, those you thought were uncommonly trifling and therefore transcribed as examples to make it clear to everyone that Erasmus is wasting his energies and filling “whole sheaves,” in your words, with sheer nonsense. First you criticize his objection to the reading sagena<sup>257</sup> in Matthew 13, where he would prefer to read verriculum, even though, as you put it, “sagena and verriculum signify the same thing.” I am sure you think you have said something very impressive, but first prove that Erasmus objected to the term sagena. He does not criticize this term, though he prefers the other one; he merely says that the translator left the Greek expression. “But verriculum and sagena mean the same thing,” you say. Who denies it? Who needs to be told? But as you could have learned from Erasmus’s note, sagena is a Greek expression while verriculum is Latin; they are as distinct as decretum and psephisma [“decree”]. Even you cannot automatically think that whoever prefers to use Latin terms rather than Greek in a Latin translation from Greek is just trifling. But perhaps you will assert that the term sagena is also found in Latin authors. What of it? A Greek term does not stop being Greek and immediately start being Latin as soon as some speaker of Latin employs it among Latin terms. No one has the power to confer Roman citizenship on all terms, by Jove, any more than on all human beings. Nor is psephisma a Latin word, even though Cicero himself employed it once or twice,<sup>258</sup> nor does energia [force or import] stop being Greek even if Jerome did employ it occasionally in Latin,<sup>259</sup> whether because he was writing to people he knew to have been trained in Greek or perhaps because he could find no Latin expression that conveyed well enough (if I may say so) τὴν τῆς ἐνεργείας ἐνέργειαν [the import of import]. But in clumsy imitation of Jerome you repeatedly employ that word with an incorrect meaning. So you see that when you try to fish up something to criticize as you haul in sagena and seize on verriculum, this sweep of the net nets you nothing at all.

You go on to find fault with his opinion that Nuptiae impletae sunt discumbentium [The wed-

255 What... turn?: See Terence, Hecyra 516. 256 According to tradition, Ptolemy II of Egypt commissioned seventy Jewish scholars to translate the Hebrew Old Testament into Greek for his library of Alexandria in the third century BC.

257 “fishnet” 258 See Cicero, Oratorio pro L. Flacco 6.15, 7.17, 8.19, 10.23.

259 See Jerome, Epistolae 53.2 (PL 22: 541), Dialogus contra Pelagiones 1.8 (PL 23: 524c).

ding feast was full of guests] is not very good Latin, where he asserts we should read discumbentibus [filled with guests], and then (by all that is holy!) you set out to lecture Erasmus on grammar. Then 5 you drag in Calepino, as if Erasmus were not ten times as trustworthy as Calepino on matters of good Latin speech. And then it is especially funny that after citing Calepino you produce nothing but what you have borrowed from Erasmus himself.
 10 You left out just one point, though that one should have taught you that all you had said comes to nothing at all. For after he briefly indicated that impleor is used with both the genitive and the ablative and provided the same examples that you do, he sums 15 up the matter by saying that though it is possible to say in good Latin implentur vini [They are full of wine], this phrase is not good Latin: domus impletur hominum [The house is full of people]. Now go out and look for examples which contradict that.

20 Now when he judged that the translation of the Lord's prayer in Matthew 6 should read remitte nobis debita nostra [forgive us our debts] instead of dimitte [pardon], you judge this to be such an obvious instance of trifling that none can deny it, and 25 you think you infer this from Erasmus's own words. For "if ἄφεσις [pardon] has multiple meanings, as Erasmus himself noted," you say, "how can he prefer the translation remitte to dimitte when that Greek expression serves for both, while indeed dimitto, 30 which according to ancient authors means do or dono [I give or I present], conveys well enough the same meaning?" Here you ought to produce those ancient authors according to whom you found that dimittere is the same thing as dare. For unless you 35 produce them, and I think you will not, you yourself are obviously trifling. I for one do not think it is good Latin to say dimitte mihi vestem [pardon me a coat] for da mihi vestem [give me a coat]. Further, even if dimittere did mean the same thing as dare, 40 I still do not concede that the phrase dimitte nobis debita nostra is good Latin, any more than this other one on the basis of which you defend it: da nobis debita nostra [give us our debts]. If to your ears dare debita sounds the same as remittere debita, your dis-
 45 ease is one I cannot cure. "But," you say, "what difference does it make? For the sense is as clear with that translator's dimitte as with this one's remitte."

Who denies we can guess what sense he has in mind? Even so, it does not follow that his phrasing is sufficiently good Latin, nor is it trifling for some-50 one to indicate what he got wrong; but it is trifling to contradict someone who is indicating the truth. And if Erasmus is trifling, he is certainly trifling in a more decent way since he does so in the company of 55 Cyprian, one of the holiest doctors of the Church, who preferred to say remitte nobis debita instead of dimitte.<sup>260</sup>

You say, "It showed enormous and dangerous temerity for this fellow to go against the judgment of all the ancient fathers in changing such a well-60 established word in the first chapter of John, where he puts sermo [Speech] in place of verbum [the Word]." Here you assume, as if it could be taken for granted, the utterly false thesis that none of the 65 ancients dared to say sermo in place of verbum. But meanwhile you admit that, according to Jerome, λόγος has other meanings besides verbum<sup>261</sup> which are quite appropriate for the Son of God, testimony confirmed by Gregory of Nazianzus, who goes so
 70 far as to assert that the Son of God was called λόγος not only because he is Speech and the Word but also because he is Reason and Wisdom,<sup>262</sup> not to mention the other meanings of λόγος, as if the evangelist, according to God's own intention, chose that 75 word because it embraced many meanings each of which can appropriately be applied to the Son of almighty God. I myself would go so far as to say that if any word should be so revered as to be kept in its original form, as we have done with χῦριε ἐλέησον, "Alleluia," "Amen," and "Osanna," words which we 80 have retained in their original unaltered form, then this utterance logos would seem to have had the best possible claim to such reverence. And since it is wonderfully rich in holy meanings, out of which it is not at all easy to choose which you ought to 85 prefer to the others, it would have been not imprudent to retain that very word, without setting a tendentious precedent, and indeed to include many of Christ's epithets in one two-syllable word. But since translators have actually thought it best to do other-90 wise, I for one think that the next-best procedure is for them to translate it variously so that none of the meanings of λόγος appropriate for Christ goes unknown or falls into disuse.

260 See Cyprian, De oratione dominica 22–23 (PL 4: 552–53). 261 See Jerome,

Epistolae 53.4 (PL 22: 543). 262 See Gregory of Nazianzus, Orationes 30.20

(PG 36: 130).

But Jerome did not dare to change verbum: how very surprising that he did not change it when he had no occasion to do so! For I ask you, why would he have changed it, since he was not making an entirely new translation but correcting one that already existed? But if he had taken it upon himself to translate the Gospel all over again, he would not have felt so constrained by the precedent of the ancient translator as to think he could not take the liberty of translating differently, provided that he translated well, even if his predecessor did not translate badly. It was for this very reason that he indicated that λόγος has other meanings besides verbum which could rightly be referred to the Son of God: he wanted to demonstrate just what you deny, namely that λόγος could rightly have been translated in other ways than “verbum.” For the translations sermo and verbum are used almost interchangeably in Scripture wherever the Greek text has λόγος, although no one who knows any Greek does not know that sermo is the meaning of λόγος much more often than verbum.

But you bring up a reason (good lord, what a reason!) for saying that the Son of God is more rightly called verbum than sermo. For sermo, you say, “properly speaking, is rather that which is expressed with the voice, whereas verbum is that which is inwardly conceived by the mind, namely the thought which is still confined in the silence of the soul, in the privacy of personal knowledge; and if it is ever released to the world, it still becomes public in such a way as to remain permanently closed up within.” I ask you, who taught you this distinction between sermo and verbum? For the author from whom you have excerpted the remarks you adduce about verbum does not deny that the same may be said about sermo, and no one fails to see that there is internal mental speech by the same reasoning according to which there is an internal word, or that verbum properly means that which is expressed with the voice, just as sermo does, since those who examine the origins of words hold that verbum is derived from aere verberando [striking the air]. But if sermo as well as verbum can mean an unspoken conception of the mind, whereas verbum as well as sermo can mean conceptions expressed with the voice, you see how that remarkable reasoning collapses which you thought gave you such fine support.

And yet I myself certainly do not assign much importance to reasoning in these matters, which cannot be known except by divine revelation. I am certain that the Son of God is rightly called λόγος, whether it is understood to mean verbum or sermo or ratio or causa or anything else λόγος means, or indeed all it means. Once again, I am certain that he is rightly called λόγος, for I learned this from him who reclined on the breast of the Lord at the Supper,<sup>263</sup> and I know that the Son of God is rightly called sermo and verbum, for the whole Catholic Church addresses him by these names. Several learned and holy fathers call him ratio, as well, but the whole Roman Church calls him verbum and sermo, without any exception. For when it celebrates the birth of Christ with this solemn chant, “When all things dwelt in the midst of silence and the night was in the midst of her course, your almighty Speech, O Lord, leapt forth from heaven and came from its royal throne,”<sup>264</sup> the Son of God is unambiguously called “Speech”; and where we read in the psalm, “By the Word of God the heavens were made firm,”<sup>265</sup> whereas others read, and among them Augustine, “By the Speech of God the heavens were made solid,”<sup>266</sup> the Son of God is undoubtedly what is meant by both readings. For Ambrose contradicts you when he says, “For the evangelist did not say, ‘In the beginning the Word came to be,’ but ‘In the beginning,’ he said, ‘was the Word.’ Anyone who would attempt to assign a beginning to the Word will be checked by this precedent, since he said, ‘In the beginning it was’; not that we should speak of two principles arising from a difference of substance, but because Speech the Son is always with the Father and was born of the Father.”<sup>267</sup> Hilary makes the same point when he says, “This Word was in the beginning with God, because the speech of thought is eternal when the thinker is eternal.”<sup>268</sup> Lactantius makes the same point in these words: “Then how did he beget him? First of all, no man can either understand or explain the works of God. Nonetheless Sacred Scripture teaches us this much; in them it is explicitly stated that that Son of God is the Speech of God.” He also says elsewhere, “But the Greek term λόγος is more suitable than our ‘word’ or ‘speech.’

263 St. John the Evangelist; see Jn 13:23–25, 21:20. 264 an introit based on Ws 18:15 265 Ps 32(33):6 266 Augustine,

Enarratio in Psalmum 32 (PL 36: 286) 267 Ambrose, De fide orthodoxa contra

Arianos (PL 17: 554) 268 Hilary, De Trinitate 2.15 (PL 10: 61)

For λόγος means both ‘speech’ and ‘reason.’<sup>269</sup> Cyprian makes the same point in these words from the chapter he entitled “That this same Christ is the Speech of God,” which he proves with the following words:

In Psalm 44, “My heart has brought forth a good Speech; I will tell of my works to the King.”<sup>270</sup> Likewise in the psalm, “By the Speech of God the heavens were made firm, and all their strength by the breath of his mouth.”<sup>271</sup> Likewise in Isaiah, “ratifying and consummating his Word in justice, for God will consummate his Speech throughout the earth.” Likewise in the psalm, “He sent forth his Speech and it healed them.”<sup>272</sup> Likewise in the Gospel according to John, “In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and God was the Word; this was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him, and of the things that were made nothing was made without him. In him was life, and the life was the light of men, and the light shines in the darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not.”<sup>273</sup> Likewise in the Apocalypse, “And I saw heaven opened, and behold! a white horse; and he that sat upon him was called faithful and true, in fairness and justice judging and making war. And he was clothed in a garment besprinkled with blood; and his name is called the speech of God.”<sup>274</sup>

Augustine makes the same point when he takes as the principal basis for his commentary that translation of the Psalter which reads, “By the Speech of God the heavens were made solid.” Nor does he disapprove of that reading; instead, he asserts that it has the same import as our reading, “By the Word of God the heavens were made firm,” while he manifestly thinks that both verbum in this translation and sermo in that one are the Son of God. There is also, in the fourth chapter of Hebrews, “For the Speech of God is alive,”<sup>275</sup> a passage in which not only the Glossa interlinearis but also the Glossa ordinaria declare plainly that Speech is the Son. Indeed, even de Lyra, who proposed to explain the literal sense of Scripture, clearly teaches that sermo means the same thing as verbum and that in this passage Speech is nothing else but the Son of God, and in this way he himself expounds the passage not according to any allegory but quite “literally” as we use that term.

But since you must acknowledge those proof-texts, and you cannot refute them, it is worth seeing the fine way you attempt to evade them. For you say, “There is a great deal of difference between what is fitting in various contexts: what is suitable in one is less appropriate in another. But I do not want to spend too much time on this subject lest you think I am drafting a book, not a letter.” What a graceful retreat! Under pretext of brevity you refuse to support your own statement, indeed that very statement on which your whole argument depends, and yet not even then do you actually finish your letter. Instead, you go on to waste more paper still on matters that are not at all to the point. I am certain about this much: even if you rack your brains for a year you will never find any support for your case besides that single point you have already mentioned—indeed, barely touched on, as if you yourself found it flimsy—namely, that sermo means that which is expressed with the voice and not an unspoken conception of the mind. But if you had any sense you would not have touched this point at all, since it is just as inimical to verbum as it is to sermo. For verbum, too, properly speaking, means a concept expressed with the voice. But there can be no other support for your case. For if both sermo and verbum can mean the Son of God not only as he was after his mother gave birth to him but also as he was in the bosom of the Father<sup>276</sup> before he took on fleshly form, before the world was even created, what rationale can you make up for saying that any consideration of what you call contextual appropriateness prevents us from calling the Son of God sermo in this passage as well as in others? When Cyprian proves against the Jews that the Son of God is the Speech of God, not only from other texts but also from that very text “In the beginning was the Word,” do you not see that he would not be proving anything at all unless Speech and the Word were the same thing in that very passage? But to silence you once and for all, Cyprian not only cites the passage in this way; a bit later he cites it in these very words: “In the beginning was Speech, and Speech was with God, and God was Speech.”<sup>277</sup> Now go on and call Erasmus an innovator of words, since you hear that

269 Lactantius, Divinae institutionem 4.8, 9 (PL 6: 467, 469) 270 Ps 44(45):1 271 Ps 32(33):6 272 Ps 106(107):20

273 Jn 1:1–5 274 Cyprian, Testimonia adversus Iudaeus 2.3 (PL 4: 726); Rv 19:11–13 275 Heb 4:12 276 Jn 1:18

277 Jn 1:11; Cyprian, Testimonia adversus Iudaeus 2.3 (PL 4: 726, 730)

a most learned father and a most holy champion of Christ read and used the name sermo for the Word of God, for whom he shed his blood, more than a thousand years before Erasmus was born. And on this point Saint Augustine in his commentary on John very plainly concurs with Saint Cyprian.<sup>278</sup>

Now you say it suffices to confirm your own case that for so many centuries, with the consensus of all the saints, Holy Mother Church has religiously used the term verbum, but you must figure out for yourself how that fact can confirm your position. It certainly does not hurt Erasmus; more than that, it even supports and defends what he has done. For he is not criticizing verbum when he translates sermo, any more than the old translator is condemning and censuring sermo when he translates verbum, or indeed any more than the Church condemned sermo when it retained verbum in regular usage, in which it retained and still does retain sermo, as well. Thus when he translates sermo Erasmus neither contradicts the Church nor finds fault with the old translator. Then again, when he translates sermo as a way of referring to Christ, why should it not also suffice to confirm his case that—as you yourself wrote about verbum—for so many centuries, with the consensus of all the saints and doctors, Holy Mother Church has religiously used the term sermo? Will anyone forbid a translator to employ whichever he likes of two terms which denote the same thing? Can anyone justly indict a new translator for rendering as “wife” what the previous one called a “spouse”?

“Yes indeed,” you say, “since he disturbs the simple common folk with the less familiar term. And so you see where the work of this fellow Erasmus is headed—at starting a schism and fostering vain quarrels.” Pray tell, is it really he who disturbs the simple common folk, who would never give a thought to what he writes if it were not for the envy inciting a few? For like another Cain, these men, their countenances falling when they see how the smoke from their brother’s burnt offering rises while theirs is brought low,<sup>279</sup> try their hardest to murder a man who is innocent. They use impious slanders to combat the recognized truth and seditious outcries to provoke simple people, whom they either could have kept calm just by not speaking out or at least should have soothed with the truth after stirring them up with their falsehoods. Otherwise, if those fellows see that they cannot defend their position to intelligent people and so cry out to the unlearned crowd against works that Erasmus addressed to the learned, if they tactlessly force literary debates on illiterate hearers and court the applause of the crowd because they cannot please the discerning, it is they who are stirring up schism. Otherwise, had they either said nothing of these matters to the crowd or at any rate spoken the truth, there would be no schism. For why should it start a schism if different translators employ different words when the words mean the same? On this point I can use against you the very saying you borrowed from Ambrose to hurl at Erasmus: “In my view there is no difference in wording where there is no difference in sense.”<sup>280</sup>

But you are afraid that on this basis we will soon have innumerable editions, since you say that “the world contains not a few people who are equal or indeed superior to Erasmus in their knowledge of Greek.” I do not know what number makes more than a few by your reckoning, but I have no doubt that if you start to count them by name you will find that his equals number less than a few and his superiors perhaps less than one. If you add the study of Sacred Scripture, without which even the greatest linguistic expertise will be unequal to this undertaking, I for one have no doubt that the work of Erasmus will easily ensure that not many hereafter will translate the same texts again. For though some people may well appear who believe that in one or two passages, perhaps, they have understood something more clearly than he did, I do not expect that there will ever be anyone either learned or reckless enough to hope he could do something worthwhile by retranslating a whole work that Erasmus had already translated.

But suppose that there were many editions; what harm would there be in that? Saint Augustine regards as exceedingly useful the very thing you are afraid of, for though not all of the translators could be equally good, there are places where each of them translates more aptly. “But meanwhile,” you say, “the reader will be rendered uncertain as to which one of so many translations he ought to trust most.” That is undoubtedly true if the reader is simply a blockhead without any intelligence or judgment of his own. Otherwise, if he does have a mind, he will find it much easier to elicit the true sense out of a variety of translations, as Augustine says.<sup>281</sup> I ask you, why do you fear so much danger from variety and diversity of translations when you do not take any offense as you read such a heterogeneous assortment of commentators who can reach no consensus at all on the sense of the letter where the letter does not vary at all? And yet their disagreements are frequently useful, since they offer the studious a good opportunity to exercise their thought and judgment. Finally, the extent to which various versions are actually a help to the Church, and by no means a source of confusion, is established at least by the Psalms, which are read in translations that vary considerably, nor does anything else prove as helpful to those who endeavor to study them thoroughly, unless anyone is senseless enough to suppose that the commentary of Vienne is sufficient.

278 See In Iohannis evangelium tractatus 108.3 (PL 35: 1915–16) 279 See Gn

4: 4–8. 280 Ambrose, Expositio evangelii secundum Lucam 2.42 (PL 15: 1568)

I had almost omitted one argument which you think is your strongest, though I think it so flimsy and weak that just one breath could blow it down. But since I see that you regard it as the best fortified of all your defenses, I have decided to quote your own words so that you could not blame my report for corrupting your logic. Now then, you say,

I simply never stop marveling at the blindness of the many who think that it is a fine feat to collate any work at all with Greek or Hebrew texts, although anyone can infer from the perfidy of the Jews and the various errors of the Greeks that those very texts of theirs must be shockingly corrupt and laden with all sorts of foul errors. Furthermore, from their excessive antiquity it follows that their texts must be more corrupt than our own, not to mention here Saint Jerome's testimony that even in his day the Latin texts were less corrupt than the Greek, and the Greek than the Hebrew.

I am simply amazed that you never stop marveling at this, since you can easily discern that Saint Jerome met with these same objections long ago and completely refuted them. For first of all, he thinks it is foolish for anyone to believe that a whole people would conspire to tamper with all of the books owned by everyone. For not to mention the other difficulties in this scheme, they could have no hope at all of concealing their actions for good, nor could they doubt that as soon as the scheme was revealed they would seem to have lost their case<sup>282</sup> through their own testimony, since it would be clear that the position that they had supported was one they confessed they could defend only by corrupting their texts. But I think even you see that something done publicly by a whole people could not be kept secret. Indeed, I think you also see that, since every day some people defected from the Hebrews to the Christians, and as many from the Greeks to the Latins, that falsification of books would have been brought to light immediately. Furthermore, since books in both languages were not only in the possession of the unfaithful but also at large in the hands of the orthodox, either the orthodox too would have had to corrupt their own texts as a favor to the unfaithful or else the trustworthy texts of the orthodox would have clearly established the falseness of the others. What of this? On the points we dispute with the Greeks or with the Hebrews, their texts agree with the Latin; the debate never turned on the letter but always on its sense and significance. Thus you can easily conclude that they did not try to alter their books in other passages where it would not matter, since they left them intact even where it would have been most advantageous to alter them.

But "our texts are more trustworthy than Greek ones," you say. Then why does Augustine advise that wherever you have any doubt about the Latin texts you should turn to the Greek? But you would rather side with Jerome, who according to you writes that even in his time the Greek texts were more trustworthy than the Hebrew, and the Latin than the Greek.

The rest of the arguments you had gathered certainly looked very easy to deal with, but I confess that in reading this one I felt somewhat perturbed. For Jerome is an author I always take seriously, and on this point I properly take him most seriously of all. And if he confessed that the books of the Greeks were less corrupt than those of the Hebrews and also that Latin books were less corrupt than the Greek, others might well have found some way out;<sup>283</sup> I myself saw no way to escape.

But then, as I reflected, it started to strike me as perfectly amazing that Jerome should have held such an opinion. For I knew he could not have said anything more opposed to his own undertaking.

<sup>281</sup> See De doctrina Christiana 2.12.17–18, 2.14.21 (PL 34: 43, 45–46).

<sup>282</sup> lost their case: See Cicero, De oratore 1.36.166–67.

<sup>283</sup> found... out: Adages 2175 (CWE 34: 253)

No passage occurred to me where he said this, and I thought it more likely that he would never have said it anywhere. Thinking harder about it, I finally began to remember, as if through a fog,<sup>284</sup> that I had

5 once read something of the sort in the book of pontifical decretals. I snatched up the book in the hope I could prove you mistaken, since I was practically sure that that book was the source of your quotation, and I hoped you had got it wrong.

10 When I found the passage, I simply lost heart, indeed I practically abandoned all hope, since I found that a gloss in that work said the same thing that you do. For although I was not so intimidated by the learning of whoever produced this commentary

15 that I had no hope of his stumbling occasionally in citing Jerome, I was still overawed by the great diligence that I was convinced must have been brought to bear to ensure that that holy volume of decretals, which inexorably lays down the law for the whole

20 world, would not include anything at all that had not been correctly understood. Nonetheless, I was drawn toward a different conclusion by my respect for Jerome's prudence, since I simply knew he could not be so stupid that even after he had noted the

25 faults of the Greek texts and had chosen to correct the Old Testament according to the true Hebrew readings, and even after he had chosen to emend the corruptions that had appeared in Latin texts of the 30 New Testament on the basis of their Greek originals, he would still admit that the Greek texts are more trustworthy than the Hebrew, and the Latin than the Greek. For what could be said or conceived to undermine his own project more thoroughly?

As I thought these things over I eventually

35 started to feel more dubious about the diligence that went into the gloss than about Jerome's prudence. So I turned to the passage, which is at the end of the letter that begins with the words Desiderii mei. Good lord, what a disgraceful mistake I saw that the author of that gloss had made! For in Jerome the passage reads thus: "It is another matter if as against their own position they have accepted the forms of the text which are subsequently at-

40 tested by the apostles, and if Latin texts are less corrupt than the Greek and the Greek than the Hebrew."<sup>285</sup> For after anticipating the objections that he thought his opponents would make, he finally indicated that if anyone were so signally foolish as to think the Greek texts more trustworthy than the Hebrew, and the Latin than the Greek, he would

50 not deserve any response. But that author of yours, not understanding this figure of speech, lopped off a few words which establish the whole point of the sentence and then cited the rest as a basis for saying that Jerome himself said what he actually thought

55 no one foolish enough to say, namely just what this author of yours says. Now go on and rely on those summary textbooks of yours, on which most now rely so heavily that the authors despoiled by your modern compilers to fill out their summaries are regarded as almost superfluous.

Having bravely concluded your siege of his translation and notes—his acropolis, as it were—you attack several of his smaller towns, as if greedy for plunder. You strike hardest of all at his Moria ["Folly"], an ample and populous city, but one

65 which you hope can be taken without difficulty since it has a woman in charge,<sup>286</sup> and since she is not one to defer to her generals but always directs things according to whim and caprice. But listen

70 here, you, I predict that in this undertaking her bastions will not be as easy to take as you think. For first of all, as Solomon says, "The number of fools is infinite,"<sup>287</sup> and then what they are lacking in intelligence they make up for in recklessness.<sup>288</sup> Though

75 they would gladly admit you as a citizen if you yearn to become one, they will certainly never agree to have you as a conqueror, for they will fight to the death before they will take orders from anyone.

But joking aside, even Folly herself has less

80 folly to offer,<sup>289</sup> as well as more piety, than some of your—I will restrain myself, and yet I will dare to say this much—than some of the rhythmical prayers with which some of your brethren suppose they put all of the saints in their debt every time

85 that they honor their memory with such foolish jingles that not even a rogue trying his hardest to mock them could muster more foolish ones. And yet some of this trifling stuff has now found a place in our churches, and each day it acquires more au-

90 thority, particularly when it is provided with a musical accompaniment, so that by now we are much less attentive to the sober and serious prayers holy fathers prescribed long ago. In fact it would be a considerable advantage for Christendom if bishops would utterly ban all such silliness, as I am sure they eventually will, so that our subtle foe cannot cause Christ's flock, whom he meant to be not only simple but prudent as well, to slip gradually into the habit of embracing folly in place of piety.

<sup>284</sup> through a fog: Adages 263 (CWE 31: 287–88) <sup>285</sup> PL 28: 152 <sup>286</sup> a woman

in charge: Adages 1481 (CWE 33: 176–77) <sup>287</sup> Eccl 1: 15 <sup>288</sup> See Praise of Folly (ASD

4/3: 96). <sup>289</sup> See Praise of Folly (ASD 4/3: 68).

I will not undertake the defense of the Folly, since there is no need. For the book has long had the approval of all the best judges, and it was defended long ago against the aspersions of envious people in Erasmus's apology to Dorp, a man of great learning in both secular and sacred disciplines, who had taken the part of those critics by gathering up every objection that they could contrive and had even gone on to develop them eloquently in an effort to show that he meant what he said, so that you would now be hard pressed to raise any objection that has not been confuted already, though you have found one charge that is utterly new when you say that Erasmus in the Folly is acting like someone called Moscus. This reproach I confess I for one cannot answer, since I have no idea what it means, or who that Moscus was, and I am not such an arrogant fool as to make a deliberate pretense of being more learned than I am. I have often heard of someone called Momus,<sup>290</sup> who might have had Moscus as a surname, but I personally cannot confirm it.

I have never been particularly keen to learn who wrote the dialogue Julius<sup>291</sup> or what sort of production it is, though I have heard various opinions on both points. I do know that right after Julius's death the affair was the subject of public skits in Paris. Many know that the Reverend Father Poncher,<sup>292</sup> bishop of the city of Paris, declared, when he came here as an ambassador, that the book was by Fausto.<sup>293</sup> But this theory, should it be true, by no means rules out the possibility that Erasmus also had the book in his possession before it was in print, since Fausto is not a complete stranger to him. But when you base your argument on the style, which you claim is distinctly and purely Erasmian, I cannot refrain from a laugh at the thought that, while you will not let Erasmus base any of his judgments concerning the works of Jerome on their style, even though everyone knows that Erasmus is a consummate expert on fine points of language, you yourself are so arrogant that, without even knowing the meaning of style or of diction, you single things out as his work on the basis of style even though there are so many learned people intent upon writing just like him. Now suppose that he did write the book. Suppose that a man who was fed up with war and provoked by the turbulent times did let some passion carry him further than he might have wished after peace was achieved and emotions were soothed. First, most of the blame should then go to the people responsible for the untimely publication of a once timely book. Then I ask you, was this really your job as a monk, to expose a mistake in your brother, when your office enjoins you to sit by yourself and lament your own sins, not denounce other people's? And I think that assigning the book to Erasmus will win you no thanks among those whom it may have offended, since it would be better for them if the work remained anonymous than if it were commended by being ascribed a prestigious author.

Those with leisure to do so may assess Luther's writings for themselves, but I have no doubt at all that if Erasmus has written to Luther he wrote in a way that befits a good man. Nor do you yourself claim to have any real proof, and yet you cannot wait till you do to launch into abuse, doubtless simply in order to get all the pleasure you can from that splendid bon mot, "The pot matches the lid,"<sup>294</sup> which appears to have furnished your only incentive for mentioning Erasmus together with Luther. For it is remarkable how you never stop trying to pass for a wit. But what I find amazing is the inordinate quantity of leisure you are free to devote to schismatic and heretical books—if, that is, you are telling the truth—unless a shortage of good ones compels you to spend the short time you do have on the worst ones. For if those books are good, why condemn them? If bad, then why read them? For since you will never be in an appropriate position to lecture the world on combating erroneous beliefs, since you even forswore any care for the world when you entered the cloister, what else do you accomplish by reading false doctrines but to learn them?

Nor will you be content, as I see, just to squander good hours on bad books; you must go on to fritter away a great deal of time speaking and chatting on themes even worse than bad books. For I see every rumor and slander and scandal on earth

<sup>290</sup> See Adages 473 (CWE 31: 448–50).

<sup>291</sup> Iulius exclusus e coelo <sup>292</sup> Etienne

Poncher (d. 1525) <sup>293</sup> Fausto Andrelini of Forli (ca. 1412–1518) <sup>294</sup> Adages 972

(CWE 32: 265–66)

is immediately passed on to you in your cell. And yet we read that once there were monks who withdrew from the world so completely that they would not even read letters from their friends so that they would not have to look back on the Sodom<sup>295</sup> which they had abandoned.<sup>296</sup> Now, however, I see that they read both heretical and schismatic books and vast volumes of absolute rubbish. Now our subtle foe thrusts on the fugitives just the sort of vain talk that they feared among secular people and cloistered themselves to escape, and he artfully thrusts it into their very cells. Nor does their splendid regimen serve any purpose but to help them deceive the unwary, nor does their leisure serve but to give them more time to perfect their disparaging speech, nor does their withdrawal from the world serve but to make them shameless because men cannot see what they do, nor does the narrowness of their little cells serve but to lend freer scope to their slander of others. And yet the first thing that anyone does upon entering those cells is to call on God with the Lord's Prayer to ensure that the talk in that place should be holy and wholesome. But what good does it do to say the Lord's Prayer at the outset of scandalous and slanderous gossip? If this is not taking God's name in vain, then what is? This is surely the most fitting context of all for that verse from the Gospel you cite against Erasmus, for certainly not everyone who says "Lord, Lord" to God in this way will enter into the kingdom of heaven.<sup>297</sup>

Consequently, as I look at this letter of yours, so replete with reproach, abuse, slander, and mockery, and as I think back on the candor and the genuinely amiable nature you had as a youth, when you were as free from these faults as it would have been easy to pardon them in one of that age and condition, if I gauged your whole character on the basis of this letter I would certainly be reminded of that poem by Ovid in which Deianira chides Hercules: "Your beginning surpassed your finale; your performance falls short of your promise; the grown man is no match for the boy."<sup>298</sup> But of course I am not so unfair as to judge you entirely on the basis of a single letter. Indeed, I am more willingly inclined to believe that the goodness and holiness of the rest of your character have made some demon especially resentful and envious of your virtues and that, since you are avoiding the rest of his snares, he is insidiously trying his hardest to trap you and draw you to himself with his last and by far most insidious snare, when he transforms himself into an angel of light,<sup>299</sup> dazzling our vision till we see without seeing and to our deranged eyes black looks white and white black,<sup>300</sup> others' virtue seems tarnished, and our own faults impress us as glamorous and appealing. Then we call defamation of character fraternal advice; we regard anger and envy as fervor and zeal to serve God; we name ignorance simple and saintly rusticity, and call arrogant stubbornness bold and invincible constancy; and in sum, we are never without an altruistic pretext for indulging our own passions, and generally the worst passions at that, just as in this very letter, while pretending to give me advice, you disparage Erasmus.

Yet not one of the bitter reproaches you hurl at him actually strikes home, whereas many of them promptly recoil on you.<sup>301</sup> You protest that his style is affected, when your own solecisms are more labored than his refinements. You attack him for his mordant wit and cry out that he sinks his fangs into everything, when you yourself sink more teeth into him in one letter than he ever sank into anyone. In fact, if someone went through all the books of Erasmus, all his letters, every variety of writing he has ever produced in the course of producing such numerous volumes, and if he then gathered in one pile every unkind thing that Erasmus ever wrote about anyone, characteristically withholding the names of the people to whom he referred although some deserved much harsher treatment, this whole pile would be dwarfed by the mountainous load of explicitly personal abuse which you heap on Erasmus like a second Great Pyramid, although he never did you the slightest injury, although he even furthered your studies with his writings and thus did you a kindness too great to repay.

You accuse him of arrogance because he dared to challenge the errors of others, and of course you think you are being modest when you find fault with the things he gets right, when you criticize works praised by judges whom only an egregiously immodest man would defy. I could list for you many such men from all over the world, all renowned for their virtue and learning, who vie with each other

295 look . . . Sodom: See Gn 19:17.

296 See John Cassian, De coenobiorum institutis 5,32 (PL 49: 248–49). 297 See

Mt 7:21. 298 Ovid, Heroides 9.23–24

299 when . . . light: See 2 Cor 11:14.

300 black looks . . . black: See Is 5:20;

Ovid, Metamorphoses 11.314; Juvenal 3,30.

301 promptly . . . you: See Adages 3588 (CWE 36: 272–73).

in thanking Erasmus for all they have gained by his work. But I will omit all his foreign admirers, since you will probably dispute their authority because you do not know who they are. I will name one or two of our countrymen whom it would be outright impudence to contradict. I will name, and most worshipfully I will name, the reverend father in Christ, John the bishop of Rochester, a man as conspicuous for his virtue as he is for his learning and as eminent for both as any man living today. I will name Colet, a man both as learned and as holy as any of our countrymen has been for the last several centuries. Quite apart from the letters that these men have sent to Erasmus,<sup>302</sup> in which they might appear to be flattering him somewhat were it not that such men would never choose to tell anyone flattering lies, and especially lies that might harm someone else, there are letters in which these men exhort other people as strongly as possible to a diligent reading of Erasmus's translation, from which they will learn a great deal. Master John Longland, the dean of Salisbury,<sup>303</sup> whose preaching and pure living would make you suppose he was another Colet (to sum up his praise in a word), never stops testifying that Erasmus's works on the New Testament have done more to enlighten him than virtually all the rest of the commentaries he owns. There is no need to list any others if you will trust these men; there is even less if you will not. For whom will you trust on this point if you will not trust men such as these? Either way you take a great deal on yourself when you attack with such fanfare what those men so earnestly praise.

What of this, that the Pope has twice given his explicit sanction to what you attack? Like a boy-prophet of the almighty<sup>304</sup> you proclaim to be harmful what the vicar of Christ, as if with the authority of a divine oracle,<sup>305</sup> has already declared to be useful. What the supreme prince of Christendom honors with his own testimonial from the citadel of our religion you sully with your filthy tongue from the darkness of your little cell, an unlearned, obscure little monk. At this point you yourself should apply the advice that you offer Erasmus: do not be wise beyond your share of wisdom, but be wise with sobriety.<sup>306</sup> Are you not doing precisely what you also charge him with doing, neglecting God's ordinance and setting out to establish your own, when you blithely persist in condemning the very work that the Pope has so often recommended with pious good will to all scholars?

You take as a basic assumption in this condemnation the thesis that Erasmus is utterly ignorant of Scripture — just as you, I suppose, are omniscient — when in fact he has spent almost as many years studying Scripture as you have been living. I am not going to dwell on the possibility that you surpass him in intelligence or diligence. I know this much for sure, and can say so without any slight to your honor at all: you do not surpass him by such a wide margin that you could achieve in a much shorter time something he could not in a much longer one. And yet when he is already growing gray in the study of Scripture, you yourself, a self-tutored young man — indeed one who has never had time to be tutored — are actually immodest enough to lecture an old man as if he were a schoolboy;<sup>307</sup> you actually think you are being very clever when you employ arguments which make it quite clear you have just missed the point.

But you think you have done something especially grand every time that you mock him with patchwork citations from various books of the Bible and when you clown around with the words of Holy Scripture the same way comic parasites play around with their quips. This is not only the most inexcusable game in the world, it is also the easiest. As a case in point, there is a mischievous mimic who recently copied the dress, tone of voice, facial expressions, and gestures of a preaching friar. In the middle of his obscene and ridiculous sermon, which was made up entirely of excerpts from Scripture, he also included an anecdote, just as some friars habitually do, but this anecdote was an indecent story of a friar who seduced and corrupted a housewife. The rogue padded even this disgraceful and sordid tale with so many patchwork citations from Scripture that even when the friar was seducing the adulterous wife, and even when she was being polluted, and even when her husband appeared and discovered the matter, and even when upon this discovery the friar was arrested, and even when upon this arrest both his testicles were cut off, not one word was employed that was not taken directly from the

302 See EE 2: 257–58, 268, 598.

303 (1473–1543), also appointed bishop of Lincoln in 1521

304 Like . . . almighty: See

Lk 1:76.

305 with . . . oracle: See Adages

3980 (CWE 36: 531).

306 See Rm 12:3.

307 lecture . . . schoolboy: See Adages 160

(CWE 31: 199).

text of Scripture, and these excerpts were all applied so aptly to this totally incongruous<sup>308</sup> subject matter that no one, no matter how grave, could refrain from a laugh, even as no one, no matter how giddy, did not feel incensed to behold Sacred Scripture being travestied in this sort of burlesque. And yet there were some present who said it was part of God's own secret plan that, since so many friars had made such an inveterate habit of adulterating God's word,<sup>309</sup> friar-mimics should finally spring up who could outfriar the friars, beat them at their own game, and (as the saying goes) use their own weapons to finish them off.<sup>310</sup> But if it is wrong, and it certainly is, to abuse Sacred Scripture for bawdy amusement, it is still more wrong to abuse it for slandering some other person as you do. Nor does it mitigate the offense that you are writing to someone you know is his friend; indeed, that makes it all the worse. For if you had said these things to someone who hated Erasmus you would merely have alienated someone who was alienated already. But in fact you have done all you could to estrange one of his dearest friends.

Thus, as I already said, when I thought back on the mild, modest nature you had as a youth, it gave me no end of grief and amazement to find out that your greater maturity, in a state of life completely committed not just to humility but to self-abnegation as well, could give rise to this sort of immodesty, which could easily be called something worse. As I ponder in silent amazement what caused this distemper, I sense that the blame lies not only with that common foe at whose covert suggestion, as if from a tainted spring,<sup>311</sup> almost all faults arise, and not only with those accomplices of his who have infected your simplicity with the virulence of their envy; at least some of this poison derives from a certain kind of Scripture which is certainly not new or uncommon to mortals but which has afflicted mankind with more serious evils than any other kind. I refer to that Scripture of covert self-indulgence which makes almost everyone so partial to his own order of existence that he can neither see its faults by himself nor let anyone else point them out to him.

You were blinded with this very Scripture, I see, when your misguided zeal and devotion to religious orders goaded you into speaking ill of a man who deserves very well of everyone in those orders, and never better than when he is doing the very thing you are trying to twist into something hateful and invidious. For you say, "How often he clamors against the holy observances of religious orders, against the devout ceremonies of the religious, against austerity of living, against holy solitude, and, in summary, against everything that is not to be reconciled with his vagabond lifestyle and conduct!" Upon reading these words I could easily tell what sort of spur must be goading you on,<sup>312</sup> namely zeal for your own religious order. I have no doubt at all that there is no good man anywhere who does not feel a great deal of heartfelt esteem for all religious orders, and certainly I myself have always regarded them not only with love but also with the utmost reverence, since it is my custom to honor the poorest man commended by virtue more than anyone distinguished for his riches or admired for an illustrious birth. But even so, just as I want all other mortals to be deeply devoted to you and your orders, as your merits deserve, of course, since I am inclined to believe that the misery of this world is substantially alleviated by your pleading in its behalf (for if one just man's diligent prayer does a great deal of good,<sup>313</sup> how much good must be done by the incessant prayer of so many thousands?), I would similarly hope that not even you would be so inordinately prejudiced in your own favor that if anyone aims any remark at your practices you will try to pervert things well said by the way you report them or to damn things well thought by the tententious way you construe them.

I do not know how his words taste to your diseased palate, but I know this for sure: I have never met anyone yet who interpreted his writings as if he were condemning the devout ceremonies of the religious and not rather those people who abuse them superstitiously or rely on them too recklessly and thus foolishly turn to their own peril a practice not bad in itself. I think not even you will deny that there are too many people of this sort, no matter how partial you are to your fellows. For nothing in the world is too holy for our cunning foe to attempt to corrupt it by some sort of trickery, for

<sup>308</sup> totally incongruous: See Adages 945 (CWE 32: 254). <sup>309</sup> adulterating God's word: 2 Cor 2:17, 4:2 <sup>310</sup> their own...

off: See Adages 51 (CWE 31: 100–101). <sup>311</sup> as if... spring: Adages 56 (CWE 31: 103)

<sup>312</sup> spur... on: See Adages 147 (CWE 31: 189–90). <sup>313</sup> one... good: Js 5:16

since he is God's opposite in everything, he seeks to produce evil from our good in the same way that God procures good from our evil. How many you can find who place far more importance on the ceremonies of their sect than on God's own commands! Do you not find whole orders doing battle with other orders for the sake of their rituals as each works not to be but to seem holier, each relying on its own private ceremonies which are frequently less than essential, while they all share a common position on serious, more meaningful matters just as surely as some men in orders are not very careful to live by it! Into what a variety of factions and how many sectarian movements one order can split! And then what a commotion, what tragic upheavals ensue on account of a different color, or a differently cinctured robe, or some other trivial ceremony that is possibly not altogether contemptible, but is certainly an unworthy pretext for banishing charity! And worst of all, certainly, how many there are who are encouraged by belonging to a religious order to conceive such a lofty self-image that they think they are walking in the heavens or that they themselves, perched on a sunbeam, look down from the heights on the general populace creeping like ants on the ground, and not only on the laity but also on the whole class of priests who live outside the cloister! So true is it that for many of them, nothing is holy apart from what they do themselves.<sup>314</sup>

God showed great foresight when he instituted all things in common;<sup>315</sup> Christ showed as much when he tried to recall mortals again to what is common from what is private.<sup>316</sup> For he perceived that corrupt mortal nature cannot cherish what is private without detriment to what is common, as experience shows in all aspects of life. For not only does everyone love his own plot of land or his own money, not only does everyone cherish his own family or his own set of colleagues, but to the extent that we call anything our own it absorbs our affections and diverts them from the service of the common good. So, too, we prefer our own fast-days to public ones, and so, after we have selected some saint as our own, we often prize this one more than ten better ones just because he is ours while the other saints belong to everyone. Now if anyone challenges anything of this sort, he is not condemning popular piety but rather warning us not to let impiety creep in under some pious pretext. For, though no one would criticize any nation for fostering the cult of some saint when it had a good reason to do so, some will probably feel that his admirers are carrying their piety too far when as a special favor to their own saint they drag the patron saint of an enemy nation from the church and throw him in the mud. But just as rituals of this sort and private ceremonies sometimes work out badly for us, by the same token, I think, they do not always work out well for you; and among many of you, the more exclusively something is yours, the more value you place on it. For this reason many prize their own ceremonies more than those of their religious house, their own house's ceremonies more than those of their order, and whatever is exclusive to their order more than everything that is common to all religious orders, while they prize all that pertains to the religious somewhat more than they do those lowly and humble concerns that are not only not private to them but are common to the whole Christian people, such as those plebeian virtues of faith, hope, charity, fear of God, humility, and others of similar character. Nor is this a new problem: long ago Christ rebuked his chosen people by saying, "Why do even you transgress God's commandments for the sake of your own traditions?"<sup>317</sup>

I am sure that the very people who do such things will deny that they do them. For who is idiotic enough to admit that he prizes his own ceremonies more than God's precepts when he knows that unless he abides by those precepts his own ceremonies are useless? Doubtless they will supply the right answers if asked, but their actions make their words ring false. Put me down for a liar if there are not some wretched fellows in orders at various locations who are so stubborn about keeping silence that you could not pay them enough to make them whisper even discreetly in their cloister walks, while if they are diverted one foot to either side they are not at all coy about thundering out dire abuse. There are some who are afraid that a demon will swoop down and take them directly to hell if they change any item in their customary dress, whereas they feel no qualms about amassing money, opposing their abbot, and often supplanting him. Do you think there are only a few who consider it a foul and extremely lamentable sin if they leave out one line in saying their office, but feel not the least scruple of fear when they often befoul themselves with outrageous and slanderous gossip even longer than their longest prayers? Thus they strain at a gnat as they swallow an elephant whole.<sup>318</sup>

314 nothing... themselves: See Adages 3616 (CWE 36: 289–90); Terence, Adelphoe

98–99. 315 See Lv 19:18. 316 See Jn 13:34–35, 15:12–13; Acts 2:44–46,

4:32–35. 317 Mt 15:3

Certainly there are many more than I would wish who suppose that the very title “religious” exalts them far beyond mortal constraints. But a good number of these people are mad without being particularly wicked, the ones who are so pleasantly deranged that they take every product of their addled brain as if it were divinely inspired and think they have been carried up into the third heaven<sup>319</sup> when they have actually been carried away into the third stage of lunacy. But some are mad in a vastly more dangerous way, those who are so insolently assured of their own saintliness that they not only condemn but completely condemn other mortals compared with themselves, and for practically no other reason but that they themselves cling to their own rituals excessively and superstitiously and glory in their own trivial observances, by which some of them think they are protected even when they gird themselves with this sort of defensive equipment for all kinds of crime.

Indeed I know of a man who was formally one of the religious, and in fact he belonged to the order which is currently thought (rightly so, in my personal opinion) to be the most religious of all. Although he was no longer a novice but had already spent many years in what they call regular observances, and had advanced so far in them that he had even been chosen the head of his monastery, through paying less attention to God’s precepts than to monastic ritual he slipped from one vice to another, finally sinking so low as to plot the most ghastly and unbelievably heinous crime, and indeed not a single crime but one pregnant with many and various crimes, for he planned to join murder and parricide with sacrilege. But since he did not think himself equal to perpetrating all these crimes by himself he recruited some killers and cutthroats to help him. They committed the most monstrous crime of any I have ever seen. They were arrested and thrown into prison. But I do not plan to unfold the whole incident, and I will withhold the names of the guilty to avoid stirring up any forgotten ill will against their guiltless order. To come to the one point that I had in mind in beginning the story, I heard from these villainous killers that whenever they came to the chamber of that would-be man of religion they never discussed plans for their felony before being ushered into his private chapel to kneel in the approved fashion and pray to the Blessed Virgin with a Hail Mary; it was not until these devotions were rightly concluded that they purely and piously rose to commit their unspeakable crime.

And just as the crime I have mentioned was by far the most ghastly of all, so the one I am now going to mention, though it appears to be much more innocuous, actually may have done little less harm, and the harm that it did was undoubtedly much more widespread. There was a certain friar at Coventry who belonged to that group of Franciscans who have not yet been reformed according to the Rule of Saint Francis. This man preached in the city, in the suburbs, and in the neighboring and outlying villages that whoever said the psalter of the Blessed Virgin every day could never be damned. What he said fell upon eager ears<sup>320</sup> and was gladly believed because it opened up such an easy road to heaven.

There was a certain local pastor, a good and learned man, who considered the friar’s words to be foolish but nevertheless looked the other way for a while, reasoning that the business would not lead to any real harm, since the more lavish the people’s devotion to the cult of the Blessed Virgin the more piety they would imbibe from it. But at length, on inspecting his pastoral fold, he discerned that his flock had been gravely infected with that scabrous error, that the very worst people were those who recited that psalter most religiously, and that they did so precisely in order to secure themselves a license to do anything at all, since they thought it a sin to retain any doubts about heaven when so weighty an authority as that friar had dropped out of heaven<sup>321</sup> to promise it to them with so much conviction. Then the pastor began to admonish the people not to put too much faith in reciting that psalter, even if they did it ten times a day. He said they would certainly be acting virtuously if they said it virtuously and did not say it with that assurance which some had already conceived; otherwise they would do better to omit the prayers themselves if they would only omit along with them the various crimes which were being committed more confidently beneath their protection.

318 they strain . . . whole: See Mt 23:24; Adages 869, 2027 (CWE 32: 219, 34:

191–91). 319 carried . . . heaven: See 2 Cor 12:2. 320 eager ears: Tacitus, Historiae 1.1 321 dropped . . . heaven: See Adages 500, 786 (CWE 31: 470, 32: 170–71).

When he spoke these words from his pulpit they fell on completely intolerant ears; he was hissed, shouted down,<sup>322</sup> and reviled on all sides as an enemy of Mary. On another day, the friar ascended the pulpit and took as his text what was obviously a swipe at the rector, “Blessed Virgin, permit me to praise you; give me strength to encounter your foes.”<sup>323</sup> For they say that a certain Scotus<sup>324</sup> employed the same theme to begin the debate on the Blessed Virgin’s immaculate conception at Paris, to which they falsely claim he was brought in an instant from three hundred miles away, as if she needed Scotus to come to her rescue. What need to say more? The friar easily persuaded his partisan hearers that the minister was both fatuous and impious.

At the most tumultuous stage of the incident I myself happened to set out for Coventry to visit my sister there. I had barely gotten off my horse when the question was put to me, too, whether anyone who said the psalter of the Blessed Virgin every day could be damned. I laughed it off as a laughable problem. I was instantly warned that my answer was rash and that it contradicted the preaching of a certain most holy and most learned father. I scorned the whole business as one which in no way concerned me.

I was promptly invited to dinner, I accepted, I went. Lo and behold, in walked a cadaverous and somber old friar, followed by a boy carrying books. I knew right then that a fight was in store<sup>325</sup> for me. We sat down, and the host, not wasting any time about it, instantly put the question. The friar responded as he had preached earlier. I myself said nothing. For I take no pleasure in getting involved in vexatious and pointless disputes. They finally asked me what I thought, and since they would not let me keep quiet I said what I thought, but in only a few careless words. Then the friar launched into a long, rehearsed speech, and he blurted out over that dinner enough verbiage for nearly two sermons. The whole gist of his reasoning was dependent on miracles, many of which he rattled off to us from the Mariale<sup>326</sup> along with some he had taken from other such books, which he had the boy bring to the table to lend greater authority to his exposition. When he had finished his speech at long last, I modestly answered that, first of all, nothing he had said in that entire sermon would seem really persuasive to anyone who did not accept the miracles that he had reported, a response which would not necessarily contravene Christian faith, and that even if those miracles were true they were hardly an adequate basis for the thesis at hand. For while you might easily find a prince who would sometimes pardon even his enemies at his mother’s entreaty, no prince anywhere is foolish enough to promulgate a law which would encourage his own subjects to defy him by promising immunity to every traitor who propitiated his mother with a set form of flattery. After a lengthy exchange,<sup>327</sup> all I finally achieved was that the friar was praised to the skies whereas I was laughed down as a fool. Indeed, through the misguided devotion of people indulging their own vices under a pretext of piety, the affair finally went so far that only the most forceful action on the part of the bishop could put a stop to it at all.

I do not record these incidents out of any desire to implicate the religious life itself in the offenses committed by some men in religious orders, since the same soil produces both wholesome and noxious herbs,<sup>328</sup> or to criticize the devout practice of those who frequently pray to the Blessed Virgin (for that is a most wholesome devotion), but rather to stress that some people place so much reliance on such rituals that these are precisely what gives them the confidence to commit serious sins. It is this sort of thing that Erasmus believes we should challenge, and if anyone feels angry with him, why not also resent Saint Jerome? Why not also resent the other holy fathers who both recorded the faults of the religious at much greater length and attacked them with much greater bitterness? How cunning is that ancient serpent! How he always flavors his toxins with honey so that no one will balk at the poison! How he sickens our taste and arouses our nausea every time we are offered an antidote! Those who admire us and praise what we do, those who hail us as blessed and saintly, in other words those who seduce us and turn us from fools into madmen,<sup>329</sup> these are obviously candid, benevolent fellows, and these we call good, pious men in return. But those 5 who work to do something much more useful for us, to make us see ourselves as we really are, those men are barking dogs, snappish, malicious, and envious, and those words are used against them even when they never attack the vices of anybody by name and when those who describe them this way

<sup>322</sup> hissed, shouted down: Cicero, Paradoxa Stoicorum 3.26 <sup>323</sup> Anselm, PL 158: 962 <sup>324</sup> Johannes Duns Scotus (ca. 1266–1308)

<sup>325</sup> fight . . . store: Terence, Phormio 133, Adelphoe 792 <sup>326</sup> The title of several books honoring the Virgin Mary.

<sup>327</sup> After . . . exchange: Adages 284 (CWE 31: 302) <sup>328</sup> since . . . herbs: See Ovid, Remedia amoris 45–46.

 10 openly smear their own filth upon others. And so I see that now there is no place where that comic saying does not apply, since not even the cloister is closed to it: “Flattery is the way to make friends, truthfulness to make enemies.”<sup>330</sup> Jerome’s truthfulness was once held against him by the slanderer Rufinus<sup>331</sup> even though every fair, virtuous reader construed it in a fair, virtuous way. But you take what Erasmus has written not only truthfully but also so
 20 very graciously that he has received from all sides written expressions of deep gratitude from members of every religious order, especially your own,<sup>332</sup> and now, of all times, you tastelessly and arrogantly attack it with slander and abuse. Your whole profession rests on humility as its foundation, and in this spirit of humility you not only exalt your own sect with extravagant praise for its sacred traditions, holy solitude, devout ceremonies, vigils, austere living, and fasts, but you kick him around like a dog
 30 while you speak of his bark and his vagabond lifestyle. When I read these words flowing from so religious a pen, I almost imagine I am hearing the humble prayer spoken by that holy pharisee: “Lord, I thank you that I am not as other men are, even as this publican.”<sup>333</sup>

Even though I think it a bit closer to holiness to dwell on the praise of good men than to slander them, I have no intention at present of writing an encomium of Erasmus. For my own powers
 40 are unequal to so great a task, and everywhere on earth the best and most learned men are each vying to do it as well as they possibly can. And even if they remained silent, his own rich benefactions to all mortal men, which commend him to virtuous men now, will commend him to all when his death 45 puts an end to their envy (though I pray it will not happen soon), when at last he will be missed even by those people whose jaundiced, bleared eyes, as if dazzled with his intense brightness, cannot stand to 50 look straight at him now. Since he has no shortage of praise among virtuous judges, I myself will refrain from fueling the envy even of those who have such perverse minds that they feed on all kinds of detraction and pine away at the praises of virtuous men. But without any offense even to them, I think,

 55 I may say this at least. If anyone carefully considers the steady stream of massive, excellent, and numerous volumes that Erasmus has produced single-handedly, so many that you would think that one man would not even be equal to copying them all 60 out, he will readily conclude that even if Erasmus were not totally preoccupied with virtue he would certainly have little time left to devote to vice. Now if you look even closer with an unbiased eye, first considering the fruitfulness of his works and then 65 appraising the testimony of those who have derived from his works either illumination in their studies or fervor in their affections, I for one think you will not find it at all likely that the heart from which such sparks of piety leap forth to kindle the spirits 70 of others is utterly cold in itself.

Such praises are not, I think, generous enough to stir up any envy, nor is anyone grudging enough to deny it. Yet I would have withheld even this except that your impudence keeps me from drawing 75 the line even there, and compels me to push well beyond it to catch up with you. For whose ears are long-suffering enough to endure your shameless insults when you twit Erasmus with being a vagabond just because he occasionally changes his residence, something he rarely does except when his 80 concern for the good of the public directs him to do so? As if it were the essence of holiness to stagnate forever and stay glued to one rock all the time like an oyster or sponge!<sup>334</sup> But if that is so, then the Franciscan order was quite ill conceived, though 85 no order (unless I am mistaken) is holier than this one; and yet many of its members, with perfectly good reasons, go wandering all over the world. Jerome did something wrong when he traveled all the 90 way from Rome to Jerusalem. The most holy apostles were much beneath your sort of holiness when 329 See Terence, Eunuchus 254.

330 Terence, Andria 68; Adages 1853 (CWE 34: 110–11) 331 See Apologia contra

Hieronymum 2.5 (PL 21: 576); Apologia adversus libros Rufini 1.30 (PL 23: 421).

332 See EE 2: 29, 244. 333 Lk 18:11

334 rock . . . sponge: Adages 3745 (CWE 36: 385); Praise of Folly (ASD 4/3: 162); EE 3: 267

they journeyed all over the earth while you people sat still, indeed even before you sat still. Nor am I saying this as a way of placing Erasmus on a level with them, so that no one will captiously charge me with meaning to do so, but rather to show you that just as there is often nothing wrong about moving around so there is no special holiness seated in always sitting still.

For to come to Erasmus, whatever the character of the rest of his conduct, which is actually quite irreproachable, I would certainly not hesitate to prefer his kind of wandering, which you run down so shamelessly, to any part of your virtues, however proud you all may be of it. For I think there is not a man living today who loves ease and hates work who would not rather sit still with you than go wandering with him. For if you consider work, he sometimes does more in one day than you do in many months, and if you consider the usefulness of the work, he sometimes does more fruitful work for the Church in one month than you do in several years, unless you think that anyone's fasts or perfunctory prayers do as much or do such widespread good as so many great volumes, through which the whole world is instructed in righteousness, or unless you suppose he is out for sheer fun when he makes light of turbulent seas, inclement skies, and all sorts of trials in order to work for the common good. What a fine sort of fun, to get seasick from being on a ship, to be battered around by its tossing, to be threatened by storms, and to have death and shipwreck continually before one's eyes! When he crawls so often through rugged forests and wild groves, over rough slopes and precipitous mountains, along roads beset with bandits, when he is buffeted by the wind, splashed with mud, drenched with rain, worn out by his travels, and exhausted by overwork, when he frequently lodges in a miserable inn and wishes that he had your bed and board, what a hedonist's life he appears to be leading! Especially since all these hardships, which could easily wear down a vigorous and sturdy young man, are confronted and borne by Erasmus's old body, which is already breaking down with the strain of his study and work, so that it is practically obvious that he must have succumbed long ago to so many hardships if God, who makes his sun rise on both good men and bad,<sup>335</sup> had not protected him for the benefit even of ingrates. For from each of his voyages he brings home the splendid fruits of his travels for others but for himself nothing more than poor health and the ill words that his good deeds provoke from the worst sort of men. Thus he takes so much pleasure in those expeditions that if they were not required for the sake of his studies, that is, for the public benefit of everyone (something he often buys at the cost of some private disadvantage), he would be very glad to forgo them. But in the meantime he associates only with people who are respected for both learning and character, and he is constantly gestating some new idea which he later brings forth, not without public intellectual profit, during those travels which you so malign. But if he had paid less attention to that public profit and more to his own advantages, he would have today not only a much less debilitated body but also a much richer and more opulent fortune, since all princes and almost all great nobles are vying to draw him to them on the most generous terms. And yet it would surely have been fair and just that Erasmus, who, wherever he lives, spreads his great bounty all over the world as the sun spreads its rays, should receive benefits from all over the world in return.

Thus, since he is devoted entirely to the welfare of others and asks for no reward whatsoever on earth, I certainly ought not to doubt that God will reward him most generously there where it is better to get one's reward. And for this reason, though I anticipate that your own reward will be very great and I wish for it to be as great as possible, when I compare you with the man you despise and I consider your merits side by side, insofar as I can judge on the basis of human conjecture, I firmly expect that when the day finally dawns on you both when your virtues will get their reward, on that day, without any injury to you and indeed with your cheerful assent as your feelings will stand then, God, the impartial assessor of both of you, will not only prefer his wandering to your sitting still, but since all things work together for good<sup>336</sup> in good men, God will also prefer his eloquence to your silence, his silence to your prayers, his food to your fasting, and his sleep to your vigils, and in summary, God will prize all that you so proudly despise in Erasmus above all that you so dearly esteem in your own way of life.

For undoubtedly, though you might be ashamed to admit it, you could never have attacked anyone so arrogantly unless you grossly flattered yourself with an amazing assurance of your own holiness. There is absolutely nothing more dangerous than this to the religious life, and nothing that I, for the love that I bear you, want you to avoid more completely. For it could benefit me and those like me, who drift here and there in a miserable world, to look up to you from below, so to speak, and to admire your observances as we would a pattern of angelic life, so that we could be prompted as if by our awe at the virtue of others to hold our own lives in more perfect disdain. But it could do you, on the other hand, no good at all to condemn and condemn others' lives, sometimes even superior ones, in comparison with your own. You should make it your habit instead to look up even to inferior attainments in others and not only to think more modestly of your own attainments but also to hold them all suspect, and live not without hope but yet always in fear, not just of falling hereafter (for which there is the saying, "He who stands, let him take heed of falling"),<sup>337</sup> but of having fallen long before now, in particular when you yourself thought that you were ascending most rapidly, namely when you entered the religious life.

I am not saying this because I doubt in the least that the portion Mary chose was the better one. But since "All mortal justice is as the rag of a menstruating woman,"<sup>338</sup> so that everyone has good reason to hold even his own good qualities suspect, it would probably be not unwholesome for you to feel inwardly doubtful and fearful lest either you do not share Mary's portion or you have chosen Mary's portion mistakenly, since you rank her function not merely above Martha's office, as Christ did, but even above that of the apostles. You should be afraid that, when you view yourself, too indulgently, as one who has retreated into holy solitude to escape harmful pleasures, the deeper scrutiny of God, who observes us with more penetration, who explores our own hearts more profoundly than we do, and whose eyes discern our imperfections, may find that what you have been doing is avoiding responsibility, dodging work, cultivating the pleasure of repose in the shadow of piety, looking for a way out of life's troubles, and wrapping your talent up in a napkin,<sup>339</sup> thus wasting it inside for fear of losing it out-of-doors.

You will gain at least this much by such meditations: they will stop you from using your sect to fuel personal pride, the most dangerous habit there is, and from putting too much faith in private ceremonies, while they will encourage you to place more hope in the Christian religion than you do in your own religious order and to trust less in the things you can do by yourself than in the things you cannot do except with God's help. You can fast by yourself; you can watch by yourself; you can pray by yourself; why, you can even do all this by the devil. But a truly Christian faith, through which Christ Jesus's name is truly uttered in the spirit; a truly Christian hope, which despairs of its own merits and puts all its faith in the generosity of God; and a truly Christian charity, which is not puffed up, which does not become angry, which does not seek its own glory, are not to be had by anyone except through God's grace and gratuitous favor alone.<sup>340</sup> The more confidence you place in these common virtues of Christianity the less faith you will come to place in your own private ceremonies or in those of your order; and the less faith you have in such things, the more good they will do you. For it is when you consider yourself a useless servant that God will consider you a faithful one. And we can certainly find good cause to see ourselves as useless even when we have done all we can, which I pray to God that both of us, and Erasmus as well, will eventually do, yet not only that we will do all we can, but (especially if it turns out we have done a good deal) that we reckon ourselves to have done really nothing at all. For this way is the surest of all to aspire to the place in which neither the virtue of others will cause us distress nor the brilliance of others will draw any tear from our own bleary eyes.

At the end<sup>341</sup> of your letter you write that my modesty ought to prevent me from showing your letter to anyone. I do not see how that can pertain to my modesty at all. Your own modesty, or at least your own prudence, should certainly have stopped you from showing your letter to as many as you did: modesty if your letter had been what you deem it to be; prudence if you had deemed it to be what it is. But in view of the facts, your own notion of modesty is novel indeed: even as you insist on my silence, as if you were either displeased with your letter or loath to accept any praise for it, you yourself, the moment that you start to burn with a prickling desire for ephemeral glory, go out looking for others provoked by the same scabby itch, so that you can scratch each other's backs<sup>342</sup> in a pleasurable medley of chafing. Having heard how those fellows were boasting wherever they went that your elegant letters, dictated by the Holy Spirit, had changed my opinions enough to make me reject Erasmus's writings, I thought it best to declare my position in a letter in order to show up their folly, if they actually believed what they said, or their malice, if they made it up. For I cannot judge how your letter struck them, since an ass's penchant for thistles has even given rise to an adage.<sup>343</sup> I, at any rate, found nothing in it sufficiently splendid or dazzling to make us stop seeing white as white. Thus although I felt I had to state my own views on account of the unfounded boasting which you or your friends have been doing, thus far I have decided to continue to safeguard your own reputation: I have not only not mentioned your name in my letter (a name which I otherwise hold very dear); I have also erased it in yours, or at any rate in the one copy I have ("I am afraid that what I have to say may appear somewhat brash . . ."). These steps will ensure that no matter how men speak or think of your action — and all good, learned men will undoubtedly think and speak ill of it — you yourself will be spared the least blush of embarrassment.

337 1 Cor 10:12 338 See Lk 10:42; Is 64:6. 339 wrapping... napkin: See Lk

19:20. 340 hope... alone: See 1 Cor 13:4–8. 341 At the end: Adages 137

(CWE 31: 178–79)

It pleases me greatly that once you have finished your raving you finally return to your senses and grow less implacable, even hinting that you may be willing to settle your feud with Erasmus on quite easy terms. For you write the following: "Even so, I am not such an enemy of Erasmus that I would refuse to make up with him if he would correct his minor mistakes." My word, you have crowned the man's bliss! For without this assurance the poor fellow might well have wasted away from sheer grief had he lost every hope of eventually gaining your favor, great man that you are. But now that you offer him peace with such easy conditions, making such fair demands, I am sure he will rush to oblige, and correct his mistakes just as soon as you point any out; for thus far you have pointed out only your own. And yet even those readings that you call his minor mistakes, where he alters sagena to verriculum, dimitte to remitte, discumbentium to discumbentibus, and so on, wherever he replaces a barbarous word with a Latin one, a solecism with a grammatical phrase, or an ambiguous phrase with a clear one, wherever he either corrects a mistake of the translator or redresses the lapse of a scribe, even these I repeat, he will change for the worse, one and all, to avoid having you as an enemy, and since (as I see) it was sacrilege, not simple theft, for Erasmus to remove all this treasure from the temple, he will retrieve every barbarism, every solecism, each and every obscurity, each careless rendering or faulty transcription, and faithfully put it all back in the sanctuary, not deterred in the least by the thought that this action will look like a quite unforgivable insult to all of the good, learned men he won over with that other service. For at last, by dispensing with all of them — with the mere rank and file — he will be making friends with the mightiest potentates and paired prefects of literacy, namely you and that paltry apologist.

But joking aside, I sincerely and wholly approve of the decent and pious intentions you showed here, at least, in confessing that all that needs to be corrected are some minor mistakes. For thereby you confessed (somewhat bashfully, in keeping with your modesty, but still truthfully enough to disburden yourself of such a criminal lie), you confessed, I repeat, that all the intemperate charges with which you began about heresy, schism, and the heralding of Antichrist were all pure fabrications. For I still do not think you so totally hopeless that you could regard heresy, schism, and the heralding of Antichrist, three crimes which no mass of evils could rival, as minor mistakes. Therefore, since I see you have recanted all your really serious charges, I am not going to argue with you over trifles, so that we can both simply forget what was said, let the whole uproar, which sprang out of nothing, dissolve at long last into nothing again, and thus finish this tragedy as a comedy. Farewell; and if you hope to reap any benefit from secluding yourself in a cloister, find contentment in spiritual repose, not in this sort of quarreling. THE END

342 you . . . backs: See Adages 699 (CWE 32: 126–27). 343 See Adages 971 (CWE 32: 264–65).

86. To Germanus Brixius<sup>344</sup>

London, 1520

T. More to Germanus Brixius, greetings.

I myself, Brixius, am not so fastidious or so self-indulgent as to be vexed or hurt because I have not been granted a thing which has never been granted to anyone among mortal men. For who has ever, in any age, lived out his days so untroubled that he not only had friends but never encountered an enemy?<sup>345</sup> Therefore, since I see that the blessing of having no enemy at all is denied me by the common lot of mortals, I am happy, at least, that through fortune's beneficence I have been granted the best sort of friends and an enemy such that no one would want him as a friend or be troubled by him as an enemy, a man who is equally unable to gratify when he means well and to injure when he is irate.<sup>346</sup> And yet I would certainly be angry with myself if I had given even such a person as you cause to hate me. As it is, I bear it with all the more equanimity since I am quite sure no one fails to perceive that this pointless and worse-than-effeminate quarreling of yours has no source but your own morbid feelings. Indeed, I am also less vexed by this strife since, though no good can come of it, I also see that apart from a loss of paper and time (and I choose to waste little of either) no great ill otherwise can befall either one of us. Each of us, in his way, is immune; you can not injure me, nor can anyone injure you, since your sort leaves no room for disparagement.<sup>347</sup>

I see that your confidence in this fact alone has driven you to embrace the expedient of traducing yourself, far and wide, before all learned people (if any, that is, will see fit to read trifles so trifling as these) with so elegant and splendid a specimen of your natural gifts and so sober a testimony to your moral soundness as that latest tract of yours furnishes. Having already established quite clearly just what sort of poet you are, now no doubt you intend to show by publishing this tract what kind of man you are. Indeed you have shown it so distinctively and have portrayed yourself so graphically that I neither would, if I could, nor could, if I would, spatter

you with so many and such grievous slanders as you plaster all over yourself. And yet you display so much eagerness for that sort of praise, it would seem that the one and only way to placate and propitiate you is to savage you with disgraceful slanders.<sup>348</sup> But I am not so ambitious for your amity that I would not rather speak words which may please even one good and honorable man than words which may please three hundred Brixiuses, and therefore I shall not take in hand that illustrious and rich stock of insults in which you take such vaunting and boastful delight; nor, so far as I can stay away from it, will I touch on it at all. Only if there is some slight admixture of amusing insanity which thoughtful observers may laugh at, and need not detest, will I not hesitate to use it to alleviate my reader's disgust, of which he must endure a great deal as he reads through such quarrelsome and utterly fruitless rebukes. But the other slanders with which you pollute yourself more disgracefully I shall either avoid altogether or else, where I am forced to touch on them, I shall touch on them so lightly as to make it clear to everyone that I am no less eager to conceal your slanders, Brixius, than you are to reveal them and wear them about you like a badge of distinction. For the charges which you lay against me are such insipid calumnies that I would not have seen fit to reply if I had not decided to wash away this single charge, which you constantly harp on, but never establish, that I started this quarrel of yours.

But you should have confirmed that, Brixius, and not just affirmed it. And if you thought that my epigrams sufficed to demonstrate that claim, you ought at least to have included them in your tract,<sup>349</sup> so that you would not have appeared impudent even to those who had no access to my poems. And undoubtedly you would have done so if you had not perceived it was not in your interest that my lines be read. For if they are compared closely with yours (even if anyone else thinks, as you do, that my lines should be quite overcome by the splendor of your verses), mine would still benefit to this extent from the luster of their rivals, that the main issue would be made quite clear: my lines have been rather

<sup>344</sup> This letter was originally published with this title: "A letter of Thomas More to Germanus Brixius who once attacked England with shameful lies in a tract which More made fun of in some epigrams more than seven years ago, and who now, not a month and a half ago, in a time of the most perfect peace between England and France, on the very eve of the meeting between their princes, published a tract against More which defames its own author with its pointless and virulent rebukes. In the renowned city of London 1520." <sup>345</sup> so . . . enemy: See Plutarch, Moralia 86c. <sup>346</sup> enemy . . . irate: See Adages 1709 (CWE 34: 52). <sup>347</sup> nor . . . disparagement: See Terence, Hecyra 233–34. <sup>348</sup> See CW 3.2: 488, 538. <sup>349</sup> Antimorus

reviled than refuted, and they do not give you an adequate pretext for launching another savage attack at this late date. To make this still clearer, since I see just how eager you are to forget it, I will refresh your memory about the origin of this splendid duel of yours. But I will do so in such a way as to omit certain points which might strengthen my own case whenever I cannot touch on a point in my favor without insult to this or that nation.

During the late disturbance between Louis, your king, and the Roman pontiff, our unvanquished prince Henry, the eighth of that name, at the request of that sacrosanct see, had decided to lend his assistance to the faltering cause of the Church: he ordered several ships to put to sea to blockade and restrain the formidable fleet which Louis had equipped. When these two fleets engaged each other, all the ships on both sides were lucky enough to survive except two which were lost; for these two, at their first encounter, had immediately thrown out grappling hooks and bound themselves together so tightly that when their decks caught fire they could not be parted—a dismal prelude to the war.

When you described this sea battle in verse, you set out not to combine truth with falsehood but to fabricate practically the whole of your story from out-and-out lies, tailoring new facts according to your personal whim.<sup>350</sup> You disparaged the piety of our king by calling it envy. With false maledictions and unsurpassed petulance you assailed all of England as pact-breaking and perjured. With lies which were more than poetic you led out to sea a Hervé who was more than Herculean.<sup>351</sup> Charging in with the Cordelière,<sup>352</sup> all by itself, and a small crew of helpers, relying on the doughty Hervé, you dispersed all our vessels, with which you had covered the main, and drove them away like flies<sup>353</sup> in whatever direction you pleased.<sup>354</sup> You sank most of them under the waves, you cruel man, though a merciful Neptune soon sent home the same ships unscathed. You raced with the Cordelière like a thoroughbred hound in pursuit of our Regent, which fled like a poor little hare. You drove the Cordelière on with the strong arms of oarsmen, although made no use of oars, so that you would not lose that laborious half-line, “driven on by strong arms.”<sup>355</sup> You puffed up the sails with Hervé’s noisy huffing. You silently passed by the commander of the opposing ship,<sup>356</sup> a man of great name and station, and of course thought it artful to do so. You sang of your well-nigh factitious Hervé fighting not merely stoutly but prodigiously to boot. You foisted him, dauntless, into the midst of his enemies on the Regent, on which he did not once set foot. Having taken the Regent’s crow’s nests and staged that abominable massacre, you led her in tow, bound and vanquished. Unguarded as you were, you threw a bolt of blazing fire from the vanquished ship into the vanquisher (not an easy feat for a crew bound and vanquished). By a lapse of memory (a trap liars often slip into)<sup>357</sup> you made Hervé, whom you had left in the Regent, turn up suddenly on the burning Cordelière, as if he had two bodies, to deliver himself, there in the flames, of a long-winded sermon. You chose to put off his death for no other reason, I suspect, than to have him sing, in the meantime, of your future election as a nursling of Phoebus to sing of Hervé’s own demise. You roasted your heroes to ashes one and all, and had good cause to roast them, indeed, since they chose to burn up when they could have moved onto the Regent, which they had captured and which they were leading in tow, bound and vanquished, begging heaven for mercy. You described Hervé, who had outlived his comrades, right on the verge of flying off to the heavenly saints (for by then the fire had burned away everything mortal about him, especially the ruinous emotions of mortals, in particular anger and hatred), and right then, of all times, you pretended that he, though thus purified—provoked, I suppose, by Saint Lawrence’s example<sup>358</sup> (whom indeed you had made your exemplar in fashioning that valiant man’s

350 combine . . . whim: See Horace, Ars poetica 151–52, 338–39. 351 Hervé de Porzmoguer was the Breton commander of the Cordelière. 352 The Cordelière was a French ship that burned up with the Regent, a British ship. Germanus Brixius’s poem Chordigeræ navis conflagratio, published in 1513, commemorated this naval battle that took place on August 10, 1512. More wrote sarcastic epigrams in reply; Brixius responded in his 1519 Antimorus, despite Erasmus’s advice not to do so. More replied to Brixius in this letter, but at Erasmus’s request, withdrew the book from circulation. For More’s poems in English translation, see Epigrams 188–95, 209, 266–69. More had left it to Erasmus’s judgment whether to include these epigrams concerning Brixius in More’s 1518 edition of Epigrams, first published by Froben in Basel. 353 drove . . . flies: Adages 2660 (CWE 35: 251–52) 354 For More’s allusions to the poem, see Brixius’s Chordigera in CW 3.2: 429–65. 355 CW 3.2: 450 356 Sir Thomas Knyvet 357 See Adages 1274 (CWE 33: 175). 358 The battle occurred on August 10, St. Lawrence’s feast day.

character) — was induced by pure envy and lust for revenge, having nothing to gain for himself, to cremate the ship which he had captured and all those fine prisoners' physiques along with him. On top
 5 of all this you were not content merely to consume men and ships in the fire so completely that (contrary to what usually happens in tragedies) no deus ex machina saved even one man to show you the factual foundation for the story you harp at, but with
 10 those very flames you then kindled "the stars with the heavens and with all the fish in it, the sea,"<sup>359</sup> and did so not in some brief hyperbole but in numerous lines of impressively painstaking dullness, a fine emulation of Ovid, of course, which in one respect
 15 even outdoes him: in his fabrication, the steeds of the sun, gone astray for the want of their driver, burn only the earth,<sup>360</sup> whereas you, with egregious cunning, of course, enflame sky, land, and sea with just one burning boat. Having thus outdone Ovid,
 20 you fiercely challenged Vergil as well, and whereas he had imagined a rain sent by Jove to besprinkle and thus save the fleet of Aeneas when it was afire,<sup>361</sup> you delayed till the ships were long gone and consumed by the blaze and then rained down a copious
 25 torrent from heaven, as if otherwise the fire which was belched inexhaustibly out of the water (as water perpetually springs from a pumice stone)<sup>362</sup> might launch some of its flames into heaven. When you handled these things in this way, I happened
 30 to get a copy of your book, perhaps even before it was printed, and when I observed such portentous monstrosities, such disgraceful, such shameful lies, such absurd fabrications, and those patches of other men's purple you wore stitched<sup>363</sup> all over your ill-woven bardic surtout (to make room for which you 35 had arrayed your whole habit in a form which "Orestes himself, though insane, would swear was a form which no sane man would choose"),<sup>364</sup> I indicated in a couple of epigrams that I found your 40 narration wanting in material credibility and your composition wanting in sense, while the hoard you had gathered of other men's corn had exceeded the measure of your granary.

At the same time I had written an epigram making 45 fun of one of my countrymen who was given to affecting French manners both inopportunistly and clumsily. If there is anything in this epigram which is too biting, it recoils on the ludicrous fop himself, not on the French, against whom, torture the epigram as you may, you will exact no other accusation than that as masters you are a little too harsh to 50 your servants. And that, I suppose, not even you will deny. Nor do I attack that propensity in you, but rather, since each race has its own code of conduct, it irked me that that countryman of mine should 55 defy our conventions by treating your countryman too harshly.

Since I was writing these epigrams at the time when everything was ablaze with the tumult of war, even if it had occurred to me to write something 60 more biting, I would certainly not have believed that anyone was so inequitable or that you yourself were so outrageously self-indulgent as to demand that we should aim not one line at you Frenchmen, though you had launched book-length attacks
 65 against us. Thus, if I wrote against you first, I will be guilty of having challenged you; but if you wrote against us first, then how can you put an honorable face on so dishonorable an action as that? While I myself repaid a book with an epigram, you in turn 70 retaliated against a jesting epigram with an amazingly virulent volume. Further, I wrote these playful pieces of mine right away, before peace had been made; as for you, only now, so many years later, in the most perfect peace, with our princes conjoined
 75 by the closest affinity, with our peoples bound together in a wonderful concord, after the most salutary [of peace settlements] has been consecrated on your side and ours by the most sacred rituals, now, of all times, you spring up and renew old and long-buried feuds, tear apart mending wounds,<sup>365</sup> and chafe open the scars drawn across them; now you
 80 cast in our faces our men's disgraceful flight, our fleets scattered and sunk, and our envy and pact-breaking perjury, charges which you disgracefully fabricate.<sup>366</sup>

Yet you want it to seem that all this is entirely in order, namely that you should attack me now, vigorously, as you imagine, simply because I fought with 90 you once in the past.<sup>367</sup> But who fails to see how ridiculously any athlete would be acting if he entered the arena and challenged all comers, if one of them happened to overthrow him and the meet was then finally broken up and the contest concluded, and if he then showed up once again, some years later, and only then, when everyone had different interests and outlooks and paid no attention to that sort of strife, he pounced in unexpectedly and seized

359 CW 3.2: 460 360 See Metamorphoses 2.201–10. 361 See Aeneid 5.687–99. 362 as water . . . stone: Adages 375 (CWE 31:

369–70) 363 purple . . . stitched: Horace, Ars poetica 15–16 364 Persius, Satires 3.118 365 tear . . . wounds: See Adages 580 (CWE

32: 53). 366 See Antimorus (CW 3.2: 490). 367 See CW 3.2: 486, 512, 536.

 5 by the waist<sup>368</sup> the antagonist with whom he had fought in the past and proclaimed himself challenged even now, as if a person who answers a challenge could be called a challenger or as if any strife, once begun, lasts forever; who, I ask, fails to see how
 10 ridiculously such an athlete would be acting, even if he should happen to win the fight? But what if he jumps in as you do and lashes out in all directions, flailing his arms and legs, bruising some with his outflung fists and others with his heels,<sup>369</sup> and
 15 among these perhaps the sponsors of the preceding contest, and what if at last, when he has racked himself for a long time in vain, unable to throw his adversary, lest he seem to have sallied forth wholly in vain he then spits in his opponent's face and throws 20 up all over him, heaving the toxic and distempered vomit from his drunken stomach, and what if then, swelling with pride as if he had given a splendid performance, he goes off to celebrate his extraordinary triumph in low dives and taverns? Does such a wrestler then merit a victory crown? Or does he deserve 25 rather to have his shins and his ankles broken?

Who does not see by now, Brixius, how much like this athlete you are; though you may be unlike him in this one respect, that you did not challenge 30 our entire nation to a sporting competition but provoked us instead with belligerent abuse, unless perhaps you contend that to charge us with perjury ought not to be classed as an insult—in much the same way, you might argue that a donkey ought 35 not be classed as a quadruped. In response to this challenge I took up a couple of darts, of the blunt-tipped variety, and did not so much fight you as sport with you (since it seemed you were not worth the trouble of wounding). Nonetheless, for one
 40 reason or another, as a pustule is easily punctured, my stroke left you in such grievous pain that even now, after so many years have elapsed, after peace has so often been made and confirmed, after concord has been established in so many ways, after 45 our princes have been joined in such intimate affinity<sup>370</sup> (although this fact alone should have settled all long-standing feuds between the nations of both princes), all of a sudden you rise up once more against me, as if you had not given the first challenge 50 and the war were still on; and when everyone else is intent upon love, friendship, and now mutual hospitality, you set upon me with the weapons of war and attack me with darts which, although none too sharp, are (despite the fixed martial conventions of 55 all who are not wholly barbarous and savage) envenomed. Meanwhile, you insist, no less stupidly than dishonestly, that you come forth to answer my challenge, as if you were prepared to respond to those darts which we launched against you in responding 60 to your provocation. But those darts of ours were clearly such that, however much you sweat, you cannot escape them by any response. Knowing this to be true, you arranged your own tract so that you need not touch on your personal defense except 65 timidly and in passing but could turn your whole effort toward skewering me; and although this offensive absorbed every ounce of your vigor and virulence, what else did you finally achieve but to blurt out your bumptious urbanities, to spew out your furious venom, and at last, since you could not really 70 wound me, to do something at least by spitting all over me, after which you marched off an egregious victor and triumphant hero?

But how wittily pert you have proven against me we shall see in good time. Meanwhile let us consider 75 how artfully you refute my objections in that toilsome tract of yours, which has cost you more days to perfect than the book contains lines. Now, whereas I arraigned you for purloining some elements of your poem from the ancients, for developing 80 other elements very absurdly, and for narrating everything in such a way that there was neither any truth in your subject matter nor any credit attached to your words, you responded to the first point as if I had charged that your lines smack too
 85 much of antiquity,<sup>371</sup> from which charge, lest you strain yourself too much in answering, I freely absolve you. For elsewhere you touch again on this same charge in passing; again you dissemble the theft you are charged with; again you attempt to 90 defend it as if I had accused you of emulating the ancients, and indeed, not content to escape any blame, you even claim praise for your blameworthy deed; you claim you have emulated the ancients, followed

368 seized . . . waist: See Adages 396 (CWE 31: 381). 369 fists . . . heels: See Adages

2021 (CWE 34: 190). 370 Henry VIII's daughter Mary was supposed to eventually marry the dauphin of France. 371 See CW 3.2: 488.

assiduously in their footsteps,<sup>372</sup> and, in a word, wrested the club out of Hercules' hands.<sup>373</sup> But I had to laugh, by Hercules, as I read what grand and glorious claims you had based on so shameful an action. For you have imitated everything in the worst possible way. You do frequently take over either half-lines or whole lines from others as if they were yours, meanwhile making some small and inept alteration. But in my opinion, Brixius, this is not emulating the ancients but contaminating, disgracing, and polluting them; this is not wresting Hercules's club away forcibly but furtively snatching it up when he has laid it down. Still I cannot deny that this is following in the footsteps of the ancients, but assuredly, Brixius, you follow a bit too relentlessly: you follow so closely in their footsteps that you knock off their shoes and then wear them yourself, though your feet hardly fill them.<sup>374</sup> It was a poor defense, for you to boast of doing much the same thing that Vergil claimed to have done (not everyone has any business to head for Corinth).<sup>375</sup> He was more than able to make good on his claim; you lack any means to make good on your arrogant boast; unless you suppose it is the same sort of achievement for Vergil to engraft the transitory lines of Ennius into his poems, which will live forever, as it is for you to obtrude Vergil's everlasting lines into yours, which are already dying; for him to set off others' verses with better ones, as for you to commingle whatever is finest in ancient writers with your sordid rubbish; for him to compete with the Greeks so that he everywhere proved himself their equal, often even surpassing them, as for you to encounter the Latins not in order to rival or compete with them, but in order to sneak up and pilfer something which you may transfer whole to your store (if you hope that your theft will not be noticed) or else lop off its tail and its ears, as you would treat a stolen horse, since you would rather secure the use of it even by disfiguring it than not have it at all.

In this matter you prove to be such an industrious and indeed thrifty thief that often, rather than let even a single half-line of some other poet escape you if you think it is especially pretty, you import wildly absurd fantasies and the most pointless fabrications, which the context and subject at hand neither call for nor tolerate, fabrications and fantasies ranging from heaven to earth, but without any bearing on heaven or on earth,<sup>376</sup> as the saying goes. And if, in setting forth a battle or representing a tempest or anything else of that sort, you choose any one of the ancients to emulate, you obtrude so many of his words and even whole verses into your verses, you so change for the worse all that you alter, that if anyone considers the parts separately, on the one side you look not at all like your model and on the other side you look just like him. But if anyone regards the whole from both sides at once, then indeed it may seem that some angry god, by a wondrous metamorphosis, has changed some very beautiful hero into a ludicrous ape.<sup>377</sup>

Such was the elegant method — dissimulation, that is — which you used to answer my charge of thievery. And when you come to the shameless lies which swarm throughout your Chordigera like worms in a corpse, then you brandish before me, like the shield of Ajax<sup>378</sup> or the aegis of Pallas,<sup>379</sup> the privilege peculiar to poetry, whereby, you think, she is exempted from the law of history which prescribes truthful reporting. But assuredly, Brixius, while I would not shut up poetry (an august and extremely free goddess,<sup>380</sup> to be sure) in such straitened confines as to deny her the license to fabricate not only words but also incidents, provided it not be used shamelessly, even so I will simply not stand for it if she tells some shameless lie and elaborates it absurdly, if she twists and perverts a whole sequence of incidents and even their very outcome. If you have decided, on the contrary, that she is so absolutely free of all the laws of history, without exception, that she is permitted to sing that men fought to the death, though they never came to blows, and that those who lost, won, and that those who fled, routed their enemies, at that point we would not only laugh at the lamentable fate of Dido, which you adduce as a fabrication<sup>381</sup> (and indeed, although I am not sure it has been altogether confuted, it is certainly called into question by authors whose own credibility is not altogether unquestionable); we would also be brought to believe that those wars were all falsehoods and those 372 See CW 3.2: 510–42. 373 wrested ... hands: See Adages 3095 (CWE 35: 498–99) for the saying attributed to Vergil.

374 wear ... them: See Adages 1446 (CWE 33: 262). 375 head for Corinth: See Adages

301 (CWE 31: 317–19). 376 without ... earth: See Adages 444, 1495 (CWE 31: 422, 33: 285). 377 See Horace, Ars poetica 1–9; Adages 2409 (CWE 35: 76). 378 See Adages 2737 (CWE 35: 295–96); Homer,

Iliad 8.267–68. 379 See Homer, Odyssey 22.297. 380 poetry ... goddess: See Adages 2048 (CWE 34: 199); Horace, Ars poetica 9–13. 381 See CW 3.2: 488.

nuptials false fabrications, or that Aeneas was certainly overcome by Turnus and Turnus by Pallas,<sup>382</sup> and in short that everything was done just the opposite way from how it is reported by Vergil; that is, we would leave Vergil to join up with you, and then by the same token leave Homer for Dio,<sup>383</sup> a man so inimical to poetry that he argues that the whole Trojan war, and Troy itself, practically, is a Homeric fabrication, sustaining this argument obstinately despite countless proofs which refute him. He had no other motive for doing so, it seems, than to bring about with an inimical intent just the thing that you now bring about with a friendly intent. You two differ in just one respect: he was deliberately trying to keep anyone from esteeming the poets; you accomplish the same thing through heedlessness, not as one craftsman envying another<sup>384</sup> but rather as one envying art its own glory, indeed envying yourself your own glory if you were in fact such a great poet as you would be thought; for do you not spoil your own principal source of prestige if, because of you, no one will deign to have his deeds memorialized in the lines of the poets? Certainly no one will do so who has any sense, at least not if he is convinced that everything a poet sings is to be taken for a fabrication, especially when the singer himself testifies to the fact.

On this point, moreover, if I may talk with you truthfully and freely, you are not the only one to recount your nation's dealings with ours, if not falsely (for I scruple to utter that word in the presence of such fastidious ears), then at least very freely indeed. A short work was issued by one Pilleus of Tours, in sufficiently melodious lines; for I willingly pass by my other objections, lest he too should proclaim himself challenged. In his tract, however, if anyone observes how frequently he employs the Brixian style of poetry in narrating his story, or with what venerable titles he adorns our England, or with what reverend epithets he dignifies glorious Spain, that observer, I think, will assuredly judge that if anyone, either English or Spanish, should snap back at Pilleus with even more than an epigram, Pilleus would have no reason to complain about being offended, since he was the first to offend. And if anyone on earth were so inequitable as to think otherwise, I myself would not have hesitated to submit to the calumny of that man if the book had come into my hands at some point in the past. But now that new friendship has rendered such feuds obsolete, it is not my intention to stir matters up all over again, and so I will leave out the book and adduce nothing more than the title, both to enable my readers to gauge the whole lion by its claw<sup>385</sup> and to give anyone who is inclined to read the book a name, at least, with which he can track it down. It bears this inscription: On the Flight of the English from the Territories of France, and the expulsion of the Spanish from Navarre. Who needs a sieve to guess what stuff the rest of this book must consist of, since the title he reads consists of such chaff and rings as true to the rest of the book as it rings false to history? For who will not laugh at Pilleus when he boasts that in battle the English were driven out of France? It is, I think, amply established (to say nothing further) that the English were certainly not driven out of France; and if he thinks that the English were driven out by the people of Aquitaine, how could they have been put to flight by a people with whom they did not even have an opportunity to clash? But it is even more remarkably absurd that he should trumpet the Spaniards' repulse from their holdings in Navarre, for they entered Navarre at that time, held it steadily thereafter, and hold it today.

But yet let us concede all these whimsies to poetry; for in poetry, at least in the province of fabrications, Pilleus's muse recalls your muse so prettily that nowhere on earth is there simian more similar to simian. And indeed, I guess that that other author will also belabor this sanction of poetry, the one who, not so very long ago, printed in Paris a Short Sheaf of the Times,<sup>386</sup> a sheaf truly made to be burned, since its author had gathered within it a number of firebrands which might very well have been enough to touch off a new conflagration between our two peoples if our prince's insight had not given him ample assurance that he and his deeds, both so clearly and generally commended, were proof against the barking of envious men. For besides certain other seditious lies which have lately been inserted into that tract, a final flourish<sup>387</sup> has been added, by far the most seditious avowal of them all, where we read that your prince fully two years ago would have gone out to ward off the Turks if he had not suspected that the English king was untrustworthy. Who would put up with such stuff if he knows that at that time your people had not planned any such expedition and that no one had been less suspected by your prince than ours, or had done less to merit suspicion? Now what could be said or imagined more shameless than what that other writer<sup>388</sup> asserted in your language: that while our king was in arms in France, James, the King of the Scots, entered Britain and waged a successful campaign and then made his way home with great glory?<sup>389</sup> Nor was this wretched writer at all disconcerted by what was common knowledge everywhere, even though, as he knew, common knowledge had given every mortal more than ample assurance that the Scots had been routed and driven to flight, that the king himself had been slain with almost all his nobles, and that since he had died excommunicate his body had been kept without burial for so many years in accord with a papal injunction.

<sup>382</sup> See Vergil, Aeneid 10.439–509, 12.887–952. <sup>383</sup> Dio Cocceianus Chrysostomos (ca. 40–ca. 120 AD), attempted to discredit the legend of Troy

as completely fictitious in his Eleventh Discourse. <sup>384</sup> not as . . . another: See Adages 125 (CWE 31: 170–71); Hesiod, Works and Days 25. <sup>385</sup> gauge . . . claw:

Adages 834 (CWE 32: 200) <sup>386</sup> by Werner Rolevinck (1425–1502) <sup>387</sup> final flourish: See Adages 3520 (CWE 36: 223–24).

Although writings like these often make their way over from your shores to ours, nonetheless, now that such a general peace has been achieved we have chosen rather to make no response and to bear with such calumnies, which are growing in bulk by the day, than to throw them back at you with any offense to your feelings; at the same time we hope that hereafter no less a historian than Paulus Aemilius,<sup>390</sup> so strict and impartial in shaping his narrative that one might suppose he was bound by an oath and so elegant that if he did not write of more recent events he would seem not the humblest of ancients, will report for posterity the deeds of both peoples, at least those deeds which concerned both alike, with an unalloyed credibility.

But since your book was set before me when our relations were at their most troubled, I certainly never thought I would have to expiate my offense with a blood-sacrifice if I chastised that book, which was so bitter and shamelessly given up to lies, with a mere epigram penned in play and in jest. You, on the other hand, marvelously witty as ever, joke about my lordly privilege<sup>391</sup> should I forbid you to touch me in turn after I had touched you, and yet even though you took the initiative in assailing the whole of my nation with wanton abuse and shameless lies, you were so irked at my touching your sacrosanct majesty with even a jest that for several years, day and night,<sup>392</sup> you spent all of your energy in preparing to combat my casually improvised epigrams with a carefully planned volume. In it you set up two tasks for yourself, first to vindicate your lines and then to inveigh against mine; and you performed the first so magnificently that out of the things with which I had reproached you you dissembled some and misunderstood others, while the one charge which was too great to sidestep, too commonly known to dissemble, and too true to evade, you conveniently deflected with that definition, according to which all that I had exposed as a lie you contended to be not a lie but a sheer fabrication.

Wherefore, since our confrontation brings me to realize that you are so keen as to split fabrication from falsehood with Tenedian<sup>393</sup> precision, which amounts to the same thing as extricating yourself from a mistaken lie by implicating yourself in a deliberate one, I will not make any more difficulties for you about this matter. You can claim the victory provided that we agree on this one point (and if not I will then win the point with sworn witnesses, whom you burned to a crisp, but who live to this day to expose and mock your fabrications); let us agree, I repeat, that apart from this one point, which you could have summed up in one little line — namely, that two ships were burned — all the other things your volume sings of with such tragic clamor are nothing but your fabrications.

Now, then, since you have driven and beaten me back from your camp in this way, I am forced to retreat to defend my own camp; in which I quake with terror lest so fierce an enemy, so rudely challenged, so mortally offended, fired up by so recent a victory, chasing me all the way from his bulwarks, which I had assaulted so feebly and he had defended so stoutly, all the way to my camp, to which I returned in such wild disarray, should now overwhelm me. I quake all the more violently at this prospect because of those siege-engines of yours, known for his history of France, De rebus francorum <sup>391</sup> See EE 4: 130. <sup>392</sup> day and night: See Adages 32.4 (CWE 31: 337).

<sup>388</sup> unknown <sup>389</sup> James IV of Scotland besieged Norham Castle in August 1513 and held in until he was defeated at Flodden Field in September. <sup>390</sup> (ca. 1460–1529)

<sup>393</sup> For the king of Tenedos's axe, see Adages 82.9 (CWE 32: 197).

which so forcefully launch against me not those trifling objections which you scarcely deigned to deflect when I cast them at you, namely, that you had engrafted lines stolen from the ancients among 5 your melodious trifles,<sup>394</sup> that you had covered over the imbecility of your talent with a flimsy veneer of words which in no way disguises it, and that you lied with outrageous impudence. You consider that praiseworthy provided it is called fabrication. No,
 10 you charge me instead with barbarisms, and solecisms, and syllables which do not scan quite consistently. Good Lord, what atrocious and impious infractions these are! If compared to those others, how monstrous! For those are your only material 15 objections; the rest is mere verbal abuse, as you cry “fool,” “madman,” or “raving idiot” time and time again. Such name-calling is simply your seasoning of Attic wit, introduced as a condiment to render a book which is insipid in its own right still more 20 insipid. With those syllables and solecisms, on the other hand, you assault and beset me most stoutly.

But yet, Brixius, there is one more way in which you hedge me in more ruthlessly still; and indeed, you are ruthless beyond all equity and justice, 25 since you are not content to have assaulted me but you also insist on prescribing which arms I may use to defend myself. Thus you command imperiously that I must not attribute to Froben any of the errors which you impute to me personally. Observe how 30 uncivil you are on this point, and inequitable, too: though you knew that my work was printed in Basel, while I stayed in England, and though you cannot doubt that I was too busy at that time to be able to cross over to Basel from London twice daily, you
 35 still choose to throw up to the author whatever mistakes you discover in that little work and to ascribe none at all to the printer. If the same law which you applied to me ought to apply to you, I am sure that hereafter, if anything of yours is printed in any place
 40 where you do not have ready access to the press of your printer, you will furnish us with plenty of darts we can turn against you,<sup>395</sup> much the same as those you now launch at us as if each by itself could transfix us. A clear confirmation of that point is yielded 45 by this very tract, which you did oversee, in which you are so fierce in imputing mistakes generated by others to me that at times you impute to me

even mistakes which you generated: though it was printed with you standing by and continually correcting the forms as the sheets were removed from 50 the press, once the volume was finished, if you had not furnished corrections for your publisher’s errors or some one had not furnished corrections for yours, then your book would contain neither fewer nor 55 more tolerable faults than the ones which you now so insipidly sneer at in mine. But not even now have you thoroughly emended your book, since you left, here and there, some warts fouler than any tumor.

Indeed, I can defend my own cause on this point even without shifting any of the blame onto Froben, 60 although he himself wrote me a letter<sup>396</sup> confessing that his workers were careless in printing my book and promising to reprint it more diligently. And in any event, even if I saw that certain passages had been corrupted through no fault of mine, none-
 65 theless I could not automatically place the blame on him, since I knew that Froben had not received any copy text from me; for the poems in which I celebrated the king’s coronation and the poems in 70 which I made fun of you are virtually the only ones which I myself ever published or had ever intended to publish. And if either my friends or my servants made themselves copies of my booklet when it was not guarded carefully enough—either by me or 75 by someone to whom I had lent it (although not for copying)—and if it happened that people who liked my book thought that it should be published, it is not at all surprising that the copyist should 80 have made some mistakes or that the typesetter should have added others, since he had to rely on a copy text which was somewhat corrupt and quite possibly difficult to make out. It is hardly fair for you to blame me for corruptions caused by the errors or inattentiveness of others, and to condemn 85 me for ignorance based on someone else’s lack of expertise—unless you will automatically declare a man illiterate and decree that he be hooted out of all learned men’s company if he has been just a bit careless about keeping his letterboxes shut tightly.

And if there can be no doubt that the book is 90 marred by faults not my own, since it was set up in type and, before that, transcribed by a number of hands, I can scarcely be led to believe that you yourself do not tacitly absolve me in private of the very

394 melodious trifles: See Horace, Ars poetica 322; Adages 2598 (CWE 35: 177).

395 plenty . . . you: See Adages 51 (CWE 51: 100–1). 396 not extant same errors of which you accuse me in public with such blatant calumny. If, on the contrary, you do have a deep-seated, fixed, obstinate sense that whatever you found uncorrected ought promptly to be 5 blamed on me, I can no more exonerate myself before you than I can wash the clay out of a brick.<sup>397</sup> See, then, how civilly I will deal with you. For although (as you see) I can carry the point, before equitable judges, that many of the faults you impute

 10 to me should be assigned to others (unless something occurred in the printing of my book which has never occurred in the printing of any book at all, that is, that neither the typesetter nor the copyist ever made one mistake); although in the very instances
 15 which you belabor most exultantly of all as my surest infractions, I can prove with the surest of arguments that your own judgments are either most slanderous or at any rate most ill-conceived, partly by bringing forth authoritative testimonies according 20 to which it will be crystal clear that many expressions which you take to task are correct, partly by bringing forth those very pages in which I once published those few poems I mentioned, which will make it quite clear that what I composed and 25 circulated is different from what Froben printed, whether it happened because of some illegible copy text, or because of inattentiveness, or because some copyist preferred something which I myself changed by cancellations in the first version (for 30 who can adequately divine by how many accidents a flaw may steal in, or by what fortune it happens to almost every author that even among the earliest copies the readings occasionally vary?); although, as I said, I am able to do all these things, nonetheless, 35 Brixius, since you displayed so much civility in defending yourself that you brought to bear almost nothing which had any real bearing on the case (whether some sense of shame struck you dumb, so that you could not utter the things you had thought 40 of, or your hurry to vilify me kept you from it), I have decided to recompense you with a corresponding civility in arguing my own case. With respect to mistakes such as these, I shall simply defer my defense for the present. It would be useless to you, 45 since you can never be satisfied, and unnecessary for others, since I doubt that you will have persuaded anybody at all that the things which you tax are directly ascribable to me. Indeed, I am sure that every equitable reader would imagine almost any explanation on his own rather than presume me to be so 50 extraordinarily ignorant as to know nothing about either placement in a verse or solecisms in phrasing.

But even if your claim that these errors are mine did prevail, still, since I myself did not publish the book (a fact which is too manifest for even you to 55 be able to sidestep), what right do you have to reproach a writer whose work was snatched away and published while he was still thinking it over, and who can fairly cite that line of Ovid's, "I would have emended if I had been given the chance"?<sup>398</sup> If 60 anyone has a right to use this line, I most certainly do. For apart from those verses which I had already published some time ago, I was going to suppress the whole book permanently, and I would not have 65 published even those unless readers more literate than I had liked them more than I did. To me personally, none of my writings has ever seemed at all savory till now, when I see from your bilious response that there must have been some touch of salt 70 in the mockery with which I have chafed you. But if I had at some point decided to make the book public, I would certainly have changed various things in it; not because I would think a syllabic mistake so important, but because several poems in it were 75 somewhat more frivolous than I would have liked them to be. But if I went astray anywhere in my scansion of syllables, even though I would not have been reluctant to correct them, nonetheless in one or two places perhaps I would not have strained too
 80 hard to change them, especially where I could not readily make a change without damaging the sense, for I find that not only those authors who surpass you just as much as you pompously scorn them but also very ancient authors did not always scan the same syllables in just the same way, so that there are 85 many syllables which may be either long or short.

Finally, this circumstance too lessens my grief at the thought that someone should imagine all the faults you carped at were mine: among these very faults I note some which are not mine, and yet I 90 would not be ashamed to avow them; nor do I have any doubt that examples will occur to everyone, as he reads, which will show that many of the things which you called solecisms on our part are actually Latin through and through.<sup>399</sup> Indeed, to sum up,
 95 even if you had better cause to criticize some points,

<sup>397</sup> wash . . . brick: See Adages 348 (CWE 31: 356). <sup>398</sup> Ovid, Tristia 1.7.40 <sup>399</sup> through and through: See Adages 3930 (CWE 36: 502–3).

you cannot with certainty impute them to me, since I neither took part in the proofreading nor provided a copy text to be used in the printing nor published the book at all; on the other hand, in those instances when your own judgments are either mistaken or wantonly slanderous, which undoubtedly make up more than half of the total, you have convicted yourself of ignorance or slanderous knavery, and in either case, certainly, of egregious shamelessness, since even as you write so insolently and so gratuitously, in phrases you pondered for such a long time and addressed to a man you now challenge a second time, a man whom you rashly and haughtily urge to scrutinize you in the same way, you still criticize so many things with which nothing is wrong, whether ignorance blinds you to what you are doing or envy makes you do it all too clear-sightedly. But even after you have displayed so much vigor of this sort by blowing down all I have written in a single breath, so to speak, smug and breathing an air of sheer glory you urge me to sift through your writings, in turn; doubtless you are quite certain that all of your writings are so finely wrought that not even a Momus can find a single syllable to pick at.<sup>400</sup>

For my part, Brixius, I would much rather sift through books from which I might sift out something good. But still I did read this book of yours, though I neither expected nor found any fruitful material in it; and I read it all the more carefully since it was written against me, and since an angry enemy will often blurt out faults which ought to be remedied, but which love can occasionally endear to one's friends, or which they do not mention lest they injure his feelings. Thus, I did read attentively, but in the following way. While I never paid any heed to the task which you set me — namely, that I should be punctilious in examining your syllables — wherever you had anything substantial to say I assuredly pondered it with no little diligence. And yet, however much I abhor the thought of idling away my energies stalking syllables, certainly that monosyllable “mind,” which I had found wanting in the Chordigera, also turned out to be so completely absent from the Antimorus<sup>401</sup> — though I searched for it conscientiously, and not only I but many others too — that the title of your book, short as it is, still seems to everyone to be longer by a half than it should be: your work should be called, not The Anti-Moron, but The Moron. This new title seems all the more fitting in view of the way you witlessly affect a reputation for wit by punning on my name,<sup>402</sup> as if fortune had not made it possible even for total barbarians to joke in this way about Ermolao Barbaro.<sup>403</sup> To joke in this way about Thomas More's name is also possible for Germanus Brixius, a true and germane cousin-german to a work which is truly, germanely named Moron. While I inspected that book very attentively indeed, I found nothing else in it but mad allegations which either criticize things written correctly or reproach me with someone else's errors or directly recoil upon your head. Further, many of your abuses suited me so prettily that they appear to be just as well suited for anyone. I hear currish barking, but it is barked out in vain; rabid biting, but it lacerates you alone; viperish virulence, but it harms only you. Since this is the sort of thing you had to say, I do not wonder at all that you fear lest perchance I will not have the patience to read what no one could endure to read to the end unless (here we have Brixius's sole charm) all these things were sweetened with entertaining delusions. They afford me personally such a powerful incentive to smile at that moronic Antimorus of yours that as soon as I have the leisure I am going to see to it that it is reprinted, somewhat more carefully than it has been printed already, and maybe even elucidated with commentaries; note how far I am from begrudging you any of that glory which makes you a god in your own eyes when you hiss at the name More, which you find so despicable, and with that book of yours, with so polished, so erudite, so charming, so festive, and finally so inspired a performance, you consecrate the venerable name Brixius to immortal infamy. Lest the admirable gifts of this book should perchance elude the yawning reader, we will point out a few examples to spur him on, as it were, to penetrate more profoundly into the book and observe more attentively what charming jests, witticisms, pleasantries, honey and treacle, and, indeed, what a milky torrent of persuasiveness streams forth from the Gallic headwaters.

I will begin, therefore, where you began, with the hendecasyllables you wrote to Macrin.<sup>404</sup> In these, as if in the frontispiece of your work, you inscribed a

400 Momus . . . pick at: See Adages 474 (CWE 31: 448–50). 401 Antimorus is the name of the tract Brixius had just issued against Thomas More. 402 See CW 3.2: 486, 496–98, 512. 403 (1454–93), an Italian scholar 404 Brixius's friend, Salomonius Macrinus

distinctive announcement of your imbecility. For at first you made Macrin your Homeric Stentor, your Nestor<sup>405</sup> to boot, long established as the finest of poets, but now unexpectedly sallying forth as an orator too, and an orator so comely and so vehement that his power of persuasion, which the comely one, Venus, had charged with such numerous graces and charms, could manipulate your feelings however he pleased; you could not stand firm against his insistence that the Antimorus should come out at once, and therefore you brought out the volume under his auspices, since you had not been able to withstand his urgings. Then, a little while later, forgetting yourself, you deny that for all his insistence and his oratory he could ever have compelled you to issue that splendid elephantine offspring before nine full years had elapsed. But so as not to let the comeliness of your invention go to waste by suppressing so comely a tract even a little too long—since taunts, unless hurled back at once, never win any acclaim—you were forced to hasten, and, in order that your tract against my epigram might come out lightning—quick, in just a few years, you were forced to dash off individual lines in approximately two days apiece. But since in these lines your talent does not even sustain you long enough to make it through your first page with a consistent pace, or without losing your train of thought so prodigiously and contradicting yourself so flagrantly through a lapse of memory that, although you at first made Macrin out to be a sufficiently powerful orator to force you to think the way he does, you now in almost the next line say he failed to persuade you at all; although you wrote at first that he forced you to issue your book, since supposedly you could not withstand so much honeyed persuasion, you immediately assert that he never could have spoken so deftly as to lure the book from you; thus, Brixius, since you trip up on the very threshold,<sup>406</sup> as I was saying, and in lines so long polished and repolished, with such sustained effort on your part, you write the same sort of drivel which morons blurt out on the spur of the moment, who can fail to agree with the lines where you try to win over your reader as if with a bribe of delight, where you promise that he will obtain great delight from your poem if he reads conscientiously?<sup>407</sup> Obtain great delight he assuredly will, unless he is so stone-faced that he does not even laugh at the kind of performance, the only kind almost, through which those to whom nature denies any wit raise men's laughter, namely by talking sheer nonsense, in pure contradictions and paradoxes, as if they are lost in a daydream. Though I will not dissemble the fact that some think this is not a foolish caprice but a cunning one, as if you had set out to be witty in making a laughingstock out of Macrin, since you make him out to be so sweet and so vehement an orator, and finally so able to sway you with his suave address, that on the one point where his comely persuasion attempts to persuade you, it fails to persuade you. I, at any rate, have no such suspicion. For Macrin, it seems, merits more loving treatment from you than that you should be laughing at him, and the rest of your book approximates a very different kind of felicity more nearly than this sort of wiliness. Hence you had no reason for toiling so artfully to disguise how long you had hung on to your book; just as delay detracts from the acclaim which is given to taunts, even so time and labor set off your sort of wit to advantage. For whenever you say something that is egregiously obtuse, the more you travail in preparing it the more acclaim greets your producing it.

And that is another remarkable touch of urbanity, indeed, when you vindicate the truthfulness of your lies by reiterating a lie, where you once again make Hervé out to be saving his homeland, again take out your trumpet and sound him the victor, again harp on him harring and troubling our fleet, even though all these claims are as truthful as you are. Now the proof you adduce here is wonderful indeed. For you say that the things you recount are attested by Englishmen's deaths. If you mean any deaths but those of the men who were killed in the Regent, those deaths are as truthful as that victory was. If, on the contrary, you are trying to reproach us with the deaths of the men who perished in the burning of the Regent, call me fool just as much as you like, I am not such a fool that I fail to perceive that on this point your acumen is as dull as a pestle,<sup>408</sup> since you reproach us with the fact that our ship was burned up as if yours felt a chill while ours

405 Stentor was the herald of the Greek forces in the Trojan War; see Adages 1237 (CWE 33: 150). Homer's Nestor was known for his long-winded speeches; see Adages 156 (CWE 31: 196–97). 406 trip . . . threshold: See Adages 477 (CWE 31: 452).

407 See CW 3.2: 484. 408 dull as a pestle: See Adages 2521 (CWE 35: 125); Jerome, Epistolae 69.4 (PL 22: 657).

blazed, or as if you could prove Hervé the victor because his ship was first to catch fire. So this is what Brixian acumen is! So this is a Brixian victory!

5 But it is worthwhile to observe with what artfulness you handle that passage in which I record among the praises of our prince how he had restored and reformed a commonwealth which had previously been deformed by certain men's crimes, avarice, depredations, incrimination, and calumnies. Even though you decided to leave none of my writings untouched by your own inept calumnies, against this passage you stir up the most pointless tumults of all. You worry this passage with wondrous and unalloyed slanders. On this passage you 15 pour all the splendid and admirable virulence your talent affords you. Here I seemed overweening to you for attempting so weighty a theme, one so vastly exceeding my powers, as if I had taken it upon myself to relate all the praises deserved by our prince, 20 and had not done the same thing in offering due homage to princes that everyone does, even toward the saints, without any reproach, in accord with his own inclinations. Others were competing to celebrate such a happy beginning of our prince's reign, 25 so advantageous to us from the very first day, and I did the same to the best of my abilities, in whatever manner of verse I was able to write. In this regard I do not doubt that it could have been praised both more richly, by more expert writers, and more 30 worthily, by more distinguished ones; even so, others' actions would not have absolved me of my personal duty, and my poems kept no one from doing as I did, or claiming at will the same liberty to do so. Most important of all, whoever decrees that our 35 prince ought to be praised by no one who cannot sustain the whole weight of so great a theme envies our king's attainments under a pretext of admiring them: while everyone ought to extol them, he bids everyone to keep permanently silent about them.

40 But at this point, if the gods will allow it, you summon Apelles<sup>409</sup> back up from the infernal regions, which indeed is no difficult feat for you, if, as you write, you are on such familiar terms with the infernal Furies. Meanwhile you yourself prove 45 to be such a consummate master of portraiture that even though anyone wishing to paint a definitive portrait must take care, above all, to observe

what features and what disposition are so characteristic of this or that subject that when these are set forth in a likeness they will render the countenance most recognizable, the way you insist that the king be portrayed prescribes that we simply leave 50 out of the picture the crowning appeal of his reverend face, one so rare and distinctively his, although this alone renders him most recognizable.<sup>410</sup> For to 55 you, a completely blind painter, I clearly seem stupider than a stump since I did not foresee that I ought not to touch on those praises which in our prince's case were preeminently worth mentioning, whether for the people's sake or for his own; for although I concede that these praises are not poetic 60 in the same way as Brixian praises (since you suppose nothing poetic except what is fabricated), even so there was no one in England who failed to sense through some personal benefit that these praises are 65 true, nor is anyone living so senseless that he does not sense them to be truly regal, unless you can invent for us some feat more regal than to remake a realm which is everywhere crumbling and to render it once again prosperous and happy. 70

Nor does the honor we give to the present prince detract anything from his forebear's acclaim, whose ill health was the cause of his failure for several years before his death to show adequate vigor in either public or domestic matters. Therefore we have no 75 cause to marvel, and certainly no cause to blame him, if through the perfidy of certain men whom he trusted too much the commonwealth declined; as it swayed on the brink of collapse, his own son rose propitiously to right it, and did so with such 80 purposeful haste that he captured and curbed the felons whose crime had produced the calamity, and he immediately reformed the whole realm before letting himself be adorned with the crown. Nor did it seem to him, nor to any sane person, at any 85 rate, that he injured his father in righting his fatherland when it had been bowed down because of his father's ill health and the malice of others, or in dealing severely with those through whose perfidy, mortally threatening his fatherland, his father had 90 been led astray, or in rescinding some of his father's laws, although these were not disadvantageous for the people, for the sake of some greater advantage, changing good for the better. Even to you, does it seem a portentous impiety if the son's regal virtue quickly accomplished what sickness denied to his father's felicity; if, for the good of his fatherland, for the strength of the laws, for the honor of his father, he suppressed the despoilers of his fatherland, the beguilers of his father, the subverters of the laws; or if, finally, the son surpassed even that most prudent father in prudence and showed in one case more discernment in governing the commonwealth? Since our prince's actions respecting these matters not only had beneficial results in the context of current affairs but also afforded the future so wholesome a regal example, and thereby established him prince of all princely attainments, I would certainly not have been deterred from praising these actions of his even if some blame had been thrown back on his father; nor would we ever have deferred so completely to our sense of respect for the father that it could have preempted the praise which was due to the deed of his son, since in no age has any prince ever performed any deed which was worthier of praise or which it could be more in the public interest to memorialize.

409 Apelles was a famous painter of ancient Greece (ca. 4th century BC).

See CW 3.2: 494, 510. 410 crowning... recognizable: See Plato, Republic 2.378d.

Nor would I ever have assigned such importance to fortune, or even to nature, that I could have preferred the vain splendor of either to the true glory of such an illustrious virtue. Who our parents are is theirs to determine; a good man's only true commendation is virtue. "Our race and our forebears, whatever we have not obtained by ourselves, I scarce call those things ours."<sup>411</sup> Neither Vergil nor Homer, whom you set against me,<sup>412</sup> ever said anything either truer or more wholesome than this maxim taken from Ovid. However much I esteem both the writers you mention, they will never prevail on my judgment to such an extent that I will concede as much authority on this point to both put together as I concede Plato alone. He does actually consider it highly desirable, an aim which we ought to pursue with all possible care, that children should have honorable people for parents,<sup>413</sup> since in this way, to speak metaphorically, a seedbed of good nature and virtue is secretly fostered in these children when they are born; nonetheless, while he considers the good offspring of good parents to be somewhat more fortunate than others, even so he supposes the good son of a bad father to deserve greater praise, and quite rightly. For if a person is all the more dishonorable if he degenerates from an eminent father, does it not hold, in turn, that more praise is due to someone who is drawn in the opposite direction by the example of a bad parent but has nonetheless grown eminent by his virtue and his good deeds? Thus, since these were his own views, undoubtedly the one sort of poet that "Plato should have driven from his state"<sup>414</sup> was the flattering sort, like yourself, who command that we adulate princes according to the endowments of fortune or nature, and will not let us praise them according to virtue, which we ought to praise even if it costs us the windy esteem of the people;<sup>415</sup> even contrary to the ordinary ideas of the masses, whose taste generally runs to the worst things in life, we should little by little instill proper values in men's hearts with the sweetness of verses.

Accordingly, as I have said, even if some blame had come to rest on the father I would not have suppressed the praise due to the son, which indeed he would have earned all the more richly by resolving to remedy the error of his father instead of to imitate it. And I would have proceeded in this way, deferring and hearkening to reason alone, even if I saw that all of the poets and all of the masses saw things just the opposite way. Note how far I am from regretting that I did not keep silent about those deeds the infamy of which falls on those who exploited the father's credulity and served their own profit through public misfortune, while a vast and an undying glory accrues to the son, since he so quickly punished the guilty and restored the commonwealth, and thus redeemed father and fatherland at once, making good his devotion toward both. But you, who are such an egregious praiser, brandish your censor's rod at the principal element of his regal praise, the same one that the whole of our people in public and private avows as the prince of all praises and that which befits England's prince best of all, one so far from detracting from his father's memory that it actually affords him his own crowning honor, since he himself fathered this prince who now governs the realm with the true regal arts, and you command that this praise be expunged, on no other account, I suppose, than because it is true. Indeed, nothing meets with your sanction apart from

<sup>411</sup> Ovid, Metamorphoses 13.140–41
<sup>412</sup> See CW 3.2: 492. <sup>413</sup> See Plato,

Republic 415a–c. <sup>414</sup> CW 3.2: 494; see Plato, Republic 2.378d–358e, 10.59a–608a.

<sup>415</sup> windy... people: See Horace, Carmina 3.2.20.

that poetic product of yours which is wholly conflated from fabrication and falsehood. For your poetry, as you assure us, “will cease to be poetry at all if you take that away.”<sup>416</sup> But since our prince did 5 these things not in secret, by night, as if he were ashamed of his good deeds, but in the brightest daylight, in the sight of everyone, in private and public hearings, in councils, in the amplest assembly of the entire realm, and in accord with the commons
 10 as well as the nobles; since every age, order, and sex saw how splendid his policy was, sensed how wholesome it was, and praised to the heavens how noble it was; should I actually have been the one person to leave out the one thing which I should extol most 15 of all? How even the youngsters<sup>417</sup> would laugh at my not mentioning what Brixius now has attacked me for mentioning; for to these very youngsters I would rightly have seemed either the stupidest of men, if I had not perceived it, or the most malignant of men, if I had not admired it, or the most envious of men, if I had not praised it.

And yet it is hard to tell which is worse in the way that you worry this passage, your pointlessness or your invidiousness; you are so head-over-heels 25 in your blind rushing on that unwittingly you very nearly brand our prince with ignorance, and indeed, since you make your prince our prince’s equal, you brand yours with ignorance equally. Nor yet, in the meantime (though assuredly this is your style all the 30 time), do your words show the slightest consistency. For at first you concede to our prince some concern for the Latian muse, but so little that he may not know the rules governing versification; soon you make him so ignorant that he does not even know 35 what the words mean; and yet you couple your king with him, so that both kings are equally “filled with the genius of the Cecropian goddess.”<sup>418</sup> These statements cohere none too handsomely, do they? But this is nothing new, that in every other line you 40 should lose your own train of thought.

Yet you call me a thrifty and stingy praiser,<sup>419</sup> even though you yourself are such an ungenerous praiser that when you wished to apply to two princes the same praise that Vergil attributed to shepherds you 45 pared away something, as if you supposed it too sumptuous, and (as you generally do to whatever you imitate) you altered his praise for the worse.

For his verse reads as follows, describing two shepherds, “both being in the flower of their age,”<sup>420</sup> while your own reads, describing two princes, “both 50 equal in age.”<sup>421</sup> In that way, Vergil aptly expresses in those shepherds age at its most flourishing; your praise, even though you appropriate it for princes like these, who are truly in the flower of their age, is nonetheless so ambiguous that it could befit two 55 decrepit and cadaverous old men. Further, the praise you tack on about virtue is not at all generous, since the way you concede each king virtue leaves you free to revoke it at will. For while you pronounce both to be “equal in virtues,” you never affirm there to 60 be any virtues in either; in case you have not heard, men are just as much equals who lack something equally as men are who equally possess it.

I do not say this because I think that was your meaning but rather to show just how easy it is to 65 discover a vulnerable passage if anyone examines your praises in the same way that you slander mine. Nor yet do I here invoke any Apelles and Alexander, any Choerilus, beating, or exile, nor do I advance any such tragedies against you as you stir up 70 against me. But if the action in question were any less widely appreciated and our prince were as ignorant as you make him out to be, what dire peril you might have brought down on me! For it is almost impossible for anyone who is involved in political 75 business to forestall the appearance of someone, at some point, who would gladly seize any occasion for slander if either the action in question admitted his cavils or he could exploit any ignorance on the part of the prince, especially if there
 80 are some persons who would like the whole state of affairs to be violently changed for the worse, since they dislike the way that the present state of affairs is more prosperous for the public at large than for them by themselves. But these men, if there are any 85 such men, themselves saw the way that the action in question was done and advanced, not with any clandestine machinery, but out in the public domain; they themselves perceive how much our prince excels them in their favorite arts, he who beat down, 90 suppressed, and stamped out the vipers time and time again, every time that they crept out of hiding as if to lie basking in the new sun which follows a winter and to try to pour forth again their old venom of calumny; hence they themselves are quite aware that their own harmful longings have lost every hope of fulfilment.

<sup>416</sup> CW 3.2: 490. <sup>417</sup> even the youngsters: CW 3.2: 492, 494, 510; Cecrops was a mythical king of Athens. <sup>419</sup> See

3.2: 494. <sup>420</sup> Vergil, Eclogues 7.4
<sup>421</sup> CW 3.2: 510

And yet, Brixius, even though what you write is 5 not just absurd and pointless, but criminal as well, and indeed as pernicious as you have been able to make it, nonetheless you name Deloynes, Budé, and Lascaris,<sup>422</sup> men revered by the whole world for 10 their learning and virtue (whose names deserved greater respect than that you should contaminate them with such a tract as yours, as if setting jewels in the mire), and force them to enlist, as it were, in your faction; for you claim that these men were 15 brought in to review and to aid in the planning of your ill-planned plans. But though I myself cannot vouch for their feelings regarding those syllables and solecisms with which you reproach me (and even concerning these points I would not shy away from their judgment if they could hear me out), I 20 am fully convinced that those men have such a thorough knowledge of philosophical principle and such a practical mastery of political principles that if you can extort an endorsement from any of them on this issue, at any rate — that is, if you can get him 25 to attest his agreement with you on the subject of praising kings — I will give way to you on all the rest of the issues and freely surrender my praise; though at present I cannot help suspecting what everyone thinks, that those infernal Furies (who you confess 30 stood by you while you were writing) were the ones who inspired such a plan in you; for whether you look at its fury or its virulence, it recalls very clearly indeed its Tartarean<sup>423</sup> origin.

But once, at long last, while emerging from hell 35 by Trophonius's cave,<sup>424</sup> as it seems, you are cheered and break out into jesting, and with the laughter of an angry cur you snarl at my letter, in which I attribute the tardiness of my booklet to the illuminator whose gout had caused it to be given to the king 40 somewhat later than I had intended. You do not like this plea; superstitiously poetic, the man cannot bear that the truth should be told, and outdoes any courtier's refinement in laughing at me for using, as I tell the prince of a thing which is not at all 45 obscene, the same words that the people use. Who will not laugh at whoever laughs thus?

Further, I do not understand what that taunt means, although it seems to smack of some well-hidden wit, in which you indicate that my household concerns interfere with my studies. Perhaps 50 you are advancing this saying as an artful expedient to win precedence for your own studies on the basis that you have no household, but free and untrammled by cares you roam back and forth between other men's plates like a parasite, and thus 55 your poem must needs be preeminent because it is nourished by leisure and other men's bread. I for one thought more highly of you, and I still do today, even though, to speak truthfully, your tract does recall both Pyrgopolynices and Artotrogos.<sup>425</sup> 60 And I fail to see how it pertains to the matter at hand when you reproach me for having a household unless you have no household, since otherwise that festive jest or that excellent bon mot, as one Plautine parasite puts it, would simply recoil on you. 65

At any rate, even as I persuade myself that you are not an out-and-out parasite (however your book may enforce that impression), I do truly suspect that you are a philosopher of the Cynical sect, not only because of your barking but also because I 70 observe how you everywhere make fun of riches and everywhere applaud beggary and famine. For you joke at my children's expense and you write of their misery if they were to have for their legacy only my lines, and not also my coins, as if yours will be happy 75 with nothing beyond the lines of their father.<sup>426</sup> But for my part I pray that your children, if you have any or ever should have any, may never have any experience of the gallows or beggary, the ills which ur-banely, of course, you forebode for my children, and 80 I pray from my heart that some richer fortune may dawn for them from some other source than your lines, since no one is, I think, so demented that he would buy three hundred thousand of those for a threepence, at least not of the sort you have blurted 85 out up to now.

That other jest smacks of similar wit when you liken yourself to a famished wolf, as if you would have swallowed me up all at once, like a wretched lamb, if the two kings had not ratified the peace 90 for my benefit; but now that the peace has been made you consider it wicked to quarrel, and so now,

<sup>422</sup> François Deloynes (ca. 1468–1524), Guillaume Budé (1468–1540), Joannes Lascaris (ca. 1445–1535) <sup>423</sup> Tartarus was the deepest pit of the Underworld in Greek mythology. <sup>424</sup> Those who returned from the cave of Trophonius would never smile again; see Adages 677 (CWE 32: 113–15). <sup>425</sup> One is a bully and the other a parasite in Plautus's Miles gloriosus.

<sup>426</sup> See CW 3.2: 504.

at last, you have published that meek little tract of yours. But that was an utterly heavenly invention when you fabricated all those Baneful Spirits, and those pretty infernal Graces, the Furies, to be—your darling girlfriends, to play with and gladden your leisure.<sup>427</sup> You seem to be imitating certain clever clowns who discern in themselves either physical deformities or moral depravities which are vulnerable either to scoffs or to scandals. These master-buffoons mock their own flaws: since they cannot circumvent disrepute they can at least outstrip their own rivals in seizing a pretext for carping and, rather than give up the game, hold a triumph at their own expense. Similarly, when you saw that the spirit which breathed through your own Antimorus was not only moronic but maniacal to boot, since you saw how apparent to everyone it would be from what quarter this furor was loosed, you chose rather to take the initiative by joking about your own Furies, feigning that they had spontaneously offered their services to you, since of course you are such a close friend to them all and the most firmly sworn of their votaries, and that you would then loose them upon me.

There is one thing that I suspect no one is ever going to read without judging that it is an outstanding mark of your ingenuity and a stroke of distinctively Brixian urbanity: after painting me in your own image, in lines which are worthy of you, you were worried that your self-portrait might not do you justice, and so, in a marginal note, you marked “litigious wrangler,”<sup>428</sup> since you wished to say that in my fatherland that is my status. Brixius, I do not say what my status at home is, lest I be like you; I deserve no such glory as you grant yourself, and I crave no such glory as other men grant you. But you have made it possible to recognize, even abroad, what your status at home is: you wish to be styled a queen’s secretary,<sup>429</sup> but you rant at a king’s privy councilor with more rabid impudence than anyone would rant, even at a wrangler, unless he himself were a wrangler.

And since this is the way you conduct yourself all through your tract, it is worthwhile to observe how you take up the part of an augur, of course, and divine that henceforth in return for your own friendly service toward me I will act as an enemy toward you, even though you picked out my shameful errors with pious concern for the honor of their author, an ingrate, however, who you think will never repay you except with ill thanks. You handle that marvelous conceit, drawn from rhetoric’s innermost shrine, with such zeal that you practically take on a preacher’s part, too; you throw in the word “Christian,” too often, and frequently harp on the title of “sinner,”<sup>430</sup> as if you were concerned with the health of my soul, and all but insist I do penance for my solecisms, I suppose since the kingdom of God is at hand.<sup>431</sup> I myself, indeed, Brixius, will not be reluctant to render your augury concerning me false, since I never resolved upon being your enemy. Nor am I so inhuman as not to acknowledge such a friendly service toward me on the part of a man so desirous of serving my fame that in defamatory tracts, published and printed against me, he whispers of others’ mistakes in my ear<sup>432</sup> as if they were my own; a man so careful of my honor that before he will pass up the chance to inveigh against me with false calumnies he dishonors his own name with truthful disgrace; a man so intent on my welfare that he arraigns my prince for either impiety or ignorance if he does not simply exterminate me. Nor yet am I so stupid as not to sense just how indebted I am for indulgence like this from a man who is so circumspect that he cannot remember what he wants to say from one line to the next, as if he had just drunk up a draught out of Lethe;<sup>433</sup> so noble a palm<sup>434</sup> that he not only stands upright despite other men’s maledictions but even weighs himself down with his own; so stout and unvanquished a pugilist that, using the club which he pilfered from Hercules, he is everywhere violently at odds with himself; so keen-sighted and Lynceus-like<sup>435</sup> that he fails to perceive that his own taunts recoil on him; so refined that he counts “madman,” “fool,” “lunatic,” “cur,” and “wrangler” among his urbanities; of so placid and tranquil a nature that when he proclaims someone “faith-breaking,” “perfidious,” and “perjured,” he abstains nonetheless from abuse; so great a champion of poetry that he

427 See CW 3.2: 510. 428 CW 3.2: 512
429 See CW 3.2: 482. 430 See CW 3.2:
536. 431 kingdom . . . hand: See Mt 3:2.
432 whispers . . . ear: See Adages 247 (CWE 31: 276). 433 draught out of Lethe: Lethe was a river in the Underworld that caused forgetfulness; see Adages 1855 (CWE 34: 111).

434 so noble a palm: The palm was thought to grow higher when a weight was placed on it; see Adages 204 (CWE 31: 237–38);

Aulus Gellius 3.6. 435 keen-sighted and Lynceus-like: See CW 3.2: 540; Adages 1054 (CWE 33: 487); Praise of Folly (ASD 4/3: 148, 154).

orders that she should be held in contempt, warning all in advance not to covet her praise, since she suffers no one to believe her; so vehement an orator that he upholds the view that a man who responds 5 to a challenge delivers the challenge, while the first to offend is the man who is challenged; so adroit at upholding the olive branch in the midst of hostilities<sup>436</sup> that in the midst of peace he is quarreling about a war; so equitable that he goes mad because 10 his book was truthfully taxed for its lying by a man whose whole people that same book, before then, had falsely indicted for perjury; so wholesome a praiser that he orders us to praise princes for their physical gifts, lets us praise them for fortune's en-15 dowments, but does not permit us to praise them for virtue except in a general way which we might use for anyone at all, and imposes a Pythagorean silence<sup>437</sup> whenever men, women, and children, and even the stones, one might say, all praise some wor-20 thy deed;<sup>438</sup> so great an Apelles that he would appear to be blackening two princes from virtually the same pot of paint<sup>439</sup> if his canvas is not viewed indulgently; so careful a Christian that if two kings had not secured me his pardon (with prayers, I sup-25 pose), Christ could never have stayed the man, ravenous beyond any wolf, from devouring me whole, like a hapless lambling, simply because he had been stung with one word in reprisal for savaging us long ago; so clever, so genial, so artful, and so thoroughly 30 and consummately wise that he himself tells us the infernal Furies are his familiars.

Thus, since that is the company you keep at home, Brixius, someone somewhere who likes to play games with such intimates as yours may well crave your acquaintance. I for one neither quail at 35 your emnity nor covet your friendship. For no one needs to fear lest the Furies will attack your enemy, as you threaten, since they are too deeply attached to you, with the most secure rivets, for anything to tear them away from a head they love so dearly.<sup>440</sup> Your 40 friends and familiars, however, risk hurt by contagion from this sort of plague. Nor will I myself be your enemy, for I cannot hate anyone whom I pity for being thus afflicted; indeed, I would certainly come to love you if I did not fear you would come to 45 love me in return, since I often have heard how annoying and harmful the love of such specters can be.

Accordingly, as far as possible, my feelings about you will remain neutral; in fact I will not so much 50 as try to find out whether you are white or black.
 But then there is no need to find that out; your own black ink has stained you as black as a coal. Still, lest I should seem to have simply forgotten so gracious a service as yours was in carefully marking the flaws in my lines and refusing to let them be blamed upon 55 anyone but me, at a time when (if you are telling the truth) you yourself were beset by the Banes and the Furies, I humbly pray for whatever shall serve to make each of us whole; that the powers above may be so propitious to me and to you that they remedy 60 both our deficiencies, correcting my uncouth expression as they purge away your uncouth thinking; that they may be so kind as to pluck out the barbarous words from my speech and those barba-65 rous morals of yours from your heart; and, at last, that they may be so good as to grant me sound feet for my verse and you a sound head for your body.<sup>441</sup>

London, in the publishing house of Pynson.

<sup>436</sup> See CW 3.2: 486. <sup>437</sup> Pythagorean silence: See Adages 3272 (CWE 36: 44).
<sup>438</sup> even . . . deed: See Lk 19:14, Adages

4117 (CWE 36: 610–11). <sup>439</sup> blackening . . . paint: See Adages 603 (CWE 32: 68).
<sup>440</sup> head . . . dearly: See Horace, Carmina

1.2.4.2. <sup>441</sup> sound . . . body: See Juvenal, Satires 10.356.

The Four Last Things

The only source for this text is Rastell's 1557 Workes. Because its running header is De quatuor novissimis, the common title has long been The Four Last Things, even though these words are not part of the Workes' title, which is A treatise (unfinished) upon these words of Holy Scripture, Memorare novissima, et in aeternum non peccabis, "Remember the last things, and thou shalt never sin" [Ecclesiastes 7:40]. Rastell states that the work dates from "about the year 1522."

According to Thomas Stapleton's biography of 1588, More began this work as a kind of writing contest with his daughter Meg: "When More wrote his book on the Four Last Things, he gave the same subject to Margaret to treat, and when she had completed her task, he affirmed most solemnly that that treatise of his daughter was in no way inferior to his own" (113). Margaret's treatise, unfortunately, has been lost. But as "More's first extended piece of writing conceived solely in English," The Four Last Things is an important example of his rhetorical "ease and lucidity," "stylistic balance and rhythm," "unlabored syntax," and "vivid, well-realized illustration," in Katherine Rodgers's account (CW 1: xciii–xciv).

More begins by praising Scripture and placing it above secular literature. Speaking of the single line from Ecclesiasticus that launches The Four Last Things, More writes that it "contains more fruitful advice and counsel" in the service of acquiring virtue and avoiding vice than many whole volumes of works of secular literature. The imperative to "remember the last things" is a "sure medicine" for readers' health, More argues, provided they "forsloth not" in receiving this counsel of Scripture.

More utilizes both "the natural light of reason" and the "spiritual light of faith" as he writes about the danger of human blindness and the propensity of human beings to seek limited pleasures over the

"profit" of their souls. More explores the nature of pleasure in this treatise, as he did in Book 2 of Utopia. Here More argues that the medicine of the four last things does not destroy pleasure, but fosters something more — namely, that "marvelous ghostly pleasure and spiritual gladness" which rises out of "the love of God, and hope of heaven, and inward liking that the godly spirit taketh in the diligent labor of good and virtuous business." The experience of such pleasure, however, requires demanding work, the "busy minding and deep consideration" of the four last things, since "in the things of the soul, knowledge without remembrance profits little."

More was about forty-four years old when he wrote The Four Last Things. In good health, he was entering the prime of his public career. As Rodgers argues, More's book has "the whole of life as its purview" (CW 1: lxxxiv), and the author's keen interest in the "details of ordinary experience" and the "all-too-natural world" of everyday life are unusual for the genre (lxxxvi). The Four Last Things is concerned as much with living "this present life" well, as More writes early in the work, as it is with preparing for eternity prudently.

Of the four medicinal "herbs" — death, judgment, heaven, and hell in the traditional phrasing, or "death, doom, pain, and joy" as More writes — the author treats only the first, the remembrance of death, and that is itself incomplete. In the course of this opening section, More also shares his thinking on the seven deadly sins, beginning with pride, the mother of all vices, and envy, the daughter of pride. More's account of the four last things and the deadly sins breaks off with his consideration of spiritual sloth, which human beings do not often perceive as a deadly sin, though More writes that sloth is "able to destroy" half the way to heaven, by undermining the desire to labor and do good in the soul.

CONTENTS

A sure medicine: superior to the philosopher's. . . . .	477
True and counterfeit pleasures
Power of conscience; labor of cultivating spiritual pleasures
“Our Lord loveth a glad giver”
A digression on silence, speech, and wandering thoughts
Remembering, not just knowing
Remembrance of death. . . . .	482
Philosophy as meditation of death
Pains of death
Sickness as inkling of death; life as a long disease
A preservation from every sin
Pride: mother of all vices. . . . .	488
Spiritual vs. fleshly vices
Death: an ointment so conscience can see
The world as a play, as a prison
Envy: daughter of pride . . . . .	490
Execution of “a great duke” [Buckingham]
Wrath: born of pride . . . . .	492
Eliminated by remembrance of death
Covetous: they seem humble, wise, Christian, rich . . . . .	494
“Have none anxiety . . . for tomorrow”
The coveting rich are really wretched beggars
Hard to heal, why
Death as ointment for the eyes
Gluttony . . . . .	498
Harmful to body and soul
What follows from it
Sloth. . . . .	502
Able to destroy one half of our way to heaven

A Treatise (vntynny)

(shed) vpon these wordes of holye Scrypture.

Memorare nouissima, & in eternum non peccabis. Remember the last thynges, and thou shalt neuer synne.

Eccle. 7.

Made about the yere of our lorde, 1522, by sir Thomas More than knyghte, and one of the pryuye counsaile of kynge Henry theight, and also vnder trealozer of Englande.

Lf there were anye questyon amonge menne, whyther the wordes of holy scripture, or the doctrine of anye secular authour, were of greater force and effecte to the weale and profyte of mannes soule, (thoughe we shold let passe to many thynges & weighty wordes, spoken by the mouth of oure saviour Christ himself, to whole heavenly wisdom, the wit of none earthly creature can be comparable yet this onely text written by the wise man in the seventh chapter of Ecclesiasticus is suche, that it containeth moze fruitfull aduise and counsaile, to the forming and framing of mannes maners in vertue, and auoyding of synne, then many whole & great volumes of the best of old philosophers, or anye other that euer wrote in secular litterature.

Long would it be to take the beste of theys wordes and compare it with these wordes of holy writ: Let vs consider the frute and profit of this in it selfe: which thyng wel aduised and pondered, shall wel declare, that of none whole volume of secular litterature, shall aryse so very fruitful doctrine. For what would a man geue for; a sure medicin, ywer of such strength, y it should al his life kepe hym fro sickness: namely if he mighte by thauoyding of sicknes be sure to contynue his life one hundred yeres: So is it nowe y these wordes geueth vs al a sure medicine (yf we for; slouth not the receiuyng) by which we shal kepe from sickness, not the body, which none health may longe kepe fro death (for dye we muste in fewe yeres liue we neuer so long) but y soul, whiche here p;serued fro the sickness of sin, shal after this eternally liue in ioy, and be p;serued from the deadly lyfe of euerlastyng payne.

Dye we must

The physicion sendeth his bill to the poticary, & ther in writteth sommetime a costlye receite of many strange herbes and rootes, set out of far countreis, log & lien byugges, al the strength woyn out, & some none such to be gotten. But thys physicion sendeth his bil to thy selfe, no strange thing therin, nothing costly to be, nothing farre to fet, but to be gathered al times of the yere in the garden of thyne owne soule.

Let vs heare than what wholesome receit this is. Remember (saith this byll) thy last thynges, and thou shalt neuer sin in this world. Here is first a short medicine, containyng onely foure herbes, comen and well knowe, y is to wit, death, dome, pain, and ioy.

Eccle. 7.

Death, dome, pain, and ioy.

This short medicine is of a marueylous force, able to kepe vs al our life fro sin. The physicion canne not geue no one medicine to every man to kepe him from sickness, but to diuers men diuers, by reason of the diuersity of diuers complexions. This medicine serueth every man. The physicion dorbe but geue a co;ecture y his receit shal do good: but thys medicine is vndoubtedly sure.

How happeth it than thou wilt happily say, that so fewe be p;serued from sin, if every man haue so sure a medicine, so ready at hand: For folk fare commonly as he doth that goeth forth fasting among sick folk for slouth, rather than he will take a litle tryacle before.

Thou wilt saye par aduventure y some parte of thys medicine is verpe bytter and paynfull to receyue. Surely there canne bee nothyng so bytter, but wyse dome would byooke it for so gret a profyte. But yet this medicine thoughe thou make a lowze face at it, is not so bytter as thou makeste for. For well thou wottest, he byddeth thee not take neyther deathe, nor dome, nor payne, but onely to remember them, and yet the ioye of heauen therewith to temper them

This title page for More's treatise on the Last Things is from the 1557 Workes of Sir Thomas More Knight (reduced).

A Will ye see the sample? Looke vpon his holy apostles, whan they were taken and scourged with whippes for chrystes sake, did it grieue them thinke ye? I imagine your self in the same case, & I thinke ye wil thinke yea. How see than for all y paine of their flethe, what toy and pleasure they conceiued in their soule. The holy scripture saith, that they reioyced & ioyed that god had accounted the woꝛthy for Chrystes sake, not onely to be scourged, but also which wold be far greater grief to an honest man than the payne it selfe, to bee scourged with dispite and shame, so that the moꝛe they payn was, the moꝛe was their ioy. For as the holy doctour saint Chrysostome saith, though paine be grieuous for the nature of y affliction, yet is it pleasaunte by the alacritie and quick mind of them that willingly suffer it. And therefore though y nature of the toꝛmentes make gret grief and payne, yet the prompt and willing mynde of them that were scourged, passed and ouercame the nature of y thing, that is to wit, masking the outwarde flethly payne with inwarde spirituall pleasure. And surely this is so trewe, y it may stande for a very certayne token, that a penitent beginneth to pꝛofite and grow in grace and fauour of god, whan he feleth a pleasure and quicknes in his laboꝛ and pain, taken in pꝛayer, almes bede, pilgrimage, fastig, discipline, tribulacion, affliction, and such other spirituall exercise, by which the soule willingly woꝛketh with the bodye by they own punishment, to purge and rub out the rusty cankerd spots, that sinne hath defiled them with, in the sight of God, and to leaue the sewer to be burned out in the fire of purgatoꝛy. And when so euer as I say y a man feleth in this pain a pleasure, he hath a token of gret grace and that his penance is pleasant to god. For as the holy scripture saith, our lord loneth a glad geuer. And on the toꝛber syde wher as one doth such spirituall busines with a dulnes of spirite & wertines of minde, he doth twyfe as much & thereby taketh foure times as much payne, sth his bodily paine is reled with no spirituall reioyce noꝛ comfoꝛt. I wil not say that his labour is lost, but I dare be bold to say, that he pꝛofitech much lesse with much moꝛe payne. For certayne it is, y the best soules, and they that haue best trauailed in spirituall busines, find most comfoꝛt therein. And therefore yf they most pleased god, that in the bodily paine of their penance toke lesse spiryту all pleasure, it should therof folow, that the farther a manne pꝛoceded in the pꝛofeccon of spirituall exercise, in y woꝛlde case he were. Which can in no wise bee so, sythe that wee see the holy apostles & other holy men and women, the better y they were, the moꝛe pleasure they partecued in their flethly afflictions, epyther put vnto them by god, oꝛ taken by them selfe for goddes sake. Therefore let euery manne by y laboꝛ of his minde and helpe of pꝛaier, fꝛoꝛce himself in all tribulacion and affliction labour paine and trauaille, without spot of pꝛide oꝛ ascribing any pꝛaize to himself to conceiue a delite and pleasure in such spirituall exercise, and thereby to ryse in the loue of our lord, with an hope of heauen, contempt of the woꝛld, and lōging to be with god. To that attaining of which mynde, by the putting awaye of the malicious pleasures of the deuil, the filthy pleasures of the flethe, and the vaine pleasures of the woꝛlde, whiche once excluded, there is place made and cleane purged, to receiue the very swete and pure pleasure of the spirite, there is not anye one thyng lightly as I haue sayd, moꝛe accommodate noꝛ moꝛe effectnall, than this thing that I haue begon with, and taken in hand to entreate, that is to wit the remembrance of the foure last thynges, which is as the scripture saythe so effectnall, that yf a mā remember it well, he shall neuer synne. Thou wilt happily say, that is is not ynough that a man do none euyl, but he must also do good. This is verve truth that ye say. But first if ther be but these two steppes to heauen, he y getteth hym on the tone is halfe by. And ouer y, who so doth none euil, it wil be very hard but he must nedes do good, syth mans mind is neuer ydle, but occupied commonly either with good oꝛ euil. And therefore whan folke haue selwe woꝛdes & bie much musyng, likewise as among many woꝛdes al be not alwaye well and wisely set, so whan the tounge lyeth still, if the mynde be not occupied well, it were lesse euil saue for woꝛldly rebuke, to blabber on trifles somewhat fortlylye, than whyle they seeme sage, in keepyng silence, secretlye paradienature the meane whyle to fantasye wyth them self, sylthy sinful deuises, wherof they tonges if they wer set on halbing, could not for shame vtter and speake the lyke.

Actes. 5.

S. Chrysost. de car. pain.

A token of gods fauor.

Pilgrimage.

Purgatoꝛy.

1. Cor. 9.

D

comfoꝛt.

pleasure in spirituall exercise.

pleasure in spirituall exercise.

G

Two steppes to heauen.

The mynde is occupied commonly.

Musyng.

W

paradienature

F

De quatuor nouissimis ("Concerning the four last things") is the section heading for each page of the 1557 Workes. This elaborate black-letter edition featured side-glosses and, to assist in referencing, letters in the margins.

The Four Last Things

A treatise (unfinished)

upon these words of Holy Scripture,

Memorare novissima, et in aeternum non peccabis,

5 “Remember the last things, and thou shalt never sin.”<sup>1</sup>

Made about the year of our Lord 1522 by Sir Thomas More then knight, and one of the Privy Council of King Henry VIII, and also Under-Treasurer of England

10 If there were any question among men whether the words of Holy Scripture, or the doctrine of any secular author, were of greater force and effect to the weal<sup>2</sup> and profit of man’s soul (though we should let pass so many short and weighty words 15 spoken by the mouth of our Savior Christ himself, to whose heavenly wisdom the wit of none earthly creature can be comparable) yet this only text written by the wise man in the seventh chapter of Ec-clesiasticus is such that it containeth more fruitful 20 advice and counsel to the forming and framing of man’s manners in virtue and avoiding of sin than many whole and great volumes of the best of old philosophers, or any other that ever wrote in secular literature.

25 Long would it be to take the best of their words and compare it with these words of Holy Writ.
Let us consider the fruit and profit of this in itself:
which thing, well advised and pondered, shall well declare that of<sup>3</sup> none whole volume of secular literature shall arise so very fruitful doctrine. For what 30 would a man give for a sure medicine that were of such strength that it should all his life keep him from sickness, namely if he might by the avoiding of sickness be sure to continue his life one hundred years? So is it now that these words giveth us all 35 a sure medicine (if we forsloth<sup>4</sup> not the receiving) by which we shall keep from sickness, not the body, which none health may long keep from death (for die we must in few years, live we never so long), but the soul, which here preserved from the sickness of sin, shall after this eternally live in joy and be pre- 40 served from the deadly life of everlasting pain.

The physician sendeth his bill<sup>5</sup> to the apothecary,<sup>6</sup> and therein writeth sometimes a costly receipt<sup>7</sup> of many strange herbs and roots, fetched out of far 45 countries, long-lain drugs, all the strength worn out, and some none such to be got. But this physician sendeth his bill to thyself, no strange thing therein, nothing costly to buy, nothing far to fetch, but to be gathered all times of the year in the garden of thine own soul. 50

Let us hear, then, what wholesome receipt this is. “Remember,” saith this bill, “thy last things, and thou shalt never sin in this world.” Here is first a short medicine containing only four herbs, common and well known: that is to wit,<sup>8</sup> death, doom, 55 pain, and joy.

This short medicine is of a marvelous force, able to keep us all our life from sin. The physician cannot give no one medicine to every man to keep him from sickness, but to diverse men diverse,<sup>9</sup> by rea- 60 son of the diversity of diverse complexions.<sup>10</sup> This medicine serveth every man. The physician doth but guess and conjecture that his receipt shall do good; but this medicine is undoubtedly sure.

How happeth it, then, thou wilt haply<sup>11</sup> say, that 65 so few be preserved from sin, if every man have so sure a medicine so ready at hand? For folk fare commonly as he doth that goeth forth fasting among

<sup>1</sup> Eccles 7:40 <sup>2</sup> well-being <sup>3</sup> out of,
from <sup>4</sup> lose, miss, neglect, spoil, or waste through sloth <sup>5</sup> medical prescription

<sup>6</sup> pharmacy <sup>7</sup> list of things to be received <sup>8</sup> say <sup>9</sup> to diverse men diverse: to different men different medicines <sup>10</sup> physical constitutions <sup>11</sup> perhaps sick folk for<sup>12</sup> sloth, rather than he will take a little treacle<sup>13</sup> before.

Thou wilt say, peradventure,<sup>14</sup> that some part of this medicine is very bitter and painful to receive.
 5 Surely there can be nothing so bitter but<sup>15</sup> wisdom would brook<sup>16</sup> it for so great a profit. But yet this medicine, though thou make a sour face at it, is not so bitter as thou makest for. For well thou wottest,<sup>17</sup> he biddeth thee not take neither death, nor doom,
 10 nor pain, but only to remember them, and yet the joy of heaven therewith to temper them withal. Now if a man be so dainty stomached<sup>18</sup> that going where contagion is he would grudge to take a little treacle, yet were he<sup>19</sup> very nicely wanton<sup>20</sup> if he might not at the leastwise take a little vinegar and rose water in his handkerchief.

Yet wot<sup>21</sup> I well that many ones will say that the bare remembrance of death alone, if a man consider it and advise it well, were able to bereave<sup>22</sup> a man of 20 all the pleasure of his life. How much more, then, should his life be painful and grievous if, to the remembrance and consideration of death, a man should add and set to<sup>23</sup> the deep imagination of the dreadful doom of God, and bitter pains of purgatory or hell, of which every one passeth and exceedeth many deaths. This is the sage saws<sup>24</sup> of such as make this world their heaven, and their lust<sup>25</sup> their God.

Now see the blindness of us worldly folk, how precisely we presume to shoot our foolish bolt<sup>26</sup> in those matters most in which we least can skill. For I little doubt but that among four thousand taken out at adventure,<sup>27</sup> we shall not find four score<sup>28</sup> but they shall boldly affirm it for a thing too painful, 35 busily to remember these four last things. And yet durst I lay a wager that of those four thousand ye shall not find fourteen that hath deeply thought on them four times in all their days.

If men would vouchsafe<sup>29</sup> to put in proof and experience the operation and working of this medicine, the remembrance of these four last things, they should find therein, not the pleasure of their life lost, but so great a pleasure grow thereby that they never felt the like before, nor would have supposed that ever they should have felt any such. 45

 For it is to be known that, like as we be made of two far diverse and unlike substances, the body and the soul, so we be apt and able to receive two diverse and unlike pleasures, the one carnal and fleshly, the other ghostly and spiritual. And like as the soul ex- 50 cellethe the body, so doth the sweetness of spiritual pleasure far pass and excel the gross and filthy pleasure of all fleshly delight, which is of truth no very true pleasure, but a false counterfeit image of pleasure. And the cause why men be so mad thereon is 55 only for ignorance and lack of knowledge of the other — as those that lack insight of precious stones hold themselves as well content and satisfied with a beryl<sup>30</sup> or crystal well counterfeited, as with a right natural diamond. But he that by good use and experience hath in his eye the right mark and very true luster of the diamond rejecteth anon<sup>31</sup> and listeth<sup>32</sup> not to look upon the counterfeit, be it never so well-handled, never so craftily polished. And trust it well that, in likewise, if men would well accustom themselves in the taste of spiritual pleasure and of that sweet feeling that virtuous people have of the good hope of heaven, they should shortly set at nought,<sup>33</sup> and at length abhor, the foul delight and filthy liking that riseth of<sup>34</sup> sensual and fleshly pleasure, which is never so pleasantly spiced with delight and liking but that it bringeth therewith such a grudge and grief of conscience that it maketh the stomach wamble<sup>35</sup> and fare as<sup>36</sup> it would vomit. And that notwithstanding, such is our blind custom that 75 we persevere therein without care or cure of the better, as a sow content with draff,<sup>37</sup> dirt, and mire<sup>38</sup> careth neither for better meat nor better bed.

Think not that everything is pleasant that men for madness laugh at. For thou shalt in Bedlam<sup>39</sup> see one laugh at the knocking of his own head against a post, and yet there is little pleasure therein. But ye think peradventure this example as mad as the mad man, and as little to the purpose. I am content ye so think. But what will ye say if ye see men that are taken and reputed wise laugh much more madly than he? Shall ye not see such laugh at their own craft, when they have, as they think, willfully done

12 because of 13 a medical compound, salve 14 perhaps 15 but that 16 make use of 17 know 18 dainty stomached: easily upset 19 were he: he would be 20 unmanageable 21 know 22 deprive 23 actively involve 24 sage saws: wise sayings 25 pleasure; desire 26 arrow 27 at adventure: at random, by chance 28 four score: eighty 29 agree, choose 30 a transparent, light green precious stone, worth less than an emerald 31 instantly 32 likes, wishes 33 set at nought: value

as nothing 34 out of, from 35 feel nauseous 36 as if 37 refuse, dregs 38 swampy ground 39 a hospital for the insane in London

their neighbor wrong? Now whoso seeth not that his laughter is more mad than the laughter of the mad man, I hold him madder than they both. For the mad man laughed when he had done himself but little hurt by a knock of his head to the post. This other sage fool laugheth at the casting of his own soul into the fire of hell, for which he hath cause to weep all his life. And it cannot be but the grudge and fear thereof followeth his laughter, and secret sorrow marreth all such outward mirth. For the heart of a wicked wretch is like a stormy sea that cannot rest, except a man be fallen down into the dungeon of wretchedness, and the door shut over his head. For when a sinner is once fallen down into the depth, he waxeth a desperate wretch and setteth all at naught, and he is in the worst kind of all, and farthest from all recovery. For like as in the body his sickness is most incurable that is sick and feeleth it not, but weeneth<sup>40</sup> himself whole (for he that is in that case is commonly mad), so he that by a mischievous custom of sin perceiveth no fault in his evil deed nor hath no remorse thereof hath lost the natural light of reason and the spiritual light of faith—which two lights of knowledge and understanding quenched, what remaineth in him more than the bodily senses and sensual wits common to man and brute beasts?

Now albeit so that the fleshly and worldly pleasure is of truth not pleasant but bitter, and the spiritual pleasure is of truth so sweet that the sweetness thereof many times darkeneth and diminisheth the feeling of bodily pain, by reason whereof good virtuous folk feel more pleasure in the sorrow of their sins and affliction of their penance than wretches feel in the fulfilling of their foul delight, and credible is it that the inward spiritual pleasure and comfort which many of the old holy martyrs had in the hope of heaven darkened and in manner overwhelmed the bodily pains of their torment—yet this notwithstanding, like as a sick man feeleth no sweetness in sugar, and some women with child have such fond lust<sup>41</sup> that they had liefer<sup>42</sup> eat tar than treacle and rather pitch than marmalade, and some whole people love tallow better than butter, and Iceland loveth no butter till it be long barreled, so we gross carnal people—having our taste infected by the sickness of sin and filthy custom of fleshly lust, find so great liking in the vile and stinking delectation of fleshly delight that we list<sup>43</sup>—not once prove<sup>44</sup> what manner of sweetness good and virtuous folk feel and perceive in spiritual pleasure. And the cause is why? Because we cannot perceive the one but if<sup>45</sup> we forbear the other. For like as the ground that is all forgrown<sup>46</sup> with nettles, briars, and other evil weeds, can bring forth no corn till they be weeded out, so can our soul have no place for the good corn of spiritual pleasure as long as it is overgrown with the barren weeds of carnal delectation. For the pulling out of which weeds by the root, there is not a more meet<sup>47</sup> instrument than of the remembrance of the four last things, which as they shall pull out these weeds of fleshly voluptuousness, so shall they not fail to plant in their places, not only wholesome virtues, but also marvelous ghostly<sup>48</sup> pleasure and spiritual gladness, which in every good soul riseth of the love of God, and hope of heaven, and inward liking that the godly spirit taketh in the diligent labor of good and virtuous business.

I would not so long tarry in this point nor make so many words of the pleasure that men may find by the receipt of this medicine, were it not that I well perceive the world so set upon the seeking of pleasure that they set by<sup>49</sup> pleasure much more than by profit. And therefore to the intent that ye may perceive that it is not a fantasy found of mine own head, that the abandoning and refusing of carnal pleasure and the ensuing of labor, travail, penance and bodily pain, shall bring therewith to a Christian man, not only in the world that is coming but also in this present life, very sweetness, comfort, pleasure, and gladness, I shall prove it to be true by their testimony and witness whose authority, speaking of their own experience, there will, I ween, none honest man mistrust.

Lo, the holy doctor Saint Augustine, exhorting penitents and repentant sinners to sorrow for their offenses, saith unto them: “Sorrow,” saith this holy man, “and be glad of thy sorrow.”<sup>50</sup> In vain should he bid him be glad of his sorrow, if man in sorrow could not be glad. But this holy father showeth by this counsel, not only that a man may be joyful and glad for all his sorrow, but also that he may be and hath cause to be glad because of his sorrow.

40 thinks 41 fond lust: mad desire 42 had liefer: would rather 43 desire 44 try, test 45 but if: unless

46 overgrown 47 fitting 48 spiritual 49 set by: value 50 from the pseudonymous twelfth-century Liber de vera et falsa

poenitentia, 13.28 (PL 40: 112.4), attributed to Augustine in the Middle Ages

Long were it to rehearse<sup>51</sup> the places that prove this point among the holy doctors of Christ's Church. But we will, instead of them all, allege you the words of him that is doctor of them all, our Savior Jesus Christ. He saith that the way to heaven is 5 strait and asper<sup>52</sup> or painful. And therefore he saith that few folk find it out or walk therein. And yet saith he for all that, "My yoke is easy and my burden light."<sup>53</sup> How could these two sayings stand 10 together, were it not that as the labor, travail, and affliction of the body is painful and sharp to the flesh, so the comfort and gladness that the soul conceiveth thereof, rising into the love of our Lord and hope of his glory to come, so tempereth and over-15 mastereth the bitterness of the grief, that it maketh the very labor easy, the sourness very sweet, and the very pain pleasant?

Will ye see the example? Look upon his holy apostles—when they were taken and scourged with 20 whips for Christ's sake, did it grieve them, think ye? Imagine yourself in the same case, and I think ye will think yea. Now see, then, for all the pain of their flesh, what joy and pleasure they conceived in their soul. The Holy Scripture saith that they 25 rejoiced and joyed that God had accounted them worthy for Christ's sake, not only to be scourged, but also—which would be far greater grief to an honest man than the pain itself—to be scourged
 30 with despite and shame, so that the more their pain was, the more was their joy.<sup>54</sup> For as the holy doctor Saint Chrysostom saith, though pain be grievous for the nature of the affliction, yet is it pleasant by the alacrity and quick mind of them that willingly
 35 suffer it.<sup>55</sup> And therefore though the nature of the torments make great grief and pain, yet the prompt and willing mind of them that were scourged passed and overcame the nature of the thing, that is to wit,<sup>56</sup> mastering the outward fleshly pain with inward
 40 spiritual pleasure. And surely this is so true that it may stand for a very certain token that a penitent beginneth to profit and grow in grace and favor of God when he feeleth a pleasure and quickness in his labor and pain taken in prayer, almsdeeds, pil-
 45 grimage, fasting, discipline, tribulation, affliction, and such other spiritual exercise, by which the soul willingly worketh with the body by their own punishment to purge and rub out the rusty cankered spots that sin hath defiled them with, in the sight of God, and to leave the fewer to be burned out in the 50 fire of purgatory.

And whensoever, as I say, that a man feeleth in this pain a pleasure, he hath a token of great grace and that his penance is pleasant to God. For as the Holy Scripture saith, our Lord loveth a glad giver.<sup>57</sup> And on the other side, whereas one doth such spiri-
 55 tual business with a dullness of spirit and weariness of mind, he doth twice as much and thereby taketh four times as much pain, since his bodily pain is relieved with no spiritual rejoice nor comfort. I will not say that his labor is lost, but I dare be bold to say that he profiteth much less with much more pain. For certain it is that the best souls, and they that 60 have best travailed<sup>58</sup> in spiritual business, find most comfort therein. And therefore if they most pleased God that in the bodily pain of their penance took 65 less spiritual pleasure, it should thereof follow that the farther a man proceeded in the perfection of spiritual exercise, in the worse case he were. Which can in no wise be so, since that we see the holy apostles and other holy men and women, the better that 70 they were, the more pleasure they perceived in their fleshly afflictions, either put unto them by God, or taken by themselves for God's sake.

Therefore let every man, by the labor of his mind and help of prayer, enforce himself in all tribulation and affliction, labor, pain and travail, without spot
 75 of pride or ascribing any praise to himself, to conceive a delight and pleasure in such spiritual exercise, and thereby to rise in the love of our Lord, with a hope of heaven, contempt of the world, and longing
 80 to be with God. To the attaining of which mind, by the putting away of the malicious pleasures of the devil, the filthy pleasures of the flesh, and the vain pleasures of the world (which once excluded there 85 is place made and clean purged to receive the very sweet and pure pleasure of the spirit), there is not any one thing lightly,<sup>59</sup> as I have said, more accommodated nor more effectual than this thing that I
 90 have begun with and taken in hand to treat, that is to wit, the remembrance of the four last things, which is, as the Scripture saith, so effectual that if a man remember it well, he shall never sin.

Thou wilt haply<sup>60</sup> say that it is not enough that a man do none evil, but he must also do good. This is

51 tell; cite 52 rough 53 Mt
 11:30 54 See Acts 5:27–41. 55 See

Chrysostom's Homily 24 on Matthew (PG 57: 314). 56 say 57 2 Cor 9:7

58 labored 59 of little weight or difficulty 60 perhaps

very truth that ye say. But first, if there be but these two steps to heaven, he that getteth him on the one is half up. And over<sup>61</sup> that, whoso doth none evil, it will be very hard but he must needs do good, since 5 man's mind is never idle, but occupied commonly either with good or evil.

And therefore when folk have few words and use much musing, likewise as<sup>62</sup> among many words all be not always well and wisely set, so when the tongue lieth still, if the mind be not occupied well, it were less evil, save for worldly rebuke, to blabber on trifles somewhat sottishly<sup>63</sup> than while they seem sage in keeping silence, secretly peradventure,<sup>64</sup> the meanwhile to fantasy with themselves filthy sinful devices, whereof their tongues, if they were set on babbling, could not for shame utter and speak the like.

I say not this for that<sup>65</sup> I would have folks fall to babbling, well wotting<sup>66</sup> that, as the Scripture saith, in many words lacketh not sin,<sup>67</sup> but that I would 20 have folk in their silence take good heed that their minds be occupied with good thoughts, for unoccupied be they never. For if ever the mind were empty, it would be empty when the body sleepeth. But if it were then all empty, we should have no dreams.
 25 Then if the fantasies leave us not sleeping, it is not likely that ever they leave us waking. Wherefore, as I say, let us keep our minds occupied with good thoughts, or else the devil will fill them with evil.

And surely everything hath his mean. There is, as Scripture saith, time to speak and time to keep thy tongue.<sup>68</sup> Whensoever the communication is naught<sup>69</sup> and ungodly, it is better to hold thy tongue and think on some better thing the while than to give ear thereto and underpin<sup>70</sup> the tale. And yet better were it than holding of thy tongue, properly to 35 speak, and with some good grace and pleasant fashion to break into some better matter; by which thy speech and talking, thou shalt not only profit thyself as thou shouldst have done by thy well-minded silence, but also amend the whole audience, which is a thing far better and of much more merit. Howbeit, if thou can find no proper means to break the tale, then except<sup>71</sup> thy bare authority suffice to command silence, it were peradventure good, rather to keep a 40 good silence thyself than blunder forth rudely, and irritate them to anger, which<sup>72</sup> shall haply<sup>73</sup> therefore

not let<sup>74</sup> to talk on, but speak much the more, lest they should seem to leave at thy commandment. And better were it for the while to let one wanton<sup>75</sup> word pass uncontrolled than give occasion of 50 twain.<sup>76</sup> But if the communication be good, then is it better, not only to give ear thereto, but also first well and prudently to devise with thyself upon the same, and then moderately and in good manner, if thou find aught<sup>77</sup> to the purpose, speak thereto and 55 say thy mind therein. So shall it appear to the presence that your mind was well occupied the while, and your thought not wandering forty miles thence while your body was there, as it often happeth that the very face showeth the mind walking a pilgrimage in such wise that, not without some note and reproach of such vagrant mind, other folk suddenly say to them, "A penny for your thoughts." Which<sup>78</sup> manner of wandering mind in company may percase<sup>79</sup> be the more excusable sometimes by some 60 chargeable business of the party, but surely it is never taken for wisdom nor good manners.

But now to return to my purpose, since the remembrance of these four last things is of such force and efficacy that it is able always to keep us from sin, 70 and since we can never be long void of both, it must thereof ensue that we shall consequently do good; and thereof must it needs follow that this only lesson, well-learned and busily put in ure,<sup>80</sup> must needs lead us to heaven.

Yet will ye peradventure say that ye know these four things well enough, and if the knowledge thereof had so great effect as the Scripture speaketh of,<sup>81</sup> there should not be so many naught as there be. For what Christian man is he, that hath wit and 80 discretion, but he hath heard and, having any faith, believeth these four last things? — of which the first, that is to say, death, we need no faith to believe, we know it by daily proof and experience.

I say not nay, but that we know them either by 85 faith or experience — and yet not so very thoroughly as we might, peradventure, and hereafter undoubtedly shall. Which if we knew once thoroughly, and so feelingly perceived as we might, percase, and namely as we surely shall, there would be little 90 doubt but<sup>82</sup> the least of all the four would well keep us from sin. For as for<sup>83</sup> that, though we have heard

61 beyond 62 likewise as: just as 63 foolishly 64 perhaps 65 for that:
 because 66 knowing 67 Prv 10:19 68 Eccl 3:7 69 wicked 70 support, corroborate 71 unless 72 who 73 perhaps 74 hesitate 75 undisciplined 76 two 77 anything 78 This 79 perhaps 80 use, practice 81 See

1 Cor 8:1. 82 but that 83 For as for:
 As regards

of the doom, yet were we never at it. Though we have heard of hell, yet came we never in it. Though we have heard of heaven, yet came we never to it. And though we daily see men die, and thereby know the death, yet ourselves never felt it. For if we knew these things thoroughly, the least of all four were, as I said, enough to keep us from sin.

Howbeit, the aforesaid words of Scripture biddest thee not know the four last things, but remember thy four last things, and then, he saith, thou shall never sin.

Many things know we that we seldom think on. And in the things of the soul, the knowledge without the remembrance little profiteth. What availeth it to know that there is a God, which thou not only believest by faith, but also knowest by reason? What availeth that thou knowest him, if thou think little of him? The busy minding of thy four last things, and the deep consideration thereof, is the thing that shall keep thee from sin. And if thou put it in assay<sup>84</sup> and make a proof, thou shalt well find, by that thou shalt have no lust<sup>85</sup> to sin for the time that thou deeply thinkest on them, that if our frailty could endure never to remit or slacken in the deep devising of them, we should never have delight or pleasure in any sinful thing.

For the proof whereof, let us first begin at the remembrance of the first of these four last, which is undoubtedly far the least of the four, and thereby shall we make a proof what marvelous effect may grow by the diligent remembrance of all four, toward the avoiding of all the trains,<sup>86</sup> darts, sleights, enticings, and assaults of the three mortal enemies, the devil, the world, and our own flesh.<sup>87</sup>

35 THE REMEMBRANCE OF DEATH

What profit and commodity<sup>88</sup> cometh unto man's soul by the meditation of death is not only marked of the chosen people of God, but also of such as were the best sort among gentiles and paynims.<sup>89</sup> For some of the old famous philosophers, when they were demanded what faculty<sup>90</sup> philosophy was, answered that it was the meditation or exercise of death. For like as death maketh a severance of the body and the soul, when they by course of nature must needs depart asunder,<sup>91</sup> so (said they) doth the study of philosophy labor to sever the soul from the love and affections of the body while they be together.

Now if this be the whole study and labor of philosophy, as the best philosopher said that it is,<sup>92</sup> then may we within short time be well-learned in philosophy. For nothing is there that may more effectually withdraw the soul from the wretched affections of the body than may the remembrance of death—if we do not remember it hourly, as one heareth a word and let it pass by his ear, without any receiving of the sentence into his heart. But if we not only hear this word “death,” but also let sink into our hearts the very fantasy and deep imagination thereof, we shall perceive thereby that we were never so greatly moved by the beholding of the Dance of Death pictured in Paul's,<sup>93</sup> as we shall feel ourselves stirred and altered by the feeling of that imagination in our hearts. And no marvel. For those pictures express only the loathly<sup>94</sup> figure of our dead bony bodies, bitten away the flesh, which though it be ugly to behold, yet neither the light thereof, nor the sight of all the dead heads in the charnel house,<sup>95</sup> nor the apparition of a very ghost, is half so grisly as the deep-conceived fantasy of death in his nature, by the lively imagination graven in thine own heart. For there seest thou, not one plain grievous sight of the bare bones hanging by the sinews, but thou seest (if thou fantasy thine own death, for so art thou by this counsel advised), thou seest, I say, thyself if thou die no worse death, yet at the leastwise lying in thy bed, thy head shooting,<sup>96</sup> thy back aching, thy veins beating, thine heart panting, thy throat rattling, thy flesh trembling, thy mouth gaping, thy nose sharpening,<sup>97</sup> thy legs cooling, thy fingers fumbling, thy breath shortening, all thy strength fainting, thy life vanishing, and thy death drawing on.

If thou couldst now call to thy remembrance some of those sicknesses that have most grieved thee and tormented thee in thy days, as every man hath felt some, and then findest thou that some one disease in some one part of thy body, as percase<sup>98</sup> the stone<sup>99</sup> or the strangury,<sup>100</sup> have put thee (to thine

<sup>84</sup> put it in assay: put it to the test; try it <sup>85</sup> desire <sup>86</sup> deceits, guiles <sup>87</sup> See 1 Jn 2:15–16. <sup>88</sup> benefit <sup>89</sup> pagans <sup>90</sup> special ability or power <sup>91</sup> apart

<sup>92</sup> Plato, Phaedo 63e–67e, 81e <sup>93</sup> a now-destroyed mural of the danse macabre in the north cloister of St. Paul's Cathedral, London <sup>94</sup> hideous, repulsive own mind) to no less torment than thou shouldst have felt if one had put up a knife into the same place, and wouldst, as thee then seemed, have been content with such a change—think what it will be then when thou shalt feel so many such pains in every part of thy body, breaking thy veins and thy life strings, with like pain and grief as though as many knives as thy body might receive should everywhere enter and meet in the midst.

<sup>95</sup> charnel house: a house or vault for bones of the dead <sup>96</sup> having darting pains <sup>97</sup> sharpening <sup>98</sup> perhaps <sup>99</sup> kidney stones <sup>100</sup> a disease of the urinary organs

A stroke of a staff, a cut of a knife, the flesh singed with fire, the pain of sundry sickness, many men have assayed<sup>101</sup> in themselves. And they, that have not yet, somewhat have heard by them that felt it. But what manner dolor<sup>102</sup> and pain, what manner of grievous pangs, what intolerable torment, the seely<sup>103</sup> creature feeleth in the dissolution and severance of the soul from the body, never was there body that yet could tell the tale.

Some conjecture and token of this point we have of the bitter Passion and piteous departing of our Savior Jesus Christ, of whom we nothing read that ever he cried for any pain, neither for the whips and rods beating his blessed body nor the sharp thorns pricking his holy head, or the great long nails piercing his precious hands and feet. But when the point approached in which his sacred soul should depart out of his blessed body, at that point he cried loud once or twice to his Father in heaven, into whose mighty and merciful hands, at the extreme point, with a great loud cry he gave up the ghost. Now if the death was so painful and rageous<sup>104</sup> to our Savior Christ—whose joy and comfort of his godhead, if he would have suffered it, might in such wise have redounded<sup>105</sup> into his soul, and so forth into his body, that it should not only have supped up<sup>106</sup> all his pain, but also have transformed his holy body into a glorious form and made it impassible—what intolerable torment will death be then to us miserable wretches, of which the more part among the pangs of our passage shall have yet so painful twitches of our own conscience that the fear of hell, the dread of the devil, and sorrow at<sup>107</sup> our heart at the sight of our sins shall pass and exceed the deadly pains of our body.

Other things are there, which will peradventure<sup>108</sup> seem no great matter to them that feel them not, but unto him that shall lie in that case,<sup>109</sup> they shall be tedious out of all measure.

Have ye not ere<sup>110</sup> this, in a sore sickness, felt it very grievous to have folk babble to you, and namely such things as ye should make answer to, when it was a pain to speak? Think ye not now that it will be a gentle pleasure, when we lie dying, all our body in pain, all our mind in trouble, our soul in sorrow, our heart all in dread, while our life walketh awayward,<sup>111</sup> while our death draweth toward, while the devil is busy about us, while we lack stomach and strength to bear any one of so manifold heinous troubles—will it not be, as I was about to say, a pleasant thing to see before thine eyes and hear at thine ear a rabble of fleshly friends, or rather of flesh-flies, skipping about thy bed and thy sick body, like ravens about thy corpse, now almost carrion, crying to thee on every side, “What shall I have? What shall I have?” Then shall come thy children and cry for their parts;<sup>112</sup> then shall come thy sweet wife, and where in thine health haply<sup>113</sup> she spoke thee not one sweet word in six weeks, now shall she call thee sweet husband and weep with much work and ask thee what shall she have. Then shall thine executors ask for the keys, and ask what money is owing thee, ask what substance thou hast, and ask where thy money lieth. And while thou liest in that case, their words shall be so tedious that thou wilt wish all that they ask for upon a red fire, so thou mightest lie one half-hour in rest.

Now is there one thing which a little I touched before, I wot<sup>114</sup> not whether more painful or more perilous—the marvelous intentive<sup>115</sup> business and solicitation of our ghostly<sup>116</sup> enemy the devil, not only in one fashion present, but surely never absent from him that draweth toward death. For since that<sup>117</sup> of his pestilent<sup>118</sup> envy conceived from the beginning of man’s creation, by which he lay in wait to take our first mother Eve, in a train,<sup>119</sup> and thereby drawing our former father Adam into the breach of God’s behest, found the means, not without the grievous increase of his own damnation, to deprive us of paradise, and bereave us our immortality, making us into subjection not only of temporal death but also of his eternal torment, were we not by the great bounty of God and Christ’s

101 experienced 102 manner dolor: kind of suffering 103 poor, pitiful

104 outrageous, grievous 105 surged up

106 supped up: consumed 107 in 108 perhaps 109 condition 110 before

111 away 112 share 113 perhaps

114 know 115 attentive 116 spiritual

117 since that: because 118 harmful

119 snare, trap; deceit

painful Passion restored to the possibility of everlasting life, he never ceased since to run about like a ramping<sup>120</sup> lion, looking whom he might devour,<sup>121</sup> it can be no doubt but he most busily travaileth<sup>122</sup> in that behalf at the time that he perceiveth us about to depart hence. For well he knoweth that then he either winneth a man forever, or forever loseth him. For have he him never so fast<sup>123</sup> before, yet if he break from him then he can after his death never get him again. Well he may peradventure have him as his jailer in his prison of purgatory for the time of his punishment temporal. But as he would have him for his perpetual slave, shall he never have him after, how sure soever he had him afore, if he get from him at the time of his death. For so lost he suddenly the thief that hung on the right hand of Christ.<sup>124</sup>

And on the other side, if he catch a man fast at the time of his death, he is sure to keep him forever. For as the Scripture saith, “Wheresoever the stone falleth, there shall it abide.”<sup>125</sup> And since he knoweth this for very surety and is of malice so venomous and envious that he had liefer<sup>126</sup> double his own pain than suffer us to escape from pain, he, when we draw to death, doth his uttermost devoir<sup>127</sup> to bring us to damnation, never ceasing to minister, by subtle and incogitable<sup>128</sup> means, first unlawful longing to live, horror to go gladly to God at his calling.

Then giveth he some false glade<sup>129</sup> of escaping that sickness, and thereby putteth in our mind a love yet and cleaving to the world, keeping of our goods, loathsomeness of shrift,<sup>130</sup> sloth toward good works. And if we be so far gone that we see we cannot recover, then he casteth in our minds presumption and security of salvation as a thing well won by our own works, of which, if we have any done well, he casteth them into our minds with overgreat liking and thereby withdraweth us from the haste of doing any more, as a thing that either needeth not or may be done by our executors. And instead of sorrow for our sins and care of heaven, he putteth us in mind of provision for some honorable burying—so many torches, so many tapers,<sup>131</sup> so many black gowns, so many merry mourners laughing under black hoods, and a gay hearse, with the delight of goodly and honorable funerals, in which the foolish sick man is sometimes occupied as though he thought that he should stand in a window and see how worshipfully he shall be brought to church.

And thus inveigleth<sup>132</sup> he them that either be good, or but meetly<sup>133</sup> bad.

But as for those that he hath known for special wretches, whose whole life hath in effect been all bestowed in his service, whom he hath brought into great and horrible sins by the horror whereof he hath kept them from confession, these folk at their end he handleth on another fashion. For into their minds he bringeth their shameful sins by heap, and by the abominable sight thereof, draweth them into desperation. For the aggrieving whereof our Lord, after their deserving, suffereth him to show himself to them for their more discomfort in some fearful figure and terrible likeness, by the beholding whereof they conceive sometimes despair of salvation, and yield themselves as captives quick,<sup>134</sup> beginning their hell in this world, as hath appeared by the words and wretched behavior of many that of a shameful sinful life have died and departed with heavy<sup>135</sup> desperate death.

Now death being such as I have described, or rather much more horrible than any man can describe, it is not to be doubted but if<sup>136</sup> we busily remembered the terror and grief thereof, it must needs be so bitter to the fleshly mind that it could not fail to take away the vain delight of all worldly vanities. But the thing that letteth<sup>137</sup> us to consider death in his kind,<sup>138</sup> and to take great profit that would arise of<sup>139</sup> the remembrance thereof, is that for by the hope of long life, we look upon death either so far off that we see him not at all, or but a slight and uncertain sight, as a man may see a thing so far off that he wotteth<sup>140</sup> not whether it be a bush or a beast. And surely so fare we by death, looking thereat afar off through a great long space of as many years as we hope to live. And those we imagine many, and perilously and foolishly beguile ourselves. For likewise as wives would their husbands should ween<sup>141</sup> by the example of Sarah that there were no woman so old but she might have a child,<sup>142</sup> so is there none old man so old but that, as Tully saith, he trusteth to live one year yet.<sup>143</sup> And as for

120 rampaging, raging 121 See 1 Pt 5:8. 122 labors 123 securely 124 See Lk 23:40-43. 125 Eccl 11:3 126 had liefer: would rather 127 endeavor

128 inconceivable 129 gleam of hope 130 confession 131 candles 132 beguile, cajole 133 fairly 134 living 135 distressing, grievous 136 but if:

unless 137 prevents; hinders 138 nature 139 from 140 knows 141 believe 142 See Gn 20-21. 143 Cicero, De senectute 9.68

young folk, they look not how many be dead in their own days younger than themselves, but who is the oldest man in the town, and upon his years they make their reckoning—where the wiser way were to reckon that a young man may die soon, and an old man cannot live long, but within a little while die the one may, the other must. And with this reckoning shall they look upon death much nearer hand, and better perceive him in his own likeness, and thereby take the more fruit of the remembrance and make themselves the more ready thereto.

Thou wouldst somewhat remember death the more effectually, and look upon him somewhat the more nearly, if thou knewest thyself sick and especially of any perilous sickness that would make an end of thee, though thou feltest yet little pain. For commonly when we be sick, then begin we to know ourselves, then pain bringeth us home, then we think how merry a thing it were to be praying in health, which we cannot now do for grief. Then care we little for our gay gear,<sup>144</sup> then desire we no delicate dainties. And as for Lady Lechery, then abhor we to think on. And then we think in ourselves that if ever we recover and mend in body, we will amend in soul, leave all vices and be virtuously occupied the remnant of our life—insomuch that very true we find the words of the epistle that the well-learned man Plinius Secundus, after his sickness, wrote unto his friend, wherein, after the description of men's fantasies in their disease, he closeth up his letter in this wise: “all the philosophers and wise men in this world give us for instruction of virtuous living, all that can I compendiously<sup>145</sup> give to myself and thee in few words: no more, lo, but let us be such when we be whole, as we think we will be when we be sick.”<sup>146</sup>

Now then if thou be ever sick, and ever sick of a perilous sickness, wouldst thou not, if thou knewest thyself in such case, have better remembrance of death than thou hast? It would be hard peradventure<sup>147</sup> to make thee believe thyself sick while thou feelest no harm, and yet is that no sure knowledge of health. Trow<sup>148</sup> ye not that many a man is infected with the great sickness a good while ere<sup>149</sup> he perceive it, and the body sore<sup>150</sup> corrupt within ere

he feel the grief? How many men have there been that have gone about with God's marks<sup>151</sup> on their body, never perceiving themselves to be sick, but as merry as ever they were in their lives, till other men gave them warning how near they were their deaths? And therefore never reckon thyself whole, though thou feel no grief.

But thou wilt haply<sup>152</sup> say, “Be it that I cannot surely reckon myself whole, yet ye show me not why I should reckon myself sick.” Thou sayest right well, and that shall I show thee now. Tell me, if one were in case<sup>153</sup> that he must be fain<sup>154</sup> once or twice a day to swaddle and plaster<sup>155</sup> his leg and<sup>156</sup> else he could not keep his life, wouldst thou reckon his leg sick or whole? I ween<sup>157</sup> ye will agree that his leg is not well at ease, nor the owner neither. Now if ye felt your belly in such case that ye must be fain all day to tend it with warm clothes or else ye were not able to abide the pain, would ye reckon your belly sick or whole? I ween ye would reckon your belly not in good quart.<sup>158</sup> If thou shouldst see one in such case that he could not hold up his head, that he could not stand on his feet, that he should be fain to lie down along, and there lie speechless as a dead stock<sup>159</sup> an hour or two every day, wouldst thou not say that he were perilously sick and had good cause to remember death, when he lieth every day in such case as though he were dead already?

Now then I pray thee consider me that all our bodies be ever in such case so tender of themselves that except we lapped<sup>160</sup> them continually with warm clothes, we were not able to live one winter week. Consider that our bodies have so sore a sickness and such a continual consumption<sup>161</sup> in themselves that the strongest were not able to endure and continue ten days together, were it not that once or twice a day we be fain to take medicines inward to clout<sup>162</sup> them up withal and keep them as long as we can. For what is our meat and drink but medicines against hunger and thirst, that give us warning of that we daily lose by our inward consumption?<sup>163</sup> And of that consumption shall we die in conclusion, for<sup>164</sup> all the medicines that we use, though never other sickness came at us.

Consider also that all our swaddling and tending

144 gay gear: showy apparel 145 concisely, comprehensively 146 Pliny the Younger, Epistolae 7.26 147 perhaps 148 Believe 149 before 150 greatly 151 God's marks: physical signs of plague, such as the sweating sickness which afflicted England in the summer of 1517 152 perhaps 153 the position 154 obliged 155 treat medically with a plaster 156 or 157 think

158 well-being 159 a tree stump 160 wrapped up 161 wasting away, decay 162 patch, mend 163 See Augustine, Confessions 10.31.43–44. 164 despite with warm clothes and daily medicines, yet can our bodies not bear themselves but that almost half our time ever in twenty-four hours we be fain<sup>165</sup> to fall in a swoon which we call sleep, and there lie like 5 dead stocks by a long space ere we come to ourselves again, insomuch that among all wise men of old it is agreed that sleep is the very image of death.

Now thou wilt peradventure say that this is but a fantasy. For though we call this hunger sickness, and 10 meat a medicine, yet men know well enough what very sickness is, and what very medicines be, and thereby we know well enough that they be none.

If thou think this, then would I wit<sup>166</sup> of thee what thou callest a sickness. Is not that a sickness 15 that will make an end of thee if it be not helped? If that be so, then I suppose thou bearest ever thy sickness with thee. For very sure art thou that it will make an end of thee if thou be not helped.

What callest thou, then, a medicine? Is it not such 20 a thing as either applied outwardly to thy body, or received inward, shall preserve thee against that sore or sickness that else would put thee or some part of thee in peril? What can be, then, more properly and more verily<sup>167</sup> a medicine than is our meat and drink,
25 by which is resisted the peril and undoubted death that else should in so few days follow, by the inward sickness of our own nature continually consuming us within? For as for<sup>168</sup> that ye reckon that we know which be sickness, that is but a custom of calling, by 30 which we call no sickness by that name but such as be casual and come and go. For that that<sup>169</sup> is common to all men, and never from any man, because we reckon it natural, we give it not the name of sickness, but we name sickness a passion that cometh
35 seldomer and, as we reckon, against nature, whereas the conflict of the diverse qualified elements tempered in our body, continually laboring each to vanquish other and thereby to dissolve the whole, though it be as sore<sup>170</sup> against the continuance of 40 our nature, and as sore laboreth to the dissolution of the whole body as other sickness do, yet we neither call it sickness, nor the meat that resisteth it we call no medicine, and that for none other cause but for the continual familiarity that we have therewith.

45 But now consider, if it were so that one whole country were born all lepers, which is a sickness rather foul and perilous than painful, or all a whole country born with the falling sickness,<sup>171</sup> so that never any of them had ever in their lives known or 50 heard either themselves or any other void of those diseases, trow<sup>172</sup> ye that, then, that they would ever have reckoned them for sickness? Nay surely, but they would have counted for sickness the colic<sup>173</sup> and the stone,<sup>174</sup> and such other like as come and go. But as for their leprosy and falling evil, they would 55 never account it other than we account hunger or sleep. For as for that thy hunger doth thee pleasure when it is fed, so doth sometimes the itch of a sore leg when thou clawest about the brinks.<sup>175</sup>

And thus mayest thou surely see that all our 60 whole life is but a sickness never curable, but as an incurable canker,<sup>176</sup> with continual swaddling and plastering,<sup>177</sup> botched<sup>178</sup> up to live as long as we may, and in conclusion undoubtedly to die of the same sickness, and though there never came other. 65

So that if thou consider this well, thou mayest look upon death, not as a stranger, but as a nigh<sup>179</sup> neighbor. For as the flame is next the smoke, so is death next an incurable sickness, and such is all our 70 life.

And yet if this move you little, but that ye think for all this that death is far from you, I will go somewhat near<sup>180</sup> you. Thou reckonest every man near his death when he is dying. Then if thyself be now 75 already dying, how canst thou reckon thyself far from death?

Some man saith merrily to his fellow, “Be merry, man — thou shalt never die as long as thou livest.”
And albeit he seem to say true, yet saith he more 80 than he can make good. For if that were true, I could make him much merrier, for then he should never die.

Ye will peradventure marvel of this, but it is easy to prove. For I think ye will grant me that there is 85 no time after that a man hath once life but he is either alive or dead. Then will there no man say that one can die either before he get life or after that he hath lost it, and so hath he no time left to die in but while he hath life. Wherefore, if we neither die 90 before our life nor when we be dead already, needs must it follow that we never die but while we live.

It is not all one to die and to be dead. Truth it is that we be never dead while we live; and it is, meseemeth, as true, not only that we die while we

165 obliged 166 know 167 truly 168 For as for: As regards 169 which 170 grievously 171 epilepsy 172 believe, trust 173 severe gripping pains in the belly 174 kidney stones 175 edges 176 chronic sore or ulcer 177 medically applying a plaster 178 clumsily patched 179 near 180 nearer

live, but also that we die all the while we live. What thing is dying? Is it any other thing than the passage and going out of this present life?

Now tell me, then, if thou were going out of a house, whether art thou going out only when thy foot is on the uttermost inch of the threshold, thy body half out of the door, or else when thou beginnest to set the first foot forward to go out, in what place of the house soever ye stand when ye buskle<sup>181</sup> forward? I would say that ye be going out of the house, from the first foot ye set forward to go forth. No man will think other, as I suppose, but all is one reason in going hence and coming hither. Now if one were coming hither to this town, he were not only coming hither while he were entering in at the gate, but all the way also from whence he came hitherward. Nor, in likewise, in going hence from this town, a man is not only going from this town while he hath his body in the gate going outward, but also while he setteth his foot out of his host's house to go forward. And therefore if a man met him by the way, far yet within the town, and asked him whither he were going, he should truly answer that he were going out of the town, all were the town<sup>182</sup> so long that he had ten miles to go ere<sup>183</sup> he came at the gate.

And surely methinketh that in likewise, a man is not only dying, that is to say, going in his way out of this life, while he lieth drawing on, but also all the while that he is going toward his end, which is by all the whole time of his life, since the first moment till the last finished, that is to wit, since the first moment in which he began to live, until the last moment of his life, or rather the first in which he is fully dead.

Now if this be thus, as meseemeth that reason proveth, a man is always dying from before his birth, and every hour of our age, as it passeth by, cutteth his own length out of our life, and maketh it shorter by so much, and our death so much the nearer. Which measuring of time and diminishing of life, with approaching toward death, is nothing else but, from our beginning to our ending, one continual dying: so that wake we, sleep we, eat we, drink we, mourn we, sing we, in what wise soever live we, all the same while die we.

So that we never ought to look toward death as a thing far off, considering that although he made no haste toward us, yet we never cease ourselves to make haste toward him.

Now if thou think this reason but a sophistical subtlety, and thinkest while thou art a young man, thou mayest for all this think thy death far off, that is to wit,<sup>184</sup> as far as thou hast by likelihood of nature many years to live, then will I put thee a homely example, not very pleasant, but none the less very true and very fit for the matter.

If there were two, both condemned to death, both carried out at once toward execution; of which two, the one were sure that the place of his execution were within one mile, the other twenty miles off, yea a hundred, and ye will, he that were in the cart to be carried a hundred miles would not take much more pleasure than his fellow in the length of his way, notwithstanding that it were a hundred times as long as his fellow's and that he had thereby a hundred times as long to live, being sure and out of all question to die at the end.

Reckon me<sup>185</sup> now yourself a young man in your best lust,<sup>186</sup> twenty years of age, if ye will. Let there be another, ninety. Both must ye die, both be ye in the cart carrying forward. His gallows and death standeth within ten miles at the farthest, and yours within eighty. I see not why ye should reckon much less of your death than he, though your way be longer, since ye be sure ye shall never cease riding till ye come at it.

And this is true, although ye were sure that the place of your execution stood so far beyond his.

But what if there were to the place of your execution two ways, of which the one were four score<sup>187</sup> miles farther about than your fellow's, the other nearer by five miles than his; and when ye were put in the cart, had warning of both; and though ye were showed that it were likely that ye should be carried the longer way, yet it might hap ye should go the shorter, and whether ye were carried the one or the other, ye should never know till ye come to the place; I trow ye could not in this case make much longer of your life than of your fellow's.

Now in this case<sup>188</sup> are we all. For our Lord hath not indented us of the time.<sup>189</sup> He hath appointed what we may not pass, but not how soon we shall go, nor where, nor in what wise. And therefore if thou wilt consider how little cause thou hast to reckon

181 to set out hastily 182 all were the town: even if the town were 183 before 184 say 185 for me 186 vigor

187 four score: eighty 188 situation entered into agreement by indentures with us regarding time. See Jb 14:5.

thy death so far off, by reason of thy youth, reckon how many as young as thou have been slain in the selfsame ways in which thou ridest; how many have been drowned in the selfsame waters in which thou rowest. And thus shalt thou well see that thou hast no cause to look upon thy death as a thing far off, but a thing undoubtedly nigh thee, and ever walking with thee. By which<sup>190</sup> — not a false imagination, but a very true contemplation — thou shalt behold him and advise him such as he is, and thereby take occasion to flee vain pleasures of the flesh that keep out the very pleasures of the soul.

OF PRIDE

Now since I have somewhat laid before thy face the bodily pains of death, the troubles and vexations spiritual that come therewith by thy ghostly<sup>191</sup> enemy the devil, the unrestful cumbrance<sup>192</sup> of thy fleshly friends, the uncertainty of thyself how soon this dreadful time shall come, that thou art ever sick of that incurable sickness, by which, if none other come, thou shalt yet in few years undoubtedly die — and yet, moreover, that thou art already dying, and ever hast been since thou first beganst to live — let us now make some proof of this one part of our medicine, how the remembrance of death, in this fashion considered in his kind, will work with us to the preservation of our souls from every kind of sin, beginning at the sin that is the very head and root of all sins — that is to wit, pride, the mischievous mother of all manner vice.

I have seen many vices ere<sup>193</sup> this that at the first seemed far from pride, and yet well considered to the uttermost it would well appear that of that root they sprang. As for wrath and envy, be<sup>194</sup> the known children of pride, as rising of<sup>195</sup> a high estimation of ourselves. But what should seem farther from pride than drunken gluttony? And yet shall ye find more that drink themselves sow-drunk of<sup>196</sup> pride to be called good fellows than for lust of<sup>197</sup> the drink itself. So spreadeth this cursed root of pride his branches into all other kinds, besides his proper<sup>198</sup> malice for his own part, not only in high mind<sup>199</sup> of fortune, rule and authority, beauty, wit, strength, learning, or such other gifts of God, but also the false pride of hypocrites that<sup>200</sup> feign to have the virtues that they lack, and the perilous pride of them, that for their few spotted virtues, not without the mixture of other mortal vices, take themselves for quick<sup>201</sup> saints on earth, proudly judging the lives of their even<sup>202</sup> Christians, disdaining other men's virtue, envying other men's praise, bearing implacable anger where they perceive themselves not accepted and set by<sup>203</sup> after the worthiness of their own estimation.

Which<sup>204</sup> kind of spiritual pride, and thereupon following envy and wrath, is so much the more pestilent, in that it carrieth with it a blindness almost incurable, save<sup>205</sup> God's great mercy. For the lecher knoweth he doth naught,<sup>206</sup> and hath remorse thereof. The glutton perceiveth his own fault, and sometimes thinketh it beastly. The slothful body misliketh his dullness, and thereby is moved to mend. But this kind of pride, that in his own opinion taketh himself for holy, is farthest from all recovery. For how can he mend his fault that taketh it for none, that weeneth<sup>207</sup> all is well that he doth himself (and nothing that any man doth else), that covereth his purpose with the pretext of some holy purpose that he will never begin while he liveth, taketh his envy for a holy desire to get before his neighbor in virtue, and taketh his wrath and anger for a holy zeal of justice. And thus while he proudly liketh his vices, he is out all the way to mend them, in so far forth that I surely think there be some, who had<sup>208</sup> in good faith made the best merchandise<sup>209</sup> that ever they made in their lives for their own souls, if they had changed those spiritual vices of pride, wrath, and envy for the beastly carnal sins of gluttony, sloth and lechery. Not that these three were good, which be undoubtedly damnable, but for that<sup>210</sup> like as God said in the Apocalypse unto the Church of Laodice, "Thou art neither hot nor cold but lukewarm. I would thou were cold that thou mightst wax<sup>211</sup> warm,"<sup>212</sup> signifying that if he were in open and manifest sins, he would have more occasion to call fervently for grace and help, so if these folk had these carnal sins, they could not be ignorant of their own faults. For, as Saint Paul saith, the fleshly sins be easy to perceive,<sup>213</sup> and so should

190 this 191 spiritual 192 distress, trouble 193 before 194 they be 195 from 196 out of, from 197 lust of: desire for 198 own; particular 199 high mind: pride 200 who 201 living 202 fellow 203 set by: esteemed, regarded 204 This 205 except for 206 wickedness 207 thinks 208 would have 209 bargain, exchange 210 for that: because 211 become, grow 212 Rv 3:14–15 213 Gal 5:19

they have occasion to call for grace and wax good, where now, by their pride taking themselves for good where they be naught,<sup>214</sup> they be far from all occasion of amendment, saving the knocking of our 5 Lord, which always standeth at the door of man's heart and knocketh,<sup>215</sup> whom I pray God we may give ear unto and let him in. And one of his good and gracious knockings is the putting us in remembrance of death, which remembrance, as I have said, 10 let us see what stead<sup>216</sup> it may stand us in against this cursed sin of pride.

And surely against this last branch of pride, of such as repute themselves for holy with the disdain of others, and an inward liking of all their spiri-
 15 tual vices, which they commend unto themselves, under the cloak and shadow of some kind of virtue, most hard it is to take remedy by the remembrance of death, forasmuch as they reckon themselves thereby ready to go straight to heaven. But 20 yet if they consider the labor and solicitation of our ghostly<sup>217</sup> enemy, the devil, that shall at the time of their death be busy to destroy the merits and good works of all their life before, and that subtlest craft, and most venomous dart, and the most for them to 25 avoid, shall be, under the color<sup>218</sup> of a faithful hope of heaven, as a thing more than due to their own holiness, to send them wretchedly to the fire of hell for their sinful and willful blind presumption, I say, the remembrance and consideration of this perilous
 30 point and fearful jeopardy likely to fall on them at the time of their death is a right effectual<sup>219</sup> ointment long before in their life to wear away the web that covereth the eyes of their souls in such wise as they cannot with a sure sight look upon their own 35 conscience.

As for all other kinds of pride, rising of beauty, strength, wit, or cunning, methinketh that the remembrance of death may right easily mend it, since that they be such things as shall shortly by death 40 lose all their gloss, the owners wot nere<sup>220</sup> how soon.

And as lightly may there, by the same consideration, be cured the pride of these foolish proud hypocrites, which are yet more fools than they that plainly follow the ways of the world and pleasure 45 of their body. For they, though they go to the devil therefor,<sup>221</sup> yet somewhat<sup>222</sup> they take therefore. These mad hypocrites be so mad that where they sink in hell as deep as the others, yet in reward of all their pain taken in this world, they be content 50 to take the vain praise of the people, a blast of wind of their mouths, which yet percase<sup>223</sup> praise them not but call them as they be. And if they do, yet themselves hear it not often. And sure they be that within short time death shall stop their ears, and the clods<sup>224</sup> cover all the mouths that praise them, 55 which, if they well and advisedly considered, they would, I ween,<sup>225</sup> turn their appetites from the laud of seely<sup>226</sup> mortal men, and desire to deserve their thanks and commendation of God only, whose praise can never die.

Now the high mind of proud fortune, rule, and authority, Lord God, how slight a thing it would seem to him that would often and deeply remember that death shall shortly take away all this royalty, and his glory shall, as the Scripture saith, 65 never walk with him into his grave;<sup>227</sup> but he that overlooketh<sup>228</sup> every man, and no man may be so homely to come too near him, but thinketh that he doth much for them whom he vouchsafeth<sup>229</sup>
 70 to take by the hand or beck upon, whom so many men dread and fear, so many wait upon — he shall within a few years, and only God knoweth within how few days, when death arresteth him, have his dainty body turned into stinking carrion, be borne out of his princely palace, laid in the ground and
 75 there left alone, where every lewd<sup>230</sup> lad will be bold to tread on his head. Would not, ween ye, the deep consideration of this sudden change, so surely to come and so shortly to come, withdraw the wind that puffeth us up in pride upon the solemn sight
 80 of worldly worship? If thou shouldst perceive that one were earnestly proud of the wearing of the gay golden gown, while the lorel<sup>231</sup> playeth the lord in a stage play, wouldst thou not laugh at his folly, considering that thou art very sure that when the play is 85 done he shall go walk a knave in his old coat? Now thou thinkest thyself wise enough while thou art proud in thy player's garment, and forgettest that when thy play is done, thou shalt go forth as poor as he. Nor thou remembrest not that thy pageant may 90 happen to be done as soon as his.

We shall leave the example of plays and players, which be too merry for this matter. I shall put thee a more earnest image of our condition, and that not

214 wicked 215 Rv 3:20 216 place
 217 spiritual 218 appearance, pretext
 219 right effectual: powerful in effect

220 wot nere: know not 221 for it 222 something 223 perhaps 224 soil
 225 think 226 silly; weak 227 See

Ps 48(49):18. 228 watches over 229 grants, wishes 230 uneducated; rude 231 rogue

a feigned similitude but a very true fashion<sup>232</sup> and figure of our worshipful estate. Mark this well, for of this thing we be very sure, that old and young, man and woman, rich and poor, prince and page, all the while we live in this world we be but prisoners, and be within a sure prison, out of which there can no man escape. And in worse case be we than those that be taken and imprisoned for theft. For they, albeit their heart heavily<sup>233</sup> hearkeneth after<sup>234</sup> the sessions,<sup>235</sup> yet have they some hope either to break prison the while, or to escape there by favor, or after condemnation some hope of pardon. But we stand all in other plight: we be very sure that we be already condemned to death, some one, some other, none of us can tell what death we be doomed to, but surely can we all tell that die we shall. And clearly know we that of this death we get no manner<sup>236</sup> pardon. For the King, by whose high sentence we be condemned to die, would not of this death pardon his own Son. As for escaping, no man can look for. The prison is large and many prisoners in it, but the jailer can lose none; he is so present in every place that we can creep into no corner out of his sight. For as holy David saith to this jailer, “Whither shall I go from thy spirit, and whither shall I flee from thy face?”<sup>237</sup> — as who saith, nowhither. There is no remedy therefore, but as condemned folk and remediless, in this prison of the earth we drive forth awhile, some bounden to a post, some wandering abroad, some in the dungeon, some in the upper ward, some building them bowers<sup>238</sup> and making palaces in the prison, some weeping, some laughing, some laboring, some playing, some singing, some chiding, some fighting, no man, almost, remembering in what case he standeth, till that suddenly, nothing less looking for, young, old, poor and rich, merry and sad, prince, page, pope and poor soul priest, now one, now other, sometimes a great rabble at once, without order, without respect of age or of estate, all stripped stark naked and shifted out in a sheet, be put to death in diverse wise<sup>239</sup> in some corner of the same prison, and even there thrown in a hole, and either worms eat him under ground, or crows above.

Now come forth, ye proud prisoner, for iwis<sup>240</sup> ye be no better, look ye never so high, when ye build in that prison a palace for your blood — is it not a great royalty if it be well considered? Ye build the Tower of Babylon<sup>241</sup> in a corner of the prison, and be very proud thereof; and sometimes the jailer beateth it down again with shame. Ye leave your lodging for your own blood; and the jailer, when ye be dead, setteth a strange prisoner in your building, and thrusteth your blood into some other cabin. Ye be proud of the arms of your ancestors set up in the prison; and all your pride is because ye forget that it is a prison. For if ye took the matter aright — the place a prison, yourself a prisoner condemned to death, from which ye cannot escape — ye would reckon this gear<sup>242</sup> as worshipful as if a gentleman thief, when he should go to Tyburn, would leave for a memorial the arms of his ancestors painted on a post in Newgate.<sup>243</sup> Surely, I suppose that if we took not true figure<sup>244</sup> for a fantasy, but reckoned it as it is indeed, the very express fashion and manner of all our estate,<sup>245</sup> men would bear themselves not much higher in their hearts for any rule or authority that they bear in this world, which they may well perceive to be indeed no better but one prisoner bearing a rule among the remnant, as the tapster<sup>246</sup> doth in the Marshalsea,<sup>247</sup> or at the uttermost, one so put in trust with the jailer that he is half an under-jailer over his fellows, till the sheriff and the cart come for him.

OF ENVY

Now let us see what help we may have of this medicine against the sickness of envy, which is undoubtedly both a sore<sup>248</sup> torment and a very consumption.<sup>249</sup> For surely envy is such a torment, as all the tyrants of Sicily never devised a sorer.<sup>250</sup> And it so drinketh up the moisture of the body, and consumeth the good blood, so discoloreth the face, so defaceth the beauty, so disfigureth the visage,<sup>251</sup> leaving it all bony, lean, pale, and wan, that a person well set a work with envy needeth none other

232 making 233 sorrowfully, with difficulty 234 hearkeneth after: listens to 235 the periodical sittings of justices of the peace 236 kind of 237 Ps 138(139):7 238 dwellings 239 ways 240 certainly 241 Babel, Gn 1:1–9 242 business; matter

243 a prison at London's northwest entrance 244 shape (of the matter) 245 condition 246 one who draws beer 247 another prison, in the borough of Southwark 248 grievous 249 disease causing the wasting of the body, specifically tuberculosis 250 e.g., Dionysius and Phalaris. Phalaris had created a bronze bull which, with a victim inside, was heated as a torturous method of execution. 251 face

image of death than his own face in a glass. This vice is not only devilish, but also very foolish. For albeit that envy, where it may over,<sup>252</sup> doth all the hurt it can, yet since the worse most commonly envieth the better, and the feebler the stronger, it happeth, for the more part, that as the fire of the burning hill of Etna<sup>253</sup> burneth only itself, so doth the envious person fret, fume, and burn in his own heart, without ability or power to do the other hurt. And little marvel it is though envy be an ungracious graft,<sup>254</sup> for it cometh of an ungracious stock. It is the first begotten daughter of pride, begotten in bastardy and incest by the devil, father of them both. For as soon as the devil had brought out his daughter pride, without wife, of<sup>255</sup> his own body, like as the venomous spider bringeth forth her cobweb, when this poisoned daughter of his had helped him out of heaven, at the first sight of Adam and Eve in paradise set in the way to such worship, the devil anon took his own unhappy daughter to wife, and upon pride begot envy, by whose enticement he set upon our first parents in Paradise, and by pride supplanted them, and there gave them so great a fall by their own folly that unto this day all their posterity go crooked thereof. And therefore ever since, envy goeth forth mourning at every man's welfare, more sorry of another man's wealth than glad of her own, of which she taketh no pleasure if other folk fare well with her. In so far forth that one Publius, a Roman, when he saw one Publius Mutius sad and heavy, whom he knew for an envious person, "Surely," quoth he, "either Mutius hath a shrewd turn<sup>256</sup> himself, or some man else a good turn,"<sup>257</sup> noting that his envious nature was as sorry of another man's weal<sup>258</sup> as of his own hurt.

I cannot here — albeit I nothing less intend than to meddle much with secular authors in this matter — yet can I not here hold my hand from the putting in remembrance of a certain fable of Aesop;<sup>259</sup> it expresseth so properly the nature, the affection, and the reward of two capital vices, that is to wit, envy and covetousness. Aesop, therefore, as I think ye have heard, feigneth that one of the paynim<sup>260</sup> gods came down into earth, and finding together in a place two men, the one envious, the other covetous, showed himself willing to give each of them a gift, but there should but<sup>261</sup> one of them ask for them both; but look, whatsoever that one that should ask would ask for himself, the other should have the selfsame thing doubled. When this condition was offered, then began there some courtesy between the envious and covetous, whether<sup>262</sup> of them should ask: for that would not the covetous be brought unto for nothing, because himself would have his fellow's request doubled. And when the envious man saw that, he would provide that his fellow should have little good of the doubling of his petition. And forthwith<sup>263</sup> he required, for his part, that he might have one of his eyes put out. By reason of which request, the envious man lost one eye, and the covetous lost both.

Lo, such is the wretched appetite of this cursed envy, ready to run into the fire, so he may draw his neighbor with him. Which<sup>264</sup> envy is, as I have said, and as Saint Augustine saith, the daughter of pride, in so far forth that, as this holy doctor saith, strangle the mother and thou destroyest the daughter.<sup>265</sup> And therefore, look what manner<sup>266</sup> consideration, in the remembrance of death, shall be medicinable against the pestilent swelling sore of pride, the selfsame considerations be the next remedies against the venomous vice of envy. For whosoever envy another, it is for something, whereof himself would be proud if he had it. Then if such considerations of death as we have before spoken of in the repressing of pride should make thee set neither much by those things, nor much the more by thyself for them if thyself hadst them, it must needs follow that the selfsame considerations shall leave thee little cause to envy the selfsame things in any other man. For thou wouldst not, for shame, that men should think thee so mad to envy a poor soul for playing the lord one night in an interlude.<sup>267</sup> And also couldst thou envy a perpetual sick man, a man that carrieth his death's wound with him, a man that is but a prisoner damned to death, a man that is in the cart already carrying forward? For all these things are, as I think, made meetly<sup>268</sup> probable to thee before.

252 overcome, master 253 a volcano in Sicily 254 a shoot grafted onto another shoot or tree 255 out of, from 256 shrewd turn: malicious act 257 Macrobius, Saturnalia 2.8 258 wealth; well-being 259 Included by William Caxton in his *Historyes and Fables of Esop

(1484) as "The xvii fable . . . of Phebus . . . the Avarycious and . . . the envious," this story from which More adapts the following is actually a fable of Avianus, "De cupido et invido." 260 pagan 261 only 262 which 263 immediately 264 This 265 See Sermones 303.2, 304.5 (PL 39: 1561, 1565); Enarrationes in Psalmos 100.9; De genesi ad litteram 11.14; De catechizandis rudibus 4; Epistolae 140.54; De sancta virginitate 31. 266 kind of 267 a dramatic scene, usually light and comic, commonly introduced between the acts of a more serious play 268 fairly; suitably

It is also to be considered that since it is so that men commonly envy their betters, the remembrance of death should of reason be a great remedy thereof. For I suppose if there were one right<sup>269</sup> far above thee, yet thou wouldst not greatly envy his estate, if thou thoughtst that thou mightst be his match the next week. And why shouldst thou then envy him now, while thou seest that death may make you both matches the next night, and shall undoubtedly within few years? If it so were that thou knewest a great duke,<sup>270</sup> keeping so great estate and princely port<sup>271</sup> in his house that thou, being a right mean<sup>272</sup> man, hadst in thine heart a great envy thereat, and specially at some special day, in which he keepeth for the marriage of his child a great honorable court above other times; if thou being thereat, and — at the sight of the royalty and honor shown him of all the country about resorting to him, while they kneel and crouch to him and at every word bare-headed begrace him — if thou shouldst suddenly be surely advertised<sup>273</sup> that for secret treason lately detected to the king, he should undoubtedly be taken the morrow, his court all broken up, his goods seized, his wife put out, his children disinherited, himself cast into prison, brought forth and arraigned, the matter out of question,<sup>274</sup> and he should be condemned, his coat armor reversed, his gilt spurs hewn off his heels, himself hanged, drawn, and quartered, how thinkest thou, by thy faith, amid thine envy, shouldst thou not suddenly change into pity?

Surely so is it that if we considered everything aright and esteemed it after the very<sup>275</sup> nature, not after men's false opinion, since we be certain that death shall take away all that we envy any man for, and we be uncertain how soon, and yet very sure that it shall not be long, we should never see cause to envy any man, but rather to pity every man, and those most that most hath to be envied for, since they be those that shortly shall most lose.

OF WRATH

Let us now somewhat see how this part of our medicine (that is to wit,<sup>276</sup> the remembrance of death) may cure us of the fierce rageous<sup>277</sup> fever of wrath. For wrath is undoubtedly another daughter of pride. For albeit that wrath sometimes riseth upon<sup>278</sup> a wrong done us, as<sup>279</sup> harm to our person, or loss in our goods, which is an occasion given us and often sudden, by reason whereof the sin is somewhat less grievous, the rule of reason being letted<sup>280</sup> for the while by the sudden brunt of the injury, not forethought upon, but coming upon us unprovided, yet shall ye find that in them which have so turned an evil custom into nature that they seem now naturally disposed to wrath and waywardness, the very root of that vice is pride, although their manner and behavior be such besides, that folk would little ween<sup>281</sup> it. For go they never so simply, look they never so lowly, yet shall ye see them at every light occasion testy. They cannot abide one merry word that toucheth them, they cannot bear in reasoning to be contraried, but they fret and fume if their opinion be not accepted, and their invention be not magnified.

Whereof riseth this waywardness, but of a secret root of setting much by themselves, by which it goeth to their heart when they see any man less esteem them than they seem worthy to themselves?

Wilt thou also well perceive that the setting by<sup>282</sup> ourselves is more than half the weight of our wrath? We shall prove it by them that would haply<sup>283</sup> say nay. Take me one that reckoneth himself for worshipful, and look whether he shall not be much more wroth with one opprobrious and rebukeful word — as “knave” percase<sup>284</sup> or “beggar” (in which is no great slander), spoken to his face by one that he reckoneth but his match or far under him — than with the selfsame word spoken to him by one that he knoweth and acknowledgeth for a great deal his better.

We see this point confirmed by all the laws made among men, which laws — forasmuch as the actions of trespass be given to revenge men not of the wrongs only done unto them in their bodies or their goods, but also of their contumelies,<sup>285</sup> griefs,

269 very 270 Here More alludes to the fall of the Duke of Buckingham in 1521. 271 bearing, demeanor 272 moderate, average 273 notified 274 out of question: beyond a doubt 275 true 276 say 277 rage-filled 278 from 279 such as 280 hindered, prevented 281 think 282 setting by: valuing of

283 perhaps 284 perhaps 285 insolent reproaches or rebukes

and despites, whereby they conceive any displeasure at heart, lest in lack of law to do it for them, they should in following their irous<sup>286</sup> affection, revenge themselves immoderately with their own hands —
 5 the laws, I say, considereth, pondereth, and punisheth the trespasses done to every man, not only after<sup>287</sup> the hurt that is done or loss that is taken, but and if<sup>288</sup> it be such as the party grieved is like to be wroth withal,<sup>289</sup> the punishment is aggrieved or diminished, made less or more, after the difference in 10 degree of worship and reputation between the parties. And this is the provision of the laws almost in every country, and hath been afore Christ was born, by which it appeareth by a common consent that 15 a man's own estimation — setting by himself, disdain- ing to take rebuke of one worse than himself — maketh his wrath the sorer.<sup>290</sup>

For the assuaging whereof, the law contenteth him with the larger punishment of his offender.

20 And this so far forth that in Spain it is sorer taken, and sorer punished, if one give another a dry blow<sup>291</sup> with his fist, than if he draw blood upon him with a sword. The cause is none other but the appeasing of his mind that is so stricken, forasmuch 25 as commonly they take themselves for so very manly men that three strokes with a sword could not anger one of them so much as that it should appear that, by a blow given him with a bare hand, any man should so far reckon him for a boy that he would 30 not vouchsafe to draw any weapon at him.

So that, as I said, it well appeareth by the common confession of the world, expressed and declared by their laws, that the point and readiness that men have to wax<sup>292</sup> angry groweth of the secret 35 pride by which we set overmuch by ourselves. And like as that kind of good anger that we call a good zeal riseth of that we set, as we should do, so much by our Lord God, that we cannot be but wroth<sup>293</sup> with them whom we see set so little by him that 40 they let<sup>294</sup> not to break his high commandments, so riseth of much setting by<sup>295</sup> ourselves that affection of anger, by which we be moved against them with ire<sup>296</sup> and disdain that displease us and show by their behavior that they set less by us than our 45 proud heart looketh for. By which though we mark it not, yet indeed we reckon ourselves worthy more reverence than we do God himself only.

I doubt not but men will say nay, and I verily believe that they think nay, and the cause is for that we perceive not of what root the branches of our sins
 50 spring. But will ye see it proved that it is so? Look whether we be not more angry with our servants for the breach of one commandment of our own than for the breach of God's all ten; and whether we be not more wroth with one contumelious<sup>297</sup> or 55 despiteful word spoken against ourselves than with many blasphemous words irreverently spoken of God. And could we, trow<sup>298</sup> ye, be more moved with the diminishing of our own worship than God's, or look to have our own commandments better 60 obeyed than God's, if we did not indeed set more by ourselves than him?

And therefore this deadly sore of wrath, of which so much harm groweth, that maketh men unlike 65 themselves, that maketh us like wood wolves or furies of hell, that driveth us forth headlong upon sword points, that maketh us blindly run forth upon other men's destruction with our own ruin, is but a cursed branch rising and springing out of the 70 secret root of pride.

And like as it is in physic<sup>299</sup> a special thing necessary to know where and in what place of the body lieth the beginning, and, as it were, the fountain of the sore, from which the matter is always ministered<sup>300</sup> unto the place where it appeareth (for the 75 fountain once stopped, the sore shall soon heal of itself, the matter failing that fed it — which continually resorting from the fountain to the place, men may well daily purge and cleanse the sore, but they shall hardly heal it), likewise, I say, fareth it by the 80 sore of the soul: if we perceive once the root and dig up that, we be very sure the branches be surely gone. But while the root remaineth, while we cut off the branches, we let<sup>301</sup> well the growing and keep it somewhat under, but fail they may not always to 85 spring again.

And therefore, since this ungracious branch of wrath springeth out of the cursed root of pride and setting much by ourselves, so secretly lurking in our heart that uneasily we can perceive it ourselves, let 90 us pull up well the root, and surely the branch of wrath shall soon wither away. For taken once away the setting by ourselves, we shall not greatly dote upon that we set little by.

286 wrathful 287 according to 288 and if; if 289 wroth withal:
 angry besides or thereby 290 worse

291 dry blow: a blow that does not draw blood 292 become 293 indignant 294 hesitate 295 setting by: esteeming

296 anger 297 reproachful, humiliating 298 trust 299 medical treatment
 300 supplied 301 prevent, hinder

So shall there of<sup>302</sup> such humility, contempt and abjection of ourselves shortly follow in us high estimation, honor, and love of God, and every other creature in order for his sake, as they shall appear 5 more or less lief<sup>303</sup> unto him.

And since that by the destruction of pride followeth, as I have said, the destruction of wrath, we shall apply to the repression of wrath the selfsame considerations in the remembrance of death that 10 we before have shown to serve to the repression of pride.

For who could be angry for the loss of goods, if he well remembered how little while he should keep them, how soon death might take them from him?
15 Who could set so much by himself, to take to heart a lewd<sup>304</sup> rebukeful word spoken to his face, if he remembered himself to be as he is, a poor prisoner damned to death; or so very wroth as we be now with some bodily hurt done us upon some one part 20 of the body, if we deeply remembered that we be, as we be indeed, already laid in the cart carrying toward execution.

And if the wretchedness of our own estate<sup>305</sup> nothing moved us—which being such as it is, should,
25 if it were well pondered, make us little regard the causes of our wrath, considering that all the while we live we be but in dying—yet might the state of him that we be wroth withal make us ashamed to be wroth. For who would not disdain to be wroth with 30 a wretched prisoner, with him that is in the cart and in the way to hanging, with him that were a-dying? And of this would a man be the more ashamed, if he considered in how much peril and jeopardy of himself his own life and his own soul is, while he
35 striveth, chideth and fighteth with another, and that oftentimes for how very trifles. First, shame were it for men to be wroth like women, for fantasies and things of nought,<sup>306</sup> if there were no worse therein. And now shall ye see men fall at variance for kissing 40 of the pax,<sup>307</sup> or going before in procession, or setting of their wives' pews in the church. Doubt ye whether this wrath be pride? I doubt not but wise men will agree that it is either foolish pride or proud folly.

How much is it now the more folly, if we consider that we be but going in pilgrimage, and have 45 here no dwelling place, then, to chide and fight for such follies by the way.

How much more shame and folly is it yet, when we be going together to our death, as we be indeed.

If we should see two men fighting together for 50 very great things, yet would we reckon them both mad, if they left not off when they should see a ramping<sup>308</sup> lion coming on them both, ready to devour them both. Now when we see surely that the death is coming on us all and shall undoubtedly 55 within short space devour us all, and how soon we know not all, is it not now more than madness to be wroth and bear malice one to another, and for the more part for as very trifles, as children should fall at variance<sup>309</sup> for cherry stones, death coming, as I 60 say, upon us to devour us all?

If these things and such others as they be very true, so<sup>310</sup> they were well and deeply remembered, I little doubt but they would both abate the crooked branch of wrath, and pull up from the bottom of 65 the heart the cankered root of pride.

OF COVETOUSNESS

Let us now somewhat see what this part of our medicine may do to the cure of covetousness, which is a 70 sickness wherein men be very sore<sup>311</sup> deceived. For it maketh folk to seem far<sup>312</sup> of another sort than they be indeed. For covetous men seem humble, and yet be they very proud; they seem wise, and yet be they very foolish. They seem Christian, and yet have no trust in Christ. And (which most marvel is of all)
75 they seem rich, and yet be very beggars, and have nought of their own.

As for pride of the possession of their goods, whoso be well acquainted with them shall well perceive it how heartily they rejoice, where they dare 80 speak and call their betters beggars, if money be not so rife with them, because they regard it less and spend it more liberally.

Men ween<sup>313</sup> them wise also, and so they do themselves, because they seem to have providence and be 85 folk of foresight, and not to regard only the time present, but make provision for time to come. But then prove they more fools than they that live from hand to mouth. For they take at the leastwise some time of pleasure with their own, though they fare
90 hard at another. But these covetous niggards,<sup>314</sup>

302 from, out of 303 beloved, dear 304 rude 305 condition, state 306 no importance 307 a tablet depicting the crucifixion, kissed by the celebrating priest and other participants at a Mass 308 rampaging, raging 309 fall at variance: begin quarreling 310 so that 311 grievously; greatly 312 much more 313 believe 314 misers

while they pass on with pain always the time present, and always spare all for their time to come, thus drive they forth wretchedly, till all their time be past and none to come. And then when they least look therefor, leave all that they have heaped to strangers that shall never can them thank.

If ye will say there be no such fools, I might say that I have seen some such in my time. And if ye believe not me, I could find ye record.<sup>315</sup> But to the intent ye shall not deny me but that there have been such fools of old, ye shall hear what Solomon said seven years ere<sup>316</sup> I was born. “I have seen,” saith he, “another plague under the sun, and it is common among men: a man unto whom God hath given riches, substance,<sup>317</sup> and honor, so that he wanteth nothing that his heart can desire, yet God hath not given him leave to eat of it or to enjoy it, but a stranger devoureth.”<sup>318</sup> Of such sort of fools also speaketh the Psalmist thus: “A man disquieteth himself in vain, and heapeth up riches, and cannot tell for whom he gathereth them.”<sup>319</sup> And in the forty-eighth psalm the Prophet expresseth plainly the folly of such fools: “For,” saith he, “both the rich and the poor shall die, and leave their riches unto strangers.”<sup>320</sup> And surely where they seem Christian, they have none earthly trust in Christ. For they be ever afraid of lack in time to come, have they already never so much. And methinketh utterly on the other side that albeit<sup>321</sup> every man that hath children is bound by the law of God and of nature to provide for them, till they be able at the least by the labor of their hands to provide for their bellies (for God and nature looketh not, as methinketh, much farther, nor thrust us not out of the paradise of pleasure to make us look and long to be lords in this wretched earth) yet, I say, meseemeth verily<sup>322</sup> that have we never so little, if we be not in spirit merry therewith, but live in puling<sup>323</sup> and whimpering and heaviness of heart, to the discomfort of ourselves and them that are about us, for fear and dread of lack in time to come, it appeareth, I say, plainly, that speak we never so much of faith and of trust in Christ, we have in our hearts neither more belief in his holy words nor trust in his faithful promise than hath a Jew or a Turk.

Doth not Holy Scripture say, “Cast thy thought into God and he shall nourish thee?”<sup>324</sup> Why takest thou thought now in thyself, and fearest to fail for food?

Saith not our Savior himself, “Have no care for tomorrow,” and then furnisheth and enforceth his commandment by example, saying, “reap, nor gather to no barns, and your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are not ye far more excellent than they? Your Father in heaven knoweth that ye have need of all these things. Seek ye first for the kingdom of heaven and the justice of him, and all these things shall be cast unto you besides.”<sup>325</sup> Whosoever he be that heareth this, and yet puleth<sup>326</sup> and whimpereth for doubt and fear of lack in time coming, either he believeth not that Christ spoke these words (and then believeth he not the Gospel) or else, if he believe that Christ spoke them and yet feareth lest he will not keep them, how believeth he Christ or trusteth in his promise? Thou wilt haply<sup>327</sup> say that Christ would not for any trust of him that thou shouldst not provide for tomorrow, but look to be fed by miracle. In this thou sayest true; and therefore he said not, “Provide not for tomorrow, nor labor not for tomorrow.” In token whereof he sent the Jews double manna, weekly, the day before the sabbath day, to be provided for before the hand.<sup>328</sup> But he said unto us, “Have none anxiety nor care of mind for tomorrow.” For the mind would Christ have clean<sup>329</sup> discharged of all earthly care, to the end that we should in heart only care and long for heaven. And therefore he said, “things God shall cast unto us besides,” showing thereby that by the hearty longing for heaven we shall have both twain.<sup>330</sup>

And surely the things coming of<sup>331</sup> the earth for the necessary sustenance of man, requireth rather the labor of the body than the care of the mind. But the getting of heaven requireth care, cure and ardent desire of the mind, much more than the labor of the body, saving that the busy desire of the mind can never suffer the body to be idle.

Thou wilt haply say, “What if I cannot labor, or have more small children to find than my labor of three days will suffice to feed for one day? Shall I not then care and take thought how they shall live tomorrow, or tell what other shift I shall find?” First shall I tell thee what shift thou shalt make in such case, and after shall I show thee that if all shift

315 examples 316 before 317 property, possessions 318 Eccl 6:1–2 319 Ps 38(39):7 320 Ps 48(49):11

321 although 322 meseemeth verily: it truly seems to me 323 whining 324 Ps 54(55):23 325 Mt 6:25–6, 32–33; cf. also

Lk 12:24, 31–2. 326 whines 327 perhaps 328 Ex 16:4–5 329 entirely 330 together 331 from fail thee, yet if thou be a faithful man, thou shalt take no thought. I say, if thou lack, thou shalt labor to thy power, by just and true business, to get that thee and thine behoveth.<sup>332</sup> If thy labor suffice

 5 not, thou shalt show thy state — that thou hast little money and much charge<sup>333</sup> — to some such men as have much money and little charge, and they be then bounden of duty to supply of theirs that thee lacketh of thine. What if they will not? Then I say
 10 that yet oughtest thou not to take thought and care in heart, or despair of God's promise for thy living, but to make thyself very sure that either God will provide thee and thine meat by putting other men in the mind to relieve thee, or send thee meat by 15 miracle (as he hath in desert wilderness sent some men their meat by a crow),<sup>334</sup> or else his pleasure is that thou and thine shall live no longer but die and depart by famine, as he will that some other die by sickness. In which case thou must willingly without 20 grudge or care (which, care thou never so sore,<sup>335</sup> cannot get thee a penny the more) conform thyself to his ordinance. For though he hath promised to provide us meat, yet hath he not promised it for longer time than him liketh to let us live, to whom we
 25 be all debtors of death. And therefore, though he sent Daniel meat enough by Habakkuk the prophet into the lake among lions,<sup>336</sup> yet sent he none at all to but let him die for famine at the rich glutton's gate. There died he without grudge, without anxiety, 30 with good will and glad hope, whereby he went into Abraham's bosom.<sup>337</sup> Now if thou do the like, thou shalt go into a better bosom, into heaven, into the bosom of our Savior Christ.

Now if the poor man, that nought hath, show
 35 himself to lack faith and to have no trust in Christ's words, if he fear lack of finding,<sup>338</sup> what faith hath then the covetous wretch, that hath enough for this day, for tomorrow, for this week, for the next, for this month, for the next, for this year, for the next,
 40 yea and peradventure<sup>339</sup> for many years, yearly coming in, of lands, offices, or merchandise, or other ways, and yet is ever whining, complaining, mourning, for care and fear of lack many years hereafter for him or his children, as though God either would 45 not, or were not able to keep his promise with us? And (which is the more madness) his care is all for the living of himself and his children, for some such time as neither himself nor his children shall haply live thereto. And so loseth he the commodity<sup>340</sup> of all his whole life, with the fear of lack of living when 50 he is dead.

Now if he hap to have a great loss, in what heaviness<sup>341</sup> falleth he then? For if he had ten thousand pounds, and thereof had eight thousand taken from him, he would weep and ween<sup>342</sup> he were undone.
 55 And yet if he had never had but one, he would have thought himself a great rich man, where now for the loss of eight, twain<sup>343</sup> can do him no pleasure.

Whereof riseth this high<sup>344</sup> folly but of the blind covetous affection that he had to that he lost? If he had had it still, yet he would peradventure not have occupied it, for this that is left is more than he will spend or haply shall need to spend. If ye would have spent it well, ye have no cause to be sorry of the loss, 60 for God accepteth your good will. If ye would have kept it covetously or spent it naughtly,<sup>345</sup> ye have a cause to be glad and reckon that ye have won by the loss, in that the matter and occasion of your sin is by God's goodness graciously taken from you.

But ye will say that ye have now lost of your worship,<sup>346</sup> and shall not be set by<sup>347</sup> so much as ye were when ye were known for so rich. Ah well, I say, now ye come home, lo! Methought always that ye covetous niggards,<sup>348</sup> how lowly<sup>349</sup> soever ye looked, would if ye were well searched, prove yourself
 75 proud and high-hearted. For surely make they never so meek and humble countenance, they have much pride in the mind, and put their trust in their goods, making their goods their god. Which<sup>350</sup> thing is the cause that our Savior Christ said it were as hard for 80 the rich man to come into heaven as a great cable or a camel to go through a needle's eye.<sup>351</sup> For it is not sin to have riches, but to love riches.

"If riches come to you, set not your heart thereon," saith Holy Scripture.<sup>352</sup> He that setteth not his heart 85 thereon, nor casteth not his love thereon, reckoneth, as it is indeed, himself not the richer by them, nor those goods not his own, but delivered him by God to be faithfully disposed upon himself and others, and that of the disposition he must give the reckon-90 ing. And therefore, as he reckoneth himself never the richer, so is he never the prouder.

332 need 333 care 334 Elijah was fed by a raven; see 1 Kgs 17:6.

335 greatly 336 Dn 14:32–38 337 Lk 16:19–22 338 material support, provisions 339 perhaps 340 benefit, profit 341 sadness 342 think 343 two 344 proud 345 wickedly 346 honor, distinction 347 set by: valued, esteemed

348 misers 349 humble 350 This 351 Mk 10:25; cf. also Lk 18:25; Mt 19:24 352 Ps 61(62):11

But he that forgetteth his goods to be the goods of God, and of a disposer<sup>353</sup> reckoneth himself an owner, he taketh himself for rich. And because he reckoneth the riches his own, he casteth a love thereto, and so much is his love the less set unto God. For, as Holy Scripture saith, “Where thy treasure is, there is thine heart”;<sup>354</sup> where if thou didst reckon the treasure not thine, but the treasure of God delivered<sup>355</sup> thee to dispose and bestow, thy treasure should be in earth and thy heart in heaven.

But these covetous folk that set their hearts on their hoards, and be proud when they look on their heaps, they reckon themselves rich, and be indeed very wretched beggars — those, I mean, that be full christened in covetousness, that have all the properties belonging to that name: that is to wit, that be as loath to spend aught<sup>356</sup> as they be glad to get all. For they not only part nothing liberally with other folk, but also live wretchedly by sparing from themselves. And so they reckon themselves owners, and be indeed but the bare keepers of other men’s goods. For since they find in their heart to spend nothing upon themselves, but keep all for their executors, they make it even now not their own while they use it not, but other men’s, for whose use and behoof<sup>357</sup> they keep it. But now let us see, as I said before, how the remembrance of death may quicken<sup>358</sup> men’s eyes against this blind folly of covetousness. For surely it is a hard sore to cure; it is so mad that it is much work to make any good counsel sink into the heart. Wilt thou see it proved? Look upon the young man whom Christ himself counseled to sell that he had and give it to poor folk, and come and follow him. He clawed his head and went his way heavily,<sup>359</sup> because he was rich,<sup>360</sup> whereas Saint Peter and other holy apostles at the first call left their nets, which was in effect all that they had, and followed him.<sup>361</sup> They had no great things whereupon they had set their hearts to hold them back. But and if<sup>362</sup> their hearts had been sore set upon right small things, it would have been a great let.<sup>363</sup>

And no marvel though covetousness be hard to heal. For it is not easy to find a good time to give them counsel. As for the glutton, is<sup>364</sup> ready to hear of temperance, yea and to preach also of fasting

himself, when his belly is well-filled. The lecherous, after his foul pleasure past, may suffer to hear of continence, and abhorreth almost the other by himself. But the covetous man, because he never ceaseth to dote upon his goods, and is ever alike greedy thereupon, whoso giveth him advice to be liberal seemeth to preach to a glutton for fasting when his belly is empty and gapeth for good meat, or to a lusty lecher when his leman<sup>365</sup> is lately light in his lap. Scantly can death cure them when he cometh.

I remember me of a thief once cast at Newgate, that cut a purse at the bar when he should be hanged on the morrow. And when he was asked why he did so, knowing that he should die so shortly, the desperate wretch said that it did his heart good to be lord of that purse one night yet. And in good faith methinketh as much as we wonder at him, yet see we many that do much like, of whom we nothing wonder at all. I let pass old priests that sue for advowsons<sup>366</sup> of younger priests’ benefices. I let pass old men that hove<sup>367</sup> and gape to be executors to some that be younger than themselves, whose goods, if they would fall, they reckon would do them good to have in their keeping yet one year ere<sup>368</sup> they die.

But look if ye see not some wretches that scant can creep for<sup>369</sup> age, his head hanging in his bosom, and his body crooked, walk pit-pat upon a pair of pattens<sup>370</sup> with the staff in the one hand and the paternoster<sup>371</sup> in the other hand, the one foot almost in the grave already, and yet never the more haste to part with anything, nor to restore that<sup>372</sup> he hath evil-gotten, but as greedy to get a groat<sup>373</sup> by the beguiling of his neighbor, as if he had of certainty seven score<sup>374</sup> years to live.

The man that is purblind<sup>375</sup> cannot see far from him. And as to look on death, we be for the most part purblind all the many, for we cannot see him till he come very near us. But these folk be not purblind but stark blind, for they cannot see him when he cometh so near that he putteth almost his finger in their eye.

Sure the cause is for that<sup>376</sup> they willingly wink, and list<sup>377</sup> not to look at him. They be loath to remember death, loath to put this ointment on their eyes. This water is somewhat pricking and would

353 steward 354 Mt 6:21 355 delivered to 356 anything 357 benefit 358 revive spiritually 359 sadly 360 Mt 19:21-22; Mk 10:21-22; Lk 18:22-23 361 Mt 14:18-22; Mk 1:16-20; Lk 5:9-11

362 and if: if 363 hindrance 364 he is 365 mistress 366 the rights to benefices or livings 367 wait, linger; hover 368 before 369 because of 370 thick-soled footwear 371 a set of rosary beads 372 what 373 very small sum of money 374 seven score: 140 375 partially or almost blind 376 for that: because 377 choose, wish make their eyes water, and therefore they refuse it. But surely if they would use it, if they would as advisedly remember death as they unadvisedly forget him, they should soon see their folly, and shake off 5 their covetousness. For undoubtedly, if they would consider deeply how soon they may, yea, and how soon they must, lose all that they labor for, they would shortly cease their business, and would never be so mad, greedily to gather together that other 10 men shall merrily soon after scatter abroad.

If they thought how soon in what painful plight they shall lie a-dying, while their executors afore their face ransack up their sacks, they would, I ween, shortly empty their sacks themselves. And if they 15 doubt how far that death is from them, let them hear what Christ saith in the Gospel to the rich covetous gatherer, that thought to make his barns and his warehouses larger to lay in the more, because he reckoned in himself to live and make merry many
20 years, and it was said unto him, “Thou fool! This night shall they take thy soul from thee; and then these things that thou hast gathered, whose shall they be?”<sup>378</sup> And holy Saint Bernard saith that it may be said unto him further, “Thou that hast gathered them, whose shalt thou be?”<sup>379</sup>

If we would well advise us upon this point, and remember the painful peril of death, that we shall so soon come to, and that of all that we gather we shall carry nothing with us, it would cause us to consider 30 that this covetous gathering and niggardous<sup>380</sup> keeping, with all the delight that we take in the beholding of our substance,<sup>381</sup> is in all our life but a very gay golden dream, in which we dream that we have great riches, and in the sleep of this life we be glad and proud thereof. But when death shall once waken us, our gay golden dream shall vanish, and of all the treasure that we so merrily dreamed of, we shall not 35 (as the holy Prophet saith) find one penny left in our hands.<sup>382</sup> Which<sup>383</sup> if we forgot not, but well and effectually remembered, we would in time cast covetousness out of our heads and, leaving little business for our executors after our death, not fail to dispose and distribute our substance with our own hands.

If thou knewest very certainly that, after all thy 45 goods gathered together, thou shouldst be suddenly robbed of all together, thou wouldst, I ween, have little joy to labor and toil for so much, but rather as thou shouldst happen to get it, so wouldst thou wisely bestow it there as need were and where thou 50 mightst have thanks therefor—and on them especially that were likely to help thee with theirs when thine were all gone. But it is so, that thou art of nothing so sure as that death shall bereave<sup>384</sup> thee of all that ever thou heapest, and leave thee scant<sup>385</sup> a sheet. Which thing, if we did as well remember as 55 we well know, we should not fail to labor less for that we shall so lose, and would put into poor men’s purses our money to keep, that death, the cruel thief, should not find it about us, but they should relieve us therewith when the remnant were bereft us. 60

OF GLUTTONY

Now have we to consider how this part of our medicine (that is to wit, the remembrance of death) may be applied to the cure and help of gluttony, which is a beastly sickness and an old sore. For this was 65 in the beginning joined with pride in our mother Eve, who besides the proud appetite that she had to be by knowledge made in manner<sup>386</sup> a goddess, yet took she such delight also in the beholding of the apple, that she longed to feel the taste. And so
70 entered death at the windows of our own eyes into the house of our heart, and there burned up all the goodly building, that God had wrought therein. And surely so falleth it daily, that the eye is not only the cook and the tapster,<sup>387</sup> to bring the ravenous
75 appetite of delicate meat and drink into the belly (so far forth that men commonly say it were better fill his belly than his eye, and many men mind it not at all till they see the meat on the board), but the eye is also the bawd,<sup>388</sup> to bring the heart to the 80 desire of the foul beastly pleasure beneath the belly. For when the eye immoderately delighteth in long looking of the beauteous face, with the white neck and round paps,<sup>389</sup> and so forth as far as it findeth
85 no let,<sup>390</sup> the devil helpeth the heart to frame and form in the fantasy, by foul imaginations, all that ever the clothes cover. And that in such excellent

378 Lk 12:16–20 379 See Sermo de conversione ad clericos 8.16–17 (PL 182: 843). 380 miserly 381 possessions 382 Ps 75(76):6 383 This 384 deprive, dispossess 385 barely, scarcely 386 in manner: very nearly; so to speak 387 one who draws beer, keeper of a tavern 388 a procurer of sexual debauchery or prostitution 389 breasts 390 hindrance, obstacle

fashion, as the mind is more kindled in the feigned figure of his own device than it should haply be if the eye saw the body, belly-naked such as it is indeed. And therefore saith the holy Prophet, “Turn 5 away thine eyes from the beholding of vanities.”<sup>391</sup>

Now, as I began to say, since it is so that this old sore of gluttony was the vice and sin by which our forefathers, eating the forbidden fruit, fell from the felicity of Paradise and from their immortality into 10 death, and into the misery of this wretched world, well ought we to hate and abhor it, although there should now no new harm grow thereof. But so is it now, that so much harm daily growth thereof new, not to the soul only, but to the body also, that if we 15 love either other, we see great cause to have it in hatred and abomination, though it had never done us hurt of old. For hard it is to say whether this vice be more pestilent to the body or to the soul — surely very pestilent to both.

And as to the soul, no man doubteth how deadly it is. For since the body rebelleth always against the spirit, what can be more venomous and mortal to the soul than gorbellied<sup>392</sup> gluttony, which so pampereth the body, that the soul can have no 25 rule thereof, but carrieth it forth like a headstrong horse, till he have cast his master in the mire. And if the corruptible body be (as the wise man saith)<sup>393</sup> burdenous to the soul, with what a burden chargeth he the soul that so pampereth his paunch that 30 he is scant able to bear the burden of his own belly, though it were taken from the place and laid upon his back. If the body be to the soul a prison, how strait a prison maketh he the body that stuffeth it so full of riff-raff that the soul can have no room to 35 stir itself, but as one were so set, hand and foot, in a strait stocks that he can neither stand up nor lie down, so the soul is so stifled in such a stuffed body that it can nothing wield itself in doing of any good spiritual thing that appertaineth unto his part, but 40 is, as it were, enclosed, not in a prison but in a grave, dead in manner already, for any good operation that the unwieldy body can suffer it to do.

And yet is gluttony to the soul not so pernicious and pestilent for the hurt it doth itself, as for the 45 harm and destruction that is done by such other vices as commonly come thereon. For no man doubteth but sloth and lechery be the very daughters of gluttony. And then needs must it be a deadly enemy to the soul, that bringeth forth two such daughters, of which either one killeth the soul eternally — I mean 50 not the substance of the soul, but the wealth and felicity of the soul, without which it were better never to have been born. What good can the great glutton do with his belly standing a-strut like a tabor,<sup>394</sup> and his noll totty<sup>395</sup> with drink, but bolck<sup>396</sup> up his brews

55 in the midst of his matters, or lie down and sleep like a swine. And who doubteth but that the body delicately fed maketh, as the rumor saith, an unchaste bed. Men are wont to write a short riddle on the wall that D. C. hath no P. Read ye this riddle?<sup>397</sup> I cannot,
60 but I have heard say that it toucheth the readiness that woman hath to fleshly filth, if she fall in drunkenness. And if ye find one that can declare it, though it be no great authority, yet have I heard say that it is very true.

Of our glutton feasts followeth not only sloth and lechery, but oftentimes lewd and perilous talking, foolhardiness, backbiting, debate, variance, chiding, wrath, and fighting, with readiness to all 70 manner<sup>398</sup> mischief, running to ruin for lack of circumspection, which can never be without soberness. The Holy Scripture rehearseth<sup>399</sup> that in desert the children of Israel, when they had sat down and well eaten and drunk, then rose they up and played the idolators, whereof by the occasion of 75 gluttony, the wrath of God fell upon them.<sup>400</sup> Holy Job, when his children fell to feasting, feared so greatly that the occasion of gluttony should in their feasts make them fall into foolish talking and blasphemy, that while they were about their feasts, he 80 fell to prayer and sacrifice, that God might at his prayer send them grace so to make good cheer that they fell not in the vices usually coming of gluttony.<sup>401</sup> Now to the body what sin is so noyous?<sup>402</sup> What sin so shameful? Is it not a beastly thing to see
85 a man that hath reason, so to rule himself that his feet may not bear him, but when he cometh out he weeneth<sup>403</sup> that the sky would fall on his head, and there rolleth and reeleth till he fall down the cannel,<sup>404</sup> and there lie down till he be taken up and 90 borne to bed as a corpse were borne in bier? And in good faith, in my mind much wrong is there done

391 See Ps 118(119):37. 392 potbellied 393 Wis 9:15 394 drum 395 noll totty: head tipsy 396 belch, vomit 397 See

Til C901 — to the effect that a drunken woman has no porter to protect her.
398 kinds of 399 recounts 400 Ex

32:6 401 Jb 1:4-5 402 vexatious, troublesome 403 believes 404 channel, gutter

him that any man presumeth to take him up, and that he is not suffered<sup>405</sup> to take his ease all night at his pleasure in the king's highway, that is free for every man.

5 Wonder it is that the world is so mad that we had liefer<sup>406</sup> take sin with pain than virtue with pleasure. For, as I said in the beginning and often shall I say, virtue bringeth his pleasure, and vice is not without pain. And yet speak I not of the world to come, but 10 of the life present. If virtue were all painful, and vice all pleasant, yet since death shall shortly finish both the pain of the one and the pleasure of the other, great madness were it if we would not rather take a short pain for the winning of everlasting pleasure 15 than a short pleasure for the winning of everlasting pain. But now, if it be true, as it is indeed, that our sin is painful and our virtue pleasant, how much is it then a more madness to take sinful pain in this world, that shall win us eternal pain in hell, rather 20 than pleasant virtue in this world, that shall win us eternal pleasure in heaven?

If thou ween<sup>407</sup> that I teach thee wrong, when I say that in virtue is pleasure and in sin is pain, I might prove it by many plain texts of Holy Scrip-
25 ture, as by the words of the psalmist, where he saith, "I have had as great pleasure in the way of thy testimonies as in all manner of riches."<sup>408</sup> And Solomon saith of virtue thus: "Her ways are all full of pleasure, and her paths are peaceable."<sup>409</sup> And further he saith, "The way of the wicked is as it were 30 hedged with thorns; but the way of the righteous is without stumbling."<sup>410</sup> "And we be wearied," shall the wretches say, "in the way of wickedness; we have walked in hard and cumbrous ways,"<sup>411</sup> and the wise man saith, "The way of the sinners is set or laid with stones, but in the end is hell darkness and pains."<sup>412</sup>

But to tell us worldly wretches the words of Holy Writ is but a dull proof. For our beastly taste savoreth not the sweetness of heavenly things. And as 40 for experience, we can none get of the one part: that is to wit,<sup>413</sup> the pleasure that is in virtue. The other part we cannot perceive for bitter, for<sup>414</sup> the corruption of our custom, whereby sour seemeth us sweet. But yet if we would consider our sin well, with the dependents thereupon, we should not fail to per-45 ceive the painful bitterness of our wallow<sup>415</sup> sweet sin. For no man is so mad that will reckon that thing for pleasant that hath with little pleasure much pain. For so might we call a man of India white, because of his white teeth. Now if thou shouldst, 50 for a little itch, claw thyself suddenly deep into the flesh, thou wouldst not call thy clawing pleasant, though it liked<sup>416</sup> thee a little in the beginning. But so is it that for the little itching pleasure of sin, we claw ourselves suddenly to the hard bones, and win 55 thereby not a little pain, but an intolerable torment. Which thing I might prove beginning at pride in every kind of sin, saving that the digression would be overlong. For the abridging whereof, let us consider it but in the selfsame sin that we have in hand. 60

The pleasure that the glutton hath in his viand<sup>417</sup> can be no longer any very pleasure than while it is joined with hunger—that is to say, with pain. For the very pleasure of eating is but the diminishing of his pain in hungering. Now all that ever is eaten after, in which gluttony beginneth, is in effect pain altogether. And then the head acheth, and the stomach gnaweth, and the next meal is eaten without appetite, with gorge upon gorge and grief upon grief, till the gorbelly<sup>418</sup> be compelled to cast up all again, and then fall to a rere-supper.<sup>419</sup> 70

If God would never punish gluttony, yet bringeth it punishment enough with itself: it disfigureth the face, discoloreth the skin, and disfashioneth the body; it maketh the skin tawny, the body fat 75 and fobby, the face drowsy, the nose dripping, the mouth spitting, the eyes bleared, the teeth rotten, the breath stinking, the hands trembling, the head hanging, and the feet tottering, and finally no part left in right course and frame. And besides the daily dullness and grief that the unwieldy body feeleth by the stuffing of his paunch so full, it bringeth in by leisure the dropsy, the colic, the stone,<sup>420</sup> the strangury,<sup>421</sup> the gout, the cramp, the palsy, the pox, the pestilence, and the apoplexy, diseases and sickness of 85 such kind that either shortly destroy us, or else, that worse is, keep us in such pain and torment that the longer we live the more wretched we be.

Howbeit, very long lasteth no man with the surfeits of gluttony. For undoubtedly nature, which is 90 sustained with right little (as well appeared by the old fathers that so many years lived in desert with herbs only and roots) is very sore<sup>422</sup> oppressed, and in manner overwhelmed, with the great weight and burden of much and diverse viands, and so much laboreth to master the meat,<sup>423</sup> and to divide and 5 sunderly<sup>424</sup> to send it into all parts of the body, and there to turn it into the like, and retain it, that she is by the force and great resistance of so much meat as she hath to work upon (of which every part laboreth to conserve and keep his own nature and kind such 10 as it is) forwearied and overcome, and giveth it over, except<sup>425</sup> it be helped by some outward aid. And this driveth us of necessity to have so much recourse to medicines, to pills, potions, plasters, clysters,<sup>426</sup> and suppositories, and yet all too little—our gluttony 15 is so great and therewith so diverse that, while one meat digesteth, another lieth and putrefieth.

405 permitted 406 had liefer: would rather 407 believe 408 Ps 118(119):14 409 Prv 3:17 410 Prv 15:19 411 Wis 5:7 412 Eccl 21:11 413 say 414 due to

415 sickly 416 was pleasant to 417 provisions of food, victuals 418 pot belly 419 a lavish meal taken late at night in addition to the usual evening meal

420 kidney stone 421 a disease of the urinary organs

And ever we desire to have some help to keep the body in health. But when we be counseled to live temperately, and forbear our delicacies and our 20 gluttony, that will we not hear of, but fain<sup>427</sup> would we have some medicines, as purgations and vomits, to pull down and avoid that we cram in too much. And in this we fare (as the great moral philosopher Plutarch saith) like a lewd<sup>428</sup> master of a ship that
 25 goeth not about to see the ship tight and sure, but letteth by his lewdness his ship fall on a leak, and then careth not yet to stop the chinks, but set more men to the pump rather with much travail and great peril to draw it dry, than with little labor and great
 30 surety to keep it dry. “Thus fare we,” saith Plutarch, “that through intemperate living drive ourselves in sickness, and botch<sup>429</sup> us up with physic,<sup>430</sup> where we might with sober diet and temperance have less need of and keep ourselves in health.”<sup>431</sup>

If we see men die some dear<sup>432</sup> year by famine, we thereof make a great matter—we fall to procession, we pray for plenty, and reckon the world at an end. But whereas yearly there dieth in good years great 40 people of gluttony, thereof we take none heed at all, but rather impute the blame to the sickness whereof they die than to the gluttony whereof the sickness cometh.

And if there be a man slain of a stroke,<sup>433</sup> there is, as reason is, much speech made thereof, the coroner 45 sitteth, the quest<sup>434</sup> is charged, the verdict given, the felony found, the doer indicted, the process sued, the felon arraigned, and dieth for the deed. And yet if men would ensearch how many be slain with weapon, and how many eat and drink themselves to 50 death, there should be found (as Solomon saith)<sup>435</sup> more dead of the cup and the kitchen, than of the dent of sword, and thereof is no words made at all.

Now if a man willingly kill himself with a knife, the world wondereth thereupon, and, as well worthy is, he is indicted of his own death, his goods
 55 forfeited and his corpse cast out on a dunghill, his body never buried in Christian burial. These gluttons daily kill themselves<sup>436</sup> their own hands, and no man findeth fault, but carrieth his carrion corpse into the choir, and with much solemn service burieth the body boldly at the high altar, when they have all their life (as the Apostle saith)<sup>437</sup> made their belly their god, and liked to know none other, abusing not only the name of Christian men, preferring 60 their belly-joy before all the joys of heaven, but also abusing the part and office of a natural man and reasonable creature. For whereas nature and reason showeth us that we should eat but for to live, these gluttons are so glutted in the beastly pleasure of their taste that they would not wish to live and<sup>438</sup>
 70 it were not for to eat.

But surely wisdom were it for these gluttons well and effectually to consider that, as Saint Paul saith, “the meat for the belly and the belly to the meat, but God shall destroy both the meat and the belly.”<sup>439</sup>
 75

Now should they remember and think upon the painful time of death, in which the hands shall not be able to feed the mouth, and the mouth that was 80 wont<sup>440</sup> to pour in by the pottle<sup>441</sup> and cram in the flesh by the handfuls, shall scant be able to take in three drops with a spoon, and yet spew it out again.

Often have they had a sick drunken head, and slept themselves sober. But then shall they feel a swimming and aching in their drunken head, when the dazing of death shall keep all sweet sleep out of 85 their watery eyes. Often have they fallen in the mire, and thence borne to bed; but now shall they fall in the bed, and from thence laid and left in the mire till Gabriel blow them up.<sup>442</sup>

Whereas these considerations much ought to 90 move any man, yet specially should it so much the more move those gluttons, in how much that

422 grievously 423 food 424 separately
 425 unless 426 enemas 427 gladly 428 wicked 429 mend clumsily
 430 medicine 431 Plutarch, De tuenda

bona sanitate, Moralia 127c–d 432 lean, scarce 433 blow 434 inquest 435 a reworking of Ecc 37:33–34 436 by 437 Phil 3:18–19 438 if 439 1 Cor 6:13

440 used to, accustomed to 441 tankard
 442 blow them up: blow his horn. See Til G1; Whit G2.

they may well wit<sup>443</sup> that their manner of living must needs accelerate this dreadful day, and draw it shortly to them, albeit that by course of nature it might seem many years off. Which thing if these 5 intemperate would well and advisedly remember, I would ween verily, it would not fail to make them more moderate in their living, and utterly flee such outrageous riot and pestilent excess.

OF SLOTH

10 Of the mortal sin of sloth men make a small matter. Sloth is a sin so common, and no notable act therein that is accounted for heinous and abominable in the estimation of the world, as is in theft, manslaughter, false forswearing,<sup>444</sup> or treason, with any of 15 which every man would be loath to be defamed, for the worldly perils that do depend thereupon, that therefore of sloth there is no man ashamed, but we take it as for a laughing matter and a sport.

But surely, since it is a great capital sin indeed, the less that we set thereby, the more perilous it is: for 20 the less we go about to amend it.

Now to the intent that we do not deadly deceive ourselves, it is necessary that we consider well the weight. Which if we do, we shall find it far greater than we would before have weened.<sup>445</sup>
 25

There are, ye wot<sup>446</sup> well, two points requisite unto salvation: that is to wit, the declining or going aside from evil, and the doing of good. Now 30 whereas in the first part there are all the other six to be eschewed—that is to wit, pride, envy, wrath, gluttony, covetousness, and lechery—the other part, that is, the one half of our way to heaven, even sloth alone is able to destroy.

Sir Thomas More wrote no farther of this work.

A Response to Luther

In July 1521, King Henry published his In Defense of the Seven Sacraments arguing against Martin Luther's Babylonian Captivity of the Church (1520). Later in 1521, Pope Leo X awarded King Henry the title "Defender of the Faith." When Luther published in late 1522 his Contra Henricum Regem Angliae, a book marked by "extraordinary violence and vulgarity" and "abusive derision" (CW 5: 724, 725), King Henry and the Royal Council asked both Thomas More and Bishop John Fisher to respond.

More did so immediately, creating the persona of an emotional and blunt Spanish student named Ferdinand Baravellus, and placing him in a Spanish and international setting. King Henry apparently decided to delay publication, however, possibly for diplomatic reasons, or to allow Bishop Fisher to respond, or to wait for Erasmus's collaboration (which Erasmus promised in September 1523), or in the hopes that Luther would recant. This delay allowed More to revise his approach, and he changed his persona and setting to English ones, with William Ross as an earthy, blunt, and easily angered lawyer, loyal to King Henry and to the Church, outraged by Luther's disrespect for both. More's caustic, occasionally shocking wit in the Response may surprise contemporary readers, but More was directed to respond "in kind" to Luther's rhetoric in Contra Henricum, and the polemical manners of the age were rather different from our own.

More's method throughout the Response to Luther is to cross-examine Luther's own words rigorously, hence the inclusion of passages from Luther, and the general rhythm of quotation and critique across the work. As John Headley argues, More's method manifests his confidence in "the rationality of man," and the book's structure appeals throughout to "right reason" and the reader's own judgment of the theological controversies exploding across the European stage (CW 5.2: 808–9). More will continue to employ this method throughout his later controversial writings, including Dialogue of Sir Thomas More, Knight; The Confutation of Tyndale; and The Apology.

More's Response is both polemical and apologetic in character: polemic "in that he is defending the King by revealing what he claims to be the lies and inconsistencies of his opponent"; apologetic "in that, by defending the sacraments as presented in the King's Assertio, he moves toward a broader defense of the whole Christian order" (CW 5.2: 806). Regarding More's handling of Luther's writings, Headley observes that while there are a small number of inaccuracies in More's quotations, "More's record here is truly impressive," a reflection of scholastic and humanistic practice and culture, and his legal experience as well (810, 812). As More explains later in his Apology, he is "loath . . . to misrehearse any man's reason against whom I write, or to rehearse him slenderly."

More's Response addresses the theological controversies he will return to throughout much of the rest of his working life. After critiquing Luther's authorship and character, particularly his questionable motivations and alleged inconsistencies, More addresses many subjects, including the nature of the Church, the relation of Scripture and tradition, human liberty, law, and the sacraments, especially the Eucharist, holy orders, and matrimony.

As he states in the peroration, More presents his major concern as revealing the "insane" teachings that threaten the "peace" and "harmony" of the world—a concern that Erasmus came to share over time. Though initially sympathetic to Luther's desire for reform, Erasmus concluded by 1526 that Luther's fiery approach had "almost shattered the whole world." At More's encouragement, Erasmus published Hyperaspistes (The Shield-Bearer) in two parts (1526–27) as a rebuttal to The Enslaved Will (1525), which was Luther's response to Erasmus's Discourse concerning Free Will (1524).

What follows are excerpts from this 350-page Latin work. For the complete text and commentary, see CW 5. The full text is also available at www.essentialmore.org. More also addresses Luther and his positions in the "Letter to Bugenhagen," and in part four of the Dialogue of Sir Thomas More, Knight, both complete in this volume.

CONTENTS

These are More's headings for the chapters from pages 51–61, 271–321, 685–93 of CW 5: Responsio ad Lutherum.

Luther's mad intention and design are revealed. . . . .	505
A summary of the matter to be treated in the whole work. . . . .	506
He answers Luther's pretense of not believing that the King's book was written by the King himself, and at the same time he shows what distinguished authors the book of Luther has. . . . .	507
He censures the wicked folly of Luther, who is of the opinion that all laws should be repealed. . . . .	508
He shows that Luther does only one thing: destroy the very Scriptures for which he pretends to fight. . . . .	511
He declares that Luther, who boasts that the papists use a corrupt method of disputation by begging the initial premise, not only makes this objection falsely against others, but also uses this as his own peculiar and perpetual method of disputing. This whole chapter is delightful. . . . .	515
Lest it can seem that he makes up such absurd things as these about Luther through calumny, he recalls the very words of Luther and examines them carefully; from which it is clear that Luther both said and thought things in many ways still more absurd. . . . .	518
The peroration of the work, in which many points are handled piously, cleverly, and learnedly, as well as pleasantly. . . . .	521

A Response to Luther

The choice, learned, witty, pious work of the MOST LEARNED William Ross in which he very admirably exposes and refutes the frantic calumnies with which that most foul buffoon, Luther, attacks the invincible King of England and France, HENRY the Eighth of that name, the defender of the faith, renowned no less for his learning than for his royal power.

London 1523

Luther's mad intention and design are revealed.

[Luther] says<sup>1</sup> of all those who acknowledge the pope, that is, all the Italians, Spaniards, French, Germans, and all Christian people everywhere, all of whom he calls Cyclopes, that although they have been fighting so long with Luther alone, a Ulysses indeed of consummate shrewdness,<sup>2</sup> they have their eyes gouged out like Polyphemus so that, despite the many books he has published, they still cannot determine where he is heading. What a difficult matter! It would require, not an eyeless Cyclops, but some many-eyed Argos and Lynceus<sup>3</sup> to trace Luther's paths. It would perhaps be a difficult matter to trace the path of a snake over the ground, except that by its offensive odor breaking out wherever it turns and creeps along and by its loathsome corruption infecting the earth it betrays itself only too well. Neither, then, is any one of these Cyclopes so blind that he cannot detect the tricks and shifts of this fellow, with what a worthless subterfuge he prepares himself for flight from Aetna so that, having escaped from this island of the Cyclopes, as he calls them, he heads straight for hell. But from there no Tiresias<sup>4</sup> may lead him back.

They do not understand, he says. In vain have I published so many books plainly testifying that I seek only that the divine Scriptures should have sole rule, as is meet and just, but that human inventions and traditions should be abolished as most pernicious scandals, or with their poison cut out and their sting removed, that is, with their power of forcing and commanding and ensnaring consciences taken away, they should be tolerated freely as things neither good nor bad, just as with any other plague or misfortune of the world. These people, violently agitated by incessant madness, advance no argument against me but the decrees of men, the glosses of the fathers, and the practices or customs of the ages; in other words, those very things which I reject and impugn, which even they themselves admit are untrustworthy. I argue de iure; they answer me de facto. I seek a reason; they show me a work. I cannot yet understand why I am at war with them." <sup>2</sup> Earlier, in Utopia, Raphael Hythloday is compared to Ulysses. Erasmus presents Homer's portrayal of this Greek as "ingenious, astute, and wily" (Adages 1779, CWE 34: 81). <sup>3</sup> Argos was the many-eyed guardian of Io slain by Mercury (Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.625f), and Lynceus was one of the Argonauts famed for his sharp-sightedness (Horace, Epistle 1.1.28; Satires 1.2.90). <sup>4</sup> The blind seer of Thebes (Sophocles, Oedipus Tyrannus 408–62; Cicero, Tusculan disputations 5.115, De divinatione 2.19)

<sup>1</sup> From his hearing at Worms on April 18, 1521, Luther has just been quoted as saying: "With such blindness and madness has our Lord Jesus Christ stricken that whole realm of papist abomination that for three whole years now these innumerable crowds of Cyclopes fighting with Luther alone

ask: “By what power do you do this?” They answer: “Because this is the way we are doing it, and this is the way we have done it.” Let will take the place of reason, observance the place of authority, custom the place of law, and that in matters pertaining to God. These men have in their schools a most corrupt manner of disputing, which they call “begging the question.” This the wretched men learn and teach even to gray hairs, even to the grave, with extreme effort and expense.<sup>5</sup>

And of the King shortly after:

But this god, growing shockingly arrogant in his new divinity and certain that whatever he has said ought to happen or has happened, goes further and explicitly testifies that he wishes to dismiss my fundamental principle, leaving it for others to attack, and to overthrow only the superstructure; that is, to fight with straw and hay against the rock of God’s word. You would not know whether madness itself could be so mad or dullness itself so dull as is our blockhead Henry. Perhaps this is to verify the proverb: “Kings and fools are born — not made.”<sup>6</sup> What fool would say: “I declare that there are seven sacraments, but I shall leave untouched the principal argument of my opponent”? You would think this book were published by a noted enemy of the King to the King’s lasting disgrace.<sup>7</sup>

A summary of the matter to be treated in the whole work.

These very words of Luther, reader, on which he so excessively plumes himself, not only are absolutely false but contain almost as many errors as there are words. A little later when I come to what he calls his general response I will demonstrate this fact according to proofs taken from the King’s book, so that anyone may readily perceive it. Besides this, I will show not only that the scoundrel does away with all the traditions of men, even those which he ought to obey, but also that he does away with the traditions of God. And nevertheless not content with this, he attacks by means of every possible stratagem those very Scriptures of God for the sovereign authority of which he pretends to fight. In that passage I will make clear how foolishly he ridicules the Royal Majesty’s method of disputing, which consists of opposing to the authority of a single buffoon the authority of so many holy fathers, the custom of so many centuries and the public faith of the whole Church. At the same time I will also make clear that the faulty method of disputing by begging the question, which he attributes to others with so much insolence, is his own sole and almost only form of disputing. Moreover, I will show that he falls into this practice especially in the very passages in which he most fiercely reproaches and upbraids others for it. Then, at the point suited to the purpose, we shall winnow those words in which he boasts of himself so inordinately that he overwhelms his readers with darkness, and we shall scatter with the winnowing wind this chaff that he labors to sell for grain. This obviously witty and facetious fellow jeers at the King for explicitly testifying, when about to defend the sacraments, that he will leave Luther’s chief foundation for others to attack and that he himself will tear down only the superstructure built on that foundation. This will be touched on in the only passage which suits it, where Luther keeps repeating the same argument seasoned always with a similar salt; that is, where we will treat the argument that for Luther the Mass cannot be a good work, an oblation, or a sacrifice, because it is, as he says, a testament. There you will see, reader, that the witless witticisms of this man of such merry humor make sport of Luther alone. I set down as separate points these things that I now promise to do for you, so that you can require each of them from me in its own place. I put myself in your debt for them, so that if I do not discharge in this booklet all that I have promised I may be thought to have discharged nothing at all, content to have Luther chant over and over at me these words of Horace: “What will this braggart produce worthy of such pompous language?”<sup>8</sup>

He answers Luther's pretense of not believing that the King's book was written by the King himself, and at the same time he shows what distinguished authors the book of Luther has.

5 Meanwhile I shall briefly run through those incidental objections to Luther from which the wise man makes such efforts to extricate himself that in doing so he more and more implicates and involves himself. But first, the following.

10 He thought he would doubtless exasperate the King exceedingly if he pretended not to believe that the book published by the King was the King's own, but clearly Lee's,<sup>9</sup> or some phlegmatic sophist's, as he calls him—as if anyone were so phlegmatic, Luther, as not to prefer the phlegm of any 15 person whatever who is not completely raving to your raving bile.

This scoundrel is painfully tormented by the fact that the Royal Majesty's learning in almost all disciplines and especially in theology is too well known 20 and, in other lands besides Britain, too celebrated for the dolt to be able to persuade anyone that the most wise King wished to seek renown through another man's book at the expense of a frenzied friar-25 let. I think the King would rather consider it inglorious to contend with him than glorious to conquer him, especially in such a contest as, while it would always be intrinsically noteworthy, he yet knew would be rendered notorious by the folly of his op-
30 ponent. Nor, I think, would the Prince have written anything at all against such a buffoon except that for the honor of Christ he considered nothing a dishonor to himself; but just as for the honor of Christ's name he would not decline to fight against 35 the basest of infidels, if that were his fortune, so for the faith of Christ he deigned to fight with his pen against the most foolish of heretics. But I see what Luther wants: he wishes everyone to believe about the King's book what he is aware of with regard to 40 his own, and what everyone knows was done in his own book. For who does not know that this fellow's response was not the labor of any one man? What single head could ever have begotten such a great mass of follies? By heaven, frenzy itself would have 45 been exhausted from giving birth incessantly to so much crazy nonsense. But, as is quite well known, the lusts of many madly raving scoundrels have engendered this shapeless and monstrous offspring of Luther. As at their drinking bouts each one is ac-50 customed to pay his scot, so into this book, a farago of follies, each of the foolish triflers by common design contributed his own foolish expression. When Luther had received the King's book and had tasted some of it, the wholesome food began 55 to grow bitter to his perverted taste. Since he was not able to gulp it down, wishing then to get rid of its bitterness by tipping, he convoked an assembly of his fellow-tiplers. There, although he would have preferred the work to be hidden in ever-

60 lasting darkness, yet, because it could not be concealed, he reluctantly brought out the book, after strongly fortifying his spirit by draining his cups. Once the reading started, it began to grate on their 65 asinine ears with biting truth.<sup>10</sup> They therefore close the book, and then soon reopen it. Now they leaf through it to see if they may perhaps discover something which they can reasonably carp at. Nothing 70 occurs convenient to cavil. Now, as in situations of crisis, opinions are sought. The assembly began to be dejected, and things began to look desperate<sup>11</sup> for Luther, except that some Bitias<sup>12</sup> skillfully consoled him, saying: What difference did it make 75 to them what the King of England had written, or why did they have to consider honesty at all, since they had no purpose but to agitate a noisy rebellion and become famous as the ringleaders of a faction? Thus they would exact money from the seduction
80 of the simple and pleasure from the provocation of the more learned. Therefore, what did it hurt how truly the King writes or how shrewdly he refutes their heresies? Let Luther just reply and pursue his usual way: let him be quick to rail and mock. It 85 would be enough for them to impose on and dominate the simple folk. How few of these would either wish to reconsider the whole matter from the beginning or would be able to evaluate it, once re-
90 considered? So let him not be disheartened nor at any rate so foolish as to decide that the battle must be waged by reason; all that needed to be employed were reproaches and insults on every page, thicker
90 than winter snow, of which an inexhaustible stream

<sup>9</sup> Edward Lee (1482?–1544), whom Luther suspected to be the author of the King's book <sup>10</sup> it began . . . truth: Persius,

Saturae 1.107–8 <sup>11</sup> things . . . desperate: Terence, Phormio 4.4.4–5

<sup>12</sup> a distinguished drinker. See Vergil, Aeneid 1.738, 9.672, 11.396.

would gush forth from Luther's breast. With these weapons Luther would be safe; with them he could both strike and keep himself from being struck in return. The generous soul of the King would be indignant that such things were said against himself by such men; it would grieve the souls of all honorable men that the scoundrels were allowed to get away with so much unpunished. If anyone should write a stern and severe answer, the common people would condemn it, which would be enough for Luther. If, on the contrary, someone should determine to make a retort that fit Luther, he would act ridiculously; for, spoken against a man whose person is fouler than every kind of reproach, his words will have no effect. But neither would anyone be equal to Luther, who could take on single-handed ten of the most garrulous and brawling whores. And yet his potfellows themselves, each according to his ability, would not fail to help him, and thus the victory would easily be his.

On being given this advice, Luther began to recover his spirit, which had already almost escaped through the rear. But because he saw that he needed more than his usual brawling, since indeed he had not a single other weapon to employ in the disputation, he urged them each to hurry to the place where they could hunt out the greatest possible matter of stupid brawls and scurrilous scoffs. When each had collected a bagful of these, he should bring it immediately to Luther, for from them he would stuff full his own farrago of a response. With this charge he dismisses the assembly. They then go off in different directions, each to the place that his spirit suggests, and they scatter among all the carts, carriages, boats, baths, brothels, barber shops, taverns, whorehouses, mills, privies, and stews. There they diligently observe and set down in their notebooks whatever a coachman spoke ribaldly, or a servant insolently, or a porter lewdly, or a parasite jeeringly, or a whore wantonly, or a pimp indecently, or a bath-keeper filthily, or a shitter obscenely. After hunting for several months, then, finally, all that they had collected from any place whatever, railings, brawlings, scurrilous scoffs, wantonness, obscenities, dirt, filth, muck, shit, all this sewage they stuff into the most foul sewer of Luther's breast. All this he vomited up through that foul mouth into that railers' book of his, like devoured dung. From there, reader, you receive that accumulated mass of indecent brawlings, with which alone the utterly foolish book is filled. When he tries to say anything to the point, just remove that very ornate mosaic of scurrility; immediately you will see, reader, how slight a handful of substance remains from such a great heap of words, and yet even that is corrupted. That this may become clearer to you, come, let us examine, as I was about to do, those errors, briefly objected to in passing, which he volubly strives to disclaim. It will be fairly easy to infer how he behaves in attacking another since he so prettily defends himself. . . .

He censures the wicked folly of Luther, who is of the opinion that all laws should be repealed.

This extraordinary opinion, by which he would wish all human laws abolished, is like a kind of corollary of this heresy. Indeed, he already denies that any one of all those laws binds any Christian. For he writes thus in the Babylonian Captivity:

And so I say: neither pope, nor bishop, nor any man has the right to impose a single syllable on a Christian man, unless this is done by the latter's consent. Whatever is done otherwise, is done in a tyrannical spirit. Therefore, prayers, fasting, donations, and in short whatever the pope has ordained and demanded in the whole body of his decrees, as numerous as they are wicked, he has demanded and ordained with absolutely no right, and he sins against the liberty of the Church as often as he attempts to decree any of these things.<sup>13</sup>

This madness of the rascal the Prince touches on in the following words:

But I am amazed that the man has so little shame as to be able to think up such absurd things about laws; as if Christians could not sin, but that such a great multitude of believers were so perfect that nothing should be decreed, either for the worship of God or for the avoidance of crimes; but with the same stroke and with the same shrewdness he takes away all the power and authority of princes and prelates. For what should a king or a prelate do if he can neither establish any law nor execute it once it has been established; but the people without law drifts to and fro like a ship without a rudder. What then becomes of the Apostle's command: "Let every creature be subject to higher authorities"?<sup>14</sup> What about the text: "Obey your superiors, or the king as supreme,"<sup>15</sup> and what follows? Why then does Paul say: "The law is good"?<sup>16</sup> And elsewhere: "The law is the bond of perfection"?<sup>17</sup> Furthermore, why does Augustine say: "Not without reason have there been instituted the power of the king, the right of the judge, the executioner's instruments of torture, the arms of the soldier, the discipline of the ruler, and even the severity of a good father. All these things have their own bounds, their own causes, reasons, usefulness; and when these things are feared, the wicked are restrained, and the good live in quiet among the wicked"?<sup>18</sup>

But I forbear to speak of kings lest I seem to plead my own cause. I ask this: If no one, whether man or angel, can lay down a law for the Christian man, why does the Apostle lay down so many laws about electing bishops, and about widows, and about women's veiling their heads? Why does he decree that the believing wife should not leave an unbelieving husband, unless she be deserted by him? Why does he dare to say: "To the others I, not the Lord, say"?<sup>19</sup> Why did he exercise such great power as to order the fornicator to be delivered over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh? Why did Peter strike down Ananias and Saphira with a like punishment because they had kept back for themselves a little of their own money? If the apostles were used to decreeing many things besides the special precept of the Lord for the Christian people, why may not those who have succeeded to the position of the apostles do the same thing for the welfare of the people? Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, a holy man, and not at all arrogant, did not hesitate to command that throughout his diocese married couples should abstain from marital embraces during Lent; and is Luther indignant if the Roman pontiff, the successor of Peter, the vicar of Christ, to whom as to the chief of the apostles Christ is believed to have given the keys of the Church so that by him others might enter and be excluded, enjoins fasting and a few prayers? As for his persuading men that one must obey bodily but retain liberty of mind, who is so blind as not to see these tricks? Why does this simple and sanctimonious fellow carry both fire and water?<sup>20</sup> Why does he order us, as though in the words of the Apostle, not to become slaves of men, not to be subject to the decrees of men, and yet order us to obey the unjust tyranny of a pontiff? Does the Apostle preach in this manner: "Kings have no right over you; you should put up with their unjust rule. Masters have no right over you; you should put up with their unjust slavery"? If Luther does not think the people should obey, why does he say that they must obey? If he thinks they should obey, why does he not himself obey? Why does the slippery fellow trifle with such tricks? Why does he rise up with abusive language against a pontiff who he says must be obeyed? Why does he stir up a tumult? Why does he arouse the people against one whose very tyranny, as he calls it, must by his own admission be endured? Indeed, it is for no other reason, I think, than to procure for himself the favor of such wicked men as would desire impunity for their crimes and who would appoint as their chief him who already struggles for their liberty, and who would divide the Church of Christ, founded for so long upon a firm rock, and would erect a new church gathered together from wicked and criminal men, against which the prophet exclaimed: "I have hated the church of the wicked and I will not sit down with the impious."<sup>21</sup>

What does he answer to this? Exactly what he could; that is, absolutely nothing. What excuse can be given or contrived for an opinion so absurd? And yet this utterly stupid fellow is not ashamed to declare it so often with such great arrogance, as if to think otherwise would be a crime. But he thought he had brilliantly handled this very silly opinion when he replied at Worms that the law of the Gospel alone would ultimately be sufficient and human laws useless if magistrates were good and the faith truly preached. As if even the best magistrates could manage either that the whole Christian people would want to live in common or that the wicked

<sup>14</sup> Rom 13:1 <sup>15</sup> Heb 13:1; Pt 2:13

<sup>16</sup> 1 Tm 1:8 <sup>17</sup> Col 3:15 <sup>18</sup> Augustine, Epistle 153,6.16 <sup>19</sup> See 1 Cor 7:12–15.

<sup>20</sup> carry... water: Erasmus's Adages 3374 (CWE 36: 110–11) <sup>21</sup> Ps 25(26):5; Jer

15:17; King Henry VIII, Assertio septem sacramentorum (1523), sigs. K<sub>1</sub>–K<sub>2</sub>

would not want to steal or that any preaching of the faith could procure that no one anywhere would be wicked. If the law of the Gospel does not permit stealing, surely the human law which punishes stealing is not useless; and the human law which alone apportions ownership of goods binds Christians; if this ownership is done away with, there cannot indeed be stealing. But if he should say that from this premise the argument is drawn that we would do better to be without that law from which the ownership of goods arises and would do better to live in a certain natural community with the occasion of stealing eliminated, it does not help his case even if someone should grant him this argument. For even if we could live in common with far fewer laws, we still could not live altogether without laws. For the obligation to work would have to be prescribed for certain classes, and laws would be needed to restrain crimes which would run riot even in that kind of life. But now if, with the faith preached most truly as the apostles used to preach it most truly, with, moreover, the best rulers everywhere put in charge of the Christian people, the ownership of property could yet remain, and many wicked men would remain, he cannot deny that the human law binds Christians so that no one might steal what the law has apportioned to another, nor would the law be useless in punishing anyone who committed theft.

As for his statement in the Babylon that good and prudent magistrates will govern their charge better by the leading of nature than by laws,<sup>22</sup> who does not see how absurd this is? Will the good magistrate be less just in establishing law than in conducting a court of justice, in which many things can occur which may destroy the innocent? To say nothing meantime of the fact that hardly any judgment is rendered justly which is not rendered according to some established law. For the law of the Gospel does not apportion possessions, nor does reason alone prescribe the forms of determining property, unless reason is attended by an agreement, and this a public agreement in the common form of mutual commerce, which agreement, either taking root in usage or expressed in writing, is public law. Therefore, if you take away the laws and leave everything free to the magistrates, either they will command nothing and they will forbid nothing, and then magistrates will be useless; or they will rule by the leading of their own nature and imperiously prosecute anything they please, and then the people will in no way be freer, but, by reason of a condition of servitude, worse, when they will have to obey, not fixed and definite laws, but indefinite whims changing from day to day. And this is bound to happen even under the best magistrates, whom, although they may enjoin the best laws, nevertheless the people will oppose and murmur against as suspect, as though they govern everything, not according to what is just and fair, but according to caprice. But now, since Luther himself admits that no magistrates can be found anywhere who are not men; that is, of whom it is not very certain either to the citizens or to themselves what sort of men they will be within three days, how shrewdly does this wise man advise that laws be omitted and that all things be permitted to the magistrates, as though the people would thus live in liberty!

Now I ask you, what sort of statement is this which he makes: "Neither pope, nor bishop, nor any man has the right to impose a single syllable on a Christian man without the latter's consent"<sup>23</sup> I say nothing for the time being about the pope and about those to whom God has given power to impose many syllables by which they may direct the people in the worship of God; let us consider civil laws. If no one has the power to establish a single syllable for the Christian man without his consent, then neither the king nor the whole people can establish any law which is valid against anyone who opposed it at the time it was proposed. Happy, therefore, are thieves and murderers, who will never be so insane as to agree on a law according to which they will pay penalties. Indeed, this farsighted father does not see that according to this reasoning, should everyone unanimously agree, yet the law can have force only until a new citizen is born or someone is enrolled as a citizen. But the fellow thinks that preaching the faith truly is nothing else than preaching it as he himself has often preached it already; namely, that faith alone suffices not only without good works but even with crimes of any kind, which, so he says, can in no way damn any Christian, if only his faith stays firm or returns; that is, of course, if even while he is committing the crime he yet believes that it cannot harm him because of his faith in the promise of God; or, if he has believed this less firmly while committing the crime and so because of his infirm faith has committed the crime more timidly, let his faith at least return once the crime is carried through; let him not be sorry that he has committed it and torture himself by useless contrition. Surely, if the people had faith in the preaching of this Lutheran faith, they would very soon say truly that no laws obliged anyone, but the people without law would rush forth into every kind of crime.

<sup>22</sup> good... laws: See WA 6: 554: 22-32. <sup>23</sup> Neither... consent: See WA 6: 534: 7-9.

Now you see, reader, how shrewdly the sagacious fellow strives to remove all human laws and with how much profit for the Christian people. You see, likewise, with how much reasoning, with what testimonies of Scripture he has propped up his decree in opposition to the judgment of all learned men, in opposition to the judgment of all good men, in opposition to the public agreement of the whole world. You see how in that matter, in which hardly any reason could be strong enough, this sagacious fellow brings forward no reason at all, no scriptural testimony; rather, he, who falsely imputes to others that they demand credence for themselves alone, himself demands credence for himself alone against the whole world, against clear reasons, against the testimonies of Sacred Scriptures, and this to the utter and inescapable destruction of all peoples. And this in human laws which truly are the traditions of men. For those items which are listed in his catalogue as traditions of men and are therefore, so he judges, to be tolerated like some pests or altogether abolished as most harmful stumbling blocks, have long ago been proved to be the traditions of God, partly contained in the Scriptures themselves, partly handed on by the living word of God. And this has been proved by reason, by the Scriptures, and by what is the strongest argument against Luther, the admission of Luther himself. Unless he either denies again his admission that the Church has from God the power to distinguish the words of God from the words of men,<sup>24</sup> or brings forward another catholic Church by whose teaching he has known the Gospel, or proves to us that the Church has learned nothing without the Scriptures, despite the evangelist's statement: "Not all things have been written in this book";<sup>25</sup> and likewise the Apostle's words: "Hold on to what I have commanded you, whether by word of mouth or by letters";<sup>26</sup> likewise what was recalled by the same apostle: "I will give my laws into their hearts and in their minds I will write them";<sup>27</sup> and likewise those words of Christ: "The Spirit, the Paraclete, when he shall have come, will lead you into all truth";<sup>28</sup> or unless Luther proves to us that for so many ages in the times of the holy fathers Christ abandoned his Church, and that the faith failed immediately after the apostles, contrary to the text which says: "Christ prayed that the faith of the Church would not fail,"<sup>29</sup> and as though truth itself were a liar like Luther when he said he would be with the Church even to the consummation of the world; unless Luther overthrows for us all the objections which the Prince has brought up against him, all of which he so far conceals and dissimulates for no other reason than that he is aware that he has nothing at all to answer to any of all those arguments; unless, I say, Luther clearly does all these things, then I have made most clear to you, reader—rather, I have clearly shown you that the King has done so—that which I initially promised to show you: that this fellow not only abolishes the traditions of men, even those which he ought to obey, but that he abolishes even the traditions of God, which the filthy mouth of this utterly insane rascal with insolent blasphemy calls plagues and most harmful stumbling blocks.

*He shows that Luther does only one thing:
destroy the very Scriptures for which he pretends to fight.*

Now let us see whether he does not by every trick possible attack the very Sacred Scripture for which he pretends to fight. In the first place, to say nothing of how he everywhere very wickedly, everywhere stupidly twists the Scriptures to the defense of destructive teachings, what can more thoroughly or more clearly destroy the whole force and fruit of all the Scriptures than the fact that this fellow strives hand and foot so that no one will believe any learned men at all concerning the interpretation of Scripture; so that no one will believe any of the holy fathers at all, or all men taken together at all; not believe the whole Church at all, though it has been of one mind from the very origins of the Church until this day; but that each one will oppose his own interpretation to everyone? What fruit will the Scriptures bring forth if anyone whatever claims such authority for himself that in understanding them he relies on his own interpretation in opposition to that of every-5 all not to measure the Scriptures according to feeling and fancy? Here he clearly opens the window<sup>30</sup> by which the people may plunge into perdition.

Tell me, Luther, by your madness, if you had lived during that tempest in which the Church was 10 thrown into turmoil by Arian storms, would you have urged what you now urge: that anyone of the common people who pleased might consider himself qualified to judge concerning that controversy, and that each one might rely on himself in under-
 15 standing the Scriptures which he read, and that he might make light of the judgment of the holy fathers who were present at the council sessions in which the heresies were condemned, so that, although you admit that Christ is present wherever 20 two or three are gathered together in his name,<sup>31</sup> you deny that he was present where there were gathered together in that same name six hundred men, and those from every part of the Christian people?

But who is so blind as not to see that in this 25 matter you have no other intention than that, after abolishing completely the authority of public agreement, you may be able to stir up a tumult from the heedless disagreement of private individuals, in which case you may find some men foolish
 30 enough to think themselves free to rely with impunity on you, a single scoundrel, in opposition to the faith of everyone else? Lest the authority of Scripture might have any force against you, you work so that each person will drag into doubt the meaning 35 of the sacred writings and defend his own fancy not only against the judgment of all the holy fathers, against the universal judgment of the whole Church, but even against the judgment of blessed Paul the apostle.

Perhaps, reader, you understand this to mean that 40 Luther is showing boldness in not acknowledging Paul's judgment and in saying: In this or that passage Paul does not mean what the Church believes he means. No, the case is far otherwise, reader, although not even that is to be endured; but this fel-45 low does not fear, when Paul teaches that some text or other from Sacred Scripture refers to Christ, he does not fear, I say, to draw into doubt once more and to render questionable the judgment of the Apostle 50 and to say: Perhaps Paul did not say that from God, but from his own understanding. So then, you rascal, recognize the sacrilegious words with which in the Babylonian Captivity you, truly a captive in the service of demons, pervert the Scriptures and blas-

 55 pheme the Apostle. For thus you blather:

Paul, in Ephesians 5, either forcibly applies to Christ on his own initiative those words on marriage quoted from Genesis 2, or else, according to the commonly held opinion, he teaches that the spiritual marriage of Christ is taught in that 60 passage.<sup>32</sup>

O Satan, Satan, how much more honestly even you treat the Scripture than does your disciple Luther! For, although you tried to misuse one text through trickery, yet you applied to Christ those 65 words of Scripture which pertained to him. "It is written of you," you said, "God has given his angels command concerning you."<sup>33</sup> "But Luther not only does not apply to Christ the scriptural text which pertains to Christ, but he even belittles, so far as he 70 can, the trustworthiness of the Apostle's application of the text. Exult, Satan; you have the kind of disciple who makes even the word of Christ doubtful. For, although Christ says, "No disciple is above his teacher, but it is enough for him if he be like his 75 teacher,"<sup>34</sup> it is not enough for your disciple Luther if he be a liar and a schemer such as you are, Satan, but he strives to surpass you by far. And so, when he tries first of all to disparage the authority of the sacrament according to the interpretation he wants 80 accepted: that if that passage of Genesis<sup>35</sup> did pertain in any way to Christ and the Church, it would not, at any event, pertain to him except superficially, as if by some commonly held opinion, lest it be thought to pertain properly to that point; yet, con-
 85 scious that Paul cannot be so understood since he exalts the greatness of that sacrament so explicitly in so many ways on the authority of that passage of Genesis about the union of Adam with Eve, a passage applied so properly, so truly, to the marriage 90 of Christ with the Church, what does the scoundrel do? Why, something more pestilential than

<sup>30</sup> opens the window: See Terence, Heauton Timorumenos 3.481, and Erasmus, Adages

<sup>31</sup> wherever . . . name: See Mt 18:30. <sup>32</sup> WA 6: 552: 19–21;

Eph 5:31–32; Gn 2:24 <sup>33</sup> Ps 90(91):11
<sup>34</sup> Mt 10:24–25 <sup>35</sup> Gn 2:23–24

anything he could have devised for destroying the force of all the Scriptures. Paul, he says, forcibly applies that passage to Christ, possibly on his own initiative. O scoundrel, scoundrel, you suggest a scruple, as if the Apostle would interpret the Scriptures, not according to the spirit of God, but according to his own — that is, a human — spirit, which you so often call deceptive; nor does he only interpret but he even “forcibly applies” them, as if he seizes them by the neck and twists them resisting into a different meaning.<sup>36</sup>

Is this your deference for the Scriptures, you who boast that you believe nothing but the Scriptures? You who accept nothing else but the Scriptures, do you accept the Scriptures in such a way that you do not believe even the apostles concerning the meaning of the Scriptures, although the apostles learned the meaning of the Scriptures from the Lord? But, you say, they speak some things from Christ, some things from their own head, and the former must necessarily be believed, the latter can be doubted. Let your friarity, Reverend Friar, give us, then, a rule by which we may distinguish those passages in Scripture which the apostles interpret according to God’s meaning from those which they forcibly apply and twist according to their own personal judgment. I hear, honored doctor, that you give us such a rule: that the interpretation of the apostles and evangelists on the sacred writings must stand firm wherever they add to their interpretations, “Thus says the Lord”; but, as to the other things which they say, that they themselves speak them, or rather they forcibly apply or twist the Scriptures where they please according to their own personal, that is a human, judgment. Nor should they be believed in such cases because all men are liars, as you have earlier blathered in that madly raving book of yours in regard to Jeremiah, Isaiah, Elias, and John the Baptist.<sup>37</sup> A single scoundrel, therefore, renders questionable all the passages which the evangelists so often cite from the prophets or from any passage of Scripture whatever, all those which the apostles so often bring forward in support of Christ, and he opens the way for everyone to say that these passages were not predictions about Christ but that the evangelists and the apostles have on their own judgment forcibly applied to Christ what the prophets have written about other persons. What is this, reader, if it is not openly to attack the Scriptures?

But come, though; let this, if you will, be nothing; I grant you, Luther, who are so wicked that hardly any vice is a vice to you, I grant you, I say, that it is a trifling matter to contemn all the holy doctors. I grant that it is not a proof of a mind hostile to the Scriptures that you strive and struggle to render all the interpretations of the apostles suspect. This at least not a single person will be too stupid to sense: how openly, how directly your not hesitating impiously to attack an undoubtedly sacred text as profane aims at sweeping away all the Scriptures. Indeed, what is still more hateful: even if you have conceded that a text is canonical and written by the pen of an apostle, yet you dare to say that no faith should be placed in it and, setting your face against heaven,<sup>38</sup> you do not fear to blaspheme an apostle with your abusive tongue. And so, you scoundrel, recognize again the sacrilegious words with which, when you were hard pressed by the apostle James’s words on the sacrament of extreme unction,<sup>39</sup> you, as though engaged in hand-to-hand conflict with the apostle, empty out on an apostle of God, you most base buffoon, the privy of your filthy mouth.

I pass over (you say) the fact that many persons assert with great probability that this epistle is not by James and is not worthy of the apostolic spirit, although whosoever it is, it has acquired authority by custom. Nevertheless (you say) if it were by the apostle James, I would say that no apostle is permitted to institute a sacrament on his own authority; that is, to give a divine promise with a sign accompanying it. This belonged to Christ alone. Thus, Paul says that he received the sacrament of the Eucharist from the Lord and that he was sent not to baptize but to preach the Gospel. Nowhere in the Gospel, however, does one read of this sacrament of extreme unction.<sup>40</sup>

Reader, please reread what the Prince has written against these words. There you will immediately discover in how few words of Luther the Prince has discovered and refuted how many absurdities. For he shows that Luther unjustly censures the Church, that he impiously contradicts an apostle, and that he is also stupidly inconsistent with himself. And all three of these things in scarcely three lines, so that no man's wisdom has ever been so wonderful as this fellow's folly is bewildering. What will you say here, Luther? What burrow have you provided for yourself by which you can flee? Will you deny that whoever wrote that epistle is clearly describing a sacrament, and will you depart from your definition of a sacrament as such, which you wanted to consist of a sensible sign and a promise of grace clearly included in the sacred writings? Or will you deny, as you have done, that that epistle should be numbered among the sacred writings? But the same Church which numbers the Gospels among the sacred writings, the same Church, I say, numbers among the sacred writings this epistle. In this matter you are lying, whether the Church can be deceived or whether it cannot be deceived. If she can be deceived in discerning the words of God, you lie precisely in saying that she cannot be deceived on this score. If she cannot be deceived, you again lie in saying that this epistle, which the Church has approved as apostolic, is probably not apostolic. What remains then but that you should retract what you have said and instead deny once again that the Church can discern the words of God, and then you would be calling into doubt even the epistles of Paul and the Gospels? And you who contend that nothing is certain except the Sacred Scripture would then be rendering nothing more uncertain than Sacred Scripture itself.

<sup>36</sup> as if... meaning: Plautus, Poenulus 3,790; Erasmus, Adages 1019 (CWE 33: 27–28) <sup>37</sup> But, you say... Baptist: See WA

<sup>6</sup>: 552: 18–27 and 553: 18–20. <sup>38</sup> setting... See WA 10/2: 219: 12 and Rv 13: 5–6. <sup>39</sup> Jas 5:14 <sup>40</sup> WA 6: 568: 9–16

But still more dangerous is the fact that you even dared to contemn the epistle, if you have admitted that it is the apostle's; doubtless, I suppose, because the apostles are ours, not we theirs, according to that text which you cite as foolishly as you do frequently: "For all things are yours, whether Apollo, or Cephas, or Paul."<sup>41</sup> It does not behoove us, then, you will say, to be judged by them but to judge them. How then, Luther, do you say that you are doing this so that the Scriptures alone may be believed, since you do not admit as Scripture a clear scriptural text? But if you rejected no Scripture at all, nevertheless, since you care not a straw for all interpreters taken together, you return to the same spot since you believe nothing at all which is not manifest in evident scriptural texts. For what scriptural text will ever be sufficiently evident if one can,

as you are trying to do, cause the opinion of good men and of learned men to have no force against either the stupid interpretations of ignorant men or the crafty ones of wicked men? Who does not see that by this means it will come about that nothing at all can be proved from Sacred Scripture to a man so senseless that he either cannot or will not understand the sense of Scripture? Indeed, that nothing is so absurd, nothing is so impious but someone like you, a raging madman and a shameless fellow, can argue he proves it by the testimonies of Sacred Scripture. For example, if some scoundrel should deny that Christ descended into hell, he will boast that he admits nothing besides evident Scriptures, and he will deny that this teaching is proved by any sufficiently evident scriptural text. But if someone should cite that verse from the psalm, "My flesh shall rest in hope because you will not leave my soul in hell,"<sup>42</sup> he will cite in his turn whatever fabrication he chooses from the commentaries of the Jews, and he will deny that that text refers in any way to Christ. But if someone objects in turn that the apostle Peter declared that that psalm speaks of Christ,<sup>43</sup> the scoundrel will not hesitate to say of Peter what our scoundrel said of Paul; namely, that Peter forcibly applied that text to Christ on his own initiative. But if some other scoundrel wants good works not to be required for salvation, he will cite that text of the Gospel, "Whoever believes and is baptized shall be saved";<sup>44</sup> nothing else therefore should be required. Then, if someone should deny that this text is to be so understood and should cite the real meaning, together with the testimony of all the doctors, the fellow will scorn all the doctors and will stick to his own interpretation, bawling only that the scriptural text is evident. But if someone keeps bringing up to him some objection or other from Sacred Scripture, the scoundrel will not hesitate to escape immediately by means of some silly trick or other. For example, if someone brings up that text of James, "Faith without works is dead,"<sup>45</sup> the fellow will say the same thing as our rascal has said: that the epistle is not James's, that it is not any apostle's, that it has nothing worthy of the apostolic spirit.<sup>46</sup> Finally, should the epistle be proved to be an apostle's, the fellow will still say that the apostle does not speak correctly, that he has arrogated too much to himself in imposing the law of good works on Christians whom Christ has made free in faith alone from every yoke of good works. Nor should anyone but Christ alone be able to impose any law or any syllable of the law on any Christian. For the apostles did not have authority enough to judge us, but it is our right to judge them. “For all things are ours, whether Apollo, or Cephas, or Paul.”<sup>47</sup> For thus the fellow has been taught by Luther.

<sup>41</sup> 1 Cor 3:22 <sup>42</sup> Ps 15(16):9–10 <sup>43</sup> Acts 2:31 <sup>44</sup> Mk 16:16 <sup>45</sup> Jas 2:26 <sup>46</sup> epistle . . . spirit: See WA 6: 568: 9f.

If anyone therefore, passing over your disciple, should object to you once more, Luther: “The Church has judged this epistle to be the apostle’s, to have been written by the divine Spirit,” and should bring up to you your own words: “This power at least has been given by God to the Church, that she can distinguish the words of God from the words of men,”<sup>48</sup> then you will retract this statement immediately and will say that you have now weighed the matter more carefully, that the Church has no power from God but that the Church can be deceived in accepting Scripture. But if someone or other will add that therefore the Gospels themselves are uncertain, you will doubtless concede this also: that the true Gospels are probably not the Scriptures and Gospels which we read but rather some one of those which the Church has rejected. And concerning these matters, each one believes at his own risk.<sup>49</sup>

But if someone should at this point throw up to you your inconsistency, because you are so often at variance with yourself and disagree with your own self, here indeed with how many jeers, how many guffaws and snorts will that man be mocked who is so ignorant, so inexperienced in arguing that he does not know what it means for a man to disagree with himself, or considers capricious and unstable a person who is consistently inconsistent, or demands that a man’s words should be bound fast as a bull’s horns are bound fast so that if he has ever said anything worthwhile he should not be permitted later to retract it when it would be to his advantage and to turn it into something evil, even as he changes nothing for the better of those things which he has at any time said badly.

You see here clearly, reader, with what good faith this good man proclaims that he proclaims “The Gospel! The Gospel!” — as if anyone has ever been a heretic who did not proclaim the Gospel — while at the same time he devises for himself a way whereby he may raise a doubt as to whether the Gospel be the Gospel, and by false interpretations weakens the Scriptures which, he says, should alone reign, and gives everyone the license of daring the same thing. Whatever Scriptures he pleases he does not acknowledge as sacred; then, if the case presses him hard, he even contemns those which have been acknowledged; so that you cannot have any doubt that he himself has proved for us that which we initially promised we were ready to prove: that he does this only in order to destroy the very Scriptures for which he pretends to fight.

He declares that Luther, who boasts that the papists use a corrupt method of disputation by begging the initial premise, not only makes this objection falsely against others, but also uses this as his own peculiar and perpetual method of disputing. This whole chapter is delightful.

Come now, let us carefully examine that point in which Luther strangely delights and considers himself witty and skillful, when he makes sport of the catholic Church as papistic and thinks everyone in comparison with himself so ignorant that no one understands either what the point in question is or by what method the point ought to be proved. “There is,” he says, “among these very men a most corrupt method of disputing which they call ‘begging the initial premise.’<sup>50</sup> This they learn and teach even till grey hairs, even till the grave, with so much sweat, with so much waste, the utterly wretched men.”<sup>51</sup>

Let us see, then, reader, which of the two sides begs the initial premise more corruptly; for each side begs some initial premise. We beg of him four postulates.

First, we beg that Luther believe the sacred writings. We beg that he believe that some things were said, done, taught by God which are not contained in writing.

We beg that he believe that the Church has been given the power from God to distinguish the words of God from the words of men and the traditions of God from the traditions of men, with Christ clearly governing his Church constantly and the

<sup>47</sup> See WA 10/2: 194: 33–37 and 1 Cor 3: 22.

<sup>48</sup> See WA 6: 561: 3–4. <sup>49</sup> each . . . risk:

See Plautus, Poenulus 4.878.

<sup>50</sup> Aristotle, Prior Analytics 64b28–65a38

<sup>51</sup> WA 10/2: 182: 30–32

Holy Spirit always directing the agreement of the Church in matters of faith.

We beg finally that in a disputed interpretation of the sacred writings he believe the consistent judgment of the holy fathers and the faith of the whole catholic Church rather than his own opinion.

Although we consider these postulates no less evident to the Christian than the geometrical postulates of Euclid are to the philosopher, nevertheless this fellow postulates reasons for such postulates.

And so we have presented for the last postulate, besides several other reasons, the fact that it is easier and more probable that one man is deceived and out of his mind than that many are so, that a bad man misunderstands rather than good men, that a heretical man errs rather than the catholic Church.

The second last postulate we prove indeed by many and evident testimonies of Sacred Scripture, with many reasons besides, and finally by the confession of Luther himself.

Next, as to the postulate that some things have been said, done, taught by Christ which have not been written, besides other evident reasons, besides other passages of Scripture, we have proved this on the authority of Paul; we have proved it by the Gospel.

As for the first postulate, that the Sacred Scripture must be believed, we had hoped that Luther would not demand any proof at all for this, because he so often proclaims throughout all his books that he demands nothing else than that the Sacred Scripture alone should be believed.

Luther jeers at all these postulates of ours. He considers the last one to be utterly foolish: that anyone should beg him to believe the fathers and the Church rather than himself. Whereas the fathers, so he says, and the judgment of the Church are at times deceived, he himself cannot be deceived, because he is certain, so he says, that he has his teaching from heaven.<sup>52</sup>

The next to last postulate, however, although once granted by himself, he now nevertheless retracts altogether. For he thinks it ridiculous if anyone should think the Church is governed by the Holy Spirit in the faith, since the Turk would ridicule anyone begging such an initial premise. And so, the pious priest will rather be impious toward Christ than be ridiculous to the Turk.

The second postulate he clearly considers worthless, since whatever Christ has said, done or taught which has not been written Luther once and for all considers as of no importance, because—I suppose—if those points had been of importance, Luther did not think that Christ would have been so negligent as not to have taken care that they be included in Scripture.

Next, because of the authority of Scripture, he treats the first postulate ambiguously. For he often cites the Scriptures erroneously, and very often he twists them from a true meaning to a false one when he has no support for himself but his own words, and those almost always contrary to his own conscience. When the words of Scripture express conflicting ideas, the fathers give a consistent interpretation, and the whole Church through so many ages agrees; at such times we inexperienced Thomists beg the initial premise that he believe everyone taken as a whole rather than a single individual. But because this is begging an initial premise, we are repulsed with the ridicule of this fellow, shrewd and quite artful in arguing, and we are overwhelmed by waves of roaring laughter.

But if you present a text of Scripture which is so clear that there can be no question about its meaning, then, driven by necessity, he betrays himself and openly denies the scriptural text. If the situation requires, he says that the epistle of James is not apostolic, or even if it be an apostle's, still the apostle has arrogated too much to himself. And when once Luther has said this, if anyone again insist that Luther yield to the authority of the apostle, then that person will be mocked in a thousand ways as a man ignorant of disputing, one who is not ashamed to use the most corrupt form of disputing and to beg the initial premise; namely, that that be considered Scripture which Luther denies is Scripture, or that the apostle be believed to have written correctly, although Father Tossopot has said once and for all that he has erred. In this way, then, reader, we corruptly beg the initial premise.

Luther, on the contrary, is a little more modest, for he also has established an initial premise, but only one, which he demands to have granted to himself. It is, however, of this kind: that he alone must be believed on all matters.

This initial premise, as a matter known by nature,

<sup>52</sup> See WA 10/2: 184: 27.

he does not hesitate to beg everywhere; in fact, to assume as by his own right. Suppose there is a question about the meaning of a scriptural text; he first presents what he himself either thinks or at least pretends to think; you in turn present whatever has always been the judgment of all Christians; he drives everyone away like flies and begs that he be believed. He denies that human laws are useful; you in turn present whatever has always been the judgment of mortals; he jeers at the whole world and demands that he be believed. He denies the sacrament of extreme unction; you in turn present the apostle James; he contemns the apostle and demands that he be believed. Thus, almost everywhere he begs that this initial premise be granted him: that in all matters he alone be believed.

This postulate of his: although no one does not see that it is apparently very fair, nevertheless because we fear the snares and subtleties of this sophistical fellow, we will be prevailed upon reluctantly and with difficulty to grant him this postulate, especially because we are aware that on this initial premise and brilliant axiom of Luther rests the whole foundation of the marvelous Lutheran doctrine. Once this initial premise is granted, it is amazing to relate the sort and importance of the conclusions he will prove to you in such a way that you simply cannot deny them. But if you deny that axiom, he proves to you absolutely nothing. We therefore put off granting him so subtle and sophistical a premise, and we ask of him: "By what reason, Father, do you prove that you alone must be believed?"

To this he returns this cause: "Because I am certain," he says, "that I have my teachings from heaven."

Again we ask: "By what reason are you certain that you have your teachings from heaven?"

"Because God has seized me unawares," he says, "and carried me into the midst of these turmoils."<sup>53</sup>

Again therefore we demand: "How do you know that God has seized you?"

"Because I am certain," he says, "that my teaching is from God."

"How do you know that?"

"Because God has seized me."

"How do you know this?"

"Because I am certain."

"How are you certain?"

"Because I know."

"But how do you know?"

"Because I am certain."

I ask you, reader, whether that form of disputing does not find a place here, the form by means of which (unless Luther is lying) Amsdorf<sup>54</sup> lyingly says that the theologians of Leipzig<sup>55</sup> dispute, as follows: when the respondent has denied his opponent's assumed initial premise, the opponent proves the same premise as follows: "It must be so." When the former again denies it, then the latter says a second time, "And how can it be otherwise? It must be so."<sup>56</sup>

To this lie Luther has added, as one of his better sayings, the flourish: "Splendidly," he says, "and most Thomistically, or rather, most Leipzigly and most Henricianly."

Now, since the Reverend Father founds all his arguments on this initial premise: "I am certain because I know, and I know because I am certain, and I am certain because I cannot err, and I cannot err because I am certain, and I am certain because I know," may we not re-echo against the Reverend Father the flourish of the Reverend Father: "Splendidly and most Wittenbergly, or rather, most stupidly and most Lutheranly."

You see, then, reader, that in this passage I quote none of his statements in the way that he usually quotes all the statements from the King's book. He quotes nothing honestly, but he either distorts it badly or he cites from the book statements which are nowhere in the book; but while he is recounting them he is fashioning for himself monsters to conquer. But we, as a matter of fact, make clear that the Scriptures are thus presented by him, thus twisted from their own meaning, that this fellow thus prefers his own fancies to the judgments of all the saints, that he thus counts the whole Church as straw in comparison with himself, that he thus openly denies the Sacred Scripture and clearly contemns the acknowledged Scripture, that he thus establishes his own teachings without Scripture and contrary to Scripture, so that you cannot doubt that in very truth this fellow everywhere begs this single initial premise: that against everyone and everything he alone be believed on all matters.

<sup>53</sup> WA 10/2: 186: 31-32 <sup>54</sup> Nicholas von Amsdorf (1483-1565), Luther's trusted

friend and fellow worker <sup>55</sup> Jerome Emser (1478-1527) and George, Duke of Saxony (1500-1539) <sup>56</sup> See WA 10/2: 191: 10f.

Lest it can seem that he makes up such absurd things as these about Luther through calumny, he recalls the very words of Luther and examines them carefully; from which it is clear that Luther both said and thought things in many ways still more absurd.

Nevertheless, that you may not doubt that this inference was not drawn from ambiguous words of his but that it was proclaimed by himself in the clearest of words, consider carefully the very words of the rascal.

I am certain (he says) that I have my teachings from heaven, I who have triumphed even over him who has more strength and cunning in his little fingernail than do all the popes and kings and doctors.<sup>57</sup>

Likewise, shortly after:

The Lord has seized me unawares and carried me into the midst of these turmoils.<sup>58</sup>

And again:

Here I need have no reason for patience, when the trifling buffoon attacks with his lies, not me nor my life, but the very doctrine which I am most certain is not mine but Christ's.<sup>59</sup>

And when he has proved this simply by saying it, then by his own right the rascal rages wildly against the King, as if to reprove a heretic on behalf of the faith were in very truth to blaspheme God.

He would have to be forgiven if humanly he erred. Now, since he knowingly and consciously fabricates lies against the majesty of my King in heaven, this damnable rottenness and worm, I will have the right, on behalf of my King, to bespatter his English majesty with muck and shit and to trample underfoot that crown of his which blasphemes against Christ.<sup>60</sup>

Come, do not rage so violently,<sup>61</sup> good Father; but if you have raved wildly enough, listen now, you pimp. You recall that you falsely complained above that the King has shown no passage in your whole book, even as an example, in which he said that you contradict yourself. You told this lie shortly before, although the King has demonstrated to you many examples of your inconsistency. Suppose that the King here in turn asks of you why you have not produced even one passage as an example in which you say he blasphemes God. Your Paternity must by all means search out and produce this passage. But meanwhile, for as long as your Reverend Paternity will be determined to tell these shameless lies, others will be permitted, on behalf of his English Majesty, to throw back into your Paternity's shitty mouth, truly the shit-pool of all shit, all the muck and shit which your damnable rottenness has vomited up, and to empty out all the sewers and privies onto your crown divested of the dignity of the priestly crown, against which no less than against the kingly crown you have determined to play the buffoon.

In your sense of fairness, honest reader, you will forgive me that the utterly filthy words of this scoundrel have forced me to answer such things, for which I should have begged your leave. Now I consider truer than truth that saying: "He who touches pitch will be wholly defiled by it."<sup>62</sup> For I am ashamed even of this necessity, that while I clean out the fellow's shit-filled mouth I see my own fingers covered with shit. But who can endure such a scoundrel who shows himself possessed by a thousand vices and tormented by a legion of demons, and yet stupidly boasts thus: "The holy fathers have all erred. The whole Church has often erred. My teaching cannot err, because I am most certain that my teaching is not my own but Christ's," alluding of course to those words of Christ, "My words are not my own but his who sent me, the Father's"?<sup>63</sup> What about the following: "The pope shall fall; my teachings will stand firm"? Does it not seem to vie with that statement of Christ: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, not one iota of my words shall perish"?<sup>64</sup> For when he says, "The Lord has seized me unawares and carried me into the midst of these turmoils,"<sup>65</sup> this is more than, "The devil took him and placed him on a pinnacle of the temple."<sup>66</sup>

Then, how boastful is that statement: "I have

57 WA 10/2: 184: 27-29 58 WA 10/2: 186: 31-32 59 WA 10/2: 189: 1-3 60 WA 10/2:

184: 6-10 61 Terence, Andria 5.868 62 Ecclus 13:1 63 Jn 7:16 64 Mt 24:35

65 Mt 5:18 66 Mt 4:5-6

triumphed over him who has more strength and cunning in his little fingernail than do all the popes and kings and doctors"? How much more boastfully this fellow exults than did Christ, who said 5 of himself somewhat more modestly: "I have overcome the world";<sup>67</sup> and likewise: "The prince of this world comes and in me he has nothing"?<sup>68</sup> But what does this fellow say? "Therefore I have triumphed, not over the world, but far more sublimely, over the 10 prince of the world, the devil." Then he trumpets his triumph and tinsels it with pompous bombast: "I have triumphed,"<sup>69</sup> he says, "over him who has more strength and cunning in his little fingernail than do all popes and kings and doctors."

15 O swelling triumph! But whence have we learned this? What will he say to us here who proves everything by evident Scriptures? What else but the words of Christ (for he tries to vie with him): "I bear witness to myself"?<sup>70</sup> But if someone should 20 answer, "Your testimony is not true," he will have recourse immediately to his new Scripture: "I am certain that I have my teachings from heaven." And there he will stand firm on this initial premise of his as on a most firm foundation that not all the popes, 25 kings, doctors, men, angels will be able to destroy.

Certain, then, indeed most certain that he has his doctrines from heaven, as men who sleep are certain, indeed most certain that everything they dream is true; or rather certain, indeed most cer-
 30 tain that he lies with his eyes wide open<sup>71</sup> in saying that his teachings are from heaven, whereas his own conscience murmurs to him that they have been let loose in him by the deceits of demons; he curses any men and angels who contradict his teachings.
 35 And he protests that all those who do not fear to reproach his most filthy blasphemies set their face against heaven and besmirch sacred things and blaspheme God. His only cry is: "Let all be anathema who attack my teachings, because I am certain that 40 I have my teachings from heaven."

With this initial premise begged by the Reverend Father and granted by no one, he thus argues further, this reverend friar, Father Tossopot Luther, fugitive extraordinary of Saint Augustine, one of the 45 unskilled masters of Wittenberg, unformed ranter of both kinds of law, and unlearned doctor in sacred theology: "I am certain that I have my teachings from heaven; therefore my teachings are heavenly." And then further thus: "My teachings are heavenly; therefore whoever contradicts my teachings sets his 50 face against heaven and blasphemes God. Because, therefore, my teachings are indeed contradicted by the Pope, the Emperor, kings, bishops, priests, the laity, and in fine all good men, I will be permitted 55 on behalf of the majesty of my God, to anathematize the Pope, the Emperor, kings, bishops, priests, the laity, in fine all good men, to assail them with curses and insults, and against all their crowns and heads I will be permitted to spew out of my mouth 60 muck, filth, dung, shit."

These are the conclusions of the Reverend Father, deduced by necessity from this same father's initial premise, begged by him: that we should believe him to be certain that his teachings are from heaven.

But come, Reverend Father, suppose I carried out the deduction thus: "I am certain that the Reverend 65 Friar Father is an ass; therefore the Reverend Friar Father is an ass." If the reverend father should here grant me this antecedent premise, how many conclusions I may infer: he will undoubtedly have 70 to eat hay; he will have to bear burdens; and what is most galling, he will have to do without beer: Father Tossopot would be vexed to hear that. But rather than be forced to this conclusion, he would not hesitate to demand that I prove I am certain he is an 75 ass; otherwise, shameless as he is, he will not be ready to grant what everyone nevertheless sees to be evident. But I should not hesitate immediately to prove the antecedent in this way: "I am certain that 80 as no animal laughs but man, so no animal brays but an ass; but I am certain that the reverend friar, Father Tossopot, is some animal and that he brays most brayingly; therefore I am certain the reverend friar, Father Tossopot, is most truly an ass."

See, Reverend Father, I have proved my antecedent, nor would I have demanded that it be granted 85 me had I not proved it. I pray you also, reverend father, prove that assumption of yours: how your Paternity is certain that you have your teachings from heaven, from what messenger you received them.
 90 "For no one has ascended into heaven except him who has descended from heaven."<sup>72</sup> But at this point, as I hear, you will reply that your teachings were brought down to you from heaven, not indeed

67 Jn 16:33 68 See Jn 14:30. 69 he trumpets... triumphed: Erasmus, Adages

1659 (CWE 34: 28-29) 70 Jn 8:18 71 who sleep... open: Erasmus, Adages 2281

(CWE 34: 308-9). See also Juvenal, Satires 1.57. 72 Jn 3:13. See also Lk 10:18.

by him who descended from heaven, but by him who fell like lightning from heaven. You answer well, Reverend Friar. Really, I do not qualify as your teacher, but I leave you with the cacodaemon who 5 inspires your teachings, with whom you will remain in Tartarus for ever and ever.

I am indeed not so prejudiced in my own favor that I will not easily forgive you, reader, if you should at times little approve of this frivolity of 10 mine by which I occasionally intersperse certain things which suit neither the gravity of the matter nor your seriousness. And yet, I think there has never been anyone so severe as not to think it fair either to wink at us occasionally or to forgive us—
 15 when he reads everywhere the most filthy insolence of a most stupid scoundrel against a most prudent prince—if we are so stirred by indignation that, even though unwillingly, we are forced in turn to act foolishly and, as Solomon says, “to respond to 20 the fool according to his folly,”<sup>73</sup> especially since the fellow’s book, leaving aside completely the subject of concern, idles about entirely in scurrilous trifles.

We may in passing make sport of his madness; nevertheless, at the same time we handle the matter in such a way that everything that we promised 25 at the beginning is made clearly evident to you. For since his general response includes in sum nothing else than that nothing must be held for certain except what is included in evident Scriptures, but that 30 all other things—even if they are not opposed by the sacred writings and are confirmed by the unbroken agreement of the whole Church—either must be wholly rooted out as traditions of men (which policy he indeed thinks best), or at least they are to 35 be tolerated so freely that each of those things is left wholly to each individual to approve, disapprove, change, condemn, reject, wherever, whenever, as often as he pleases. Since he places in this category all human laws, the decrees of the fathers, the councils of the Church, and the sacraments, fear of purgatory, the veneration of the saints and the rite of celebrating Mass, we have made manifest both by 40 most clear Scriptures and most evident reasons that the word of God has been handed down without

Scripture and that this word is of no less authority than is the Scripture itself. We have proved by 45 the authority of Scripture and even by the confession of Luther himself that the Church cannot err at all in distinguishing the word of God in matters of faith. We have proved that the Church which he 50 calls papistic is the true catholic Church of Christ. We have proved that those sacraments which Luther calls the traditions of men are not the traditions of men but of God, and that thus he denies the word of God, not of men. We have proved that 55 he not only stupidly abolishes all human laws but also attacks both secretly and openly the Scriptures themselves. From the latter we have shown more clearly than light that whatever he has presented from the Scripture he cites so stupidly in support of 60 his own case that no fool could cite it more stupidly. And since, on the meaning of any scriptural text, he would want no one to believe all men taken as a whole but every single person to believe himself, we have made clear that he is contriving to weaken the 65 force of all Scripture and to turn all its fruit into destruction. Then, since he does not admit that an uncontested scriptural text is Scripture but denies that it has anything worthy of Scripture, and since the apostate does not hesitate to censure an apostle, we have made it very clear that he not only secretly but 70 even openly destroys the very Scriptures for which he pretends to fight. Finally, aside from his most wicked lies, and his most stupid contradictions, and his thousand follies, which we have exposed from 75 here and there, we also proved that that corrupt method of disputing by begging the initial premise which he thought he had so very wittily cast in the teeth of others; this method, I say, we proved to be 80 his one and only form of disputing.

Thus then, reader, we have discharged more than we promised, and we have done it with proofs drawn from hardly any other source than the book of the King. And since, as you see, Luther’s general response has now turned out prettily for him, we 85 next gird ourselves to handle his special answers; you shall not see one of them in which you will not laugh at the singular folly of the fellow....

The peroration of the work, in which many points are handled piously, cleverly, and learnedly, as well as pleasantly.

I have no fear, good reader, but that your sense of fairness will make allowance for me that in this book you so often read such things as I think your sense of modesty shuns. Indeed, nothing more irksome could have happened to me than to be forced to such a point of necessity that I should inflict on decent ears anything that would offend by indecent words. But there was no way of avoiding it unless I had determined, as I had tried to do with all my strength, not to touch the buffoonish book of Luther at all. Otherwise, if a response absolutely had to be made to a man on the lookout for spreading calumnies, nothing that he had written should have been omitted, nor was it allowable that words be changed when there was no substance to them, nor was it effective to recount decently what had been written indecently. Finally, how can it be that I who undertake to refute his buffoonish tricks should answer purely and cleanly the most impure words of an impure rascal? For he handles the matter in such a way that he clearly declares that he contemplates within himself a certain most absurd kind of immortality and has already begun to enjoy it and wholly to be in, to be engaged in, to live in, this kind of sense and tickling of paltry glory which he presumes will come after yet some myriads of ages, so that men will recall and say that once long ago there was in a former age a certain rascal by the name of Luther who, when he had got the better of cacodaemons in impiety, in order to adorn his sect with fitting emblems, surpassed magpies in chatter, pimps in wickedness, prostitutes in obscenity, all buffoons in buffoonery. This he zealously strove for, took pains about, accomplished so that as the sects of philosophers have names after the philosophers themselves, and Gnatho contemplated that parasites likewise should be called Gnathonites, so the most absurd race of heretics, the dregs of impiety, of crimes, and filth, should be called Lutherans.<sup>74</sup> For I ask you, reader, what race of heretics was ever so absurd as to be compared to this one? It renews every one of those heresies which the Christian world once condemned, overwhelmed, quenched, each one in its own time; the ashes of all of these this firebrand of hell once more enkindles. Since by this very deed he makes a pretext of piety, to pass over the books of most learned men who have ripped this mask and disguise from his wicked face, if you consider the matter itself, reader, you will easily recognize the tree from its fruit.<sup>75</sup> For if you turn over in your memory the ancient leaders of the Church from the very beginnings of Christianity, you will see, reader, how whatever was honored most holily by them is thus held in the utmost contempt by these Lutherans. What was once celebrated with so much veneration as the most holy sacrifice of the Mass? What has been so defiled by these pigs and trodden underfoot and all but abolished? This one thing, indeed, they still preserve sacred in every temple, but this very thing they pollute and profane by their impieties, since they both contend that it is not a sacrifice and preach that it does not profit the people anything; are they not constructing for themselves a way by which they will very soon cast out even that one sacred thing which they have left? Now how much they value prayers you see, since they not only throw out the canonical hours but also those universal prayers which even from the beginning the Church has continually chanted for the support of the deceased. On this point who will not detest such great cruelty? For if, as they falsely argue, it were especially doubtful whether the prayers of the living were profitable to the dead, nevertheless what ill will would it have been to exercise devout affections and to make a trial of prayers by which, though you might be doubtful perhaps whether you were of service, yet you would be certain that you could do no harm? What was once held to be more religious than fasting? What was more exactly observed than Lent? Yet now these men, finally perfected by the spirit, lest they seem to distinguish day from day, dedicate every day to bacchanalian orgies. Who does not know how continence was once prized? How strictly conjugal fidelity was commanded, how esteemed by the ancients the chastity of widows, how zealously, how rightly virginity was praised? And all these things by the authority of Christ himself. Now this Antichrist has taken away almost completely all sense of modesty. Priests, monks, virgins dedicated to God, now by the favor of the devil, in the Church of the wicked, under the title of lawful spouses, with great pomp of demons celebrate nefarious nuptials, and the contract and fidelity which even when ratified by man none except the wicked violate, they do not fear to violate, though it is ratified by God; they are secure of course with Luther condoning their nuptials, who begins to promise also numerous wives at once, which alone he calls the true second marriage. Very soon no doubt he will confirm this promise when he will have sufficiently fortified himself with troops of men against squadrons of women. But meanwhile, so that he may oblige those also, to how many persons, how easily he opens exits in the Babylon, by which it is permitted to leave one's spouse if any have not been able to pay their conjugal debt, unless the husband himself is so fair that he brings in a substitute from elsewhere who will in his place faithfully pay the debt to the wife.<sup>76</sup> And these things, which are not only impious but also so silly that they can seem to be distorted by me for the sake of a joke, you will see, reader, in the Babylon so seriously confirmed by him that you cannot wonder enough that he ever finds anyone who is not thoroughly ashamed to be called the disciple of so utterly absurd and insane a master.

<sup>74</sup> so that . . . Lutherans: See Terence, Eunuchus 2.263–64. <sup>75</sup> See Mt 18:33; Lk 6:44.

But a great stimulus to evil is the hope of liberty and license; while it is extended in the one hand, fear is stretched out in the other. For neither is anything more violent than the Lutherans. What wonder is it if Luther's sect advances itself by these same arts, by which it has grown strong and continues to grow strong from day to day, not unlike that sect of the Turks — that is, if the impiety of these men does not surpass even the Turks themselves? For this is plainly evident, that never have the images of the saints been mistreated with such insult as they are mistreated from day to day by the most criminal fingers of these scoundrels, who do not fear not only to tear them away from their most holy shrines, to cast them aside when torn away, to trample them down when cast aside, but also to abuse them trampled down and trodden underfoot by every kind of mockery and insult.

And these things Luther gleefully beholds perpetrated against the images of the saints, all of whose honors and veneration he judges should be abolished as most harmful scandals, while in the meantime he rejoices that his own truly venerable image is carried about and worshipped. But because he sees, conscious of his guilt, that his impiety is hateful to all the saints, he hates in turn the veneration and honors of all of them. Even the Turks venerate the virgin mother of God, whose name the Lutherans hardly endure. For how can they endure the honors of Mary when these most criminal buffoons bespatter the most holy image of Christ crucified with the most foul excrement of their bodies destined to be burned? These are the spiritual fruits of that sect. To this point at last has grown Luther's piety. A single impiety protects all the crimes of this heresy: according to it, they want themselves to seem to be, and they argue that they are, necessarily such as they are — on the grounds that the certain and destined will of God drives men into every kind of crime. Do you doubt, do you doubt, illustrious Germany, that those who sow such spiritual goods as these are, will one day reap carnal goods?<sup>77</sup> Indeed now, as I hear, the thistles are reproducing their bad fruit, and God is beginning to show how he approves this sect, when he does not allow the priests who take wives to be joined to any other than public strumpets. And in the case of those whom he once forbade to be joined in legitimate wedlock, except to most pure virgins, he does not now allow their incestuous and criminal nuptials to take place except with the most foul prostitutes. What about the fact that everywhere such spouses, exposed at first with wretched infamy, then ruined by illness, poverty and destitution, shortly afterwards slipping into robbery, he finally punishes with public penalty? And would that the vengeance be confined within these dregs, but unless it is speedily resisted, it will spread somewhat farther. For just as very many of the princes look not without pleasure on a degenerating clergy, undoubtedly because they pant for the possessions of those who defect and hope to seize them on the grounds of abandonment, and just as those princes rejoice that obedience is withdrawn from the Roman pontiff with the hope that they will be able to dispose and divide and squander it all for themselves at home, so too there is no reason for them to doubt but that the people look to the time when they may shake off in turn the yoke of the princes and strip them of their possessions; once they have accomplished this, drunk with the blood of princes and revelling in the gore of nobles, enduring not even common rule, with the laws trampled underfoot according to Luther's doctrine, rulerless and lawless, without restraint, wanton beyond reason, they will finally turn their hands against themselves and like those earthborn brethren, will mutually run each other through. I pray Christ I may become a false prophet; I shall if men will come to their senses and resist the rising evils. Otherwise, I fear that I will become what I do not wish, a true prophet. But let Germany see to these things.

I return to Luther's book; since it is such as you see, that is, a mere conglomeration of buffoonish words, you will, reader, consider my book worthy of pardon wherever you see what that fellow's filth has infected to be not sufficiently clean. But if at times I seem too long-winded, let your fairness consider that since his words had to be recorded, and those added which the Prince wrote, as well as something added of my own so that the misrepresentation of Luther might become evident, it could not but happen that the work should grow somewhat, not to mention meanwhile the fact that by the custom of all the courts the respondent obtains a longer time to speak. But if you think that you find less of serious matter and matter worthy of approval than is proportionate to the size of the book, not even that can you rightly impute to me, to whom it was not permitted to stray beyond the limits of that man's book, nor to present anything else from it than what was there. And yet I hope that some things have been thrown in by me which so undermine Luther's foundations that together with them the man's impious doctrines stupidly built upon them will necessarily fall into ruin; this I certainly do not doubt, that nothing from the book of the King was carpied at by Luther in which I did not clearly refute Luther's shameless deceitfulness. Finally, as I confess my book not to be the kind that demands publication as something that must be read, so I trust it is not the kind which a person ought rightly to condemn who deigns to read Luther's trifles. For if anyone has spurned his chatter, there is no need, nor do I desire, that he waste his time on this book. Indeed, my most earnest prayer is that I may sometime see the day in which all mortals will cast aside both these trifles of mine and all the insane heresies of that fellow, so that, with the pursuit of the worst things consigned to oblivion, with the incitements to railing buried, and the memory of contentions wiped out, the serene light of faith may shine into souls, sincere piety and truly Christian harmony may return; and I pray that he who came into the world to bring peace from heaven, may one day bring back and restore that harmony to the world. The end.

A dyaloge of Syr Thomas More knyghte: one of the

countayll of oure souerayne lorde the kyng & chauncellour of hys duchy of Lancaster. wherin be treatyd dyuers maters/as of the veneration

& worthyp of ymagys & relyques/prayng to sayncys/ & goyng
o pylgrymage.

Wyth many othere thyngys touchyng the pestylent sect of Luther and Tyndale / by the tone by gone in Sarony / and by the tother laboyd to be brought in to England. .

Title page, first edition, A dyaloge of Syr Thomas More knyght, 1529; the same wording was used in the 1531 edition. Only in the 1557 Workes did editor William Rastell use the title now prevalent: A Dialogue concerning Heresies.

A Dialogue of Sir Thomas More, Knight

First published in June 1529, A Dialogue of Sir Thomas More, Knight, was composed in response to the request of Cuthbert Tunstall, Bishop of London. A second edition, “newly overseen by the said Sir Thomas More, Chancellor of England,” was revised and published in 1531, with additions including More’s response to the argument against images in The Image of Love, and his updated account of the controversies especially raised by Tyn-dale’s Answer in early 1531. A third edition, with the more familiar title, A Dialogue Concerning Heresies, was published in the 1557 Works of Sir Thomas More, edited by William Rastell. The 1531 text provides the basis for our edition.

Like the earlier Utopia and his later Tower work A Dialogue of Comfort against Tribulation, this work exhibits More’s intellectual commitment to the dialogue genre, as well as his artfulness and skill with this ancient form of writing. Informed by the example of Plato, Cicero, Boethius, and others, More uses the dialogue form for writing and provoking reflection about subjects of fundamental concern. As A Dialogue demonstrates, one of More’s chief gifts as a writer is his ability to represent human conversation in its variety and reality. The conversation represented is sometimes pithy, sometimes rambling, sometimes funny, sometimes contradictory, sometimes pointed, sometimes urgent—and yet it is always probing and challenging in ways reminiscent of Socrates and his approach, though with a spirit and seasoning distinctly More’s own.

Whereas in Utopia the dialogue centers on questions such as “What is the best form of a republic?” and “Does a philosophical person have a duty to serve the public?,” and while in A Dialogue of Comfort the conversation focuses on the question of human suffering and our experience of it, here More represents a long conversation about the “diverse matters of religion” under public debate at the beginning of the Reformation in England. The Dialogue has been called by C. S. Lewis the best written Platonic dialogue in English, and the work is marked throughout by More’s habitual irony, his flashing and challenging wit, and his distinctive humanism.

Composed in four parts, A Dialogue records the serious, merry, and trenchant conversation between More and “the Messenger,” a young man sent to More by a friend who is concerned about the Messenger’s new opinions as they have grown through the influence of the reformers, or “new men.”

The Dialogue represents the long conversation of More and the Messenger on the most discussed subjects of religious controversy in the period, including: the nature of the Church and the “common corps” of Christendom; the veneration of saints and the practice of going on pilgrimages; the preeminence of Scripture and the place of liberal education; the respective roles of reason, faith, tradition, and charity; the relationship between grace and nature; the number and nature of the sacraments; the dispute over human liberty and sin; the responsibility of magistrates and the rule of law; and the role of temporal and spiritual authority in political life. The Dialogue also contains More’s first extended discussion of the handling of seditious heresy by the English authorities, an account that has divided readers of More and his legacy, and yet a text that remains indispensable for those who wish to understand More as he understood himself, his office, and English law.

The Oxford Dictionary of National Biography has called More’s dialogue the “wittiest” work of the English Reformation, with a “potential to persuade” and “relaxed charm” that are singular. As More writes near the beginning of the work, the questions discussed in this Dialogue may be “short,” but answering them well is the longer labor, and a necessary one requiring time, conversation, humility, good humor, and courage—More’s chosen means for cultivating shared reason and friendship with the Messenger, and the grounds for his hope, stated at the end of the Dialogue, that the unity of the Church might be preserved. After centuries of comparative neglect, A Dialogue of Sir Thomas More, Knight stands as one of the most comprehensive and valuable resources for the study of the issues involved in the English Reformation and its controversies.

CONTENTS

Book 1

Preface	Why More writes out this conversation and publishes it after consulting others . . . . .	527
1	“Letter of Introduction” from Chancellor More’s friend . . . . .	529
	“Author’s Letter” sent to friend, accompanying this printed book . . . . .	530
	(Evening) Initial meeting of Messenger and More . . . . .	530
2	(Next morning, before 7:00 am, in More’s study) More says he will respond to the four issues raised the night before by Messenger; begins with Thomas Bilney [though never named], but postpones this until 3.2; defines “heresy” and discusses The Image of Love’s criticisms of images and “outward observances” . . . . .	534
3–19	On saints, images, miracles, pilgrimages . . . . .	542
20–25	Place of Scripture and how to interpret it . . . . .	572
26–31	Nature of the Church . . . . .	591

Book 2

(After lunch, in the arbor of More’s garden)

1–7	Status of the “Church” discussed . . . . .	607
8–12	Discussion on images, relics, saints, pilgrimages continued . . . . .	618

Book 3

(Morning after Messenger’s two-week stay at the University)

1	Objections regarding the relationship of the Church to Scripture . . . . .	636
2–7	Bilney’s trial . . . . .	640
8–14	Tyndale’s translation of the New Testament . . . . .	655
15	Richard Hunne’s posthumous heresy trial . . . . .	672
16	Tyndale’s translation of the New Testament . . . . .	679

Book 4

(After lunch, in the arbor of More’s garden)

1–10	Luther, his teachings, their effects, and harsh treatment received . . . . .	687
11–12	English vs. German Lutherans as well as justification and predestination . . . . .	703
13–18	Why force is used . . . . .	717
18	More gives Messenger books to read, with passages marked; supper . . . . .	729
	Next day, just before lunch: Final discussion; lunch . . . . .	729
	Addenda to 3.7: On Perjury . . . . .	733

A Dialogue of Sir Thomas More, Knight,
one of the Council of our sovereign lord the King, and Chancellor of his Duchy of Lancaster.

5 Wherein be treated diverse matters, as of the veneration and worship of images and relics, praying to saints, and going on pilgrimage, with many other things touching the pestilent
sect of Luther and Tyndale, 10 by the one begun in Saxony, and by the other labored to be brought into England.

Newly overseen by the said Thomas More, Chancellor of England.

1530.

15 THE FIRST BOOK

16 It is an old-said saw,<sup>1</sup> that one business begetteth and bringeth forth another. Which proverb as it happeth<sup>2</sup> I find very true by<sup>3</sup> myself, which<sup>4</sup> have been fain<sup>5</sup> by occasion first of one business, after 20 to take the second, and upon the second, now to take the third. For whereas a right worshipful<sup>6</sup> friend of mine sent once unto me a secret sure<sup>7</sup> friend of his,
with certain credence to be declared unto me, touching many such matters as, being indeed very certain 25 and out of doubt, be nevertheless of late by lewd<sup>8</sup> people put in question (the specialties<sup>9</sup> whereof do so far-forth<sup>10</sup> in the first chapter of this book appear that we shall here need no rehearsal<sup>11</sup> thereof), I thought it first enough to tell the messenger my mind by mouth, accounting that after our commu- 30

nication ended, I should never need further business therein. But after that the messenger was departed, and I felt my stomach<sup>12</sup> well eased — in that I reckoned all my labor done — bethinking myself 35 a little while thereon, my business that I took for finished I found very far from that point, and little more than begun. For when I considered what the matters were, and how many great things had been treated between the messenger and me, and in 40 what manner fashion,<sup>13</sup> albeit<sup>14</sup> I mistrusted not his good will, and very well trusted his wit (his learning well serving him to the perceiving and reporting of our communication) — yet finding our treaty<sup>15</sup> so

1 proverb, adage 2 happens 3 of; with regard to 4 who 5 obliged 6 right worshipful: very distinguished 7 secret sure: confidential and trusted 8 base; vile; uneducated 9 particulars 10 so far-forth:

to such an extent 11 enumeration; account

12 heart; feelings; spirit 13 manner fashion: kind of way 14 although 15 treatment, discussion

diverse and so long, and sometimes such wise intricate that myself could not without labor call it orderly to mind, methought I had not well done, without writing, to trust his only memory, namely<sup>16</sup> since some parts of the matter be such of themselves as rather need to be attentively read and advised<sup>17</sup> than hoveryly<sup>18</sup> heard and passed over. And over<sup>19</sup> this I considered that though I nothing suspect the messenger — as in good faith I do not (and, to say the truth, am of myself so little mistrusting that he were like very plainly to show himself naught,<sup>20</sup> whom I should take for bad) — yet since no man can look into another's breast, as it is therefore well done to deem the best, so were it not much amiss in such wise to provide for the worst, as (if a man hap<sup>21</sup> to be worse than we take him for) our good opinion turn us to no harm. For this cause methought that for the more surety,<sup>22</sup> my part were to send our communication to my said friend in writing. Whereby if it had happed that his messenger had, for any sinister favor borne toward the wrong side, purposely mangled the matter, his master should not only know the truth, but also have occasion the better to beware of his messenger — which else might hap to hurt, while he were mistaken for good. Now when I had upon this deliberation taken with myself, written all the matter and sent it to my friend, then had I methought all done, and my mind full set at rest. But that rest rested not long. For soon after it was showed me that of all my writings were written diverse copies, and one also carried over the sea. Where, when I remembered what a shrewd<sup>23</sup> sort of our apostates are assembled — part run out of religion, and all run out of the right faith — methought great peril might arise if some of that company (which<sup>24</sup> are confedered<sup>25</sup> and conspired together in the sowing and setting forth of Luther's pestilent heresies in this realm) should maliciously change my words to the worse, and so put in print my book, framed after their fantasies, which, when I would afterward reprove and show the difference, I might peradventure<sup>26</sup> seem, for the color of my cause,<sup>27</sup> to have amended mine own, upon the sight of theirs. For eschewing<sup>28</sup> whereof, I am now driven, as I say, to this third business of publishing and putting my book in print myself, whereby their enterprise (if they should any such intend) shall, I trust, be prevented and frustrated. And this have I done not all of mine own head,<sup>29</sup> but after the counsel of others more than one — whose advice and counsel, for their wisdom and learning, I asked in that behalf, and which<sup>30</sup> have at my request vouchsafed<sup>31</sup> to read over the book ere<sup>32</sup> I did put it forth. For albeit that<sup>33</sup> I dare be somewhat bold to commune in familiar manner, with such as for their fantasies like to ask me of such matters any question — according to the counsel of Saint Peter bidding us be ready to give a reckoning and to show a reasonable cause to every man of the faith and hope that we have<sup>34</sup> — yet to make and put forth any book (wherein were treated any such things as touch our faith) would I not presume but if<sup>35</sup> better-learned than myself should think it either profitable or at the leastwise harmless. To whose examination and judgment I did the more studiously submit this work for two things in special,<sup>36</sup> among diverse others: the one, for<sup>37</sup> the liberal allegations of the Messenger for the wrong part,<sup>38</sup> so laid out at large that of myself I stood half in a doubt whether it were convenient<sup>39</sup> to rehearse<sup>40</sup> the words of any man so homely,<sup>41</sup> and in manner sometimes unreverently, spoken against God's holy hallows<sup>42</sup> and their reverent memories; the other was certain tales and merry words which he mingled with his matter — and some such on mine own part among<sup>43</sup> — as occasion fell in communication. In which, albeit I saw no harm, yet somewhat doubted I, lest they should unto sad<sup>44</sup> men seem overligh and wanton<sup>45</sup> for the weight and gravity of such an earnest matter. Wherefore, in these two points, though I had already seen some examples of right holy men — which,<sup>46</sup> in their books answering to the objections of heretics in their time have not let to rehearse the very formal words of them whose writings they made answer to, being sometimes of such manner and sort as a good man would not well bear, and have not also let<sup>47</sup> to write a merry word in a right earnest work of which two things I could out of godly men's books and holy saints' works gather a good sort — yet in mine own work I determined that I would nothing allow

16 especially 17 reflected on 18 superficially 19 in addition to 20 wicked 21 happen 22 safety, security; certainty 23 wicked; malicious 24 who 25 confederated 26 perhaps 27 for the color of my cause: to make my case look better 28 avoiding 29 accord 30 who 31 agreed 32 before 33 albeit that: although 34 See 1 Pt 3:15. 35 but if: unless 36 particular 37 side

38 because of 39 appropriate 40 repeat 41 plainly; directly 42 saints 43 occasionally 44 serious 45 undisciplined, unruly 46 who 47 hesitated

nor defend that the judgment of other virtuous and cunning<sup>48</sup> men would in any wise<sup>49</sup> mislike. And therefore after that<sup>50</sup> such had read it and severally<sup>51</sup> said their advice, I found (as it often happeth) that 5 something which one wise and well-learned man would have out, twain<sup>52</sup> of like wisdom and learning specially would have in — neither side lacking good and probable reasons for their part. Wherefore, since it became<sup>53</sup> not me to be judge over the 10 judgment of them whom I took and chose for my judges — being such, of themselves, as hard were it for any man to say which of them before the others he could in erudition, wit, or prudence anything prefer — I could no further go, but lean to the more<sup>54</sup>
 15 part. Which I so far-forth<sup>55</sup> have followed that, likewise as I diverse things put out or changed by their good advice and counsel, so let I nothing stand in this book but such as twain advised me specially to let stand, against any one that any doubt moved me 20 to the contrary. And thus much have I thought necessary for my declaration<sup>56</sup> and excuse to advertise<sup>57</sup> you all that shall happen to read this rude simple work, praying you of patience and pardon, whom God, of his especial grace, grant as much profit in 25 the reading as my poor heart hath meant you and intended in the making.

THE FIRST CHAPTER

The letter of credence sent from his friend by a trusty secret<sup>58</sup> messenger, with the letter of the 30 author answering the same. The declaration of the credence by the mouth of the messenger; whereupon the matter of all the whole work dependeth.

The Letter of Credence

Master Chancellor: as heartily as I possibly can, 35 I recommend me<sup>59</sup> to you, not without a thousand thanks for your good company when we were last together. In which, forasmuch as it liked you to spend some of your time with me in familiar communication — whereof some part I trust so to 40 remember as myself shall be the better, and some others never the worse, which shall have cause, and have already, to give you great thanks therefor<sup>60</sup> — I am bold at this time to send you my special secret friend, this bearer, to break with<sup>61</sup> you somewhat 45 further, partly of the same matters, partly of some others, such as are happed there since, whereof great speech and rumor runneth here, whereby ye shall have occasion more at length (if your leisure will serve<sup>62</sup>) to touch certain doubts moved<sup>63</sup> since of the matters treated between us before. Wherein were it

 50 not for your other business, I would be bold on your goodness to desire you to take good time with him. And yet nevertheless do require<sup>64</sup> you heartily — as your leisure will serve you — to satisfy him at the full. For he shall (how long soever he tarry there-55 for) give attendance<sup>65</sup> unto you — days and hours, as ye may spare him time, which cannot in these things be but well bestowed, considering that the matters be such, and so touching to God, as they were well worthy to set worldly business aside, spe-
 60 cially in such need. For I assure you, some folk here talk very strangely of the things that he shall move you — not only for such words as they tell that come from thence,<sup>66</sup> but also most especially through the occasion of some letters lewdly<sup>67</sup> written hither out
 65 of London by a priest or two, whom they take here for honest. But whatsoever any man tell or write, I shall, for the confidence and trust that I have in you, surely take and tell forth for the very truth
 70 whatsoever ye shall affirm unto my friend, whom I send unto you not so much because I may not come myself (howbeit,<sup>68</sup> therefor too) as for because I long to have him talk with you. To whom, whatsoever ye say, reckon it said to myself — not only for his troth<sup>69</sup> and secretness, but also for his memory, 75 with whom to commune,<sup>70</sup> I trust shall not mislike you. For either mine affection blindeth me, or ye shall find him wise and, as others say that can better judge it than I, more than meanly<sup>71</sup> learned with 80 one thing added wherewith ye be wont<sup>72</sup> well to be content: a very merry wit. He is of nature nothing tongue-tied. And I have in these matters bidden him be bold, without any straining of<sup>73</sup> courtesy, whereof the ceremonies in disputation<sup>74</sup> marreth 85 much of the matter, while<sup>75</sup> one studieth more how he may behave him than what he shall say. I have,

48 learned 49 way 50 after that: after 51 separately 52 two 53 suited, befitted 54 the majority 55 so far-forth: to such an extent 56 explanation 57 notify 58 trusted, confidential 59 recommend me: commend myself to your benevolent remembrance or regard 60 for it 61 break with: disclose to 62 allow 63 doubts moved: questions raised 64 ask 65 attention 66 there (i.e., London)

67 evilly 68 although 69 trustworthiness 70 talk 71 moderately 72 accustomed 73 straining of: restraining out of 74 ceremonies in disputation: formalities of academic debate 75 when I say, therefore bidden him more to mind his matter than his courtesy, and freely to lay forth not only what he thinketh, but also what him list,<sup>76</sup> giving no foot<sup>77</sup> in disputing unto your authority, but if<sup>78</sup> he be borne back with reason. Thus may ye see I am bold on your goodness, to put you to labor and business, and send one to face you in your own house. But so much am I bolder, for that<sup>79</sup> in such challenges I know you for a ready and sure defender. And of such labor your wisdom well seeth that God is the rewarder, who long preserve you and all yours.

The Letter of the Author
Sent with the Book

Right worshipful<sup>80</sup> sir: after most hearty recommendation, albeit that<sup>81</sup> of late I sent you my poor mind by the mouth of your trusty friend, to whom ye desired<sup>82</sup> me by your letters to give no less credence than to yourself concerning all such things as he broke of<sup>83</sup> and communed with me in your behalf (and that for<sup>84</sup> the confidence that ye have in him, the wit and learning that I found in him, and honesty that I so much the more think him to be of, in that I perceive you, being of such wisdom and virtue, to have him in so special trust), I neither do nor can believe the contrary but that he hath of all our communication made you faithfully plain and full report, yet since I suppose in myself that if we had might<sup>85</sup> conveniently come together, ye would rather have chosen to have heard my mind of mine own mouth than by the means of another, I have since in these few days (in which I have been at home) put the matter in writing, to the end ye may not only hear it by the mouth of your friend, but also (which better is than suddenly once<sup>86</sup> to hear it of mine own mouth) read it (if ye list<sup>87</sup>) more often, at your best leisure advisedly from mine own pen. Which thing I verily thought myself so much the more bound to do, for that<sup>88</sup> it liked you, of your special favor and affection toward me, so greatly to regard and esteem my mind and answer in those matters that no rumor there running, or tales in your country told, or letters thither written, nor reasons or arguments there made to the contrary, should let or withstand,<sup>89</sup> but that ye would, (as ye wrote), take that thing for undoubted truth that I should (by your friend) ascertain you.<sup>90</sup> And surely, sir, in this point, ye may make yourself sure: that I shall never willingly deceive your trust. And lest I might hap to do it of oversight unware,<sup>91</sup> albeit I nothing said unto your friend by mouth but that I was right well informed of the truth, yet forasmuch as I perceived by him that some folk doubted lest many things were laid to the charge, not only of that man ye wrote of, but also of Luther himself, otherwise than could be proved, I did so much therein that I was suffered<sup>92</sup> to see and show him as well the books of the one, as the very acts of the court concerning the other, that we might both by so much the more surely warrant<sup>93</sup> you the truth. Wherein if ye find any man that yet doubteth whether he told you and I write you the truth or not, I shall, if he understand the Latin tongue, find the means at your pleasure that he shall so see the books himself, that were he never so full of mistrusting, he shall not fail to be fully content and satisfied. And this warrant<sup>94</sup> will I make you as far-forth as concerneth any act done here. But as for things reasoned and disputed between us, the conclusions themselves be so sure truths that they be not disputable. But whether the reasons<sup>95</sup> by me made in them been effectual or insufficient (albeit your friend either for that<sup>96</sup> of truth he thought so, or for that of courtesy he said so, accepted them for good), yet without prejudice of the principal matters ye may yourself be judge. And thus I pray you take in good worth the little labor and great good will of him whom, in anything that may do you pleasure, ye may to the uttermost of his little power well and boldly command. And thus our Lord send you, with my good lady your bedfellow, and all yours, as heartily well to fare as you would all wish.

Your friend first (after your letter read, when I demanded him his credence) showed me that ye had sent him to me not for any doubt<sup>97</sup> that yourself had in many of those things that he should move<sup>98</sup> unto me, but for the doubt that ye perceived in many others, and in some folk plain persuasion to the contrary, whom ye would be glad to answer

76 him list: he wishes 77 ground
78 but if: unless 79 for that: because 80 honorable 81 albeit that: although 82 asked 83 broke of: disclosed to 84 because of 85 had might: might have 86 suddenly once: all at once 87 want to 88 for that: because 89 let or withstand:

hinder or prevent (you) 90 ascertain you:

assure you of 91 unawares; inadvertently 92 allowed 93 guarantee 94 guarantee 95 arguments, explanations 96 for that: because 97 question 98 raise

with the truth — albeit some things, he said, were also there so talked that ye wist<sup>99</sup> not well yourself which part ye might believe. For it was there not only spoken, but also thither written by diverse honest priests out of London, that the man ye write of was of many things borne wrong in hand,<sup>100</sup> and therein so sore handled<sup>101</sup> that he was forced to forswear and abjure<sup>102</sup> certain heresies, and openly put to penance therefor, where he never held any such.

10 And all this done for malice and envy, partly of some friars (against whose abusions<sup>103</sup> he preached), partly for that he preached boldly against the pomp and pride and other inordinate living (that more men speak of than preach of) used in the clergy.

15 And they take for a great token that he should not mean evil<sup>104</sup> the proof and experience which men have had of him: that he lived well, and was a good, honest, virtuous man, far from ambition and desire of worldly worship<sup>105</sup> — chaste, humble, and charitable, free and liberal in almsdeed — and a very good preacher, in whose devout sermons the people were greatly edified. And therefore the people say that all this gear<sup>106</sup> is done but only to stop men's mouths, and to put every man to silence that would anything speak of the faults of the clergy. And they think that for none other cause was also burned, at Paul's Cross,<sup>107</sup> the New Testament late<sup>108</sup> translated in English by Master William Hutchins, otherwise called Master Tyndale,<sup>109</sup> who was (as men say), well known ere<sup>110</sup> he went over the sea, for a man of right good living, studious and well-learned in Scripture, and in diverse places in England was very well liked and did great good with preaching. And men mutter among themselves that the book was not only faultless, but also very well translated, and was devised to be burned because<sup>111</sup> men should not be able to prove that such faults (as were at Paul's Cross declared to have been found in it) were never found there indeed, but untruly surmised.<sup>112</sup> And yet such as they were (some men say) were no faults at all if they had been so translated indeed, but blame laid and fault found with things nothing blameworthy only to deface and infame<sup>113</sup> that holy work, to the end that they might seem to have some just cause to burn it.

45 And that for none other intent but for to keep out of the people's hands all knowledge of Christ's Gospel, and of God's law, except so much only as the clergy themselves list<sup>114</sup> now and then to tell us. And that little as it is and seldom showed, yet as it is feared, not well and truly told, but watered with false glosses, and altered from the truth of the very words and sentence<sup>115</sup> of Scripture, only for the maintenance of their authority.

55 And the fear — lest this thing should evidently appear to the people if they were suffered<sup>116</sup> to read the Scripture themselves in their own tongue — was (as it is thought) the very cause not only for which the New Testament translated by Tyndale was burned, but also that the clergy of this realm hath before this time, by a constitution provincial,<sup>117</sup> prohibited any book of Scripture to be translated into the English tongue, fearing men with fire as heretics who so should presume to keep them, as though it were heresy for a Christian man to read Christ's Gospel.

60 “And surely, sir,” quoth he, “some folk that think this dealing of the clergy to thus (and good men to be mishandled for declaring the truth, and the Scripture itself to be pulled out of the people's hands, lest they should perceive the truth) be led in their minds to doubt whether Luther himself (of whose opinions — or, at the least, of whose works — all these businesses began) wrote indeed so evil as he is borne in hand.<sup>118</sup> And many men there be that think he never meant such things. But that because he wrote against the abusions of pardons,<sup>119</sup> and spoke somewhat liberally against the court of Rome, and generally against the vices of the clergy, therefore he was brought in hatred,<sup>120</sup> and first cited<sup>121</sup> to Rome. And when that for fear of bodily harm with wrong<sup>122</sup> — whereof<sup>123</sup> it would have been too late to look for remedy after, if he had once been burned up before — he durst<sup>124</sup> not come thither,<sup>125</sup> then was he accursed,<sup>126</sup> and his books damned,<sup>127</sup> and under

99 knew 100 borne wrong in hand: falsely accused 101 sore handled: badly treated 102 publicly renounce 103 corrupt practices 104 badly 105 honor 106 matter 107 Paul's Cross: the outdoor pulpit in front of Old St. Paul's Cathedral in London 108 lately, recently 109 New Testament... Tyndale: Tyndale (1494–1536) published his English translation of the New Testament in 1526 in Worms; it was declared illegal in England. 110 before 111 so that 112 formally alleged; charged 113 bring into infamy 114 want 115 meaning 116 allowed 117 constitution provincial: decree made by the bishops of the national synod 118 borne in hand: accused of having done 119 abusions of pardons: corrupt practices concerning services held for the granting of indulgences 120 brought in hatred: made to be hated 121 summoned 122 with wrong: unjustly inflicted 123 by reason of which 124 dared 125 come thither: go there (i.e., to Rome) 126 excommunicated 127 condemned great pains forbidden to be read. And that thing done because it should not be known what wrong he had, and that he neither meaneth nor saith such odious and abominable heresies as the people be borne in hand<sup>128</sup> to induce them to hatred of him — as it would peradventure<sup>129</sup> appear if his books were suffered to be read.

“And they say that it were no mastery<sup>130</sup> to make it seem that a man should be a heretic, if he may be borne in hand that he saith the thing which he never said, or peradventure one line taken out among many — and misconstrued — not suffering the remnant to be seen, whereby it might more clearly appear what he meaneth. By which manner of dealing a man, they say, might lay heresy to Saint Paul, and find a fault in Saint John’s Gospel.

“And yet, they say, the worst of all is this: that the clergy cease not hereby,<sup>131</sup> nor hold themselves content with the condemning of Luther and forbidding of his books, but further abuse<sup>132</sup> the hatred of his name against every man that is, in preaching of the Word of God, anything such as should be — that is to wit,<sup>133</sup> plain and bold, without gloss or flattering — where if they find a man faulty, let them lay his fault to his charge. What needeth to call him a ‘Lutheran’? Though<sup>134</sup> Luther were a devil, yet might a man percase<sup>135</sup> say as he saith in something, and say true enough. For never was there heretic that said all false. Nor the devil himself lied not when he called Christ God’s Son.<sup>136</sup> And therefore men think that this name of a Lutheran serveth the clergy for a common cloak of<sup>137</sup> a false crime: that where they lack special matter<sup>138</sup> to charge one with by judgment,<sup>139</sup> they labor to bring him first in the infamy of that name, that compriseth (as they make it seem) a confused heap of heresies, no man can tell what.

“And yet in such dealing they wound their own matter<sup>140</sup> another way. For while they defame for Lutherans men that be of known virtue and cunning,<sup>141</sup> what do they thereby but one of the twain:<sup>142</sup> either cause the people (that have, for<sup>143</sup> good living and learning, those men in great reputation) to think that the clergy, for malice and envy, doth untruly defame them, or else that Luther’s doctrine is good, while so<sup>144</sup> cunning men, and good men, lean thereto.<sup>145</sup> 45

“And therefore it were wisdom not to call them Lutherans, but rather, when they teach and hold any such opinions as the people know for Luther’s, let it either be dissimulated,<sup>146</sup> or they secretly<sup>147</sup> by fair ways induced to the contrary, if the points that they teach of his be naught.<sup>148</sup> Lest by calling good and cunning men ‘Lutherans,’ they may peradventure<sup>149</sup> bring themselves in suspicion of malice and envy, and Luther among the people into good opinion — thinking, as they begin to do already, that either Luther said not as evil as is surmised upon<sup>150</sup> him, or else that those things that he saith, as odious as they seem, be good enough in deed.”<sup>151</sup> 50

He said also that it seemed unto many men a sore<sup>152</sup> thing, and far unreasonable, that poor, simple, and unlearned men — although they fell into errors, and were led out of the right way by that they leaned to, the authority of such men as they believed to be virtuous and cunning — should instead of teaching be beaten cruelly, with abjurations<sup>153</sup> and open shame, with peril of burning also, if a few false witnesses shall, after such abjuration, depose<sup>154</sup> that they have heard him fall in relapse. 55

Finally he said that many good and well-learned men thought plainly that the clergy seemeth far out of all good order of charity — and that they do contrary to the mildness and merciful mind of their Master, and against the example of all the old holy fathers<sup>155</sup> — in that they cause, for any error or wrong opinion in the faith, any man, one or other, to be put to death. 60

“For they say that the old holy fathers used only to dispute with heretics, teaching them, and convicting them by Scripture, and not by faggots.<sup>156</sup> And that, by that way, the faith went well toward,<sup>157</sup> and one heretic so turned<sup>158</sup> did turn many others, whereas now men abhor this cruelty in the Church. And they that seem turned think still the things that they dare not say. And of the ashes of one heretic springeth up many. And that now we make the fashion of Christendom to seem all turned quite upside down. For whereas Christ made infidels the 85

128 borne in hand: led to believe he does 129 perhaps 130 superiority 131 in connection with this 132 take advantage of, misuse 133 say 134 Even if 135 perhaps 136 See Mk 3:11. 137 cloak of: cover for 138 special matter:

specific grounds 139 by judgment: in a trial 140 position 141 learning 142 two 143 because of (those men’s) 144 such 145 lean thereto: subscribe to it 146 ignored 147 privately 148 bad 149 perhaps 150 surmised upon: alleged of 151 actuality 152 terrible 153 formal renunciations on oath 154 testify 155 old holy fathers: early fathers of the Church 156 bundles of sticks 157 forward 158 converted persecutors and his Christian people the sufferers, we make the Christian men the persecutors and the infidels the sufferers, whereby men think that secretly Christ's order yet standeth still, though it be 5 not so taken and so perceived. For the people take it that still those that persecute be the miscreants,<sup>159</sup> and those poor people that suffer it be (under the false name of 'heretics') the true-believing men, and very<sup>160</sup> Christian martyrs.

10 "Christ also, they say, would never have any man compelled by force and violence to believe upon<sup>161</sup> his faith, nor would that men should<sup>162</sup> fight for him or his matters. In so far-forth<sup>163</sup> that he would not suffer<sup>164</sup> Saint Peter to fight for his own self, but re-
 15 proved him for striking Malchus.<sup>165</sup> Nor would not defend himself, but, healing the ear again of Malchus his persecutor, which Peter had smitten off, and giving all his holy body to the patient sufferance of all the painful torments that his cruel ene-
 20 mies would put to it, showed us, as well by his effectual<sup>166</sup> example of his death as by his godly counsel in his life (and after that, confirmed by the continual passion<sup>167</sup> and martyrdoms of his holy martyrs) that his will and pleasure is that we should not so 25 much as defend ourselves against heretics and infidels, were they pagans, Turks, or Saracens. And much less then should we fight against them and kill them, but that we should persevere in setting forth his faith against miscreants and infidels by 30 such ways as himself began it, keep it and increase it as it was gotten. And that was by patience and sufferance,<sup>168</sup> by which the faith was divulged<sup>169</sup> and spread almost through the world in little while. Not by war and fighting; which way hath (as they say) 35 well near already lost all that the other way won."

When your friend had thus declared his credence, he desired<sup>170</sup> me, both on your behalf and on his own, in such things as were percase<sup>171</sup> not well said, to take them as they were in deed:<sup>172</sup> the mind<sup>173</sup> of 40 others, whom ye would fain<sup>174</sup> answer and satisfy with reason — which ye trusted to be the better able to do by mine answer — and neither the mind and opinion of you nor him, which did and would in all things stand and abide by the faith and belief of 45 Christ's Catholic Church. But as for such parts of this matter as concerned not any part of our belief, but the dealing of this world — as<sup>175</sup> the justice or injustice of some spiritual persons<sup>176</sup> in the pursuing and condemning men for heretics, or their works for 50 heresies — he thought, he said (as of himself) that men might without any peril of heresy, for their own part, notwithstanding any man's judgment given, yet well and reasonably doubt<sup>177</sup> therein. For though he thought it heresy to think the opinions of any man to be good and Catholic which been heresies indeed,

 55 yet might a man (he thought) without any peril of heresy, doubt whether he were a heretic or no, that were by man's judgment condemned for one, since it might well happen that he never held those opinions that were put upon him, but that he was either 60 by false depositions of wrongful witnesses or by the error or malice of unjust judges condemned. And that sometime percase the ignorance of some judges would condemn for heresy such articles as wiser and better-learned would in point of judgment allow for 65 good and Catholic, and of the other judgment discern and judge the contrary.

Howbeit,<sup>178</sup> he said that ye had in me and my learning so special trust and confidence that in any of all these things — whatsoever ye had heard or 70 should hear elsewhere — ye were fully determined to give full credence to me, and take for the truth such answer as he should bring you from me, wherein ye right heartily desired me to take some pain, that ye might in these matters by his mouth know my mind 75 at large.

After this, ere<sup>179</sup> I made any answer to his words, I demanded<sup>180</sup> him what manner acquaintance was between him and you. And thereupon perceiv-80 ing him to have your sons at school, inquiring further of him to what faculty<sup>181</sup> he had most given his study, I understood him to have given diligence to the Latin tongue. As for other faculties, he rought nought of.<sup>182</sup> For he told me merrily that logic he reckoned but babbling; music, to serve for singers;
 85 arithmetic, meet<sup>183</sup> for merchants; geometry, for masons; astronomy, good for no man; and as for philosophy, the most vanity of all, and that it and logic had lost<sup>184</sup> all good divinity<sup>185</sup> with the subtleties of their questions and babbling of their dispicions,<sup>186</sup>
 90

159 unbelievers; infidels, heretics 160 true 161 in 162 would... should:
 would want men to 163 In so far-forth:
 To such an extent 164 allow 165 See Mt 26:51–54; Jn 18:10. 166 effective

167 suffering 168 tolerance 169 proclaimed 170 asked 171 perhaps 172 actuality 173 opinion 174 willingly 175 such as 176 spiritual persons:
 members of the clergy 177 question

178 However 179 before 180 asked 181 branch of knowledge 182 rought nought of: thought nothing of 183 suitable 184 ruined 185 theology 186 disputations

building all upon reason, which rather giveth blindness than any light. “For man,” he said, “hath no light but of Holy Scripture.” And therefore he said that besides the Latin tongue, he had been (which I 5 much commend) studious in Holy Scripture, which was, he said, “learning enough for a Christian man, with which the apostles held themselves content.” And therein, he said, he labored not only to can<sup>187</sup> many texts thereof by heart, but also to ensearch<sup>188</sup>
 10 the sentence<sup>189</sup> and understanding thereof, as far as he might perceive by himself. For as for interpreters, he told me that neither his time would well serve him to read, and also he found so great sweetness in the text itself that he could not find in his heart
 15 to lose any time in the glosses. And as touching any difficulty, he said that he found by experience that the best and surest interpretation was to lay and confer<sup>190</sup> one text with another, which fail not among them well and sufficiently to declare<sup>191</sup> them-
 20 selves. And this way he said that he used, which he found sufficient and surest. For so should it most surely tarry,<sup>192</sup> when it were found out and learned by a man’s own labor. And that, he said, every man was able enough to do with help of God, which<sup>193</sup>
 25 never faileth them that faithfully trust in his promise. And he hath promised that if we seek, we shall find, and if we knock, we shall have it opened to us.<sup>194</sup> And what shall be opened, but that book which, as Saint John saith in the Apocalypse is so
 30 shut with seven clasps that it cannot be opened but by the Lamb: that when he shutteth, then can no man open it, and when he openeth it, then can no man shut it.”<sup>195</sup>

Upon these words and other like, when I considered that your friend was studious of Scripture, and although I now have a very good opinion of him, nor at that time had not all the contrary—yet to be plain with you and him both, by reason that he set the matter so well and lustily<sup>196</sup> forward, 35 he put me somewhat in doubt whether he were (as young scholars be sometimes prone to new fantasies) fallen into Luther’s sect. And that ye peradventure<sup>197</sup> somewhat fearing the same, did of good mind the rather send him to me with such a message, for that<sup>198</sup> ye trusted he should be somewhat 40 answered and satisfied by me. I therefore thought it not meetly,<sup>199</sup> in so many matters and weighty, to make him an unadvised answer, but with good words welcoming him for the time (pretending lack of leisure for<sup>200</sup> other present business) required<sup>201</sup> 50 him to return on the morrow. Against<sup>202</sup> which time I would so order mine affairs that we would have conference together of all his errand at length. And he in this wise<sup>203</sup> being departed, I began to gather in mind the whole effect, as my remembrance would 55 serve me, of all that he had purposed. And because I would have it the more ready at mine eye, so that I might the more fully and effectually answer it, leaving no part untouched, in such order as he had purposed it—that is to wit,<sup>204</sup> after the manner that I 60 have above rehearsed<sup>205</sup>—I briefly committed it to writing.

THE SECOND CHAPTER

Here summarily is declared what order the author intendeth to treat of the matters purposed unto 65 him. Whereof, because the first was an opinion conceived in some men’s heads that a certain person late<sup>206</sup> abjured of heresy for preaching against pilgrimages and images and prayers made to saints was therein greatly wronged, the author briefly 70 declareth his mind concerning the confutation of those perilous and pernicious opinions.

On the morrow, when he was comen again somewhat before seven of the clock (for so I appointed him), taking him with me into my study—and my 75 servants warned that if any others should happen to desire to speak with me (certain except of whom I gave them knowledge), they should defer them till another leisure—I set him down with me at a little table. And then I showed unto him that, where<sup>207</sup>
 80 he had purposed on your behalf in short words many long things, whereof the rehearsal<sup>208</sup> were loss of time to him that so well knew them already, I would—all superfluous recapitulation set apart, as briefly as I conveniently could—show him my 85 mind in them all. And first begin where he began: at the abjuration<sup>209</sup> of the man he spoke of. Secondly would I touch the condemnation and burning of the New Testament translated by Tyndale.

187 learn 188 investigate; scrutinize
 189 meaning 190 lay and confer: compare 191 make clear 192 remain 193 who 194 See Mt 7:7–8. 195 Rv 3:7, 5:1–7

196 forcefully, energetically 197 perhaps 198 for that: because 199 proper 200 on account of 201 asked 202 In anticipation of 203 way 204 say

205 related 206 recently 207 whereas, given that 208 enumeration 209 formal renunciation on oath

Thirdly somewhat would I speak of Luther and his sect in general. Fourthly and finally, the thing that he touched last: that is to wit, the war and fighting against infidels, with the condemnation of heretics unto death, which two points himself had combined and knit together.

And first, as touching the matter of the man's abjuration, where it is reported that the spirituality<sup>210</sup> did him wrong, and for to make that seem likely, there is laid<sup>211</sup> in them displeasure, malice, and envy toward him, for preaching (as ye say, quoth I) against their vicious living, and in him is on the other side alleged much cunning,<sup>212</sup> virtue, and goodness. I will neither enter into the praise of them nor into the dispraise of him, wherein standeth nothing the effect<sup>213</sup> of this matter. For if there did, I would not pass over some part thereof so shortly.

"But now for this matter: although<sup>214</sup> the whole spirituality (wherein no man doubteth to be many a right virtuous and godly man) were in their living far worse than devils, yet if they did that man no wrong, there hath for this matter no man against them any cause to complain. And over<sup>215</sup> this, if that man were in all his other living as innocent as a saint, yet if he were infected and faulty in these heresies, he had then in this matter no wrong. And yet besides all this, if he not only were in all other things very virtuous, but also were in all these heresies (whereof he was detected<sup>216</sup>) utterly clean and faultless, yet if it were by sufficient witnesses (were they never so false in deed, seeming honest and likely to say true) proved in open court that he was faulty therein, albeit<sup>217</sup> in such case his witnesses had wronged him, yet had his judges done him but right. And therefore letting pass, as I say, the praise or dispraise of either his judges or him, as things impertinent to the point, I will show you that they not only did him no wrong, but also showed him in my mind the greatest favor, and used toward him the most charitable mercy that ever I wist<sup>218</sup> used to any man in such case.

"And first, as for any wrong that his judges did him, I marvel me much wherein they that report it could assign it. For if any were done him, it must needs have been in one of the two things: either in that he was untruly judged to have preached such articles as he was detected of, where he preached none such indeed; or else in that some such articles as he preached were judged and condemned for heresies where they were none indeed. Except that any man would say that though he were proved and convicted of heresy, yet he should have been put to no penance at all, or else to no such as he was. And of that point if any man so think, I shall speak in the Fourth Part, where we shall touch in general the order that the Church taketh in the condemnation of heretics. But as for the other points: first, if any priest wrote out of London into your country that any such article of his preaching was by his judges declared for heresy as were indeed good and not against the faith of Christ's Church, let him name what article. And either ye shall find that he shall name you such as the man was not charged withal,<sup>219</sup> or else shall ye find that such as he shall name you, were such indeed as yourself shall perceive for heresies at your ear.<sup>220</sup> For the articles wherewith he was charged were that we should do no worship to any images, nor pray to any saints, or go on pilgrimages, which things I suppose every good Christian man will agree for heresies. And therefore we shall let that point pass, and so resort to the second, to see whether it were well proved that he preached them or no."

"Sir," quoth your friend, "I would for my part well agree them for heresies, but yet have I heard some ere<sup>221</sup> this that would not do so. And therefore when we call them heresies, it were well done to tell why, since some men would — I ween<sup>222</sup> if they might be heard — stiffly say nay, which now hold their peace, and bear themselves full coldly that would take the matter more hot, save for burning of their lips."<sup>223</sup>

"Now forsooth,"<sup>224</sup> quoth I, "whosoever will say that these be no heresies, he shall not have me to dispute it, which have no cunning<sup>225</sup> in such matters, but as it best becometh a layman to do in all things, lean and cleave to the common faith and belief of Christ's Church. And thereby do I plainly know it for a heresy — if a heresy be a sect, and a side way (taken by any party of such as been baptized and bear the name of Christian men) from the common faith and belief of the whole Church besides. For this am I very sure and perceive it well — not only by experience of mine own time, and the places where myself hath been, with common report of other

210 clergy 211 alleged to be 212 learning 213 wherein . . . effect: which concerns not at all the substance 214 even if 215 beyond 216 accused 217 although 218 knew 219 with 220 at your ear:

as soon as you hear them 221 before

222 believe 223 save . . . lips: i.e., except that they would be burnt at the stake 224 truly, in truth 225 expertise

honest men from all other places of Christendom, but by books also, and remembrances, left of long time, with writing of the old holy fathers and now saints in heaven — that from the apostles' time hitherto,<sup>226</sup> this manner hath been used, taught, and allowed, and the contrary commonly condemned, through the whole flock of all good Christian people.

“And as touching such texts as these heretics allege against the worshipping of images, praying to saints, and going on pilgrimages — as they lay<sup>227</sup> the law given to the Jews, Non facies tibi sculptile (“Thou shalt carve thee none image”),<sup>228</sup> and the psalm In exitu Israel de Aegypto,<sup>229</sup> and Soli Deo honor et gloria (“Only to God be honor and glory”),<sup>230</sup> and Maledictus qui confidit in homine (“Accursed is he that putteth his trust in man”),<sup>231</sup> with many such other like, which heretics have of old ever barked against Christ’s Catholic Church — very sure am I that Saint Augustine, Saint Jerome, Saint Basil, Saint Gregory, with so many a godly cunning<sup>232</sup> man as hath been in Christ’s Church from the beginning hitherto, understood those texts as well as did those heretics: namely having as good wits, being far better learned, using in study more diligence, being a heap to a handful, and (which most is of all) having (as God by many miracles beareth witness) besides their learning, the light and clearness of his especial grace, by which they were inwardly taught of his only Spirit to perceive that the words spoken in the old law to the Jewish people, prone to idolatry — and yet not to all them neither, for the priests then had the images of the angel cherubim in the secret place of the Temple<sup>233</sup> — should have no place to forbid images among his Christian flock, where his pleasure would be to have the image of his blessed body hanging on his holy cross had<sup>234</sup> in honor and reverent remembrance, where he would vouchsafe<sup>235</sup> to send unto the king Abgar<sup>236</sup> the image of his own face, where he liked to leave the holy vernicle,<sup>237</sup> the express image also of his blessed visage, as a token to remain in honor among such as loved him from the time of his bitter Passion hitherto. Which,<sup>238</sup> as it was by the miracle of his blessed holy hand expressed<sup>239</sup> and left in the sudary,<sup>240</sup> so hath it been, by like miracle, in that thin, corruptible cloth kept and preserved uncorrupted this fifteen hundred years, fresh and well perceived, to the inward comfort, spiritual rejoicing, and great increase of fervor and devotion in the hearts of good Christian people. Christ also taught his holy evangelist Saint Luke to have another manner<sup>241</sup> mind toward images than have these heretics, when he put in his mind to counterfeit<sup>242</sup> and express in a table<sup>243</sup> the lovely visage of our blessed Lady, his mother.<sup>244</sup> He taught also Saint Amphibalus, the master and teacher of the holy first martyr of England, Saint Alban, to bear about and worship the crucifix. Who showed also Saint Alban himself, in a vision, the image of the crucifix, but God? Which thing wrought in that holy man so strongly, that he with few words of Saint Amphibalus, at the sight of that blessed image (which our Lord had before showed him in his sleep) was clean turned<sup>245</sup> to Christendom. And in the worshipping of the same image was taken and brought forth to judgment, and afterward to martyrdom.

“I would also fain wit,<sup>246</sup> whether these heretics will be content that the blessed name of Jesus be had in honor and reverence or not. If not, then need we no more to show what wretches they be, which dare despise that holy name that the devil trembleth to hear of.<sup>247</sup> And on the other side if they agree that the name of Jesus is to be revered and had in honor,<sup>248</sup> then since that name of Jesus is nothing else but a word, which, by writing or by voice, representeth unto the hearer the person of our Savior Christ, fain would I wit of these heretics — if they give honor to the name of our Lord, which name is but an image representing his person to man’s mind and imagination — why and with what reason can they despise a figure of him, carved or painted, which representeth him and his acts, far more plain and more expressly?”

“Sir,” quoth he, “as touching the cost done upon the Ark and the Temple and the priests’ apparel by the commandment of God, there is a proper book, and a very contemplative, written in English — and 226 until now 227 adduce; cite 228 Ex 20:4 229 “When Israel went forth from Egypt,” Ps 113(114):1 230 1 Tim 1:17 231 Jer 17:5 232 learned 233 See 1 Kgs 6:23–29. 234 held 235 be willing 236 King of Edessa, d. ca. AD 50.

The cloth portrait of Christ was called the Image of Edessa. 237 the handkerchief with which St. Veronica wiped the face of Jesus 238 This (vernicle) 239 imprinted 240 vernicle 241 kind of 242 portray 243 painting 244 Luke... mother: A picture of St. Mary ascribed to St. Luke hangs in the Basilica of St. Mary Major in Rome. 245 clean turned: completely converted 246 fain wit: gladly know 247 See Jas 2:19. 248 See Phil 2:9–11.

entitled The Image of Love<sup>249</sup> — which was made as it seemeth by some very virtuous man, contemplative and well-learned. In which book that reason of yours is not only well answered, but also turned 5 again<sup>250</sup> against you. For therein that good holy man layeth sore<sup>251</sup> against these carved and painted images, giving them little praise, and specially least commending such as be most costly, curiously,<sup>252</sup> and most workmanly wrought. And he showeth full well that images be but laymen's books, and therefore that religious men<sup>253</sup> and folk of more perfect life, and more instruct in spiritual wisdom, should let all such dead images pass, and labor only for the lively quick<sup>254</sup> image of love and charity. And very
 10 sore he speaketh there against all these costly ornaments<sup>255</sup> of the Church, whereof the money were (as he saith) better bestowed upon poor folk. And he showeth that the saints and holy doctors<sup>256</sup> of old time would suffer no such superfluity in the paraments<sup>257</sup> of the Church, but only see that they were clean and pure, and not costly. And therefore he saith that in their time they had treen<sup>258</sup> chalices and golden priests, and now have we golden chalices and treen priests.”

25 “Surely,” quoth I, “that book have I seen, whereof who was the maker, I know not. But the man might peradventure<sup>259</sup> mean well and run up so high in his contemplation spiritual that while he thought he sat in God almighty his<sup>260</sup> bosom up on high 30 in heaven, he contemned<sup>261</sup> and set at nought<sup>262</sup> all earthly things, and all temporal service done to God here beneath, among poor seely<sup>263</sup> men in earth. And verily<sup>264</sup> of his intent and purpose I will not much meddle. For a right good man may hap at a time, in a fervent<sup>265</sup> indiscreet, to say something, and write it too, which when he considereth after<sup>266</sup> more advisedly, he would be very fain<sup>267</sup> to change; but this dare I be bold to say: that his words go somewhat further than he is able to defend. For I doubt it not but that in the days of those holy saints, ornaments<sup>268</sup> in churches of Christ were not only pure and clean, but also very costly. And it might well be — and so have I read that it

hath been in some great dearth of corn and famine of people — that some good, holy bishops have relieved poor people with the sale of some of the vessels and plate<sup>269</sup> of the Church. But I suppose he shall never find (except in some such great, urgent cause chancing upon some occasion) that ever those holy men refused to have God served in his churches with the best and most precious of such metals as his goodness giveth unto man, of which it is very right and good reason that man serve him again with the best, and not do as Cain did: keep all that aught is<sup>270</sup> for himself, and serve his Master and his Maker with the worst.<sup>271</sup> And because he nameth Saint Ambrose,<sup>272</sup> I ween<sup>273</sup> there will no man doubt of the emperor Theodosius,<sup>274</sup> a man so devout unto God as he was, that he would be served himself in cups of gold, and suffer<sup>275</sup> his and our Savior Christ in the church of Milan — where himself resorted, and Saint Ambrose was bishop — to be served in chalices of tree.<sup>276</sup> Nor verily I can scant<sup>277</sup> believe that any Christian people, all were they very poor, would at this day suffer the precious blood 65 of our Lord to be consecrated and received in tree, where it should cleave to the chalice and sink in and not be clean<sup>278</sup> received out by the priest. But that word I ween he set in for the pleasure that he had in that proper comparison between treen chalices and golden priests of old, and now golden chalices and treen priests. But of truth I think he saith not truth — that the chalices were made of treen when the priests were made of gold — and shall find that then were, of old time, many more chalices made 75 of gold than he findeth now priests made of tree. If he look well in Platina's De vitis pontificum,<sup>279</sup> I ween he shall well perceive that Christ was served with silver and gold in the vessels, utensils, and ornaments of his Church, long time ere<sup>280</sup> Saint Ambrose was born, or the eldest of those old doctors that he speaketh of. And I dare make me bold to warrant that they themselves used not to say Mass in chalices of tree. And methinketh that the pleasure of God cannot in this point better appear than 80 by his own words written in Holy Scripture: as in

249 The Image of Love: published 1525
 250 back 251 severely 252 elaborately
 253 religious men: members of religious orders 254 living 255 furnishings used in worship 256 theologians
 257 decorations 258 wooden 259 perhaps 260 almighty his: almighty's 261 disdained, scorned 262 no value

263 pitiful; poor 264 truly 265 fervor
 266 afterwards 267 pleased 268 furnishings used in worship 269 utensils made of precious metals 270 ought is: is worth anything 271 See Gn 4:2–7; 1 Jn 3:12. 272 Bishop of Milan (339–97 AD)
 273 suppose 274 Emperor Theodosius I (347–95 AD), who established the Nicæan

Creed against the heresy of Arianism 275 allow 276 wood 277 scarcely 278 completely 279 Platina's... pontificum: Bartolomeo Platina (1421–81), Italian humanist, published his Lives of the Popes in 1479. 280 before the Ark of the Testament<sup>281</sup> and the ornaments of the priest, and the cost and riches<sup>282</sup> bestowed about the Temple of Solomon.”<sup>283</sup>

5 “Marry,”<sup>284</sup> quoth he, “that is the thing that is in the book of The Images of Love — as I was about to tell you — very well and clearly answered.”

“In what wise?”<sup>285</sup> quoth I.

10 “Marry,” quoth he, “for first, when the Ark was made, there were no poor men to bestow that riches upon, for while the children of Israel were in desert, they were fed with manna, and their clothes never wasted,<sup>286</sup> nor were the worse, in all that forty years.<sup>287</sup> And as for the riches of the Temple made by Solomon, could<sup>288</sup> make no matter to the people, 15 for there was then no poor folk neither. For as the very words of the Scripture showeth, there was in his days so great plenty of gold that ‘silver was not set by.’”<sup>289</sup>

20 “Forsooth,”<sup>290</sup> quoth I, “the man maketh a proper<sup>291</sup> answer for the Ark. But I would fain wit<sup>292</sup> of him: though there were no poor folk among them at the time of the making, was there never none among them after the time of the keeping? I ween he will not say nay. And then if there were — since God 25 would by his reason rather have commanded to give that gold to poor men if there had been such, than to make it in the Ark — he would by the same reason after, when there were such, have commanded then to break it again and give it them, rather than to 30 keep it in the Ark. And as for the riches bestowed upon the Temple of Solomon — where he said that there were then no poor men, because there were so great plenty of gold that ‘silver was not set by’: every man may well wit<sup>293</sup> that if every man had in 35 his time been rich, he had not had so many workmen. But weeneth<sup>294</sup> he that because there was in his days so much gold, that therefore all the people had enough thereof? I rather fear me that, because he was so rich, his people were the poorer. 40 For albeit<sup>295</sup> he had great gifts sent him, and also used not his own people, of the children of Israel, for bondmen and slaves, yet it is likely that he set great and sore impositions<sup>296</sup> upon them, whereby he gathered great riches, and they grew in great 45 poverty. And if any man think the contrary, let him then look after Solomon’s death, in the beginning of his son’s reign, whether all the people did not so sore complain thereof, that (because they could not get a promise of amendment as sad<sup>297</sup> men advised the king, but by the lewd<sup>298</sup> counsel of young lads 50 that then led the young king to folly were with a proud rigorous<sup>299</sup> answer put in fear of worse) of the twelve tribes of Israel, ten fell clearly from him, and left him no more but twain.<sup>300</sup> And therefore by the riches and royalty of the prince to prove that 55 there was no poor people in his royalme<sup>301</sup> is a very poor proof. For so may it hap that the prince may be most rich when his people be most poor, and the riches of the one causing the poverty of the other, if the people’s substance<sup>302</sup> be gathered into the 60 prince’s purse. And for conclusion it is little doubt but Solomon might have found poor folk enough to have given his gold unto that he bestowed upon the Temple of God. And therefore that answer answereth not well the matter.” 65

“Well,” quoth your friend, “yet hath that book one answer that assoileth<sup>303</sup> all the whole matter. For as it is said there, all those things that were used in the Old Law were but gross and carnal, and were all as a shadow of the law of Christ; and therefore the 70 worshipping of God with gold and silver and such other corporal things ought not to be used among Christian people, but leaving all that shadow, we should draw us to the spiritual things, and serve our Lord only in spirit and spiritual things. For so 75 he saith himself: that God as himself is spiritual, so seeketh he such worshippers as shall worship him “in spirit and in truth”<sup>304</sup> — that is, in faith, hope, and charity of heart — not in the hypocrisy and ostentation of outward observance, bodily service, 80 gay and costly ornaments, fair images, goodly song, fleshly fasting, and all the rabble of such unsavory ceremonies, all which are now gone as a shadow. And our Savior himself, whose faith is our justification,<sup>305</sup> calleth upon our soul, and our good 85 faithful mind, and setteth all those carnal things at nought.”<sup>306</sup>

“The book,” quoth I, “saith not fully so far as ye rehearse,<sup>307</sup> howbeit<sup>308</sup> indeed many other men do. But these men that make themselves so spiritual, 90

281 Covenant 282 wealth, riches 283 See Ex 25–28. 284 an exclamation, from “by Mary”; indeed 285 way 286 wore out 287 See Dt 8:2–4.
288 that could 289 set by: valued. See Ex

16:15; Dt 8:2–4; 1 Kgs 10:21. 290 Truly,
In truth 291 good, correct 292 fain wit: gladly know 293 say 294 thinks 295 although 296 sore impositions:
harsh taxes 297 sober, serious 298 bad

299 harsh 300 two. See 1 Kgs 12:4–20.
301 realm 302 wealth 303 resolves
304 Jn 4:24 305 See Rom 5:1–2.
306 setteth at nought: values as nothing
307 relate 308 although

God send grace that some evil spirit inspire not to their hearts a devilish device,<sup>309</sup> which under a cloak of special zeal to spiritual service, go first about to destroy all such devotion as ever hath hitherto showed itself, and uttered the good affection of the soul by good and holy works, unto God's honor wrought with the body. These men be comen into so high point of perfection that they pass all the good men that served God in old time. For as for that good godly man Moses, he thought that to pray not only in mind, but with mouth also, was a good way.<sup>310</sup> The good king David thought it pleasant to God not only to pray with his mouth, but also to sing and dance too, to God's honor, and blamed his foolish wife, which did at that time as these foolish heretics do now: mocking that bodily service.<sup>311</sup> Holy Saint John the Baptist not only baptized and preached, but also fasted, watched,<sup>312</sup> prayed, and wore hair.<sup>313</sup> Christ our Savior himself not only prayed in mind, but also with mouth<sup>314</sup> — which kind of prayer these holy spiritual heretics now call 'lip labor' in mockage. And the fasting which they set at nought,<sup>315</sup> our Savior himself set so much by that he continued it forty days together.<sup>316</sup> Now, as for the images, which ye call one of the shadows —

"Nay, by Saint Mary," quoth he, "I called gay ornaments<sup>317</sup> of the Church, and such other outward observances and bodily ceremonies, as The Image of Love calleth them; such things I called, as the book doth, 'shadows of the Old Law.' But as for images, the book adviseth men either clean let pass and leave off or (if we will needs have any) care not how simple it be made — for as well may the most rude<sup>318</sup> image, and most simply wrought, put us in mind<sup>319</sup> of Christ, and our Lady, and any other saint, as may the most costly and most curious<sup>320</sup> that any painter or carver can devise.

"And verily to say the truth, as for images they be no shadows of the old law, but things therein plainly and clearly forbidden, as well in diverse other places of Scripture as in the texts lately remembered by yourself: Non facies tibi sculptile ('Thou shalt carve thee, nor grave<sup>321</sup> thee, none image').<sup>322</sup> And by all the whole psalm In exitu Israel de

Aegypto<sup>323</sup> is it with great execration and malediction<sup>324</sup> prohibited."

"First," quoth I, "ye may not take those words for such a precise prohibition as should forbid utterly any images to be made; for as I showed you before, they had in the Temple the images of cherubim. But it was prohibited to make such images as the Egyptians and other paynims<sup>325</sup> did — that is to wit,<sup>326</sup> the idols of false gods — for that appeareth in the psalm itself, where he layeth for the cause of the prohibition, Quoniam omnes dii gentium daemonia; Dominus, autem, caelos fecit ('For all the gods of the paynims be devils; but our Lord hath made the heavens').<sup>327</sup> Doth it not by these words well appear what images were in that psalm forbidden: that is to wit, the images and idols only of those paynim gods? For else,<sup>328</sup> I pray you tell me what reason<sup>329</sup> were this, if one would say, 'Make none image of Christ, nor of our Lady, nor of any Christian saint in no wise;<sup>330</sup> for all the gods of the paynims be but devils'? Were not this a wise reason well concluded?

"There is also in these prohibitions intended that no man shall worship any image as God. For if he should, then should he fall in the contempt of the precept of God, by which we be commanded to worship only one God, and forbidden to worship any false gods. And therefore where it is written Non facies tibi sculptile ('Thou shalt grave thee none image'), it goeth next before, Non habebis deos alienos ('Thou shalt have no false gods').<sup>331</sup> And it is also written, Nolite converti ad idola, neque deos conflatiles faciatis vobis ('Turn not to idols, nor make not for yourselves any gods of metal cast in a mold').<sup>332</sup> And where it is forbidden to worship any image, there is the word that signifieth the honor and service<sup>333</sup> only pertaining to God. And therefore neither may we do any worship to any image and idol of any false paynim, nor with honor and service done as to God may we neither worship image of any saint, nor yet the saint itself. But I suppose neither Scripture nor natural reason doth forbid that a man may do some reverence to an image — not fixing his final intent in the image, but referring it further to the honor of the person that the image

309 scheme, contrivance 310 See Ex 15:1–18. 311 See 2 Sm 6:14–23. 312 kept vigils 313 a hair shirt; Mt 3:4 314 See Mt 6:9–13; Jn 17:1–26. 315 set at nought: value as nothing 316 See Lk 4:2. 317 gay ornaments:

showy furnishings 318 least skillfully made; roughest 319 remembrance 320 elaborate 321 engrave 322 Ex 20:4 323 "Israel went forth from Egypt," Ps 113(114):1 324 execration and malediction: condemnation and curse

325 pagans 326 say 327 Ps 95(96):5 328 otherwise 329 argument 330 way 331 Ex 20:3 332 Lv 19:4. See also Ex 34:17. 333 homage, worship representeth—since that in such reverence done unto the image, there is none honor withdrawn neither from God nor good man, but both the saint honored in his image, and God in his saint. When 5 a mean<sup>334</sup> man, an ambassador to a great king, hath much honor done him, to whom doth that honor redound—to the ambassador, or to the king?

“When a man at the receipt of his prince’s letter putteth off his cap and kisseth it, doth he this reverence to the paper, or to his prince?
 10

“In good faith, to say the truth, these heretics rather trifle than reason in this matter. For where they say that images be but laymen’s books, they cannot yet say nay but<sup>335</sup> that they be necessary if 15 they were but so. Howbeit, methinketh that they be good books both for laymen and for the learned, too. For as I somewhat said unto you before, all the words that be either written or spoken, be but images representing the things that the writer or 20 speaker conceiveth in his mind, likewise<sup>336</sup> as the figure of the thing framed with imagination and so conceived in the mind is but an image representing the very thing itself that a man thinketh on. As, for 25 example, if I tell you a tale of my good friend your master, the imagination that I have of him in my mind is not your master himself, but an image that representeth him. And when I name you him, his name is neither himself nor yet the figure of him—
 30 which figure is in mine imagination—but only an image representing to you the imagination of my mind. Now if I be too far from you to tell it you, then is the writing not the name itself, but an image representing the name. And yet all these names spoken, and all these words written, be no natural signs
 35 or images, but only made by consent and agreement of men to betoken and signify such things, whereas images painted, graven, or carved may be so well-wrought, and so near to the quick<sup>337</sup> and to the truth, that they shall naturally and much more effectually 40 represent the thing than shall the name either spoken or written. For he that never heard the name of your master shall, if ever he saw him, be brought in a right full remembrance of him by his image well-wrought and touched to the quick. And surely saving<sup>338</sup> that men cannot do it, else<sup>339</sup> if it might commodiously be done, there were not in this world so effectual writing as were to express all things in imagery. And now likewise as a book well-made and well-written better expresseth the matter than doth 50 a book made by a rude<sup>340</sup> man that cannot well tell his tale, and written with an evil hand,<sup>341</sup> so doth an image well workmanly wrought<sup>342</sup> better express the thing than doth a thing rudely made, but if<sup>343</sup> it move a man for some other special cause, as peradventure<sup>344</sup> for some great antiquity, or the great virtue

 55 of the workman, or for that God showeth at the place some special assistance of his favor and grace. But now as I began to say, since all names spoken or written be but images, if ye set aught by<sup>345</sup> the name of Jesus spoken or written, why should ye set nought<sup>346</sup> by his image painted or carven, that representeth his holy person to your remembrance, as much and more too, as doth his name written? Nor these two words Christus crucifixus do not so lively represent us the remembrance of his bitter Passion 60 as doth a blessed image of the crucifix—neither to layman nor unto a learned. And this perceive these heretics themselves well enough. Nor they speak not against images for any furtherance of devotion, but plainly for<sup>347</sup> a malicious mind, to diminish and 70 quench men’s devotions. For they see well enough that there is no man but if he love another, but he delighteth in his image or any thing of his. And these heretics that be so sore<sup>348</sup> against the images of God and his holy saints would be yet right<sup>349</sup> angry
 75 with him that would dishonestly<sup>350</sup> handle an image made in remembrance of one of themselves, where the wretches forbear not villainously to handle and cast dirt in despite<sup>351</sup> upon the holy crucifix—an image made in remembrance of our Savior himself—
 80 and not only of his most blessed Person, but also of his most bitter Passion.

“Now as touching prayer made unto the saints, and worship done unto them, much marvel is it what cause of malice these heretics have to them.
 85 We see it common in the wretched condition of this world, that one man of a pride in himself hath envy at another, or for displeasure done, beareth to some other malice and evil will. But this must needs be a devilish hatred: to hate him whom thou never 90 knewest, which<sup>352</sup> never did thee harm, which, if he could now do thee no good where he is, yet either

334 common, average 335 say nay but: deny 336 just 337 life-like quality 338 except 339 otherwise 340 uneducated 341 evil hand: bad handwriting

342 well workmanly wrought: very skillfully made 343 but if: unless 344 perhaps 345 set aught by: place any value on 346 no value 347 because of

348 strongly 349 very 350 disrespectfully 351 contempt 352 who

with his good example gone before thee, or his good doctrine left behind him, doth thee, but if<sup>353</sup> thou be very naught<sup>354</sup> of thyself, great good in this world for thy journey toward heaven. And this must needs
 5 be an envy coming of a high devilish pride, and far passing the envy of the devil himself, for he never envied but such as he saw and was conversant with, as when he saw man and the glory of God. But these heretics envy them whom they never saw nor never 10 shall see, but when they shall be sorry and ashamed in themselves of that glorious sight.

“For where they pretend the zeal of God’s honor himself—as though God, ‘to whom only all honor and glory is to be given,’<sup>355</sup> were dishonored in that 15 some honor is done to his holy saints—they be not so mad nor so childish as they make themselves.<sup>356</sup> For if all honor were so to be given only to God that we should give none to no creature, where were then God’s precept of honor to be given to our father and mother; to princes, governors, and rulers
 20 here in earth; and, as Saint Paul saith, every man to other?<sup>357</sup>

“And well they wor<sup>358</sup> that the Church worshippeth not saints as God, but as God’s good servants; and therefore the honor that is done to them re-25 roundeth principally to the honor of their Master, like<sup>359</sup> as in common custom of people we do reverence sometimes and make great cheer to some men for their master’s sake, whom else we would not haply<sup>360</sup> bid once ‘Good morrow.’
 30

“And surely if any benefit or alms done to one of Christ’s poor folk for his sake be, by his high goodness, reputed and accepted as done unto himself, and that whoso receiveth one of his apostles or disciples receiveth himself,<sup>361</sup> every wise man may well
 35 consider that in like wise, whoso doth honor his holy saints for his sake doth honor himself. Except these heretics ween<sup>362</sup> that God were as envious as they be themselves, and that he would be wroth<sup>363</sup> to have any honor done to any other, though it thereby redounded unto himself. Whereof our Savior Christ well declareth the contrary, for he showeth himself so well content that his holy saints shall be partners of his honor that he promiseth 40 his apostles that at the dreadful Doom<sup>364</sup>—when he shall come in his high majesty—they shall have their honorable seats, and sit with himself upon the judgment of the world.<sup>365</sup>

“Christ also promised that Saint Mary Magdalene should be worshipped through the world, and 50 have here an honorable remembrance for that<sup>366</sup> she bestowed that precious ointment upon his holy head.<sup>367</sup> Which thing, when I consider it, maketh me marvel of the madness of these heretics that bark against the old ancient customs of Christ’s
 55 Church, mocking the setting up of candles, and with foolish, facetious, and blasphemous mockery demand<sup>368</sup> whether God and his saints lack light, or whether it be night with them, that they cannot see without candle. They might as well ask what good 60 did that ointment to Christ’s head. But the heretics grudge at<sup>369</sup> the cost now, as their brother Judas did then,<sup>370</sup> and say it were better spent in alms upon poor folk. And this say many of them which can 65 neither find in their heart to spend upon the one nor the other. And some spend sometimes upon the one for none other intent, but to the end that they may the more boldly rebuke and rail against the other. But let them all by that example of that 70 holy woman, and by these words of our Savior, learn that God delighteth to see the fervent heat of the heart’s devotion boil out by the body, and to do him service with all such goods of fortune as God hath given a man.

“What riches devised our Lord God himself in 75 the making and garnishing of the Temple, and in the ornaments of the altar, and the priests’ apparel? What was himself the better for all this? What for the beasts that himself commanded to be offered him in sacrifice? What for the sweet odors and 80 frankincense?<sup>371</sup> Why do these heretics more mock at the manner of Christ’s Church than they do at the manner of the Jews’ synagogue, but if<sup>372</sup> they be better Jews than Christian men?

“If men will say that the money were better spent 85 among poor folk—by whom he more setteth,<sup>373</sup> being the quick<sup>374</sup> temples of the Holy Ghost,<sup>375</sup> made by his own hand, than by the temples of stone, made by the hand of man—this would be percase<sup>376</sup> very true, if there were so little to do it with that we 90

353 but if: unless 354 wicked 355 See 1 Tim 1:17. 356 themselves to be 357 another. See Mk 7:10; 1 Pt 2:13–17; Rom 12:10. 358 know 359 just 360 perhaps 361 See Mt 25:34–40,

10:40–42. 362 suppose 363 very angry, stirred to wrath 364 Last Judgment 365 See Mt 19:28. 366 for that: because 367 See Mt 26:13. 368 ask 369 grudge at: complain about 370 See Jn 12:4.

371 See Ex 25–29. 372 but if: unless 373 values 374 living 375 See 1 Cor 3:16. 376 perhaps should be driven of necessity to leave the one undone. But God giveth enough for both, and giveth diverse men diverse kinds of devotion — and all to his pleasure. In which, as the apostle Paul saith, let every man for his part abound and be plenteous in that kind of virtue that the Spirit of God guideth him to,<sup>377</sup> and not to be of the foolish mind that Luther is, which wisheth, in a sermon of his, that he had in his hand all the pieces of the holy cross, and saith that if he so had, he would throw them there as<sup>378</sup> never sun should shine on them. And for what worshipful<sup>379</sup> reason would the wretch do such villainy to the cross of Christ? Because (as he saith) that there is so much gold now bestowed about the garnishing<sup>380</sup> of the pieces of the cross, that there is none left for poor folk. Is not this a high reason?<sup>381</sup> As though all the gold that is now bestowed about the pieces of the holy cross would not have failed to have been given to poor men if they had not been bestowed about the garnishing of the cross. And as though there were nothing lost but that is bestowed about Christ's cross.

“Take all the gold that is spent about<sup>382</sup> all the pieces of Christ's cross through Christendom. Albeit<sup>383</sup> many a good Christian prince, and other godly people, hath honorably garnished many pieces thereof, yet if all that gold were gathered together, it would appear a poor portion in comparison of the gold that is bestowed upon cups. What<sup>384</sup> speak we of cups? — in which the gold, albeit that it be not given to poor men, yet is it saved, and may be given in alms when men will, which they never will. How small a portion, ween<sup>385</sup> we, were the gold about all the pieces of Christ's cross, if it were compared with the gold that is quite cast away about the gilding of knives, swords, spurs, arras,<sup>386</sup> and painted cloths — and (as though these things could not consume gold fast enough) the gilding of posts and whole roofs, not only in the palaces of princes and great prelates, but also many right mean<sup>387</sup> men's houses! And yet among all these things could Luther spy no gold that grievously glittered in his bleared eyes but only about the Cross of Christ. For that gold, if it were thence<sup>388</sup> the wise man weeneth it would be straight given to poor men — and that where he daily seeth that such as have their purse full of gold give to the poor not one piece thereof, but if they give aught,<sup>389</sup> they ransack the bottom, among all the gold, to seek out here a halfpenny,<sup>390</sup> or in his country, a brass penny, whereof four make a farthing.<sup>391</sup> Such goodly causes find they that pretend holiness for the color of<sup>392</sup> their cloaked heresies.”

THE THIRD CHAPTER

The objections of the messenger made against praying to saints, worshipping of images, and going on pilgrimages, with the answer of the author unto the same. And incidentally is it by the messenger moved<sup>393</sup> that there should seem no necessity for Christian folk to resort to any churches, but that all were one to pray thence or there. And that opinion by the author answered and confuted.<sup>394</sup>

At this point your friend, desiring me that whatsoever he should say, I should not reckon it as spoken of his own opinion, but that he would partly show me what he had heard some others say therein, to the end that he might the better answer them with that<sup>395</sup> he should hear of me. This protestation and prefation<sup>396</sup> made, he said that albeit no good man would agree that it were well done to do unto saints or their images despite<sup>397</sup> or dishonor, yet to go in pilgrimages to them, or to pray to them, not only seemed in vain (considering that all they, if they can anything do, can yet do no more for us among them all than Christ can himself alone, that can do all; nor be not so ready at our hand to hear us — if they hear us at all — as Christ, that is everywhere; nor bear us half the love and longing to help us that doth our Savior, that died for us; whom, as Saint Paul saith, we have for advocate afore the Father),<sup>398</sup> but, over this, it seemeth to smell of idolatry when we go on pilgrimage to this place and that place, as though God were not like<sup>399</sup> strong, or not like present, in every place. But as the devils were of old, under the false name of “gods,” present and assistant<sup>400</sup> in the idols and mamnets<sup>401</sup> of the pagans, so would we make it seem that God and his saints

377 See Rom 12:6–8; 2 Cor 9:6–15.

378 where 379 honorable; pious

380 adorning 381 argument 382 on

383 Although 384 Why 385 think

386 tapestries 387 right mean: quite ordinary 388 not there 389 anything

390 here a halfpenny: In England, half-pennies were then made of silver. 391 a quarter of a penny 392 for the color of: as a pretext for 393 proposed 394 refuted

395 what 396 introductory statement

397 contempt 398 See 1 Jn 2:1. 399 as

400 ready to help 401 images of false gods

stood in this place and that place, bound to this post and that post, cut out and carved in images. For when we reckon ourselves to be better heard with our Lord in Kent than at Cambridge, at the north door of Paul's<sup>402</sup> than at the south door, at one image of our Lady than at another, is it not an evident token — and in manner<sup>403</sup> a plain proof — that we put our trust and confidence in the image itself, and not in God or our Lady, which<sup>404</sup> is as good in the one place as in the other, and the one image no more like her than the other, nor cause why she should favor the one before the other. But we blind people, instead of God and his holy saints themselves, cast our affections to the images themselves, and thereto make our prayers, thereto make our offerings, and ween these images were the very saints themselves, of whom our help and health should grow, putting our full trust in this place and that place, as necromancers put their trust in their circles, within which they think themselves sure against all the devils in hell, and ween if they were one inch without, that then the devil would pull them in pieces, but as for the circle he dare not, for his ears, once put over his nose.

“And men reckon that the clergy is glad to favor these ways, and to nourish this superstition under the name and color<sup>405</sup> of devotion, to the peril of the people's souls, for the lucre and temporal advantage that themselves receive of the offerings.”

When I had heard him say what him liked, I demanded<sup>406</sup> if he minded ever to be priest, whereunto he answered: “Nay, verily;<sup>407</sup> for methinketh,” quoth he, “that there be priests too many already but if<sup>408</sup> they were better. And therefore when God shall send time I purpose,” he said, “to marry.”

“Well,” said I, “then since I am already married twice, and therefore never can be priest, and ye be so set in mind of marriage that ye never will be priest, we two be not the most meetly<sup>409</sup> to ponder what might be said in this matter for the priests' part.

“Howbeit,<sup>410</sup> when I consider it, methinketh surely that if the thing were such as ye say — so far from all frame<sup>411</sup> of right religion, and so perilous to men's souls — I cannot perceive why that the clergy would, for the gain they get thereby, suffer such abusion<sup>412</sup> to continue. For first, if it were true that no pilgrimage ought to be used, none image offered unto, nor worship done, nor prayer made unto any saint, then if none of all these things had ever been in ure,<sup>413</sup> or now were all undone — if that were the right way, as I wot<sup>414</sup> well it were wrong — then were it to me little question but Christian people, being in the true faith, and in the right way to Godward, would thereby nothing slake<sup>415</sup> their good minds toward the ministers of his Church, but their devotion should toward them more and more increase. So that if they now get by this way one penny, they should (if this be wrong and the other right) not fail, instead of a penny now, then to receive a groat.<sup>416</sup> And so should no lucre give them cause to favor this way and<sup>417</sup> it be wrong, while they could not fail to win more by the right.

“Moreover look me through Christendom, and I suppose ye shall find the fruit of those offerings a right<sup>418</sup> small part of the living of the clergy. And such as, though some few places would be glad to retain, yet the whole body might without any notable loss easily forbear.

“Let us consider our own country here, and we shall find of these pilgrimages far the most part in the hands of such religious persons, or such poor parishes, as bear no great rule in the convocations.<sup>419</sup> And besides this ye shall not find, I suppose, that any bishop in England hath the profit of one groat of any such offering within his diocese. Now standeth then the continuance or the breaking of this manner and custom, specially in them, which take no profit thereby. Which,<sup>420</sup> if they believed it to be (such as ye call it) superstitious and wicked, would never suffer it<sup>421</sup> continue to the perishing of men's souls, whereby themselves should destroy their own souls, and neither in body nor goods take any commodity.<sup>422</sup> And over this we see that the bishops and prelates themselves visit those holy places and pilgrimages with as large offerings, and as great cost in coming and going, as other people do, so that they not only take no temporal advantage thereof, but also bestow of their own therein.

“And surely I believe this devotion so planted by God's own hand in the hearts of the whole Church — that is to wit,<sup>423</sup> not the clergy only, but the whole congregation of all Christian people — that if the

402 Paul's: Old St. Paul's Cathedral 403 in manner: as it were 404 who 405 guise 406 asked (him) 407 truly 408 but if: unless 409 appropriate

410 However 411 established order
412 wrongdoing 413 customary use 414 know 415 nothing slake: not at all diminish 416 fourpence 417 if 418 very 419 provincial synods.

England had two: Canterbury and York.
420 Who 421 suffer it: allow it to 422 benefit 423 say

spirituality<sup>424</sup> were of the mind to leave it, yet would not the temporalty<sup>425</sup> suffer it.

“Nor if it so were that pilgrimages hanged only upon the covetise<sup>426</sup> of evil priests — for evil must they be that would for covetise help the people forward to idolatry — then would not good priests and good bishops have used them themselves. But I am very sure that many a holy bishop, and therewith excellently well-learned in Scripture and the law of God, have had high devotion thereto.

“For whereas ye say men reckon that it smelleth of idolatry to visit this place and that place — as though that God were more mighty, or more present in one place than in another, or that God or his saints had bounden themselves to stand at this image or that image, and that by men’s demeanor<sup>427</sup> thereby should appear that the pilgrims put their trust in the place or the image itself, taking that for very God, or for the very saint, of whom they seek for help, and so fare like necromancers that put their trust in their circle — surely, sir, holy Saint Augustine, in an epistle of his (which he wrote to the clergy and the people), taketh pilgrimages for a more earnest and a far more godly thing. And saith that though the cause be to us unknown why God doth in some place miracles, and in some place none, yet is it no doubt but he so doth. And therein had that good holy doctor so great confidence, that as he saith himself, he sent two of his priests in pilgrimage, for the trial of the truth of a great matter in contention and debate between them, out of Hippo in Africa unto Saint Stephen’s Church in Milan — where many miracles were wont to be showed — to the end that God might there, by some means, cause the truth to be declared and made open by his power, which by no means known to man he could well find out.<sup>428</sup>

“Nor they that go on pilgrimage do nothing like to those necromancers to whom ye resemble<sup>429</sup> them, that put their confidence in the roundel<sup>430</sup> and circle on the ground, for a special belief that they have in the compass of that ground, by reason of foolish characts<sup>431</sup> and figures about it, with invocations of evil spirits and familiarity with devils, being enemies to God, and the craft and ways of all that work by God himself prohibited and forbidden,

and that upon the pain of death.<sup>432</sup> What likeness hath that unto the going of good men unto holy places, not by enchantment dedicated to the devil, but by God’s holy ordinance, with his holy words consecrated unto himself? Which two things if ye would resemble together, so might ye blaspheme and have in derision all the devout rites and ceremonies of the Church, both in the divine service (as incensing, hallowing<sup>433</sup> of the fire, of the font, of the paschal lamb) and over that the exorcisms, benedictions, and holy strange<sup>434</sup> gestures used in consecration or ministration of the blessed sacraments, all which holy things — great part whereof was from hand to hand left in the Church from the time of Christ’s apostles, and by them left unto us, as it was by God taught unto them — men might now, by that means, follily<sup>435</sup> misliken unto the superstitious demeanor and fond<sup>436</sup> fashion of jugglery.<sup>437</sup> Nor the flock of Christ is not so foolish as those heretics bear them in hand:<sup>438</sup> that whereas there is no dog so mad but he knoweth a very cony<sup>439</sup> from a cony carved and painted, Christian people that have reason in their heads, and thereto<sup>440</sup> the light of faith in their souls, should ween<sup>441</sup> that the images of our Lady were our Lady herself. Nay they be not, I trust, so mad, but they do reverence to the image for the honor of the person whom it representeth, as every man delighteth in the image and remembrance of his friend. And albeit that<sup>442</sup> every good Christian man hath a remembrance of Christ’s Passion in his mind, and conceiveth by devout meditation a form and fashion thereof in his heart, yet is there no man (I ween) so good, nor so well-learned, nor in meditation so well-accustomed, but that he findeth himself more moved to pity and compassion upon the beholding of the holy crucifix than when he lacketh it. And if there be any that for the maintenance of his opinion will peradventure<sup>443</sup> say that he findeth it otherwise in himself, he should give me cause to fear that he hath, of Christ’s Passion, neither the one way nor the other but a very faint feeling, since that the holy fathers before us did, and all devout people about us do, find and feel in themselves the contrary.

“Now for the reason<sup>444</sup> that you allege,” quoth I, “where ye say that in resorting to this place and that place, this image and that image, we seem to reckon

424 clergy 425 laity 426 greed
427 behavior 428 See PL 33: 267–72.
429 liken 430 ring; circle 431 magical symbols 432 See Jer 27:9; Ex 22:18.

433 blessing 434 unfamiliar, unusual 435 foolishly 436 foolish 437 magic 438 bear them in band: make them out to be 439 rabbit 440 in addition to that 441 think 442 albeit that: although 443 perhaps 444 argument

as though God were not in every place like mighty, or not like present, this reason proceedeth no more against pilgrimages than against all the churches in Christendom. For God is as mighty in the stable 5 as in the temple. And as he is not comprehensible nor circumscribed nowhere, so is he present everywhere. But this letteth<sup>445</sup> not heaven, be it a corporal thing or not, to be the place of a special manner and kind of his presence, in which it liketh him
 10 to show his glorious majesty to his blessed heavenly company, which he showeth not unto damned wretches in hell; and yet is he never thence.<sup>446</sup> So liked it his goodness to go with his chosen people through the desert in the cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night;<sup>447</sup> yet was he not bounden, as ye resemble<sup>448</sup> it, like the damned spirits to the old idols of the paynims.<sup>449</sup>

“It liked him also to choose the Ark that was carried with his people; at<sup>450</sup> which Ark specially, by 20 miracle, he diverse times declared<sup>451</sup> his especial assistance, the Ark being translated<sup>452</sup> from place to place.<sup>453</sup>

“Was it not also his pleasure to be specially present in his temple of Jerusalem, till he suffered<sup>454</sup> it to be destroyed for their sin? And instead of that one 25 place of prayer (to which he would<sup>455</sup> before that all his people should come), he hath vouchsafed to spread himself abroad into many temples, and in more acceptable wise to be worshipped in many 30 temples throughout his Christian flock.”

Here said your friend, that the temple of Christ is (as Saint Paul saith) man’s heart,<sup>456</sup> and that God is not included<sup>457</sup> nor shut in any place. And so himself said to the woman of Samaria that very worshippers should worship in spirit, and in truth, not 35 in the hill<sup>458</sup> or in Jerusalem, or any other temple of stone.<sup>459</sup>

Whereunto I showed him that I would well agree that no temple of stone was unto God so pleasant 40 as the temple of man’s heart, but yet that nothing letteth<sup>460</sup> or withstandeth but that God will<sup>461</sup> that his Christian people have in sundry places, sundry temples and churches, to which they should, besides their private prayers, assemble solemnly, and resort

 45 in company to worship him together, such as dwell so near together that they may conveniently resort to one place.

“For albeit<sup>462</sup> our Savior said,” quoth I, “unto the woman of whom ye spoke, that the time should come in which they should neither worship God
 50 in that hill of Gerizim nor in Jerusalem neither—which places were after destroyed and desolate,<sup>463</sup> and the pagan manner of worshipping of the one, and the Jewish manner of worshipping in the other, turned both into the manner of worshipping of 55 Christian faith and religion—yet said he not to her that they should never after worship God in none other temple. But he said that the time should come, and then was comen already, when the very true worshippers should worship God in spirit and 60 truth.<sup>464</sup> And that, as God is a spiritual substance, so looked he for worshippers that should in such wise worship him. In which words our Savior reproveth all false worship as was used after<sup>465</sup> paganism in that hill in Samaria, and all such worship as 65 was done in any place with opinion that God might not be worshipped elsewhere. Those that so believe, they be such as bind God to a place, which<sup>466</sup> our Lord reproveth, showing that God may in heart truly and spiritually be worshipped everywhere.
 70 But this excludeth not that besides that, he will be worshipped in his holy temple, no more than when he gave counsel that for avoiding of vainglory, a man shall not stand and pray in the street to gather worldly praise, but rather secretly pray in his cham-
 75 ber.<sup>467</sup> This counsel forbade not the Jews, to whom he gave it, that they should never after come into the Temple and pray.

“And surely albeit that some good man here and there, one among ten thousand—as Saint Paul and 80 Saint Anthony,<sup>468</sup> and a few such other like—do live all heavenly, far out of all fleshly company, as far from all occasion of worldly wretchedness as from the common temple or parish church; yet if churches and congregations of Christian people resorting together to God’s service were once
 85

445 prevents 446 not there 447 See Ps 77(78):14; Ex 13:21–22; Nm 14:14; Dt 1:33; Neh 9:12, 19. 448 interpret 449 pagans 450 about 451 made manifest 452 transported 453 See Jo 3:14–17; 1 Kgs (1 Sm) 4–6. 454 allowed 455 wanted 456 See 1 Cor 3:16.

457 enclosed 458 in the hill: on the mountain (Mt. Gerizim) 459 See Jn 4:21, 23. 460 prevents 461 wants 462 although 463 which... desolate: Gerizim was destroyed by the Jews in AD 65; the Temple in Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans in AD 79. 464 See

Jn 4:24. 465 used after: practiced in the manner of 466 whom 467 See Mt 6:5–6. 468 Saint Paul and Saint Anthony: St. Paul the Hermit (ca. 228–343) and St. Anthony of the Desert (ca. 251–356), ascetics of Egypt abolished and put away, we were like<sup>469</sup> to have few good temples of God in men's souls, but all would within a while wear away clean and clearly<sup>470</sup> fall to naught.<sup>471</sup> And this prove we by experience: that those which be the best temples of God in their souls, they most use<sup>472</sup> to come to the temple of stone. And those that least come, there be well known for very ribalds and unthrifths,<sup>473</sup> and openly perceived for temples of the devil. And this not in our days only, but so hath been from Christ's days hither.<sup>474</sup> I trow<sup>475</sup> no man doubteth but that Christ's apostles were holy temples of God in their souls, and as well understood the words of their Master, spoken to the woman of Samaria, as the thing which their Master after told them himself, or else how could some of them have written that communication, which none of them heard, as appeareth by the Gospel?<sup>476</sup> But they — not in their Master's days only, but also after his resurrection and after that they had received the Holy Ghost, and were by him instructed of every truth belonging to the necessity of their salvation<sup>477</sup> — were not content only to pray secretly<sup>478</sup> by themselves in their chambers, but also resorted to the Temple to make their prayers. And in that place as a place pleasant to God did they pray "in spirit and in truth,"<sup>479</sup> as well appeareth in the book of Saint Luke written of the acts of Christ's holy apostles.<sup>480</sup> So that no doubt is there but that yet unto this day, and so forth to the world's end, it is and shall be pleasant unto God that his chosen people pray to him and call upon him in temple and church, whereof himself witnesseth with the prophet: Domus mea domus orationis vocabitur ('My house shall be called a house of prayer').<sup>481</sup>

"Now maketh your reason,<sup>482</sup> as I said, no more against pilgrimages than against every church. For as God is not bounden to the place, nor our confidence bounden to the place, but unto God (though we reckon our prayer more pleasant to God in the church than without, because his high goodness accepteth it so), in like wise do not we reckon our Lord bounden to the place or image where the pilgrimage is, though we worship God there because himself liketh so to have it."

THE FOURTH CHAPTER

The author declareth in the comprobation<sup>483</sup> of pilgrimages that it is the pleasure of God to be specially sought and worshipped in some one place before another. And albeit that<sup>484</sup> we cannot attain to the knowledge of the cause why God doth so, yet the author proveth by great authority that God by miracle testifieth it is so.

With this, your friend asked me what reason were there that God would set more by<sup>485</sup> one place than by another, or how know we that he so doth, namely if the one be a church as well as the other?

Whereunto I answered that why God would do it, I could make him no answer, no more than Saint Augustine saith that he could. I was never so near of his counsel, nor dare not be so bold to ask him. But that he so doth indeed that I am sure enough, yet not for that<sup>486</sup> he setteth more by that place for the soil and pavement of that place, but that his pleasure in some place is to show more his assistance, and to be more specially sought unto, than in some other.

Then he asked me whereby was I so sure of that, whereupon I demanded<sup>487</sup> him that if it so were that, the thing standing in debate and question, it would like our Lord to show a miracle for the proof of the one part, "Would ye not," quoth I, "reckon then the question were decided, and the doubt asoiled,<sup>488</sup> and that part sufficiently proved?"

"Yes, marry,"<sup>489</sup> quoth he, "that would I."

"Well," quoth I, "then is this matter out of doubt long ago; for God hath proved my part in diverse pilgrimages by the working of many more than a thousand miracles, one time and other. In the Gospel of John, the fifth chapter, where we read that the angel moved the water, and whoso next went in was cured of his disease<sup>490</sup> — was it not a sufficient proof that God would they should come thither for their health, albeit no man can tell why he sent the angel rather thither, and there did his miracles, than in another water? But whensoever our Lord hath in any place wrought a miracle — although he nothing do it for the place, but for the honor of that saint whom he will have honored in that place; or for the 469 likely 470 clean and clearly: entirely and completely 471 wickedness 472 are accustomed 473 ribalds and unthrifths: good-for-nothings and spend-thrifts 474 up until now 475 trust;

think 476 See Jn 4:8. 477 See Jn 16:13. 478 privately 479 Jn 4:23 480 See Acts 2:46–47. 481 Is 56:7; Mt 21:13; Mk 11:17 482 argument 483 argument in favor of something, using evidence 484 albeit that: although 485 set more by: value more 486 for that: because 487 asked 488 resolved 489 indeed 490 See Jn 5:4.

faith that he findeth with some that prayeth in that place; or for the increase of faith, which he findeth falling and decayed in that place, needing the show of some miracles for the reviving—whatsoever the cause be, yet I think the affection<sup>491</sup> is to be commended of men and women that with good devotion run thither, where they see or hear that our Lord showeth a demonstration of his special assistance. And when he showeth many in one place, it is a good token that he would be sought upon and worshipped there. Many Jews were there that came to Jerusalem to see the miracle that Christ had wrought upon Lazarus, as the Gospel rehearseth.<sup>492</sup> And surely we were worse than Jews if we would be so negligent that where God worketh miracles we list<sup>493</sup> not once go move our foot thitherward. We marvel much that God showeth no more miracles nowadays, when it is much more marvel that he doth vouchsafe<sup>494</sup> to show any at all among such unkind<sup>495</sup> slothful deadly people, as list not once lift up their heads to look thereon, or that our incredulity can suffer<sup>496</sup> him nowadays to work any.<sup>497</sup>

THE FIFTH CHAPTER

Because pilgrimages be, among other proofs, testified by miracles, the messenger doth make objection against those miracles, partly lest they be feigned and untrue, partly lest they be done by the devil if they be done at all.

Then said your friend, “Well I perceive then the force and effect of all the proof standeth all in miracles. Which I will agree to be a strong proof, if I saw them done, and were sure that God or good saints did them. But first since that men may, and haply<sup>498</sup> do, of miracles make many a lie, we must not prove this matter by the miracles, but if<sup>499</sup> we first prove that the miracles were true. And over this, if they were done indeed, yet, since the angel of darkness may transform and transfigure himself into an angel of light,<sup>500</sup> how shall we know whether the miracle were done by God, to the increase of Christian devotion, or done by the craft of the devil, to the advancement of misbelief and idolatry, in setting

men’s hearts upon stocks and stones<sup>501</sup> instead of saints—or upon saints themselves that are but creatures, instead of God himself?”

I answered him that the force of my tale was not the miracles, but the thing that I hold stronger than any miracles, which, as I said in the beginning, I reckon so sure and fast,<sup>502</sup> and therewith so plain and evident unto every Christian man, that it needeth none other proof. And that thing is, as I said afore, the faith of Christ’s Church, by the common consent whereof these matters be decided and well known: that the worship of saints and images been<sup>503</sup> allowed, approbated,<sup>504</sup> and accustomed for good, Christian, and meritorious virtues, and the contrary opinion not only reprov’d by many holy doctors,<sup>505</sup> but also condemned for heresies by sundry general councils.

“And this in the beginning I told you,” quoth I, “was and should be the force and strength of my tale; albeit<sup>506</sup> of truth I said unto you besides that methought that the miracles wrought by God were sufficient proof and authority therefor,<sup>507</sup> although<sup>508</sup> there were none other, which thing since ye seem to impugn,<sup>509</sup> I shall as I can make you answer thereunto.”

“Nay, sir,” said he, “I pray you take me not so, as though that I did impugn it, but as I showed you before, I rehearsed<sup>510</sup> you what I have heard some others say.”

“In good time,” quoth I. “Then because they be not here, I pray you defend and bear out<sup>511</sup> their part, with all that ye have heard them say; and set thereto also all that ever your own mind giveth you that they may more hereafter say, lest you return not fully furnished<sup>512</sup> for your purpose.”

THE SIXTH CHAPTER

Because the messenger thinketh that he may well mistrust and deny the miracles because reason and nature tell him that they cannot be done, therefore first the author showeth what unreasonableness would ensue if folk would stand so stiff against all credence to be given to any such thing as reason and nature should seem to gainsay.<sup>513</sup>

491 disposition; attitude 492 tells. See Jn 11:45. 493 wish to 494 readily agree 495 ungrateful 496 allow 497 See Mt 13:58. 498 perhaps 499 but if: unless

500 See 2 Cor 11:14–15. 501 stocks and stones: statues, idols from blocks of wood and stone 502 secure 503 officially approved 504

501 stocks and stones: statues, idols from blocks of wood and stone 502 secure 503 have been 505 theologians

506 although 507 for it 508 even if 509 dispute 510 told 511 bear out: be responsible for 512 equipped 513 contradict

“And first where ye say—”

“Nay,” quoth he, “where ‘they’ say.”

“Well,” quoth I, “so be it: where ‘they’ say. For here ever my tongue trippeth. But now therefore, first, 5 where they say that they never saw any of these miracles themselves, and therefore the miracles be no proof to them—which, while they never saw them, are not bounden to believe them, they seem either very negligent if they nothing inquire when they mistrust and doubt of the truth in such a weighty mat-10 ter, or if they have diligently made ensearch,<sup>514</sup> then must it needs be that they have heard of so many, told and rehearsed by the mouths and the writing of so good and credible persons that they seem unreasonably suspicious if they think altogether lies that 15 so many true men, or men like to be true, so faithfully do report. If these men were judges, few matters would take end at their hand—or at the least the plaintiff should have evil speed<sup>515</sup>—if they would 20 believe nothing but that<sup>516</sup> were proved, nor reckon nothing proved but that they see themselves.

“Thus may every man reckon himself unsure of his own father, if he believe no man, or because all the proof thereof standeth but upon one woman, 25 and that upon her which, though she can tell best, yet if it be wrong hath greatest cause to lie. Let the knowledge of the father alone, therefore, among our wives’ mysteries. And let us see, if we believe nothing but that we see ourselves, who can reckon 30 himself sure of his own mother; for possible it were that he were changed<sup>517</sup> in the cradle, and a rich man’s nurse bring home her own child for her master’s, and keep her master’s for her own, to make her own a gentleman good cheap.<sup>518</sup> And this were no 35 great mastery<sup>519</sup> while the mother hath of her own child no earmark.”

“Sir,” quoth your friend, “if I should answer them thus, and by these examples prove them that they were of reason bounden to believe such miracles 40 as were reported, because many credible men tell them—forasmuch as else<sup>520</sup> we should believe nothing but that we see ourselves, and then were all the world full of confusion, nor no judgment could be given but upon things done in the judge’s sight—I 45 should, I fear me, very feebly satisfy them. For they would soon say that the examples be nothing like the matter. But as it is reason that I should believe honest men in all such things as may be true, and wherein I see no cause why they should lie, so were it against all reason to believe men—be they never 50 so many, seem they never so credible—whereas reason and nature (of which twain<sup>521</sup> every one is alone more credible than they all) showeth me plainly that their tale is untrue, as it must needs, if the matter be impossible, as it is in all these miracles. And in 55 such case, though I can perceive no profit that they can receive thereby, yet when I well see that it could not be true, I must well see that it was not true. And thereby must I needs know that if they can take no profit by lying, they lie not for any covetise,<sup>522</sup> but 60 even only for their special pleasure.”

“Forsooth,”<sup>523</sup> quoth I, “this is right merrily answered. And to say the truth, as far as we be yet gone in the matter of these miracles, not much amiss, nor very far from the point. But since this thing is 65 much material,<sup>524</sup> as whereupon many great things do depend, we shall not so shortly shake it off, but we shall come one step or twain nearer to the matter. And first I will say to them that it were hard for them, and not very sure,<sup>525</sup> to believe that every man 70 lieth which telleth them a tale for true that reason and nature seemeth to show them to be false and impossible. For in this wise<sup>526</sup> shall they in many things err and clearly deceive themselves, and sometimes while they make themselves sure of the wrong 75 side if they would with wagers contend and strive therein, they should, upon the boldness of<sup>527</sup> nature and reason, lose all that ever they were able to lay<sup>528</sup> thereon. If there were a man of India<sup>529</sup> that never 80 came out of his country, nor never had seen any white man or woman in his life, and since he seeth innumerable people black, he might ween<sup>530</sup> that it were against the nature of man to be white. Now if he shall—because nature seemeth to show him 85 so—believe therefore that all the world lied if they would say the contrary, who were in the wrong: he that believeth his reason and nature, or they that against his persuasion of reason and nature shall tell him as it is of truth?”

Your friend answered that reason and nature told 90 not the man of India that all men should be black, but he believed so against reason and against nature; for he had nothing to lead him to it but because himself saw no white, which was no reason.

514 an investigation 515 outcome, success 516 what 517 exchanged 518 good cheap: at a cheap price 519 achievement

520 forasmuch as else: seeing that otherwise 521 two 522 greed 523 truly, in truth 524 much material: very pertinent

525 safe 526 way 527 upon the boldness of: in reliance on 528 bet 529 Ethiopia 530 suppose; think

And he might by nature perceive, if he had learning, that the heat maketh his country black. And that of like reason, the cold of other countries must make the people white.

5 “Well,” quoth I, “and yet he cometh to his persuasion by a syllogism and reasoning almost as formal as is the argument, by which ye prove the kind of man<sup>531</sup> reasonable, whereof what other collection<sup>532</sup> have you that brought you first to perceive it, than 10 that this man is reasonable, and this man, and this man, and this man, and so forth, all whom ye see? By example whereof, by them whom ye know, presuming thereby no man to be otherwise, ye conclude that every man is reasonable. And he thinketh
15 himself surer<sup>533</sup> in his argument than he thinketh you in yours. For he saw never other but black people, whereas ye see many men fools. As for that<sup>534</sup> he heareth of others that there be white men elsewhere, this serveth nothing for your purpose if ye 20 believe no witness against the thing that your reason and experience showeth you. And whereas ye say, if the man of India had learning he should perceive that it is not against nature, but rather consonant with nature that some other men should in 25 other countries be white, though all his countrymen be black — so peradventure<sup>535</sup> those whose part<sup>536</sup> ye do sustain, if they had some learning that they lack, should well perceive that of<sup>537</sup> reason they should give credence to credible persons, reporting them
30 things that seem far against reason because they be far above reason, whereof we may peradventure have more perceiving in our communication hereafter, ere<sup>538</sup> ever we finish that<sup>539</sup> we have in hand. But in the meanwhile, to show you further what necessity there is to believe other men in things not 35 only unknown, but also seeming impossible: the man of India that we speak of can by no learning know the course of the sun, whereby he should perceive the cause of his blackness, but if<sup>540</sup> it be by astronomy, which cunning<sup>541</sup> who can learn that nothing will believe that seemeth to himself impossible? Or who would not ween<sup>542</sup> it impossible but if experience had proved it that the whole earth hangeth in the air, and men walk foot against foot, and ships sail bottom against bottom — a thing so strange, and seeming so far against nature and reason, that 45 Lactantius, a man right wise and well-learned, in his work which he writeth, De divinis institutionibus, reckoneth it for impossible, and letteth<sup>543</sup> not to laugh at the philosophers for affirming of that 50 point,<sup>544</sup> which is yet now founden true by experience of them that have in less than two years sailed the world roundabout.<sup>545</sup> Who would ween it possible that glass were made of fern roots?<sup>546</sup> Now if 55 those that ween it impossible by reason, and never saw it done, believe no man that tell it them, albeit that<sup>547</sup> it be no peril to their soul, yet so much have they knowledge the less, and unreasonably stand in their error through the mistrusting of the truth.

“It is not yet fifty years ago since the first man, as 60 far as men have heard, came to London that ever parted the gilt from the silver, consuming shortly<sup>548</sup> the silver into dust with a very fair water.<sup>549</sup> In so far-forth<sup>550</sup> that when the finers<sup>551</sup> and goldsmiths of London heard first thereof, they nothing wondered 65 thereof, but laughed thereat as at an impossible lie, in which persuasions, if they had continued still, they had yet at this day lacked all that cunning.

“Yet will I not say nay but<sup>552</sup> that a man may be too light in belief,<sup>553</sup> and be by such examples 70 brought into belief too far, as a good fellow and friend of mine late,<sup>554</sup> in talking of this matter of marvels and miracles, intending merrily to make me believe for a truth a thing that could never be,
75 first brought in<sup>555</sup> what a force the fire hath that will make two pieces of iron able to be joined and cleave together, and with the help of the hammer be made both one, which no hammering could do without the fire; which thing, because I daily see, I assented.
80 Then said he further, that yet was more marvel that the fire shall make iron to run as silver or lead doth, and make it take a print.<sup>556</sup> Which thing I told him I had never seen, but because he said he had seen it, I thought it to be true. Soon after this, he would have
85 me to believe that he had seen a piece of silver — of two or three inches about, and in length less than a foot — drawn by man’s hand through strait<sup>557</sup> holes made in an<sup>558</sup> iron, till it was brought in thickness

531 the kind of man: mankind 532 line of reasoning 533 more certain 534 the fact that 535 perhaps 536 side of the argument 537 from 538 before 539 what 540 but if: unless 541 science 542 think 543 hesitates 544 See Divine Institutes 3.2.4 of Lactantius (ca.

250–325). 545 Magellan’s famous voyage departed Spain in September 1519 and returned in September 1522. 546 In Venice at this time, the alkali necessary for glass manufacturing was derived from native ferns. 547 albeit that: although 548 consuming shortly: reducing quickly

549 fair water: pure liquid (nitric acid) 550 In so far-forth: This was so (unreasonable) 551 refiners 552 say not but: deny 553 light in belief: credulous 554 lately, recently 555 up 556 make . . . print: allow it to be cast in a mold 557 narrow 558 a piece of not half an inch about, and in length drawn out I cannot tell how many yards. And when I heard him say that he saw this himself, then I wist<sup>559</sup> well he was merrily disposed.”

5 “Marry,<sup>560</sup> sir,” quoth your friend, “it was high time to give him over,<sup>561</sup> when he came to that!”

“Well,” said I, “what if I should tell you now that I had seen the same?”

10 “By my faith,” quoth he merrily, “I would believe it at leisure,<sup>562</sup> when I had seen the same; and in the meanwhile, I could not let<sup>563</sup> you to say your pleasure in your own house, but I would think that ye were disposed merrily to make me a fool.”

15 “Well,” said I, “what if there would—besides me—ten or twenty good honest men tell you the same tale, and that they had all seen the thing done themselves?”

“In faith,” quoth he, “since I am sent hither to believe you, I would in that point believe yourself alone, as well as them all.”

20 “Well,” quoth I, “ye mean ye would believe us all alike. But what would you then say if one or twain<sup>564</sup> of them would say more?”

25 “Marry,” quoth he, “then would I believe them less.”

30 “What if they would,” quoth I, “show you that they have seen that the piece of silver was overgilt,<sup>565</sup> and, the same piece being still drawn through the holes, the gilt not rubbed off, but still go forth in length with the silver, so that all the length of many yards was gilded of the gilding of the first piece not a foot long?”

35 “Surely, sir,” quoth he, “those twain that would tell me so much more, I would say were not so cunning<sup>566</sup> in the maintenance of a lie as was the pilgrim’s companion, which,<sup>567</sup> when his fellow had told at York that he had seen of late at London a bird that covered all Paul’s Churchyard<sup>568</sup> with his wings, coming to the same place on the morrow, said that he saw not that bird (but he heard much speech thereof), but he saw in Paul’s Churchyard an egg so great that ten men could scant move it with levers. This fellow could help it forth<sup>569</sup> with a proper sideways.<sup>570</sup> But he were no proper underpropper of a lie

45 that would diminish his credence with affirming all the first<sup>571</sup> and setting a louder<sup>572</sup> lie thereto.”

“Well,” said I, “then I have espied<sup>573</sup> if ten should tell you so ye would not believe them.”

“No,” quoth he, “not if twenty should.”

50 “What if a hundred would,” quoth I, “that seemed good and credible?”

“If they were,” quoth he, “ten thousand, they were worn<sup>574</sup> out of credence with me when they should tell me that they saw the thing that myself knoweth by nature and reason impossible. For when I know it could not be done, I know well that they lie all—

55 be they never so many—that say they saw it done.”
 “Well,” quoth I, “since I see well ye would not in this point believe a whole town, ye have put me to silence, that I dare not now be bold to tell you that I have seen it myself. But surely if witnesses would have served me, I ween<sup>575</sup> I might have brought you a great many good men that would say, and swear too, that they have seen it themselves. But now shall I provide me—tomorrow, peradventure<sup>576</sup>—a couple of witnesses, of whom I wot well<sup>577</sup> ye will mistrust neither nother.”<sup>578</sup>

60 “Who be they?” quoth he. “For it were hard to find whom<sup>579</sup> I could better trust than yourself, whom, whatsoever I have merrily said, I could not in good faith but believe, in that<sup>580</sup> you should tell me earnestly upon your own knowledge. But ye use,<sup>581</sup> my master saith, to look so sadly<sup>582</sup> when ye mean merrily,<sup>583</sup> that many times men doubt whether ye speak in sport, when ye mean good earnest.”

75 “In good faith,” quoth I, “I mean good earnest now; and yet, as well as ye dare trust me, I shall as I said—if ye will go with me—provide a couple of witnesses of whom ye will believe any one better than twain<sup>584</sup> of me; for they be your near friends, and ye have been better acquainted with them, and such as, I dare say for them, be not often wont to lie.”

“Who be they,” quoth he, “I pray you?”

80 “Marry,” quoth I, “your own two eyes. For I shall, if you will, bring you where ye shall see it, no further hence than even here in London. And as for iron and latten<sup>585</sup> to be so drawn in length, ye shall see it done in twenty shops almost in one street.”

559 knew 560 Indeed 561 give him over: be done with him 562 at leisure: after a while 563 prevent 564 two 565 covered with gilding 566 clever; knowledgeable 567 who 568 Paul’s Churchyard: the churchyard of Old

St. Paul’s Cathedral 569 along 570 proper sideways: apt change of judgment 571 i.e., first lie 572 more flagrant 573 discerned that 574 were worn: would have run 575 think 576 perhaps 577 know 578 neither nother: neither the one nor the other 579 anyone whom 580 that which 581 are accustomed 582 serious 583 jokingly 584 two 585 a metal similar to brass

“Marry, sir,” quoth he, “these witnesses indeed will not lie. As the poor man said by the priest — if I may be so homely to tell you a merry tale by the way?”

5 “A merry tale,” quoth I, “cometh never amiss to me.”

“The poor man,” quoth he, “had found the priest over-familiar with his wife; and because he spoke it abroad<sup>586</sup> and could not prove it, the priest sued him
10 before the bishop’s official<sup>587</sup> for defamation, where the poor man, upon pain of cursing,<sup>588</sup> was commanded that in his parish church, he should upon the Sunday, at High Mass time, stand up and say, ‘Mouth, thou liest!’ Whereupon, for fulfilling of his
15 penance, up was the poor soul set in a pew, that the people might wonder on<sup>589</sup> him, and hear what he said. And there, all aloud (when he had rehearsed<sup>590</sup> what he had reported by the priest) then he set his hands on his mouth, and said, ‘Mouth, mouth, thou
20 liest!’ And by and by<sup>591</sup> thereupon, he set his hand upon both his eyes and said, ‘But eyes, eyes,’ quoth he, ‘by the Mass, ye lie not a whit!’ And so, sir, indeed, and<sup>592</sup> ye bring me those witnesses, they will not lie a whit.

25 “Howbeit, sir, and though<sup>593</sup> this be true — as in good faith I believe and am sure that it is — yet am I never the more bounden by reason to believe them that would tell me a miracle. For though this thing be incredible to him that heareth it, and strange and 30 marvelous to him that seeth it, yet is it a thing that may be done. But he that telleth me a miracle, telleth me a thing that cannot be done.”

“I showed you,” quoth I, “this example to put you in mind that in being overhard of belief of things
35 that by reason and nature seem and appear impossible, where they be reported by credible witnesses having no cause to lie, there is as much peril of error as where men be too light of credence.<sup>594</sup> And thus much have I proved you onward:<sup>595</sup> that if ye 40 believe no man in such things as may not be, then must it follow that ye ought to believe no man in many things that may be; for all is one<sup>596</sup> to you, whether they may be or may not be, if it seem to you that they may not be. And of truth ye cannot tell 45 whether they may be or may not be, except<sup>597</sup> they be two such things as imply contradiction, as one self<sup>598</sup> thing in one self part to be both white and black at once. For else,<sup>599</sup> many things shall seem to you such as all reason will resist, and nature will in no wise<sup>600</sup> admit. And yet they shall be done well enough, and 50 be in some other place in common use and custom. But now, because all your shift<sup>601</sup> standeth in this — that of a miracle told you, ye may with reason believe that all men lie, because reason and nature, being more to be believed than all they, telleth you

55 that they say wrong, in that the thing reported for a miracle cannot be done — I have showed you that nature and reason doth show you that many things may not be done which yet indeed be done, so far-60 forth<sup>602</sup> that when ye see them done, ye may right well account them as miracles for anything that reason or nature can show you by what natural order and cause it could be done, but that ye shall still see 65 reason stand quite against it, as in the drawing of the silver or iron.”

THE SEVENTH CHAPTER

The author showeth that neither nature nor reason do deny the miracles to be true, nor do not gainsay<sup>603</sup> but that they may be well and easily done.

“Sir,” saith he, “yet hit we not the point, for albeit that<sup>604</sup> many things be well done, and by nature, in which neither my wit, nor haply<sup>605</sup> no man’s else, can attain so near to nature’s counsel that we can therein perceive her craft — but like as some rude<sup>606</sup> people
75 muse upon a clock that hath the spring (which is the cause of his<sup>607</sup> moving) secretly conveyed and closed<sup>608</sup> in the barrel,<sup>609</sup> so marvel we and wonder on her<sup>610</sup> work — yet always all those things differ
80 and be unlike to miracles. In that yourself will agree with me: that when I believe that reason and nature teacheth me surely that miracles be things that cannot be done, I am not in this deceived, though I may be in such other things deceived as seem im-
85 possible and yet may be done. And therefore as concerning miracles — in which yourself will agree that I am not (by any mistaking of reason and nature)

586 in public 587 the bishop’s official: i.e., the diocesan judge 588 excommunication 589 about 590 repeated 591 by and by: immediately 592 if 593 and though: even if 594 be too light of credence:

believe too readily 595 beyond that 596 the same 597 unless 598 same 599 otherwise 600 in no wise: by no means 601 contrived argument 602 so far-forth: to such an extent 603 deny; contradict 604 albeit that: although 605 perhaps 606 uneducated 607 the clock’s 608 enclosed 609 cylindrical case 610 Nature’s deceived—ye may not yourself (methinketh) say nay but<sup>611</sup> that I may well with reason believe them twain,<sup>612</sup> against all them that will tell me they have seen such things done, as yourself doth agree, that they twain (that is to wit,<sup>613</sup> nature and reason) doth verily and truly show me cannot be done.”

“What manner of things be those?” quoth I.

“Marry,<sup>614</sup> miracles,” quoth he, “such as yourself will agree to be done against nature.”

10 “Give us thereof,” quoth I, “some example.”

“As if men,” quoth he, “would now come tell me that at Our Lady of Rouncivalle<sup>615</sup> there were a dead child restored again to life.”

15 “Let that,” quoth I, “be one, and let another be that a bishop, in the building of his church, finding one beam cut a great deal too short for his work, drew it forth between another man and him four feet (and<sup>616</sup> ye will) longer than it was, and so made it serve.”

20 “Be it, by my troth,”<sup>617</sup> quoth he.

“Will we,” quoth I, “take for the third that a man was, by miracle in a Pater Noster while,<sup>618</sup> conveyed a mile off from one place to another?”

25 “Be it so,” quoth he. “Now they that should tell me,” quoth he, “that they had seen these three miracles—were I bound to believe them?”

30 “Whether ye were bounden,” quoth I, “or no, we shall see further after. But now why should ye not of reason trust them, if the men be credible, and earnestly report it, and peradventure<sup>619</sup> on their oaths depose<sup>620</sup> it, having no cause to feign it, nor likely to lie and be forsworn for nought?”<sup>621</sup>

35 “I will,” quoth he, “not believe them because that nature and reason are two records<sup>622</sup> more to be believed than all they that bear witness against them.”

“Why,” quoth I, “what doth reason and nature tell you?”

40 “They twain tell me,” quoth he, “that those three things cannot be done which those men say they saw done.”

“Wot<sup>623</sup> you well,” quoth I, “that reason and nature tell you so?”

“Yea marry,” quoth he, “that I wot well they do, and I think yourself will agree that they tell me so.”

45 “Nay, by Saint Mary, sir,” quoth I, “that will I not.

For I think that neither reason nor nature telleth you so, but rather both two tell you clean<sup>624</sup> the contrary: that is to wit,<sup>625</sup> that they both bear witness that those three things, and such other like, be things that may be well and easily done.”

50 “Yea?” quoth he. “Marry, this is another way. Then have we walked wrong a while, if ye prove that.”

“Methinketh,” quoth I, “nothing more easy to prove than that. For I pray you tell me,” quoth I, 55 “doth reason and nature show you that there is a God or not?”

“Faith showeth me that surely,” quoth he, “but whether nature and reason show it me or no, that I doubt, since great-reasoned men and philosophers have doubted thereof. And some of them have been plainly persuaded and in belief that there was none at all, and the whole people of the world, in effect, fallen from knowledge or belief of God into idolatry and worship of mamnets.”<sup>626</sup>

60 “Nay,” quoth I, “there is little doubt, I trow,<sup>627</sup> but that nature and reason giveth us good knowledge that there is a God. For albeit<sup>628</sup> the Gentiles worshipped among them a thousand false gods, yet all that proveth that there was and is in all men’s heads a secret consent<sup>629</sup> of nature, that God there is—or else they would have worshipped none at all. Now as for the philosophers, though a very few doubted, and one or twain thought there was none, yet as one swallow maketh not summer, so the folly of so few maketh no change of the matter, against all the whole number of the old philosophers. Which,<sup>630</sup> as Saint Paul confesseth, found out by nature and reason that there was a God—either Maker or Governor or both—of all this whole engine<sup>631</sup> of the world. The marvelous beauty and constant course whereof showeth well that it neither was made nor governed by chance.<sup>632</sup> But when they had by these visible things knowledge of his invisible majesty, then did they as we do: fall from the worship of him 85 to the worship of idols, as now do Christian men—not as heretics lay to the charge of good people in doing reverence to saints or honor to their images, but in doing as do those heretics themselves: making our belly or beneath our belly, or our goods, or 90

611 say nay but: deny 612 both 613 say 614 Indeed 615 Our... Rouncivalle: a shrine and hospital near Charing Cross 616 if 617 trustworthiness; faithfulness
618 a Pater Noster while: the time it takes to say an Our Father 619 perhaps 620 swear 621 be... nought: commit perjury for nothing 622 witnesses 623 Know 624 completely 625 say 626 statues of false gods 627 feel sure

628 although 629 agreement
630 Who 631 design 632 See Acts
17: 22–29; Rom 1: 19–20.

our own blind affection toward other creatures, or our own proud affection and dotage toward ourselves, our mammetts and idols and very false gods. But surely both nature and reason will declare and teach us that a God there is.”

“Well,” quoth he, “I will not stick<sup>633</sup> in this, since Saint Paul saith so.”

“Then,” quoth I, “if reason and nature show you that there is a God, doth not reason and nature show you also that he is almighty and may do what he will?”

“Yes,” quoth he, “that is both natural to his Godhead, and by reason it may well be perceived.”

“Then followeth it,” said I, “that reason and nature doth not show you that those three miracles (that we were agreed should stand for examples) precisely could not be done, but they taught you only that they could not be done by nature. But ye may, as ye now see, perceive that they themselves teach that they may be done by God, since they teach you that there is a God, and that he is almighty. And therefore when ye will in no wise<sup>634</sup> believe them that tell you they have seen such miracles done, ye refuse not to believe such things as cannot be done, but ye mistrust causeless the credence and faith<sup>635</sup> of honest men in the report of such things as, by him that they said did it, may well and easily be done.”

THE EIGHTH CHAPTER

The messenger allegeth that God may nothing do against the course of nature. Of which the author declareth the contrary, and over<sup>636</sup> that, showeth that our Lord in working of miracles doth nothing against nature.

“Sir,” quoth he, “ye come indeed somewhat near me now. But yet seemeth me that reason and nature teach me still that I shall in no wise believe them that tell me, they have seen such miracles done. For first, if ye will grant me that they teach me that, if they should be done, they must be done by God against the course of nature, so is it then that reason showeth me that God hath set all things, already from the first creation, to go forth in a certain order and course, which order and course men call nature, and that hath he of his infinite wisdom done so well, and provided that course to go forth in such a manner and fashion, that it cannot be mended. And therefore seemeth it that reason showeth me that God never will anything do against the course which his high wisdom, power, and goodness hath made so good that it could never be broken to the better. For if it might, then had our Lord not made his order and course perfect in the beginning. And therefore doth, as I say, reason and nature yet bear record<sup>637</sup> against them that shall say they see such miracles, since God will never work against the course of nature, which himself hath already set in so goodly an order that it were not possible to be better, and the goodness of God will make no change to the worse.”

“Surely,” quoth I, “ye go now very far wide.<sup>638</sup> For neither doth reason prove you that God (although it cannot otherwise be but that anything of the making of his goodness must needs be good) hath made therefore everything to be of sovereign perfection — for then must every creature be equal — nor also that the whole work of his creation, though it have in itself sufficient and right wonderful perfection, that therefore it is wrought to the utterest point of sovereign goodness that his almighty Majesty could have made it of. For since he wrought it not naturally but willingly, he wrought it not to the uttermost of his power, but with such degrees of goodness as his high pleasure liked to limit,<sup>639</sup> for else were his work of as infinite perfection as himself. And of such infinite, equal perfection was there by God brought forth nothing but only the two Persons of the Trinity: that is to wit,<sup>640</sup> the Son and the Holy Ghost. Of which two, the Son was first by the Father begotten, and after the Holy Ghost by the Father and the Son — ‘after,’ I say, in order of beginning, but not in time — produced and brought forth. And in this high generation and production did the doers work both willingly and naturally, and after the utterest perfection of themselves, which they did only therein and in none other thing. And therefore God might break up the whole world, if he would, and make a better by and by,<sup>641</sup> and not only change in the natural course of this world some things to the better. Howbeit,<sup>642</sup> God in working of miracles doth nothing against nature, but<sup>643</sup> some immediately 642 However 643 but for special benefit above nature. And he doth nought<sup>644</sup> against you that doth another a good turn which ye be not able to do. And therefore since God may do what he will, being almighty, and in doing of miracles he doth for the better, neither reason nor nature showeth you that they which<sup>645</sup> say they saw such miracles do tell you a thing that cannot be done, since ye have no reason to prove that God either cannot do it, or will not do it. For since he can do it, and it may be that he will do it, why should we mistrust good and honest men that say they saw him do it?"

633 persist 634 way 635 trustworthiness 636 in addition to 637 witness

638 astray 639 liked to limit: wished to allot 640 say 641 by and by:

THE NINTH CHAPTER

The author showeth that albeit men may mistrust some of the particular miracles, yet can there no reasonable man neither deny nor doubt but that many miracles hath there been done and wrought.

"Forsooth,"<sup>646</sup> quoth he, "and yet as for miracles, I were not for all this bounden to believe any. For I spoke never yet with any man that could tell me that ever he saw any."

"It may," quoth I, "fortune you to live so long that ye shall find no man that was by at your christening, nor when ye were bishoped<sup>647</sup> neither."

"Marry," quoth he, "for aught I wot,<sup>648</sup> I have lived so long already."

"Why doubt ye not then," quoth I, "whether ye were ever christened or not?"

"For every man," quoth he, "presumeth and believeth that I am christened, as a thing so commonly done that we reckon ourselves sure that no man leaveth it undone."

"If the common presumption," quoth I, "sufficiently serve you to set your mind in surety, then albeit miracles be nothing commonly and customably<sup>649</sup> done, nor that no presumption can sufficiently serve for the proof of this miracle or that, yet hath there ever from the beginning of the world—in every nation, Christian and heathen, and almost every town at sundry times—so many miracles and marvels been<sup>650</sup> wrought besides the common course of nature that I think through the world it is as well believed universally that miracles and marvels there be as anything is believed that men look upon. So that if common presumption serve you, ye may (as I said) as well believe that miracles be done as that yourself was ever christened. For I dare well say that there are a thousand that believe there hath been miracles done against one that<sup>651</sup> believeth that ye were ever christened—or ever wist<sup>652</sup> whether ye were born or not.

"Nor the doctors of Christ's Church did never mistrust the wonders and marvels that the paynims<sup>653</sup> tell and write to have been done by their false gods, but assigneth<sup>654</sup> them to have been done by the devil through God's sufferance,<sup>655</sup> for the illusion<sup>656</sup> of them that with idolatry had deserved to be deluded. And whether they be miracles—by which name we commonly call the wonders wrought by God—or marvels done by the devil, it forceth<sup>657</sup> not for this purpose of ours. For if ye grant that the devil may do any by God's sufferance, ye cannot say nay but<sup>658</sup> God may much more easily do them himself.

"And since ye be a Christian man and receive Scripture, I might in this matter," quoth I, "have choked<sup>659</sup> you long ago with the manifold miracles and marvels that be showed there."

THE TENTH CHAPTER

The author proveth that many things daily done by nature or craft,<sup>660</sup> whereof we nothing marvel at all, be more marvelous and more wonderful indeed than be the miracles that we most marvel of and repute most incredible.

"Nay," quoth he, "surely, though it hath done me good to hear what ye would say, yet I neither doubt, nor I suppose no good man else, but that God hath, beside the common course of nature, wrought many miracles.

"But yet of those that men tell of as done in your time—by which ye would it should<sup>661</sup> seem that it were well-proved that the praying to saints, going on pilgrimages, and worshipping of images were well and sufficiently proved, although<sup>662</sup> there were

644 nothing 645 they which: those who 646 In truth 647 confirmed 648 ought
I wot: all I know 649 customarily 650 have been 651 against one that: for everyone who 652 knew 653 pagans 654 account 655 allowing it 656 deluding 657 matters 658 say nay

but: deny that 659 silenced 660 skill

661 would it should: would have it; want it to 662 even though none other proof thereupon — of these miracles did I mean, in the report of which methinketh I need not believe a common fame of this miracle and that, begun by some seely<sup>663</sup> woman seeking Saint Zita when she sigheth for miscasting<sup>664</sup> of her keys.<sup>665</sup> Of these miracles I speak, and all such as men say nowadays be done at diverse pilgrimages by diverse saints or diverse images, in which methinketh that such as be told to be done, which nature and reason saith be impossible, I may well mistrust the tellers. Or else how many of them shall make me a sufficient proof of an impossible matter? One or two or three — either seemeth me too few to trust their credence in a thing so incredible. And if I shall not believe them till I find many records,<sup>666</sup> I ween I were fain<sup>667</sup> to wander the world about ere<sup>668</sup> I proved many miracles sufficiently, of such, I say, as ye prove your pilgrimages by.”

“Your few words,” quoth I, “have wrapped in them many things that seem somewhat as they be couched<sup>669</sup> together, which, when we see them unfolded, and consider each part asunder, then may we better examine them and better see whereof they serve.

“First ye speak of seeking<sup>670</sup> to saints for slight causes, as for the loss or miscasting of Kit’s keys.<sup>671</sup> Then ye would wit<sup>672</sup> how many ye must hear say they saw a miracle ere ye should of reason believe it. Thirdly, ye think ye were like<sup>673</sup> to go long ere ye should find any proved true. Finally, when ye say that ye mean only those miracles that men tell of as done at pilgrimages, ye seem to put still a difference between those miracles wrought in pilgrimages and such as are wrought by God otherwise. The cause whereof I must further ask you after, for I perceive not well what ye mean by that.

“But first, whereas ye speak still as though ye might mistrust them, were they never so many, because they tell you a thing that reason and nature saith is impossible — methinketh that ye should now change that word. For I have already proved that reason and nature say not that a miracle is impossible, but only that it is impossible to nature. And they confess both that miracles be possible to

God; and they that report them do report them for things done by God. And therefore they do report you none impossible tale.

“For the clearer consideration whereof, let us resort to the miracles which we were agreed should stand for examples. And first, if men should tell you that they saw, before an image of the crucifix, a dead man raised to life, ye would much marvel thereof, and so might ye well. Yet could I tell you somewhat<sup>674</sup> that I have seen myself that methinketh as great a marvel, but I have no lust<sup>675</sup> to tell you, because that ye be so circumspect and wary in belief of any miracles that ye would not believe it for me, but mistrust me for it.”

“Nay, sir,” quoth he, “in good faith, if a thing seemed me never so far unlikely, yet if ye would earnestly say that yourself have seen it, I neither would nor could mistrust it.”

“Well,” quoth I, “then ye make me the bolder to tell you. And yet will I tell you nothing but that I would, if need were, find you good witnesses to prove it.”

“It shall not need,<sup>676</sup> sir,” quoth he, “but I beseech you, let me hear it.”

“Forsooth,”<sup>677</sup> quoth I, “because we speak of a man raised from death to life. There was in the parish of Saint Stephen’s in Walbrook in London (where I dwelled before I came to Chelsea) a man and a woman — which are yet quick and queathing<sup>678</sup> — and young were they both. The eldest, I am sure, passed not twenty-four. It happed them, as doth among young folk, the one to cast the mind<sup>679</sup> to the other. And after many lets,<sup>680</sup> for the maiden’s mother was much against it, at last they came together and were married in Saint Stephen’s Church, which is not greatly famous for any miracles, but yet yearly, on Saint Stephen’s Day, it is somewhat sought unto and visited with folks’ devotion. But now short tale to make, this young woman (as manner is in brides, ye wot<sup>681</sup> well) was at night brought to bed with honest women. And then after that went the bridegroom to bed; and everybody went their ways, and left them twain<sup>682</sup> there alone. And the same night — yet abide,<sup>683</sup> let me not lie now, in faith, to 663 pitiable; foolish; helpless 664 misplacing 665 Saint Zita... keys: St. Zita (1212–72) is the patron saint of domestic servants, and traditionally her intercession is sought for lost keys. 666 many records: much evidence 667 ween I were fain:

think I would be obliged 668 before 669 concealed 670 going 671 Kit’s keys: Til K109; Whit K70. 672 would wit: want to know 673 likely 674 something 675 desire 676 It shall not need: That will not be necessary

677 In truth 678 quick and queathing: alive and able to talk 679 cast the mind: take a fancy 680 obstacles 681 know 682 both 683 wait a minute say the truth, I am not very sure of the time—but surely, as it appeared afterward, it was of likelihood the same night, or some other time soon after, except it happened a little afore.”

5 “No force for the time,”<sup>684</sup> quoth he.

“Truth,” quoth I, “and as for the matter, all the parish will testify for truth: the woman was known for so honest.<sup>685</sup> But for the conclusion, the seed of them twain turned in the woman’s body, first into blood, and after into shape of man-child. And then waxed quick,<sup>686</sup> and she great therewith. And was within the year delivered of a fair boy; and forsooth, it was not then (for I saw it myself) passing the length of a foot. And I am sure he is grown now 15 an inch longer than I.”

“How long is it ago?” quoth he.

“By my faith,” quoth I, “about twenty-one years.”

“Tush,” quoth he, “this is a worthy miracle!”

“In good faith,” quoth I, “never wist<sup>687</sup> I that any 20 man could tell that he had any other beginning. And methinketh that this is as great a miracle as the raising of a dead man.”

“If it seem so,” quoth he, “to you, then have you a marvelous seeming,<sup>688</sup> for I ween<sup>689</sup> it seemeth so 25 to no man else.”

“No?” quoth I. “Can ye tell what is the cause? None other surely but that the acquaintance and daily beholding taketh away the wondering, as we nothing wonder at the ebbing and flowing of the sea or the Thames because we daily see it. But he that had never seen it, nor heard thereof, would at the first sight wonder sore<sup>690</sup> thereat: to see that great water come wallowing up against the wind, keeping a common course to and fro, no cause perceived that driveth him. If a man born blind had suddenly his sight, what wonder would he make to see the sun, the moon, and the stars, whereas one that hath seen them sixteen years together marvelleth not so much of them all as he would wonder 40 at the first sight of a peacock’s tail. And very cause can I see none why we should of reason more marvel of the reviving of a dead man than of the breeding, bringing forth, and growing of a child unto the state of a man. No more marvelous is a cuckoo
45 than a cock, though the one be seen but in summer

and the other all the year. And I am sure if ye saw dead men as commonly called again<sup>691</sup> by miracle as ye see men brought forth by nature, ye would reckon it less marvel to bring the soul again into the body, keeping yet still his shape, and his organs
50 not much perished, than of a little seed to make all that gear<sup>692</sup> new, and make a new soul thereto.<sup>693</sup> Now if ye never had seen any gun in your days, nor heard of any before, if two men should tell you—the one that he had wist a man in a Pater Noster
55 while<sup>694</sup> conveyed and carried a mile off, from one place to another, by miracle, and the other should tell you that he had seen a stone more than a man’s weight carried more than a mile in as little space<sup>695</sup> by craft—which of these would you by your faith take for the more incredible?”

“Surely,” quoth he, “both twain were very strange. But yet I could not choose but think it were rather true that God did the one than that any craft of man could do the other.”
65

“Well,” quoth I, “let us then to our third example. If it were showed you that Saint Erkenwald<sup>696</sup> or his sister<sup>697</sup> drew out a piece of timber that was cut too short for the roof in making Barking Abbey,<sup>698</sup> should this be so incredible to you to believe—that they drew in length a piece of wood by the power and help of God’s hand—when we see daily a great piece of silver, brass, latten,<sup>699</sup> or iron drawn alength into small wire as wonderfully by man’s hand?” 70

THE ELEVENTH CHAPTER

The author showeth that a miracle is not to be mistrusted though it be done in a small matter and seemeth upon a slight occasion.
75

“Now, though ye would peradventure (as ye seem to do) reckon this cause very slight for God to show such a high miracle—since there might have been without miracle a longer piece of timber gotten, and so ye would haply mistrust it for the slender occasion, resembling<sup>700</sup> it to the miscasting<sup>701</sup> of some good housewife’s keys—God hath, I ween, so much wit of himself<sup>702</sup> that he needeth not our advice to inform him what thing were sufficient occasion to 80
85

684 No . . . time: No matter the time

685 so honest: such an honest person

686 waxed quick: became alive 687 knew

688 way of seeing 689 think, suppose

690 greatly 691 back 692 matter

693 as well 694 a Pater Noster while:

the time it takes to say an Our Father

695 time 696 Bishop of London, d. 693;

founder of Barking Abbey 697 St.

Ethelburga, first Abbess of Barking

698 Barking Abbey: a Benedictine convent near London 699 a metal similar to brass

700 likening 701 misplacing 702 wit of himself: sense of his own work his wonders for. But and if ye read in the books of Cassian,<sup>703</sup> Saint Gregory, Saint Augustine, Saint Jerome, and many other holy virtuous men, ye shall (except<sup>704</sup> ye believe them not) learn and know that 5 God hath for his servants done many a great miracle in very small matters. And so much the more are we bounden to his goodness in that he vouchsafeth<sup>705</sup> so familiarly in small things to show us so great a token of his mighty Godhead. And no reason were it

 10 to withdraw<sup>706</sup> his thank and honor because of his familiar goodness. And if ye peradventure would not believe their<sup>707</sup> writings, go to Christ's Gospel and look on his first miracle, whether he might not have provided for wine without miracle. But such 15 was his pleasure in a small matter to do a great miracle for some show of his Godhead among them whom he vouchsafed; where on the other side afore Herod, that would fain<sup>708</sup> have seen some miracle — where it stood upon his life, and might have delivered
 20 him from the Jews — yet would he not vouchsafe either to show the proud curious king one miracle, or speak one word.<sup>709</sup> So the times, places, and occasions, reason is that we suffer<sup>710</sup> to rest in his arbitrament,<sup>711</sup> and not look to prescribe and appoint at our pleasure where, when, and wherefore<sup>712</sup>
 25 God shall work his miracles, and else blaspheme them and say we will not believe them."

THE TWELFTH CHAPTER

The author somewhat noteth the froward<sup>713</sup> minds of many folk that would be very hard to believe a man in<sup>714</sup> a miracle upon his oath, and very light in a shrewd tale to believe a woman on her word.

"Now where ye require<sup>715</sup> how many witnesses should be requisite and suffice to make you think 35 yourself in reason, to have good cause to believe so strange a thing, methinketh that right few were sufficient of them that would say they saw a great good thing done by the power and goodness of God, except it be hard for us to believe, either that God is so 40 mighty that he may do it, or so good that he would do it.

"But because ye would wit of<sup>716</sup> me how many records<sup>717</sup> were requisite, that thing standeth not so much in number as in weight. Some twain be more credible than some ten. And albeit that I see not 45 greatly why I should mistrust anyone that seemeth honest and telleth a good tale of God in which there appeareth no special cause of lying,<sup>718</sup> yet if any witnesses will serve you, then would I wit of you: how many yourself would agree? For I now put case<sup>719</sup>
 50 that there came ten diverse honest men of good substance<sup>720</sup> out of ten diverse parts of the realm, each of them with an offering, at one pilgrimage (as for example at Our Lady of Ipswich), and each one of them affirming upon their oath a miracle done 55 upon themselves, in some great sudden help, well appearing to pass<sup>721</sup> the power of craft or nature. Would you not believe that among them all at the leastwise twain of those ten said true?"

"No, by our Lady," quoth he, "not and<sup>722</sup> there were ten and twenty."

"Why so?" quoth I.

"Marry," quoth he, "for were they never so many, having none other witness, but each man telling his tale for himself, they be but single all and less than 65 single. For every miracle hath but one record,<sup>723</sup> and yet he not credible in his own cause. And so never a miracle well proved."

"Well," said I, "I like well your wisdom: that ye be so circumspect that ye will nothing believe without 70 good, sufficient, and full proof.

"I put you then," quoth I, "another case: that ten young women not very specially known for good, but taken out at adventure,<sup>724</sup> dwelling all in one town, would report and tell that a friar of good fame, 75 hearing their confessions at a pardon,<sup>725</sup> would have given them all in a penance to let him lie with them. On your faith, would ye not believe that among so many, some of them said true?"

"Yes, that I would," quoth he, "by the Mary Mass<sup>726</sup> 80 believe they said true all ten — and durst<sup>727</sup> well swear for them and<sup>728</sup> they were but two."

"Why so?" quoth I. "They be as single witnesses as the others, of whom I told you before. For none of them can tell what was said to another, and yet
 85

703 St. John Cassian (360–435)

704 unless 705 is willing 706 withhold (from God) 707 the Church fathers'

708 gladly 709 See Jn 2:8–11; Lk

23:8–9. 710 allow 711 control

712 why 713 perverse 714 about

715 ask 716 would wit of: want to know from 717 witnesses 718 special cause of lying: particular reason to lie 719 put case: propose as a hypothetical instance (a customary legal practice) 720 wealth

721 surpass 722 (even) if 723 witness

724 random 725 a Church festival where indulgence is granted 726 Mary Mass: Mass in honor of Mary, mother of Jesus

727 would dare 728 if they be unsworn also; and therewith<sup>729</sup> be they but women, which<sup>730</sup> be more light and less to be regarded, dwelling all in one town also and thereby might they the more easily conspire a false tale.”

5 “They be,” quoth he, “witnesses good enough for such a matter, the thing is so likely of itself—that a friar will be womanish,<sup>731</sup> look the holy whoreson never so saintly.”

10 “Ye deny not,” quoth I, “but God may as easily do a good turn by miracle as any man may do an evil by nature.”

“That is true,” quoth he, “and he list.”<sup>732</sup>

15 “Well,” quoth I, “see now what a good way ye be in, that are of your own good godly mind, more ready to believe two simple women that a man will do naught,<sup>733</sup> than ten or twenty men that God will do good.”

THE THIRTEENTH CHAPTER

20 The author showeth the untoward<sup>734</sup> mind of many men, which<sup>735</sup> in miracles so highly touching the honor of God and weal<sup>736</sup> of their own souls, will neither believe other folk that tell them, nor themselves vouchsafe to go prove them.

25 “But since that this kind of proof will not suffice you, I dare say, if ye would seek and inquire, ye should find many done in your days in the presence of much people.”

“Where should I see that?” quoth he.

30 “Ye might,” quoth I, “upon Good Friday, every year this two hundred years (till within this five year that<sup>737</sup> the Turks have taken the town),<sup>738</sup> have seen one of the thorns that was in Christ’s crown bud and bring forth flowers in the service time,<sup>739</sup> if ye would have gone to the Rhodes.”

35 “So far?” quoth he. “Nay, yet had I liefer<sup>740</sup> have God’s blessing to believe that I see not, than go so far therefor.”

40 “I am well apaid,”<sup>741</sup> quoth I, “thereof, for if ye had liefer believe than take the pain<sup>742</sup> of a long pilgrimage, ye will never be so stiff in any opinion that ye will put yourself in jeopardy for pertinacy<sup>743</sup> and stubborn standing by your part.”

45 “Nay marry,”<sup>744</sup> quoth he, “I warrant<sup>745</sup> you that I will never be so mad to hold till it wax<sup>746</sup> too hot. For I have such a fond<sup>747</sup> fantasy of mine own, that I had liefer shiver and shake for cold in the mids of summer, than be burned in the midst of winter.”

50 “Merrily said,” quoth I. “But yet in earnest, where such a solemn yearly miracle is wrought, so wondrously in the face of the world, before so great a multitude, it is a great untowardness in a thing so highly touching the honor of God and health of our own soul, both to mistrust all them that say they have seen it, and either of sloth or incredulity, not vouchsafe himself to prove it.”

55 “If I should have gone,” quoth he, “and found it a lie, then had I walked a wise journey! And on the other side, if I should have seen there such a thing myself, yet could I scantily reckon myself sure.”

“No?” quoth I. “That were a strange case.”

60 “Not very strange,” quoth he. “For where ye speak of miracles done before a multitude, a man may be deceived therein right well.”

THE FOURTEENTH CHAPTER

65 The messenger maketh objection that miracles showed before a multitude may be feigned,<sup>748</sup> and by the author showed how the goodness of God bringeth shortly the truth of such falsehood to light (with examples thereof, one or two rehearsed);<sup>749</sup> and further showed that many miracles there be which no good Christian man may deny to be true.

70 “Some priest, to bring up<sup>750</sup> a pilgrimage in his parish, may devise some false fellow feigning himself to come seek a saint in his church, and there suddenly say that he hath gotten his sight. Then shall ye have the bells rung for a miracle, and the fond<sup>751</sup> folk of the country soon made fools. Then women coming thither with their candles. And the parson, buying of some lame beggar three or four pairs of their old crutches, with twelve pennies spent in men and 80 women of wax thrust through diverse places, some with arrows and some with rusty knives, will make his offerings for one seven-year<sup>752</sup> worth twice his tithes.”

729 additionally 730 who 731 having a great inclination for women 732 and he list: if he wishes or pleases 733 evil 734 perverse, obstinate 735 who 736 good; well-being 737 since

738 within . . . years: Rhodes fell to Suleiman the Magnificent in 1522. 739 in . . . time: during Mass 740 rather 741 pleased 742 trouble 743 perverse obstinacy 744 indeed 745 guarantee

746 grew 747 foolish 748 faked 749 related 750 bring up: attract 751 foolish; gullible 752 seven-year period

“This is,” quoth I, “very truth, that such things may be, and sometimes peradventure so be indeed. As I remember me that I have heard my father tell of a beggar that in King Henry his<sup>753</sup> days the Sixth came with his wife to Saint Alban’s, and there was walking about the town begging a<sup>754</sup> five or six days before the King’s coming thither, saying that he was born blind and never saw in his life, and was warned in his dream that he should come out of Berwick (where he said he had ever dwelled) to seek Saint Alban, and that he had been at his shrine, and had not been helped. And therefore he would go seek him at some other place, for he had heard some say since he came that Saint Alban’s body should be at Cologne, and indeed such a contention hath there been. But of truth as I am surely informed, he lieth here at Saint Alban’s, saving some relics of him which they there show shrined. But to tell you forth: when the King was comen, and the town full, suddenly this blind man at Saint Alban’s shrine had his sight again, and a miracle solemnly rung, and Tē Deum<sup>755</sup> sung, so that nothing was talked of in all the town but this miracle. So happened it then that Duke Humphrey of Gloucester — a great wise man and very well-learned — having great joy to see such a miracle, called the poor man unto him. And first showing himself joyous of God’s glory so showed in the getting of his sight, and exhorting him to meekness, and to none ascribing of any part the worship<sup>756</sup> to himself, nor to be proud of the people’s praise, which<sup>757</sup> would call him a good and a godly man thereby, at last he looked well upon his eyes, and asked whether he could never see nothing at all, in all his life before. And when as well his wife as himself affirmed fastly<sup>758</sup> no, then he looked advisedly upon<sup>759</sup> his eyes again, and said, ‘I believe you very well; for methinketh that ye cannot see well yet.’

“Yes, sir,” quoth he, ‘I thank God and his holy martyr, I can see now as well as any man.’

“Ye can?” quoth the Duke. ‘What color is my gown?’ Then anon<sup>760</sup> the beggar told him.

“What color,’ quoth he, ‘is this man’s gown?’ He told him also; and so forth, without any sticking, he told him the names of all the colors that could be showed him. And when my lord saw that, he bade him walk faitour,<sup>761</sup> and made him be set openly in the stocks. For though he could have seen suddenly, by miracle, the difference between diverse colors, yet could he not, by the sight, so suddenly tell the names of all these colors but if<sup>762</sup> he had known them before, no more than the names of all the men that he should suddenly see.”

“Lo, therefore I say,” quoth your friend, “who may be sure of such things, when such pageants be played before all the town? I remember me now what a work I have heard of that was at Leominster in the King’s father’s<sup>763</sup> days, where the prior brought privily<sup>764</sup> a strange wench into the church that said she was sent thither<sup>765</sup> by God, and would not lie out of the church. And after, she was grated within iron grates above in the rood loft,<sup>766</sup> where it was believed she lived without any meat<sup>767</sup> or drink — only by angels’ food. And diverse times she was houseled<sup>768</sup> in sight of the people with a host unconsecrated; and, all the people looking upon, there was a device with a small hair<sup>769</sup> that conveyed the host from the paten of the chalice out of the prior’s hands into her mouth, as though it came alone, so that all the people — not of the town only, but also of the country about — took her for a very quick<sup>770</sup> saint, and daily sought so thick to see her that many that could not come near to her, cried out aloud, ‘Holy maiden Elizabeth, help me!’ and were fain<sup>771</sup> to throw their offering over their fellows’ heads, for press.<sup>772</sup> Now lay the prior with holy maiden Elizabeth nightly in the rood loft till she was after taken out and tried in the keeping<sup>773</sup> by my lady the King’s mother. And by the longing for meat, with voidance of that<sup>774</sup> she had eaten (which had no saintly savor), she was perceived for no saint, and confessed all the matter.”

“In faith,” quoth I, “it had been great alms<sup>775</sup> the prior and she had been burned together at one stake. What came of the prior?”

Quoth he, “That can I not tell; but I ween he was put to such punishment as the poor nun was, that<sup>776</sup> had given her in penance to say this verse — Miserere

753 Henry his: Henry’s 754 about 755 Tē Deum: a traditional hymn of praise to God 756 the worship: (of) the honor 757 who 758 steadfastly 759 advisedly upon: intently at 760 immediately 761 bade him walk faitour: i.e., dismissed him as an impostor 762 but if: unless 763 the King’s father’s: i.e., Henry VII’s

764 secretly 765 there 766 rood loft: choir loft 767 food 768 given Communion 769 small hair: thin filament 770 living 771 obliged 772 for press:

because of the crowd 773 tried in the keeping: tested in confinement 774 that which 775 had been great alms: would have been a very good deed if 776 who

mei, Deus, quoniam conculcavit me homo<sup>777</sup> — with a great threat that and<sup>778</sup> she did so anymore, she should say the whole psalm. But as for holy Elizabeth, I heard say she lived and fared well, and was 5 a common harlot at Calais many a fair day after, where she laughed at the matter full merrily.”

“The more pity,” quoth I, “that she was so let pass.”

“That is truth,” quoth he. “But now what say 10 you? What trust can we have—or at least way, what surety can we have—in such things, when we see them feigned so shamefully in the face of the world, so openly, and so much people abused so far, that they would not have letted<sup>779</sup> to swear, and some to 15 jeopard<sup>780</sup> their lives thereon, that all this work was wrought by God’s own hand, till the truth came to light, and the drab<sup>781</sup> driven out of the church in the devil’s name?”

“Verily,”<sup>782</sup> said I, “there was abuson<sup>783</sup> in the one side and great folly in the other side. And as that noble duke Humphrey wisely found out the falsehood of that blyson<sup>784</sup> beggar, so did that noble lady the King’s mother prudently decipher,<sup>785</sup> and found out that beastly filth. And to say the 25 truth there was cause enough in both these parties, whereof the people might reasonably gather so much suspicion, that if they had made thereupon sufficient inquisition and search, they could never have been so far abused.<sup>786</sup> For both might 30 they well mistrust a beggar’s word, whom they had but newly known—and well likely to lie for to win first favor, and after money—and also men might well think that a young she-saint was not meetly<sup>787</sup> to be shrined quick<sup>788</sup> in a monastery among a meinie<sup>789</sup> of monks. And yet in conclusion, because no such feigned wonders should infame<sup>790</sup> God’s very miracles, his goodness shortly brought them both to knowledge. And so doth his especial cure<sup>791</sup> and providence bring ever shortly such falsehood and 35 fattery<sup>792</sup> to light, to their shame and confusion,<sup>793</sup> and, as he did in Bern (a great city in Almain)<sup>794</sup> bring to knowledge the false miracles whereby certain friars abused the people, for which they were openly<sup>795</sup> burned.<sup>796</sup> And so God always bringeth such false miracles to light.”

“Nay, nay,” quoth he, “there be many such, I warrant<sup>797</sup> you, that never come to light, and are still taken for very good.”

“Ye cannot very well warrant it,” quoth I. “For since God brought to light the false, feigned miracle of the priests of the idol Bel in the old time (as appeareth in the fourteenth chapter of the prophet Daniel), it is more likely that among Christian men he will suffer<sup>798</sup> no such things long lie hid. And also, how can ye warrant that many of those miracles be false? For while there is no doubt but<sup>799</sup> 55 many be true, and ye know not any which ye precisely know for false, ye be not sure whether any be such or not.”

“Marry,” quoth he, “that reason holdeth as well on the other side. For since I know not any which I precisely know for true, I know not whether any be true or not.”

“Nay,” quoth I, “that argument will not serve you so. For though no man bindeth you to believe that every thing is true that is told for a miracle, yet some there be of which ye must needs reckon yourself 65 sure, and of which ye cannot—if ye be a Christian man—have any scruple or doubt.”

“Yea?” quoth he. “Fain<sup>800</sup> would I wit<sup>801</sup> which 70 were one of those.”

“Marry,”<sup>802</sup> quoth I, “all that are written in the Gospel.”

“Marry,” quoth he, “that wor<sup>803</sup> I well; but them we speak not of, for they were done by God himself.”

“Why,”<sup>804</sup> quoth I, “be they not so all? If ye will not agree that ye be sure of any which be told by saints, what say you by<sup>805</sup> the miracles of the apostles written by Saint Luke?”<sup>806</sup>

“Nay,” quoth he, “ye mistake me yet,<sup>807</sup> for I do
80 not mean any mistrust in the miracles done of old time by God for his apostles or holy martyrs in corroboration and setting forth of the faith. I mean only these miracles that men tell and talk of nowadays to be done at those images where these pilgrims 85 are be, and where we see some of them ourselves

777 “Have mercy on me, God, for man has trampled me,” Ps 55(56):1 778 if 779 hesitated 780 jeopardize 781 whore (was) 782 Truly 783 deception 784 possibly More’s coinage combining bisson (blind) and blysne (shining, blushing) or

blissom (lustful) 785 discover, reveal 786 deceived 787 suitable 788 shrined quick: enshrined alive 789 bunch 790 defame, make infamous 791 care 792 fakery 793 confounding; overthrow 794 Germany (The inhabitants of Bern spoke German.) 795 publicly 796 Four

Dominicans were burned at the stake in Bern on May 31, 1509, for a similar deception. 797 guarantee 798 allow 799 that 800 Gladly 801 know 802 Indeed 803 know 804 Well 805 about 806 See Acts 2:22; 4:30; 6:8; 7:36; 14:3; 15:2. 807 still proved plainly false, and yet told for so true—and so many false shrews<sup>808</sup> to affirm it, so many simple souls trust it, so much foolish folk believe it—that a man may well with reason mistrust all the remnant.”

“Ye have,” quoth I, “more oft than once spoken of a difference between the miracles done by God in old time and these miracles that are done, or told to be done, nowadays at pilgrimages. But surely if ye grant the miracles done of old time, we need no more for the proof of all our matter. For I trow<sup>809</sup> that pilgrimages, and miracles done at them, be very old things, and not things newly begun nowadays, except<sup>810</sup> ye call a thousand years ago, or fourteen hundred years ago, ‘nowadays.’ For I am very sure that so long ago, and yet longer too, did good Christian people pray to saints, and go in pilgrimage to their holy relics, and had<sup>811</sup> images in great veneration; and many wonderful miracles did our Lord work for the comprobation<sup>812</sup> of his high pleasure, to the conservation and increase of the devotion of his Christian people therein, as we find largely written and reported in the godly books of holy Saint Gregory, Saint Augustine, Saint Jerome, Saint Eusebius,<sup>813</sup> Saint Basil, Saint Chrysostom, and many another old holy doctor of Christ’s Church whose books were not unwritten this thousand years. And whereas ye say that of miracles many be nowadays feigned, so may it be that some were then also, but neither then nor now neither, were—nor be—all feigned. And any being true, all were they right few,<sup>814</sup> sufficed for our purpose. For if God had but with one miracle declared that the thing contenteth and pleaseth him in his Church, it must needs suffice for the Church against all the heretics in the world that ever would bark against the Church therein. And therefore there can be no doubt in the matter, where God hath declared his pleasure by so many a thousand, and that in every time, not only nowadays, but also a thousand years, or fourteen hundred years, and yet more too before our days. And as for feigned miracles, of which ye speak so much, albeit that some such hath been, yet I verily think that, neither of old time nor now, Christ among Christian people suffereth<sup>815</sup> not such things to happen oft, nor such delusion to last long, but shortly (to their shame as it hath appeared in some) doth utter<sup>816</sup> and make open their falsehood, as himself said of all such: ‘That<sup>817</sup> ye whisper one in another’s ear shall be preached out aloud upon the ridge of the house roof.’”<sup>818</sup>

THE FIFTEENTH CHAPTER

The author showeth that if of<sup>819</sup> those miracles that are told and written to be done at diverse pilgrimages and commonly believed for very true, we certainly knew some falsely feigned, yet were that no cause to mistrust the remnant.

“But be it that among so many miracles as be daily told and written done at diverse pilgrimages, between which miracles and others why ye put a difference, we shall, as I said before, know further your mind hereafter. And be it also that of such as long have been reputed and still taken for true, yourself undoubtedly knew some for very false: Would ye therefore think that among all the remnant, there were never one true? What if ye find some fair woman painted, whose color ye had weened were natural? Will ye never after believe that any woman in the world hath a fair color of herself? If ye find some false flatterers that long seemed friendly, will ye take ever after all the world for such? If some prove stark hypocrites whom the world would have sworn for good and godly men, shall we therefore mistrust all others for their sake, and ween there were none good at all?”

“By my troth,”<sup>820</sup> quoth he, “I rode once in good company—and, to say the truth, for good company—to Walsingham in pilgrimage, where a good fellow’s horse so fell in halting<sup>821</sup> that he was fain<sup>822</sup> to hire another and let him go loose, which was so lean and so poor, and halted so sore,<sup>823</sup> that empty<sup>824</sup> as he was, he could scant keep foot<sup>825</sup> with us. And when we had went we should have left him behind, suddenly he spied a mare; and forth he limped on three legs so lustily<sup>826</sup> that his master’s horse with four feet could scant overtake him. But when he caught him and came again,<sup>827</sup> he swore in great anger all the oaths he might swear that he would trust ‘halting Sir Thomas’ the worse while he lived.”

808 scoundrels 809 trust 810 unless 811 held 812 approval 813 of Caesarea
(ca. 260–340) 814 all...few: even if they had been very few (they would have) 815 allows 816 reveal 817 That which; What 818 Lk 12:3 819 out of 820 truth, trustworthiness 821 fell in halting: started hobbling or limping

822 obliged 823 badly 824 unladen
825 scant keep foot: barely keep pace
826 vigorously 827 back

“What was that ‘halting Sir Thomas?’” quoth I.

“Marry,” quoth he, “their parish priest, as he told us, ‘as lean and as poor and as halting as his horse — and as holy too.’ But since he would, while he lived, mistrust the halting<sup>828</sup> priest for his halting horse, if I find a holy whoreson halt in hypocrisy, I shall not fail, while I live, to trust all his fellows the worse.”

“Well,” quoth I, “ye speak merrily, but I wot well ye will do better, whatsoever ye say. Nor, I am sure, though ye see some white sapphire or beryl so well counterfeited, and so set in a ring that a right good jeweler will take it for a diamond, yet will ye not doubt, for all that, but that there be in many other rings already set right diamonds indeed. Nor ye will not mistrust Saint Peter for Judas. Nor though the Jews were many so naughty<sup>829</sup> that they put Christ to death, yet ye be wiser, I wot well, than the gentlewoman was, which in talking once with my father, when she heard say that our Lady was a Jew, first could not believe it, but said, ‘What? Ye mock, iwis!<sup>830</sup> I pray you, tell truth.’ And when it was so fully affirmed that she at last believed it, ‘And was she<sup>831</sup> a Jew,’ quoth she, ‘so help me God and halidom,<sup>832</sup> I shall love her the worse while I live!’ I am sure ye will not do so, nor mistrust all for some, neither men nor miracles.”

THE SIXTEENTH CHAPTER

The author showeth that whoso<sup>833</sup> would inquire should soon find that at pilgrimages been<sup>834</sup> daily many great and undoubted miracles wrought and well known. And specially he speaketh of the great and open miracle showed at Our Lady of Ipswich of late upon the daughter of Sir Roger Wentworth, Knight.

“And as for the point that we spoke of concerning miracles done in our days at diverse images where these pilgrimages be, yet could I tell you some such done so openly, so far from all cause of suspicion, and thereto<sup>835</sup> testified in such sufficient wise, that he might seem almost mad that, hearing the whole matter, will mistrust the miracles. Among which I durst<sup>836</sup> boldly tell you, for one, the wonderful work of God that was within these few years wrought in the house of a right worshipful<sup>837</sup> knight, Sir Roger Wentworth, upon diverse of his children, and specially one of his daughters, a very fair young gentlewoman of twelve years of age, in marvelous manner vexed and tormented by our ghostly<sup>838</sup> enemy the devil, her mind alienated<sup>839</sup> and raving, with despising and blasphemy of God, and hatred of all hallowed<sup>840</sup> things, with knowledge and perceiving<sup>841</sup> of the hallowed from the unhallowed, all were she nothing warned thereof,<sup>842</sup> and after that, moved in her own mind, and admonished by the will of God, to go to Our Lady of Ipswich. In<sup>843</sup> the way of which pilgrimage, she prophesied and told many things done and said at the same time in other places which were proved true; and many things said, lying in her trance, of such wisdom and learning that right cunning<sup>844</sup> men highly marveled to hear of so young an unlearned maiden — when herself wist<sup>845</sup> not what she said — such things uttered and spoken as well-learned men might have missed with a long study; and finally, being brought and laid before the image of our blessed Lady, was there, in the sight of many worshipful people, so grievously tormented, and in face, eyes, look, and countenance so grisly changed, with her mouth drawn aside, and her eyes laid out upon her cheeks, that it was a terrible sight to behold.

“And after many marvelous things at the same time showed upon diverse persons by the devil, through God’s sufferance,<sup>846</sup> as well all the remnant as the maiden herself, in the presence of all the company, restored to their good state, perfectly cured and suddenly.

“And in this matter no pretext of begging, no suspicion of feigning, no possibility of counterfeiting, no simpleness<sup>847</sup> in the seers; her father and mother, right honorable and rich, sore abashed<sup>848</sup> to see such chances<sup>849</sup> in their children; the witnesses, great number, and many of great worship,<sup>850</sup> wisdom, and good experience; the maid herself too young to feign, and the fashion<sup>851</sup> itself too strange for any man to feign, and the end of the matter virtuous:

828 a pun on two archaic meanings: limping and deceiving 829 wicked 830 truly 831 And was she: If she was 832 all things holy 833 whoever 834 have been 835 in addition; also 836 dared

837 right worshipful: very distinguished 838 spiritual 839 estranged 840 blessed 841 distinguishing 842 all . . . thereof: although she had not been informed about them (i.e., not been told which was which) 843 Along 844 learned 845 knew 846 consent 847 gullibility; ignorance 848 sore abashed: greatly shamed 849 happenings 850 distinction 851 appearance the virgin so moved in her mind with the miracle that she forthwith,<sup>852</sup> for aught<sup>853</sup> her father could do, forsook the world and professed religion in a very good and godly company at the Minoress,<sup>854</sup> where she hath lived well and graciously ever since.”

THE SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER
The messenger layeth forth objections against miracles done at pilgrimages, of which he confesseth many to be true. But he layeth causes and reasons whereby he saith that many men be moved to believe and think that those miracles that be done there be done by the devil, to set our hearts upon idolatry by the worshipping of images instead of God.

“But now albeit, as I said, that I might allege<sup>855</sup> you this miracle, and prove it you in such wise that I wot well ye would be as far out of all doubt thereof as ye would be deep in the marvel of the miracle — and peradventure diverse others could I show you done of late at diverse pilgrimages, and prove them well, too — yet would I fain<sup>856</sup> first hear of you what distinction and difference is that that<sup>857</sup> ye make, and wherefore<sup>858</sup> ye make it, between the miracles done of old time and these that be nowadays done at these pilgrimages.”

“Sir,” quoth he, “somewhat a little I touched it in the beginning, and made in manner a glance thereat. But loath were I to hit it with a full shot and a sharp, as I have seen some with such reasons cleave the prick in twain,<sup>859</sup> that they seemed to bear over the butt<sup>860</sup> and all. Which reasons I would be loath in so sore<sup>861</sup> manner to allege,<sup>862</sup> lest I might haply<sup>863</sup> give you some occasion to think that either I set to somewhat<sup>864</sup> of mine own, or else at the leastwise, liked well that side and were a favorer of that faction.”

“Nay, nay,” quoth I, “fear not that hardily,<sup>865</sup> for neither am I so suspicious to mistrust that one thinketh evil because he defendeth the worse part<sup>866</sup> well by way of argument and reasoning. And also, I trust that all their shots shall be so far too feeble to bear over the butt, that few of them shall touch the mark — many too faint to pierce the paper. And some too high, and some too short. And some walk too wide of the butt by a bow.<sup>867</sup> And therefore I require<sup>868</sup> you spare not to bring forth all that ever ye have heard, or that ye think may be said, in the matter.”

“Sir,” quoth he, “since ye can hear it so indifferently,<sup>869</sup> I shall not spare to speak it. And surely to begin with: all that I think true, I will not fail to confess. For albeit that I have long sticked with<sup>870</sup> you to withstand any credence to be given to miracles done nowadays — in which I have much the longer sticked because of some, whom I have known ere this so far from the belief of any miracles at all that, in good faith, they put me half in doubt whether they believe that there were any God at all, if they durst for dread and shame have said all that they seemed to think, yet to say the truth I never heard anything said so sore<sup>871</sup> therein that ever moved me to think that any reason would bear the importune<sup>872</sup> mistrust of them, that among so many an open miracle as is daily in diverse places done, would ween that none at all were true. But verily, as I began a little to touch in the beginning, whether these miracles be made by God and for good saints, or by the devil for our deceit and delusion — albeit I believe, and ever will, as the Church doth — yet some men among<sup>873</sup> some such things say therein<sup>874</sup> that I am driven to do as I do in other articles of the faith: lean fast unto belief, for any reason that I find to make them answer with. For first, they take for a ground<sup>875</sup> that the devil may do miracles. Or if we list<sup>876</sup> not to suffer them called by that name, the matter shall be thereby nothing amended, for if we will have only called by the name of ‘miracles’ things by God done above nature, yet will we not deny but that God suffereth<sup>877</sup> the devil to work wonders which the people cannot discern from miracles. And therefore when they see them, ‘miracles’ shall they call them, and for miracles shall they take them. Now since it so is, that the devil may do such things, whereby shall we be sure that God doth them? And since the devil may do them, and we be

852 immediately 853 for aught: in spite of anything 854 a cloistered convent of the Poor Clares just outside London 855 cite 856 gladly 857 that that: that which 858 why 859 cleave . . . twain: split the target in two 860 bear . . . butt: knock over the support or stand on which the target is mounted 861 harsh (a) 862 argue 863 perhaps 864 to somewhat: forth something 865 by no means 866 worse part: bad side (of the debate) 867 walk . . . bow: miss the target by the length of a bow 868 ask that 869 impartially 870 sticked with:

persisted in arguing with 871 grievous 872 bear the importune: suffer the troublesome 873 now and then; occasionally 874 on that subject 875 basis 876 wish 877 allows not sure that God doth them, why may not we as well believe that the devil doth them?"

"Marry," said I, "ye told me that ye set nought by<sup>878</sup> logic, but now ye play the logician outright. Howbeit,<sup>879</sup> that argument men may turn on the other side and say that, since God may do them much better than the devil and we be not sure that the devil doth them, why should we not rather believe that God doth them, which<sup>880</sup> may do them better? And much more reason it is, where a wonderful work is wrought, there to ascribe it to God, the Master of all masteries,<sup>881</sup> rather than the devil, that can do nothing but by sufferance, except<sup>882</sup> we see some cause that cannot suffer that work to be reckoned God's."

"Well," quoth he, "then is it reason that we show you some such cause. It is," quoth he, "cause enough, in that we see that God hath in Scripture forbidden such imagery — and that under great malediction, as in the law which yourself spoke of before, Non facies tibi sculptile,<sup>883</sup> and in the psalm In exitu Israel de Aegypto,<sup>884</sup> where he first by the mouth of the prophet describeth the folly of such as worshippeth those images, that 'hath ears and cannot hear, hands and cannot feel, feet and cannot go, mouth and cannot speak.'<sup>885</sup> All which absurdities and unreasonable follies appeareth as well in the worship of our images as in the paynims<sup>886</sup> idols. And after, he showeth the maledictions that shall fall thereupon, saying, 'Like might they be to them all such as make them, and all such as putteth their trust in them.'<sup>887</sup> And forthwith he declareth in whom good men have their trust, and the profit that proceedeth thereupon, saying: Domus Israel speravit in Domino; adiutor eorum et protector eorum est ('The house of Israel hath put their trust in our Lord; the helper and defender of them is he').<sup>888</sup> Now when the words of God be clear, open and plain upon this side, what reason is it to believe the comments and glosses of men such as ye brought forth right now, wherewith ye would wind out<sup>889</sup> against the true texts of God? What, should we give credence to the example of men's doings against the plain commandment of God's writings? And when<sup>890</sup> that only Christ is our Savior and our mediator to bring our nature again<sup>891</sup> to God, and our only proctor and advocate<sup>892</sup> afore his Father,<sup>893</sup> and may help us best and will help us most, what<sup>894</sup> shall we make either our Lady or any other creature our advocate, or pray to them — which of likelihood hear us not? For there can none of them be present at so many places at once as they be called upon. And if they were, yet are they no nearer us than God himself, nor so fain<sup>895</sup> would that we did well as he that died for us. And therefore when we not only do them reverence (which I were content were done them, for God's sake, as ye said before), but also pray to them, we do Christ and God great injury. For if we pray to them as mediators and advocates for us, we take from Christ his office and give it them. If we ask help and health of them, then make we them plain gods, and betake<sup>896</sup> to them the power of the Godhead. For only God is it that giveth all good, as witnesseth Saint James: 'Every good and very perfect gift cometh from above, descending from the Father of lights.'<sup>897</sup> And surely if we consider how we behave us to them, though ye say that all the honor given to saints redoundeth unto God — since it is done, as ye say, not for their own sakes, but for his — yet would not I ween God be well content that we should for his sake do to any creature like honor as to himself. For Scripture saith that he will not give his glory from him, nor to any other creature like honor as to himself.<sup>898</sup> And therefore the schools, as I hear say, devise a treble<sup>899</sup> difference in worshipping, calling the one dulia, the reverence or worship that man doth to man, as the bondman to the lord; the second, hyperdulia, that a man doth to a more excellent creature, as to angels or saints; the third, latria, the veneration, honor, and adoration that creatures doth only to God. In which of these parts ye put the worshipping of images, I am neither so well seen<sup>900</sup> therein to tell nor so curious greatly to care. But this I see well: if any of all these three kinds of worship be better than other, the images hath it. For they have all that ever we can do. For what do we to God when we do worship him in that fashion that they call latria, but we do the same to saints and images both? If it stand<sup>901</sup> in kneeling, we kneel to

878 set nought by: value as nothing
879 However 880 who 881 great accomplishments 882 unless 883 "You shall not make for yourself a carved image." Ex 20:4 884 "When Israel went forth from Egypt," Ps 113(114):1

885 Ps 113:13–15 (115:5–7) 886 pagans'
887 Ps 113:16 (115:8) 888 Ps 113:17 (115:9) 889 wind out: circuitously argue
890 given 891 back 892 proctor and advocate: two words for a representative, attorney, or defender in court 893 See

1 Jn 2:1. 894 why 895 willingly 896 give; assign 897 Jas 1:17 898 See Is 42:8. 899 threefold 900 versed 901 consists saints and their images; if in praying, we pray as bitterly<sup>902</sup> to them as to God; if incensing and setting up of candles, we cense them also — and set some saint seven candles against God's one, so that whatsoever fashion of worshipping latria be, the same is as largely done to saints and images as to God. And this not unto images only — which though they have no life, have yet some shape and fashion after man — but, as men ween, unto pigs' bones also sometimes. For what reverent honor is there daily done, under the name and opinion of a saint's relic, to some old rotten bone that was haply<sup>903</sup> sometime, as Chaucer saith, a bone of some 'holy Jew's sheep'!<sup>904</sup> See we not that some one saint's head is showed in three places? And some one whole saint's body lieth in diverse countries, if we believe the lies of the people. And in both the places is the one body worshipped, where the one or the other is false, and one body mistaken for another — an evil man haply for a good. And yet will the priests of both places take offerings and toll<sup>905</sup> men thither with miracles too. In which case, either must ye say that the miracles of the one place be false and feigned, or else that miracles make not your matter good,<sup>906</sup> nor prove your pilgrimages true; and yet might all this gear<sup>907</sup> be much the better borne if it were true that ye defend the things withal, when ye say that in worshipping of saints and images, men worship neither the one nor the other as gods, but the images for the saints, and the saints for God. But now, as it seemeth, the matter is indeed far otherwise. For the people pray to the saints for their necessities, putting thereto trust for their petitions in the saints themselves, as though God gave it not, but they. And in the images put the people their trust instead of the saints themselves. For albeit that it might stand with reason (as ye have answered me) that presupposed the miracles in these pilgrimages to be done by God, the people might then with reason go seek and visit such places as God by miracle declared that he would have himself or his holy saints sought and honored in, yet now this answer toucheth the point but in part and matcheth not the whole matter. For the people do not only visit these places and there do all the worship to the saints that they can possibly do to God (with hope of their help from the saints themselves, which they should well wit<sup>908</sup> only to be given by God — and thus by this demeanor make the saints God's fellows — that is to say, the servants matches with their Master and the creatures mates<sup>909</sup> to the Maker), but also use themselves in as religious fashion, and as fervent affection, to the images of stone or tree,<sup>910</sup> as either to saint or God, and plainly take these images for the saints themselves and for God himself, and put in these images of their pilgrimages their full hope and whole trust that they should put in God.

“Which, besides that<sup>911</sup> I have said before, appeareth well in this: that they will make comparisons between Our Lady of Ipswich and Our Lady of Walsingham, as weening that one image more of power than the other, which they would never do but if<sup>912</sup> instead of our Lady they put their trust in the image itself. And the people, in speaking of our Lady, ‘Of all our Ladies,’ saith one, ‘I love best our Lady of Walsingham.’ And I,’ saith the other, ‘Our Lady of Ipswich.’ In which words, what meaneth she but her love and affection to the stock<sup>913</sup> that standeth in the chapel of Walsingham or Ipswich?

“What say you when the people speak of this fashion in their pains and perils: ‘Help, holy cross of Bradman!’ ‘Help, our dear Lady of Walsingham!’ Doth it not plainly appear that either they trust in the images in Christ's stead and our Lady's — letting Christ and our Lady go — or take at the leastwise those images so, that they ween they were verily the one Christ, the other our Lady herself? And so every way the faith and devotion withdrawn<sup>914</sup> from God that<sup>915</sup> should have it, and our hearts by these images blinded and set upon the dead stocks and stones. Now see the good fruit also that followeth thereupon. I let pass over the faitery<sup>916</sup> and falsehood that is therein used among<sup>917</sup> — sometimes by the priests, sometimes by beggars — in feigning of false miracles. Look what devotion men come thither with. With the most come they that most abuse themselves — such, I mean, as most trust have, and blind faith, in these blind images. But the most part that cometh, cometh for no devotion at all, but only for good company to babble thitherward<sup>918</sup> and drink<sup>919</sup> drunk there, and dance and reel homeward. And yet here is not all. For I tell you nothing

902 intensely, with strong emotion
903 perhaps 904 See the prologue to the Pardoner's Tale 347–51. 905 summon 906 make . . . good: do not substantiate your contention 907 matter, business 908 know 909 equals 910 wood 911 what 912 but if: unless 913 statue

914 are withdrawn 915 who 916 fraud

917 on occasion 918 on the way there 919 drink themselves

now of many a naughty<sup>920</sup> pack, many a fleck and his make,<sup>921</sup> that maketh their images meetings<sup>922</sup> at these wholesome hallowes.<sup>923</sup> And many that seemeth an honest housewife at home hath help of 5 a bawd<sup>924</sup> to bring her to mischief as she walketh abroad about her pilgrimages. I heard once, when I was a child, the good Scottish friar Father Donald, whom I reckon surely for a saint if there be any in heaven. I heard him preach at Paul's Cross<sup>925</sup> that 10 our Lady was a virgin, and yet at her pilgrimages be made many a foul meeting. And loud he cried out, 'Ye men of London, gang<sup>926</sup> on yourselves with your wives to Willesden,<sup>927</sup> in the devil's name, or else keep them at heme<sup>928</sup> with you — with sorrow.' And 15 surely so many good men ween it were best, considering that those voyages<sup>929</sup> be but wandering about vanity or superstitious devotion, and the next door to idolatry, when men have their affections instead of God bound to blocks and stones. And now, since 20 that this gear<sup>930</sup> is such, what marvel is it though<sup>931</sup> (as I said before) the devil be glad to give attendance thereon, and do for his part what he may to help his own devices forward? Or what marvel is it though
 25 God, in this cursed world, when we fall from him to others, and from the honor of himself to his saints, when we do as the paynims<sup>932</sup> did — instead of God, worship mammetts<sup>933</sup> — and all this by fall-
 30 ing<sup>934</sup> to follow men's glosses before his own texts, what wonder is it though God again<sup>935</sup> serve us as he served<sup>936</sup> them, and suffer<sup>937</sup> the devil delude us as he did them, and make us lean to false miracles as we fall willfully to false gods? Thus say they," quoth he, "that speak on that side, and yet much more
 35 than I can call to mind. But surely since ye willed me to forbear<sup>938</sup> nothing, I have as I could rather set to somewhat<sup>939</sup> (not of mine own opinion, but of mine own invention) than anything left out that I could remember which I had ever heard any man 40 lay,<sup>940</sup> to prove the miracles done at pilgrimages to be uncertain by whom they be wrought — or rather to prove that they should not be God's miracles, but the devil's wonders."

920 wicked 921 fleck and his make: worthless person and his illicit lover
 922 images meetings: representations (of their illicit liaisons) of licit gatherings or assemblies 923 shrines 924 someone who arranges illicit sexual encounters 925 Paul's Cross: the outdoor pulpit at Old St. Paul's Cathedral, in London 926 go (Scottish accent) 927 Our Lady of Willesden was a shrine near London. 928 home (Scottish accent)

 929 pilgrimages 930 matter, business
 931 if 932 pagans 933 statues of idols
 934 starting 935 in return 936 treated 937 let 938 withhold 939 set to somewhat: added in a little 940 put forward 941 "They sit on the chair of Moses.... What they say, do; however, what they do, don't do" (Mt 23:2–3).

 942 defense attorney 943 business; matter 944 bull's eye 945 fain...
butt: have to knock over the archery target 946 bidden by: questioned, investigated 947 entirely 948 have been 949 approval 950 the one or the other 951 disproof 952 attempt

THE EIGHTEENTH CHAPTER

The author deferreth the answer to the aforesaid objections; and first by Scripture he proveth that the Church of Christ cannot err in any necessary article of Christ's faith. And in this chapter be those words of Christ specially touched, Super cathedram Moysi sederunt etc. Quae dicunt vobis, facite; quae autem faciunt nolite facere,<sup>941</sup> concerning the authority of the Church.

"Surely," quoth I, "for my part I can you very good thank; for ye have not faintly defended your part as though it were a corrupted advocate,<sup>942</sup> that would by collusion handle his client's matter feebly for the pleasure of his adversary, but ye have said therein, I cannot tell whether as much as any man may say, but certainly I suppose as much as ye either have heard any man say or can yourself say, and at the leastwise much more than I have heard of any man 55 else, or could have said of myself. And undoubted as ye spoke of shooting in the beginning, this gear<sup>943</sup> how near it goeth to the prick<sup>944</sup> we shall see after. But this I promise you, it would fain bear over the butt<sup>945</sup> and all. For if it might hold and be bid-
 60 den by,<sup>946</sup> and were as well able to be proved true as I trust to prove it false, the butt we shot at were quite<sup>947</sup> gone for any surety that we could reckon of our faith and Christendom. But now to come to the point: since it is agreed already between us that 70 at these images and pilgrimages miracles been<sup>948</sup> there — either showed by God for the comprobation<sup>949</sup> of his pleasure therein, or wonders wrought by the devil for our delusion and damnation — if it may either appear to us that they be not done by
 75 the devil, then will it well follow that they be done by God; or if it be proved to be done by God for the good of his Church, then will it be clear enough that they be no wonders wrought by the devil to the deceit of Christian people. And since that ei-80 ther other<sup>950</sup> of these parts proved implieth the reproof<sup>951</sup> of your purpose, I will assay<sup>952</sup> to show, and trust right well to prove you the truth of our side by some one of these ways, or peradventure by both: that is to wit, as well in proving that God doth these miracles as in reproving<sup>953</sup> and confuting<sup>954</sup> that they should be done by the devil. And first 5 would I fain<sup>955</sup> meet with your objections and answer them forthwith,<sup>956</sup> while they be fresh, saving that meseemeth better for the while to defer them, forasmuch as some things there be whereupon it will be requisite that we first be both agreed, without which we were like to walk wide<sup>957</sup> in words and run all at riot, so loose that our matter could neither have ground, order, nor end.

“Now if I were in this matter to dispute with a paynim, that<sup>958</sup> would make the question between their miracles and ours, albeit I should have a clear matter in the end, yet must it needs be a long matter and much entriked,<sup>959</sup> ere it should come at the end. And whole books would it hold, both the confuting of theirs, and unto them the assertion<sup>960</sup> of our own, specially for that they receive not our Scripture, and between them and us nothing common to ground upon but reason. And if we should dispute with a Jew, less labor should we have, since that we should have with him, though he deny the 25 New Testament, yet reason and the Old Testament agreed upon — wherein we should not vary for the text, but for the sentence<sup>961</sup> and understanding. For therein we should have him stiffly withstand<sup>962</sup> us.

“But now since we shall in our matter dispute and reason with those that agree themselves for<sup>963</sup> Christian men, our dispicions<sup>964</sup> are so much the shorter, in that we must needs agree together in more things. For we must agree in reason, where faith refuseth<sup>965</sup> it not. And over<sup>966</sup> that, we shall agree upon the whole corpus of Scripture, as well the New Testament as the Old. But in the interpretation we may peradventure stick.<sup>967</sup> Is it not so?”

“Yes,” quoth he.

“Well,” quoth I, “is there any other thing wherein 40 ye think that we shall vary but the interpretation of the Scripture?”

“Not that I remember,” quoth he, “except the conclusion itself whereupon we talk — as of the worshipping of images or praying to saints — in which men

think there can be no great question, if the Scripture 45 be well interpreted.”

“Ye do,” quoth I, “agree that such things as are mentioned in the Gospel, spoken by Christ unto Saint Peter and other his apostles and disciples, were not only said to themselves, nor only for them-50 selves, but to them for their successors in Christ’s flock, and by them to us all — that is to wit, every man as shall appertain<sup>968</sup> to his part?”

“Whereby mean you that?”<sup>969</sup> quoth he.

“I mean,” quoth I, “as for example when he said,
 55 Nisi abundaverit iusticia vestra plus quam scribarum et Phariseorum, non intrabitis in regnum caelorum (‘Except your justice abound and exceed the justice of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall never come in heaven’),<sup>970</sup> and where he saith, ‘If thou wilt enter 60 into the kingdom of heaven, keep the commandments.’<sup>971</sup> Did not he say such things to them for all Christian men that should come after?”

“I think yes,” quoth he, “for the second word concerning the commandments. But as for the first,
 65 that their justice should be better than the justice of the scribes and Pharisees, peradventure he spoke specially to his apostles themselves, that they should not be like the scribes and Pharisees, which<sup>972</sup> commanded others many things, and did nothing 70 themselves.”

“That is, in my mind,” quoth I, “well taken, and so doth holy Saint Augustine<sup>973</sup> expound it. But since ye think he said that word to his apostles specially, rather than to all his whole flock, whether<sup>974</sup> think 75 you: that he said it only to them, or else to all others also that should after come in their places and succeed them in office?”

“Nay ’fore God,” quoth he, “to all the bishops he said it, and prelates and spiritual rulers of his 80 Church, that ever shall be in the Church, forbidding them to bind and lay upon other poor men’s backs importunable<sup>975</sup> burdens, to the bearing whereof themselves will not once put forth a finger.”

“Very well said,” quoth I. “What think you then 85 of that he said: ‘Do ye such things as they bid you do, but do not as ye see them do?’<sup>976</sup>”

“In that would our Lord,” quoth he, “that all the 953 disproving 954 refuting 955 gladly 956 right away 957 astray 958 who 959 much entriked: very complicated 960 making 961 meaning 962 oppose 963 to be 964 discussions 965 forbids

966 beyond 967 peradventure stick:
 perhaps be unable to agree 968 belong 969 Whereby mean you that: What do you mean by that 970 Mt 5:20 971 Mt 19:17–23 972 who 973 See Tractates on the Gospel of John, 122.9; Answer to Petilian the Donatist, 2.61. 974 which of these 975 grievous 976 Mt 23:3

people should do all that the prelates should command as far as was commanded in the law by God, but he meant no further. And therefore he said that they sat ‘upon the chair of Moses,’ and he willed that they should for that cause be obeyed.<sup>977</sup> And therein he meant in such things only as they should command that were by God commanded the people, in the law given to Moses, and that Christian men in like wise obey the bishops and prelates commanding only such things as himself hath commanded his people in his Gospel and his own law.”

“And in nothing else?” quoth I. “What meaneth it then that our Lord, in the parable of the Samaritan bearing the wounded man into the inn of his Church, and delivering him to the host after that himself had dressed his wounds with wine and oil and left with the host the two groats<sup>978</sup> of the two Testaments, promised the host besides that whatsoever the host would bestow upon him more, he would, when he came again, recompense him therefor?<sup>979</sup> And also in that place that we spoke of, our Savior said that the scribes and Pharisees, besides the Law of Moses on whose seat they sat, did lay great fardels<sup>980</sup> and fast bound them on other men’s backs, to the bearing whereof they would not move a finger themselves.<sup>981</sup> And yet, for all that, he bade the people do what their prelates would bid them, though<sup>982</sup> the burden were heavy, and let<sup>983</sup> not to do it though they should see the bidders<sup>984</sup> do clean the contrary. For which he added, ‘But as they do, do not you.’”

“By our Lady,” quoth he, “I like not this gloss.<sup>985</sup> For it maketh all for the bonds by which the laws of the Church bind us to more ado<sup>986</sup> than the Jews were almost with Moses’ law. And I wot well Christ said, ‘Come to me, ye that be overcharged, and I shall refresh you.’<sup>987</sup> And his apostles said that the bare<sup>988</sup> law of Moses—besides the ceremonies that were set to<sup>989</sup> by the scribes and the Pharisees—were more than ever they were able to bear and fulfill. And therefore Christ came to call us into a law of liberty and that was in taking away the band<sup>990</sup> of those weary ceremonial laws.<sup>991</sup> And therefore saith our Savior of the law that he calleth us unto: ‘My yoke,’ saith he, ‘is fit and easy, and my burden but light.’<sup>992</sup> Whereby it appeareth that he meant to take away the strait yoke and put on a more easy, and to take off the heavy burden and lay on a lighter. Which he had not done if he would load us with a fardel full of men’s laws, more than a cart can carry away.”

“The laws of Christ’s Church,” quoth I, “be made by himself and his Holy Spirit for the governance of his people, and be not, in hardness and difficulty of keeping, anything like to the laws of Moses. And thereof durst I for need make yourself judge. For if ye bethink you well, I ween if ye were at this age now to choose, you would rather be bounden to many of the laws of Christ’s Church than to the circumcision alone. Nor to as much ease as we ween that Christ called us, yet be not the laws that have been made by his Church of half the pain—nor half the difficulty—that his own be, which himself putteth in the Gospel, though<sup>993</sup> we set aside the counsels<sup>994</sup> It is, I trow,<sup>995</sup> more hard not to swear at all, than not to forswear;<sup>996</sup> to forbear<sup>997</sup> each angry word than not to kill; continual watch<sup>998</sup> and prayer than a few days appointed.<sup>999</sup> Then what an anxiety and solicitude is there in the forbearing of every idle word? What a hard threat, after the worldly count,<sup>1</sup> for a small matter? Never was there almost so sore<sup>2</sup> a word said unto the Jews by Moses as is to us by Christ in that word alone where he saith that we shall of every idle word give account at the Day of Judgment.<sup>3</sup> What say ye then by divorces restrained,<sup>4</sup> and liberty of diverse wives withdrawn, where they had liberty to wed for their pleasure, if they cast a fantasy<sup>5</sup> to any that they took in the war?”

“One of that ware<sup>6</sup> is enough,” quoth he, “to make any one man warre.”<sup>7</sup>

“Now that is merrily said,” quoth I, “but though one eye were enough for a fletcher,<sup>8</sup> yet is he for store<sup>9</sup> content to keep twain, and would though<sup>10</sup>

977 See Mt 23:2–3. 978 coins 979 for that. See Lk 10:33–35. 980 burdens 981 See Mt 23:3–4. 982 even if 983 hesitate 984 leaders, superiors 985 interpretation 986 trouble, work 987 Mt 11:28 988 mere 989 added 990 restraint 991 See Acts 15:10; Gal 5:13; Rom 8:21; Jas 2:12. 992 Mt 11:30 993 even if 994 the counsels:

The “counsels of perfection” are poverty (see Mt 19:21), chastity (see Mt 19:12), and obedience (for those who take vows and enter religious life: to a religious superior such as an abbot). 995 think 996 commit perjury 997 refrain from 998 vigil-keeping 999 See Mt 5:33–37, 21–22; Lk 18:1. 1 reckoning 2 harsh; severe 3 See Mt 12:36–37. 4 (being) prohibited. See Mt 5:31–32, 19:3–9; Lk 16:18. 5 cast a fantasy: took a liking 6 articles of merchandise; sexual organ 7 war . . . ware . . . warre: an elaborate pun. All three words were originally spelled “ware.” The latter two both also have double meanings. warre: worse; wary 8 arrow-maker 9 reserve 10 even if they were sometime sore both, and should put him to some pain. What ease also call you this: that we be bounden to abide all sorrow and shameful death, and all martyrdom, upon pain of perpetual damnation, for the profession of our faith? Trow ye that these easy words of his ‘easy yoke’ and ‘light burden’ were not as well spoken to his apostles as to you? And yet what ease called he them to? Called he not them to watching, fasting, praying, preaching, walking, hunger, thirst, cold, and heat, beating, scourging, prisonment, painful and shameful death? The ease of his yoke standeth not in bodily ease, nor the lightness of his burden standeth not in the slackness of any bodily pain (except<sup>11</sup> we be so wanton<sup>12</sup> that where himself had not heaven without pain, we look to come thither with play), but it standeth in the sweetness of hope, whereby we feel in our pain a pleasant taste of heaven. This is the thing, as holy Saint Gregory Nazianzen<sup>13</sup> declar-eth, that refresheth men that are laden and maketh our yoke easy and our burden light, not any delivering from the laws of the Church—or from any good temporal laws either—into a lewd<sup>14</sup> liberty of slothful rest. For that were not an easy yoke, but a pulling of the head out of the yoke. Nor it were not a light burden, but all the burden discharged, contrary to the words of Saint Paul and Saint Peter both, which<sup>15</sup> as well understood the words of their Master as these men do. And as a thing consonant and well agreeable therewith, do command us obedience to our superiors and rulers, one and other,<sup>16</sup> in things by God not forbidden, although they be hard and sore.<sup>17</sup>

“But see for God’s sake how we be run a great way further than I thought to go when I began, and have left that<sup>18</sup> we should go forth withal.”<sup>19</sup>

“It is no loss,” quoth he, “for there is a good thing well touched by<sup>20</sup> the way.”

“Well,” quoth I, “let us go back again where we left. Since ye agree that Christ spoke his words not to his apostles only for their own time, but such things as he said to them, he meant to all that should follow them—and thereof somewhat he spoke to them for the priests and bishops only (as when he said, Vos estis sal terrae; ‘Ye be the salt of the earth’),<sup>21</sup>

and somewhat to the whole flock (as when he said, Mandatum novum do vobis: ut diligatis invicem sicut ego dilexi vos; ‘I give you a new commandment: that you love together as I have loved you’).<sup>22</sup> Tell me then, I require<sup>23</sup> you: when Christ said to Saint Peter, ‘Satan hath desired to sift ye as men sift corn;’<sup>24</sup> but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith shall not fail,’<sup>25</sup> said he this to him as a promise of the faith to be by God’s help perpetually kept and preserved in Saint Peter only, or else in the whole Church—that is to wit, the whole congregation of Christian people professing his name and his faith, and abiding in the body of the same, not being precided<sup>26</sup> and cut off—meaning that his faith should never so utterly fail in his Church, but that it should whole and entire abide and remain therein?”

“Marry,” quoth he, “this is good to be advised of. For though Christ, for the more part, such things as he spoke to one spoke to all, according to his own words, Quod uni dico, omnibus dico (‘That I say to one, I say to all’),<sup>27</sup> yet some things he said and meant particularly as he spoke it. As when he bade Saint Peter come upon the water to him,<sup>28</sup> he bade not the remnant come so. And so may it peradventure be that this word was spoken and meant toward Peter alone.”

“That will be,” quoth I, “very hard to hold, for his faith after failed.<sup>29</sup> But since that<sup>30</sup> upon his first confession of the right faith, that Christ was God’s Son, our Lord made him his universal vicar and under him head of his Church, and that for his successor he should be the first upon whom and whose firm confessed faith he would build his Church, and of any that<sup>31</sup> was only man make him the first and chief head and ruler thereof—therefore he showed him that his faith (that is to wit, the faith by him confessed) should never fail in his Church,<sup>32</sup> nor never did it, notwithstanding his denying. For yet stood still the light of faith in our Lady, of whom we read in the Gospel continual assistance to her sweetest Son, without fleeing or flitting.<sup>33</sup> And in all others we find either fleeing from him one time or other, or else doubt of his resurrection after his death, his dear mother only except.<sup>34</sup> For the signification and remembrance whereof the Church

11 unless 12 self-indulgent; spoiled

13 See Gregory’s oration De Pace.

14 evil 15 who 16 one and other: both

17 grievous. See Eph 6:5; Ti 2:9–3:1;

Heb 13:17; 1 Pt 2:13–21. 18 that which

19 with 20 along 21 Mt 5:13 22 Jn

13:34 23 ask of 24 wheat 25 Lk

22:31–32 26 excommunicated 27 Mk

13:37 28 See Mk 14:28. 29 See Lk

22:55–62. 30 since that: because 31 any that: anyone who 32 See Mt 16:16–19.

33 See Jn 19:25. 34 See Jn 19:26–27;

Mt 26:31.

yearly, in the Tenebrae<sup>35</sup> lessons,<sup>36</sup> leaveth her candle burning still when all the remnant, that signifieth his apostles and disciples, be one by one put out. And since his faith in effect failed, and yet the faith that he professed abode still in our Lady, the promise that God made was, as it seemeth, meant not to him but as head of the Church. And therefore our Lord added thereto, ‘And thou being one of these days converted, confirm and strengthen thy brethren.’<sup>37</sup> In which, by these words, our Savior meant and promised that the faith should stand forever, so that ‘the gates of hell should not prevail there against.’<sup>38</sup> Or else might ye say that these words spoken to Saint Peter — ‘Feed my sheep’<sup>39</sup> — was meant but for himself, and no commandment to any successor of his, or any bishop or prelate. And by that means might ye say also that these words of Christ’s promise made unto his disciples — that the Holy Ghost should instruct them of all things<sup>40</sup> — were only meant for themselves in their own persons, and not that ever he should instruct his Church after their days. And when he said, ‘Whersoever be two or three gathered together in my name, there am I myself among them,’<sup>41</sup> we shall say by this means that he meant but of<sup>42</sup> his own disciples in his own time, while he was here with them, and not that he would be likewise present with such other congregations in his Church after. And finally, then were these words frustrate<sup>43</sup> — where he said, ‘Lo, I am with you all the days to the world’s end’<sup>44</sup> — if he should mean it but with them that heard him speak it. Then should it appear that he had intended a Church only of them and for their time. And then from their death hither,<sup>45</sup> all were done.”

“Verily, sir,” quoth he, “I can well agree that all such things was spoken by Christ to make them sure that the faith should never fail in his Church. Howbeit if I durst doubt in<sup>46</sup> that point, one thing is there that somewhat sticketh in my mind.”

“Doubt on,” quoth I, “between us twain and spare not, nor let<sup>47</sup> not to tell me what moveth you.”

“Sir,” quoth he, “I think that God setteth no more by faith than he doth by charity. But as for charity and good works, with virtuous living, shall<sup>48</sup> cool and decay in the Church, as our Savior saith in the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew: ‘Because iniquity shall abound, the charity of many men shall cool.’<sup>49</sup> And surely methinketh it is well near all gone already.”

“God forbid,” quoth I. “For albeit that it greatly day by day decayeth, and much people naught,<sup>50</sup> yet be there many good men about, and shall be always, though they be few in comparison of the multitude. And yet is it not all one of other virtues and of faith — that is to wit, of knowledge and belief of the articles of our faith — I mean of such articles as we be of necessity bounden to believe. For albeit that the flock of Christ shall never lack good and devout virtuous people, yet shall both the best be sinners, and also much more the multitude shall ever have the faith that I speak of, than shall have the goodness of living.”

“Why so?” quoth he.

“For two causes,” quoth I. “One, the malice of the people, whereby they will not be so ready to live well as to believe well. For the people themselves will better keep the faith than other virtues, since it is a thing of less labor to know what they should believe — and to believe it also when they know it — than it is to work well. For though the knowledge and belief bring many men to the labor of good works, yet the world commonly and the frailty of our flesh, with the enticement of our ghostly<sup>51</sup> enemies, make us willingly and wittingly,<sup>52</sup> well knowing and believing the good, yet to walk in the worse — as doth sometimes the sick man that, believing his physician, and having had also right often good proof by his own experience to his pain before, that some certain meat or drink shall do him harm, doth yet of an importune<sup>53</sup> appetite fall for his little pleasure to his great pain and hurt.”

“Another cause is,” quoth I, “the goodness of God, which<sup>54</sup> how far soever his people fall from the use<sup>55</sup> of virtue, shall not yet (as himself hath promised) suffer<sup>56</sup> them to fall from the knowledge of virtue, not only for the manifestation of his justice — that their own conscience may condemn them in doing the things that themselves know to be naught — but also to the intent they may still have among them a perpetual occasion of amendment. For if the faith

35 Tenebrae: “Darkness,” a liturgical ritual conducted during Holy Week to mark Christ’s time in the tomb 36 readings (from the Bible); a major part of the ceremony 37 Lk 22:32 38 Mt 16:18

39 Jn 21:17 40 See Jn 14:26. 41 Mt 18:20 42 meant but of: meant this to apply only to 43 meaningless; pointless 44 Mt 28:20 45 to this day 46 durst doubt in: dare question 47 hesitate

48 they shall 49 Mt 24:12 50 (are) bad, wicked 51 spiritual 52 consciously 53 inopportune 54 who 55 practice 56 permit were once gone, and the Church of Christ fallen in that error—that they believed vice to be virtue, and idolatry to be the right way of God’s worship—then had they no rule to guide them to better. And therefore while we be not in error of understanding and faith, howsoever we fall or how often soever we sin, we see the way to turn again by grace to God’s mercy. But if faith were gone, all were gone, and then had God here no Church at all.”

THE NINETEENTH CHAPTER

The author proveth that if the worship of images were idolatry, then the Church, believing it to be lawful and pleasant to God, were in a misbelief and in a deadly error. And then were the faith failed in the Church, whereof Christ hath promised the contrary, as is proved in the chapter before.

“Surely, sir,” quoth he, “that God made not his Church for a while, but to endure till the world’s end, that is there no Christian man but he will well agree. And since his Church cannot stand without faith, which is the entry into Christendom—for as Saint Paul saith, Accedentem ad Deum oportet credere (‘Whoso will come to God must needs believe’)<sup>57</sup>—no man will deny but that faith is, and always shall be, in his Church, and that his Church—not in faith only, and the knowledge of the truths necessary to be known for our souls’ health, but also to the doing of good works and avoiding of evil—is, hath been, and ever shall be specially guided and governed by God and the secret inspiration of his Holy Spirit.”

“Well,” quoth I, “then if the Church have faith, it erreth not in belief.”

“That is truth,” quoth he.

“It should err,” quoth I, “if it believed not all the truths that we be bound to believe.”

“What else?” quoth he.

“What and<sup>58</sup> we believed,” quoth I, “all that is true, and over that some other thing not only false, but also displeasing to God—did we not then err in our necessary belief?”

“Whereby<sup>59</sup> mean you that?” quoth he.

“As thus,” quoth I, “if that one believed in all the three Persons of the Trinity—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost—and therewith<sup>60</sup> were persuaded that there were a fourth Person besides, equal and one God with them.”

“He must,” quoth he, “needs err in his necessary belief, by which he is bounden to believe in the Trinity. And that fellow believeth in a Quaternity!”

“That is,” quoth I, “the whole Trinity and one more.”

“But we be not only not bounden,” quoth he, “to believe in any more, but also bounden not to believe in any more.”

“Very well,” quoth I, “then erreth he as much, and as far lacketh his right belief, that<sup>61</sup> believeth too much, as he that believeth too little, and he that believeth something that he should not, as he that believeth not something that he should.”

“What else?” quoth he. “And what then?”

“Marry<sup>62</sup> this,” quoth I: “If we believe that it were lawful and well done to pray to saints, and to reverence their images, and do honor to their relics and visit pilgrimages; and then where we do these things they were indeed not well done, but were displeasing to God, and by him reputed as a diminishment and a withdrawing of the honor due to himself, and therefore afore his Majesty reprovèd and odious and taken as idolatry—were not this opinion a deadly pestilent error in us, and a plain lack of right faith?”

“Yes, ’fore God,” quoth he.

“But ye grant,” quoth I, “that the Church cannot err in the right faith necessary to be believed, which is given and always kept in the Church by God.”

“Truth,” quoth he.

“Then followeth it,” quoth I, “that the Church—in that it believeth saints to be prayed unto, relics and images to be worshipped, and pilgrimages to be visited and sought—is not deceived nor doth not err, but that the belief of the Church is true therein. And thereupon also followeth that the wonderful works done above nature at such images and pilgrimages, at holy relics, by prayers made unto saints, be not done by the devil to delude the Church of Christ therewith, since the thing that the Church doth is well done and not idolatry. But by the great honor done unto saints, God himself the more highly honored,<sup>63</sup> in that his servants have so much honor for his sake. And thereof followeth it that himself maketh the miracles, in comprobation<sup>64</sup> thereof.”

“Also if it be true that ye have granted—that God keepeth and ever shall keep in his Church the right faith and right belief by the help of his own hand that hath planted it—then can it not be that
 5 he shall suffer the devil to work wonders like unto his own miracles to bring his whole Church into a wrong faith. And then if those things be not done by the devil, I trow<sup>65</sup> ye will not then deny but they be done by God. And so is yet again our purpose
 10 doubly proved. First, in that ye grant that God will not suffer his Church to err in his right faith; secondly (which pursueth thereupon), by that he hath by many a visible miracle declared that this faith and manner of observance is very pleasant and 15 acceptable unto him; which miracles, since they been<sup>66</sup> proved to be done upon good ground and cause, appear well to be done by God, and not by our ghostly<sup>67</sup> enemy.”

THE TWENTIETH CHAPTER

20 The messenger allegeth that the perpetual being and assistance of Christ with his Church to keep it out of all damnable errors is nothing else but his being with his Church in Holy Scripture, whereof the author declareth the contrary.

25 “How think you?” quoth I. “Is there anything in this matter amiss?”

“I cannot well tell,” quoth he, “what I might answer thereto. But yet methink that I come to this point by some oversight in granting.”<sup>68</sup>

30 “Well,” quoth I, “men say sometimes—when they would say or do a thing and cannot well come thereon, but miss and oversee themselves<sup>69</sup> in the assay<sup>70</sup>—‘It maketh no matter,’ they say. ‘Ye may begin again and mend it, for it is neither Mass nor 35 Matins.’<sup>71</sup> And albeit in this matter ye have nothing granted but that<sup>72</sup> is in my mind as true as the Matins or the Mass either, yet if ye reckon yourself over-swift in granting, I give you leave to go back and call again what ye will.”

40 “In good faith,” quoth he, “full hard were it in mine own mind otherwise to think but that God shall always keep the right belief in his Church. But yet since we come to this conclusion by the granting thereof, let us look once again thereupon. And

45 what if men would say (as I heard once one say myself) that God doth peradventure not keep always faith in his Church, to give them warning with when they do well, and when the contrary. But since he hath given them, and left with them, the 50 Scripture—in which they may sufficiently see both what they should believe and what they should do—he letteth them alone therewith, without any other special cure<sup>73</sup> of his, upon their faith and belief. For therein they may see all that them need-55 eth, if they will look and labor therein. And if they will not, the fault is their own sloth and folly. And whoso be willing to mend and be better may always have light to see how, by recourse to the reading of Holy Scripture, which shall stand him in like stead<sup>74</sup>
 60 as ye said before, that God kept the faith for, by his special means in his Church.”

“If this,” quoth I, “were thus, whereof should Christ’s promise serve, Ego vobiscum sum omnibus diebus usque ad finem saeculi (‘I am with you all the days till the end of the world’)?<sup>75</sup> Wherefore<sup>76</sup>
 65 should he be here with his Church, if his being here should not keep his right faith and belief in his Church?”

“Marry,” quoth he, “these words well agreeth withal. For God is, and shall be until the world’s 70 end, with his Church in his Holy Scripture, as Abraham answered the rich man in hell, saying, ‘They have Moses and the prophets,’<sup>77</sup> not meaning that they had them all at that time present with them, but only that they had their books. And so Christ, 75 forasmuch as the Scripture hath his faith comprehended<sup>78</sup> therein according to his own words, Scrutamini scripturas, quia scripturae sunt quae testimonium perhibent de me (‘Search you the Scriptures, for they bear witness of me’),<sup>79</sup> therefore he said, Ego vobiscum sum usque ad finem saeculi (‘I am with 80 you to the end of the world’), because his Holy Scripture shall never fail, as long as the world endureth. ‘Heaven and earth,’ saith he, ‘shall pass away, but my words shall never pass away.’<sup>80</sup>
 85

“And therefore in his Holy Writing is he with us still;<sup>81</sup> and therein he keepeth and teacheth us his right faith if we list<sup>82</sup> to look for it; and else, as I said, our own fault and folly it is.”

“If God,” quoth I, “be none otherwise with us but 90 in Holy Scripture, then be those words of Christ ‘I

65 trust 66 have been 67 spiritual 68 conceding (as in a debate) 69 oversee themselves: fail to see their error

70 attempt 71 formal morning prayer 72 what 73 concern, care 74 stand... stead: be of use to him in the same way

75 Mt 28:20 76 Why 77 Lk 16:29
 78 included, comprised 79 Jn 5:39
 80 Mt 24:35 81 See Mt 28:20. 82 want am with you to the world's end' somewhat strangely spoken, and unlike the words of Abraham whereunto ye resemble them. For Christ left never a book behind him of his own making, as Moses did, and the prophets. And in their books was he spoken of, as he was in the Gospel. Wherefore if he had spoken and meant of Scripture, he would have said that they should have with them still his evangelists and writers of his Gospels, as Abraham said, "They have Moses and the prophets," which were the writers of the books that the Jews had. Christ also said 'I am with you till the end of the world'<sup>83</sup> — not 'I shall be,' but 'I am,' which is the word appropriated<sup>84</sup> to his Godhead.<sup>85</sup> And therefore that word 'am' is the name by which our Lord would, as he told Moses, be named unto Pharaoh,<sup>86</sup> as a name which from all creatures (since they be all subject to time) clearly discerneth<sup>87</sup> his Godhead, which is ever being and present, without difference of time past or to come. In which wise, he was not in his Holy Scripture, for that had beginning. And at those words spoken, was not yet all written. For of the chief part, which is the New Testament, there was yet at that time never one word written. And also we be not sure by any promise made, that the Scripture shall endure to the world's end, albeit I think verily the substance shall. But yet, as I say, promise have we none thereof. For where our Lord saith that his 'words shall not pass away,' nor one iota thereof be lost,<sup>88</sup> he spoke of his promises made indeed, as his faith and doctrine taught<sup>89</sup> by mouth and inspiration. He meant not that of his Holy Scripture in writing there should never an iota be lost, of which some parts be already lost — more peradventure than we can tell of — and of that<sup>90</sup> we have, the books in some part corrupted with miswriting.<sup>91</sup> And yet the substance of those words that he meant be known, where some part of the writing is unknown. He saith also that his Father and he should send the Holy Ghost, and also that he would come himself<sup>92</sup> — whereto all this if he meant no more but to leave the books behind them and go their way? Christ is also present among us bodily, in the Holy Sacrament. And is he there present with us for nothing? The Holy Ghost taught many things, I think, unwritten, and whereof some part was never comprised in<sup>93</sup> the Scripture yet unto this day, as<sup>94</sup> the article which no good Christian man will doubt of: that our blessed Lady was a perpetual virgin as well after the birth of Christ as afore.

"Our Savior also said unto his apostles that when they should be accused and brought in judgment, they should not need to care for answer; it should even then be put in their minds.<sup>95</sup> And that he meant not only the remembrance of Holy Scripture (which before the paynim judges were but a cold and bare alleging), but such words new given them by God, inspired in their hearts, so effectual and confirmed with miracles that their adversaries, though they were angry thereat, yet should not be able to resist it.<sup>96</sup> And thus with secret help and inspiration is Christ with his Church, and will be to the world's end, present and assistant — not only spoken of in writing."

THE TWENTY-FIRST CHAPTER

The author showeth that if it so were indeed as the messenger said — that is to wit, that Christ continued with his Church none other wise<sup>97</sup> but only by the leaving of his Holy Scripture to them, and that all the faith also were only therein — then should it yet follow that, as far as the necessity of our salvation requireth, God giveth the Church the right understanding thereof. And thereupon followeth further that the Church cannot err in the right faith. Whereupon is inferred eftsoon<sup>98</sup> all that the messenger would have fled from before. And thereon also specially followeth that all the texts of Holy Scripture which heretics allege against images, or any point of the common belief of Christ's Catholic Church, can nothing serve their purpose.

"But now would I wit,<sup>99</sup> since ye reckon<sup>100</sup> him none other wise present than in Holy Scripture, whether then doth he give his Church the right understanding of Holy Scripture or not?"

"What if he do not?" quoth he.

"Marry,"<sup>101</sup> quoth I, "then yourself seeth well that they were as well without. And so should the Scripture stand them in as good stead as a pair of spectacles should stand a blind friar."

83 Mt 28:20 84 appropriate 85 Jn 8:58 86 See Ex 3:9–15. 87 distinguishes 88 See Mt 5:18, 24:35. 89 were taught 90 that which 91 miscopying 92 See

Jn 14:16–18, 15:28. 93 compromised in: incorporated into 94 such as 95 See Mt 10:19. 96 See Lk 21:12–15. 97 none other wise: in no other way 98 for a second time 99 would I wit: I would like to know 100 suppose 101 Indeed

“That is very truth,” quoth he. “But therefore hath his wisdom and goodness provided it so to be written that it may be well understood by the collation<sup>102</sup> and consideration of one text with another.”

5 “May it not also be,” quoth I, “that some of them which do read it diligently, and diligently compare and consider every text, how it may stand with others, may yet, for all that, mistake and misunderstand it?”

10 “Yes,” quoth he, “it may be so. For else had there not been so many heretics as there hath been.”

“Very truth,” quoth I. “But now if all the faith be in Holy Scripture, and no part thereof anywhere else, but that it must be therein altogether learned, were it then sufficient to understand some part aright, and some other part wrong, in the necessary points of our faith? Or must we, as far-forth<sup>103</sup> as concerneth the necessity thereof, misunderstand no part?”

20 “We must,” quoth he, “mistake no part, as far as necessarily concerneth our faith. But we must have so the right understanding of all together, that we conceive no damnable error.”

“Well said,” quoth I. “Then if we must, we may. For if we may not, we must not. For our Lord bindeth no man to an impossibility.”

25 “We may,” quoth he.

“If we may,” quoth I, “then may we either by good hap<sup>104</sup> fall into the right understanding, or else by natural reason come to it, or else by supernatural grace be led into it.”

30 “That is truth,” quoth he. “Needs must it be one of these ways.”

“Well,” quoth I, “we will not yet ensearch<sup>105</sup> which. But I would first wit whether Christ have a church in the world continually, and so shall have to the world’s end, or else hath one sometimes, and sometimes none at all. As we might think that he had one while he was here himself, and peradventure a while after, and haply<sup>106</sup> none at all never since, nor shall not again — we wot nere<sup>107</sup> when.”

40 “Nay,” quoth he, “that cannot be in no wise,<sup>108</sup> but that he must needs have his Church continue still somewhere; for else how could he be with them continually to the world’s end — in Scripture or otherwise — if they (with whom he promised to be, and continue to the world’s end) should not continually so long endure? Or how could those words of Christ be true, ‘Lo, I am with you all the days to the world’s end,’ if before the world’s end he were away some days — as he were indeed from the Church some days, if in some days he had no church?”

50 “Well,” quoth I, “yet would I wit one thing more: Can he have a church without faith?”

“Nay,” quoth he, “that were impossible.”

55 “Forsooth,”<sup>109</sup> quoth I, “so were it. For his Church is a congregation of people gathered into his faith. And faith is the first substantial difference discerning Christian men from heathen, as reason is the difference dividing man from all the kinds of brute beasts. Now then if his Church be and ever shall be continual, without any times between in which there shall be none;<sup>110</sup> and without faith it may never be; and no part of the faith is, as ye say, elsewhere had but in Holy Scripture, and all it must be had; and also, as we were agreed a little while afore, there must be none error adjoined thereto; and therefore, as far as toucheth the necessity of faith, no part of Scripture may be mistaken, but all must be understood right, and may be right understood either by hap, reason, or help of grace — it necessarily followeth that by one or other of these ways the Church of Christ hath always, and never faileth,<sup>111</sup> the right understanding of Scripture, as far as longeth for<sup>112</sup> our necessity.”

75 “That followeth indeed,” quoth he.

“Well,” quoth I, “let pass for the while what followeth further. And since the Church so hath,<sup>113</sup> let us first agree by which of these three ways the Church hath it: whether by hap, reason, or grace.”

80 “By hap,” quoth he, “were a poor having. For so might it hap to have and hap to fail.”

“Then,” quoth I, “since it hath it ever, it cannot be by hap. What think you then of reason?”

85 “As little,” quoth he, “as any man thinketh. For I take reason for plain enemy to faith.”

“Ye take peradventure<sup>114</sup> wrong,” quoth I. “But thereof shall we see further after. But now since ye so think, ye leave but the third way, which is the help of grace.”

90 “No surely,” quoth he.

“Verily,” quoth I, “where reason may between diverse texts stand in great doubt which way to lean, I think that God with his Holy Spirit leadeth his

102 comparison 103 so far-forth: to such an extent 104 luck 105 inquire 106 perhaps 107 wot nere: know not

108 in no wise: by no means 109 In truth 110 i.e., no Church 111 lacks

112 longeth for: pertains to 113 i.e., the right understanding 114 perhaps

Church into the consent of the truth, as himself said that the Holy Ghost (whom he would send) should lead them into all truth.<sup>115</sup> He said not that the Holy Ghost should at his coming write them all truth, nor tell them all the whole truth by mouth, but that he should by secret inspiration lead them into all truth. And therefore surely for a true conclusion in<sup>116</sup> such means—by God himself, by the help of his grace (as yourself granteth)—the right understanding of Scripture is ever preserved in his Church from all such mistaking whereof might follow any damnable error concerning the faith. And thereof doth there first follow, that besides the Scripture itself, there is another present assistance and special cure of<sup>117</sup> God perpetual with his Church to keep it in the right faith, that it err not by misunderstanding of Holy Scripture—contrary to the opinion that ye purposed when ye said that Christ’s being with his Church was only the leaving of his Holy Scripture to us. And over<sup>118</sup> this, if God were no other wise present than ye speak of, yet since it is proved that his Church, for all that, ever hath the right understanding of Scripture, we be comen to the same point again that ye would so fain flit<sup>119</sup> from. For if the Scripture—and nothing but the Scripture—doth contain all things that we be bounden to believe, and to do, and to forbear,<sup>120</sup> and that God also therefore provideth for his Church the right understanding thereof concerning every-thing necessary for us that is contained in Scripture, then must there needs follow thereupon the thing that ye feared lest ye had wrong and unadvisedly granted: that is to wit, that God always keepeth the right faith in his Church. And thereupon followeth further the remnant of all that is in question between us: that the faith of the Church in the worship that it believeth to be well given unto saints, relics, and images is not erroneous, but right. And thereupon followeth also that the miracles done at such places be none illusions of damned spirits, but the mighty hand of God, to show his pleasure in the corroboration thereof, and in the excitation of our devotion thereto.”

“Indeed,” quoth he, “we be come back here with going forward, as men walk in a maze.”

“Ye have not yet,” quoth I, “lost all that labor. For though ye have half a check<sup>121</sup> in this point, yet have ye (if ye perceive it) mated<sup>122</sup> me in another point, by one thing that is agreed between us now.”

“What is that?” quoth he.

“This,” quoth I, “that I have agreed as well as you: that God hath given his Church the right understanding of Scripture in as far-forth<sup>123</sup> as longeth<sup>124</sup> to the necessity of salvation.”

“In what point,” quoth he, “hath that mated you?”

“Why,” quoth I, “see you not that? Nay, then will I not tell you, but if<sup>125</sup> ye hire me;<sup>126</sup> or if I tell you, yet shall ye not win the game thereby. For since ye see it not yourself, it is but a blind mate.”<sup>127</sup>

“Let me know it yet,” quoth he, “and I am agreed to take none advantage thereof.”

“On that bargain be it,” quoth I.

“Ye wot well,” quoth I, “that against the worshipping of images and praying to saints, ye laid<sup>128</sup> certain texts of Scripture to prove it forbidden and reputed of God for<sup>129</sup> idolatry. For answer whereof, when I laid that men must lean to the sentence<sup>130</sup> that the Church and holy doctors<sup>131</sup> of the Church give to those texts, ye said they were but men’s false glosses against God’s true texts. And now since ye grant, and I also, that the Church cannot misunderstand the Scripture to the hindrance of the right faith in things of necessity, and that ye also acknowledge this matter to be such that it must either be the right belief, and acceptable service to God, or else a wrong and erroneous opinion and plain idolatry, it followeth of necessity that the Church doth not misunderstand those texts that ye or any other can allege and bring forth for that purpose, but that all these texts be so to be taken and understood as they nothing make against the Church, but all against your own opinion in this matter.”

“And thus have ye suddenly answered yourself, to all those texts, out of hand, with a gloss<sup>132</sup> of your own, as true as any text in the Bible, and which all the world will never avoid,<sup>133</sup> except they would make the Scripture serve the Church of nought,<sup>134</sup> or rather to their hindrance than furtherance in the faith. For so were it, if it might be, that God giveth them not the good understanding thereof,

115 See Jn 16:13. 116 by 117 cure of: care given by 118 besides 119 fain flit: gladly flee 120 refrain from doing 121 a pun which introduces a chess metaphor: a reversal or rebuff; a threat to one’s kin in chess

122 checkmated 123 in as far-forth: to the extent 124 pertains 125 but if: unless 126 hire me: pay me to; raise the stakes we’re playing for 127 blind mate: when one player in chess has checkmated

the other without realizing it 128 cited 129 reputed of God for: regarded by God as 130 meaning(s) 131 theologians 132 interpretation, commentary 133 disprove 134 of nought: for nothing but suffereth<sup>135</sup> them to be deceived and deluded in errors, by the mistaking of the letter.”<sup>136</sup>

“Marry,” quoth he, “this is a blind mate indeed.”

5 “Surely,” quoth I, “these two things seem to me two as true points, and as plain, to a Christian man as any petition<sup>137</sup> of Euclid’s geometry is to a reasonable man. For as true as it is that every whole thing is more than his<sup>138</sup> own half,<sup>139</sup> as true is it indeed, and to every Christian man, faith maketh it
10 as certain: first, that Christ’s Church cannot err in any such article as God upon pain of loss of heaven will that we believe; and thereupon necessarily followeth that there is no text of Scripture well understood by which Christian people are commanded to 15 do the thing which the Church believeth that they may lawfully leave undone, nor any text whereby we be forbidden anything which the Church believeth that they may lawfully do.”

THE TWENTY-SECOND CHAPTER

20 Because the messenger had in the beginning showed himself desirous and greedy upon<sup>140</sup> the text of Scripture, with little force<sup>141</sup> of the old fathers’ glosses,<sup>142</sup> and with dispraise of philosophy and almost all the seven liberal sciences,<sup>143</sup> the author therefore incidentally showeth what harm hath 25 happed sometimes to fall to diverse of those young men whom he hath known to give their study to the Scripture only, with contempt of logic and other secular science, and little regard of the old interpreters. Wherefore the author showeth that in the study of Scripture, the sure way is—with virtue and prayer—first to use the judgment of natural reason, whereunto secular literature helpeth much, and secondly, the comments<sup>144</sup> of holy doctors, 30 and thirdly, above all things, the articles of the Catholic faith, received and believed through the Church of Christ.

40 “And for because we speak of Scripture now, and that the Church, in things needly<sup>145</sup> requisite to salvation, hath the right understanding of Holy Scripture, wherein I perceive ye be studious of the text alone, without great force of the old fathers’ interpretations, or any other science—of which ye reckon all seven, save grammar, almost to serve for nought<sup>146</sup>—I have of you so good opinion that 45 I trust all your study shall turn you to good. But surely I have seen to some folk so much harm to grow thereof that I never would advise any man else in the study of Scripture to take that way.”

“Why so?” quoth he.

50 “For I have known,” quoth I, “right good wits<sup>147</sup> that hath set all other learning aside—partly for sloth, refusing the labor and pain to be sustained in that learning, partly for pride, by which they could not endure the redargution<sup>148</sup> that should sometimes fall to their part in dispicions.<sup>149</sup> Which affections their inward secret favor toward themselves covered and cloaked under the pretext of simplicity and good Christian devotion borne to the love of Holy Scripture alone. But in little while after, the
60 damnable spirit of pride that, unaware<sup>150</sup> to themselves, lurked in their hearts hath begun to put out his horns and show himself. For then have they longed, under the praise of Holy Scripture, to set out to show<sup>151</sup> their own study. Which,<sup>152</sup> because
65 they would have seem<sup>153</sup> the more to be set by,<sup>154</sup> they have first fallen to the dispraise and derision of all other disciplines. And because in speaking or preaching of such common things as all Christian men know, they could not seem excellent, nor make it appear and seem that in their study they had done any great mastery, to show themselves therefore 70 marvelous, they set out paradoxes and strange<sup>155</sup> opinions against the common faith of Christ’s whole Church. And because they have therein the old holy doctors against them, they fall to the contempt and dispraise of them, either preferring their own fond<sup>156</sup> glosses against the old cunning<sup>157</sup> and
75 blessed fathers’ interpretations, or else lean to some words of Holy Scripture that seem to say for<sup>158</sup> them, against many more texts that plainly make 80 against them, without receiving or ear giving to any reason or authority of any man, quick<sup>159</sup> or dead—or of the whole Church of Christ to the contrary. And thus once proudly persuaded a wrong way, 85

135 allows 136 literal meaning of the text
137 axiom 138 its 139 Euclid’s fifth axiom. See Elements, Book 1. 140 greedy upon: eager for 141 regard 142 explanations; interpretations 143 arts. The seven liberal arts are grammar, logic, rhetoric, arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy. 144 commentaries 145 necessarily 146 nothing 147 minds, intellects 148 refutation; rebuke 149 debates 150 unknown 151 display; show off 152 Who 153 would have seem: want to have it seem (that they are) 154 set by: valued; esteemed 155 unfamiliar 156 foolish 157 wise 158 say for: support 159 living

they take the bridle in the teeth and run forth like a headstrong horse, that all the world cannot pluck them back. But with sowing sedition, setting forth of errors and heresies, and spicing their preaching
 5 with rebuking of priesthood and prelacy for the people's pleasure, they turn many a man to ruin and themselves also. And then the devil deceiveth them in their blind affections.<sup>160</sup>

10 “They take for good zeal to the people their malicious envy, and for a great virtue, their ardent appetite to preach — wherein they have so great pride for the people's praise, that preach I ween they would, though God would his own mouth command them the contrary.”

15 “Why should ye ween so,” quoth he, “or whereby can ye be sure that ye do not now misconstrue their good mind? Hard is it oft-times to judge another man's deed that hath some appearance of evil, because the purpose and intent may make it 20 good. And what peril is it then where the deed appeareth good, there to judge the mind and intent for naught,<sup>161</sup> which who can see but God? As the Scripture saith, Dominus autem intuetur cor (‘Only God beholdeth the heart’).<sup>162</sup> And therefore saith our Savior, ‘Judge not before the time.’”<sup>163</sup>

25 “I judge not,” quoth I, “but upon open things and well apparent. For I speak but of those whose erroneous opinions in their preaching, and their obstinate pride in the defense of their worldly worship,<sup>164</sup> well declareth their minds. And some have I seen which,<sup>165</sup> when they have for their perilous preaching been by their prelates prohibited to preach, have (that notwithstanding) proceeded on still; and, for the maintenance<sup>166</sup> of their disobedience, have amended the matter with a heresy, 35 boldly and stubbornly defending that, since they had cunning to preach, they were by God bounden to preach, and that no man, nor no law that was made or could be made, had any authority to forbid them. And this they thought sufficiently proved by the words of the Apostle, Oportet magis oboedire Deo quam hominibus.<sup>167</sup> As though these men were apostles now specially sent by God to preach heresies and sow sedition among Christian men, as the very apostles were indeed sent and commanded by God to preach his very faith to the Jews. One of this 45 sort, of this new kind of preachers, being demanded why that he used to say in his sermons about, that nowadays men preached not well the Gospel, answered that he thought so because he saw not the 50 preachers persecuted, nor no strife nor business<sup>168</sup> arise upon their preaching. Which things, he said and wrote, was the fruit of the Gospel, because Christ said, Non veni pacem mittere, sed gladium (‘I am not come to send peace into the world, but 55 the sword’).<sup>169</sup> Was not this a worshipful<sup>170</sup> understanding, that because Christ would make a division among infidels, from the remnant of them to win some, therefore these apostles would sow some 60 cockle<sup>171</sup> of dissension among the Christian people,<sup>172</sup> whereby Christ might lose some of them? For the fruit of strife among the hearers and persecution of the preacher cannot lightly<sup>173</sup> grow among 65 Christian men but by the preaching of some strange novelties and bringing up of some newfangled heresies, to the infection of our old faith.

“One wist<sup>174</sup> I that was for his pertinacy<sup>175</sup> in that opinion — that he would and might and was bounden to preach, any prohibition notwithstanding —
 70 when he was, after diverse bold and open defenses thereof, at last before folk honorable and few, reasoned withal, and not only the law showed him to the contrary of his opinion (which law was made at a general council),<sup>176</sup> but also by plain authority of Holy Scripture<sup>177</sup> proved that his opinion was
 75 erroneous, he so perceived himself satisfied that he meekly acknowledged his error, and offered to abjure<sup>178</sup> it and to submit himself to penance. But on the morrow, when he came forth in open presence of the people, and there saw many that had 80 oft heard him preach, of his secret<sup>179</sup> pride he fell in such an open<sup>180</sup> passion of shame that those should hear him go back with<sup>181</sup> his word which had before had<sup>182</sup> his sermons in great estimation, that at the first sight of the people he revoked his revocation, and said out aloud, that<sup>183</sup> he might well be
 85 heard, that his opinion was true, and that he was the day before deceived in that he had confessed

160 passions 161 evil 162 1 Kgs (1 Sm) 16:7 163 1 Cor 4:5. See also Mt 7:1. 164 reputation 165 who 166 defense 167 “We must obey God rather than men” (Acts 5:29). 168 trouble 169 Mt

10:34 170 pious; respectable 171 weed 172 See Mt 13:25. 173 easily; readily 174 knew 175 stubbornness 176 The Fourth Lateran Council (1215) taught that no one could preach after being forbidden. 177 See Rom 10:15. 178 publicly renounce 179 of his secret: from his private 180 public; shameless (a pun) 181 on 182 which had before had: who before had held 183 so that it for false. And thus he held his own stubbornly, without reason, till the books were showed him again, and himself read them before all the people, so that he perceived the audience that stood about him to feel and understand his proud folly in the defense of his indefensible error, and thereupon, at the last, yielded himself again. Such secret pride had our ghostly<sup>184</sup> enemy conveyed into the heart of him, which,<sup>185</sup> I ensure<sup>186</sup> you, seemed in all his other outward manner as meek a simple soul as a man should have seen in a summer's day. And some of them let<sup>187</sup> not with lies and perjury to defend themselves, and some to stand in defense of their errors, or false denying of their own deed, to their great peril of the fire, if their judges were not more merciful than their malice<sup>188</sup> deserveth. And all this done because (as themselves doth at last confess) they think if they abjure they shall after be suffered<sup>189</sup> to preach again. Such a scabbed<sup>190</sup> itch of vainglory catch they in their preaching that, though all the world were the worse for it, and their own life lie thereon, yet would they long to be pulpited. And this, I say, hath come<sup>191</sup> of some that have, with contempt of all other learning, given them<sup>192</sup> to Scripture alone. Whose affections of<sup>193</sup> pride and sloth hath not in the beginning been perceived to themselves, but have<sup>194</sup> accounted their vices for devotion.”

“Would ye then,” quoth he, “condemn that manner of study by which a man hath so great affection to the Scripture alone that he, for the delight thereof, feeleth little savor in anything else, but that we should lose time in philosophy—the mother of heresies—and let Scripture alone?”

“Nay,” quoth I, “that mind am I not of. There was never thing written in this world that can in any wise be comparable with any part of Holy Scripture. And yet I think other liberal sciences a gift of God also, and not to be cast away, but worthy to wait and as handmaids to give attendance upon divinity.<sup>195</sup> And in this point I think not thus alone. For ye shall find Saint Jerome, Saint Augustine, Saint Basil, and many of the old holy doctors, open and plain of the same opinion. And of divinity reckon I the best part to be contained in Holy Scripture. And this I say for him that shall have time thereto,<sup>196</sup> and from youth intendeth to the churchward, and to make himself, with God's help, meet<sup>197</sup> for the office of a preacher. Howbeit, if any man either happen to begin so late that he shall peradventure have no time thereto, or else any man of youth to have that fervent appetite unto Scripture that he cannot find in his heart to read anything else (which affection whoso<sup>198</sup> hap-peth to have given him is very fortunate, if he with grace and meekness guide it well), then would I counsel him specially to study for the virtuous framing<sup>199</sup> of his own affections,<sup>200</sup> and using great moderation and temperance in the preaching to other men. And in all things to flee the desire of praise and show of cunning, ever mistrusting his own inclinations, and live in dread and fear of the devil's subtle sleight and inventions.<sup>201</sup> Who though he lie in continual await upon every preacher to catch him into pride if he can, yet his highest enterprise and proudest triumph standeth in the bringing of a man to the most abuse<sup>202</sup> of that thing, that is of his own nature the best. And therefore great labor maketh he, and great boast if he bring it about, that a good wit may abuse his labor bestowed upon the study of Holy Scripture.

“For the sure avoiding whereof, my poor advice were—in the study thereof—to have a special regard to the writings and comments<sup>203</sup> of old holy fathers. And yet ere he fall in hand<sup>204</sup> with the one or the other, next<sup>205</sup> grace and help of God (to be gotten with abstinence and prayer and cleanness of living), afore all things were it necessary to come well and surely instructed in all such points and articles as the Church believeth. Which things once firmly had, and fastly<sup>206</sup> for undoubted truths presupposed, then shall reason and they be two good rules to examine and expound all doubtful texts by, since the reader shall be sure that no text is so to be understood as it standeth against them both, or against any point of the Catholic faith of Christ's Church. And, therefore, if it seem to stand against any of them, either shall the light of natural reason, with the collation<sup>207</sup> of other texts, help to

184 spiritual 185 who 186 assure
187 hesitate 188 Intention or desire to do evil or injure another person; active ill will and hatred; in legal thinking, state of mind required for a person to be found guilty of certain criminal offenses

189 after be suffered: afterward be allowed 190 diseased 191 hath come: is what has become 192 themselves 193 affections of: inclinations toward, attachments to 194 they have 195 theology 196 for it 197 suitable 198 whoever 199 ordering

200 dispositions 201 sleight and inventions: trickery and schemes
202 most abuse: worst misuse 203 commentaries 204 ere . . . hand: before he proceeds 205 next to 206 steadfastly 207 comparison

find out the truth, or else (which is the surest way) he shall perceive the truth in the comments of the good holy doctors of old, to whom God hath given the grace of understanding. Or finally, if all that he can either find in other men's works, or invent<sup>208</sup> by God's aid of his own study, cannot suffice to satisfy, but that any text yet seem unto him contrary to any point of the Church's faith and belief, let him then, as Saint Augustine saith, make himself very sure that there is some fault either in the translator, or in the writer (or nowadays in the printer), or finally that for some one let<sup>209</sup> or other, he understandeth it not aright. And so let him reverently acknowledge his ignorance, lean and cleave to the faith of the Church as to an undoubted truth, leaving that text to be better perceived when it shall please our Lord with his light to reveal and disclose it. And in this wise shall he take a sure way, by which he shall be sure of one of two things: that is to wit, either to perceive and understand the Scripture right, or else at the leastwise never in such wise to take it wrong, that ever may turn his soul to peril."

THE TWENTY-THIRD CHAPTER

The messenger objecteth against the counsel of the author, in that he would that the student of Scripture should<sup>210</sup> lean to<sup>211</sup> the commenters<sup>212</sup> and unto natural reason, which he calleth enemy to faith. And thereupon the answer of the author to those objections, specially proving that reason is servant to faith, and not enemy, and must with faith and interpretation of Scripture needs be concurrent.<sup>213</sup>

"Sir," quoth he, "I will not say nay but<sup>214</sup> this way will do well. Howbeit, I fear me that we were likely to build up many errors if we square our timber and stones by these three rules: men's glosses, reason, and faith, not that we find in Scripture, but that we bring with us to Scripture. For first, as for the commenters that ye speak of, either their comments tell us the same tale that the text doth, or else another. If they tell me the same, I believe them only because the text saith the same. And if they tell me another, then believe I them not at all, nor nought<sup>215</sup> I should, except<sup>216</sup> I should believe men better than God. And as for reason, what greater enemy can ye find to faith than reason is, which counterpleadeth<sup>217</sup> faith in every point? And would ye then send them twain forth to school together, that can never agree together, but be ready to fight together and either scratch out other's eyes by<sup>218</sup> the way? It seemeth also somewhat strange that when God hath left us in his Holy Scripture well and sufficiently his doctrine, whereby he would we should have warning of all such things as he would we should believe and do, or leave undone, and hath left us the Scripture for none other cause but for that it should stand unto us for the witness of his will declared us by writing, that we should not say nay but we were warned, and none other cause why the Scripture should be given us but to tell us his pleasure and stir us to fulfill it, we shall now not shape our faith after<sup>219</sup> the Scripture, but first frame us a faith ourselves, and then shape the Scripture of God thereby, and make it agree thereto. This were indeed a good easy way for a slothful mason that were an evil workman: to make him a square and a ruler of lead, that when he list<sup>220</sup> not to take the labor to hew the stone to the square, he may bend the square to the stone, and so shall he yet bring them together at the leastways."

"As for the old commenters," quoth I, "they tell you the same tale that the text doth, but they tell it you more plain, as we shall more talk of after. But surely ye beguiled me now, in that ye set reason so short; for verily, I would never have weened that ye would in Scripture like worse a wise man than an unreasonable reader. Nor I cannot see why ye should reckon reason for an enemy to faith, except ye reckon every man for your enemy that is your better and hurteth you not. Thus were one of your five wits<sup>221</sup> enemy to another, and our feeling should abhor our sight, because we may see farther by four miles than we may feel. How can reason — but if<sup>222</sup> reason be unreasonable — have more disdain to hear the truth of any point of faith than to see the proof of many things natural whereof reason can no more attain to the cause than it can in the articles of the faith? But still for any power that reason hath to perceive the cause, she shall judge it impossible after

208 discover 209 hindrance
210 would... should: wants the student of Scripture to 211 lean to: rely on 212 commentators 213 compatible

214 say nay but: deny 215 not at all 216 unless 217 contradicts 218 on 219 according to 220 wishes 221 interior senses (memory, imagination, apprehension, reasoning, will) 222 but if: unless she prove it true, but if she believe her eye better than her wit.

“When ye see the adamant stone<sup>223</sup> draw iron to it, it grieveth not reason to look thereon, but reason hath a pleasure to behold the thing that passeth<sup>224</sup> her power to perceive. For it is as plain against the rule of reason that a heavy body should move alone any other motion than downward, or that any bodily thing should draw another without touching, as is any article of the faith. Nor never was there yet cause by reason assigned that men may perceive for probable, but only that it is a secret property of the stone—which is as much to say as ‘I wot nere<sup>225</sup> what.’ And yet, as I say, reason can believe that thing well enough, and be not angry therewith nor strive against it. And yet all the rules that ever she learned tell her still that it may not be.”

“Yea,” quoth he, “but a man’s own eyes tell him that it may be. And that must needs content him.”

“May a man then better trust his eyes,” quoth I, “than his wit?”<sup>226</sup>

“Yea, marry!”<sup>227</sup> quoth he. “What may he better trust than his eyes?”

“His eyes may,” quoth I, “be deceived and ween they see that they see not, if reason give over his hold, except ye think the juggler blow his galls<sup>228</sup> through the goblet’s bottom, or cut your girdle afore your face in twenty pieces and make it whole again, and put a knife into his eye and see never the worse, and turn a plum into a dog’s turd in a boy’s mouth.”

Now happened it madly that even with this word came one of my folk and asked whether they should make ready for dinner.

“Abide,” quoth I, “let us have better meat<sup>229</sup> first.” And therewith your friend and I began to laugh.

“Well,” quoth I, “make none haste yet for a little while.” And so went he his way, half out of countenance,<sup>230</sup> weening that he had done or said somewhat like a fool, as he was one that was not very wise indeed, and wont<sup>231</sup> so to do. And then said I to your friend, “Now ye see that reason is not so proud a dame as ye take her for. She seeth done indeed by nature that she cannot perceive how, and is well contented therewith. She seeth a fond<sup>232</sup> fellow deceive her sight and her wit therewith, and taketh it well and merrily, and is not angry that the juggler will not teach every man his craft. And ween ye then that she will take it so highly that God himself, her Master and Maker, should do what him list,<sup>233</sup> and then tell her what, and tell her not how? I pray<sup>234</sup> you,” quoth I, “that our Lord was born of a virgin, how know you?”

“Marry,” quoth he, “by Scripture.”

“How know you,” quoth I, “that ye should believe the Scripture?”

“Marry,” quoth he, “by faith.”

“Why,” quoth I, “what doth faith tell you therein?”

“Faith,” quoth he, “telleth me that Holy Scripture is things of truth written by the secret teaching of God.”

“And whereby know you,” quoth I, “that ye should believe God?”

“Whereby?” quoth he. “This is a strange question. Every man,” quoth he, “may well wot that.”

“That is truth,” quoth I. “But is there any horse, or any ass, that wotteth that?”

“None,” quoth he, “that I wot of, but if<sup>235</sup> Balaam’s ass anything understood thereof.<sup>236</sup> For he spoke like a good reasonable ass.”

“If no brute beast can wit<sup>237</sup> that,” quoth I, “and every man may, what is the cause why that man may and other beasts may not?”

“Marry,” quoth he, “for man hath reason and they have none.”

“Ah well then,” quoth I, “reason must he needs have, then, that shall perceive what he should believe. And so must reason not resist faith, but walk with her, and as her handmaid so wait upon her that—as contrary as ye take her, yet of a truth—faith goeth never without her. But likewise as if a maid be suffered<sup>238</sup> to run on the bridle,<sup>239</sup> or be cupshotten,<sup>240</sup> or wax too proud, she will then wax copious and chop<sup>241</sup> logic with her mistress, and fare<sup>242</sup> sometimes as<sup>243</sup> she were frantic, so if reason be suffered to run out at riot, and wax over-high-hearted and proud, she will not fail to fall in rebellion toward her mistress, faith. But on the other side, if she be well brought up and well guided and kept in

223 adamant stone: magnet 224 surpasses
225 wot nere: know not 226 intellect
227 indeed 228 oak apples 229 food
230 out of countenance: disconcerted

231 accustomed 232 foolish 233 wishes
234 ask 235 but if: unless 236 See Nm 22:28–30. 237 know 238 allowed 239 suffered... bridle: allowed to get out of control 240 drunk 241 wax... chop:

grow profuse in speech and bandy 242 as if 243 become

good temper,<sup>244</sup> she shall never disobey faith, being in her right mind. And therefore let reason be well guided, for surely faith goeth never without her.

“Now, in the study of Scripture—in devising
5 upon the sentence,<sup>245</sup> in considering what ye read, in pondering the purpose of diverse comments,<sup>246</sup> in comparing together diverse texts that seem contrary and be not—albeit I deny not but that grace and God’s especial help is the great thing therein, yet
10 useth he for an instrument man’s reason thereto.<sup>247</sup>

God helpeth us to eat, also, but yet not without our mouth. Now as the hand is<sup>248</sup> the more nimble by the use of some feats,<sup>249</sup> and the legs and feet more swift and sure by custom of going and running, 15 and the whole body the more wieldy and lusty<sup>250</sup> by some kind of exercise, so is it no doubt but that reason is by study, labor, and exercise of logic, philosophy, and other liberal arts, corroborated and quickened,<sup>251</sup> and the judgment—both in them and also 20 in orators, laws, and stories<sup>252</sup>—much riped.<sup>253</sup> And albeit poets be with many men taken but for painted words, yet do they much help the judgment, and make a man, among other things, well furnished of one special thing, without which all learning is half 25 lame.”

“What is that?” quoth he.

“Marry,” quoth I, “a good mother wit.<sup>254</sup> And therefore are, in mine opinion, these Lutherans in a mad mind, that would now have all learning save 30 Scripture only clean<sup>255</sup> cast away, which things (if the time will serve) be as methinketh to be taken and had,<sup>256</sup> and with reason brought, as I said before, into the service of divinity.<sup>257</sup> And as holy Saint Jerome saith, the Hebrews well ‘despoil the Egyptians’<sup>258</sup> when Christ’s learned men take out of the pagan writers the riches and learning and wisdom that God gave unto them, and employ the same in the service of divinity about<sup>259</sup> the profit of God’s chosen children of Israel, the Church of Christ, 35 which he hath, of the hard stony paynims,<sup>260</sup> made the children of Abraham.”<sup>261</sup>

THE TWENTY-FOURTH CHAPTER

The messenger maketh objections against the author, in that he counseled the student of Scripture to bring the articles of our faith with 45 him for a special rule to construe the Scripture by. And the author confirmeth his counsel given in that behalf,<sup>262</sup> declaring that without that rule, men may soon fall into great errors 50 in the study of Holy Scripture.

With this your friend held, as he said, himself somewhat content that reason was not so great an enemy to faith as she seemed. But yet he thought that she should have need rather to be well bridled than to bear much rule in the interpretation of Scripture.
55 But as for the other point—that we should needs bring the faith with us already, as a rule to learn the Scripture by, when we come to the Scripture to learn the faith by—that thing he thought in no wise convenient,<sup>263</sup> but a thing, he said, much like as if 60 we would go make the cart to draw the horse.

“Well,” quoth I, “we shall see anon<sup>264</sup> whether the cart draw the horse or the horse the cart, or whether we be yet haply<sup>265</sup> so blind that we see not well which is the cart, which is the horse.”
65

“First,” quoth I, “tell me, how old would ye that one were ere he come to the study of Scripture?”

“By my faith,” quoth he, “I would have a Christian man’s child begin therein very young, and therein continue all his life.”
70

“In good faith,” quoth I, “that like I not amiss, so that<sup>266</sup> ye do not mean that ye would have him all his life learn nothing else. And yet that could I suffer too, and allow right well in some. But yet if he did never in his life learn aught<sup>267</sup> else, how old 75 think ye that he should be ere he learned the articles of his belief in the Bible?”

“I cannot readily tell,” quoth he, “for I have not seen it assayed.”<sup>268</sup>

“Well,” quoth I, “since we be not sure how long 80 it would be in learning there, were it not best then that for that while he were taught his creed before, in his own mother tongue?”

244 composure 245 devising... sentence: interpreting the meaning 246 commentaries 247 also 248 becomes 249 use of some feats: practice of some exercises 250 wieldy and lusty: agile and healthy 251 corroborated and quickened: strengthened and invigorated

252 histories, historical writings 253 matured 254 shrewd intelligence; common sense 255 completely 256 held; possessed 257 theology 258 See Ex 3:22. 259 for 260 pagans 261 See Mt 3:9; Lk 3:8; Jerome, Letter 10 (PL 22: 664–65); Augustine, De doctrina

Christiana 2.40.60–61 (PL 34: 63). 262 in that behalf: regarding that aspect of the matter 263 in no wise convenient: by no means proper 264 soon 265 perhaps 266 so that: so long as 267 anything 268 tried; tested

“I deny not that,” quoth he, “that he should con<sup>269</sup> his creed before, because every Christian man’s child, by the law, should know his faith as soon as he could, but I say he should not therewith take upon him to judge and examine Holy Scripture thereby.”

“Well,” quoth I, “let this Christian child of ours alone for a while. And let us consider if there were a good old idolater that never had heard in all his life anything of our belief, or of other god than only the man in the moon, whom he had watched and worshipped every frosty night. If this man might suddenly have the whole Bible turned into his own tongue, and read it over, think ye that he should thereby learn all the articles of the faith?”

“I think,” quoth he, “that he might.”

“Think ye so?” quoth I. “I put case<sup>270</sup> that he believed that all the book were lies.”

“Marry,” quoth he, “that may he, by the book himself,<sup>271</sup> learn the contrary. For the book in telling his tale affirmeth his tale and teacheth it to be true.”

“Ye say very truth,” quoth I, “if it were all one to read a thing and learn a thing. But now might there be another book made also, with lesser wonders and fewer, and thereby less unlikely, and yet all untrue. And how should his mind give him then that this book telling so incredible wonders should be true?”

“Nay,” quoth he, “that thing must he needs believe, or else he can perceive nothing.”

“Well,” quoth I, “then is there one point of faith, one great lesson, to be learned without the book, that must be learned somewhere, either by God or man, or else the whole book will do us little service. And of whom we shall learn that, we shall see hereafter. But now suppose that this old idolater were thoroughly persuaded in his mind that all the book were true. Think you then that he should find out therein all the articles of our faith?”

“I think,” quoth he, “that he should.”

“Think ye so?” quoth I. “Be it so then. But think ye that he shall find them out all in a week?”

“Nay,” quoth he, “that can he not do.”

“Well,” quoth I, “then since he shall not, at the leastwise, find them out all on a day, let us leave him a little while in seeking, and we shall return again after to him, and look what he shall have founden. And in the mean season<sup>272</sup> we shall go look again upon our good little godson, the boy, pardie,<sup>273</sup> that we christened right now and taught him his creed and set him to Scripture. Were it need that this child knew no more of his faith but his creed before he go to Scripture?”

“Methinketh,” quoth he, “that it were enough.”

“Be it so then,” quoth I.

“What if it should fortune him to find some text of Scripture that should seem to him to be contrary to his creed? As, for example, if he happened upon the reading of these words: Dii estis, et filii Excelsi omnes (‘Gods be ye all, and the children of the High God’).<sup>274</sup> What if he would ween that, since in these words it is said all good men be the children of God, our Savior Christ were not God’s only-begotten Son, but his son in such wise as God, by the prophet, calleth all good men?”

“That could he not think,” quoth he. “For he should in other parts of Scripture find many places that should show him well the contrary.”

“Well said,” quoth I, “and very truth. But now in the meantime, will ye that he shall believe as that text shall seem to sound<sup>275</sup> to him against his creed, till he have found another text in Scripture that answereth it and seemeth to him to say more plainly the contrary?”

“Nay,” quoth he, “not one hour. For he seeth that though other good men be called ‘God’s children’ and ‘gods,’ yet as they be not very gods, so be they not God’s very natural children by generation, but by acceptation; whereas the creed saith of our Savior that he is God’s only-begotten Son, that signifieth him to be his son by generation.”

“That is,” quoth I, “very true, and well and reasonably considered, and according unto the very right faith. But now consider that ye make him by and by<sup>276</sup> fall to the squaring of his stones, like that slothful mason that ye spoke of, with his leaden rule.<sup>277</sup> For now ye make him to examine the truth of this text of the psalm by the article of the faith which he brought with him — and by a collection<sup>278</sup> and discourse<sup>279</sup> of reason. And so, forthwith,<sup>280</sup> ye find both these rules necessary to the discussion of Scripture. Of which twain ye would in the beginning admit neither nother.<sup>281</sup>

“But now go further. What if he would upon this

269 learn by heart 270 put case: propose hypothetically (a common legal practice)

271 itself 272 mean season: meantime

273 an exclamation; “by God” (from French) 274 Ps 81(82):6

275 mean 276 by and by: immediately

277 leaden rule: ruler made of lead

278 deduction 279 process; argument

280 right away

281 neither nother: neither the one nor the other text—Homines et iumenta salvabis, Deus (‘God, thou shalt save both man and beasts’)<sup>282</sup>—ween that beasts had immortal souls as men have, and that man and beast should<sup>283</sup> be both saved at last, and so, that no deadly sin should be punished with everlasting pain, till he came to other texts that should prove well the contrary—were that best? Or else were it better that besides his creed he had knowledge before of these articles of our faith—that only our souls be immortal, and not beasts’ also, and that the pain of hell shall be for sinners everlasting—and that he may thereby, with reason joined thereto, perceive that this text, ‘thou shalt save both men and beasts,’ is meant by some other kind of saving and preserving here in this world, and not of bringing both to heaven?”

“All this may he know,” quoth he, “by Scripture itself well enough.”

“That wot I well,” quoth I. “And yet as plain as Christ speaketh of hell in the Gospel, Origen for all that—which<sup>284</sup> neither was a naughty<sup>285</sup> man nor unlearned in Scripture—could not so clearly see it but that he said the contrary, and took the words of Christ in a wrong sense, and would peradventure<sup>286</sup> with one that would stick only upon the words of Scripture (leaving the right sense thereof, which God and his Holy Spirit hath taught his Church), bring him to a bay<sup>287</sup> therein, that he should be fain<sup>288</sup>—not our child only, but also a well elderly man and in Scripture well forward<sup>289</sup>—to take him in conclusion to the faith of Christ’s Church.

“Now if our child should read on<sup>290</sup> the text of Scripture, without care of the comments, and without any further instruction of the points of our faith than be specified in our common creed, made in the beginning as a brief remembrance by the apostles, not setting out (in so short a thing) and clearly declaring all that we be bounden to believe, albeit that he should well find in Scripture many plain and open<sup>291</sup> texts whereby the Godhead of our Savior and his equality with his Father may well and sufficiently be proved, yet were he not unlikely, by such other texts as seem to show him to be less than his Father, to fall into the sect and heresy of the Arrians, and, against those other texts proving his equal Godhead, to devise such false glosses as they did. Whereas, being before taught and confirmed by the faith of the Church that our Savior is one God and one equal substance with his Father, he shall well perceive and understand thereby that all the texts that seem to make him less be nothing to be understood of his Godhead, but of his manhood only, as when we commonly speak of ourselves and of our own nature, and say we shall die, and worms eat us up and turn all to dust, we mean all this by<sup>292</sup> our body only, and nothing intend thereby to deny the immortality of our soul.

“We may not dine today if I should reckon<sup>293</sup> you the tenth part of such things as we must needs (upon loss of heaven) believe—which neither our child with his only creed (and much less our old idolater without creed) should so find out by Scripture but that they were both well likely to take the Scripture to the wrong part—except<sup>294</sup> we take with us, for a rule of interpretation, the articles of our faith.”

THE TWENTY-FIFTH CHAPTER

The author, taking occasion upon certain words of the messenger, declareth<sup>295</sup> the preeminence, necessity, and profit of Holy Scripture, showing nevertheless that many things have been taught by God without writing. And many great things so remain, yet unwritten of truths necessary to be believed. And that the New Law of Christ is the law so written in the heart that it shall never out of his Church. And that the law there written by God is a right rule to interpret the words written in his Holy Scripture. Which rule, with reason and the old interpreters, the author showeth to be the very sure way to wade with in the great stream of Holy Scripture.

“Why then,” quoth he, “this were as much to say as that God had not well written his Holy Scripture, if he have caused it to be written so as men may be so soon deceived therein that they were as likely—and as it seemeth by you, more likely—to fall into a false way than find out the true. And better were it then that God had not given us the Scripture at all, than to give us a way to walk wherein we were more likely to sink than save ourselves.”

“Holy Scripture,” quoth I, “both is such as I have 282 Ps 35(36):6 283 would 284 who 285 evil 286 perhaps 287 impasse

288 obliged 289 well forward: very advanced (in study) 290 read on: keep reading 291 clear 292 about 293 list for 294 unless 295 clarifies, explains

said, and yet nothing followeth it thereupon that God hath not caused it to be written well, or that it had been better to have kept it from us. And albeit that in this point were a great occasion of a long tale—in declaring and making open that God hath, in that writing of Holy Scripture, used so high wisdom, and showed such a wonderful temperance, that the very strange familiar fashion thereof may, to good men and wise, well declare that, as it was written by men, so was it indited<sup>296</sup> by God—yet passing over the praise, I will speak one word or twain for the answer of such blame as ye lay thereto. For it is almost a common thing among men to speak sometimes as though they could amend the works of God. And few men be there, I ween, but they think that if they had been of God’s counsel in the making of the world, though they dare not be so bold to say that they could have made it better, yet if they might have ruled it, he should have made many things of another fashion. And for all that, if he would yet call us all to counsel, and change nothing till we were upon everything all agreed, the world were well likely till Doomsday<sup>297</sup> to go forth on as it goeth already—saving that I wot nere<sup>298</sup> whether we would all agree to be winged.

“But as for the Scripture, shortly: God hath so devised it that he hath given the world therein an inestimable treasure as the case standeth. And yet we should haply<sup>299</sup> nothing have needed thereof if the wounds of our own folly had not, of our great necessity and God’s great goodness, required it. For at our creation he gave but two precepts or three by his own holy mouth to our first parents. And as for all that was for them to do besides, the reason which he had planted in their souls gave them sufficient warning. Whereof the whole sum stood, in effect, in the honor of God and God’s friends, with love of each to the other, and to their offspring and lineage. But the precepts that he gave by mouth was three: twain commanding generation and eating,<sup>300</sup> the third forbidding the Tree of Knowledge.<sup>301</sup> And that was for them continual, where the other twain, albeit they were thereto bounden by the precept, yet were not they and their posterity bounden thereto at all hours and all places. But need was it in the beginning to give them knowledge thereof, forasmuch as<sup>302</sup> they had no hunger to warn them of the one, nor sensual, rebellious appetite to warn them of the other. But after that they were by God once admonished thereof, then did reason interpret the remnant, whereby they wist<sup>303</sup> that they should eat for conservation of their bodies, and engender for propagation of their kind. And since they perceived that these two things was the end and intent of those commandments, they thereby consequently knew when it was time and place and occasion convenient<sup>304</sup> to fulfill them. But when they had once, at the subtle suasion of the devil, broken the third commandment in tasting the forbidden fruit, being then expelled out of Paradise,<sup>305</sup> then concerning their food and engendering, not only reason oft showed them what was honest and profitable, but also sensuality, what was beastly and pleasant, which sensuality labored so busily to cause man to set by<sup>306</sup> delight above good and convenient that, for the resistance thereof, it then became to be the spiritual business and occupation of man so to preserve and bring up the body that it were not suffered<sup>307</sup> to master the soul, and so to rule and bridle sensuality that it were subject and obedient unto reason, as God willed the woman to be subject and obediencer of man. Wherein God would that we were learned rather to suffer our sensual parts plain<sup>308</sup> and mourn than to follow their own hurt and ours too, as it had been better for our father Adam, and us all, that he had suffered his wife, our mother Eve, to be sad and angry both, and like a woman to weep too, than to have eaten the apple for fellowship, to please her withal.

“Now did all the sin anon<sup>309</sup> spring up, for the more part, upon the occasion of feeding and engendering, whereof sprung covetise,<sup>310</sup> gluttony, sloth, wrath, and lechery. And many times pride and envy, as one perceiving himself in these things in better condition or worse than another, so began to conceive a setting by<sup>311</sup> himself with contempt of other, or envy and hatred to some other (saving<sup>312</sup> that pride sometimes also sprang out of the soul), and so liked itself that it envied the better, as Cain did Abel;<sup>313</sup> and for to be the more set by, pride longed superfluously<sup>314</sup> to get by covetise and greediness many folks’ livings in his own hands, to make other

296 dictated; composed 297 Judgment Day. See Mt 10:15. 298 wot nere: know not 299 perhaps 300 See Gn 1:28–30. 301 See Gn 2:15–16.

302 forasmuch as: seeing that 303 knew 304 appropriate 305 See Gn 3:4–6, 23. 306 set by: value 307 allowed 308 to complain 309 immediately

310 covetousness 311 setting by: (high) valuing of 312 except 313 See Gn 4:5. 314 inordinately folks serve him, and honor and hang upon him for necessity.

“And, of all these mischiefs, was always sensuality ready to minister<sup>315</sup> matter, and by all the doors and windows of the body — by feeling, tasting, smelling, sight, and hearing — ceased never to send in occasions to the soul; nor the devil never ceased, for his part, diligently to put forward. Against whom did reason resist, with good counsel given to the soul; and good spirits appointed by God gave their help also; and God assisted with his aid and grace, where he found the person willing to work therewith. And in this manner continued man long time, not without revelation of Christ once to come. Which faith, delivered to the father, went by the mouth to the son, and so, from child to child, heard and believed among them. And whatso<sup>316</sup> were God’s pleasure besides (that nature and reason could not plainly show them), God of his goodness by special message gave them undoubted knowledge — as he did to Noah, Lot, and Abraham, and diverse others, whereof some be since written and comprised in Scripture, and of likelihood not all. For well probable is it that the patriarchs, in diverse things that they did — as in their diverse marriages, and some such other things as then were by them well done for the time — were to them appointed specially by God for causes well known to himself and unknown to us, and the things now forbidden us and therefore to us unlawful, except<sup>317</sup> God’s like ordinance or dispensation should hereafter, in general or particular, be revealed to the contrary.

“But so was it after that, the world waxing worse, right good and virtuous lineages declined and decayed. And by the lewd<sup>318</sup> conversation of evil people fell by disorder in such a blindness that, albeit some were there always that perceived well their duty, yet were the common people of the children of Israel by custom of sin so darked in their natural knowledge that they lacked in many things the right perceiving, that reason — had it not been by evil custom corrupted — might verily well have showed them.

“For the remedy whereof God of his endless mercy, by the law written with his own finger unto Moses in the tables of stone,<sup>319</sup> by the Ten Commandments,<sup>320</sup> put in remembrance again certain conclusions of the law of nature which their reason — overwhelmed with sensuality — had then forgotten. And to the end that they should keep his behests the better, he gave them a great heap of the laws, and ceremonies more, to keep them in straitly, for<sup>321</sup> straying abroad in riot. And wrought great wonders that they should well see that those things were his own deed, whereby they might have the more dread to transgress them. And there in writing he gave a warning also of Christ: that God would once send them one springing of themselves, to whom they should give hearing in stead of Moses.<sup>322</sup> Of whom also — as well before as after — by patriarchs and prophets, by figures and prophecies, God ceased not in such wise to foreshow his coming, his cause, his living, his dying, his resurrection, and his holy acts that, if pride and envy had not letted<sup>323</sup> it, the figures and prophecies, set and compared with his coming, conversation, and doings, might well have made all the Jews to know him. And for the perceiving and good understanding of the law written, he sent always some good men whose words, well living — and sometimes also manifest miracles showed therewith — never left them destitute of sufficient knowledge that<sup>324</sup> longed to learn the Law, not to plead<sup>325</sup> it, and for glory to dispute it, but to teach it again meekly, and, as man’s frailty could suffer<sup>326</sup> it, specially to fulfill and keep it.

“Yet after all this — when the world was in a more decay and ruin of all virtue — then came our Savior Christ to redeem us with his death and leave us his New Law, whereof was long before prophesied by the prophet Jeremiah. ‘Lo, the days be coming, said our Lord, when I shall order and dispose to the house of Israel and the house of Judah a new covenant’ (or ‘testament’). ‘I shall give my law in their minds. And I shall write it in their heart. And I will be their Lord, and they shall be my people.’<sup>327</sup> This law written in men’s hearts was, according to the words of the prophet, first brought by our Savior to the house of Israel and the house of Judah, to whom, as himself saith, he was specially sent. ‘I am not sent,’ saith our Lord, ‘but unto the sheep that are perished of the house of Israel.’<sup>328</sup> And also he said, ‘It is not good to take the bread from the board<sup>329</sup> of the children and cast it to dogs.’<sup>330</sup> But yet not only the ready towardness<sup>331</sup> of some paynims<sup>332</sup> caused

315 supply 316 whatever 317 unless 318 wicked 319 See Ex 31:18. 320 See Ex 20:1-17; Dt 5:6-21. 321 to hinder

322 See Dt 18:15-19. 323 prevented
324 who 325 debate 326 endure
327 Jer 31:31-33; Heb 10:16 328 Mt

15:24 329 table 330 Mt 15:26
331 inclination 332 pagans

them to be partakers of that bread, but also soon after the stubbornness and obstinate infidelity<sup>333</sup> of the Jews caused Saint Paul and the apostles to say unto their face: “The Gospel of Christ was ordained by God to be first preached unto you. But since that ye refuse it, lo, we depart from you to the gentiles.”<sup>334</sup> And so was, in their stead, the Church gathered of all the world abroad.<sup>335</sup> All which notwithstanding, both were there at that time out of the Jews converted and made many a good Christian man, and many of the same people turned unto Christ since; and in conclusion, the time shall come when the remnant that shall be then left shall save themselves by the same faith.<sup>336</sup>

“This is called the law of Christ’s faith, the law of his holy Gospel. I mean not only the words written in the books of his evangelists, but much more specially the substance of our faith itself, which our Lord said he would write in men’s hearts, not only because of the secret operation of God and his Holy Spirit in justifying the good Christian — either by the working with man’s good will to the perfection of faith in his soul, or with the good intent of the offerers,<sup>337</sup> to the secret infusion of that virtue into the soul of an innocent infant — but also for that<sup>338</sup> he first, without writing, revealed those heavenly mysteries by his blessed mouth through the ears of his apostles and disciples into their holy hearts; or rather, as it seemeth, it was inwardly infused into Saint Peter his<sup>339</sup> heart by the secret inspiration of God, without either writing or any outward word.

“For which cause when he had, upon Christ’s question demanding,<sup>340</sup> ‘Of whom say you that I am?’ answered and said, ‘Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God, which art comen into this world.’

“Our Savior said again<sup>341</sup> unto him, ‘Thou art blessed, Simon, the son of John, for neither flesh nor blood hath revealed and showed this to thee, but my Father that is in heaven.’<sup>342</sup> And thus it appeareth that the faith came into Saint Peter his heart — as to the prince of the apostles — without hearing, by secret inspiration, and into the remnant by his confession and Christ’s holy mouth. And by them in like manner — first without writing, by only words and preaching — so was it spread abroad in the world that his faith was by the mouths of his holy messengers put into men’s ears, and by his holy hand written in men’s hearts, ere ever any word thereof almost was written in the Book.<sup>343</sup> And so was it convenient<sup>344</sup> for the law of life rather to be written in the lively<sup>345</sup> minds of men than in the dead skins of beasts. And I nothing doubt but all had it so been<sup>346</sup> that never Gospel had been written, yet should the substance of this faith never have fallen out of Christian folks’ hearts, but the same Spirit that planted it, the same should have watered it, the same should have kept<sup>347</sup> it, the same should have increased it.

“But so hath it liked our Lord, after his high wisdom, to provide that some of his disciples have written many things of his holy life, doctrine, and faith, and yet far from all — which, as Saint John saith, the world could not have comprehended.<sup>348</sup>

“These books are tempered,<sup>349</sup> by the secret counsel of the Holy Ghost, so plain and simple that every man may find in them that he may perceive, and yet so high again, and so hard, that no man is there so cunning<sup>350</sup> but he may find in them things far above his reach, far too profound to pierce unto. Now were to the Christian people the points of Christ’s faith (with which points our Lord would have them charged) known, as I say, and planted before; and by reason thereof, they far the better understood those books. And although there might haply<sup>351</sup> be some texts which were not yet of necessity for them to perceive, yet by the points of their faith were they warned, that no text might there be construed contrary to their faith.

“And none evangelist was there, nor none apostle, that by writing ever sent the faith to any nation but if<sup>352</sup> they were first informed by word, and that God had begun his Church in that place.

“And for my part, I would little doubt but that the evangelists and apostles both, of many great and secret mysteries spoke much more openly, and much more plainly by mouth among the people, than ever they put it in writing, forasmuch as their writings were likely enough at that time to come into the hands of pagans and paynims, such hogs and dogs as were not meetly<sup>353</sup> to have those precious pearls put upon their noses, nor that holy food to be dashed<sup>354</sup> in their teeth.<sup>355</sup> For which cause Saint Peter, in his

333 lack of belief 334 Acts 13:46 335 at large 336 See Rom 11:15. 337 baptismal sponsors 338 for that: because 339 Peter his: Peter’s 340 asking 341 in reply 342 Mt 16:15–17 343 i.e., Bible 344 fitting 345 living 346 but... so been: that even if it had been 347 tended 348 contained. See Jn 21:25.

349 composed 350 learned 351 perhaps 352 but if: unless 353 fit 354 thrown, thrust 355 See Mt 7:6.

first sermon unto the Jews,<sup>356</sup> abstained from the declaration of Christ's Godhead and equality with his Father, as our Savior himself, when the Jews that were unworthy to hear it were offended with that<sup>357</sup> he told them plainly that he was the Son of God, withdrew the doctrine from them again and covered it with the verse of the prophet: 'I have said ye be gods, and sons of the high God, all,<sup>358</sup> as though he would say, 'What grieveth it you that name in me, which name "god" by the prophet, hath given to all good men?'<sup>359</sup> In which demeanor<sup>360</sup> he denied not the truth that he had said of himself, but he blinded their willfully winking eyes, in hiding and putting up again the jewel that he began to bring forth and show them, the bright luster whereof their bleared eyes might not endure to behold.

"And what marvel though the apostles thus did in their speech afore infidels, or writing that might come into pagans' hands, when it appeareth upon the epistles of Saint Paul that among the Christian flock, where he taught them by mouth, he told them not all the truths at one tale<sup>361</sup> — not only for that<sup>362</sup> it were too long, but also for that in the beginning they could not, haply, well have abidden it.<sup>363</sup> And therefore, as Christ said to his disciples, 'I have more to say to you, but ye be not able to bear it yet'<sup>364</sup> (which once appeared, what<sup>365</sup> time that upon the disclosing of the great mystery of the Holy Sacrament, the holy flesh of his body, the hearers said, 'Who can abide this hard word?'<sup>366</sup> and therewith went, almost all, their way), so did Saint Paul, I say, by the Corinthians, not teach them all at once. And therefore he saith in his epistle to them, 'I have given you hitherto but milk, and not strong meat.'<sup>367</sup> And, 'Wisdom speak we,' saith he, 'among folk that be perfect.'<sup>368</sup> Nor I mean not this — that there were any points of the substance of the faith which he showed to the clergy that he kept from the lay people, or showed unto one man that he kept from another — but that to no man lightly<sup>369</sup> he showed all at once. But because some came from the Jews and some came of the Gentiles, therefore, as they were, so were they handled, not only by grace, but also by wisdom, and not only in the points of the faith, but also in the rites and ceremonies, either of the Church or of Moses' Law — whereof some ceremonies were forthwith<sup>370</sup> abolished, some not by and by,<sup>371</sup> and some taken into the Church of Christ and observed still. But in conclusion, when they were meet therefor,<sup>372</sup> they were all taught, all that God would have them bounden to believe. And then doubt I nothing but that many things that now be very dark in Holy Scripture were, by the apostles (to whom our Lord opened their wits that they might understand Scripture), so plainly declared<sup>373</sup> that they were by the people well and clearly understood. I say not all the whole Scripture, in which it may be that many a secret mystery lieth yet covered concerning the coming of Antichrist, and the day, manner, and fashion of the Final Judgment, which shall never be fully disclosed till the times appointed by God's high Providence meet and convenient<sup>374</sup> for them. And from time to time, as it liketh his Majesty to have things known or done in his Church, so is it no doubt but he tempereth his revelations, and in such wise doth insinuate and inspire them into the breasts of his Christian people that, by the secret instinct of the Holy Ghost, they consent and agree together in<sup>375</sup> one, except heretics that rebel and refuse to be obedient to God and his Church, who be thereby cut off from the lively<sup>376</sup> tree of that vine, and — waxing<sup>377</sup> withered branches — be kept but for the fire first here, and after in hell, except<sup>378</sup> they repent and call for grace, that may graft them into the stock again.<sup>379</sup> But as it may be that many things be there not all at once revealed and understood in the Scripture, but by sundry times and ages more things and more by God unto his Church disclosed and that as it shall like his high goodness and wisdom to dispense and dispose, and as it may be also in things to be done, may fall in his Church variety, mutation, and change, so am I very sure that the Holy Ghost that God sent into his Church — and Christ himself that hath promised unto the end of the world to persevere and abide in his Church<sup>380</sup> — shall never suffer<sup>381</sup> his Catholic Church neither to agree to the making of any law that shall be to God damnably displeasing, nor of any truth that God would were believed, to determine or believe the contrary. For then had 356 See Acts 2:22-42. 357 with that: by that which 358 Jn 10:28-38 359 See Ps 81(82):6; Jn 10:34. 360 conduct 361 at one tale: in the same statement 362 for that: because 363 See 1 Cor 3:1-2.

364 Jn 16:12 365 that 366 See Jn 6:61, 67. 367 1 Cor 3:2 368 1 Cor 2:6 369 easily; readily 370 immediately 371 immediately 372 meet therefor: fit for it 373 explained 374 meet and convenient: fit and suitable 375 as 376 living 377 becoming 378 unless 379 See Jn 15:6; Rom 11:22-23. 380 See Mt 28:20. 381 allow Christ, which is all truth, broken his promise, and (which were blasphemy and abominable to think) were waxen<sup>382</sup> untrue. And therefore over<sup>383</sup> this as it may be that, as I said before, some things in Holy Scripture be not yet fully perceived and understood, so am I very sure that the Church neither doth nor can do damnably construe it wrong, which it should if they should construe it so as it should make an article of misbelief and of a false, erroneous faith — as if they should by misconstruction<sup>384</sup> of the Scripture bring up and believe that Christ were one God and equal with his Father and with the Holy Ghost, if the truth were otherwise indeed. And therefore, since the Church (in which Christ is assistant<sup>385</sup> and his Holy Spirit) cannot to God's displeasure and their damnation fall in any false belief, in any such substantial point of the faith, it must needs be therefore that Arius and all other heretics be drowned in damnable errors. The contrary opinion of whose execrable heresies the Church was in the beginning taught by the mouth of Christ himself, and after, of his blessed apostles, which<sup>386</sup> read and declared the Scriptures among the people in their time, showing them in what wise<sup>387</sup> the words of Holy Scripture proved the truth of such articles of the faith as they taught them by mouth, and how such texts as seemed the contrary were not contrary indeed, and therewith declared them of those texts the right understanding.

“And albeit that our Savior showed and plainly proved that in the Scripture was given good tokens and sufficient knowledge of him, yet to the intent we should well know that his own word and ordinance needeth none other authority but himself, but is to be believed and obeyed, be it written or not written, some things did he therefore bid to be done, and some things also to be believed, whereof we have in Holy Scripture no writing in the world. Saint Paul commandeth the people of Thessalonica in his epistle<sup>388</sup> to keep the traditions that he took them either by his writing or by his bare<sup>389</sup> word. For the words that he said among them, our Lord had told them him<sup>390</sup> for them. And therefore he writeth unto the Corinthians that of the holy Housel,<sup>391</sup> the Sacrament of the altar, he had showed them the matter and the manner by mouth, as our Lord had himself taught it to him.<sup>392</sup> And therefore no doubt is there but that by the apostles was the Church more fully taught of that matter than ever was written in all the Scripture. There was learned the manner and form of consecration. There was learned much of the mystical gestures and ceremonies used in the Mass. And if any man doubt thereof, let him consider where should we else have the beginning of<sup>393</sup> the water put with the wine into the chalice. For well we wot that the Scripture bideth it not. And every wise man may well wit<sup>394</sup> then when the Gospel speaketh only of wine, there durst no man in this world have been so bold to put anything else thereto. For when the Gospel speaketh of wine only turned into his Precious Blood, what man would adventure<sup>395</sup> to make any mixture of<sup>396</sup> water? And now is the Church so well ascertained of God's pleasure therein, without any Scripture, that they not only dare put in water, but also dare not leave it out. And whereby knew the Church this thing, but by God and his holy apostles, which<sup>397</sup> taught it in their time? And so went it forth from age to age, continued in the Church until this day, begun by God in the beginning, without any mention made in Holy Scripture.

“Howbeit, Luther saith because it is not commanded by Scripture, we may choose therefore whether we will do it or leave it. For this one point is the very fond<sup>398</sup> foundation and ground of all his great heresies: that a man is not bounden to believe anything but if<sup>399</sup> it may be proved evidently by Scripture. And thereupon goeth he so far-forth<sup>400</sup> that no Scripture can be evident to prove<sup>401</sup> anything that he list<sup>402</sup> to deny. For he will not agree it for evident, be it never so plain. And he will call evident for him that text that is evident against him. And sometimes, if it be too plain against him, then will he call it no Scripture, as he playeth with the epistle of Saint James. And because the old holy doctors be full and whole against him, he setteth them all at nought.<sup>403</sup> And with these worshipful<sup>404</sup> wise ways he proclaimeth himself a conqueror, where, besides all the remnant — wherein every child may see his proud, frantic<sup>405</sup> folly — he is

382 were waxen: would have become 383 beyond 384 misinterpretation
385 present 386 who 387 way(s)
388 See 2 Thes 2:15. 389 mere (i.e., spoken) 390 to him 391 Eucharist

392 See 1 Cor 11:23. 393 beginning of: source for 394 know 395 venture 396 make any mixture of: mix in any 397 who 398 foolish 399 but if: unless 400 so far-forth: to such an extent

401 conclusive, certain 402 wishes
403 setteth . . . nought: values as nothing 404 honorable 405 insane

shamefully put to flight in the first point: that is to wit,<sup>406</sup> that nothing is to be believed for a sure truth but if it appear proved and evident in Holy Writ. And yet had that point at the first face<sup>407</sup> some visage<sup>408</sup> of probability. Howbeit, to say the truth, he were a lewd lorel<sup>409</sup> that would nothing do that his master would bid him, nor nothing believe that his master would tell him, but if he take it him in writing, as Luther playeth with Christ. Of whose words or acts he will believe nothing except he find it in Scripture — and that plain and evident. Now must he by that means condemn the Church of Christ for that<sup>410</sup> they sanctify not the Saturday, which was the Sabbath day instituted by God among the Jews, commanding the Sabbath day to be kept holy.<sup>411</sup> And albeit the matter of the precept is moral, and the day legal (so that it may be changed), yet will there, I ween, no man think that ever the Church would take upon themselves to change it without special ordinance of God. Whereof we find no remembrance at all in Holy Scripture. By what Scripture is evidently known that every man and woman hath power to minister<sup>412</sup> the sacrament of baptism? Let it be showed either by commandment, counsel, license, or example expressed in Scripture.

“Many things are there like,<sup>413</sup> which, as holy doctors agree, were taught the apostles by Christ, and the Church by the apostles, and so comen down to our days by continual succession from theirs. But I will let all others pass over, and speak but of one.

“Every good Christian man, I doubt not, believeth that our Blessed Lady was a perpetual virgin, as well after the birth of Christ as before. For it were a strange thing that she should, after that blessed birth, be less minded to cleanness and purity, and set less by her holy purpose and promise of chastity, vowed and dedicated unto God, than she did before. For surely whoso considereth the words of the Gospel in Saint Luke shall well perceive that she had vowed virginity. For when the angel had said unto her, ‘Lo, thou shalt conceive in thy womb and bring forth a child, and thou shalt call his name Jesus,’ she answered him, ‘How may this be? For as for man, I know none,’<sup>414</sup> which, though it be spoken but for the time then present, yet must it needs signify that she never would know none, after<sup>415</sup> the manner of speaking.

By which a nun might say, ‘As for man, there meddleth none with me,’ signifying that never there shall. And in common speech is that figure much in use by which a woman saith of one whom she is determined never to marry, ‘We may well talk together, but we wed not together,’ meaning that they never shall wed together. And in such wise meant our Lady when she said, ‘How may this be? For I know no man,’ meaning that she never would meddle with man — or else had her answer nothing been to purpose. For the angel said not, ‘Lo, thou art conceived,’ which if he had said, she might well have marveled only for that<sup>416</sup> she knew no man already. But when he said, ‘Thou shalt conceive,’ this could be no marvel unto her for that she knew no man already. And therefore, since she marveled how it might be that ever she should conceive and have a child, it must needs be that her answer meant that she never would meddle with man. And therefore she marveled — because he said it should be, and she knew not how it could be, but that<sup>417</sup> ways by which she was at full point<sup>418</sup> with herself that it should never be — so that then he showed her how it should come about: by the Holy Ghost coming into her, and the power of God on high shadowing<sup>419</sup> her. And then she assented, and said, ‘Lo, here the handmaid of God; be it done to me after thy word, as thou tellest me.’<sup>420</sup> And thus appeareth it evidently that she had then a fully determined purpose of virginity — and that, as it seemeth, such as she thought not lawful to change. For else when the angel did the message, she might have inclined thereto though she had before been in another mind. Now, when she had then so full and fast<sup>421</sup> a purpose of perpetual virginity before the birth of her blessed Child — which<sup>422</sup> came, among his other heavenly doctrines, to call and exhort the world from all pleasure of the flesh to the purity and cleanness of the body and soul, and from the desire of carnal generation to a ghostly<sup>423</sup> regeneration in grace — more were it then wonder if she should have then more regard of fleshly delight or cure of<sup>424</sup> worldly procreation than ever she had before her celestial conception of her Maker, made man in her blessed womb. Or what man could think it — that ever God would suffer<sup>425</sup> any earthly man after to be conceived in that holy closet<sup>426</sup> taken up

406 say 407 sight 408 semblance 409 lewd lorel: wicked rogue 410 for that: because 411 See Ex 20:8–11; 23:12;
31:12–17; Dt 5:12–15. 412 administer

413 similar 414 Lk 1:31–34 415 according to 416 for that: because 417 but that: except for 418 resolution 419 overshadowing 420 Lk 1:25–38

421 steadfast 422 who 423 spiritual 424 cure of: concern for 425 allow 426 private place

and consecrated so specially to God? This reverent article of our Lady's perpetual virginity, the Church of Christ, being taught the truth by Christ, perpetually hath believed since the time of Christ. And yet
 5 is there no word thereof in Christ's Gospel written, but rather, diverse texts so sounding to the contrary that by the wrong understanding of them, the heretic Helvidius<sup>427</sup> took the occasion of his heresy by which he would that our Lady after the birth of Christ had 10 other children by Joseph. How can we then say that we could, without the learning of the faith before, find out all the points in the Scripture, when there be some that all Christendom believe — and believe themselves bounden to believe — whereof the Scripture giveth no plain doctrine, but rather seemeth to 15 say the contrary?

“But, as I began to say, the holy apostles, being taught by their great master Christ, did teach unto the Church as well the articles of the faith as the 20 understanding of such texts of Scripture as was meet and convenient<sup>428</sup> for the matter. Whereby it is not unlikely that the Gospel of Saint John and the epistles of Saint Paul were then better understood among the common people than they be peradventure
 25 now with some that take themselves for great clerks.<sup>429</sup> And as the apostles at that time taught the people, so did ever some of them that heard them teach forth, and leave their doctrine and traditions to others that came after. By reason whereof, not 30 only came the rites and sacraments and the articles of our faith from hand to hand, from Christ and his apostles unto our days, but also the great part of the right understanding of Holy Scripture, by good and godly writers of sundry times. By whose good and 35 wholesome doctrine, set forth by their virtue with God's good inspiration, grace, and help of the Holy Ghost, we have also the knowledge and perceiving what was the faith of Christ's Church in every time since. And thereby perceive we that these heretics
 40 be not only barkers against the faith that now is, but also that hath been ever since Christ died.

“And therefore is Holy Scripture, as I said, the highest and the best learning that any man can have, if one take the right way in the learning.

45 “It is (as a good, holy saint saith) so marvelously tempered that a mouse may wade therein, and an elephant be drowned therein.<sup>430</sup> For there is no man so low, but if he will seek his way with the staff of his faith in his hand, and hold that fast and 50 search the way therewith, and have the old holy fathers also for his guides, going on with a good purpose and a lowly heart, using reason and refusing no good learning, with calling of God for wisdom, grace, and help that he may well keep his way and follow his good guides — then shall he never fall in 55 peril, but well and surely wade through, and come to such end of his journey as himself would well wish. But surely, if he be as long as Longinus,<sup>431</sup> and have a high<sup>432</sup> heart and trust upon his own wit — as he doth (look he never so lowly) that setteth all 60 the old holy fathers at nought<sup>433</sup> — that fellow shall not fail to sink over the ears and drown. And of all wretches, worst shall he walk that,<sup>434</sup> forcing little

 65 of<sup>435</sup> the faith of Christ's Church, cometh to the Scripture of God to look and try therein whether the Church believe aright or not. For either doubteth he whether Christ teach his Church true, or else whether Christ teacheth it at all or not. And then he doubteth whether Christ in his words did 70 say true when he said he would be with his Church till the end of the world. And surely the thing that made Arius, Pelagius, Faustus, Manichaeus, Donatus, Helvidius, and all the rabble of the old heretics to drown themselves in those damnable heresies was nothing but high pride of their learning in 75 Scripture — wherein they followed their own wits and left the common faith of the Catholic Church, preferring their own gay<sup>436</sup> glosses before the right catholic faith of all Christ's Church, which can never err in any substantial point that God would 80 have us bounden to believe. And therefore, to end where we began, whoso will not, unto the study of Scripture, take the points of the Catholic faith as a rule of interpretation, but of diffidence and mistrust study to seek in Scripture whether the faith of 85 the Church be true or not, he cannot fail to fall in worse errors, and far more jeopardous,<sup>437</sup> than any man can do by philosophy, whereof the reasons and arguments in matters of our faith have nothing in 90 like<sup>438</sup> authority.”

427 Jerome answered him by a treatise written in 383. 428 meet and convenient: fitting and appropriate 429 scholars 430 See Gregory the Great, Commentary on Job. 431 the name traditionally given to the soldier who pierced Jesus's side with a lance. See Jn 19:34. 432 haughty 433 setteth at nought: values as nothing

434 who 435 forcing little of: attaching little importance to 436 specious; attractive; ornate 437 dangerous 438 in like: like the same

THE TWENTY-SIXTH CHAPTER

The messenger saying that him seemed he<sup>439</sup> should not believe the Church if he saw the Church say one thing and the Holy Scripture another thing, because the Scripture is the Word of God, the author showeth that the faith of the Church is the Word of God as well as the Scripture, and therefore as well to be believed, and that the faith and the Scripture well understood be never contrary, and further showeth that upon all doubts rising upon Holy Scripture concerning any necessary article of the faith, he that cannot, upon all that he can hear in the matter on both sides, perceive the better and truer part, hath a sure and undoubtable refuge provided him by the goodness of God to bring him out of all perplexity, in that God hath commanded him in all such doubts to believe his Church.

“Truly, sir,” quoth he, “methinketh it is well said, that<sup>440</sup> ye have said. And in good faith, to say the truth, I see not what I should answer it withal.<sup>441</sup> And yet, when I look back again upon Holy Scripture, and consider that it is God’s own words—which I wot<sup>442</sup> well ye will grant—I find it hard in mine heart to believe all the men in the whole world, if they would say anything whereof I should see that the Holy Scripture saith the contrary, since it is reason<sup>443</sup> that I believe God alone far better than them all.”

“In that,” quoth I, “ye say very truth. But now I put case<sup>444</sup> that God would tell you two things: whether<sup>445</sup> of them would ye believe best?”

“Neither other,”<sup>446</sup> quoth he, “but I would believe them both firmly and both alike.”

“What if neither other,” quoth I, “were likely to be true, but seemed, both twain, impossible?”

“That should,” quoth he, “make little force<sup>447</sup> to me. For that once known—that God telleth them—seemed they never so far<sup>448</sup> unlikely, nor never so far impossible, I neither should nor could have any doubt but that they were both twain true.”

“That is well said,” quoth I. “But now and<sup>449</sup> it so were that those two things seemed the one to the other clean<sup>450</sup> contrary, what would ye then think, and which would ye then believe?”

“Yet could I not,” quoth he, “doubt anything but that they were very true both, but I would verily think that I did not well understand the one<sup>451</sup> of them.”

“What would ye then do,” quoth I, “if he bade you believe them both?”

“Marry,” quoth he, “then would I pray him tell me first how he understandeth them both. For though I believe that they be both true in that sense and purpose<sup>452</sup> that he taketh<sup>453</sup> his own words, and may, in that manner understood, well stand and agree together,<sup>454</sup> yet can I not believe them both in that sense and understanding wherein they repugn<sup>455</sup> and be directly contrary each to other.”

“That is,” quoth I, “so well said that, in my mind, no man can amend<sup>456</sup> it.”

“But now would I wit,”<sup>457</sup> quoth I, “whether that the faith of the Church be the Word of God, and by God spoken to the Church or not?”

“Yes,” quoth he, “God speaketh to his Church in the Scripture.”

“And is nothing God’s words,” quoth I, “but Scripture? The words that God spoke to Moses—were they not God’s words all, till they were written? And the words of Christ to his apostles—were they not his words till they were written?”

“Yes, then,” quoth he. “But now, since he hath perfected and finished the corpus of Holy Scripture, all things that he would Christian people should<sup>458</sup> believe, and all that he would the Church should do, and all that he would the Church should eschew—all this hath he left them his mind sufficiently in Holy Scripture.”

“And none otherwise,” quoth I, “besides? I had weened we had been at another point,<sup>459</sup> in that ye see the Sabbath day changed into Sunday without any word of Scripture giving any commandment of the change in the New Testament from the commandment given for the Saturday in the Old,<sup>460</sup> and also for the point that we spoke of touching the perpetual virginity of our Lady, whereof is no word written in Scripture. But since I perceive that

439 him seemed be: to him it seemed that he 440 what 441 with 442 know 443 reasonable 444 put case: propose hypothetically a case 445 which 446 Neither other: Neither the one nor the other 447 difference 448 never

so far: no matter how extremely 449 if 450 completely 451 the one: the one or the other 452 (according to the) intention 453 understands 454 well... together: be quite consistent and compatible with each other 455 contradict 456 improve upon 457 would I wit: I want to know 458 would... should: wants the Church to 459 point of agreement 460 See Acts 20:7.

the great affection and reverence that ye bear to the Scripture of God—not without great cause, but without any measure—maketh you in the case that ye take all authority and credence from every word of God spoken beside the Scripture, I would ask you therefore this question: if God in Holy Scripture tell you two things that seem the one contrary to the other—as, for example, if he tell you in one place that he is less than his Father<sup>461</sup> and in another place that he and his Father be all one<sup>462</sup>—which of these will you believe?”

“Marry,” quoth he, “both twain. For they may stand together well enough. For he was less as man, and was all one and equal as God.”

“Very truth it is,” quoth I, “that ye say. But now if ye had been born in the days of Arius the heretic, he would not have received nor held himself content with this answer. But he would have agreed<sup>463</sup> you the first part and put you<sup>464</sup> further to prove the second part. And unto that text he would have made you a gloss that ‘his Father and he were one, not in substance, but in will.’ And that gloss he would have fortified and made somewhat seemly with another word of Christ, in which he prayed his Father saying, ‘As thou and I be both one, so make thou that they and we may be made one,’<sup>465</sup> meaning by<sup>466</sup> his Christian people, which shall never be one with him in substance. So that for the inequality of Christ by reason of his manhood, ye must agree with him; but for unity of Godhead, he will not agree with you, but put you always to prove it.”

“Well,” quoth he, “and though<sup>467</sup> he so did, yet if I were provided therefor,<sup>468</sup> there be texts enough that plainly prove it.”

“That is,” quoth I, “very truth. But yet is there none but he shall always set you another against it, and a gloss as fast<sup>469</sup> for yours as ye shall have an answer for his, in such wise as he may abuse<sup>470</sup> a right wise and well-learned man—as he did in his own days, and many days after, many a thousand. Then if it so were that in that dispicion<sup>471</sup> ye could not make your audience to discern the truth, nor peradventure persuade them to believe the truth, because the false part might hap to have, to the minds of many, a more face<sup>472</sup> of truth, as it had at that time to many that then were of that sect—what way would ye wind out?”<sup>473</sup>

“Marry,” quoth he, “I would believe well myself the truth, and go to God, and let them that would believe the false part go to the devil.”

“Ye should,” quoth I, “have taken therein a good, sure way. But now, if ye had been in that time (albeit ye be now fast and sure in the truth), ye might have happed—while the matter was in question, and many great clerks<sup>474</sup> and well-Scriptured men, and some seeming right holy, set on the wrong side—ye might have happed, I say, so to have been moved with the reasons on both the sides that ye should not have wist<sup>475</sup> on which part to determine your belief. And what would ye then have done?”

Quoth he, “Ye put me now to a pinch; and I shall answer you as I have heard say that Doctor Mayew,<sup>476</sup> sometime Almoner<sup>477</sup> to King Henry the Seventh, answered once the King at his table. It happed that there was fallen in communication<sup>478</sup> the story of Joseph, how his master’s (Potiphar’s) wife, a great man with the King of Egypt, would have pulled him to bed, and he fled away.<sup>479</sup>

“Now, Master Mayew,” quoth the King’s Grace, ‘ye be a tall, strong man on the one side, and a cunning<sup>480</sup> doctor on the other side: What would ye have done if ye had been, not Joseph, but in Joseph’s stead?’

“By my troth,<sup>481</sup> sir,” quoth he, ‘and<sup>482</sup> it like Your Grace, I cannot tell you what I would have done, but I can tell you well what I should have done.’

“By my troth,” quoth the King, ‘that was very well answered.’ And since that answer served him well there, I shall make the same serve me here. For surely, if I had been in Arius’s days, in the point that ye spoke of, what I would have done, that wot I nere.<sup>483</sup> But what I should have done, that can I well tell you, and surely trust I would have done so too.”

“What is that?” quoth I.

“Marry, I would have believed the best,” quoth he.

“The best?” quoth I. “That were best indeed, if ye wist which it were. But the case is put that the reasons<sup>484</sup> grounded upon Scripture seemed unto you

<sup>461</sup> See Jn 14:28. <sup>462</sup> See Jn 10:30.

<sup>463</sup> granted <sup>464</sup> put you: made you go <sup>465</sup> Jn 17:22–23 <sup>466</sup> by that <sup>467</sup> and though: even if <sup>468</sup> provided therefor:
prepared for that <sup>469</sup> firm <sup>470</sup> delude <sup>471</sup> debate <sup>472</sup> more face: greater semblance <sup>473</sup> wind out: get yourself

out (of that situation) <sup>474</sup> scholars
<sup>475</sup> known <sup>476</sup> Doctor Mayew:
Richard Mayew (1439–1516), Bishop of Hereford, who held several academic offices, including chancellor of Oxford <sup>477</sup> The Lord High Almoner was a royal official in charge of distribution to the poor.

<sup>478</sup> was fallen in communication: came up in conversation <sup>479</sup> See Gn 39:4–12.
<sup>480</sup> learned <sup>481</sup> trustworthiness;
faithfulness <sup>482</sup> if <sup>483</sup> wot I nere:
know I not <sup>484</sup> arguments

in such wise each to impugn and answer other<sup>485</sup> that ye stood in such a doubt that ye could in no wise discern whether<sup>486</sup> side said best.”

5 “By God,” quoth he, “I had forgotten that. Well, then were it best,” quoth he, “and so would I have done, I think, kneel me down and make my special prayer to God that it might please his goodness in so great a peril not to leave me perplexed, but vouchsafe<sup>487</sup> to incline mine assent unto that side 10 that he knew were true, and would I should<sup>488</sup> believe to be true. And then would I boldly believe the one which God should have put in my mind. Had not this been the best way?”

15 “If it were not,” quoth I, “the best, it might peradventure serve for a second.”

“A second?” quoth he. “Then ye take it for nought.”<sup>489</sup>

20 “Nay,” quoth I. “There be two seconds, after two manner countings:<sup>490</sup> one next unto the worst, another next unto the best. And your way is surely far from the worst. But yet dare I not assent that it were the best till I understand it better. And therefore I pray you tell me this: if, after your special prayers made, ye wrote the one part in one paper and the 25 other part in another, and laid them both on the ground, and then set up a staff between them both — would ye be then indifferent to take the one side or the other after, as it should hap your staff to fall?”

30 “Why not?” quoth he. “Or else put it upon two lots, and then at adventure<sup>491</sup> draw the one and take it. For when I have done as much as mine own wit<sup>492</sup> will serve, and have heard thereto all that I can of other men, and yet by neither can perceive the better opinion, what should I do, or what could I do,
35 further than pray for grace to guide my choice, and so at adventure boldly take the one and hold it fast, doubting nothing but God assisted my choice, if I have a firm faith in his promise, by which he promiseth that if we ask, we shall have — asking, as Saint 40 James saith, without any doubt?<sup>493</sup> And why should not I, in such perplexed case, after help called for of God, take the one part at adventure by lot, as did the apostles in the choosing of a new, to fulfill the place of the traitor Judas?”<sup>494</sup>

45 “Lots,” quoth I, “be well lawful in the choice of such two things as be both so good that we be likely to choose well enough whethersoever we take. But now, if ye were in the case that I have heard my father merrily say every man is at the choice of his wife — that ye should put your hand into a blind 50 bag<sup>495</sup> full of snakes and eels together, seven snakes for one eel — ye would, I ween, reckon it a perilous choice to take up one at adventure though<sup>496</sup> ye had made your special prayer to speed<sup>497</sup> well. Nor ye ought not in such case to adventure it upon your 55 prayer and trust in God without necessity.”

“That is peradventure truth,” quoth he. “But in our case there is necessity. For there were none other way to avoid the perplexity but even<sup>498</sup> take the one by prayer and firm trust in God, which<sup>499</sup> 60 never deceived them that trust in him.”

“If there were,” quoth I, “none other way, somewhat were it then that ye say. But now consider your case again. And when it so were that ye could 65 not, upon that ye heard the Arians and the Catholic party argue together, perceive whether<sup>500</sup> party were the better. And therefore, of those two tales told you by God in many texts of Holy Scripture — some seeming plainly to say that Christ was not equal with his Father, some seeming as plainly to 70 say the contrary — ye could in no wise find any reason whereby ye could find yourself moved to take the one part for more probable than the other. I put case, then, that God would himself say to you, ‘I have showed the truth of this matter to such a man,
75 and how my Scripture is to be understood concerning the same. Go thy ways, therefore, to him; and that thing that he shall tell thee, that thing believe thou.’ Would ye say, ‘Nay, good Lord, I will ask no man but thyself; and therefore tell me thine<sup>501</sup> own
80 mouth, or else I will take the one part at all adventures,<sup>502</sup> and think that thou would have it so?’ Or else would ye think that God were your good Lord, and had done much for you, in that it liked him so graciously for your surety<sup>503</sup> to bring you out of 85 such a great perplexity, whereby ye should for your own mind have remained in an insoluble doubt in a matter of the faith, wherein it is damnable to dwell in doubt, or (which yet much worse were) have declined peradventure into an invincible error?”
90

485 impugn and answer other: contradict and refute each other 486 which 487 be willing 488 would I should: wanted me to 489 nothing; something bad; worthless 490 after two manner

countings: according to two ways of counting 491 random 492 mind, intellect 493 See Jn 16:24; Jas 1:6–8. 494 See Acts 1:24–26. 495 blind bag: bag that one cannot see into

496 adventure though: risk even if 497 success 498 but even: except just to 499 who 500 which 501 who your 502 at all adventures: completely by fortune 503 certainty; safety

“Verily,” quoth he, “great cause should I have had highly to thank God.”

“Ye would not, then,” quoth I, “first make your prayer and then with good hope (that grace shall guide your fortune) take the one part at adventure by lot, but ye would in your prayer thank God for that provision. And then would ye get you to that man as fast as ye could.”

“Very truth,” quoth he.

“Then if that man should tell you that Arius and his company were heretics all, and took texts of Scripture wrong, ye would believe him?”

“Yea, verily,” quoth he, “that would I.”

“I put case,” quoth I, “that ye had not doubted before, but had been in yourself at clear point that the Arians’s opinion were the truth. Yet ye would, against Arius and all his, and against your own mind also, lean unto his word whom God had bidden you believe?”

“What else?” quoth he.

“What if ye asked him,” quoth I, “whether God have sufficiently showed that point in Scripture, so that it may by the words of Holy Writ well and evidently be proved, and that he told you, ‘Yea?’ And that thereupon he would bring in all the texts that ye had well in remembrance already, and that ye laid against them all that you could lay for the contrary, so far-forth<sup>504</sup> that, when each of you had laid all your texts and all your glosses that either of you both could bring forth, till ye both confessed that neither of ye both could any further thing find therein—he saying still that his way were the truth, and that he had by Scripture well proved it unto you, and yourself, on the other side, for all that ever ye had heard him say, perceiving in your own mind none other but that ye had by Scripture better proved the other part—which would ye now believe? That way that, as far as ye see, God saith himself in Holy Scripture? Or else that man whom God sent you to and bade you believe?”

“Nay verily,” quoth he, “I would believe him.”

“Well said,” quoth I. “But whether would<sup>505</sup> ye only believe him that the truth of the matter were against the Arians, or else would you believe him further, in that he said he had so proved it unto you by Scripture?”

“I would,” quoth he, “believe him therein also.

For since God so had commanded me, and had showed me that he had himself instructed that man in what sense the Scripture were to be understood, I could none otherwise think but that were true, and though<sup>506</sup> it appeared to mine own reason the contrary.”

“Very well said,” quoth I. “Now, if God had said unto you that ye should believe that man concerning the matter itself, and of Scripture had nothing spoken, then would ye have believed him yet in the matter? Would ye not, although he should have told you that he understood no Scripture at all?”

“That is true,” quoth he.

“Now, if he should then have told you that the Arians were heretics in that point, and their opinion erroneous and false, ye would have believed him?”

“What else?” quoth he.

“What if he had told you therewith,”<sup>507</sup> quoth I, “that he wist nere<sup>508</sup> whether it might be well proved by Scripture or not?”

“Yet would I,” quoth he, “nevertheless believe to be true the matter itself that he had told me.”

“What would you then think,” quoth I, “of those texts that ye did reckon before well and plainly to prove the contrary?”

“I would,” quoth he, “then reckon that they were meant some other ways than I could understand. For I could not doubt but being truly understood, they could never witness against the truth.”

“In good faith,” quoth I, “ye say marvelously well. Do ye not,” quoth I, “take it for all one, whether God bid you do a thing by his own mouth or by Holy Scripture?”

“Yes,” quoth he, “saving that I take the bidding by Scripture for the more sure. For there wot I well God speaketh and I cannot be illuded.”<sup>509</sup>

“Now,” quoth I, “this man that God biddeth you go to and in all things believe him—will it make any change in the matter whether it be man or woman?”

“No change at all,” quoth he.

“What if it were a certain known company of men and women together?” quoth I. “Would that make any difference?”

“Never a whit,”<sup>510</sup> quoth he.

“Then,” quoth I, “in case it appear unto you (as I suppose it doth to you and to every Christian man

504 so far-forth: to such an extent 505 whether would: would 506 and though: even if 507 in addition; also 508 wist nere: knew not 509 deluded

510 Never a whit: Not in the least else) that in all points of faith, both in things to be believed above nature, and in things also that are of necessity to be known and believed which may be perceived by reason given us with nature, God giveth us in commandment that we shall believe his Church, then are ye fully answered. For then have ye the man that ye must needs resort unto for your final answer and solution of all points and doubts in any wise concerning the salvation of your soul. Of which points no man can deny, but one of the most especial points is to take in Holy Scripture always the right sense. Or else, if we cannot attain the right understanding, yet then at the leastwise to be sure that we shall avoid and eschew<sup>511</sup> all such mistaking as might bring us into any damnable error.”

THE TWENTY-SEVENTH CHAPTER

The author proveth that God hath commanded us in all things necessary to salvation to give firm credence and full obedience unto his Church. And a cause why God will have us bounden to believe.

“That is truth,” quoth he, “if this may appear. But where shall it appear that God commandeth us in all such things to believe the Church? For first, methinketh that were a very strange manner of commanding. For of the Church be all we that should (as ye say) be by God commanded to believe the Church; and all we together make the whole Church. And what reason were it, then, to command us to believe the Church, which were no more, in effect, but to bid us all believe us all, or each of us to believe other?<sup>512</sup> And then if we fell at diverse opinions, why should the one party more believe the other, than be believed of<sup>513</sup> the other, since both the parties be of the Church and make the Church among them, saving<sup>514</sup> that always that party seemeth to be believed which best and most clearly can allege<sup>515</sup> the Scripture for their opinion? For the words of God must break the strife. He is only to be believed, and his only Son, of whom himself commanded: Ipsium audite, ‘Hear him,’ said the Father at the time of his baptism.<sup>516</sup> And therefore the man that ye speak of, whom God sendeth me to, and whom he biddeth me hear and believe, is our Savior Christ only, and not any congregation of men. Whose words if we believe before the words of God, and, in the stead of the Scripture of God put our trust and confidence in the doctrine and ordinance of the Church, it were haply<sup>517</sup> to be feared lest we fall in the reproof that is touched in the Gospel, where is said, ‘In vain worship they me with the doctrine of men;’<sup>518</sup> and where our Savior also reproveth the scribes and the Pharisees, saying unto them, ‘Wherefore<sup>519</sup> do you break and transgress the commandment of God for your traditions?’<sup>520</sup>

“I trust,” quoth I, “yet at last<sup>521</sup> we shall agree. But much ado,<sup>522</sup> methinketh, it is to come to it. But since we must, as ye say—and truth it is—hear our Savior Christ and believe him, is it enough to hear him and believe him? Or be we, besides that, also bounden to obey him?”

“To obey him also,” quoth he. “For else were he better unheard.”

“Well said,” quoth I. “But whether are<sup>523</sup> we bounden to hear him and obey him in some things, or in all things?”

“In all things,” quoth he, “without exception, that he commandeth us to do.”

“Then if Christ,” quoth I, “bid us believe and obey his Church, be we not bounden so to do?”

“Yes,” quoth he.

“Then may we,” quoth I, “no more doubt to be true whatso<sup>524</sup> the Church biddeth us believe than the thing that our Savior himself biddeth us believe, if he bid us hear his Church as his Father bade us hear him.”

“That is truth,” quoth he, “if he so do; but methinketh it were a strange bidding, as I said, to bid each of us believe other.”

“It seemeth not,” quoth I, “so strange a thing to Saint Paul. For he marvelous effectually beseecheth Christian people to ‘agree together all in one mind,’ and in the faith to tell one tale, suffering<sup>525</sup> no sects or schisms among them.<sup>526</sup> Which agreement and consent<sup>527</sup> can never be where no man giveth credence to other. But among Christian people it will soon be, if every man give credence to the Church.”

“But yet,” quoth he, “since all be of the Church, of diverse parties which shall believe which?”

511 shun 512 the other 513 by 514 except 515 cite 516 These words were spoken by the Father at the Transfiguration rather than at Jesus’s baptism. See Mt 3:17; 17:5. 517 perhaps 518 Mt 15:9 519 Why 520 Mt 15:3 521 yet at last: in the end 522 work; trouble 523 whether are: are 524 whatever 525 allowing 526 See 1 Cor 1:10. 527 consensus

“Ye take that,” quoth I, “for a great doubt and a thing very perplex, which seemeth me very plain. For either first the Church hath the truth and believe all one way till some one or some few begin the change, and then, though all be yet of the Church till some by their obstinacy be gone out or put out, yet is it no doubt but<sup>528</sup> if I will believe the Church, I must believe them that still believe that way which all the whole believed before.

10 “Or else if there were anything that was peradventure such that in the Church sometime<sup>529</sup> was doubted and reputed for unrevealed and unknown, if after that the whole Church fall in one consent upon the one side, either by common determination at a general council, or by a perfect persuasion and belief so received through Christendom that the Christian people think it a damnable error to believe the contrary, then if any would after that take the contrary way — were it one or more, were it few or many, were they learned or unlearned, were they lay people or of the clergy — yet can I nothing doubt which party to believe if I will believe the Church.”

25 “That is truth,” quoth he, “but ye prove me not yet that God hath bidden me believe the Church.”

“Ye somewhat interrupted me,” quoth I, “with your other subtlety, by which ye would it should<sup>530</sup> seem an absurdity to bid us believe the Church. Forasmuch as thereby, ye said, it should seem that we were commanded nothing else but each to believe other, and then in diverse opinions taken, we could not wit<sup>531</sup> which party should believe which. Whereof<sup>532</sup> since I have showed you the contrary, and removed that block out of the way for stumbling, we shall, I think, soon see the other point: that Christ commandeth us to believe his Church. For as his Father said of himself, ‘Hear him,’ so said he of his Church when he sent it abroad to be spread forth.

40 “For when he had gathered his Church of his apostles and his disciples, and thereupon sent them forth to preach, said he not unto them, ‘He that heareth you heareth me’? Did he not also command that whoso would not hear the Church should be reputed and taken as paynims<sup>533</sup> and publicans?”<sup>534</sup>

“That was,” quoth he, “where men would not amend their living.”

“Was it not,” quoth I, “general,<sup>535</sup> where a man would not amend any damnable fault?”

“Yes,” quoth he.

“Is misbelief,” quoth I, “none such?”

“Yes, marry,” quoth he.

“Then is,” quoth I, “the Church his judge upon his belief, to show him whether it be true or false?”

“So it seemeth,” quoth he.

“Hath his living,” quoth I, “nothing ado<sup>536</sup> with faith?”

“How mean you that?” quoth he.

“Thus,” quoth I, “as if Luther, late<sup>537</sup> a friar and having now wedded a nun,<sup>538</sup> were commanded to amend his lewd living and put away that harlot whom he abuseth in continual incest<sup>539</sup> and sacrilege under the name of a wife, and he would say that he did well enough, and that their vows could not bind them — were he not bounden to believe the Church and obey thereto as well concerning his belief as his living?”

“Yes, verily,” quoth he.

“Then appeareth it,” quoth I, “that we be by Christ commanded to hear, believe, and obey the Church as well in matters of faith as of manners.<sup>540</sup> Which thing well appeareth also by that our Lord would that whoso were disobedient ‘should be taken as a paynim or a publican.’<sup>541</sup> Of which two, the one offended in misbelief, the other in lewd<sup>542</sup> living. And thus it appeareth that not only Christ is the man that ye be sent unto and commanded by God to believe and obey, but also the Church is the person whom ye be by Christ commanded to hear and believe and obey. And therefore, if ye will — in faith, or living, or avoiding of all damnable error (that ye might fall in by misunderstanding of Scripture) — take a sure and infallible way, ye must in all these things hear, believe, and obey the Church, which is, as I say, the person whom Christ sendeth you to for the sure solution of all such doubts, as to the man in whose mouth he speaketh himself, and the Holy Spirit of his Father in heaven.

“And surely this is much to be marked. For it is the perpetual order which our Lord hath continued

528 that 529 at one time 530 would it should: want to have 531 know 532 Concerning which 533 pagans
534 Lk 10:16. See also Mt 18:17.
535 common (belief) 536 to do

537 formerly 538 Martin Luther became an Augustinian monk in 1505 and took a vow of celibacy; he later taught that such vows were not binding and in 1523 married Katharina von Bora, a former Cistercian

nun. 539 so considered because in canon law monks and nuns are regarded as siblings 540 morals 541 Mt 18:17 542 evil

in the governance of good men from the beginning: that, like<sup>543</sup> as our nature first fell by pride to the disobedience of God with inordinate desire of knowledge like unto God, so hath God ever kept man in humility, straining<sup>544</sup> him with the knowledge and confession of his ignorance and binding him to the obedience of belief of certain things whereof his own wit would verily ween<sup>545</sup> the contrary. And therefore are we bounden not only to believe, against our own reason, the points that God showeth us in Scripture, but also that God teacheth his Church without Scripture, and against our own mind also, to give diligent hearing, firm credence, and faithful obedience to the Church of Christ concerning the sense and understanding of Holy Scripture, not doubting but<sup>546</sup> since he hath commanded his sheep to be fed, he hath provided for them wholesome meat<sup>547</sup> and true doctrine, and that he hath therefore so far inspired the old holy doctors of his Church with the light of his grace for our instruction that the doctrine wherein they have agreed, and by many ages consented, is the very true faith and right way to heaven, being put in their minds by the holy hand of him qui facit unanimes in domo ('that maketh the Church of Christ all of one mind').<sup>548</sup>

THE TWENTY-EIGHTH CHAPTER

The messenger eftsoon<sup>549</sup> objected against this — that we should believe the Church in anything where we find the words of Scripture seeming plainly to say the contrary, or believe the old doctors' interpretations in any necessary article, where they seem to us to say contrary to the text — showing that we may perceive the Scripture as well as they might. And the answer of the author, proving the authority of the old interpreters and the infallible authority of the Church, in that God teacheth it every truth requisite to the necessity of man's salvation. Which he proveth by a deduction partly depending upon natural reason.

“It seemeth me,” quoth he, “that all this goeth well — that we should believe the Church as Christ — as long as they say as Christ saith, for so methinketh meant our Lord.

“But now if they tell me tales of their own, whereof Christ never spoke word, nor mention made thereof in Holy Scripture, I may then say with the prophet Jeremiah, Non mittebam prophetas, et ipsi currebant; non loquebar ad eos, et ipsi propheta-bant (“Those prophets,’ quoth our Lord, ‘ran forth of their own heads,<sup>550</sup> and I sent them not, and prophesied of their own heads, when I spoke nothing to them’).<sup>551</sup> And then how much may I more say so if they say me a thing whereof Christ or Holy Scripture saith the contrary? Shall I believe the Church above Christ? Were that a good humility, to be obedient more to men than to God? More ought I, methinketh, to believe God alone speaking in his Holy Scripture himself, than all the old fathers if they make a gloss against the text. Nor they do not themselves, for their opinions, say and write that they have them by inspiration, or by revelation, or by miracle, but by wisdom, study, diligence, and collation<sup>552</sup> of one text with another. By all which means men may now perceive the sentence<sup>553</sup> of Scripture as well as they might then. And if ye will peradventure say that grace helped them — which I will well agree — then will I say again that God’s grace is not so far worn out yet but that it may as well help us as it helped them, and so may we be, for the right understanding of Scripture, equal with them, and peradventure one ace<sup>554</sup> above them. Whereby when we perceive that they went wrong and others after them, shall we then call it humility so to captive<sup>555</sup> and subdue our understanding, whereby God hath haply given us light to perceive their errors, that without thank<sup>556</sup> given him therefor,<sup>557</sup> we shall so set his gift at nought<sup>558</sup> that we shall believe them before himself, and tell him that himself bade so? And therefore methink where the old doctors or the whole Church telleth me the tale that God doth, there he biddeth me believe them. But where God saith one thing in Scripture, and they tell me another, it thinketh me that I should in no wise believe them.”

“Well,” quoth I, “then in somewhat<sup>559</sup> ye say, ye will believe the Church, but not in all. In anything beside Scripture ye will not, nor in the interpretation of Scripture ye will not; and so, whereas ye said that ye believe the Church in somewhat, in very deed ye believe the Church in right nought.<sup>560</sup> For

543 just 544 constraining 545 verily ween: truly think 546 that 547 food 548 Ps 67(68):7 549 for a second time 550 accord 551 Jer 23:21

552 comparison 553 meaning 554 peradventure one ace: perhaps a little (a reference to dice or cards) 555 enslave 556 credit 557 for it 558 set at nought: value as nothing 559 something 560 right nought: absolutely nothing wherein will ye believe it if ye believe it not in the interpretation of Scripture? For as touching the text, ye believe the Scripture itself, and not the Church.”

“Methinketh,” quoth he, “the text is good enough and plain enough, needing no gloss, if it be well considered and every part compared with other.”

“Hard it were,” quoth I, “to find anything so plain that it should need no gloss at all.”

“In faith,” quoth he, “they make a gloss to some texts that be as plain as it is that twice two make four.”

“Why,” quoth I, “needeth that no gloss at all?”

“I trow<sup>561</sup> so,” quoth he. “Or else the devil is on<sup>562</sup> it.”

“Iwis,”<sup>563</sup> quoth I. “And yet, though ye would believe one that would tell you that twice two ganders made always four geese, yet ye would be advised ere ye believed him that would tell you that twice two geese made always four ganders. For therein might ye be deceived. And him would ye not believe at all that would tell you that twice two geese would always make four horses.”

“Tut,” quoth he, “this is a merry matter. They must be, all the twice twain, always of one kind. But geese and horses be of diverse.”

“Well,” quoth I, “then every man that is neither goose nor horse seeth well that there is one gloss yet.”

“But now,” quoth I, “the geese and the ganders be both of one kind, and yet twice two geese make not always four ganders.”

“A sweet matter,”<sup>564</sup> quoth he. “Ye wot what I mean well enough.”

“I think I do,” quoth I. “But I think if ye bring it forth, it will make another gloss to your text, as plain as your text is; and ye will in all Holy Scripture have no gloss at all. And yet will ye have collation<sup>565</sup> made of one text with another, and show how they may be agreed together, as though all that were no gloss.”

“Yea,” quoth he, “but would you that we should<sup>566</sup> believe the Church if it set a gloss that will in no wise agree with the text, but that it appeareth plainly that the text well considered saith clean the contrary?”

“To whom doth that appear,” quoth I, “so plainly, when it appeareth one<sup>567</sup> to you — and to the whole Church another?”

“Yet if I see it so,” quoth he, “though holy doctors and all the whole Church would tell me the contrary, methinketh I were no more bounden to believe them all that the Scripture meaneth as they take it than if they would all tell me that a thing were white which I see myself is black.”

“Of late,” quoth I, “ye would believe the Church in something. And now not only ye would believe it in nothing, but also, whereas God would the Church should be your judge, ye would now be judge over the Church. And ye will by your wit be judge whether the Church in the understanding of Holy Scripture — that God hath written to his Church — do judge aright or err. As for your white and black, never shall it be that ye shall see the thing black that all others shall see white. But ye may be sure that if all others see it white and ye take it for black, your eyes be sore<sup>568</sup> deceived. For the Church will not, I think, agree to call it other than it seemeth to them. And much marvel were it if ye should in Holy Scripture see better than the old holy doctors and Christ’s whole Church.

“But first,” quoth I, “ye must consider that ye and I do not talk of one doctor or twain, but of the consent and common agreement of the old holy fathers. Nor that we speak not of the doctrine of one man or two in the Church, but of the common consent of the Church. We speak not also of any sentence taken in any text of Holy Scripture whereby riseth no doubt or question of any necessary article of our faith or rule of our living (for in other by-matters<sup>569</sup> may there be taken of one text ten senses peradventure and all good enough, without warrantize of<sup>570</sup> the best), but we speak of such two diverse and contrary senses taken, as if the one be true the other must needs be false — and that, as I say, concerning some necessary point of our faith or rule of our living, which is also depending upon faith and reducible thereto. As if one would boldly break his vow for that<sup>571</sup> he thought that no man were bounden to keep any. Such points, I say, let us consider; they be that we speak of. And this remembered between us, then will we somewhat see what your saying doth prove.

“I shall not much need,” quoth I, “to stick<sup>572</sup> with you in disputing by what means the Scripture is understood, since ye be agreed with nature and

561 believe 562 in on 563 Indeed
564 A sweet matter: an ironic expression; Oh, very cute 565 comparison 566 that we should: want us to 567 one way 568 greatly 569 incidentals 570 warrantize of: any guarantee as to which is 571 for that: because 572 persist in arguing diligence the grace of God must needs go, or else no diligence or help of nature can prevail. Nor I will nothing deny you but that God may, and will also, give his grace now to us as he gave of old to his holy 5 doctors, if there be as much towardness<sup>573</sup> and no more let<sup>574</sup> or impediment in ourselves than was in them. I will also grant you that we may now, by the same means by which they might then, understand the Scripture as well as they did then; and I will not 10 much stick with you for one ace better. And were it not for the sins that we sink in, we might percase<sup>575</sup> understand it better by cater-trey-deuce,<sup>576</sup> having their labors therein and our own therewith. But since I am so genteel to grant you so many things, 15 I trust ye will grant me this one: that if in any such point of our faith as God would have men bounden to believe, they did understand the Scripture one way and we another, being the one to the other so clean contrary that if the one were true, the other 20 must needs be false, ye will then grant, I say, that either they err or we.”

“That must needs be,” quoth he.

“Ye will also grant,” quoth I, “that in such points as we speak of, the error were damnable. For we 25 speak of those points only to the belief whereof God will have us bounden.”

“I grant,” quoth he, “for damnable were it in such case to believe wrong. And wrong should they or we believe, if they or we believed a wrong article, 30 because they or we thought that the Scripture affirmed it. And as damnable were it and yet much more, if we believed a thing whereof we believed that the Scripture affirmeth the contrary. For then believed we that the Scripture were false.”

“This is,” quoth I, “very well said. But for the more plainness, let us put one example or twain.
 And what point rather than the article touching the equality in Godhead of our Savior Christ with his Father? For if the contrary belief were true, then 40 were this always damnable and plain idolatry.”

“Very truth,” quoth he.

“May not,” quoth I, “the other example be the matter that we have in hand, concerning saints’ relics, images, and pilgrimages? Which things, if it<sup>577</sup> 45 be (as ye say many reckon it) idolatry, then is it yet worse to do therein as we do than if our belief were wrong in the other point—and that as much worse

as the saints, or the images either, be worse than the holy manhood of Christ.”

“That is,” quoth he, “very true.”

“Then,” quoth I, “let the first point alone, because 50 therein we be all agreed, and speak of the second:
 if the old fathers took the Scriptures one way and we the contrary. Though it might be that we were able to understand the Scriptures as well as they, yet 55 if they so understood them that they thought this kind of worship not forbidden but commanded and pleasant to God, and we new men on the other side thought it utterly forbidden and holden for idolatry, the one party did not indeed understand 60 the Scripture right, but were in a damnable error.”

“That will no man deny,” quoth he.

“I doubt not now,” quoth I, “but that yourself seeth very well how many things I might here lay<sup>578</sup> 65 for them to prove you that they erred not so: first, their wits as<sup>579</sup> much as our new men’s; their diligence as great; their erudition greater; their study as fervent; their devotion hotter; their number far greater; their time continued longer by<sup>580</sup> many ages persevering; the contrary opinions in few, 70 and those always soon faded; they taken always for Catholic, the contrary part for heretics. Here might I lay you the holiness of their life, and the plenty of their grace well appearing thereby, and that our Lord therefore opened their eyes and suffered<sup>581</sup> and 75 caused them to see the truth. And albeit he used therein none open miracle nor sensible<sup>582</sup> revelation (whereof, as ye say, they none allege or pretend<sup>583</sup> for the proof of their opinions in their interpretations of Holy Scripture), yet used he the secret super-80 natural means by which his grace, assistant<sup>584</sup> with good men that labor therefor, by motions insensible to themselves, inclineth their assent unto the true side; and that thus the old holy fathers did, in the 85 point that we speak of and in such others, perceive the right sense of Holy Scripture so far-forth at the leastwise as they well knew that it was not contrary to their belief. And here might I lay you also that if it had been otherwise, and that they had therein 90 damnably been deceived, then, living and dying in damnable error, they could not have been saints—as God hath showed them to be, by many a thousand miracles both in their lives and after their deaths.
 With this might I also lay, and very well conclude,

573 inclination 574 hindrance 575 perhaps 576 four, three, or two times better (continuing the “ace” or dice metaphor) 577 i.e., honor given to these things 578 submit as evidence 579 are as 580 through 581 allowed

582 perceptible to the senses 583 claim 584 present to help

that since those holy doctors and the Church be (as by their books plainly appeareth) all of one faith in this point and such others, that thereby well appeareth that the Church is in the truth, and is not, in the understanding of the Scripture that speaketh of the matter, anything deceived, but they clearly deceived that do understand those texts of Holy Scripture to the contrary. These things, as I say — and yet many others more — might I lay. But since ye did yourself put the Church and them both in one case, and so they be indeed, I will rather prove you the truth of them by the truth of the Church, than the truth of the Church by the truth of them. And so seemeth me good reason. For surely, since they were but members of his Church, God had his special cure<sup>585</sup> upon them most especially for the profit of his Church, by whose whole corps he more setteth<sup>586</sup> than by any member thereof — saint, apostle, evangelist, or other. And therefore must I yet ask you again whether the Church may have any damnable error in the faith, by mistaking of Scripture or otherwise.”

“That is,” quoth he, “somewhat hard to tell.”

“Now,” quoth I, “somewhat I marvel that ye remember not that yourself hath agreed already that these words of Christ spoken unto Peter — ‘I have prayed that thy faith shall never fail’<sup>587</sup> — were not only meant by the faith in Peter his own person, but also by the faith of the Church. For to him was it spoken as head of the Church.”

“Yes, I remember,” quoth he, “right well that I agreed it. But I remember also that, notwithstanding mine agreement, ye were content that we should ensearch<sup>588</sup> again and again the matter otherwise besides, wherein mine agreement should not bind me.”

“Lo,” quoth I, “that had I forgotten again. But let it then alone for the while, and tell me this: Did not Christ intend to gather a flock and congregation of people that should serve God and be his special people?”

“Yes,” quoth he, “that is very truth. For so saith plain Scripture of Christ in sundry places, as where the Father of heaven saith unto Christ in the psalm, Postula a me, et dabo tibi gentes hereditatem tuam (‘Ask of me, and I shall give thee paynim people for thine inheritance’),<sup>589</sup> and many other places. And else<sup>590</sup> undoubtedly his whole coming had been, in manner,<sup>591</sup> frustrate and in vain.”

“That people,” quoth I, “which should be an inheritance, did he intend should endure for his own days only, while he lived here, or else that it should go forth and continue long after?”

“Nay,” quoth he, “that shall continue while the world lasteth here, till Doomsday, and after in heaven eternally.”

“Shall this people,” quoth I, “have among them the knowledge and understanding what he would they should<sup>592</sup> do to please God withal?”

“Yea,” quoth he.

“Whether shall they,” quoth I, “have this knowledge for a while, in the beginning, and then lose it; or shall they have it still as long as they continue?”

Here he began a little to stagger.

“Why,” quoth I, “can ye call them his people any longer if they lose the knowledge how to serve him and please him? If they forsoth<sup>593</sup> to do their duty, as slack servants sometimes do, yet may they mend and do better another time. But if they lose the knowledge of their duty, then wot they nere<sup>594</sup> which way to amend, as he that knoweth fornication for sin may fall by frailty to fornication; but since he knoweth it for naught,<sup>595</sup> though he sinned more in the doing than if he had not known the prohibition, yet doth the knowledge give him warning, and occasion of repentance and amendment, which must needs lack if he had lost the knowledge.”

Upon this, he granted that it must needs be that this people must needs have always the knowledge how to serve and please our Lord, or else they ceased to be his people.

“Is not this people,” quoth I, “called the Church?”

“Yes,” quoth he.

“Then the Church,” quoth I, “always hath — and always shall by your reason — have the knowledge and understanding how God may be served and pleased.”

“Truth,” quoth he.

“Is,” quoth I, “that knowledge fully had without the knowledge of such things as God bindeth us to believe?”

“Nay,” quoth he.

“What if we knew them in such wise,” quoth I, “as we could rehearse<sup>596</sup> them on our fingers’ ends,

585 care 586 values 587 Lk 22:32 588 investigate 589 Ps 2:8

590 otherwise 591 in manner: so to speak 592 would they should: wants them to 593 neglect 594 wot they nere: know they not 595 wickedness 596 recite and yet believed them not to be true? Would this knowledge serve?”

5 “In no wise,” quoth he. “For if ye believed them to be false, though ye so knew them that ye could rehearse them by row,<sup>597</sup> ye could take no warning by them to please and serve God with them, which is the cause wherefore the Church should of necessity know them.”

10 “This is,” quoth I, “very well said. Then since ye grant that the Church shall ever endure, and that it could not endure without the knowledge of such things as please God, nor those things can be all known if knowledge lacked of those things that God bindeth us to believe, nor the knowledge of 15 them anything serve to the knowledge and warning given us of God’s pleasure, but if<sup>598</sup> we not only can tell them, but also believe them — which belief ye grant is called ‘faith’ — of this it consequently followeth that the Church always hath, and always 20 shall have, the knowledge and belief of such things as God will have it bounden to believe.”

25 “That is truth,” quoth he, “because God hath left Holy Scripture to the Church; and therein is all, and the Church believeth that to be true. And therefore therein and thereby hath the Church all that warning and learning of God’s pleasure that ye speak of, without which it cannot endure.”

30 “Are ye there yet again?” quoth I. “We have sundry ways proved and agreed between us that this knowledge and faith was before Scripture and writing, and many things of necessity to be both believed and done that are not in Holy Scripture. And yet after all this (too long to be repeated), ye return again to the first point — so often confuted — that 35 nothing is learned nor known but by Holy Scripture. But now go to and suppose it were so. What should ye win thereby? For what if God,” quoth I, “had left the Scripture to the Church locked up in a close<sup>599</sup> chest, and that no man should look therein? 40 Would that have served?”

“Nay, pardie,”<sup>600</sup> quoth he.

“What if he had left it open, and written in such wise that no man could read it?”

“That were all one,” quoth he.

45 “What if every man,” quoth I, “could read it, and no man understand it?”

“As little would it serve,” quoth he, “as the other.”

50 “Then,” quoth I, “since it serveth the Church to learn God’s pleasure therein, and that can it not, as ye grant yourself, but if<sup>601</sup> the Church understand it, it followeth of this that the Church understandeth it. And thus every way for the faith and knowledge of God’s pleasure — if it be, as ye say, all known by the Scripture and no part otherwise — yet always to this point ye bring it in the end: that the Church 55 hath the sure knowledge thereof. And then, if that be so, ye shall not (as ye lately said ye should) in any diverse texts of Scripture seeming to make a doubtful<sup>602</sup> article of our faith and to bring in question what we be bounden to believe, after ye have 60 read in Scripture all that can be read, and heard on both sides all that can be said, then take which part seemeth to yourself most probable. Nor if ye stand still, for all that, in a doubt, then after your bitter<sup>603</sup> prayers made to God for his grace and guide in the 65 choice, go take you the one part at adventure<sup>604</sup> and cleave thereto, as though ye were sure by your confidence in God that his grace had inclined your assent to the surer side. But since I have showed you plainly by reason that he hath given his Church in 70 all such things knowledge of the truth, ye shall take the sure way and put yourself out of all perplexity, if in the point itself and the Scriptures that touch it, ye take for the truth that way that the Church teacheth you therein, howsoever the matter seem 75 beside<sup>605</sup> unto yourself or to any man else.”

THE TWENTY-NINTH CHAPTER

The author proveth by Scripture that God instructeth the Church of Christ in every truth necessarily requisite for our salvation.

80

85 “Truly,” quoth he, “ye wind it well about.<sup>606</sup> But yet ye made as though ye would have showed that God had in Scripture told me that he had and ever would tell his Church the truth in all such matters. And now ye bring it to the point: not the Holy Scripture telleth me the tale, but man’s reason. And surely, as I showed you before, I dare not well trust reason in matters of faith and of Holy Scripture.”

“I began,” quoth I, “to prove it you by Scripture,

597 by row: one after the other 598 but if: unless 599 hidden; closed

600 certainly 601 but if: unless 602 doubtful 603 earnest 604 random

605 otherwise 606 wind it well about: pursue a very circuitous argument

and ye then put me out<sup>607</sup> in the beginning. Howbeit,<sup>608</sup> this reason hath Scripture for his<sup>609</sup> foundation and ground. And though it somewhat build further thereon, yet is not reason always to be mistrusted, where faith standeth not against it, nor God saith not the contrary—except<sup>610</sup> reason be so far out of credence with you that ye will not now believe him if he tell you that twice twain make four. I ween ye will fare by<sup>611</sup> reason as one did once by a false shrew.<sup>612</sup> He swore that he would not for twenty pounds hear him say his creed. For he knew him for such a liar that he thought he should never believe his creed after, if he heard it once of his mouth.

“Howbeit,” quoth I, “let us yet see whether God himself in Scripture tell you the same tale or no. God telleth you in Scripture that he would be with his Church to the end of the world. I think ye doubt not thereof but those words he spoke to the whole Church that then was, and ever shall be, from the apostles’ days continued till the end of the world.”

“That, in good faith,” quoth he, “must needs be so.”

“Then were this in good faith enough,” quoth I, “for our purpose, since no man doubteth wherefore he will be with his Church—except<sup>613</sup> we should think that he would be therewith for nothing, wherefore should he be with it but to keep it and preserve it, with the assistance of his gracious presence, from spiritual mischief specially, and of all other, specially from infidelity and from idolatry? Which was the special thing from which he called his Church out of the Gentiles, which else<sup>614</sup>—as for moral virtues and political—if they had not lacked the right cause and end of referring their acts to God, were many of them not far under many of us? Let us go further. Doth he not in the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth chapters of Saint John again and again repeat that after his going he will come again to them, and saith he ‘will not leave them orphans,’<sup>615</sup> as fatherless children, but will come again to them himself? Let us add now thereunto the words before rehearsed—that he will be with them till the world’s end—and it appeareth plain that he meant all this by his whole Church that should be to the world’s end.

“When he said unto them, ‘I call you friends, for all that I have heard of my Father I have made known to you,’<sup>616</sup> he spoke as to his perpetual Church and not to the apostles alone, but if<sup>617</sup> he said to them alone these words also—‘I command that ye love each other’<sup>618</sup>—so that none should love each other after but only they. Now lest the things that he taught them should by the Church after be forgotten (which was more to be doubted<sup>619</sup> than of themselves that<sup>620</sup> heard it), he said unto them also: ‘These things,’ quoth he, ‘have I spoken to you abiding here with you. But the Comforter—which is the Holy Ghost, whom my Father shall send in my name—he shall teach you all things, and he shall put you in mind and remembrance of all things that I shall have said unto you.’<sup>621</sup> So that here ye see that he shall again always teach the Church of new,<sup>622</sup> the old lessons of Christ. And he said also to them that this Comforter, the Holy Ghost, the ‘Spirit of truth,’ should be sent to abide with them ‘forever,’<sup>623</sup> which cannot be meant but of the whole Church. For the Holy Ghost was not sent hither into the earth here to dwell with the apostles forever, for they dwelled not so long here. Now if the Spirit of truth shall dwell in the Church forever, how can the Church err in perceiving of the truth—in such things, I mean, as God will bind them to know, or shall be necessary for them to know? For only of such things meant our Lord when he said that the Holy Ghost shall teach them all things. For as Saint Paul saith, ‘the manifestation and showing of the Spirit is to the utility and profit.’<sup>624</sup> This Holy Spirit also was not promised by our Savior Christ that he should only tell his Church again his words, but he said further: ‘I have,’ quoth he, ‘besides all this, many things to say to you; but ye be not able to bear them now. But when he shall come that is the Spirit of truth, he shall lead you into all truth.’<sup>625</sup> Lo, our Lord said not that the Holy Ghost should write unto his Church all truth, but that he should lead them, by secret inspiration and inclination of their hearts, into all truth—in which must needs be conceived both information and right belief of every necessary article, and of the right and true sense of Holy Scripture, as far as shall be requisite to conserve the Church from any damnable error.

607 put me out: distracted me 608 How- ever 609 its 610 unless 611 fare by:
treat 612 false shrew: dishonest scoundrel 613 unless 614 which else: who otherwise

615 See Jn 14:18, 23, 28; 16:16, 22. 616 Jn
15:15 617 but if: unless 618 Jn 15:12
619 feared, apprehensive 620 themselves that: they themselves who 621 Jn

14:25–26 622 of new: anew 623 Jn
14:16–17 624 1 Cor 12:7 625 Jn
16:12–13

“Now when the Holy Ghost shall, by God’s promise, be for this purpose abiding in the Church forever; and Christ himself hath also said that he will not leave his Church as orphans, but will come himself, and be with it unto the end of the world, and saith also that his Father is in him and he is in his Father, and that his Father and he be both one thing<sup>626</sup> — not both one person, but both one substance — and, with the Holy Ghost, both one God, then must it needs follow that to the world’s end there is with the Church resident the whole Trinity. Whose assistance, being to the Church perpetual, how can it at any time fall from true faith to false errors and heresies?”

THE THIRTIETH CHAPTER

Whereas the messenger had thought before that it were hard to believe anything certainly save Holy Scripture, though<sup>627</sup> the Church did agree therein and command it, the author showeth that saving<sup>628</sup> for the authority of the Church, men could not know what Scripture they should believe. And here is it showed that God will not suffer<sup>629</sup> the Church to be deceived in the choice of the very<sup>630</sup> Scripture of God from any counterfeit.

“Now is it, I suppose, well and clearly proved by Scripture the thing that I promised: that is to wit, that the Church cannot err in any such substantial article as God will have us bounden to believe.

“But yet forasmuch as ye regard nothing but Scripture only, this would I fain wit of<sup>631</sup> you: whether ye believe that Christ was born of a virgin.”

“What else?” quoth he.

“Why believe you that?” quoth I.

“The Gospel showeth me so,” quoth he.

“What if it did not?” quoth I. “Were then your creed out of credence, but if<sup>632</sup> he bring witness with him?”<sup>633</sup>

“The creed,” quoth he, “is a thing by itself.”

“Yet is it,” quoth I, “no part of the Gospel, as the Pater Noster is.<sup>634</sup> And yet I think if Gospel had never been written, ye would have believed your creed.”

“So think I too,” quoth he.

“And wherefore,”<sup>635</sup> quoth I, “but for<sup>636</sup> because the Church should have showed you so? But let our creed alone a while, and go we to the Gospel itself. Which Gospel telleth you that Christ was born of a virgin?”

“The Gospel of Saint Luke,”<sup>637</sup> quoth he.

“How know you that?” quoth I.

“For I read it so,” quoth he, “in the book.”

“Ye read,” quoth I, “such a book. But how know you that Saint Luke made it?”

“How know I,” quoth he, “other books, but by that they bear the names of their authors written upon them?”

“Know you it well thereby?” quoth I. “Many books be there that have false inscriptions, and are not the books of them that they be named by.”<sup>638</sup>

“That is truth,” quoth he. “But yet though men did peradventure err and fail in<sup>639</sup> the name, as if he should repute a book of stories<sup>640</sup> to be made by Titus Livius<sup>641</sup> which he never made, but some other honest cunning<sup>642</sup> man, yet were the books neither less elegant nor less true therefor. Nor in like wise if the Church did mistake the very name of some evangelist and Gospel, yet were the Gospel nevertheless true.”

“That is,” quoth I, “well said. But how be ye sure that the matter of the book is true?”

“Marry,” quoth he, “for I am.”

“That is,” quoth I, “the reason that a maiden layeth<sup>643</sup> for her own knowledge of her maidenhead. But she could tell another how she knoweth she hath it, saving that she is loath to come so near<sup>644</sup> as to be acknown<sup>645</sup> that she could tell how she might lose it. But here is no such fear. Tell me, therefore, whereby wot ye<sup>646</sup> that the matter of that book is true?”

“I think,” quoth he, “that God showeth me so.”

“That is well thought,” quoth I. “But he told it you not mouth to mouth.”<sup>647</sup>

“No,” quoth he. “But he hath told it to others in the beginning, or else it was well known in the beginning when he wrote it. And he<sup>648</sup> was known and believed by his living, and the miracles that God did for him. And after that it was once known,

626 See Jn 17:21. 627 even if 628 except 629 allow 630 true 631 fain wit of: like to know from 632 but if: unless 633 it 634 See Mt 6:9–13.

635 why 636 but for: except 637 See Lk 1:26–37. 638 named by: attributed to 639 concerning 640 histories 641 Livy
(59 BC–AD 17) 642 learned 643 gives

644 come so near: become so intimate 645 i.e., known to still have her virginity
646 whereby wot ye: how do you know 647 mouth to mouth: in person 648 Luke the knowledge went forth from man to man. And God hath so wrought with<sup>649</sup> us that we believe it because the whole Church hath always done so before our days.”

5 “Now come you,” quoth I, “to the very point. For many things hath been true that in process after hath left<sup>650</sup> to be believed. And many a thing hath in the beginning been known for false, and yet hath after happened to be believed. But the Gospels and Holy 10 Scripture, God provideth that, though percase<sup>651</sup> some of it may perish and be lost, whereby they might have harm, but not fall in error (for the faith should stand though the Scriptures were all gone), yet shall he never suffer<sup>652</sup> his Church to be deceived in that point: that they shall take for Holy Scripture
15 any book that is not. And therefore saith holy Saint Augustine, ‘I should not believe the Gospel but if it were<sup>653</sup> for the Church.’<sup>654</sup> And he saith good reason. For were it not for the Spirit of God keeping the truth thereof in his Church, who could be sure which were the very Gospels? There were many that wrote the Gospel. And yet hath the Church, by secret instinct of God, rejected the remnant and chosen out these four for the sure, undoubted true.”

25 “That is,” quoth he, “sure so.”

“This is,” quoth I, “so sure so, that Luther himself is driven of necessity to grant this; or else he perceiveth that there were none hold nor surety<sup>655</sup> in Scripture itself, if the Church might be suffered 30 by God to be deceived in that point, and to take for Holy Scripture that writing that indeed were not. And therefore he confesseth that this must needs be a sure infallible ground, that God hath given this gift unto his Church: that his Church can always discern the word of God from the word of men.”<sup>656</sup>

“In good faith,” quoth he, “that must needs be so, or else all would fail.”

Quoth I, “Then ye that would believe the Church in nothing, nor give sure credence to the tradition 40 of the Church but if<sup>657</sup> it were proved by Scripture, now see it proved to you that ye could not believe the Scripture but if it were proved to be Scripture by the judgment and tradition of the Church.”

45 “No,” quoth he, “but when I have learned once of the Church that it is Holy Scripture and the Word of God, then I believe it better than I believe all the Church. I might by a light<sup>658</sup> person sometime know a much more substantial man. And yet when I know him, I will believe him much better 50 than him by whom I know him, if they varied in a tale and were contrary.”

“Good reason,” quoth I. “But the Church bid-deth you not believe the contrary of that<sup>659</sup> the Scripture saith. But he<sup>660</sup> telleth you that in such places as ye would better believe the Scripture than 55 the Church, there ye understand not the Scripture. For whatsoever words it speaketh, yet it meaneth not the contrary of that the Church teacheth you. And the Church cannot be deceived in any such weighty point.”

60 “Whereby shall I know?” quoth he.

“Why be we at that point yet?” quoth I. “Have we so soon forgotten the perpetual assistance of the Trinity in his Church, and the prayer of Christ to keep the faith of his Church from failing, and the 65 Holy Ghost sent of purpose to keep in the Church the remembrance of Christ’s words and to lead them into all truth? What would it have profited to have put you in the remembrance of the assistance of God with the children of Israel—walking with 70 them in the cloud by day, and in the pillar of fire by night, in their earthly voyage<sup>661</sup>—and thereby to have proved you the much more special assistance of God with his Christian Church in their spiritual voyage, wherein his especial goodness well declareth
75 his tender diligence by that he doth vouchsafe to assist and comfort us with the continual presence of his Precious Body in the Holy Sacrament? All this would not help if manifest reason that I made you, and evident Scripture that I rehearsed<sup>662</sup> you, cannot yet print in your heart a perceiving that the as-80 sistance of God in his Church must needs preserve his Church from all damnable errors in the faith, and give his Church so far-forth the understanding of Scripture that they may well perceive that no part thereof, well understood, standeth against any article that the Church believeth as parcel of their Christian faith.”

85 “Nay,” quoth he, “I perceive it well when I remember it; but it was not ready in remembrance.” 90

649 wrought with: brought about in 650 ceased 651 perhaps 652 allow 653 but if it were: were it not 654 Against the Fundamental Epistle of Manichaeus 5

655 security; certainty 656 See Luther’s Babylonian Captivity of the Church 7.2.

657 but if: unless 658 of little account
659 what 660 i.e., the Church 661 See Ex 13:21–22. 662 quoted (to)

THE THIRTY-FIRST CHAPTER

In that the Church cannot err in the choice of the true Scripture, the author proveth by the reason which the King's Highness,<sup>663</sup> in his noble and most famous book,<sup>664</sup> objecteth against Luther: that the Church cannot err in the necessary understanding of Scripture. And finally the author in this chapter doth briefly recapitulate<sup>665</sup> certain of the principal points that be before proved.

And therewith endeth the First Book.

“Yet would I,” quoth I, “ask you one thing: Wherefore,<sup>666</sup> think you, will not Christ suffer<sup>667</sup> his Church to be deceived in the discerning of Holy Scripture from other writing, and suffer them to take a book of Holy Scripture that were none indeed?”

“Lest men might,” quoth he, “of some false book reputed of Holy Scripture, have great occasion given them to conceive the wrong doctrine and wrong opinions of the faith, if God would suffer his Church to take a false devised book for Holy Scripture and for his own holy words.”

“Ye say,” quoth I, “very truth. Now what if in the very<sup>668</sup> Scripture he should suffer his Church mistake the very sentence,<sup>669</sup> in a matter substantial of our faith? Were they not in like peril to fall by misunderstanding into like errors as they might by false writings?”

“Yes, that they were,” quoth he.

“Forsooth,”<sup>670</sup> quoth I, “so were they—and in much more.<sup>671</sup> For in a false book mistaken for Scripture, though they had<sup>672</sup> it in never so high reverence for some good things that they found in it, and thereby should have great occasion to believe the false errors written in the same, yet having—as the Church always shall have, the true faith first in heart—they should find many shifts<sup>673</sup> to keep out the errors. But now if they falsely should understand the true Scripture, there were no way to escape from damnable errors. And therefore may I say to you as the King's Highness most prudently laid<sup>674</sup> unto Luther: since God will not suffer his Church to mistake a book of Scripture, for<sup>675</sup> peril of damnable errors that might ensue thereon, and like peril may there ensue by the misconstruing of the sentence as by the mistaking of the book, it must needs follow that God will, in things of our faith, no more suffer them to take a false sentence for true than to take a false book for Scripture. And with this reason his Highness concluded<sup>676</sup> him so clearly that he durst<sup>677</sup> never since, for shame, touch that point again, nor any color could lay,<sup>678</sup> but that upon his own confession in all substantial points concerning the faith or knowledge of virtue pleasant to God, the Church hath so right understanding of Scripture that it well and truly perceiveth that no text therein can be right understood against any article that the Church believeth for thing to be believed of necessity. And this point durst he never since touch, nor make answer thereto, albeit that the King's Highness with this one point alone plainly turneth up and destroyeth the ground and foundation of all the heresies that Luther would have believed. And therefore of all things had Luther greatest cause to answer this point earnestly—and would undoubtedly if he had wist<sup>679</sup> how.”

“Surely,” quoth your friend, “I marvel not though he did not. For this point is so clear he could not, and I am herein fully satisfied.”

“Then be you,” quoth I, “satisfied in this also: that the faith of the Church is a right rule to carry with you to the study of Scripture, to shape you the understanding of the texts by, and so to take them as they may always agree therewithal?”<sup>680</sup>

“Be it,”<sup>681</sup> quoth he.

“Then are ye,” quoth I, “also fully answered in this: that where<sup>682</sup> ye said ye should not believe the Church telling a tale of their own, but only telling you Scripture, ye now perceive that in such things as we speak of—that is to wit, necessary points of our faith—if they<sup>683</sup> tell you a tale which if it were false were damnable, ye must believe and may be sure that, since the Church cannot in such things err, it is very true all that the Church in such things telleth you. And that it is not their own word, but the word of God, though it be not in Scripture.”

“That appeareth well,” quoth he.

“Then are ye,” quoth I, “as fully satisfied that, where ye lately said that it were a disobedience to God and preferring of the Church before himself

663 so far-forth: to such an extent
664 King's Highness: Henry VIII's Defense of the Seven Sacraments, published in 1521 665 summarize 666 Why 667 allow

668 true 669 meaning 670 truly, in truth 671 more peril 672 though they had: even if they held 673 means; tactics 674 put forward as evidence 675 because of the 676 refuted 677 dared 678 color could lay: pretense could offer 679 known 680 with it 681 Be it: Yes 682 whereas 683 the Church

if ye shall believe the Church in such things as God in his Holy Scripture saith himself the contrary, ye now perceive it can in no wise be so. But since his Church, in such things as we speak of, cannot err, it is impossible that the Scripture of God can be contrary to the faith of the Church.”

“That is very true,” quoth he.

“Then it is as true,” quoth I, “that ye be further fully answered in the principal point: that the Scriptures laid<sup>684</sup> against images and pilgrimages and worship of saints make nothing against them. And also that those things — images, I mean, and pilgrimages and praying to saints — are things good and to be had<sup>685</sup> in honor in Christ’s Church, since the Church believeth so. Which, as ye grant, and see cause why ye so should grant, can in such points not be suffered,<sup>686</sup> for the special assistance of God and instruction of the Holy Ghost, to fall in error. And so be we for this matter at last with much work, comen to an end. And therefore will we now to dinner. And your other objections that ye have laid, by which ye would prove those things reprobable<sup>687</sup> and make them seem idolatry, which we deferred afore, those will we talk of after dinner.”

“By my troth,” quoth he, “I have another tale to tell you that, all this gear<sup>688</sup> granted, turneth us yet into as much uncertainty as we were in before.”

“Yea?” quoth I. “Then have we well walked after the ballad,<sup>689</sup> ‘The further I go, the more behind.’ I pray you, what thing is that? For that long I to hear yet ere we go.”

“Nay,” quoth he, “it were better ye dine first. My lady will, I ween, be angry with me that I keep you so long therefrom. For I hold<sup>690</sup> it now well toward twelve. And yet more angry would wax with me, if I should make you sit and muse at your meat<sup>691</sup> — as ye would, I wot well, muse on the matter if ye wist what it were.”

“If I were,” quoth I, “like my wife, I should muse more thereon now, and eat no meat for longing to know. But come on then and let us dine first, and ye shall tell us after.”

The end of the First Book

THE SECOND BOOK

THE FIRST CHAPTER

The messenger—recapitulating<sup>1</sup> certain things before proved, and for his part agreeing that the Church of Christ cannot in any necessary article of the faith fall in any damnable error—doth put in doubt and question which is the very<sup>2</sup> Church of Christ, alleging that they peradventure<sup>3</sup> whom we call heretics will say that themselves is the Church, and we not. Whereof the author showeth the contrary, declaring<sup>4</sup> whereby we may know that they cannot be the Church.

After dinner we walked into the garden. And there shortly, sitting in an arbor, began to go forth in our matter, desiring him to show what thing might that be that made our long forenoon process<sup>5</sup> frustrate and left us as uncertain as we began.

“Sir,” quoth he, “that shall I shortly show you. Whereas there was principally in question whether worshipping of images and relics, and praying to saints, and going on pilgrimages were lawful or not, and that I put you in mind that men laid<sup>6</sup> against themselves certain texts of Holy Scripture, and also said unto you that it seemed the texts themselves, which be the words of God, were of more authority against them than the glosses of men, that in such wise expound the texts as they may seem to make for them, ye laid on the other side the consent, and agreement, and common Catholic faith of the Church; which ye said—and indeed, to say the truth, both by reason and by Scripture ye proved—that it could not be erroneous, and that the Church could not err in the faith that God would have known and believed. Ye proved the matter also by miracles, in which, when I laid diverse things moving men to doubt—partly lest they were not true, but specially lest they were not done by God, for corroboration of the faith, but were percase<sup>7</sup> by God’s sufferance,<sup>8</sup> done by the devil for our delusion, deserving so to be served by our falling from the worship of God himself to the worship of his creatures—ye proved me yet again that the miracles were true, and that they must needs be done by God. And that ye proved me by this: that it should else follow that the Church had a wrong belief and a damnable, which eftsoons<sup>9</sup> ye proved well and substantially to be impossible. And forasmuch as there fell in the way occasion to speak of the contrariety that seemed sometimes to fall between the texts of Holy Scripture itself and the common persuasion and faith of the Church, where I said that it was thought reasonable to believe the Scripture, being God’s own words, rather than the words of men, ye therein proved that the common faith of the Church was as well God’s own words as was Holy Scripture itself, and of as great authority; and that no student in Scripture should presume to try, examine, and judge the Catholic faith of Christ’s Church by the Scripture, but by the Catholic faith of Christ’s Church should examine and expound the texts of Scripture; and that in the study of Scripture this were the sure way, wherein should give (ye said) great light the writing of the old holy doctors,<sup>10</sup> whereby we be ascertained<sup>11</sup> that the faith that the Church hath now is the same faith, and the same points, that they had then of old, in every age and every time. And in this part ye proved yet again, by reason and Holy Scripture, that the Church hath, by the teaching of God and the Holy Ghost, the right understanding of Scripture in all points that are of necessity to be known. And thereupon eftsoons ye deduced and proved that no text of the Scripture—well understood—could stand against the worshipping of images and relics and the seeking of pilgrimages, but that all these things be well proved good and pleasant to God, and the miracles done in such places, done by God, since his special assistance so informeth and instructeth his Church in so great and so substantial an article, so highly touching the honor or dishonor of God, that it cannot be suffered to fall to superstition and idolatry instead of faith and honor done to God.

“And this is,” quoth he, “as far as I remember, the whole sum and effect of all that hath hitherto been proved between us.”

“Very true,” quoth I. “And this is of you very well remembered, and well and summarily rehearsed.”<sup>12</sup>

1 summarizing; recapitulating 2 true
3 perhaps 4 explaining 5 reasoned discussion 6 cited 7 perhaps 8 allowing 9 once again 10 theologians 11 assured 12 recounted

“But now,” quoth he, “all this gear<sup>13</sup> granted, we be never the near.”<sup>14</sup>

“Why so?” quoth I.

“Marry,”<sup>15</sup> quoth he, “for a man that believed the worship of images to be wrong and unlawful might grant that—that ‘the Church doth not err,’ and that ‘the Church hath the right faith,’ and that ‘the Church doth not mistake the Scripture’—and when all this were agreed, he might say that the Church peradventure doth not believe as ye say it doth. For he might haply<sup>16</sup> deny the Church to be that people that ye take it for, and say that it is the people that believeth as he believeth: that is to wit,<sup>17</sup> all these kinds of worship to be wrong, and that believeth them whom ye take for the Church to believe wrong.”

“If he and his company,” quoth I, “be the Church, he must tell where his fellows be.”

“Why so?” quoth he. “If men should ask you and me where the Church is, we could tell no one place, but many diverse countries.”

“Let him,” quoth I, “in like wise assign some companies that be known for congregations together in diverse countries.”

“Why,” quoth he, “in the beginning, and a good while after, the Church of Christ in every place hid itself, that men could not tell in any country where they were, nor durst<sup>18</sup> not come out and show themselves.”

“That was in the beginning,” quoth I, “while the persecution lasted. But when the persecution ceased once, it was soon known in every country where the Church was.”

“Marry,” quoth he, “if I should take that part,<sup>19</sup> I would haply say that in that case it is still, and that the Church is that company peradventure that ye (which<sup>20</sup> call yourselves the Church) do use to<sup>21</sup> call heretics—which now do know one another well enough, and call themselves and their fellows about the world the very Church, though they dare not profess it openly, because that ye (that call yourselves the Church and them heretics) do persecute them as the church of the paynims<sup>22</sup> did in the beginning. And therefore they do hide themselves as the Church did in the beginning. But and if<sup>23</sup> ye would cease your persecution once, and let them live in rest, ye should see them flock together so fast that they should soon show you the Church with a wet finger.”<sup>24</sup>

“They might,” quoth I, “peradventure show a shrewd<sup>25</sup> sort within a while, if they were suffered, and the church that the prophet David speaketh of: Odi ecclesiam malignantium (‘I hate the church of malicious men’).<sup>26</sup> But they shall never show themselves the Church of Christ.

“The Church of Christ, wheresoever it was in all the persecution, used to come together to the preaching and prayer, though it were privily in woods or secret houses. They used also the sacraments among themselves—as baptism, confirmation, matrimony, holy orders—priests and bishops among them, fastings, vigils kept, the Sundays hallowed, the Mass said, holy service<sup>27</sup> sung, and their people houseled,<sup>28</sup> as well appeareth not only by the stories<sup>29</sup> of the Church, but also of the paynims, and partly well appeareth by an epistle of Pliny written to the Emperor Trajan.<sup>30</sup> And such things must there be therein, if it be any church or congregation of Christ. Now these people that ye speak of use<sup>31</sup> no such things among themselves, and therefore they cannot be the Church of Christ.”

“They preach,” quoth he, “privily among themselves; and all the remnant they do in our churches.”

“This,” quoth I, “plainly proveth that they cannot be the Church of Christ. For the Church of Christ ever fled and forbore the temples in which idols and mammals<sup>32</sup> were. And it was a plain renaying<sup>33</sup> of Christ’s faith to do any observance thereto, though they did it only with their body, for fear, and thought the contrary with their heart. For our Lord saith, ‘He that denieth me before the world, I will deny him before my Father in heaven.’<sup>34</sup> And Holy Scripture saith, Spiritus Sanctus effugiet fictum (‘The Holy Ghost fleeth from feigning’).<sup>35</sup> But these men, whom you call the Church, come to the churches where the images be which they take for idols, and there they come to service with us, whom they take for idolaters. And where they teach

13 discourse 14 never the near: no nearer 15 Indeed 16 haply 17 say 18 dared 19 side 20 who 21 use to: customarily
22 pagans 23 and if: if 24 with a wet finger: with the greatest of ease 25 bad

26 Ps 25(26):5 27 holy service: the Divine Office or Prayers of the Hours 28 given Communion 29 historical writings 30 Pliny the Younger (61–113), while governor of Bithynia (modern Turkey), wrote to Emperor Trajan (53–117) about 111 to ask advice on how to conduct trials against Christians. See Epistle 10.96.

31 practice 32 false gods 33 renouncing
34 Mt 10:33 35 Ws 1:5

among themselves that we do naught,<sup>36</sup> they come to our church, as I say, and in face<sup>37</sup> of the world they do the same: kneel to images as we do, set up candles as we do, pray to saints as we do — and haply more loud with their mouths while they mock them with their hearts. And over<sup>38</sup> this, many mock also the sacraments which they receive.

“And this putteth me in mind also that besides all this, ye cannot say that these be the Church, whom we call heretics, but ye must tell which kind of them is the Church. For all cannot be, since the Church is, and must be, all of one belief, and have all one faith. And, as it was written in the Acts of the Apostles, Erat multitudo credentium anima una et cor unum (‘The multitude of faithful, believing men were all of one mind and of one heart’).<sup>39</sup> And in the Church is the Holy Ghost, qui facit unanimes in domo (‘which<sup>40</sup> maketh all of one mind in the house of God’ — that is, in the Church).<sup>41</sup> But as for among heretics, there be as many diverse minds, almost, as there be men.

“The Church of Christ also is a thing that always hath stood and continued. But the sects of heretics and their churches never continued, but ever shortly decayed and vanished quite away, so farforth<sup>42</sup> that of all the old heretics, the books also be gone and lost, when there was no law made yet to burn them, so that it is easy to see that God himself destroyed them, and the world clean<sup>43</sup> gave them up at some time, though new heretics now, long after, take them up again. For if their opinions had anywhere continually endured, there would their books have been continually reserved, which be now quite gone many years ago. And thus may ye well see that there can no such folk be the Church, that<sup>44</sup> in so many years have no church, nor come to none, but to theirs in which they say themselves that they worship idols.”

“Well,” quoth he, “peradventure they will not stick much to assign you a place and show you a company and congregation which they will say is the very<sup>45</sup> Church. For what if they will show you Bohemia,<sup>46</sup> and now in Saxony, where Luther is, and peradventure in a good part of Germany?”

“Marry,” quoth I, “if they say so, then leap they like a flounder out of a frying pan into the fire. For in Saxony, first, and among all the Lutherans, there be as many heads, as many wits — and all as wise as wild geese. And as late as they began, yet be there not only as many sects almost as men, but also the masters themselves change their minds and their opinions every day, and wot nere<sup>47</sup> where to hold them. Bohemia is also in the same case: one faith in the town, another in the field; one in Prague, another in the next town; and yet in Prague itself, one faith in one street, another in the next, so that if ye assign it in Bohemia, ye must tell in what town. And if ye name a town, yet must ye tell in what street. And yet all they acknowledge that they cannot have the sacraments ministered<sup>48</sup> but by such priests as be made by authority derived and conveyed from the Pope, which<sup>49</sup> is — under Christ — vicar and the head of our Church.”

THE SECOND CHAPTER

The author showeth that no sect of such as the Church taketh for heretics can be the Church, forasmuch as<sup>50</sup> the Church was before all them, as the tree from which all those withered branches be fallen.

“That none of all these can be the Church shall well appear also by another means. Whether<sup>51</sup> will ye say: that the very Church and congregation of Christ was before all the churches and congregations of heretics, or some church of heretics before the Church of Christ?”

“Marry,” quoth he, “there might be some church of heretics before the Church of Christ. For there might be some among the Jews, before the birth of Christ. And such, I suppose, were the Sadducees, that believed not the resurrection, nor the immortality of the soul.”<sup>52</sup>

“If we should go,” quoth I, “to that reckoning, we might fetch the Church of Christ far above, and begin it at Adam. For from the first good man to the last, all shall in conclusion be his Church triumphant in heaven. But I speak of Christ’s Church now as of that congregation that, bearing his name, and having his right faith, and being begun to be gathered by himself and spread abroad by his

36 evil 37 sight 38 beyond 39 Acts 4:32 40 who 41 Ps 67(68):7 42 so far-forth: to such an extent 43 completely 44 who 45 true 46 modern Czech Republic, at that time controlled by followers of John Hus 47 wot nere: know not 48 administered 49 who 50 forasmuch as: seeing that 51 Which (of these two) 52 See Mt 22:23; Mk 12:18; Lk 20:27; Acts 23:8.

apostles, hath and doth and shall, till his coming to the dreadful Doom,<sup>53</sup> continue still in this world. Whether was this Church before all the churches and congregations of heretics, or some one of them before it?”

“Nay,” quoth he, “I think it was before them all.”

“Whereby may we,” quoth I, “be sure of that?”

“Marry,” quoth he, “for always the heretics came out of it.”

“That is,” quoth I, “true. For they could be none heretics, but by being first therein, and after<sup>54</sup> coming out. And it appeareth by the Gospel, in which the good husbandman ‘went forth to sow his seed, and when he had sowed good seed, then the enemy sowed his evil after, and they grew up together.’<sup>55</sup> It appeareth also by the words of the apostle and holy evangelist Saint John, where he said of heretics, Ex nobis profecti sunt, sed non erant ex nobis (‘They be gone,’ he said, ‘out of us, but they were none of us’),<sup>56</sup> meaning that ere<sup>57</sup> ever they professed themselves openly for heretics—yet being such indeed, since the Church of Christ is a people of one faith—these folk, that have another special faith by themselves, varying and gainsaying<sup>58</sup> the other, be not perfectly of the Church though they be for the while<sup>59</sup> in it. So it is now that any member of that body, till it be cut off for fear of corruption of the remnant, hangeth on it in a manner, and some little light or life hath by the Spirit of God, that<sup>60</sup> upholdeth the body of his Church, being ever in case<sup>61</sup> to take occasion of amendment by some vein of that wholesome moisture of God’s grace that specially spreadeth throughout that holy body. But those that, by the profession of heresies and infidelity,<sup>62</sup> fall off from that body, or—for fear of corrupting the remnant—be by curse<sup>63</sup> cast out of the body, they plainly dry up and wither away. Our Savior saith himself: ‘I am,’ saith he, ‘a very vine, and my Father is a gardener. I am the vine, and ye be the branches. And every branch that beareth in me no fruit, my Father taketh it away. And every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it to make it bring the more fruit. And as the branch can do no good being taken from the tree, right<sup>64</sup> so can ye do no good, nor serve for nought<sup>65</sup> but for the fire, except<sup>66</sup> ye abide in me.’<sup>67</sup> By these words of our Savior and many more there spoken at length, though it appeareth that whoso keep the faith, yet except he work well therewith, God will pluck him out, and whoso by faith abiding in the stock doth work good works, the more he doth, the more grace and help shall have of God to grow the better and to do the more, yet appeareth it also that all the good works that may be done will not serve if we be out of the stock. And out of the stock of the vine be all that be not grafted in by faith, or fallen off by open profession of heresy, or cut off and cast out for infidelity. For faith is the gate into God’s Church, as misbelief is the gate into the devil’s church. For as the Apostle saith, Accedentem ad Deum oportet credere (‘A man cannot come to God without faith’).<sup>68</sup> And therefore whoso professeth a false belief, let him be sure that he is gone out of the gate of God’s Church before actual excommunication, and fallen off the body of the vineyard. And if they be secret—neither professing their heresies nor actually being accursed and cast out—they be in the Church, but not perfectly of it. But in such wise, in manner,<sup>69</sup> thereof be they as a dead hand is rather a burden in the body than verily<sup>70</sup> any member, organ, or instrument thereof. And therefore saith Saint John, as I said before, that the heretics ‘be gone out of us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would have tarried with us,’<sup>71</sup> meaning thereby not, as some would have it seem, that a good man is not of the Church, nor in God’s favor while he is good, because he happeth to wax<sup>72</sup> worse afterward. But he meaneth that in that they went their way from us, they showed that they were naught<sup>73</sup> indeed while they were with us. And so though they were with us, yet were they not of us. For though heretics and infidels be among faithful and well-believing people, yet be they, pardie,<sup>74</sup> none of them. And so it appeareth, as ye said before, that the Church of Christ is before all the churches of heretics, and that all congregations of heretics have comen out of the Church of Christ.”

“That is very true,” quoth he.

“Well,” quoth I, “if that be true, as it is indeed, then can no sect in Bohemia be the right church. For the church which we call ‘the Church,’ that believeth as we believe, was there before them all. And never a church had any church of heretics yet, but it was built by our Church to their hands,

53 Last Judgment 54 afterwards 55 Mt 13:24–30 56 1 Jn 2:19 57 before 58 going against 59 time 60 who

61 a position 62 unbelief 63 excommunication 64 even; just 65 nothing 66 unless 67 Jn 15:1–6 68 Heb 11:6

69 in manner: so to speak 70 truly 71 1 Jn 2:19 72 become 73 wicked 74 indeed

so that it is evident that none of all them can be Christ's Church; but Christ's Church must needs be that church that was before all them, and out of which all they have sprung, and since severed themselves — which is the Church that all they deny not to believe against them the points which we believe and they reprove.”

THE THIRD CHAPTER

The messenger moveth<sup>75</sup> that the very Church peradventure is not the people that we take for it, but a secret unknown sort of such only as be by God predestinate<sup>76</sup> to be saved. Whereunto the author answereth, and declareth<sup>77</sup> that it cannot be so.

“Peradventure,” quoth he, “there might be said that it needeth not to assign<sup>78</sup> any place where the very Church and true Christian congregation is. But since every place is indifferent thereunto, it may be that all the good men and chosen people of God that be predestinate to be saved — in what part soever they be, and howsoever they be scattered, here one and there one, here two and there two — that these be the very Church of Christ, and be in this world unknown as yet, while the Church doth but wander in the pilgrimage of this short life.”

“Marry,” quoth I, “this gear<sup>79</sup> groweth from worse to worse. And in very deed, yet is this point their sheet-anchor.<sup>80</sup> For first, they see plainly that they must needs grant that the very Church can neither be deceived in the right faith, nor mistake Holy Scripture, or misunderstand it, to the introduction of infidelity and false belief. And this ground find all the heretics themselves so sure and fast<sup>81</sup> that they perceive well except<sup>82</sup> they would openly and utterly deny Christ altogether, it cannot be undermined. And since they manifestly see that, and as evidently see therewith that the Church (which is the very Church indeed) damneth all their ways — whereof, since the Church cannot err in discerning the truth, it must needs follow that they mistake themselves all the whole matter, and be quite in a wrong way — therefore be they driven to deny for the Church the people that be known for the Church, and go seek another, they neither know what nor where, and build up in the air a church all so spiritual that they leave therein at length neither God nor good man. And first, where they say that there be none therein but they that be predestinate to be saved, if the question were of the Church triumphant in heaven, then said they well. But we speak of the Church of Christ militant here in earth; and therefore goeth their frame as far wide from the place they should set it on as heaven and earth stand asunder. For first would I wit,<sup>83</sup> if the Church be none but those that be predestinate, whether all that been predestinate be members thereof.”

“Why not?” quoth he.

“Then,” quoth I, “he that is predestinate to be saved, whether may he or not be diverse times a sinner in his days?”

“What if he may?” quoth he.

“May he not,” quoth I, “be also diverse times in his days in a wrong belief and a false heresy, and after turn, repent, and amend, and so be saved at last, as God hath predestinate him to be?”

“What then?” quoth he.

“Marry,” quoth I, “for then shall it follow that he shall be a member of the very Church, and so still continue, and never can be cast out, being a stark<sup>84</sup> heretic.”

“Yet,” quoth he, “is he all that while a quick<sup>85</sup> member of the Church by reason of God's predestination, since, though he be not sure, yet it is indeed sure that he is and ever shall be one of the very Church.”

“It is,” quoth I, “sure indeed, and well known to God, that he so shall be. But as sure is it that for the while, he is not, except that all things that ever shall be, is already present indeed as it is present to God's knowledge. And then were Saint Paul as good while he was a persecutor as when he was apostle, and as verily a member of Christ's Church ere he was born as he is now in heaven.”

“Well,” quoth he, “though that peradventure all those that be living and predestinate to be saved be not in it, yet may it be that there be none others in it than predestinates.”

“But it may be,” quoth I, “that, as men be changeable, he that is predestinate may be many times in his life naught.<sup>86</sup> And he that will at last fall to sin and wretchedness and so finally cast himself away, shall in some time of his life be good, and therefore

<sup>75</sup> proposes <sup>76</sup> predestined <sup>77</sup> explains <sup>78</sup> it needeth... assign: there is no need to identify <sup>79</sup> matter <sup>80</sup> the largest anchor <sup>81</sup> secure <sup>82</sup> that unless

<sup>83</sup> would I wit: I want to know <sup>84</sup> utter; unyielding <sup>85</sup> living <sup>86</sup> bad for the time in God's favor. For God blameth nor hateth no man for that he shall will, but for that malicious will that he hath, or hath had already. And thus shall there by this reason be good men out of Christ's Church and naughty men therein, faithful men out of it and heretics in it, and both the one and the other without reason or good cause why."

THE FOURTH CHAPTER

The messenger moveth that though the Church be not the number of folk only predestinate to bliss, yet may it peradventure be the number of good and well-believing folk here and there unknown—which may be peradventure those whom we condemn for heretics for holding opinion against images. Whereof the author proveth the contrary.

"Well," quoth he, "yet may it be that the very Church of Christ is all such as believe aright and live well wheresoever they be—though the world know them not, and though few of them know each other. For God, as Saint Paul saith, 'knoweth who be his.'<sup>87</sup> And Christ saith that against his Church 'the gates of hell shall not prevail,'<sup>88</sup> but the gates of hell do prevail against sinners. And therefore it appeareth well that there can be no sinners in his Church, nor that there be none of his Church but good folk. And unto them our Lord is present, and keepeth them from errors, and giveth them right understanding of his Holy Scriptures. And where they be forceth not;<sup>89</sup> how few they be together maketh no matter. For our Savior saith, 'Wheresoever be two or three gathered together in my name, there am I also among them.'<sup>90</sup> And so is his very Church—here and there—of only good men to the world unknown, and to himself well known. And though they be few in comparison, yet make they about in all the world a good many among them. As God said when the children of Israel were fallen in idolatry and worshipped the idol Baal so far-forth<sup>91</sup> that it seemed all were in the case,<sup>92</sup> and men knew not who were otherwise, yet said our Lord (as appeareth in the nineteenth chapter, the Third Book of the Kings), 'I shall reserve for myself seven thousand that have not bended their knee before Baal,'<sup>93</sup> so that where the synagogue and church was then, it was unknown to man, but it was well known to God. And they were not his Church that<sup>94</sup> seemed to be, but a company ungathered, that no man was aware of, nor would have weened.<sup>95</sup> And so may it be peradventure now, that the very Church of Christ is not, nor many days hath not been, the people that seemeth to be the Church, but some good men scattered here and there unknown, till God gather them together and make them known—and haply<sup>96</sup> those that believe against images, and whom we now call heretics."

"This is," quoth I, "a reason that Luther maketh himself, by which he would bring the very Church of Christ out of knowledge, and would put it in doubt whether the saints that the Church honoreth were good men or not, and would that it might seem peradventure nay, but that they were haply not good, but the good men, and saints indeed, were some others whom the world, for their open lewd<sup>97</sup> living, reputed for naught. But where he saith that the church or synagogue of the right belief was then unknown, that is not true. For it was well known in Jerusalem and Judaea, though it had been unknown who were faithful in Samaria. And the Scripture also saith not that these seven thousand whom he would leave yet in Israel, that<sup>98</sup> had not bowed their knees before Baal, were secret and unknown; but he saith only that such a number of such folk he would leave. But now, for our purpose, since ye will have the very Church a secret unknown—not company and congregation, but a disparkled<sup>99</sup> number of only good men—will you that those good men, which<sup>100</sup> after your reckoning make the very Church, shall have the same faith and none other than we have, which be now reputed for the Church, or else a faith and belief different?"

"What if they have the same?" quoth he.

"Marry," quoth I, "then will your new-built Church nothing help your purpose. But they shall as fast<sup>101</sup> confirm the worship of images, praying to saints, and seeking to pilgrimages as we, and as deeply condemn for heresy your opinion to the contrary."

"That is very truth," quoth he. "But it may be that of that very Church, the faith and belief shall be that all this gear<sup>102</sup> is erroneous and as plain idolatry as was the worshipping of Baal."

87 2 Tm 2:19 88 Mt 16:18 89 forceth not: makes no difference 90 Mt 18:20 91 so far-forth: to such an extent 92 the case: that state 93 3 Kgs (1 Kgs) 19:18 94 who 95 thought 96 perhaps 97 wicked 98 who 99 scattered;

dispersed 100 who 101 steadfastly 102 matter

“If it were so,” quoth I, “then had Christ not kept him seven thousand from the worship of Baal in all the regions that bear the name of Christendom, except these new folk of Saxony and Bohemia which 5 yourself grant to be the heretics, as sects comen out of the Church. And more than wonder were it if all the Church of Christ should be clean<sup>103</sup> among infidels and heretics, and no part at all thereof among the great unchangeable Christian countries which 10 have kept their faith in one constant fashion derived from the beginning. For this am I sure: that in all those regions, as I say, if any have any such opinion against images and saints, yet cometh he to the church among his neighbors, and there boweth his knees to Baal (if the images be Baal) as his neighbors do—but go to,<sup>104</sup> let us forth on a little further. And supposing that there were some such secret good folk as ye speak of, that had the right belief, and were the right Church, and that they were so 20 dispersed asunder that they were to the world unknown, hath not God set an order in his Church that some shall preach to the remnant for exhortation of good living, and information wherein good living standeth<sup>105</sup>—as in faith and good works?”
 25 “Yes,” quoth he.
 “Bade not Christ,” quoth I, “sacraments also to be ministered in his Church, by the priests of the same?”
 “Yes,” quoth he.
 30 “Now,” quoth I, “if some infidels, as Turks or Saracens, having heard of Christ’s name, did long to know his Scripture and his faith, and hearing that there were many people that professed themselves for Christian men, whole nations, but they were all open idolaters and in a misbelief, and clearly 35 deceived and beguiled (and that specially by the clergy that teacheth them), howbeit<sup>106</sup> there were yet a few good folk, and right-believing, which<sup>107</sup> were not deceived, which among them be the very true Church, but who they be, or where they be, or how to ask for them, or if he happen on them, yet whereby to know them, that can no man tell him—how should these infidels come to the faith, and of whom should they hear it? For they—being warned 40 before that there were many sects of heretics, and but one true Church—would never be so mad<sup>108</sup> to learn of them that<sup>109</sup> they might ween were wrong. And how should they now come to the right, when the true Church is unknown?”

“They might,” quoth he, “take the Scripture.” 50

“They should,” quoth I, “be therein like<sup>110</sup> to Eunuchus,<sup>111</sup> that<sup>112</sup> could not understand without a reader.<sup>113</sup> And then if they took a wrong reader of a wrong church, all were marred. And also they would not trust the Scriptures, nor reckon that 55 they had the right books of Scripture, among false sects, but would look to receive the true Scripture of the right and true Church. And thus here it appeareth if it were thus, God had left none ordinary way for his Gospel and faith to be taught. But let go 60 these infidels and speak of ourselves, which are (if this way were true) as false as they. Where be then preachers of this very Church that should preach and teach us better? For it is no church if it have no preachers.” 65

“It hath,” quoth he, “some that preach sometimes, but ye will not suffer<sup>114</sup> them. Ye punish them and burn them.”

“Nay,” quoth I, “they be wiser than so. They will not be burned for us; for they will rather swear on a book that they never said so—or else<sup>115</sup> that they will no more say so. And in this appeareth that there is no such secret unknown Church of Christ that, having such opinions, is the very Church. For the very Church hath ever had some that hath abidden
 75 by their faith and their preaching, and would never go back with<sup>116</sup> God’s Word, to die therefor.<sup>117</sup> And this Church that we be of, that take your church for heretics, have had many such martyrs therein that believed as we do against your opinions—as 80 appeareth by the histories and by many of their books—whereas of your secret Church I never yet found, or heard of, anyone in all my life but he would forswear<sup>118</sup> your faith to save his life. Where be also your priests and your bishops? For such 85 must they have if they be the Church of Christ. Now such can your Church have none; ye be each to other unknown. And though some of such churches have a false opinion that every man is a priest, and every woman too, yet this heresy—false 90 as it is—will not serve this unknown Church. For the holders of that opinion do put<sup>119</sup> that no man

103 completely 104 go to: come; never mind 105 consists 106 although 107 foolish, irrational 108 whom 109 who 110 similar 111 taken here as a proper name, but usually translated today as “a eunuch” 112 who 113 interpreter. See Acts 8:27-39. 114 allow 115 otherwise 116 go back with: go back on, deny

117 to die therefor: to the point of dying for it 118 renounce under oath 119 propose may, for all that, take upon him to preach or meddle as priest, till he be chosen by the congregation. And where can that be in this imaginary Church, of which no man knoweth other? And whereas our Lord saith, ‘Wheresoever be two or three gathered together in my name, there am I with them,’<sup>120</sup> he spoke not as though every two or three, whatsoever they were, should make his Church; but that wheresoever there came together two or three in his name that be of his Church, there is he with them. And so doth the one<sup>121</sup> text of the Scripture in the Gospel plainly declare, as it is well set out and opened<sup>122</sup> by the holy doctor and glorious martyr Saint Cyprian, in his epistle against Novatian.<sup>123</sup>

“When our Savior saith also that he which would not amend by his fault showed him before two or three witnesses should be complained upon unto the Church, did he mean a secret Church, which no man wist<sup>124</sup> where to find?<sup>125</sup> Now when the Apostle<sup>126</sup> writeth unto the Corinthians that rather than they should plead<sup>127</sup> and strive in the law before the infidels, they should set such as<sup>128</sup> were in the Church little set by<sup>129</sup> to be judges in their temporal<sup>130</sup> suits, of what Church did he speak? Of such one as no man wist where to seek it?<sup>131</sup> This unknown church, which they be driven to seek that be loath to know the Church, will never serve. But the Church of Christ is a church well known. And his pleasure was to have it known, and not hid. And it is builded upon so high a hill of that holy stone — I mean upon Christ himself — that it cannot be hid. Non potest abscondi civitas supra montem posita (“The city cannot be hid that is set on a hill”).<sup>132</sup> And he would have his faith divulged and spread abroad openly, not always whispered in hugger-mugger.<sup>133</sup> And therefore he bound his preachers to stand thereby, and not to revoke his word for no pain. For he said that he did not light that candle to put it and hide it under a bushel<sup>134</sup> — for so would no man do — but he had kindled a fire which he would not should<sup>135</sup> lie and smolder as coals doth in quench, but he would it should burn and give light.<sup>136</sup> And therefore folly were it to say that Christ, which<sup>137</sup> would have his Church spread through the world, and everywhere gathered in company, would have it turned to a secret unknown single sort, severed asunder and scattered about in corners, unknown to all the world and to themselves too. Now, where they say that there is none of<sup>138</sup> the Church but only those that be good folk, this would make the Church clearly unknown, were the people never so many and the place never so large. For who can know, of the multitude, who be good indeed and who be naught,<sup>139</sup> since the bad may suddenly be amended, unware<sup>140</sup> to the world, and the good as suddenly waxen<sup>141</sup> worse? Now lay they for the proof of that opinion the words of Christ which Luther allegeth<sup>142</sup> also, for the same intent, in his book that he made against Ambrosius Catharinus<sup>143</sup> — that is to wit, the words wherein our Lord said unto Saint Peter that against his Church ‘the gates of hell should not prevail,’ by which words Luther doth (as he thinketh, and saith himself) marvelous gaily prove that there can be no man of the Church but he that sinneth not. For this argument he maketh: Christ saith that the ‘gates of hell’ shall not prevail against the Church; but the ‘gates of hell’ is nothing but the devil, and he prevaieth against all folk that sin; ergo, no folk that sin be the Church.<sup>144</sup> And by this worshipful<sup>145</sup> argument, it is a world<sup>146</sup> to see what boast the madman maketh: that he hath clearly proved that the Church is not these people whom we take for the Church, because they be sinners — which argument hath so many follies and faults therein, and so much inconvenience<sup>147</sup> and absurdity following thereupon, that it is more than marvel that a child of one week’s study in sophistry could, for shame, find in his heart to bring it in place for<sup>148</sup> any earnest<sup>149</sup> argument. For first, if men deny him that the ‘gates of hell’ do in that place signify the devil, then he can never prove it; and then is all his reason wiped quite away. Now do there indeed diverse old commenters<sup>150</sup> and doctors of the Church take in that place, for the ‘gates of hell,’ the great tyrants and heretics by whose persecutions and heresies (as it were, by two gates) many a man hath gone into hell; and our Savior promiseth in that place that neither of those two gates — that is to wit, neither

120 Mt 18:20 121 the one: that same
122 explained 123 St. Cyprian (200–258) opposed the antipope Novatian and his followers. See Cyprian’s The Unity of the Church, ch. 12 (PL 4: 524–25). 124 knew 125 See Mt 8:15–17. 126 St. Paul 127 enter pleas 128 set such as: appoint those who 129 set by: valued 130 civil 131 See 1 Cor 6:4. 132 Mt 5:14

133 secret 134 bushel basket 135 would not should: did not want to 136 See Lk 11:13, 12:49. 137 who 138 none of: no one (who is) in 139 bad 140 unknown
141 become 142 cites 143 He lived from 1483 to 1553, was baptized Lancelotto Politi, changing his name when he became a Dominican monk. Luther’s book was published in 1521. 144 See Luther, WA 7: 710–12. 145 distinctive 146 great thing, marvel 147 inconsistency 148 of 149 serious 150 commentators

5 paynim tyrant nor christened heretic—should prevail against the Church. For though they have destroyed and shall destroy many of the Church, yet shall they not be able to destroy the Church; but the Church shall stand and be by God preserved in despite of all their teeth.<sup>151</sup> And thus ye see how soon Luther’s special arguments were overthrown with truth. But if a man would grant him that the ‘gates of hell’ did here signify the devil, yet should we not need to grant him that the devil, as he is called of God by the name of ‘the gates’ (which is not done for nought),<sup>152</sup> doth prevail against every man that sinneth. For he that sinneth and riseth again out of sin (and so cometh within the gates as yet the gates cannot hold him, but that he breaketh out of the gates), the gates do not prevail against him; but he prevaieth against the gates. And thus is Luther’s wise argument which he groundeth upon the text avoided<sup>153</sup> again. It appeareth also that it is a very frantic<sup>154</sup> argument. For where he saith that against the Church of Christ the gates of hell prevail not, but they prevail against our Church—that is to wit, all the Christian people whom we call the Church, under obedience of the Pope, ergo they be not the Church—this argument proveth that there is in earth no Church at all. For what Church can he find or imagine in earth that doth not sin? And specially if that were true that himself saith, among his other heresies, where he holdeth stiffly that all the good works of good men be sins, and that men sin in that they do good. And thus he would both have the Church to be only a secret unknown sort of folk that do not sin, and yet he confesseth that there be none such. And so, as he goeth about to take away the very Church that is well known—making as though he would find out a better—he leaveth in conclusion no church at all. And to such a fond<sup>155</sup> and false end must they needs bring it all, that will make it a number of only such as be good men and do not sin. For if he should be in it always when he is out of sin, and out of it when he is in sin, then should a man peradventure<sup>156</sup> be in it in the morning, and out of it at noon, and in again at night, so that who were in it, or when, or where it were, who could tell? And of that uncertainty must needs grow all such inconveniences<sup>157</sup> and contradiction unto Scripture as is before rehearsed. The Church, therefore, must needs be the common known multitude of Christian men, good and bad together, while the Church is here in earth. For this net of Christ hath for the while good fishes and bad.<sup>158</sup> And this field of Christ beareth for the while good corn<sup>159</sup> and cockle, till it shall at the Day of Doom be purified, and all the bad cast out, and the only good remain.<sup>160</sup> And therefore when the Apostle<sup>161</sup> wrote unto the Corinthians of him that had lain with his mother-in-law,<sup>162</sup> he commanded that he should be separated out of the Church. Which he never was, after the deed done, till the excommunication denounced,<sup>163</sup> but was still, for all his sin, one of the Church, though he was naughty,<sup>164</sup> and out of God’s favor. Christ himself said to his apostles, ‘Now be you clean, but not all’<sup>165</sup>—and yet were they all of his Church, albeit that<sup>166</sup> one of them was, as our Savior said himself, a devil. ‘Did I not,’ said he, ‘choose twelve of you, and one of you is a devil?’<sup>167</sup> And if there were none of the Church but good men as long as they were good, then had Saint Peter been once no part of the Church after that Christ had appointed him for chief.

“But our Lord, in this his mystical body of his Church, carrieth his members<sup>168</sup>—some sick, some whole,<sup>169</sup> and all sickly. Nor they be not for every sin clean<sup>170</sup> cast off from the body but if<sup>171</sup> they be, for fear of infection, cut off, or else willingly do depart and separate themselves, as do these heretics that either refuse the Church willfully themselves, or else for their obstinacy be put out. For till their stubborn hearts do show them incurable, the body beareth them yet about—sick, and naughty, and key-cold<sup>172</sup> as they be—to prove whether the warmth of grace going through this whole mystical body of Christ’s Church might get yet,<sup>173</sup> and keep, some life in them. But when the time shall come that this Church shall wholly change her place and have heaven for her dwelling instead of earth, after the final judgment pronounced and given, when God shall, with his Spouse, this Church of Christ, enter into the pleasant wedding chamber to the bed of eternal rest, then shall all these scaldy<sup>174</sup> and scabbed pieces scale<sup>175</sup> clean off, and the whole body of Christ’s holy Church remain pure, clean, and

151 opposition 152 nothing 153 disproved 154 frantic; foolish 155 foolish 156 perhaps 157 inconsistencies 158 See Mt 13: 47–50. 159 grain 160 See

Mt 13: 24–30. 161 St. Paul 162 See 1 Cor 5: 1–5. 163 (was) pronounced 164 wicked 165 Jn 13: 10 166 albeit that: although 167 Jn 6: 70 168 See

Eph 5: 23. 169 healthy 170 completely 171 but if: unless 172 cold as a key; i.e., without heat or fervor 173 still 174 blistered 175 flake; peel glorious, without wem,<sup>176</sup> wrinkle, or spot;<sup>177</sup> which is (and for the while, I ween, will be, as long as she is here) as scabbed as ever was Job,<sup>178</sup> and yet her loving Spouse leaveth her not, but continually goeth about by many manner medicines — some bitter, some sweet; some easy, some grievous; some pleasant, some painful — to cure her.”

THE FIFTH CHAPTER

The author showeth and concludeth that this common known multitude of Christian nations, not cut off nor fallen off by heresies, be the very Church of Christ — good men and bad together.

“And finally, to put out of question which is Christ’s very Church, since it is agreed between us, and granted through Christendom, and a conclusion very true, that by the Church we know the Scripture — which Church is that by which ye know the Scripture? Is it not this company and congregation of all these nations that, without factions taken and precision<sup>179</sup> from the remnant, profess the name and faith of Christ? By this Church know we the Scripture; and this is the very Church; and this hath begun at Christ, and hath had him for their head, and Saint Peter, his vicar after him, the head under him, and always since, the successors of him continually, and have had his holy faith and his blessed sacraments and his Holy Scriptures delivered, kept, and conserved therein by God and his Holy Spirit. And albeit some nations fall away, yet likewise as how many boughs soever fall from the tree, though they fall more than be left thereon, yet they make no doubt which is the very tree, although each of them were planted again in another place and grew to a greater than the stock he came first of, right so, while we see and well know that all the companies and sects of heretics and schismatics, how great soever they grow, came out of this Church that I spoke of, we know evermore that the heretics be they that be severed, and the Church, the stock that all they came out of. And since that only the Church of Christ is the vine that Christ spoke of in the Gospel, which he taketh for his body mystical, and that every branch severed from that tree loseth his lively nourishing,<sup>180</sup> we must needs well know that all these branches of heretics fallen from the Church, the vine of Christ’s mystical body — seem they never so fresh and green — be yet indeed but witherlings<sup>181</sup> that wither, and shall dry up, able to serve for nothing but for the fire.”

THE SIXTH CHAPTER

The messenger moveth that since the Church is this known multitude of good men and bad together, of whom no man knoweth which be the one sort and which be the other, that it may be peradventure that the good sort of the Church be they that believe the worship of images to be idolatry, and the bad sort they that believe the contrary. Which objection the author doth answer and confute.<sup>182</sup>

When I had said,

“Sir,” quoth he, “ye have, in good faith, fully satisfied me concerning the sure and undoubted knowledge of the very Church here in earth. But yet thinketh me that one little doubt remaineth for our principal matter.”

“What is that?” quoth I.

“Marry, sir,” quoth he, “it is this: that though the very faith be in the Church, and the Church cannot err therein; nor the Church cannot be deceived, against the faith, in any text of Scripture; nor no Scripture is there that (being well understood) doth or can do stand against the faith of the Church; and that also the Church is none other but, as ye say, and as I see it is indeed, but this whole common congregation of Christian people good and bad, not separating themselves for frowardness,<sup>183</sup> nor being put out for their obstinate faults; yet — since it appeareth well that, though the right faith be in the Church, it is not in every man of the Church, and though the Church cannot err in such things, yet some of the Church may — now seemeth it to some men that it may well peradventure happen that the good men, well-believing and undeceived, be those that believe the worship of images and praying to saints to be idolatry, and on the other side, that those which believe the contrary be that part of the Church that be the naughty men, misbelievers and foully deceived.”

“That were a very strange work,” quoth I. “Ye

176 blemish; scar 177 See Eph 5:27.
178 See Job 2:7. 179 separation

180 See Jn 15:1–6. 181 shriveled up branches; enemies (pun)

182 disprove; refute 183 perversity would right now,”<sup>184</sup> quoth I, “that in the Church we should think that there were none other but good men. Will ye now agree that there be therein some good men?”

5 “Yea,” quoth he, “that must needs be.”

“Well,” quoth I, “whether be<sup>185</sup> they good men that do naught?”<sup>186</sup>

“Nay,” quoth he.

10 “Do they well,” quoth I, “that do idolatry indeed, though it be against their hearts?”

“Nay,” quoth he.

“But all,” quoth I, “come to church and worship images; and all pray to saints. Wherefore, if that be idolatry, then the Church of Christ is all naught.

15 For thus do they that be of the contrary side, for fear of being perceived. Also, if one do well or preach well, is he a good man if he deny it for fear?”

“Nay,” quoth he.

20 “But now,” quoth I, “all that are of that sort, if they happen to adventure<sup>187</sup> somewhat and be spied, they will first perjure themselves, and after abjure<sup>188</sup> their opinion; so that if their opinion were good, yet were themselves naught.”<sup>189</sup>

25 “But yet,” quoth he, “if their opinions be good, then be not they so evil in hiding their intents for fear as they that<sup>190</sup> against their true opinions do and preach openly, and pursue them for saying truth, as some that fainted<sup>191</sup> and fled from martyrdom were not so evil as they that pursued them.”

30 “Very truth,” quoth I, “if these men’s opinions were true. But yet, though<sup>192</sup> they were true, yet were these men naught.”

“And the others worse,” quoth he.

35 “That is well said,” quoth I. “But they and the others be the whole Church. And if yours be naught — as ye grant and must needs grant they be — if the others were naught too, then were in the Church none good. But yourself deny not but in the Church it must needs be that there be some good. And there

40 can be none but either your party or the other. Ergo, since yours be naught, those that be good must needs be the other. But none of those that be of the other could be good men if they were idolaters, and pursued your party for saying the truth, and compelled them to deny the truth; ergo, the other party

45 be not idolaters, nor the opinion of your party, for which they pursue your party, be not true. And thus it appeareth, as meseemeth, that good men of the Church be against you, and the naughty with you.”

THE SEVENTH CHAPTER

The author somewhat doth corroborate the truth against the heresies holding against images, and recapitulating<sup>193</sup> somewhat briefly what hath been proved, so finisheth and endeth the proof of his part.<sup>194</sup>

“And yet speak I nothing of all the good men, and well known for good men, and holy men, and now saints in heaven, that have condemned your party and written against you. And your party therefore be so sore<sup>195</sup> against saints again because they see their heresies impugned and condemned by their holy writings. Nor besides this have I nothing spoken of the general councils condemning your party by good and substantial authority comprobated<sup>196</sup> and corroborated by the whole body of Christendom, led thereunto, both long before and ever since, through the secret operation of the Holy Ghost, who could never suffer<sup>197</sup> (as yourself agreeth) the Church of Christ to continue so wholly and so long in so damnable idolatry, as this were if it were superstition, and not a part of very faith and true devout religion. Wherefore, since I have proved you that the Church cannot err in so great a point, nor against the right faith mistake the sentence<sup>198</sup> of Holy Scripture; and also that these people that believe images to be worshipped be the very Church of Christ; and that of his Church the good and bad both doth use it, and the good men doth it truly, and the bad falsely; and that all the good men of old hath allowed and used this way, and condemned the contrary, which hath also been declared for false heresy by the whole general council of Christendom, approved by the faith and custom of all the people, besides growing into such consent by God’s Holy Spirit, that governeth his Church — I never need to go further or touch your texts or arguments to the contrary. For this side thus proved good, it must needs follow that the other side is naught — except ye have against this any further thing to say. Which if ye have, never let<sup>199</sup> to bring it forth. For I will for none haste leave any corner of the matter unransacked, as far as we can any doubt find therein.”

<sup>184</sup> would right now: were wanting just now <sup>185</sup> whether be: are <sup>186</sup> evil <sup>187</sup> risk themselves <sup>188</sup> renounce

<sup>189</sup> bad <sup>190</sup> who <sup>191</sup> lost courage <sup>192</sup> even if <sup>193</sup> summarizing; recapitulating <sup>194</sup> side (of the argument)

<sup>195</sup> greatly <sup>196</sup> confirmed <sup>197</sup> allow <sup>198</sup> meaning <sup>199</sup> hesitate

“In good faith, sir,” quoth he, “I am in this matter even at the hard wall, and see not how to go further.”

5 “Now I assure you,” quoth I, “if I could myself find any further objection, I would not fail to bring it in. But in good faith, I suppose we be waded in this matter as far as we can both find. And, I am sure, as far as ever Luther found, or any that ever 10 I have seen that anything have said or written on that side.”

THE EIGHTH CHAPTER

The author entereth the answer to the objections that had been before laid by the messenger against the worship of images, and praying to saints, and going on pilgrimages. And first he answereth, in this chapter, the objections made against praying to saints.

“Now therefore, as I say, further need I not to go.
20 But yet will I somewhat touch the things which, as ye say, do move many men to take the worship of images for idolatry. And it so taken, and their opinion so reputed,<sup>200</sup> they reckon it a ground to think the miracles done at the images, or by invocations of 25 saints, to be illusions of the devil. And first will we begin at the saints themselves. And by the way shall we speak of their relics, images, and pilgrimages, as there shall occasion rise in our matter. And for the first: in good faith, saving that the books and writings of holy doctors condemn these men’s heresies, the displeasure and anger whereof setteth them on a fire to study for the diminishing of their estimation that so stand in their light, else would I much wonder what these heretics mean, to impugn the wor-
30 ship of saints and forbid us to pray to them. And albeit I now see the cause of their malice, yet can I not much the less marvel of their madness, that show their evil will so openly that they neither have reason nor good color<sup>201</sup> to cloak or cover it with. First 40 they put in doubt whether saints can hear us. And if they do, yet whether they can help us. And finally if they could, yet would they we should<sup>202</sup> think it folly to desire them,<sup>203</sup> because God can do it better and will do it sooner himself than they all. Now where they doubt whether saints hear us, I marvel 45 whereof that doubt ariseth, but if they think them dead as well in soul as body. For if their holy souls live, there will no wise man ween them worse, and of less love and charity to men that need their help, when they be now in heaven, than they had when 50 they were here in earth. For all that while, were they never so good, yet the best was worse than the worst is now, as our Savior said by Saint John the Baptist: that there was no woman’s son greater than he, yet the least that was already in heaven was his bet-

55 ter.<sup>204</sup> We see that the nearer that folk draw thitherward,<sup>205</sup> the more good mind bear they to men here. And therefore Saint Stephen, when he saw heaven open for him, he began to pray for them that maliciously killed him.<sup>206</sup> And think we then that being in heaven, he will not vouchsafe<sup>207</sup> to pray for them that devoutly honor him, but hath less love and charity being there than he had going thither-
60 ward? If the rich man that lay in hell had,<sup>208</sup> yet not only for fear of increase of his own punishment by his brothers’ damnation growing of his evil exam-
65 ple in sin, but also of carnal love and fleshly favor toward his kin (which fleshly affection, being without grace or virtue may peradventure stand with the state of damnation) had a cure<sup>209</sup> and care of his 70 five brethren, were it likely that saints then being so full of blessed charity in heaven, will nothing care for their brethren in Christ, whom they see here in this wretched world? Now if there be no doubt (as I trow<sup>210</sup> none there is) but their holy souls be alive,
75 they would we did well. And as little doubt but that they be alive if God be their God, as he is indeed—and he not the God of dead men but of living, as our Savior saith in the Gospel,<sup>211</sup> for all men live still, and ever shall, that he hath taken to him and 80 once given life unto—there resteth then no further to see but whether they can do us any good or no, either for that<sup>212</sup> they cannot hear us, or for that they cannot help us. And first, I marvel much if they think they cannot help us. For while they were here
85 they could, as appeareth in the Acts of the Apostles.<sup>213</sup> And since imbecility<sup>214</sup> and lack of power is here part of our misery, and strength and plenty of power is one great part of wealth,<sup>215</sup> they were well

200 regarded 201 good color: a plausible pretext 202 would they we should: they want us to 203 desire them: ask them to

204 See Mt 11:11. 205 in that direction 206 See Acts 7:60. 207 be willing 208 See Lk 16:19–21. 209 concern

210 believe 211 See Mk 12:27. 212 for that: because 213 e.g., Acts 3:1–8. 214 feebleness 215 well-being furthered in that point if they were now less able to do good to them whom they fain<sup>216</sup> would were helped than they were before. For whether they be able there to do it themselves, or only by their intercession made unto God, this maketh no force<sup>217</sup> for our matter, so that by their means, the one way or the other, we take help by our devotion toward them, and prayer made unto them.”

“I think,” quoth he, “they may do indeed much more than they might, both by power and prayer. But it is hard somewhat to think that they should hear us and see us — and specially in so many places at once. For though they be not circumscribed in place (for lack of bodily dimension and measuring), yet are they, and angels also, definitively so placed where they be for the time that they be not at one time in diverse places at once — as saints be in sundry countries, and very far asunder, called upon at once.”

“Ye marvel,” quoth I, “and think it hard to be believed that saints hear us. And I (while we see that the things we pray for, we obtain) marvel much more how men can doubt whether the prayers be heard or not. When saints were in this world at liberty and might walk the world about, ween<sup>218</sup> we that in heaven they stand tied to a post? But the wonder is how they may see and hear in sundry places at once. If we could no more but feel, and neither see nor hear, we would as well wonder. Or if we could not wonder thereof, because we could not hear thereof, yet should we be far from any conceiving in our mind that it were possible for man to see or hear further than he can feel. For we that prove it, and do see and hear indeed, cannot yet see the cause, nor in no wise<sup>219</sup> cease to wonder by what reason and means it may be that I should see two churches, or two towns, each of them two a mile asunder — and both twain<sup>220</sup> as far from me as each of them from other — and measure so great quantities<sup>221</sup> with so small a measure as is the little apple<sup>222</sup> of mine eye. And of hearing many men’s voices, or any man’s words coming at once into many men’s ears, standing far asunder, hath like<sup>223</sup> difficulty to conceive. And when all the reasons be made — either of beams sent out from our eyes to the things that we behold, or the figure of the things seen multiplied in the air from the thing to our eye, or of the air stricken with the breath of the speaker, and equally rolling forth in roundels<sup>224</sup> to the ears of the hearers — when all the reasons be heard, yet shall we rather delight to search than be able to find anything in these matters that were able to make us perceive it. Now, when we may with our fleshly eye and ear in this gross body see and hear things far distant from us and from sundry places far distant asunder, marvel we so much that blessed angels and holy souls — being mere<sup>225</sup> spiritual substances, uncharged<sup>226</sup> of all burdenous flesh and bones — may in doing the same, as far pass<sup>227</sup> and exceed us and our powers natural as the lively<sup>228</sup> soul itself exceedeth our deadly body, nor cannot believe they hear us, though we find they help us, but if<sup>229</sup> we perceived by what means they do it (as whether they see and hear us coming hither to us, or our voice coming hence to them; or whether God hear and see all, and show it them; or whether they behold it in him, as one doth in a book the thing that he readeth; or whether God by some other way doth utter it unto them as one doth in speaking) — except<sup>230</sup> we may know the means, we will not else<sup>231</sup> believe the matter? As wise as were he that would not believe he can see, because he cannot perceive by what means he may see.”

“Yet see I,” quoth he, “no cause or need why we should pray to them, since God can as well, and will as gladly, both hear us and help us, as any saint in heaven.”

“What need you,” quoth I, “to pray<sup>232</sup> any physician to help your fever, or pray and pay any surgeon to heal your sore leg, since God can hear you and help you both, as well as the best, and loveth you better and can do it sooner, and may afford his plasters better cheap,<sup>233</sup> and give you more for your words than they for your money?”

“But this is his pleasure,” quoth he, “that I shall be helped by the means of them as his instruments, though indeed all this he doth himself, since he giveth the nature to the things that they do it with.”

“So hath it,” quoth I, “pleased God in like wise that we shall ask help of his holy saints, and pray for help to them. Nor that is not a making of them equal unto God himself, though they do it by his will and power, or he at their intercession. Though God will (as reason is) be chief and have no match, yet forbiddeth he not one man to pray for help

216 gladly 217 difference 218 think 219 way 220 of the two 221 amounts of space 222 pupil 223 similar

224 circles 225 wholly 226 unencumbered 227 surpass 228 living 229 but if: unless 230 unless 231 otherwise

232 ask 233 afford . . . cheap: provide his medicinal dressings at a lower cost of another. And though the Father hath given all the judgment to his Son,<sup>234</sup> yet doth he delight to have his holy saints partners of that honor, and at the Day of Judgment to have them sit with him.<sup>235</sup>

5 Was Elisha made equal to God because the widow prayed him to revive her dead son?<sup>236</sup> Were the apostles equal to Christ because that they were prayed unto for help after his death — and in his life also?<sup>237</sup> And many things did they at folks' prayer.<sup>238</sup> And sometimes they were prayed unto and assayed<sup>239</sup> it also, and yet could not do it, but the parties were fain<sup>240</sup> to go from them to their Master therefor.<sup>241</sup> And yet was he content that they were prayed unto. And for proof thereof suffered<sup>242</sup> them at men's devout instance<sup>243</sup> and prayer, to do many miracles. And sometimes were they prayed to be intercessors to their Master, as where they came to Christ and said, Dimitte illam, quia clamat post nos ('Dispatch this woman, for she crieth upon us').<sup>244</sup> And think

20 you then that he being content and giving men occasion to pray to them while they were with him in earth, he will be angry if we do them as much worship<sup>245</sup> when they be with him in heaven? Nay, but I think on the other side, since his pleasure is to have his saints had<sup>246</sup> in honor and prayed unto, that they may be for us intercessors to his high Majesty, whereunto, ere we presume to approach, it becometh<sup>247</sup> us and well behooveth us to make friends of such as he hath in favor. He will disdain once<sup>248</sup> to look on us if we be so presumptuous and malapert<sup>249</sup> fellows that, upon boldness of familiarity with himself, we disdain to make our intercessors his especial beloved friends. And where Saint Paul exhorteth us each to pray for other,<sup>250</sup> and we be glad to think it well done to pray every poor man to pray for us, should we think it evil done to pray holy saints in heaven to the same?"

"Why," quoth he, "by that reason I might pray not only to saints, but also to every other dead man."

40 "So may ye," quoth I, "with good reason, if ye see none other likelihood but that he died a good man. And so find we, as I remember, in the Dialogues of Saint Gregory, that one had help by prayer made unto a holy man late<sup>251</sup> deceased which<sup>252</sup> was himself yet in purgatory.<sup>253</sup> So liked it our Lord to let the world know that he was in his special favor, though he were yet in pain of his purgation. For our Lord loved him nevertheless, though he left not for him the order of his merciful justice. And therefore let no man take his trouble or sickness as a token of God's hatred, but if<sup>254</sup> he feel himself grudge<sup>255</sup> and be impatient and evil content with it. For then is it a token of wrath and vengeance, and is to the sufferer as fruitless as painful, and in effect nothing else but the beginning of his hell, even here. But on the other side,<sup>256</sup> if he take it patiently, it purgeth; if gladly, it greatly meriteth; and glad may he be that is, with meekness, glad of God's punishment. Saint Augustine (as is written by Possidius), lying sore<sup>257</sup> sick himself of an access,<sup>258</sup> cured another with his prayer, and yet he died of his sickness himself.<sup>259</sup> Wherein there was to him more mercy and favor showed than if himself had been cured too. For now, instead of health, he had heaven, where he should nevermore be sick again."

"Marry," quoth he, "but I have ever heard it said that we should not pray to any dead man but with this condition: 'If thou be a saint, then pray for me.'"

"Why so," quoth I, "more than praying to a quick<sup>260</sup> man, where I am not bound to say, 'If thou be a good man, pray for me'? But since I may reasonably think him good while I know him not the contrary, so may I think him that is dead."

"Why," quoth he, "whereof serveth<sup>261</sup> canonizing then? If this be true, I am never advised to be canonized while I live."

"Ye do the better," quoth I, "nor seven years after, neither. For it would be but a business<sup>262</sup> for you."

"But why be they canonized then?" quoth he.

"Those," quoth I, "that be not canonized, ye may for the more part both pray for them and pray to them, as ye may for and to them that be yet alive. But one that is canonized, ye may pray to him to pray for you, but ye may not pray for him. For, as I remember, Saint Augustine saith that 'he that prayeth for a martyr doth the martyr injury.'<sup>263</sup> And of every man ye may trust well and be seldom certain, but of the canonized ye may reckon you sure."

234 See Jn 5:22. 235 See Mt 19:28.
236 See 4 Kgs (2 Kgs) 4:28–35. 237 See Mt 10:1, 8; Mk 6:7, 13; Lk 9:1–2, 6; Lk 10:9, 17, 19; Acts 3:43; 5:12–13, 15–16; Acts 6:7.
238 request 239 tried 240 obliged 241 for it. See Mk 9:14–29. 242 allowed

243 persistent entreaty 244 Mt 15:23
245 honor 246 held 247 befits
248 on any occasion 249 impudent
250 See Jas 5:16; 1 Tm 2:1; Eph 6:18.
251 recently 252 who 253 See Dialogues 4.40 (PL 32: 59–64). 254 but if; unless 255 discontented 256 hand 257 grievously 258 attack of fever or disease 259 See St. Possidius, Life of Saint Augustine 29. 260 living 261 whereof serveth: of what use is 262 anxious care 263 Sermon 159.30 (PL 38: 868)

THE NINTH CHAPTER

The messenger yet again objecteth against relics, and putteth great doubt in canonizing.

Whereunto the author maketh answer.

5 “How can I,” quoth he, “be sure thereof? May the taking up of a man’s bones, and setting his carcass in a gay<sup>264</sup> shrine, and then kissing his bare scalp, make a man a saint? And yet are there some unshrined, for no man wotteth<sup>265</sup> where they lie, and some that 10 men doubt whether ever they had any body at all or not. But marry, to recompense that withal, there be some again that have two bodies, to lend one to some good fellow that lacketh. For as I said before, some one body lieth whole in two places far asunder, or else the monks of the one be beguiled. For both the places plainly affirm that it lieth there. And at either place they show the shrine. And in the shrine they show a body, which they say is the body, and boldly bide<sup>266</sup> thereby that it is it, alleging<sup>267</sup> old
20 writing and miracles also for the proof. Now must we confess that either the miracles at the one place be false, or done by the devil, or else that the same saint had two bodies indeed. And then were that, in my mind, as great a miracle as the greatest of them
25 all. And therefore is it likely somewhere a bone worshipped for a relic of some holy saint that was peradventure a bone, as Chaucer saith, of some holy Jew’s sheep.<sup>268</sup> Our Savior also seemeth in the Gospel to blame and reprove the Pharisees for making fresh 30 the sepulchres of holy prophets, and making shrines of their graves.<sup>269</sup> Whereby it appeareth that he would not have the dead bodies worshipped and set in gay golden shrines. And yet besides this ye shall find many more worshipped, I ween, than shrined,
35 many shrined that ye find not canonized, though ye seek up<sup>270</sup> all the registries in Rome. And when they be shrined and canonized too, yet since the Church in the canonization useth a means that may beguile them — for they stand to the record<sup>271</sup> of men both 40 of their lives and of their miracles, which men may peradventure lie — why may it not then be that the Church be deceived in the canonization? And that they may — for lack of true knowledge believing untrue men — canonize for saints such folk sometimes as be full far therefrom? I dare not say so much as saith Saint Augustine. For he letteth<sup>272</sup> not to say plainly that many bodies be worshipped for saints here in earth whose souls be buried in hell.”<sup>273</sup> 45

“Ye have,” quoth I, “said many things very stoutly.<sup>274</sup> But yet let us first consider whereunto altogether<sup>275</sup> weigheth. For it stretcheth no further, if it were all true, but that we might be deceived in some that we should take for saints. And it neither proveth that there be no saints (which I wot well no wise man will say) nor that if any be, they should 55 not be worshipped nor prayed unto. Except<sup>276</sup> ye would say that if we might by possibility mistake some, therefore we should worship none. And then should you, by that reason never take<sup>277</sup> any physician, since ye might happen upon a dog-leech<sup>278</sup> for lack of knowledge, of the cunning.<sup>279</sup> For in records<sup>280</sup> of men, ye might be as well deceived there as here. Now suppose then, first, that of saints and of relics, some were true and some were false; yet the worship that ye would we should<sup>281</sup> do to them
65 all should be because (that standing as they do unknown and undiscerned) ye reckoned them all true, and all for God’s well-beloved servants. For if ye knew of them which were true and which false, then would ye worship the true, and tread the false underfoot.” 70

“That is no doubt,” quoth he.

“Then,” quoth I, “if we were beguiled in some, I see no great peril grow toward us thereby. For if there came a great many of the King’s friends into 75 your country, and ye for his sake made them all great cheer; if there came among them, unware<sup>282</sup> to you, some spies that were his mortal enemies — wearing his badge, and seeming to you, and so reported, as his familiar friends — whether would he blame you 80 for the good cheer ye made his enemies, or thank you for the good cheer ye made his friends?”

“He would, I think,” quoth he, “thank me for the good entreating of them both, since both seemed good to me and both had of me their cheer but 85 for<sup>283</sup> they seemed his friends, and for his sake.”

“Ye say,” quoth I, “good reason.<sup>284</sup> But I put case<sup>285</sup> now that ye had an inkling, or else a plain warning, that some of them were his enemies that seemed his

264 ornate 265 knows 266 maintain 267 citing 268 See “The Prologue,” line 351, of The Pardoner’s Tale. 269 See Mt 23:29–31. 270 seek up: go look in 271 stand to the record: go by the testimony 272 hesitates 273 See Augustine’s On Care to Be Had for the Dead, 4–5. 274 firmly, boldly 275 all of them together 276 Unless 277 have recourse to 278 quack 279 craft

280 testimonies 281 would we should:
want us to 282 unknown 283 but for:
only because 284 Ye say good reason: You speak good sense 285 put case: propose best friends—but which they were, no man can tell you. What would you now do? Make them all cheer, and honorably entreat them all? Or else, showing them that ye hear say plainly that some of them be 5 naught,<sup>286</sup> therefore bid them be walking all with sorrow?”<sup>287</sup>

“Nay,” quoth he, “no doubt were it, but that I should look for thanks if I cherished his enemies for his friends, rather than despitefully to handle 10 his friends for his enemies.”

“Very well,” quoth I. “And this were true although ye had warning that some of them were his enemies. But what thanks would ye then deserve if ye should shake off both where ye had no such warning at 15 all, but would say that ye durst not make any of them cheer because ye thought that peradventure it might be that some were worse than they were taken for? For in such case be you here: ye know not that any man worshipped for a saint is none, 20 but only ye think that ye be not sure whether all be or some not.”

“Yes,” quoth he, “Saint Augustine, as I told you, giveth me warning that many be none.”

“Ye be,” quoth I, “deceived<sup>288</sup> therein, as I shall tell 25 you after. But in the meanwhile, mark me well this, and let it stand for a sure ground: that all your objection, if it were true, serveth not against worshipping of saints or saints’ relics, but against the worshipping of such as were no saints, nor no saints’
 30 relics—and that after it were proved. And now this thing that is in question being first confessed and agreed between us for a thing nothing able to hurt our principal matter, let us go further therein, and search whether we find any such cause of doubt 35 in any, or have good cause to reckon ourselves sure that all be saints indeed, whom the Church of Christ hath in honor and veneration for saints. First, as for the authority that ye allege of Saint Augustine, I have heard it often alleged in like wise for 40 the same purpose. But surely they that so take Saint Augustine been foully deceived. I durst<sup>289</sup> be bold to say that Saint Augustine did never write such words, but it is a word run in many men’s mouths, begun by mistaking, and believed without examination.
 45 For surely the words whereof they took the occasion, which he writeth in the First Book De civitate Dei,<sup>290</sup> and repeateth again in his book of that cure<sup>291</sup> and care that men should have for them that be dead<sup>292</sup>—those words, I say, go far wide from all 50 such purpose. For there he speaketh only of costly burying, and making of sumptuous sepulchres, and doing the dead corpses of rich men worldly worship in the carrying forth and interring of the body, as it plainly and evidently appeareth by the matter that he writeth of.

 55

“And surely since our Lord never would among his chosen people give the glory of his name to another,<sup>293</sup> nor never so suffer<sup>294</sup> idolatry among the Jews, but that either he forthwith<sup>295</sup> punished and purged it, or so severed the flock of idolaters that it might well appear where his faithful flock remained
 60 (as it did when that, Samaria falling to idolatry, the right synagogue of the Jews remained in Jerusalem and in Judaea),<sup>296</sup> this were full unlikely: that this Holy Spirit being sent unto his Church here to remain and instruct it, and himself also therewith being and giving his special assistance unto the end of the world, should either suffer his Church to be unknown or in such wise to err and be deceived as 65 to give honor to the devil instead of himself, or to his enemies instead of his friends. And therefore when the Church, by diligent ensearch,<sup>297</sup> findeth the life of a man holy; and that thereto<sup>298</sup> it is well witnessed that God by his miracles testifieth the man’s blessedness and the favor in which he standeth with him in heaven, declaring by the boot<sup>299</sup> and profit which he doth to many men for his sake that he will have him honored and had for hallowed<sup>300</sup>
 70 in his Church here in earth; and this thing (either by them that hath the cure<sup>301</sup> of his Church, after such diligence used, being by the canonization declared unto the people, or peradventure without canonization growing thereof, by the holiness well known, and miracles many seen) so sure a common persuasion through the whole people of Christendom that the person is accepted and reputed for an undoubted saint, be the bones translated<sup>302</sup> or not,
 80 his body founden or not, albeit by possibility of nature it might be that men were in such things deceived, as ye have said, yet we boldly may, and well
 90

286 bad; wicked 287 bid . . . sorrow: tell them all to leave or they’ll be sorry 288 mistaken 289 dare 290 The City of God 1.12–13 291 concern 292 On

Care to Be Had for the Dead, 4–5 293 See Is 42:8. 294 allow 295 right away 296 See 3 Kgs (1 Kgs) 16:24. 297 investigation 298 also 299 advantage

300 had for hallowed: held as sainted
 301 charge; care 302 transported; relocated

we ought, in this case, to trust that the grace and aid of God and his Holy Spirit assisting his Church hath governed the judgment of his ministers and inclined the minds of his people to such consent, and that he hath not suffered them to err in a thing so nearly touching his honor and worship, either truly to be applied, where his will were it should<sup>303</sup> (upon himself, or his holy saints for his sake) or to be withdrawn thence, and by erroneous mistaking of truth—necessary, meet, and convenient<sup>304</sup> to be perceived of the Church for God’s honor (which kind of truth God sent the Holy Ghost to teach his Church)—the same worship to be bestowed upon them whom he would in no wise should<sup>305</sup> have it, but whom he reserveth for eternal shame. For the body shrined or not maketh no doubt of the saint. No man doubteth of our Lady; no man doubteth of Saint John the Evangelist, though their bodies be not founden. And yet if they were, then were there, I think, no good Christian man but he would be contented they were shrined and had<sup>306</sup> in honor.

“For whereas ye would take the reverence from all relics because that some be doubtful—in that some saint’s head is, as ye say, and of some the whole body, showed at two sundry places—it may fortune, for all this, that of one head there may be sundry parts, and either part, in the common speech of people, called ‘the head.’ For at Amiens is ‘Saint John’s head’ (the Baptist), as men call it in talking—even they that have been there and seen it. But then if they be asked further question thereof, they tell that the nether jaw lacketh.<sup>307</sup> This may well happen also, and so doth it hap indeed, by some saint of whom in two diverse countries be diverse shrines. And there be reckoned and reported that in either of them be laid the whole body, and the pilgrims at neither place do look into the coffin of that shrine to see whether it be all or part. In some place peradventure lay the body, and by some occasion the body translated<sup>308</sup> thence of old,<sup>309</sup> and yet the shrine showed still with some of the relics remaining therein. It may well hap also that there were two good holy men in diverse countries, both of one name. And percase<sup>310</sup> in some place may there be some very<sup>311</sup> relics unknown and misnamed. For in old time, when men at the incursion of infidels did hide holy saints’ relics, at the finding again, the names haply<sup>312</sup> decayed, some relics might rest unknown, or some peradventure lost or mistaken. As myself saw at the Abbey of Barking (besides London), to my remembrance about thirty years past, in the setting an old image<sup>313</sup> in a new tabernacle, the back of the image, being all painted over and of long time before laid with beaten gold, happened to crease in one place, and out there fell a pretty<sup>314</sup> little door, at which fell out also many relics that had lain unknown in that image, God wot how long—and as long had been likely to lie again, if God by that chance had not brought them to light. The Bishop of London came then thither, to see there were no deceit therein. And I, among others, was present there while he looked thereon and examined the matter. And in good faith, it was to me a marvel to behold the manner of it. I have forgotten much thereof, but I remember a little piece of wood there was, rudely shapen in cross, with thread wrapped about it. Writing had it none; and what it was we could not tell; but it seemed as new-cut as if it had been done within one day before. And diverse relics had old writings on them, and some had none; but among others were there certain small kerchers<sup>315</sup> which were named there our Lady’s, and of her own working. Coarse were they not, nor they were not large, but served, as it seemed, to cast<sup>316</sup> in a plain and simple manner upon her head. But surely they were as clean seams, to my seeming, as ever I saw in my life, and were therewith as white for all the long lying, as if they had been washed and laid up within one hour. And how long that image had stood in that old tabernacle, that could no man tell; but there had in all the Church none, as they thought, stood longer untouched. And they guessed that four or five hundred years ago, that image was hidden when the abbey was burned by infidels, and those relics hidden therein, and after the image founden and set up—many years after, when they were gone that had hidden it. And so the relics remained, unknown, therein till now that God gave that chance that opened it. And thus, as I say, may it peradventure happen, some names to be forgotten, or haply to be mistaken, and yet God well content that the relics be had in reverence, since he specially

303 were it should: wants it to be 304 meet, and convenient: appropriate and fitting 305 would... should: did not in any way want to 306 held 307 nether jaw lacketh: lower jaw is missing 308 was removed 309 of old: long ago 310 perhaps 311 true 312 perhaps 313 statue 314 cleverly made 315 kerchiefs 316 be put

favoreth their persons, and needeth nothing their names to know them by, as he shall once so fully restore again many a glorious body that they shall not lose the least hair of their head that may serve to their beauty, of whom the names, haply, the whole world hath long ago forgotten. And the name is not so very requisite but that we may mistake it without peril, so that we nevertheless have the relics of holy men in reverence. But as for pigs' bones for holy relics, or damned wretches to be worshipped for saints, albeit that if it happened, yet it nothing hurted the souls of them that mistake it, no more than if we worship a host in the Mass which percase the negligence or malice of some lewd<sup>317</sup> priest hath left unconsecrated, yet is it never to be thought, though such a thing might happen suddenly, that ever God will suffer<sup>318</sup> such a thing to last and endure in his Church.

“For albeit that his Church useth one means that might, as ye say, beguile them — which is the record<sup>319</sup> and witness of men — yet hath it in such things, as Saint Thomas and other holy doctors write, another means besides, which never can beguile them. And that is the assistance of God and the Holy Ghost. For else might the Church be most easily beguiled in the receiving of the very Scripture, wherein they take outwardly but the testimonies of men, from mouth to mouth and hand to hand, without other examination. But that secret means that inclineth their credulity to consent in the believing all in one point, which is the secret instinct of God, this is the sure means that never can in any necessary point fail here in Christ's Church. For if it might, all were quite at large.<sup>320</sup> And that point once taken away, Scripture and all walketh with it. And in this mind, as it seemeth, was very sure and fastly<sup>321</sup> confirmed the holy apostle Saint Paul, which<sup>322</sup> in his First Epistle to the Corinthians writeth in this wise: Obsecro vos, fratres, per nomen Domini nostri Iesu Christi, ut idipsum dicatis omnes, et non sint in vobis schismata, sed sitis integrum corpus, eadem mente et eadem sententia (‘I beseech you, my brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that you say all one<sup>323</sup> thing; and let there be no schisms’<sup>324</sup> — or several sects — ‘among you, but be ye one whole, entire body, of one mind and one sentence’).<sup>325</sup> Truth is it that he taught them and others the right way — so far-forth<sup>326</sup> that he boldly forbade an angel of heaven to be believed, if any would come and preach another Gospel. But yet in this place I note much that he called upon them only for agreement, bidding them only to agree all upon one thing, and maketh no mention of agreement upon ‘the best’ and upon ‘the truth,’ but only to avoid all discord and division, and by common consent exhorteth them to agree all in one, meaning thereby, as methinketh, that if the Church of Christ, intending well, do all agree upon any one thing concerning God's honor or man's soul, it cannot be but that thing must needs be true. For God's Holy Spirit, that animateth his Church and giveth it life, will never suffer it<sup>327</sup> all consent and agree together upon any damnable error. And therefore would he never suffer the Church so fully to consent in the worship of saints and reverence of relics if it were a thing such as some men would have it seem: that is to wit, a thing damnable, false, and feigned.

“Wherein as much as ye lay<sup>328</sup> to diminish their credence, that it might seem, as ye say well enough, that some of them were feigned, yet wist I never<sup>329</sup> proved that any such so taken,<sup>330</sup> and by the Church approved, was ever yet hitherto reproved,<sup>331</sup> either here in Christ's Church or among the Jews in their synagogue before Christ's days; and yet saints they had in honor, as patriarchs and prophets, and their bodies and relics in reverence. Now if of such as seemed good men we never had founden any for hypocrites, albeit it might be that some were such, yet would we not, I think, suppose that there were any so in deed,<sup>332</sup> if we never had known it tried and proved so. And why shall we then of saints or relics have doubt and mistrust? Of whom, being received by the Church for true, we never, that I could wit,<sup>333</sup> since God wrought<sup>334</sup> the world, tried and proved any of both sorts untrue — neither, as I say, in the Church of Christ nor synagogue of the Jews, which two sorts only were God's chosen people. And yet had as well the Jews as we both saints, as I said, in honor and their relics in great reverence, as appeareth as well by the Gospel as by the Old Testament.

317 bad 318 allow 319 testimony
320 at large: unsettled 321 steadfastly
322 who 323 the same 324 1 Cor 1:10

325 Gal 1:8 326 so far-forth: to such an extent 327 suffer it: allow (the Church) to 328 cite as evidence 329 wist I never:

I never knew it to be 330 such so taken: of those taken to be saints 331 disproved 332 truth 333 know of 334 created

Jacob, that holy patriarch, commanded his children in<sup>335</sup> his deathbed to carry his body to the burial out of that country of Egypt; and so they did.<sup>336</sup> And Joseph also required his brethren that when they should after depart out of Egypt, they should carry his bones with them.<sup>337</sup> The dead bones of the prophet Elisha, as the Bible mentioneth, raised a dead body to life.<sup>338</sup> And think you then that those bones were not there honored for holy relics?

“Nor our Savior Christ blameth not the Jews in the Gospel for that they garnished<sup>339</sup> the sepulchres of the old prophets — with whose honor he was well content — but for that they condemned themselves in following the condition of them that slew them, intending to kill Christ as their forefathers did his holy prophets.<sup>340</sup> For as for the dead bodies of the holy prophets, that God would have them had in honor and reverence he declared well by that he raised a dead body by the touch of the dead bones of the prophet Elisha, as I said to you before.

“Did not our Lord, in the finding of that holy relic his holy cross, declare by miracle and make his own cross known from the crosses of the two thieves by the raising of a dead man with the touch thereof?<sup>341</sup> Wherein is to be noted, by the way, that there was between his and theirs no notable difference, but they<sup>342</sup> nailed as he was; or else had it been no doubt upon the first sight which of them was his. Was not the body of Saint Stephen found out by miracle, and the head of Saint John Baptist also? Yes, of surety,<sup>343</sup> and many another holy martyr more, that else had lain unknown. Whereby well appeared that God would have not their souls only, but also their bodies — and in a manner the very soles of their shoes — set by<sup>344</sup> for their sakes, and themselves for his. Was not the woman healed by the touch of our Lord’s garments?<sup>345</sup> Hath there not, both among the Jews and Christian people also, many men marvelously been helped by the only touch of holy saints’ vestures? And doubt we then whether God would we should worship<sup>346</sup> them, when he so well and above nature rewardeth us for the worship we do them?”

THE TENTH CHAPTER

45

The messenger objecteth many things against pilgrimages and relics and worshipping of saints, because of much superstitious manner used therein, and unlawful petitions asked of them, and harm growing thereupon.

50

“Sir,” quoth he, “ye have in my mind very well touched the matter concerning that it is not in vain to pray to saints, nor to worship them and to have<sup>347</sup> their relics in some reverence. But, sir, all this is far from the great sore;<sup>348</sup> for though saints may hear us, and help us too, and are glad and willing so to do, and God also contented that they and their relics and images also be had in honor, yet can neither he nor they be content with the manner of the worship: first, taking away his own worship in that we do them the same worship, in every point, that we do to God. And secondly, taking their worship from them then also, in that we do to their images the same that we do to themselves — taking their images for themselves — and so make not themselves only, but also their images, fellows and matches to God; wherewith<sup>349</sup> as I have said before, neither God nor good saint can, nor good man ought to, be content and pleased.”

55

60

65

“In faith,” quoth I, “therein if it so be, ye say very true.”

70

“What say we then,” quoth he, “of the harm that goeth by going of pilgrimages — roiling<sup>350</sup> about in idleness, with the riot, reveling, and ribaldry, gluttony, wantonness, waste, and lechery? Trow ye<sup>351</sup> that God and his holy saints had not liefer<sup>352</sup> they sit still at home than thus to come seek them with such worshipful service?”

75

“Yes, surely,” quoth I.

“What say we then,” quoth he, “to that I spoke not of yet, in which we do them little worship while we set every saint to his office and assign him a craft such as pleaseth us? Saint Loye<sup>353</sup> we make a horse-leech,<sup>354</sup> and must let our horse rather run unshod and mar his hoof than to shoe him on his day<sup>355</sup> — which we must, for that point, more religiously keep high and holy than Easter Day. And because

80

85

335 on 336 See Gn 49:29, 50:14.

337 See Gn 50:25. 338 See 4 Kgs (2 Kgs) 13:21. 339 for that they garnished: because they adorned 340 See Mt 23:29–31.

341 See Jacobus de Voragine, The Golden

Legend, “The Invention of the Holy Cross.” 342 they were 343 certainty 344 set by: valued 345 See Lk 8:44–46; Mk 5:25–29. 346 would we should worship: wants us to venerate 347 hold

348 difficulty 349 with that 350 wandering 351 Trow ye: Do you believe 352 rather 353 Saint Loye: also called St. Eligius 354 doctor 355 i.e., on St. Loye’s feast day one smith is too few at a forge, we set Saint Hippolytus to help him. And on Saint Stephen's Day we must let<sup>356</sup> all our horses' blood with a knife, because Saint Stephen was killed with stones. Saint Apollonia we make a tooth-drawer,<sup>357</sup> and may speak to her of nothing but of sore teeth. Saint Zita women set to seek their keys. Saint Roch we set to see to the great sickness, because he had a sore. And with him they join Saint Sebastian, because he was martyred with arrows. Some serve for the eye only, and some for a sore breast. Saint Germanus only for children. And yet will he not once look at them but if<sup>358</sup> the mothers bring with them a white loaf and a pot of good ale. And yet is he wiser than Saint Wilgefortis; for she, good soul, is (as they say) served and content with oats. Whereof I cannot perceive the reason, but if it be because she should provide a horse for an evil husband to ride to the devil upon. For that is the thing that she is so sought for, as they say, in so much that women hath therefore changed her name, and instead of Saint Wilgefortis call her Saint Uncumber, because they reckon that for a peck of oats she will not fail to uncumber<sup>359</sup> them of their husbands. Long work were it to rehearse<sup>360</sup> you the diverse manners of many pretty pilgrimages, but one or two will I tell you. The one, Pontano<sup>361</sup> speaketh of in his Dialogues:<sup>362</sup> how Saint Martin is worshipped. I have forgot the town, but the manner<sup>363</sup> I cannot forget, it is so strange. His image<sup>364</sup> is on his day borne in procession about all the streets. And if it be a fair day, then use they<sup>365</sup> as he cometh by to cast rose water and all things of pleasant savor upon his image. But and<sup>366</sup> it happen to rain, out pour they piss-pots upon his head, at every door and every window. Is not this a sweet service and a worshipful worship? And this, as I say, Pontano writeth, and telleth where it is. But this that I shall now tell you, I dare as boldly make you sure of as if I had seen it myself. At Saint Valery's, here in Picardy, there is a fair abbey, where Saint Valery was monk. And upon a furlong<sup>367</sup> off or two, up in a wood, is there a chapel in which the saint is specially sought unto for the stone,<sup>368</sup> not only in those parts, but also out of England. Now was there a young gentleman which<sup>369</sup> had married a merchant's wife.<sup>370</sup> And having a little wanton<sup>371</sup> money, which him thought burned out the bottom of his purse, in the first year of his wedding took his wife with him and went over the sea for none other errand but to see Flanders and France, and ride out one summer in those countries. And having one in his company that told by the way many strange things of that pilgrimage, he thought he would go somewhat out of his way, either to see it if it were true, or laugh at his man<sup>372</sup> if he found it false, as he verily thought he should have done indeed. But when they came into the chapel, they found it all true. And to behold, they found it fonder<sup>373</sup> than he had told. For like<sup>374</sup> as in other pilgrimages ye see hanged up legs of wax, or arms, or such other parts, so was in that chapel all their offerings that hung about the walls none other thing but men's gear,<sup>375</sup> and women's gear, made in wax. Then was there, besides these, two round rings of silver, the one much larger than the other, through which every man did put his privy members, at the altar's end, not every man through both, but some through the one and some through the other. For they were not both of a bigness, but the one larger than the other. Then was there yet<sup>376</sup> a monk, standing at the altar, that hal-lowed<sup>377</sup> certain threads of Venice gold. And them he delivered to the pilgrims, teaching them in what wise themselves, or their friends, should use those threads against<sup>378</sup> the stone: that they should knit it about their gear, and say I cannot tell you what prayers. And when the monk had declared the manner, the gentleman had a servant that was a married man and yet a merry fellow; and he, thanking the monk for the thread, desired him to teach him how he should knit it about his wife's gear. Which (except<sup>379</sup> the monk had some special craft in knitting) he thought would be cumbrous, because her gear was somewhat short. It need not to tell you that every man laughed then, save the monk, that cast up his rings and threads in a great anger and went his way; was not this — abide,<sup>380</sup> by God, I had almost forgotten one thing, that would not be left for a groat.<sup>381</sup> As this gentleman and his wife were kneeling in the chapel, there came a good sad<sup>382</sup> woman to him, showing<sup>383</sup> him that one special point

356 draw, drain 357 dentist 358 but if: unless 359 unburden; disencumber 360 tell 361 Giovanni Pontano (1426–1503) was an Italian humanist and poet. 362 See the dialogue Charon. 363 custom

364 statue 365 use they: it's their practice 366 if 367 220 yards 368 for the stone: relief from kidney stones 369 who 370 widow 371 surplus 372 servant 373 more foolish 374 just 375 genitals

376 besides 377 blessed 378 to prevent or cure 379 unless 380 wait a minute 381 a groat: for anything 382 serious; somber 383 telling

used<sup>384</sup> in that pilgrimage — and the surest against the stone — she wist nere<sup>385</sup> whether he were yet advertised<sup>386</sup> of. Which, if it were done, she durst lay<sup>387</sup> her life he should never have the stone in his life.

5 And that was, she would have the length of his gear, and that should she make in a wax candle, which should burn up in the chapel, and certain prayers should there be said the while. And this was against the stone the very sheet-anchor.<sup>388</sup> When he had 10 heard her (and he was one that in earnest feared the stone), he went and asked his wife counsel. But she, like a good faithful Christian woman, loved no such superstitions. She could abide the remnant well enough; but when she heard once of burning up the 15 candle, she knit the brows and earnestly (blessing herself): ‘Beware, in the virtue of God, what ye do,’ quoth she. ‘Burn up?’ quoth a.<sup>389</sup> ‘Marry, God forbid! It would waste up your gear, upon pain of my life. I pray you beware of such witchcraft!’ Is this 20 kind of service and worship acceptable and pleasant unto God and his saints? Now, when people worship saints in such wise that they make them fellows to God, and images in such wise that they take them for the saints themselves; and then again, on 25 the other side, honor them with such superstitious ways that the paynim<sup>390</sup> gods were worshipped with no worse; finally, that worst is of all, pray to them for unlawful things, as thieves pray to the thief that hung on the right side of Christ<sup>391</sup> to speed<sup>392</sup>
30 them well in their robbery — and have found him a name also, calling him ‘Dismas,’ I ween, and his fellow ‘Gismas,’ to rhyme withal — think you not that this gear<sup>393</sup> is such among the people as rather were likely so to provoke God and his saints to displeasure that the devil should have license and liberty therefore to work his wonders in delusion of 35 our superstitious idolatry, than so to like and content our Lord that he should show miracles for the comprobation<sup>394</sup> of that manner of worshipping which — we may well perceive — all reason, religion, 40 and virtue reproveth?<sup>395</sup>

THE ELEVENTH CHAPTER

The author answereth all the objections proponed<sup>396</sup> by the messenger in the tenth chapter, and some of them touched by the messenger more at large in other parts before. 45

“Your whole tale, in effect,” quoth I, “containeth three things: one, that the people worship the saints, and their images also, with like honor as they
50 do God himself; another, that they take the images for the things themselves (which points do sound to<sup>397</sup> idolatry); the third is the superstitious fashion of worship, with desire of unlawful things. And since the worship that the people do to the saints
55 and the images be such, ye conclude the thing displeasing to God and to all hallows,<sup>398</sup> and that it may thereby well appear that the miracles also be not the works of God, but the delusion of the devil. The first point, which ye have now twice touched, is 60 at once soon and shortly answered, for it is not true. For though men kneel to saints and images, and incense them also, yet it is not true that therefore they worship them in every point like unto God.”

“What point lack they?” quoth he. 65

“Marry, the chief of all,” quoth I. “That is, that they worship God with the mind<sup>399</sup> that he is God — which mind in worship is the only thing that maketh it latría,<sup>400</sup> and no certain gesture nor bodily observance. Not and<sup>401</sup> we would wallow upon the 70 ground unto Christ, having therewith a mind that he were the best man that we could devise and thinking him not God. For if the lowly manner of bodily observance were the thing that would make latría, then were we much in peril of idolatry in our courtesy used to princes, prelates, and popes, to whom 75 we kneel as low as to God Almighty, and kiss some their hands — and some our own, ere ever we presume to touch them — and in the pope, his feet. And as for incensing, the poor priests in every choir be as 80 well incensed as the Sacrament,<sup>402</sup> so that if latría — that is, the special honor due to God — stood in such things, then were we great idolaters, not in our worship done to saints only, and their images, but also to 85 men — one to another — among ourselves. But albeit

384 point used: thing customarily done
385 wist nere: knew not 386 informed 387 durst lay: dared bet 388 the largest anchor 389 he (dialectical pronoun)
390 pagan 391 See Mt 27:38, 44; Mk

15:27; Lk 23:33, 39; Jacobus de Voragine, The Golden Legend, “The Passion of Our Lord.” 392 assist 393 affair 394 proof; attesting 395 condemn; denounces 396 proposed 397 sound to:

seem to suggest 398 saints 399 thought 400 the worship given only to God
401 even if 402 Eucharist

that God ought of duty to have with our body the most humble and lowly reverence that we can possibly devise, yet is not that bodily worship latría but if we so do it that in our mind we consider and acknowledge him for God, and with that consideration and intent do him that worship. And so doth, as I think, no Christian man to image or saint either. And so is avoided the peril of idolatry, for the first point ye spoke of.

10 “Now, as touching<sup>403</sup> the second—that the people take the images for the saints themselves—I trust there be no man so mad, nor woman neither, but that they know quick men from dead stones, and tree<sup>404</sup> from flesh and bone. And when they
15 prefer, as ye spoke of, our Lady at one pilgrimage before our Lady at another, or one rood<sup>405</sup> before another, or make their invocations and vows some to the one and some to the other, I ween it easy to perceive that they mean none other but that our 20 Lord and our Lady—or our Lord for our Lady—showeth more miracles at the one than at the other, and that they intend, in their pilgrimage, to visit some of them one place and some another, as their devotion leadeth them, or partly sometimes as the 25 place lieth for<sup>406</sup> them—and yet not for the place, but for that<sup>407</sup> it liketh our Lord by manifest miracles to provoke men to seek upon him or his blessed Mother, or some other holy saint of his, in those places more specially than in some others.

30 “The thing itself also showeth that they take not the images for our Lady herself. For if they so did, how could they possibly in any manner wise<sup>408</sup> have more mind to the one than to the other? For they can have no more mind to our Lady than to our 35 Lady. Moreover, if they thought that the image at Walsingham were our Lady herself, then must they needs think that our Lady herself were that image. Then if in like wise they thought that the image at Ipswich were our Lady herself, and (as they must 40 therewith<sup>409</sup> needs think) that our Lady herself were that image at Ipswich, then must they needs think therewithal, that all those three were one thing. And then every two of them were one thing. And so must they, by that reason, suppose that the image 45 of Ipswich were the selfsame image that is at Walsingham. Which, if ye ask any of them whom ye take for the simplest, except a natural fool, I dare hold you a wager she will tell you nay. Besides this, take the simplest fool that ye can choose, and she will tell you that our Lady herself is in heaven. She will also 50 call an image an image, and she will tell you a difference between an image of a horse and a horse in deed.<sup>410</sup> And then appeareth it well, whatsoever her words be of her pilgrimage—by a common manner of speech to call the image of our Lady ‘our Lady,’

55 as men say, ‘Go to the King’s Head for wine,’ not meaning his head in deed, but the sign—so meaneth she none other in that image but our Lady’s image, howsoever she call it. And if ye will well prove that she neither taketh our Lady for that image, nor that 60 image for our Lady (as both must she take if she take the one), talk with her of our Lady; and she will tell you that our Lady was saluted with<sup>411</sup> Gabriel, and that our Lady fled unto Egypt with Joseph;<sup>412</sup> and yet will she not in the telling say that our Lady of 65 Walsingham, or of Ipswich, was saluted of Gabriel or fled into Egypt. Nor if ye would ask her whether it were our Lady of Ipswich or our Lady of Walsingham that stood by the cross at Christ’s Passion, she will, I warrant<sup>413</sup> you, make answer that neither 70 of both. And if ye demand<sup>414</sup> her further, ‘Which Lady, then?’ she will name you none image, but our Lady that is in heaven. And this have I proved often, and ye may, when ye will, and shall find it true, except it be in one so very a fool that God will give 75 her leave to believe what she list.<sup>415</sup> And surely for this point, I think in my mind that all those heretics that make as though they found so much peril of idolatry among the people for mistaking of images do but devise that fear to have some cloak to 80 cover their heresy, wherein they bark against the saints themselves, and when they be marked, then say they mean but the misbelief that women have in images. Now, as touching the third point, of superstitious manner of worshipping, or unlawful 85 petitions desired<sup>416</sup> of saints, as one example may serve both: if women offer oats to Saint Wilgefortis to have her uncumber<sup>417</sup> them of their husbands, somewhat is it indeed that ye say,<sup>418</sup> and yet not all things to be blamed that ye seem to blame. For as 90 to pray to Saint Apollonia for the help of our teeth is no witchcraft, considering that she had her teeth pulled out for Christ’s sake, nor there is no superstition in such other things like.<sup>419</sup> And peradventure

403 regards 404 wood 405 cross; crucifix 406 near 407 for that: because 408 manner wise: kind of way 409 also

410 reality 411 by 412 See Lk 1:28;
Mt 2:13–14. 413 guarantee 414 ask 415 pleases 416 asked 417 unburden

418 somewhat . . . say: there is indeed something in what you say 419 similar since Saint Loye was a farrier,<sup>420</sup> it is no great fault to pray to him for the help of our horse.”

“Well then,” quoth he, “since Saint Crispin and Saint Crispinian<sup>421</sup> were shoemakers, it were well done in like wise to pray them sit down and mend our shoes, and pray to Saint Dorothy<sup>422</sup> for some flowers, because she beareth always a basketful.”

“Nay,” quoth I, “the things be nothing like. For the one thing pertaineth nothing to our necessity; the other we may do ourselves, or soon find who shall. But as for your horse, is a thing wherein as well as in our own bodies, a right good leech<sup>423</sup> may fail of<sup>424</sup> his craft, and is to many a man a greater loss than he may well recover. And albeit that God commanded that we should chiefly seek for heaven, and promiseth that if we so do, all other things that we need shall be cast unto us,<sup>425</sup> and would that we should<sup>426</sup> in no wise live in anxiety and trouble of mind for any fear of lack, considering that our Father in heaven provideth meat<sup>427</sup> for the very birds of the air, by whom he setteth nothing so much as he doth by us,<sup>428</sup> yet willed not he the contrary but we should with our bodies labor therefor, having our hearts all the while in heaven, and willed also that we should ask it of him, without whose help our labor will not serve. And therefore is our daily food one of the petitions of the Pater Noster, the prayer that himself taught his disciples.<sup>429</sup> And the horse he set not so little by but that — rather than it should perish — he reckoned it no breach of the Sabbath day to pull him out of a pit.<sup>430</sup> And therefore indeed meseemeth the devotion to run somewhat too far if the smiths will not for any necessity set on a shoe upon Saint Loye’s Day, and yet lawful enough to pray for the help of a poor man’s horse. But as for your teeth, I ween if they ached well, ye would yourself think it a thing worthy, and not too simple, to ask help of Saint Apollonia and of God too.”

“Yea, marry,” quoth he, “and of the devil too, rather than fail,<sup>431</sup> as the Lombard<sup>432</sup> did for the gout. That,<sup>433</sup> when he had long called upon God and our Lady and all the holy company of heaven, and yet felt himself never the better, he began at last to call as fast<sup>434</sup> for help unto the devil. And when his wife and his friends, sore<sup>435</sup> abashed and astonished,<sup>436</sup> rebuked him for calling on the devil — which he wist<sup>437</sup> well was naught,<sup>438</sup> and if that he helped him it should be for no good — he cried out as loud as he could again,<sup>439</sup> Ogni aiuto é bono! (‘All is good that helpeth!’).<sup>440</sup>

“And so, I ween, would I,” quoth he, “call on the devil and all, rather than abide in pain.”

“Nay,” quoth I, “whatsoever ye say, I cannot think ye would believe in the devil as that Lombard did. Ye would rather fare like another that,<sup>441</sup> when the friar apposed<sup>442</sup> him in confession whether he meddled anything with witchcraft or necromancy, or had any belief in the devil, he answered him, Crederere en le diable? Messire, no; Io grand fatigue a credere in Dio. (‘Believe in the devil?’ quoth he. ‘Nay, nay, sir, I have work enough to believe in God I.’)<sup>443</sup> And so would I ween that ye were far from all believing in the devil; ye have so much work to believe in God himself, that ye be loath methink to meddle much with his saints.”

When we had laughed a while at our merry tales, “In good faith,” quoth I, “as I was about to tell you, somewhat<sup>444</sup> indeed it is, that ye say. For evil it is, and evil it is suffered<sup>445</sup> that superstitious manner of worship. And as for that ye told of Saint Martin, if it be true, it hath none excuse, but that it nothing toucheth our matter: for it is not worshipping, but despiting<sup>446</sup> and disworshipping, of saints. Touching the offering of bread and ale to Saint Germanus, I see nothing much amiss therein. Where ye have seen it used,<sup>447</sup> I cannot tell. But I have myself seen it oftentimes, and yet am I not remembered that ever I saw priest or clerk<sup>448</sup> fare the better therefor, or once drink thereof; but it is given to children or poor folk to pray for the sick child. And I would ween it were none offense in such fashion to offer up a whole ox and distribute it among poor people. But now, as for our merry matters of Saint Valery, because the place is in France we shall leave the matter to the University of Paris to defend. And we will come home here to Paul’s<sup>449</sup> and put<sup>450</sup> one example of both, that is to say, the superstitious manner and unlawful petitions, if women there offer oats

420 person who shoes horses 421 Saint Crispin and Saint Crispinian: brothers martyred in 286 422 Saint Dorothy: martyred about 311 423 doctor 424 at 425 See Mt 6:33. 426 would... should: wanted us to 427 food 428 by whom... by us: whom he values less than he values us. See

Mt 6:25–26. 429 See Mt 6:11. 430 See Lk 14:5; Mt 12:11. 431 lack; go without (being helped) 432 Italian (Lombardy is a region in northern Italy) 433 who 434 steadfastly 435 greatly 436 astonished, stunned 437 knew 438 wicked 439 in reply 440 The Lombard dialogue

(here and below) has close ties to the Italian. 441 who 442 asked 443 myself 444 something 445 allowed, permitted 446 insulting 447 practiced 448 a man in one of the minor orders below deacon, such as acolyte or lector 449 St. Paul’s Cathedral 450 give unto Saint Wilgefortis, in trust that she shall uncumber them of their husbands, yet can neither the priests perceive till they find it there that the foolish women bring oats thither, nor is it not, I think, 5 so often done, nor so much brought at once, that the Church may make much money of it above the finding<sup>451</sup> of the canons'<sup>452</sup> horses."

"Nay," quoth he, "all the oats of a whole year's offering will not find three geese and a gander a week 10 together."<sup>453</sup>

"Well," quoth I, "then the priests maintain not the matter for any great covetise;<sup>454</sup> and also what the peevish<sup>455</sup> women pray, they cannot hear. Howbeit, if they pray but to be uncumbered, meseemeth 15 no great harm, nor unlawfulness therein. For that may they by more ways than one. They may be uncumbered if their husbands change their cumbrous conditions,<sup>456</sup> or if themselves peradventure change their cumbrous tongues, which is haply<sup>457</sup> the cause 20 of all their cumbrance. And, finally, if they cannot be uncumbered but by death, yet it may be by their own, and so their husbands safe enough."

"Nay, nay," quoth he, "ye find them not such fools,
I warrant you. They make their covenants<sup>458</sup> in their 25 bitter<sup>459</sup> prayers as surely as they were penned, and will not cast away their oats for nought."<sup>460</sup>

"Well," quoth I, "to all these matters is one evident easy answer — that they nothing touch<sup>461</sup> the effect of our matter, which standeth in this: whether the 30 thing that we speak of (as praying to saints, going in pilgrimage, and worshipping relics and images) may be done well, not whether it may be done evil. For if it may be well done, then though many would misuse it, yet doth all that nothing diminish the goodness of the thing itself. For if we should, for the 35 misuse of a good thing, and for the evils that grow sometimes in the abuse thereof, not amend the misuse, but utterly put the whole use<sup>462</sup> away, we should then make marvelous changes in the world. In some 40 countries they go on hunting commonly on Good Friday in the morning, for a common custom. Will ye break that evil custom, or cast away Good Friday?
There be cathedral churches into which the country<sup>463</sup> cometh with procession at Whitsuntide,<sup>464</sup> and the women following the cross with many an unwomanly song — and that, such honest<sup>465</sup> wives as 45 out of the procession ye could not hire to speak one such foul ribaldry word as they there sing, for God's sake, whole ribaldrous songs as loud as their throat can cry. Will you mend that lewd manner, or put 50 away Whitsuntide?

"Ye speak of lewdness used<sup>466</sup> at pilgrimages. Is there, trow ye,<sup>467</sup> none used on holy days? And why do you not then advise us to put them clean<sup>468</sup> away, Sundays and all? Some wax<sup>469</sup> drunk in Lent of 55 wigs and cracknels;<sup>470</sup> and yet ye would not, I trust, that Lent were fordone.<sup>471</sup> Christmas, if we consider how commonly men abuse it, we may think that they take it for a time of liberty for all manner of lewdness. And yet is not Christmas to be 60 cast away among Christian men, but men rather admonished to amend their manners, and use themselves in Christmas more Christianly. Go me to<sup>472</sup> Christ's own coming and giving us our faith and his holy Gospel and sacraments. Be there not ten 65 the worse therefor, against one the better? Be not all the paynims, all the Jews, all the Turks, all the Saracens, all the heretics, all the evil-living people in Christendom, the worse — by their own fault — 70 for the coming of Christ? I trow they be. And yet would no wise man wish that Christ had not comen here. Nor it had been no right that God should have left the occasion of merit and reward that good folk would, with his help, deserve by his coming, 75 for the harm that wretches would take thereof by their own sloth and malice. Nor, in like wise, right were it none that all worship of saints, and reverence of holy relics, and honor of saints' images — by which good devout folk do much merit — we should abolish and put away because some folk do 80 abuse it. Now touching the evil petitions, though<sup>473</sup> they that ask them were (as I trust they be not) a great<sup>474</sup> people, they be not yet so many that ask evil petitions of saints as there be that ask the same of God himself. For whatsoever they will ask of any 85 good saint, they will ask of God also. And commonly in the wild Irish — and some in Wales, too, as men say — when they go forth in robbing, they bless

451 feeding, supplying provision for 452 laymen who have taken vows 453 a week together: seven days in a row 454 greed 455 silly 456 cumbrous conditions: burdensome dispositions, behaviors 457 perhaps 458 stipulations, promises 459 grievous; pitiable 460 nothing 461 pertain to 462 custom, practice 463 i.e., the people of the region 464 the week beginning with Pentecost Sunday 465 honorable; respectable 466 engaged in 467 trow

ye: do you suppose 468 completely 469 become 470 wigs and cracknels:
wine-dipped buns and biscuits 471 done away with 472 Go me to: Consider 473 even if 474 great many themselves and pray God send them good speed,<sup>475</sup> that they may meet with a good purse, and do harm, and take none. Shall we therefore find a fault with every man's prayer, because thieves pray for speed in robbery? This hath, as I say, no reason although<sup>476</sup> they were a great people that abused a good thing. And whereas the worst that ye assign in our matter is that, as ye say, the people do idolatry, in that ye say, they take the images for the saints themselves, or the rood<sup>477</sup> for Christ himself—which, as I said, I think none doth (for some rood hath no crucifix<sup>478</sup> thereon; and they believe not that the cross which they see was ever at Jerusalem, nor that it was the holy cross itself; and much less think they then that the image that hangeth thereon is the body of Christ himself)—and although some were so mad so to think, yet were it not, as ye call it, 'the people.' For a few doting<sup>479</sup> dames make not the people. And over<sup>480</sup> this, if it were—as ye would have it seem—a whole people indeed, yet were not a good thing to be put away for the misuse of bad folk."

THE TWELFTH CHAPTER

The author confirmeth the truth of our faith and usage in the worship of images by the consent of the old holy doctors of the Church approving the same (as appeareth well in their writings), whom God hath by many miracles testified to be saints. The messenger eftssoon<sup>481</sup> doubteth whether we can be sure that the miracles told by them were true or not, or themselves saints or not. Whereupon the author proveth that, of any miracles told by any saints, we may be most sure of theirs, and consequently by their miracles most sure of them that they be surely saints. And in this chapter also proveth that the miracles and consent of those holy doctors do prove that this must needs be the very true Church, in which they have written, and miracles have been done. Whereupon is finally concluded eftssoons the truth of the principal question; and therewith finisheth the Second Book.

"And we be very sure that the thing is good, and our way good therein, and our belief therein right, not only by reasons and authority (by which I have proved it you more than once already), but also by that<sup>482</sup> all the old holy saints and doctors of Christ's Church—as Saint Jerome, Saint Augustine, Saint Basil, Saint Chrysostom, Saint Gregory, with all such others as plainly we read in their books—did as we do therein, and believed thereof as we believe. And since we see what they believed, we need not to doubt what is best that we believe. For if any sect believed better than other, we be sure of the best were they, that so well believed, and lived therewith, that God hath accepted them for saints, and by miracles openly declared that their faith and living liked<sup>483</sup> him. Whereas on the other side of such as believed otherwise—as were these manifold sects of obstinate heretics—we see not one a saint among them, nor one miracle showed for them."

"I wot nere,"<sup>484</sup> quoth he, "whether this reason that ye make would surely satisfy the other side or no. For men may peradventure answer you that there is many a glorious saint in heaven of whom we see no miracles in earth, nor haply<sup>485</sup> never heard of their name."

"That may well be," quoth I, "and I suppose it very true."

"May it not also be," quoth he, "that though it were hard to think but that of miracles some among so many must needs be true, yet, since some also may be feigned, may it not be that those been<sup>486</sup> feigned which been told to have been done by them whom ye rehearsed?—them, I mean, that of old have written for your party; I mean those whom ye call the old doctors of the Church, and whom the Church taketh for saints."

"This," quoth I, "were worse than anything that we spoke of yet tofore.<sup>487</sup> The worst was, before, that we should pray to no saints. And now ye would either that we should have none—or at the least that we should know none."

"Yes," quoth he, "ye may have saints, and know for saints, and many one since the apostles' time, though those be none whose writing ye would authorize by their sanctifying."

"Then fall you," quoth I, "to that point again that ye think it may be that the Church may take for saints, and worship as saints, them that be none."

"Surely," quoth he, "the proof that ye have laid<sup>488</sup>

475 success 476 even if 477 cross
478 figure of the crucified Christ 479 foolish 480 beyond 481 once again 482 by that: because 483 pleased 486 have been 487 yet tofore: before this 484 wot nere: know not 485 perhaps 488 presented unto me contrary, though it be somewhat probable, yet seemeth me not very strong, nor able and sufficient to strain<sup>489</sup> a man to consent thereto. For though the assistance of God and his Holy Spirit will not suffer<sup>490</sup> his whole Church to agree and consent together in any damnable error, yet may he suffer them well to err in the knowledge and worship of a saint, and mistake for a saint one that were a damnable wretch. For therein were no more danger to man's soul, nor no more honor taken from God, than when the people do worship a host unconsecrated, mistaking it, through the default of an evil priest, for the sacred body of our Lord himself. And this ye doubt not but it is sometimes done."

"Forget not now, by the way," quoth I, "that ye still agree that God will not suffer his whole Church to agree in any damnable error and fall in a false faith. And therewith remember that though it were no damnable error to take one for a saint that were none, or a bone for a relic that were none, yet were it a damnable error to worship any, if we should worship none at all. And therefore, since the Church believeth that we should worship them, that kind of belief can be none error, but must needs be true. Nor that kind of worship can be none idolatry, but must needs be good and acceptable to God. And so, our principal matter standing still sure and fast, we shall see somewhat further whereto your words will weigh and amount. Ye deny not," quoth I, "but there be some saints and some miracles."

"No," quoth he.

"To what purpose," quoth I, "were miracles specially wrought by God? Was it not to the intent to make his messengers known, and the truth of his message, as when he sent Moses to Pharaoh, were not the miracles done by God to make Pharaoh to perceive thereby the truth of his word?"

"Yes," quoth he.

"When Christ," quoth I, "sent his disciples to preach, the power that he gave them to do miracles, was it not for the proof of the doctrine that they taught, as is well witnessed in the Gospel?"<sup>491</sup>

"Yes," quoth he.

"If this be thus," quoth I, "as indeed it is, ye have most cause to believe, of all miracles, those that are told and reported as done for the doctors of Christ's Church, since miracles were specially devised by God for a knowledge of his true messengers and a proof of their message, so that where ye would we should<sup>492</sup> not utterly be deceived in saints and miracles, but yet we might be deceived in doctors whom we take for saints, and in their miracles, now it seemeth on the other side that of all others we be of them and of theirs most sure."

"This is well said," quoth he. "But yet always it runneth in men's minds that miracles may be feigned."

"Be it so," quoth I, "so that it run again in men's minds that all be not feigned. And then, if ye think any true, this reason abideth still: that since miracles were specially given by God for the knowledge of his doctors and declaration of his doctrine, those miracles be specially to be taken for true that be reported to be done by his doctors. For they serve for the comprobation<sup>493</sup> of his holy doctrine. And for because ye say that miracles may be feigned, that we spoke of Moses and Christ's disciples putteth me now in mind: there were of old time also false doctors and miracles falsely feigned, were there not?"

"Yes, marry," quoth he.

"By whom were those miracles feigned?" quoth I.

"Marry," quoth he, "some by men, as there be now, and some by the devil, and haply so there be now too."

"Well, be it," quoth I, "both twain, and<sup>495</sup> ye will. But were there not in the old time both twain found out and vanquished by the true doctors sent by God and true miracles for them wrought by God, as when the serpent of Moses devoured all the serpents made by the witchcraft of the Egyptian jugglers,<sup>496</sup> and when the prophet Daniel did by the steps<sup>497</sup> of the false priests' feet find out the means whereby the meat<sup>498</sup> was eaten that they feigned to be eaten by the idol Bel,<sup>499</sup> and when the prophet Elijah vanquished by miracle the false prophets of Baal?<sup>500</sup> And the holy apostles and disciples of Christ did, at their word, all-to<sup>501</sup> break in pieces the false idols in sight of the paynim people, so that always God hath prepared his true doctors to destroy, by plain miracle, the false miracles whereby men were and might be deceived. Is not this thus?" quoth I.

"Yes," quoth he.

"Well then," quoth I, "if our old holy doctors were false, and their doctrine untrue, and their

489 constrain 490 allow 491 See Mk 16:17–20. 492 where ye would we should: whereas you want us to 493 confirmation

494 what 495 if 496 magicians. See Ex 7:9–12. 497 footprints 498 food

499 See Dn 14:10–21. 500 See 3 Kgs (1 Kgs) 18:19–40. 501 completely miracles feigned, it is not enough now to say so. But if any of them that so say be sent by God to reprove<sup>502</sup> it, then must they prove that they be sent so—and that not in words only, but let some of 5 them come forth and at their word break our images, as Christ's doctors did the paynims'. And to prove our miracles feigned, let them do some very miracles themselves."

"As for miracles," quoth he, "be none<sup>503</sup> article in any man's creed. And there is not so simple a sect of heretics but they might, if they were set thereon, soon match you with miracles—whereof they might feign fifteen in a forenoon. And then, as we said now, it would be thought that though some were untrue,

10 yet all were not lies."

"It were easy indeed," quoth I, "if men were mad among whom they should report them, and would nothing do for the trial."<sup>504</sup>

"Iwis;<sup>505</sup> yet if they did," quoth he, "yet might a few mean-witted<sup>506</sup> men devise and feign a thing of such a fashion that it would be believed, and hard to try<sup>507</sup> the truth out."

"Let it be so," quoth I. "But yet would it not long hold among good Christian people. But God would either bring the falsehood to light, or soon cast it out of credence. What labor took Philostratus to make a book full of lies, whereby he would have had Apollonius Tianius in miracles match unto Christ?<sup>508</sup> And when he had all done, he never found one old wife so fond<sup>509</sup> to believe him. But I pray you tell me," quoth I, "be there not of heresies many sects?"

25

"Yes," quoth he.

"Is there," quoth I, "any more very<sup>510</sup> churches of Christ than one?"

35

"No more," quoth he.

"Is not that it," quoth I, "that is true?"

"Yes," quoth he.

"Be not," quoth I, "then all the sects of heresies false?"

40

"Yes," quoth he.

"Who is likely," quoth I, "to feign and lie: that company that is the true party, or some of them that be false?"

"It is," quoth he, "more likely that they should all lie that be false, than that company that is the true party."

45

"Then false and feigned miracles," quoth I, "be they lies, or not?"

"What else?" quoth he.

50

"Then," quoth I, "by your argument it seemeth that they were much more likely to be among every sect of heretics than in the Church."

"So seemeth it," quoth he.

"How happeth it then," quoth I, "if miracles be feigned ware,<sup>511</sup> that among all the false sects of heretics—where such false stuff should be by all reason most rife—is none at all spoken of, but miracles told only in the Church of Christ, which is only,<sup>512</sup> as ye agree, the true party?"

60

"There be," quoth he, "peradventure some done—either miracles or marvels—but they dare not speak of them, for fear of persecution."

"If they were," quoth I, "false marvels only done by the devil, it would not help your matter. For then must you grant very miracles of God only done in Christ's Church. And if there had been very miracles of God done for any sect whom we call heretics, that sect had been no sect of heretics, but the very Church. Or else had God by miracles testified the truth of a false faith, and that is impossible. And thereof should have followed that, except<sup>513</sup> there were of Christ two churches of two contrary faiths, and both true—which were impossible, else<sup>514</sup> not some, but all the miracles done, told, and wrought in one church had been either feigned or done by the devil—whereby<sup>515</sup> should it follow that our church were not the very Church, but a false sect of heretics, which were, as I have already proved you diverse ways, as far impossible. But now for the more clearness of our party therein, and for the further proof that ours is the sure Church, and only the doctors and the doctrine of our Church approved by miracles, never hath there been any done for the doctors of any sects of heretics. For if there hath any true miracles been done by God, and then that sect not a false sect but the true Church, all the persecution that could have been could never have quenched the fame thereof, as well appeareth by the miracles done in our Church in all

65

70

75

80

85

90

502 disprove 503 be none: (they) are not an 504 nothing... trial: not attempt an examination 505 Certainly 506 i.e., of average intelligence 507 test 508 Lucius Flavius Pilostratus (ca.

170–250) wrote The Life of Apollonius of Tyana about 220. Apollonius (ca. 40–120), a Pythagorean philosopher, is described as performing miracles including healing the sick, raising the dead, and ascending into heaven. 509 foolish 510 true 511 feigned ware: counterfeit goods 512 alone 513 unless 514 otherwise 515 and thus such time as both the Jews and the paynims pursued it. Now since there be so many false sects, and but one Church true, and miracles not spoken of in any but in one, it is a good token that the matter

 5 and substance of them is true. For else they were as likely to be spoken of in more, since of false and lying sects be so many. And then also, miracles being true, and being done, but in one of all those many companies each calling himself the Church, it is a 10 good proof that the same one in which only<sup>516</sup> they be done is only the very true Church of Christ, to which his Holy Spirit and marvelous Majesty giveth his special assistance. And surely of all miracles that ever God hath wrought for his Church, I see not, in 15 my mind, lightly<sup>517</sup> a more marvelous than that, as many sects of heretics as hath sprung and parted out of Christ's Church, and each of them laboring to be taken for the very Church, yet hath our Lord hitherto never suffered<sup>518</sup> neither the devil to 20 do any wonder for them that might have the color and face<sup>519</sup> of a miracle, nor—as false as they be themselves—yet hath he not suffered them hitherto not so much to do as feign a miracle for their party. Which is, to my mind, not only great wonder,
 25 but also their confessed falsehood considered, a very clear proof that they could never have been kept from it but by the especial providence of God and his tender cure upon<sup>520</sup> his chosen Church, by which it hath liked him hitherto<sup>521</sup> that miracles,
 30 among other things, have been one good and sure mark<sup>522</sup> between his Church and all those erroneous sects that been sprung<sup>523</sup> out thereof and be not his Church, but would seem to be. For as for paynims<sup>524</sup>—Turks and Saracens, which<sup>525</sup> by open profession are of another flock, and bear not the name of Christ, nor look for him<sup>526</sup>—he suffereth the devil sometimes to delude with wonders and marvels. But the Jews that still gape after<sup>527</sup> him, their miracles, as far as I can hear, be gone, to the 40 intent they may know that he hath left them and given them up which was wont<sup>528</sup> to work all those wonders for them. Now as for heretics which falsely feign themselves to be his own flock, and presume to bear and profess his name, he keepeth them
 45 from the honor of any miracles doing, to the end that the lack thereof among all their sects, and the doing thereof in his only Church, may be among many other things one good mark and sure token whereby all these false sects of them may be discerned and known from his very true Church—50 that is to say, from the whole congregation of true Christian people in this world which,<sup>529</sup> without intermixture of obstinate heresies, profess the right, Catholic faith.

“Now is it not only true that miracles be wrought
 55 only in the Church, and thereby do show which is the very Church, but also they do show that those holy doctors for whom God hath showed them were good men and of the right belief. For if it were as ye would of late have had it seem—that it might peradventure be so that the holy doctors of 60 our faith (whom we take for saints) were indeed no saints, nor saved souls, but haply<sup>530</sup> those were saved souls and saints in heaven (though it were unknown here in earth) which did teach the doctrines here
 65 that we now call heresies—then were it a wondrous change, that whereas God among the Jews provided that in every age there were some good men by their good living and his high miracles so notable and well known to the people that men had them always 70 like bright lively<sup>531</sup> stars, whose doctrine they might boldly believe, and whose living they might surely follow, he would now in his special Church of Christ, not only do nothing like, but also do clean the contrary. For if he should take that way that ye
 75 say—to leave,<sup>532</sup> ever since the apostles' days, all the true interpreters of his and their holy writing, and doctors of the very true faith, lie to the world unknown, and then, on the other side, set forth with miracles, or suffer<sup>533</sup> so to be set forth with marvels,
 80 that his Church should take and accept for saints such evil persons or hypocrites as construed the Scripture wrong, and ever since his apostles' days have taught false errors, and led his flock out of the right way in a bypath to hellward with wicked
 85 heresies and idolatry—then hath not God sent the Holy Ghost, and himself also tarried still therein, to teach his Church the truth as he said he would. But he then had helped to beguile them himself, which were impossible for God to do, and more than blasphemy for any man to think. For this were not like 90 the sufferance<sup>534</sup> of an unconsecrated host, whereof

516 alone 517 easily 518 allowed 519 color and face: semblance and appearance 520 cure upon: concern for; care for 521 liked him hitherto:

pleased him up to this time 522 i.e., of the distinction 523 been sprung: have sprung 524 pagans 525 who 526 look for him: expect him (to return) 527 gape

after: look longingly for 528 which was wont: who made it his practice 529 who 530 perhaps 531 living 532 let 533 allow 534 permitting ye put the example, wherein the people's invincible ignorance<sup>535</sup> with their devout affection may, without harm to their souls, be suffered in the thing that seldom happeth, and endureth for so short a while.

5 But if God would leave all good doctors unknown, and suffer his Church to be deceived with miracles and marvels done by them that taught heresies and set forth idolatry, then should himself, as I say, not only suffer his honor and right faith and religion to

10 be perpetually lost, but help also himself to destroy it — which, whoso could think possible were worse than Judas, and more mad than any man in Bedlam. And therefore can it not in no wise be that the Church can be deceived in that they take for saints

15 these holy doctors of the Church. Nor, they so being, can it in any wise be that the doctrines wherein they consent and agree can be false or untrue. Among which doctrines, since the things whereof we speak — I mean the praying to saints, the worship of images, reverencing of relics, and going in

20 pilgrimages — is a part, as by their books plainly doth appear, we may well and surely conclude that none of these things be damnable or displeasing to God, but things highly to his contentation<sup>536</sup> and

25 pleasure. And since we further perceive that their books be written in diverse regions and sundry ages, we thereby well perceive that these things be parcel of the rites, usages, and belief of Christ's Church, not only now and of late, but continually from the 30 beginning hitherto. And since it is plainly proved you that the Church can in no wise be suffered of God to fall into any damnable error thereby, it is yet most surely concluded that these things be none such, and consequently proved that no text of Scripture seeming to sound to the contrary can be

35 so taken or understood, nor that the Church cannot in prejudice of the faith misunderstand the Scripture. And that the substantial points of the faith therefore learned of the Church is one of the surest

40 rules that can be founden for the right interpretation of Holy Scripture. And that no sect of heretics can be the Church of Christ, but that our church is the very<sup>537</sup> Church. And it is also clearly proved that the matter of miracles therein daily done is neither

45 feigned by men, nor done by the devil, but only by the mighty hand of God. And such objections as ye laid unto the contrary of any point aforesaid be, as far as I can see, sufficiently answered, except that ye have any further objection to lay therein. Which if

50 ye have, ye get no thanks to spare.”

Whereunto he said — and swore therewith — that he so fully felt himself answered and contented therein that he thought himself able therewith to content and satisfy any man that he should happen to meet with that would hold the contrary. Whereupon for that day we departed till another time, in which we appointed to peruse the remnant of the things that he had in the beginning purposed.<sup>538</sup>

The end of the Second Book

535 invincible ignorance: a kind of ignorance that would excuse an otherwise sinful act. See Aquinas, Summa theologiae 1-2, q. 76, art 3. 536 satisfaction 537 actual 538 proposed

THE THIRD BOOK

THE FIRST CHAPTER

The messenger, having in the meanwhile been at the university, showeth unto the author an objection which he learned there against one point proved in the First Book: that is to wit,<sup>1</sup> that in the necessary points of the faith, equal credence is to be given to the Church and to the Scripture. Which objection the author answereth and dissolveth.<sup>2</sup>

10 About fortnight after, your friend came again in a morning, new comen from the university, where he was, as ye wot,<sup>3</sup> at learning ere he came at<sup>4</sup> you. And there had he now, as he said, visited some of his old acquaintances. And, upon occasion rising 15 in communication, had again repeated with some of them — very fresh learned men — good part of our former disceptation<sup>5</sup> and reasoning had between us before his departing. Which, as he said, they took great pleasure in, and much wished to 20 have been present thereat. But surely he said that some of them seemed to take very sore<sup>6</sup> to heart the hard handling<sup>7</sup> of the man that ye write of,<sup>8</sup> and the burning of the New Testament, and the forbidding of Luther's books to be read, which were, as 25 some of them thought, not all things<sup>9</sup> so bad as they were made for.<sup>10</sup> And finally, touching the burning of heretics, there were some that thought the clergy therein far out of right order of charity.

30 "I am," quoth I, "very glad that it hath been your hap<sup>11</sup> to be there, not so much for anything that ye have showed them of our communication had already, concerning the praying of<sup>12</sup> saints, worshipping of images and relics, and going in<sup>13</sup> pilgrimage (wherein I think ye told them no novelty, for I 35 doubt not but they could have told you more of the matters themselves than ye have heard or could hear of me), as for that I think that among them, being, as ye say, so well-learned, ye have either heard somewhat<sup>14</sup> whereby ye be in some part of these matters
40 (that we shall speak of) already satisfied, whereby our business therein may be the shorter, or else ye be the more strongly instructed for the other part,<sup>15</sup> whereby our disputation shall be the fuller, and the matters the more plainly touched, for the more ample satisfaction of such as yourself or your master shall hereafter happen to find in any doubt of<sup>16</sup> these things that we shall now touch and treat of."

"Indeed," quoth he, "somewhat have they showed me their minds therein, as in some part of the matters ye shall hear when we hap to come to them."

50 "That shall I gladly hear," quoth I, "and shape you such answer as my poor wit<sup>17</sup> will serve me. But yet I pray you be plain with me in one thing: Were they satisfied, and held themselves content, in those things that were at last with much work agreed between us?"

"In good faith," quoth he, "to say the truth, all were save<sup>18</sup> one, and he in all things save one. And to your great praise and high commendation, they said that in these matters —"

60 "Nay," quoth I, "let their praise pass, lest ye make me too proud. But I pray you tell me, not which one misliked one thing, but what one thing it was, and why he misliked it."

"Surely," quoth he. "For aught<sup>19</sup> that I could bend<sup>20</sup> upon him, he could never agree that the faith of the Church out of<sup>21</sup> Scripture should be as sure<sup>22</sup> and bind us to the belief thereof as the words of Holy Scripture."

70 "Why," quoth I, "if ye remembered well what we said, ye had enough to prove him that."

"Truth is it," quoth he, "so had I, and so did I — and in such wise<sup>23</sup> that diverse ways I brought him to the bay<sup>24</sup> that he wist<sup>25</sup> not how to void.<sup>26</sup> But then said he to me that he would not do with me as 75 I had done with you. 'Nor it was,' he said, 'no wisdom for a man against his adversary to use always the buckler hand.<sup>27</sup> For so must all the peril be his, and his adversary stand in surety.<sup>28</sup> But, on the other side, if he use the sword therewith,<sup>29</sup> and strike
80 among,<sup>30</sup> and drive the other to his defense, so may he hap to put him in half the peril.' And likewise he said that if I proved my part<sup>31</sup> so clearly to him that he could not say nay, yet if I would again answer

1 say 2 resolves 3 know 4 ere... at: before he came to 5 disputation
6 grievously 7 hard handling: harsh treatment 8 Thomas Bilney (ca. 1495-1531)
9 all things: altogether 10 out to be

11 fortune 12 to 13 on 14 something 15 side 16 about 17 intellect 18 except 19 all; anything 20 bring to bear 21 out of: apart from 22 certain; trustworthy 23 (a) manner 24 brought... bay: backed him into a corner 25 knew 26 escape 27 use... hand: use always the hand that holds the shield; i.e., be always on the defensive 28 safety 29 also 30 now and then 31 side him another while,<sup>32</sup> he might peradventure<sup>33</sup> bring me to the same point on the other side; and then should the matter stand yet at large.<sup>34</sup> For of two contraries, if both the parts be proved, then stand they both unproved. ‘And therefore,’ quoth he, ‘I pray you answer me this a little: When you believe the Church, wherefore<sup>35</sup> do you believe the Church? Do you not believe it because it saith truth?’

“Yes, marry,”<sup>36</sup> quoth I. ‘What else?’

“‘And how know you,’ quoth he, ‘that the Church saith truth? Know ye that any other wise than by Scripture?’

“‘Nay, marry,’ quoth I, ‘but then by plain Scripture I know it very well. For the Scripture telleth me that God hath fully taught and teacheth his Church, and biddeth me believe his Church.’

“‘Lo,’ quoth he, ‘for all your long process,<sup>37</sup> see whereto ye be brought now. Ye would in any wise before — and ye seemed to prove it, too, all the while that ye argued and I answered — that the Church was, in all necessary points of our faith, as much to be believed as the Scripture, and that we should not have believed the Scripture but for the authority of the Church, as ye say Saint Augustine saith.

And now, when I argue and ye answer, I have driven you to the wall in three words,<sup>38</sup> and proved unto you that the Church is not to be believed, nor that yourself believeth it not, but for the authority of the Scripture.’ And after that he had thus said, the remnant that were present allowed it much;<sup>39</sup> and I was therewith astonished,<sup>40</sup> and said I would advise me<sup>41</sup> further thereon. But he laughed and said he would lend me this,<sup>42</sup> and not to be hasty on<sup>43</sup> me; for he would give me respite of payment till I had spoken with you again.”

When your friend had told, “Forsooth,”<sup>44</sup> quoth I, “he dealt with you like a courteous creditor. And since he hath given you so long day,<sup>45</sup> you shall not need — I trust — to die in his debt. And, to say the truth, ye owe him not much. For ye may bear him his own again<sup>46</sup> and tell him his money is nought.<sup>47</sup> But I have espied<sup>48</sup> it is, as he saith, a great advantage for him to oppose.<sup>49</sup> For he hath such craft in arguing that he will soon bring the answerer to a perilous point, if he happen on one that will answer him handsomely,<sup>50</sup> as he would have him. But on the other side, if he had happened on one that had answered him as frowardly<sup>51</sup> as the boy answered one Caius, a poet at Cambridge, then had he, by his opposing part,<sup>52</sup> won nothing at all. For Caius, for his pleasure playing with the boy, being a young sophister,<sup>53</sup> said that he would prove the boy an ass. Which, when the boy denied, ‘Well,’ quoth Caius, ‘thou wilt grant me this first: that everything that hath two ears is an ass.’

“‘Nay, marry,’<sup>54</sup> Master, will I not!’ quoth the boy.

“‘No wilt thou?’ quoth Caius. ‘Ah, wily boy, there thou wentest beyond me. For and<sup>55</sup> thou wouldst have granted me that, I would have proved thee an ass anon.’<sup>56</sup>

“‘Marry, Master,’ quoth the boy, ‘ye might well; and so might every fool do.’

“‘Well,’ quoth Caius, ‘I will go now another way to work with thee. Thou wilt grant me that every ass hath two ears.’

“‘Nay, marry, will I not, Master!’ quoth the boy.

“‘Why so, boy?’ quoth he.

“‘Marry, Master,’ quoth he, ‘for some ass may hap to have never one; for they may be cut off both.’

“‘Nay,’ quoth Caius, ‘I give thee over;<sup>57</sup> for thou art too froward a boy for me.’ And so, if ye had not granted what he would,<sup>58</sup> he had<sup>59</sup> nothing won at your hand.”

“‘Why,’ quoth your friend, “what thing did I grant him that I should not?”

“Forsooth,” quoth I, “no more but all that ever ye granted. For first, when he asked you whether the cause why we believe the Church be not because it is true that<sup>60</sup> the Church telleth you, though your answer which ye made therein was not the cause of your redargution,<sup>61</sup> nor the thing whereby ye were concluded,<sup>62</sup> yet answered ye not well thereto when ye granted it.”

“‘Why,’ quoth he, “wherefore<sup>63</sup> should I believe the Church — or any man else — but because they tell me true?”

“‘Sometimes,’ quoth I, “it happeth so; but sometimes it happeth otherwise. For if a known liar tell

32 another while: in turn 33 perhaps 34 yet at large: still unsettled 35 why
36 an exclamation, from “by Mary”; indeed
37 argument 38 in three words: with a few words; in short order 39 approved 40 astonished, bewildered 41 advise me: deliberate 42 this one 43 not to be hasty

on: would not demand quick repayment from 44 In truth 45 so long day: such a long time before the due date 46 may bear . . . again: can take him back what he lent you 47 of no value, worthless 48 noted that 49 be the one on the offensive 50 suitably; helpfully 51 contrarily

52 had he . . . part: he would have, by being on the offensive 53 sophist 54 indeed 55 if 56 right away 57 give thee over: give up on you 58 wanted (you to grant) 59 would have 60 what 61 redargution: being disproved 62 refuted 63 Why . . . wherefore: Well . . . why you a known-true tale, ye will believe him because he telleth you truth. But, now, if a known-true man tell you an unknown truth,<sup>64</sup> ye believe not him because the thing is truth, but ye believe the thing to be truth because ye believe the man to be true. And so believe you the Church, not because it is truth that the Church telleth you, but ye believe the truth of the thing because the Church telleth it. But yet was not that answer of his, as I say, the thing that confounded<sup>65</sup> you. For now if ye so should have answered him as I have showed you, though ye should have somewhat blenched him<sup>66</sup> therewith, yet he might—and would, of likelihood—have gone further with you, and have asked you whereby ye know that ye should believe the Church. And what answer would ye then have made thereunto?”

“Marry,” quoth he, “then might I have said that I believe the Church because that in such necessary points of faith the Church cannot err.”

“That had<sup>67</sup> been very well said,” quoth I. “But he would have asked how ye know that.”

“Then must I,” quoth he, “have said the same that I did: that I know it by plain and evident Scripture that the Church in such things cannot say but true. And then would I have laid<sup>68</sup> him the texts that ye alleged<sup>69</sup> unto me for the same purpose before.”

“If ye so had said,” quoth I, “ye had answered him truly, but yet not with your most<sup>70</sup> advantage.”

“Why so?” quoth he.

“For,” quoth I, “your next answer were<sup>71</sup> to say, as truth is, that ye believe that the Church in such things cannot err, because ye believe that God hath taught and told the same things to his Church.”

“Then would he have asked me further,” quoth your friend, “what thing maketh me believe that God hath taught and told the Church those things.”

“So would he have asked you,” quoth I, “and so might he well.”

“Then were we comen,” quoth your friend, “unto the same point again, that he should have concluded<sup>72</sup> me as he did before.”

“Nay,” quoth I, “not if ye answered thereto well.”

“Why,” quoth he, “what could I answer else, but clearly grant him that I believe that thing for none other cause but only because the Scripture so showeth me?”

“No could ye?”<sup>73</sup> quoth I. “What if never Scripture had been written in this world? Should there never have been any church or congregation of faithful and right-believing people?”

“That wot I nere,”<sup>74</sup> quoth he.

“No do ye?”<sup>75</sup> quoth I. “Were there never any folk that believed in God, and had a true faith, between Adam and Noah—of such as never heard God speak themselves?”

“Yes,” quoth he, “I suppose there were some; but it should seem there were very few. For there were few saved in Noah’s ship.”

“The world was at that time,” quoth I, “waxen<sup>76</sup> worse and worse, as it waxeth now. But it is not unlikely that there were many right-believing people in the meantime.”

“That is,” quoth he, “likely enough.”

“Now as for the days,” quoth I, “of Noah himself, though there were few saved alive, yet proveth not that the people to be all miscreants<sup>77</sup> and without faith. For it fared by<sup>78</sup> them as it fareth now by us: that there were many that believed the truth and had a faith, but they followed the flesh and sank for their sin. For there appeareth no further upon the story in Genesis but that the world was washed with the water of the great flood for the filth of their fleshly living.<sup>79</sup> And albeit that<sup>80</sup> in the First Epistle of Saint Peter it might seem some incredulity<sup>81</sup> in them,<sup>82</sup> yet may it be that it stretched no further than to the lack of fear in the credence of God’s commination,<sup>83</sup> and overmuch hope and boldness<sup>84</sup> of God’s further favor and sufferance—whereof they repented after, too late for this present life, and yet many, through God’s mercy, not too late for the final salvation of their souls (as appeareth by the good and great clerk Nicholas de Lyra, upon<sup>85</sup> the same place),<sup>86</sup> which could in no wise<sup>87</sup> have been so if they had lacked faith. Which faith—what Scripture had they to teach them, or all the men in effect that any faith had from Adam thitherto?<sup>88</sup>

64 an unknown truth: something you don’t already know is the truth
65 defeated 66 blenched him: made him flinch; disconcerted him 67 would have 68 cited 69 quoted 70 with your most: to your best 71 would be 72 that he should have concluded: so that he would have refuted 73 No could ye?: You could not answer otherwise? 74 wot I nere: know I not 75 No do ye?: You don’t? 76 growing 77 unbelievers 78 fared by: happened with 79 See Gn 6:4–8:22. 80 although 81 seem there was some unbelief 82 See 1 Pt 3:19–20.

83 punishment 84 presumption 85 in his commentary on 86 See Nicholas de Lyra (1270–1349), Postillae perpetuae in universam S. Scripturam. 87 way 88 until then

Was there also no faithful folk at all from Noah to Moses — nor himself neither till he had the Law delivered him in writing? Did Abraham never believe more but those things that we find in Scripture specially to have been told him by God? Was his father and all his friends<sup>89</sup> infidels? Were there no people besides, in all that long time, that had a right faith?”

“Yes,” quoth your friend, “that I think verily there was.”

“That may ye,” quoth I, “be sure there was. And why did any man then believe the Church — that is to wit, the number and congregation of good and right-believing folk, of whose mouth and tradition he heard the true belief — against the wrong and misbelief that was in all the world among infidels and idolaters besides? Why did any man this, but because they believed that God hath taught those things to good men before, and that it was and would be still<sup>90</sup> the good lesson of God? And then what thing made them to believe that God had taught them so? It was not the Scripture that made them believe that, as ye would<sup>91</sup> that nothing can tell us that belief but the Scripture. I pray you tell me what Scripture hath taught the Church to know which books be the very<sup>92</sup> Scripture, and to reject many others that were written of the same matters — and that in such wise written, and in the names of such men, as, saving<sup>93</sup> for the Spirit of God given to his Church, a natural wise man had<sup>94</sup> been likely enough either to have taken both for Holy Scripture, or to have rejected both as none Holy Scripture. And surely in the receipt of the one and rejection of the other, there would have been at the leastways such diverse opinions that the whole Church had never taken all the one sort and rejected all the other, had not that Holy Spirit inspired that consent,<sup>95</sup> qui facit unanimes in domo (‘which maketh the Church all of one mind and accord’).<sup>96</sup> And therefore, albeit that against them that<sup>97</sup> nothing will believe but Scripture, we prove the authority of the Church by Scripture, and in such wise prove it them by Scripture that they shall be fain<sup>98</sup> either further to grant that they be bounden to believe the Church in things not specified in Scripture, and as fully as they believe the Scripture itself, or else they shall deny the Scripture and all, yet should we have believed the Church if never Scripture had been written, as those good faithful folk did that believed well before the Scripture was written. And now the Scripture itself maketh us not believe the Scripture, but the Church maketh us to know the Scripture. And God without<sup>99</sup> Scripture hath taught his Church the knowledge of his very Scripture from all counterfeit Scripture. For it is not, as I say, the Scripture that maketh us to believe the Word of God written in the Scripture — for a man might (as haply<sup>100</sup> many doth) read it altogether and believe thereof never a whit<sup>101</sup> — but it is the Spirit of God that, with our own towardness<sup>102</sup> and good endeavor, worketh in His Church, and in every good member thereof, the credulity and belief whereby we believe as well the Church concerning God’s words taught us by the Church, and by God graved<sup>103</sup> in men’s hearts, without Scripture, as his holy words written in his Holy Scripture. And thus ye perceive that where ye granted him that so did oppose you that we believe the Church by none other way but by the Scripture, there did ye not answer him well. For we beside the Scripture do believe the Church, because that God himself, by secret inspiration of his Holy Spirit, doth (if we be willing to learn) teach us to believe his Church, and also, if we will walk with him, leadeth us into the belief thereof by the selfsame means by which he teacheth us and leadeth us into the belief of his Holy Scripture. For likewise as when we hear the Scripture or read it, if we be not rebellious but endeavor ourselves to believe, and captive<sup>104</sup> and subdue our understanding to serve and follow faith, praying for his gracious aid and help, he then worketh with us, and inwardly doth incline our heart into the assent of that<sup>105</sup> we read, and after a little spark of our faith, increaseth the credence in our incredulity — so doth his goodness in like wise incline and move the mind of every like toward and like well-willing body<sup>106</sup> to the giving of fast<sup>107</sup> and firm credence to the faith that the Church teacheth him in such things as be not in the Scripture, and to believe that God hath taught his Church those points by his holy word without writing. And now

89 relatives 90 always 91 would have it 92 true; actual 93 except 94 a natural wise man had: a man wise from natural reason would have 95 consensus

96 Ps 67(68):7 97 who 98 obliged 99 outside of; apart from 100 unfortunately 101 never a whit: not a bit; not in the least 102 receptivity; cooperativeness

103 engraved 104 restrain 105 what 106 like... body: similarly cooperative and well-meaning person 107 steadfast

if ye had answered him thus, I believe surely that ye had clearly<sup>108</sup> disarmed him and broken his gay sword in twain.<sup>109</sup> Which in my mind, I promise you, how gaily soever it glitter in one's eye for a flourish,<sup>110</sup> yet who<sup>111</sup> fight therewith shall find it neither sharp nor sure, if it fall on a good buckler,<sup>112</sup> and not on a naked<sup>113</sup> man.”

“By my troth,”<sup>114</sup> quoth your friend, “so seemeth me now too. And though the brightness bleared mine eye at that time, yet I trust he shall win no worship thereof<sup>115</sup> when we meet again.”

THE SECOND CHAPTER

Incidentally somewhat is there touched the superstitious fear and scrupulosity that the person abjured<sup>116</sup> did, as it is said, begin with. The weariness whereof drove him to the delight of such liberty as brought him to the contempt of the good devout<sup>117</sup> things used commonly in Christ's Church. And in this chapter is somewhat touched the good mean manner<sup>118</sup> between scrupulous superstition and reckless negligence that would<sup>119</sup> be used in the singing or saying of divine service.<sup>120</sup>

“But surely, sir, concerning the man's abjuration<sup>121</sup> that we spoke of, they be marvelously persuaded that he had much wrong. Not in that the opinions were Catholic which were laid to his charge<sup>122</sup> (for therein have ye said enough), but in that he was wrong borne in hand that he had<sup>123</sup> preached them, where he did not so. And thus be they very credibly informed, both by word and writing of such as were present thereat. And therefore long I sore,<sup>124</sup> and would be very glad, to hear how those matters<sup>125</sup> were proved.”

“Now and<sup>126</sup> I am,” quoth I, “for my part very sorry, so help me God, to lose time therein, as a thing in effect fruitless, saving<sup>127</sup> that it may be peradventure a fruitful example that no man be light<sup>128</sup> to believe such things hereafter as he shall hap to hear

spoken against the Church in the favor of any man condemned<sup>129</sup> of heresy, while<sup>130</sup> he seeth as much said against the judgment<sup>131</sup> of this man — wherein, so to say, they can have no more hold<sup>132</sup> than if they would say the crow were white. And in good faith, to say the truth, there cannot in my mind be a more meet<sup>133</sup> example to match their words withal. For likewise<sup>134</sup> as he that would say the crow were white must, if he will be believed, go tell the tale to a blind man, and may percase<sup>135</sup> with him be as well believed as one that will say the contrary, till that he be — either by more men or men of more honesty<sup>136</sup> — put after<sup>137</sup> out of credence, so must these folk that thus talk and write of him seek (as they do indeed) such hearers as be blind in the matter and know nothing thereof, whom they persuade, with false suggestions, to conceive an evil opinion of the judges, to incline their hearts first, for pity, to the favor of the man, and after to the favor of the matters that he was abjured for. I have myself seen a letter written out of London by a priest reputed honest — howbeit indeed,<sup>138</sup> as I saw it proved after, a plain pestilent heretic — in which letter he wrote that the man we now talk of did no more abjure any heresy than he had done himself, or the man that he wrote unto. And yet was his writing as false as God is true. Wherewith he labored covertly to make the man believe that the opinions were none heresies, and that he which was pretended<sup>139</sup> to have abjured them had not so done indeed, but had well avowed them and stiffly abidden<sup>140</sup> by them. Lo, thus do such as are of that sect set forth their matters<sup>141</sup> with lies. And reason is it that they so do. For since their sects be false, lies be for them most meet.<sup>142</sup> And yet is it a mad thing of them to boast of him. For he forthwith<sup>143</sup> forsook them, and ever before his judges he confessed from the beginning that the matters were plain, false heresies — and the holders therewith<sup>144</sup> heretics — saying for himself that he never preached them. And so had they no cause to be proud of him, which<sup>145</sup> in open audience, at the first word, refused<sup>146</sup> and condemned them. But they — haply<sup>147</sup>

108 had clearly: would have completely 109 two 110 for a flourish: when being flourished 111 whoever 112 shield
113 unarmored 114 truth; trustworthiness 115 worship thereof: honor by it 116 who renounced under oath his heresies
117 devotional 118 mean manner: middle way 119 should 120 the Divine Office or Prayers of the Hours 121 formal renunciation under oath 122 which . . . charge: with which he was charged 123 wrong . . . bad: unjustly characterized as having 124 greatly 125 charges

126 even if 127 except 128 be light: should be quick 129 convicted 130 when 131 trial 132 basis, relevance

133 fitting 134 just 135 perhaps 136 respectability 137 afterwards
138 howbeit indeed: although in fact 139 alleged 140 stood 141 contentions; ideas 142 fitting 143 immediately 144 besides; also 145 who 146 repudiated 147 maybe thinking that for all his denying with his mouth, he favored still indeed them and their heresies in his mind — pardoned therefore those words, which they thought spoken but of infirmity, for fear and faint heart. And therefore would they be glad yet, among men that knew not the matter, to maintain and uphold his authority against<sup>148</sup> a better time. And surely this that I shall tell you have I heard reported, howbeit<sup>149</sup> I will not warrant<sup>150</sup> it for truth. But yet have I, as I say, heard it reported right credibly that the man we speak of, which<sup>151</sup> was abjured, used among some of that sect to say, ‘Let us preach and set forth our way. And if we be accused, let us say we said not so; and yet some of them shall we win always the while.’<sup>152</sup> And albeit I will not, as I say, warrant you that he thus said, yet I assure you, to my mind his manner in his matter before his judges was as consonant as could be to that intent and purpose. For surely the effect<sup>153</sup> of his defense was nothing else but, against a well and plainly proved matter, an obstinate shameless nay.”

“By my troth,” quoth your friend, “I marvel me much thereof. For he was called a good man and a very devout.”

“I will not,” quoth I, “as I told you in the beginning, go about to reprove his living, since the question standeth not but in<sup>154</sup> his teaching; and yet may I be bold with you to tell you what I have heard. He was (as it was said) after that he fell<sup>155</sup> from the study of the law (wherein he was a proctor<sup>156</sup> and partly well-learned) unto the study of Scripture — he was, as I say, very fearful and scrupulous, and began at the first to fall into such a scrupulous holiness that he reckoned himself bounden so straitly<sup>157</sup> to keep and observe the words of Christ after<sup>158</sup> the very letter that, because our Lord biddeth us when we will pray, enter into our chamber and shut the door to us,<sup>159</sup> he thought it therefore sin to say his service<sup>160</sup> abroad,<sup>161</sup> and always would be sure to have his chamber door shut unto him while he said his Matins.<sup>162</sup> Which thing I indeed heard him once deny in an honorable presence.<sup>163</sup>

“But I heard again another man — more credible than twain of him (and if I had said than such ten, I think I lied<sup>164</sup> not), and one of his best-proved friends — avow it in his face for truth. Howbeit,<sup>165</sup> I tell you not this thing for any great hurt in the man. For it was more peevish<sup>166</sup> and painful than evil and sinful. But surely men say that in conclusion,<sup>167</sup> with the weariness of that superstitious fear and servile dread, he fell as far to the contrary, and under pretext of love and liberty waxed so drunk of the new must<sup>168</sup> of lewd<sup>169</sup> lightness of mind and vain gladness of heart, which he took for spiritual consolation, that whatsoever himself listed<sup>170</sup> to take for good, that thought he forthwith<sup>171</sup> approved by God, and so framed himself a faith, framed himself a conscience, framed himself a devotion wherein him list;<sup>172</sup> and wherein him liked, he set himself at liberty.”

“And if it so were,” quoth your friend, “then ye see, lo, what cometh of this saying of service.”

“Of saying service?” quoth I. “This is much like as at Beverley<sup>173</sup> late,<sup>174</sup> when much of the people being at a bear-baiting, the church fell suddenly down at Evensong<sup>175</sup> time and overwhelmed<sup>176</sup> some that then were in it. A good fellow that after heard the tale told, ‘Lo,’ quoth he, ‘now may you see what it is to be at Evensong when ye should be at the bear-baiting.’ Howbeit, the hurt was not therein — being at Evensong — but in that the church was falsely<sup>177</sup> wrought. So was in him or any man else no harm but good in saying of divine service; but the occasion of harm is in the superstitious fashion that their own folly joineth thereunto, as some think they say it not but if<sup>178</sup> they say every psalm twice.”

“In faith,” quoth your friend, “then if I were as he, I would mumble it up apace<sup>179</sup> or else say none at all.”

“That were as evil,” quoth I, “on the other side. There is a mean may serve between both.”

“Yea,” quoth he, “but wot<sup>180</sup> ye what the wife said, that complained to her gossip<sup>181</sup> of her husband’s forwardness?<sup>182</sup> She said her husband was so wayward<sup>183</sup>

148 in anticipation of 149 although 150 guarantee 151 who 152 the while: in the meantime 153 sum or substance 154 standeth . . . in: concerns nothing except 155 after that he fell:
after he turned 156 advocate; defense attorney 157 straitly: strictly; rigorously
158 according to 159 See Mt 6:6.

160 prayers called the Divine Office
161 outside that room 162 morning prayers 163 an honorable presence:
the presence of a high-class person
164 would have lied 165 However
166 silly 167 in conclusion: finally 168 wine 169 wicked 170 wished, desired 171 immediately 172 wished

173 a town in Yorkshire, in northeastern England, and a major pilgrimage destination 174 recently 175 Vespers; Evening Prayers 176 crushed 177 improperly 178 but if: unless 179 quickly
180 know 181 female friend 182 bad disposition 183 capricious; self-willed that he would never be pleased. ‘For if his bread,’ quoth she, ‘be dough-baken,<sup>184</sup> then is he angry.’ ‘Marry, no marvel,’ quoth her gossip. ‘Marry, and wot ye what, gossip?’ quoth she. ‘And if<sup>185</sup> I bake it all 5 to hard coals, yet is he not content neither, by Saint James.’ ‘No,’ quoth her gossip, ‘ye should bake it in a mean.’ ‘In a mean?’<sup>186</sup> quoth she. ‘Marry, I cannot happen on it.’ And so in a pair of Matins it is much work to happen on the mean. And then to say them 10 too short<sup>187</sup> is lack of devotion, and to say them too seriously is somewhat superstitious. And therefore the best way were, in my mind, to say none at all.”

“Yea,” quoth I, “but then is God as wayward a husband as ye spoke of, that will neither be content 15 with his bread burned to coals nor dough-baken neither.”

“By our Lady,” quoth he, “but be he content or not, I ween<sup>188</sup> he hath much dough-baken bread among.<sup>189</sup> For the Matins, I tell you, be in some 20 places sung faster than I can say them.”

“Peradventure,”<sup>190</sup> quoth I, “so were it need.<sup>191</sup>
 For if they should sing Matins no faster than ye say them, they should, I ween, sing very few Matins in a year.”

“In faith,” quoth he. “And<sup>192</sup> some that say them make me to doubt<sup>193</sup> much whether the bees in their hives use<sup>194</sup> to say Matins among them. For even 25 such another buzzing they make.”

“Surely,” quoth I, “that is as true as it is evil done.
 30 For as it is a vice and some fault to be, in the service of God, superstitious instead of religious—over-dreadful<sup>195</sup> and scrupulous instead of devout and diligent—so is it a much more fault to be therein reckless and negligent. ‘For accursed is 35 he,’ as Holy Scripture saith, ‘that doth the work of God negligently.’<sup>196</sup> The peril thereof appeareth by Eutyclus, the young stripling that is spoken of by Saint Luke in the Acts of the Apostles, who, falling in sleep while the apostles and the disciples were oc-40 cupied in reading, preaching, and prayer, fell out of a high window down unto the ground, and there had<sup>197</sup> died—God wot in what case<sup>198</sup>—if the merits of Saint Paul had not recovered him.<sup>199</sup> And now, if he be of<sup>200</sup> God accursed that negligently doth his work, how much is he more accursed that casteth 45 his work away and leaveth it quite undone—such work, I say, as they be bound to do? But in this matter we spend more time than needeth.<sup>201</sup> For it is not much to our present purpose, saving<sup>202</sup> that if it be truth that the man whom we talk of fell first 50 in such superstition, it is the more likely that the devil did cast him therein for none other intent but that he might after, for very weariness thereof, bring him into a contempt of all the things that he was waxen<sup>203</sup> weary of, and set him in a delight of lib-55 erty, whereby, with leaning to<sup>204</sup> his own wit,<sup>205</sup> he might reckon everything good or bad as himself would account it, which was the ready way to bring him to these heresies wherein he was now fallen.”

THE THIRD CHAPTER

The author showeth that men ought not to be light<sup>206</sup> in mistrusting of any judgment given in the court, and that much less ought any man to be bold in the reprovings<sup>207</sup> of a common law. And he showeth also the cause why that the law admitteth 65 more slight<sup>208</sup> witnesses in heinous criminal causes<sup>209</sup> than in slighter matters of covenants or contracts.

“Fallen?” quoth your friend. “What? Abide<sup>210</sup>—we be now gone over the stile<sup>211</sup> ere we come at<sup>212</sup> it.
 70 We be yet in question whether it were righteously judged that he was fallen in them or not. For I think it no sin to doubt thereof yet till I hear how the matter<sup>213</sup> was proved.”

“Indeed,” quoth I, “that is, as ye say, the matter 75 whereof we first have to talk. And yet if ye never heard further therein but that he was judged faulty,<sup>214</sup> although<sup>215</sup> ye had ever accounted the man in your own mind for very virtuous and of right belief, yet since he cannot be good except<sup>216</sup> more 80 men than he be naught,<sup>217</sup> whom ye ought no more to misdeem<sup>218</sup> than him—and specially his judges, which<sup>219</sup> are elected and chosen for indifferent,<sup>220</sup>

184 doughy; underdone 185 And if:
 Even if 186 middle way 187 quickly
 188 think 189 sometimes; here and there 190 Perhaps 191 so were it need: that would be necessary 192 But 193 question 194 are accustomed 195 overly fearful 196 Jer 48:10 197 would have 198 state (of soul) 199 See Acts 20:9–12. 200 by 201 is necessary 202 except 203 grown 204 on 205 mind 206 quick 207 criticizing 208 unreliable 209 heinous criminal causes: trials for the most serious crimes 210 Wait 211 steps or the like allowing passage over or through a fence 212 ere . . .

at: before we get to 213 subject of litigation 214 guilty 215 even if 216 unless 217 bad; wicked 218 think ill of 219 who 220 (being) impartial and which without likelihood of lucre<sup>221</sup> or loss be set to consider, examine, and by their judgment order the cause<sup>222</sup> of another man, whereas the parties may reasonably be more mistrusted themselves, both the accuser, which<sup>223</sup> may speak of<sup>224</sup> malice, and specially the party that is accused, which is well likely to lie for his defense in a matter of peril if he were proved guilty — ye therefore ought not to mistrust the judgment except<sup>225</sup> ye knew the matter untruly judged indeed, or by<sup>226</sup> very good and substantial folk that were present and indifferent had plain and sure information thereof.”

“Marry,” quoth he, “men think that if any such information may serve, they have had enough thereof by men of wisdom, learning, and honesty, both by mouth and by writing, that were present at all the handling of the matter.”

“Well,” quoth I, “we shall let their wisdom and their learning alone. But as for their honesty, shall<sup>227</sup> somewhat show itself upon the truth or untruth of their report. Wherein first I pray you, could they say that he was not convicted by as many witnesses, and as good and as credible, as the law requireth?”

“So many,” quoth he, “and such, as the law requireth? Would God,” quoth he, “that we could as easily find good men and true as we may find so many such.<sup>228</sup> For the law doth, as I hear say, require but twain,<sup>229</sup> and yet in cause<sup>230</sup> of heresy careth not much how bad they be — not though<sup>231</sup> they be heretics themselves. And is not this a wondrous case, that whereas in a matter of a little money, no law receiveth<sup>232</sup> any witnesses but honest and credible, the law made by the Church should in so great a matter — so highly touching<sup>233</sup> the utter destruction of a man in body and goods, with a death the most painful that can be devised — admit and receive a person infamed,<sup>234</sup> and give faith and credence to an infidel, whom they have proved and re-proved false in his faith to God? Nor methinketh the excuse but very slender<sup>235</sup> that I have ere this heard in this point alleged for the Church: that such simple witnesses are admitted in heresy because the crime is so great and so odious that therefore it is worthy to be handled with the more rigor and the less favor.

And this thing will I well agree for good reason<sup>236</sup> in the punishment of the crime, when it is proved, but — ’fore God — not in hatred and persecution<sup>237</sup> of the person ere the crime be proved.

“But now, whereas they receive the witness of so slight<sup>238</sup> and false fellows for a proof, they pursue the person and not the crime. Whereas methinketh, on the other side, the more heinous, odious, and abominable that the crime is, the more slow should we be to believe it, and the more sure and plain proof should we have ere we should judge any man for so evil to commit it.”

“There is,” quoth I, “no doubt but that the world is so bad that there be many so naughty that they will be ready enough to bear false witness. And yet God forbid that it were so bad as ye say: that a man might sooner find such than good men and true. And also, though<sup>239</sup> the witnesses were false and would lie, yet when they be wisely and severally<sup>240</sup> examined, they can seldom so well make their tale before<sup>241</sup> but that their untruth shall in some part appear. And finally, the law bindeth not the judge so precisely<sup>242</sup> to the words of the witness but that it leaveth many things to be pondered and weighed by his wisdom. For it is in<sup>243</sup> a judge as it is in a physician, to whom there be many good books written able to give good light and instruction. And yet whoso<sup>244</sup> would so precisely bind him to his book that he should nothing<sup>245</sup> use the discretion of his brain, he should sometimes do full evil service.<sup>246</sup>

“And yet is it, as Aristotle saith, well done indeed to make the laws so sufficient that as few things as may shall remain and be left to the discretion of the judge, since that the common laws be commonly made by many more<sup>247</sup> than are the particular judges, and also many such as are as wise as judges.<sup>248</sup> And over<sup>249</sup> that, the laws be to the judges a sure and substantial shield, to defend and keep them from the hatred and obloquy<sup>250</sup> that else would follow their sentence on the one side or the other, were their judgments never so just. For men be so partial always to themselves that our heart ever thinketh the judgment wrong that wringeth<sup>251</sup> us to the worse. For be

221 gain 222 order the cause: settle the case 223 who 224 out of 225 unless 226 from 227 that will 228 such as the law requires 229 two 230 a case 231 even if 232 accepts 233 concerning 234 person infamed: convicted felon 235 flimsy 236 for good reason: to make good sense 237 prosecution 238 unreliable 239 even if 240 wisely and severally: astutely and separately 241 beforehand 242 strictly 243 with 244 whoever 245 not at all 246 do full

evil service: do him a disservice 247 more in number 248 See Rhetoric 1.1.7; Politics 3.16 249 besides 250 reproach 251 distresses it never so right, all reckon we wrong whereof we feel harm.

“But yet of all things specially the law should best content us, for that<sup>252</sup> it is furthest out of all cause
5 of suspicion. For whereas a judge meddleth with a matter present, and persons whom he seeth and knoweth—whereby there may percase<sup>253</sup> favor, hatred, hope, or dread, pity, cruelty, meed,<sup>254</sup> request, or some other affection incline him to disorder
10 himself in the matter—the laws always be made for the punishment of things only that are yet to come; and who shall fall in peril, the makers cannot tell. Haply<sup>255</sup> their foes; haply their friends; and (as men’s manners<sup>256</sup> be mutable) peradventure themselves—
15 for which cause, the makers of the law made by<sup>257</sup> the people in causes criminal can be but indifferent. And therefore I marvel the more, since that fault ye find now is not in the judges, but in the laws themselves, wherein ye think it evil<sup>258</sup> provided that, for<sup>259</sup>
20 the hatred of a heinous crime, the person peradventure innocent should fall in peril of a painful death by the taking of more slight<sup>260</sup> witness than would be taken for sufficient in a far slighter matter. Somewhat ye said<sup>261</sup> indeed if the hatred of the crime were 25 all the cause. But therein ye go far wide.<sup>262</sup> For the chief cause why that in heinous criminal cases—as<sup>263</sup> theft, murder, treason, and heresy—the law taketh such for witnesses as it will not accept in a matter of money or other contract made between two parties, 30 is for that else<sup>264</sup> all such crimes should pass forth unpunished—and thereby should the world swarm full of such mischievous<sup>265</sup> people—for lack of proof and trial in the matter, by cause that<sup>266</sup> those which go about such a heinous deed as coming once to 35 knowledge would bring them to a shameful death, do not use<sup>267</sup> commonly to take a notary and honest witness with them to make an instrument<sup>268</sup> thereof (as many men do, and all men may do, in a contract or covenant), but use to<sup>269</sup> do it by stealth, as covertly as they can. By reason whereof, reason moveth 40 and necessity compelleth (except<sup>270</sup> ye would have all go to nought)<sup>271</sup> to receive such records<sup>272</sup> as they

be wont<sup>273</sup> to make of their counsel,<sup>274</sup> which<sup>275</sup> be, as ye wot well, none but such as they be themselves.
And yet sometimes, which may seem more strange, 45 we be content, and reason would we so were, with the witness of the parties themselves. For if that ten thieves robbed four men at once in a wood, though all the goods that they take away were one common 50 purse of all four—and would<sup>276</sup> all ten, when they were taken, well and stiffly say nay<sup>277</sup>—yet were I their judge (since all witness serveth but only to induce a credence or credulity in the judges’ minds), I would not let<sup>278</sup> (except some other circumstance 55 withstood<sup>279</sup> it) to believe the four complainants,<sup>280</sup> in their own matter,<sup>281</sup> against all ten defendants. And albeit that percase a judge might be, in a contract made between two parties, induced in his own mind, without any doubt to the contrary, to give credence in such a point to the one party against the
60 other for the well-known troth<sup>282</sup> and honesty of the one and in the other party the contrary, yet doth the law, through<sup>283</sup> the world almost, prohibit him so to proceed in a civil case, lest they should bring that form of judgment in custom<sup>284</sup> wherein, for lucre ensuing to the party, there were occasion to corrupt the judge—and also forasmuch as that fashion were, in a civil case, clean<sup>285</sup> without necessity, since the parties may if they list<sup>286</sup> for the surety of their bargains,<sup>287</sup> have writing<sup>288</sup> or good witnesses
65 thereat. Which if they list not for to do—either for folly, sloth, or trust—good reason is<sup>289</sup> that it rather turn themselves to loss than, for the redressing of their oversight, to bring in place that form and fashion of judgment that may be the cause of 70 other men’s wrongful trouble. Whereas in heinous criminal causes neither is there always such cause of corruption—specially toward the condemnation<sup>290</sup> upon which side only falleth the fault and peril that ye speak of—and is also, as ye see, inevitable necessity for lack of possibility of other record and witness,<sup>291</sup> till ye provide that thieves and murderers will be content to take honest witnesses with them that may bear witness against them.”

252 for that: because 253 perhaps 254 bribery 255 maybe 256 morals
257 about 258 wrongly 259 on account of 260 unreliable 261 Somewhat ye said: i.e., There would be something to what you said 262 astray 263 such as 264 for that else: because otherwise 265 evil 266 by cause that: because 267 make it their practice 268 official written record 269 use to: usually 270 unless 271 go to nought: come to nothing 272 witnesses 273 accustomed 274 make of their counsel: take into their confidence 275 who 276 even if 277 say nay: deny it 278 hesitate 279 argued against 280 plaintiffs 281 suit 282 integrity; trustworthiness 283 throughout 284 in custom: into common practice 285 completely 286 wish 287 surety of their bargains:

security of their contracts 288 have writing: have them put in writing 289 good reason is: it makes good sense 290 toward the condemnation: favoring the conviction 291 record and witness:
witness and testimony

THE FOURTH CHAPTER

The author showeth upon what ground and cause the man was convicted, and also diverse other things not then brought in judgment,<sup>292</sup> whereby
 5 it may well appear that he was greatly guilty. And so he showeth incidentally wherefore it were not reason,<sup>293</sup> in a detection<sup>294</sup> of heresy, to suffer,<sup>295</sup> after the witnesses published<sup>296</sup> and the crime
 10 well proved, any new witnesses to be received for the party that is accused.

“Howbeit,<sup>297</sup> though this serve for such matters in general, yet for this one matter that we now speak of, we stand far in another case.<sup>298</sup> For this man was not convicted by the words of one or twain, but by 15 the oaths of one or twain above twenty, not such men as we now speak of—Lollards<sup>299</sup> and heretics—but honest men, and almost of all sorts: of religious folk, husbandmen, and gentlemen.”<sup>300</sup>

“Indeed,” quoth he, “to say the truth, I heard say

20 there were many witnesses. But I heard, again, that he offered to bring twice as many and that of such as were present as well as they, and stood as near as they, and understood as well as they, and slept no more at his preaching than a parson doth at his offering, and would depose<sup>301</sup> plainly for him.”

“Whether he said so or not,” quoth I, “that can I not tell you, but this I wot well: himself was well-learned in the law, and never could say that he was denied any favor that the law would grant. And

30 many a witness was there to whom he laid none exception,<sup>302</sup> nor could say the contrary but that they were at his sermons and heard him. And then, when he was so clearly convicted by so many, so honest, and so far from all suspicion of corruption, it were peradventure a thing not convenient,<sup>303</sup> after those witnesses published, to bring proofs<sup>304</sup> afresh upon the principal matter. For if it so should be, then should either the new proofs depose the same that the others did before, or else they should depose the

292 brought in judgment: considered during the trial 293 reasonable 294 accusation 295 allow 296 publicly named 297 However 298 situation 299 followers of John Wycliffe (ca. 1324–84) 300 religious . . . gentlemen: members of religious orders, farmers, and persons of rank 301 testify 302 laid none

exception: made no objection 303 appropriate 304 witnesses 305 make nor mar: help nor hurt 306 trial 307 one stay: the same impasse 308 allegeable ground 309 were also well remembered: also clearly remembered 310 for that 311 verdict 312 clear or doubtful: clearly or possibly 313 clear; exonerate; acquit 314 guilty further than we were before, and that time lost and the matter<sup>306</sup> delayed in vain. If they did the third—deposing percase that themselves were not present, or asleep, or not well understood or not well remembered the matter—yet were we still at one stay.<sup>307</sup> Put now the second point (which were, in manner, the only thing that might seem to have any color<sup>308</sup> for him): that the new proofs would depose that they were at the same time present, and stood near him, marked him well, and were also well remembered<sup>309</sup> that he said not so—yea, and peradventure that he said the contrary. This case were possible; but surely it were so seldom likely that it were not worth to change a law therefor.<sup>310</sup> But now if it so should happen, here were a great confusion. And how could any sentence<sup>311</sup> be given if they should believe the second as well as the first?”

“That maketh,” quoth he, “no matter. For if the matter appear upon his side thereby—either clear or doubtful<sup>312</sup>—then may the judges acquit and assoil<sup>313</sup> the defendant. And better were it the faulty<sup>314</sup> to be quit<sup>315</sup> than the faultless to be punished.”

“It were a strange thing,” quoth I, “if the law should, in such a matter as this is, after the witnesses once published,<sup>316</sup> and thereby the matter well proved, then examine other witnesses afresh upon the principal point. This were in my mind perilous, not only for fear of subornation<sup>317</sup> and false instruction of witnesses (a thing easy to be done upon the sight of that that is deposed<sup>318</sup> already before), but also for that<sup>319</sup> if the affirmative be proved—especially in this case of heresy, being by so many sufficiently proved, that one taught and preached such things in his open<sup>320</sup> sermons—if others that were present at the same sermons would now depose the contrary, it may be that the first heard the thing which the second marked not, as many times it happeth. And more likely is it also that one may forget the thing that he heard, than that another should remember that thing that he heard not. And if they would peradventure add thereto that he said the contrary of such things as was proved<sup>321</sup> against him, then can it at the best be no better taken than

315 acquitted 316 once published: have already publicly testified 317 procuring for the purpose of giving false testimony 318 that that is deposed: what is testified 319 for that: because 320 public 321 established; demonstrated that he in one sermon said, taught, and preached both twain:<sup>322</sup> that is to wit,<sup>323</sup> the truth and the heresies. In which case, he well were worthy in judgment to acknowledge his fault<sup>324</sup> and be corrected therefor.”<sup>325</sup>

“By my troth,” quoth he, “yet methinketh ever that it ought to be heard, all that any man will say, and take all to the best for him that is accused—and specially in heresy pretended<sup>326</sup> to be preached where so many be present.”

“Surely,” quoth I, “what were best, God wotteth, for I cannot tell. But this wot I well: that the wit<sup>327</sup> of the whole world, in effect, agreeth that in all such heinous crimes, reason is clear<sup>328</sup> to the contrary and quite against your mind.<sup>329</sup> And where ye think your mind worthy to take special place in the proof and examination of heresies, surely meseemeth that of all crimes, in heresy might it least be suffered.<sup>330</sup> For well ye wot that heresies be false belief and factious ways full of business.<sup>331</sup> And such as give themselves thereto be sturdy<sup>332</sup> and studious<sup>333</sup> about the furtherance of their seditious sect. And since they be fallen from God and his true faith, they have no great care of truth, nor be very scrupulous in the lending of an oath till they need in like case<sup>334</sup> to be paid again.<sup>335</sup> So that if their ‘nay’ may stand against other good men’s ‘yea,’ and where the heresy is proved to have been preached, there men may be heard and believed in deposing<sup>336</sup> the contrary, the false preacher may be bold to say what him list.<sup>337</sup> For he shall never fail to have his records<sup>338</sup> ready.”

“Yea,” quoth he, “but this way would not serve him. For men might take exception to them if they were heretics.”

“Nay,” quoth I, “not if they be so, but if they be proved so. And that shall they never be if your way were received.<sup>339</sup> For each of their witnesses shall always serve other.”

“Forsooth,”<sup>340</sup> quoth he, “it seemeth somewhat perilous, as ye say, if men should, against the affirmative proved, lean to<sup>341</sup> the contrary witnesses for the negative in any crime that is seditious and hath daily folk of evil conscience fervently fall in thereto. But yet I much marvel of one thing. For I have heard it credibly reported that there were twain, and both benefited<sup>342</sup> men, both very cunning<sup>343</sup> men, both twain very virtuous men, which<sup>344</sup> heard him preach as well as they did that had deposed against him. And those twain affirmed, and offered to depose, that he preached not the things which he was accused of. And surely, had I been judge, I would have believed those twain above other twenty, except witnesses be taken only by number and not by weight.”

“Surely,” quoth I, “my mind and yours be not far asunder. For since all witnesses serve to induce the judge’s mind to conceive a credence and an opinion—or rather a certain persuasion—on the one side,<sup>345</sup> I could not myself but believe some twain better than some twenty, and would not fail to weigh them, rather than take them by tale.<sup>346</sup> Howbeit,” quoth I, “of those twain that ye speak of, the one was indeed such as ye say. But as for the other, was neither then holden very clear,<sup>347</sup> and since that time proved clearly naught.<sup>348</sup> But though<sup>349</sup> the one was, as he was indeed, a very good man, yet for the man’s excuse<sup>350</sup> he was no very good witness; nor the other neither, although<sup>351</sup> he had been as good a man as he; nor if they had been forty men more, as good as the better of them both, saying as they did.”

“Why?” quoth he, “Said they not well for him?”

“Yes,” quoth I, “for as far as they went; but they went not far enough.”

“Ah,” quoth he, “their words were of likelihood narrowly taken.”

“They were,” quoth I, “taken as large<sup>352</sup> as they were spoken, which was that he preached not such heresies in a place where they heard him in London. But then was his detection,<sup>353</sup> and the proof made thereupon, of<sup>354</sup> those heresies preached at sundry places out<sup>355</sup> of London—whereby their words went as wide for his excuse<sup>356</sup> as if one that were arraigned for a felony done at Salisbury on Shrove Tuesday<sup>357</sup> brought in good witnesses to the bar that would depose<sup>358</sup> and swear for him that he did no such felony at Shrewsbury on Sheer Thursday,<sup>359</sup> for

322 of them two 323 say 324 guilt
325 corrected therefor: punished for it 326 alleged 327 mind; intellect, reason 328 completely 329 opinion
330 allowed 331 trouble 332 strong; hard to manage; impetuously brave; violent 333 eager; intent 334 situation 335 back 336 testifying 337 what him list: whatever he wishes 338 witnesses 339 accepted 340 In truth 341 lean to: side with; believe 342 in possession of a paid church position 343 intelligent 344 who 345 on the one side: on the one side or the other 346 count 347 holden very clear:

considered very convincing 348 bad 349 even if 350 exoneration 351 even if 352 broadly 353 his detection: the accusation made against him 354 about 355 outside 356 wide for his excuse: far astray for the purpose of exonerating him 357 Shrove Tuesday: the day before Ash Wednesday 358 testify 359 Sheer Thursday: Holy Thursday

they were with him there all that day themselves. But for conclusion he was convicted by more than twenty, and excused by never one. And therefore if his judges wronged him, there was never man had right.<sup>360</sup> And yet were there, besides the witnesses, some letters written of his own hand unto one of his judges — which letters I have since seen — sounding, in mine ears, to<sup>361</sup> as evil heresies as those were that he was detected<sup>362</sup> of. Which letters were never laid into the Court<sup>363</sup> till that, after the proofs published<sup>364</sup> and read, he appeared obstinate, standing still in the denial and proudly refusing to submit himself to his abjuration.<sup>365</sup> For then said his judge, to whom they were written, that since he refused to be reconciled to the Church, he would keep no counsel of his, and therewith brought in those letters and filed them among the records of the Court.

“This man had also been, before that, accused unto the greatest prelate<sup>366</sup> in this realm, who, for his tender favor borne to the university, did not proceed far in the matter<sup>367</sup> against him. But accepting his denial, with a corporal oath<sup>368</sup> that he should, from that time forth, be no setter-forth of heresies, but in his preachings and readings<sup>369</sup> impugn them, dismissed him very benignly, and of his liberal bounty gave him also money for his costs. And yet was none of all these matters laid unto his charge. Which if they had been, would peradventure have put him to peril.

“I was also myself, since his abjuration, present (as it happed) with an honorable prelate at such time as one that was an ancient<sup>370</sup> heretic had been examined, and there had confessed that he had held, taught, and in diverse countries spread about almost all the heresies that any lewd<sup>371</sup> heretic holdeth.”

“May ye not tell his name?” quoth he.

“Which of them?” quoth I. “For he had more names than half a leaf can hold.”

“Where dwelled he?” quoth your friend.

“Everywhere and nowhere,” quoth I. “For he walked about, as an apostle of the devil, from shire to shire and town to town through the realm, and had in every diocese a diverse name. By reason whereof he did many years much harm ere he could be found out. This heretic, touching<sup>372</sup> all his other heresies, he acknowledged them in conclusion to be naught,<sup>373</sup> and offered to abjure them. But as for despising of images, relics, and pilgrimages, those things, he said, were none heresies, but very good and true points;<sup>374</sup> for he heard them preached, he said, of<sup>375</sup> the ‘great doctor,’ naming the man we speak of, and told where, confessing also that he liked so well his sermons that he letted<sup>376</sup> not to go twenty miles to hear him. And yet was there since that another heretic that confessed for his own part the like. So that ye may see that good Christian folk were offended with his preaching, and heretics liked his preaching, and grounded their heresies upon his preaching. And then look you what manner of preaching it was likely to be.

“I told you also, right now, that one of those two that ye took for so good and cunning<sup>377</sup> men was after founden worse than many men would have weened.<sup>378</sup> Sir, so was it indeed that he was detected for buying of many books of Luther, Lambert,<sup>379</sup> and Zwingli, with others of that sort — and well proved, and by himself also confessed, that he had bought of those books very many — which he brought forth at last, where he had laid them up no less suspiciously than secretly, and so secretly that all the town should have sought them long ere they should have found them out.

“He had also set a priest of his, and a secular servant of his besides, to buy many of the same suit,<sup>380</sup> and double and treble of one sort,<sup>381</sup> which were by them uttered<sup>382</sup> to diverse young scholars such as they found properly witted,<sup>383</sup> feately<sup>384</sup> learned, and newfangled minded, and thus labored to corrupt the realm. Another parish priest had he before, that kept his cure<sup>385</sup> also, as this other did, which<sup>386</sup> was after proved a very pernicious heretic.”

“But what was,” quoth he, “done to the master?”<sup>387</sup>

“Forsooth,” quoth I, “great favor had he — and as some men said, great wrong too — that he was not openly declared.<sup>388</sup> Howbeit, because he was in good estimation,<sup>389</sup> there was of<sup>390</sup> pity much regard had

360 justice 361 to describe 362 accused 363 laid into the Court: entered into Court records 364 proofs published: testimonies (had been) publicly announced 365 formal renunciation on oath 366 greatest prelate: highest-ranking clergyman 367 case 368 corporal oath: an oath made solemn by touching a sacred object, like a Bible or a relic 369 scriptural expositions 370 longtime 371 evil 372 regarding 373 wicked 374 true points: valid positions 375 by 376 hesitated 377 intelligent 378 thought 379 Francis Lambert (1486–1530), Professor at the University of Marburg 380 kind 381 double and treble of one sort:

two and three sets of one same collection 382 sold; given out 383 intelligent 384 suitably 385 kept his cure: fulfilled his pastoral responsibilities 386 who 387 leader 388 openly declared: publicly charged 389 in good estimation: held in high esteem 390 out of

to the conservation of his honesty.<sup>391</sup> And nothing was there, in effect, exacted of him but his amendment, with the acknowledging of his fault. For surely that man was of such a poor spirit in Christ that, for any oath that could be given<sup>392</sup> him, long it was ere pride would, for shame, suffer<sup>393</sup> him to say the truth. After which, once confessed with his handwriting then — as far as I have heard, without any other abjuration — there was secretly<sup>394</sup> his solemn oath taken in judgment<sup>395</sup> that he should do no such thing anymore, upon pain of a relapse,<sup>396</sup> and so with certain secret penance dismissed. But the thing that I tell you my tale for is this. This man — besides that all the books in effect which he had bought of this Lutheran sect were diligently read over and studied, and with such manner of notes marked in the margin, and words written of his own hand where the worst matters were, that he left no man in doubt that read them what fervent affection he bore unto them — he had, I say, besides all this, diverse epistles (I wot nere<sup>397</sup> whose, but written were they with his own hand) wherein were plenty of pestilent heresies, and a sermon also, worse than they all, written with his own hand also, ready to be preached, as it seemed, if the world would so change that the time would serve<sup>398</sup> it. And when he was in his examination sore<sup>399</sup> pressed upon to tell for what intent he made such a sermon ready and laid it up so secretly, destitute at last of all excuses that might bear any color<sup>400</sup> of any good cause, ‘Well,’ quoth he, ‘I see well I must tell all. I am loath to hurt anybody.’ And thereupon he told how it was made, the most part, by the man that was abjured of whom we specially speak. So that, now setting all this gear<sup>401</sup> together — this man’s confession, his secret<sup>402</sup> friend and companion in such matters, his old accusations of like matters, the heretics’ confessions that<sup>403</sup> founded their heresies in the same matters upon the authority of his sermon, and besides all this, more than twenty witnesses plainly proving the matter against him — I would fain wit<sup>404</sup> who had right if he had wrong, although<sup>405</sup> there had been used to<sup>406</sup> him more rigor<sup>407</sup> a great deal than there was.”

391 good name; reputation 392 administered to 393 allow 394 privately 395 adjudication 396 i.e., into heresy (with the resultant punishment) 397 wot nere: know not 398 be right for 399 greatly 400 semblance 401 matter 402 close 403 who 404 fain wit: like to know 405 even if

406 on 407 severity 408 ecclesiastical 409 renunciation of his heresy 410 authorities 411 offense 412 bundle of sticks (Those who renounced heresy carried the wood in public that would have been used to burn them if they had not abjured.) 413 had liefer: would rather 414 around 415 the first time: a first offense 416 otherwise 417 receive him: take him back 418 for a 419 willing 420 sufferance of: permission for 421 resort unto: visit 422 scarcely 423 renounced 424 accustomed 425 to die therefor: even if the refusal would mean his death

THE FIFTH CHAPTER

The author proveth that the spiritual<sup>408</sup> judges did the man marvelous favor — and almost more than lawful — in that they admitted him to such an abjuration<sup>409</sup> as they did, and that they did not rather leave him to the secular hands.<sup>410</sup> 45

“Why,” quoth he, “what devil rigor could they more have showed for the first time<sup>411</sup> than make him abjure and bear a faggot?”<sup>412</sup> 50

“Yes,” quoth I, “some man had liefer<sup>413</sup> bear twain cold in<sup>414</sup> his neck than have one bear him hot, on a fire at his feet.” 55

“In faith,” quoth he, “they could not have done that to him at the first time.”<sup>415</sup>

“No,” quoth I, “not if he willingly returned to the Church, acknowledging his fault, and ready to abjure all heresies, and penitently submitted himself to penance. And else<sup>416</sup> if he prove himself obstinate and impenitent, the Church neither is bounden nor ought to receive him,<sup>417</sup> but utterly may forsake him and leave him to the secular hands. But now was he so obstinate that he would not abjure of<sup>418</sup> long time. And diverse days were his judges fain,<sup>419</sup> of their favor, to give him — with sufferance of<sup>420</sup> some his best friends, and whom he most trusted, to resort unto<sup>421</sup> him. And yet scanty<sup>422</sup> could all this make him submit himself to make his abjuration. And finally were they fain, for saving of his life, to devise a form of abjuration whereof I never saw the like — nor in so plain a case never would, were I the judge, suffer the like hereafter.” 60 65 70 75

“What manner of abjuration was that?” quoth he.

“Marry,” quoth I, “his abjuration was such that he therein abjured and forswore<sup>423</sup> all heresies, acknowledging himself lawfully convicted. But whereas they be wont<sup>424</sup> to confess in their own abjuration that they have holden such heresies, and be guilty thereof, that would he do in no wise; but, as clearly as his fault was proved, and by as many, yet would he not — to die therefor<sup>425</sup> — confess himself faulty, but 85 always stood still upon it,<sup>426</sup> in virtue of his oath,<sup>427</sup> that all they belied<sup>428</sup> him.”

“It might happen,” quoth he, “that he had forgotten that he so had preached.”

5 “That were,” quoth I, “great wonder. For I am sure, when he had preached so in so many places, he had not done it of a sudden adventure,<sup>429</sup> but of a deliberate purpose—which, except<sup>430</sup> he fell mad, it were not well possible for him in so great a matter to forget. And besides this, it was also deposed<sup>431</sup>

10 that in a place where he preached, he was after the sermon reasoned withal forthwith,<sup>432</sup> and by an honest layman had it laid unto his charge<sup>433</sup> that he had perilously preached, showing him wherein.

15 Whereunto he made answer, not that he had not said so, nor that he had not meant so, or that they had mistaken and wrongly understood his words, but that he would preach there again soon after, and prove his preaching true by the old doctors<sup>434</sup> of the 20 Church. And this happed<sup>435</sup> him not long before that he was accused. Was it now possible, by your faith,<sup>436</sup> that he could have forgot this?”

“It was,” quoth he, “possible enough that altogether<sup>437</sup> was false, and that they lied all. For so

25 might they do by possibility, being but men, and though<sup>438</sup> they had been more than they were. And then he, peradventure knowing that they so did, why should he falsely confess a fault in himself for<sup>439</sup> the falsehood of other folk?”

30 “That is,” quoth I, “true if he so knew it. But how could that be so, against so many proofs<sup>440</sup> sworn and deposing the matter upon their oaths, being, though they were but men, yet men of wit<sup>441</sup> and honesty; and some well-learned also; and men that

35 bore him no displeasure for any other matter than his evil preaching; men almost all such as could have none other matter to<sup>442</sup> him; folk that never had other matter with him; and many of them of little acquaintance, or none, the one with the other,

40 so that there was no fear of conspiring together in one tale?”

“Yet,” quoth he, “were it possible that they might lie all.”

“And what,”<sup>443</sup> quoth I, “that he had been accused in other places before—as he was indeed not only 45 to the most honorable prelate that I told you,<sup>444</sup> but besides him unto two other bishops too?”

“Well,” quoth he, “and yet they that so accused him might happen to lie too.”

“And what,” quoth I, “that his own secret<sup>445</sup> acquaintance confessed that he made the first draft of that ungracious<sup>446</sup> sermon that I told you?”

“Heard you that yourself?” quoth he.

“Myself,” quoth I, “nay; but such as I heard it of were men of more worship<sup>447</sup> and truth thereto 55 than that any man, I ween, would mistrust their tale.”

“As worshipful as they were,” quoth he, “and as trusty, too, I could mistrust their tale well enough sometimes for lack of indifferency,<sup>448</sup> peradventure 60 as they stood unsworn.<sup>449</sup> And yet though I mistrusted not them all, it might be that they said true, and that the other lied, which<sup>450</sup> for his own excuse<sup>451</sup> laid the first making of that sermon to the other man.”

“The laying thereof to him,” quoth I, “could not excuse himself. For he confessed that himself liked it and allowed<sup>452</sup> it, and therefore wrote it out, and added also many things more thereto.”

“Well,” quoth he, “and yet all this might be.”

“And what,” quoth I, “of the heretics that grounded their opinions upon his sermons?”

“May it not be,” quoth he, “that they lied?”

“And what,” quoth I, “of them that accused him to other prelates before?”

“By God,” quoth he, “even as I told you before, it might be that they lied, well enough.”

“And what then,” quoth I, “of all those twenty that deposed against him now?”

“Marry,” quoth he, “as I told you now, it might be 80 that they did even the same.”

“This is,” quoth I, “a strange thing to me.”

“Why,” quoth he, “should this be strange to you? Methinketh it should be strange to no man, but very plain to every man, that it might be so. For I 85 pray<sup>453</sup> you, might it not so be? Were it not possible that they might all lie, and though<sup>454</sup> they were as many more?”

426 stood still upon it: kept maintaining 427 in virtue of his oath: under oath 428 slandered 429 chance 430 unless 431 testified 432 immediately 433 laid unto his charge: charged against him 434 old doctors: early theologians

435 happened to 436 by your faith: do you truly believe 437 the whole thing 438 even if 439 on account of 440 witnesses 441 intelligence 442 with 443 what about the fact 444 told you:
told you about 445 personal, close

446 devoid of grace; wicked 447 reputation 448 impartiality 449 peradventure . . . stood unsworn: perhaps as they were not under oath 450 who 451 exoneration 452 approved of 453 ask 454 and though: even if

“Possible?” quoth I. “That<sup>455</sup> I say not nay, but that it were possible though they were a thousand times as many.”

“Well,” quoth he, “since it might be so, then put case<sup>456</sup> it was so. Did not he right then in that he still said<sup>457</sup> so? And if he had died therein, had he not died for the truth? For knowing in himself that all they belied him, he was not bound to belie himself with them, and confess against himself an untruth, but had been in great sin if he so should have done. What say ye to this?”

“I say,” quoth I, “to this that all the force and effect of your conclusion hangeth upon the case which ye put: that all that ever aught<sup>458</sup> said or deposed against him lied, all the many. Which case ye would needs have granted because it was possible. And then, that case once granted, ye deduce your conclusion very surely. And in good faith, ye bring me therewith so to my wit’s end that I wot not well which way to answer you, admitting your case. But ever my mind giveth me that your case, though it be possible, were rather to be granted at a school<sup>459</sup> in argument than at a court in judgment.<sup>460</sup> And I pray you for the proof thereof let me put you another case, which, in good faith, I am half ashamed to put you, saving that ye drive me to seek a shift.<sup>461</sup> And yet shall not my case, in my mind, be much unlike to yours. If it so were that Wilkins had laid a wager with Simkins that in a certain way named<sup>462</sup> between them (usual enough for men and horses both) there had gone of late a horse or two, and that he would so clearly prove it that it could not be the contrary. If Simkins said and laid his wager the contrary, and then they both should choose us for judges, and we coming all four into the way,<sup>463</sup> Wilkins would show us on the ground, part in the clay and part peradventure in the snow, the prints of horse-feet, and of men’s feet also, by a long way (ten miles together, and<sup>464</sup> ye will), till they come at<sup>465</sup> a water whereas<sup>466</sup> went away by ship, no man can tell who nor whither (it forceth<sup>467</sup> not for our wise case). But now, if Wilkins would say that he had won his wager — ‘For lo, here ye see the prints of the horse-feet all this way shown, and all with the very nails in them, so that it may be none otherwise but horse hath gone here’ — if Simkins, after all this, would say the wager were his — ‘For it is not proved that any horse had gone there; for it might be that they were geldings, or mares’ — here were we fallen in a great question of the law: whether the gray mare may be the better horse or not, or whether he have a wise face or not that looketh as like a fool as a ewe looketh like a sheep. And in this question, if the parties demurred in<sup>468</sup> our judgment, we might ask advice further of learned men and judges.”

“We might,” quoth he, “by suit,<sup>469</sup> to be sure of the matter, make it a Chequer Chamber<sup>470</sup> case. Or, saving the Praemunire,<sup>471</sup> we might have it tried in the Rota<sup>472</sup> at Rome.”

“Very well,” quoth I, “so that I see well by your wit<sup>473</sup> and mine together, one shift or other we should find for a final end therein, if the doubt were in that point. But now if<sup>474</sup> Simkins sticked not thereto,<sup>475</sup> but would say thus: ‘Lo, here ye see the men have gone this way; and how can ye then be sure that any horse went here? For I put case,’ saith he, ‘that these men which went here had horseshoes in their hands, made fast upon long steels,<sup>476</sup> and always as they went pricked them down hard in the ground.’”

“Tut,” quoth he, “this were a wise invention.”

“Verily,” quoth I, “to me it would not seem very gay.<sup>477</sup> But now if Simkins were contentious and would say the wager were his except<sup>478</sup> it be so proved that it can be none otherwise but that horses have of late gone there, and then will say to us, ‘Lo, sirs, as ye see it, it may be otherwise. For men might make with their hands all the prints of horseshoes in the ground.’ And then if we would say that was never so, he would ask us how can we be sure thereof, while we cannot say nay but<sup>479</sup> it might be so, and then would still press upon us with this question: ‘May it not be so?’”

“It may,” quoth he, “by possibility be so.”

455 to that 456 put case: suppose (for the sake of argument that) 457 still said: continued to say 458 that ever aught: who ever anything 459 university 460 a trial 461 stragem 462 in... named: along a certain path specified 463 into the way: onto the path 464 if 465 to 466 at which 467 matters 468 demurred in: took exception to 469 bringing suit 470 Chequer Chamber: The Court of Exchequer Chamber was the highest regular court in England. Its decisions could be appealed only to the House of Lords. 471 saving the Praemunire: except that it would violate the Statute of Praemunire (1393). This statute forbade British subjects from appealing any legal decisions to any foreign person or body. It specifically applied to appeals made to Church courts in Rome. 472 highest court of the Catholic Church 473 intelligence 474 what if 475 sticked not thereto: did not make an issue of that 476 made fast upon long steels: fastened to long steel poles 477 humorous 478 unless 479 say nay but: deny that “Then,” quoth I, “when we grant him once that it may be so, then will he by and by put case<sup>480</sup> that it were so. And then, if we grant him his case once for the possibility, then will he shortly conclude that the other part<sup>481</sup> is not so surely proved as it must be if Wilkins should<sup>482</sup> win the wager. What should we say to him now? To whom should we give the wager?”

“In faith,” quoth he, “I wot nere<sup>483</sup> what to say to him. And the matter is so mad that, as for the wager, what I would give Wilkins I wot nere, but as for Simkins, except<sup>484</sup> he better impugned the proof, if the wager were but a butterfly, I would never award him one wing.”

“Surely,” quoth I, “and you shall rule the matter for me. For if ye give him nought,<sup>485</sup> he getteth as little of me. But now what if he wax<sup>486</sup> angry that his proper invention were no more set by,<sup>487</sup> nor his wit no more regarded, and would thereupon help forth his part with his oath, and swear upon a book<sup>488</sup> that himself saw when the men made those prints in the ground with horseshoes holden in their hands? What would ye then say?”

“Marry” quoth he, “then would I say — and swear too — that besides the loss of his wager, he had like a false foolish knave lost his honesty<sup>489</sup> and his soul too.”

“In good faith,” quoth I, “and for aught<sup>490</sup> I see yet, I durst be bold to swear with you. And then, letting Wilkins alone with Simkins disputing their sophism themselves, let us return home again to our own matter. In which, while there were so many so clear and open proofs<sup>491</sup> against the man of whom we speak all this while, though it were possible that all they might be false, yet could there none indifferent<sup>492</sup> judge so think, except<sup>493</sup> it were so proved — and that by other means than the only<sup>494</sup> oath of the party that is accused, swearing alone against them all.”

“Yet,” quoth he, “for all that, if he know indeed that he did it not, he doth but well to abide by the truth.”

“Very sooth<sup>495</sup> ye say,” quoth I. “Nor Simkins,

neither, if he saw the men print the horseshoes in the highway, though it seemed us never so unlikely, yet had he done well enough to say it, and swear it too, and stiffly to stick thereby. And yet ye remember, pardie,<sup>496</sup> that if he so would have sworn, ye and I both durst<sup>497</sup> right now right boldly have believed that he lied. And might we not well believe the same in our case too?”

“Yes,” quoth he, “that will I well.<sup>498</sup> And therefore the judges did him but right to reckon him as convicted, and therefore to compel him to abjure.<sup>499</sup> But yet they showed him therein no such favor as ye speak of, in that they admitted him to his abjuration without confessing of the fault.<sup>500</sup> For if they had forced him thereto, they had in my mind done him plain and open wrong, because it might be that he said and swore true. And then should they have forced him, against his conscience, to say of himself untrue. And that should they do, not only clean<sup>501</sup> against right, but also without necessity, considering that they might — as in conclusion they did — abjure him otherwise. And therefore they took the best way, both for him and for themselves also. But since they did therein none otherwise than as they were of duty bounden, it well appeareth he had therein no such favor as ye would make it seem that they showed him.”

“Well,” quoth I, “since yourself agreeth that he had no wrong, albeit<sup>502</sup> no favor had been showed him, yet were your errand<sup>503</sup> answered as far as toucheth his abjuration. And now if I should prove you that his judges showed him such favor, I fear me lest I should therewith somewhat seem to charge them that they had done, though not wrong, yet very near wrong — the favor appearing to be showed if not against the law, yet at the leastways, the law for<sup>504</sup> favor so far stretched forth that the leather could scant<sup>505</sup> hold. But yet choose they for me. For since I have said it, I will tell you why — and so much the more boldly between us twain, for that<sup>506</sup> I perceive not in you any such manner of mind toward them that ye would blow abroad<sup>507</sup> any fault of unlawful favor founden in them.”

480 by and by put case: immediately postulate 481 side (of the argument) 482 if Wilkins should: for Wilkins to 483 wot nere: know not 484 unless 485 nothing 486 grows 487 proper . . . by: excellent contrivance was no more valued 488 i.e.,

Bible 489 reputation 490 anything 491 testimonies 492 impartial 493 unless 494 the only: only the 495 truth 496 certainly; “by God” (from the French) 497 dared 498 well believe 499 renounce under oath 500 guilt

501 completely 502 even if 503 were your errand: would your relayed message 504 because of 505 hardly 506 for that: because 507 blow abroad: publicize

“Ah, well said,” quoth he, and laughed. “Ye ween I were more ready to report their rigor<sup>508</sup> than any point of their favor.”

“Well taken of you,” quoth I. “I see well a man cannot have a good opinion of you but your conscience construeth it to the contrary. But now for the matter, I trow<sup>509</sup> we be agreed both, that all were it<sup>510</sup> so that the man had been faultless indeed, yet were the proofs against him so many, so good, so clear and evident, and so much more than sufficient, that neither his judges nor ourselves neither — nor, I think, his own father neither if he had heard them — could have thought him other than very greatly guilty.”

“Surely,” quoth he, “that is true.”

“Now,” quoth I, “that being true that they could none otherwise reckon in<sup>511</sup> him though he still swore the contrary, must it not needs be that in his denying, in virtue of his oath,<sup>512</sup> the things which they could not but believe true, they must needs therewith believe him all that while to lie and be perjured?”

“That followeth,” quoth he.

“Now,” quoth I, “when one is accused and convicted of heresy, what thing will<sup>513</sup> the law that the Church shall receive him to?”

“What thing?” quoth he. “Marry, to mercy.”

“Nay,” quoth I, “mercy is the thing, as it seemeth, that they receive him by, not the thing that they receive him to.”

“Then is it,” quoth he, “to penance.”

“That seemeth well said,” quoth I. “For the Church, by mercy, receiveth him to penance.”

“But now,” quoth I, “doth the Church openly<sup>514</sup> receive to penance any person appearing and proving himself still impenitent?”

“Nay,” quoth he.

“Appareth not he still impenitent,” quoth I, “that still appareth perjured, and still standing in perjury? And where<sup>515</sup> the first part of penance is confession and humble acknowledging of the fault, can the Church reckon him penitent that still refuseth to confess his fault, that lieth falsely still, and falsely forswearth<sup>516</sup> himself?”

“The Church,” quoth he, “cannot surely<sup>517</sup> know whether he swear true or false, and therefore they cannot surely judge him forsworn. For it may be, by possibility, that all the witnesses lied.”

“It may be, too,” quoth I, “by possibility, if we go this way to work, that all the men lied that ever have said they came from Rome, and that all the briefs and bulls were feigned<sup>518</sup> that ever were supposed to be brought from thence, for aught<sup>519</sup> that he can tell that never came there himself. For some one man might lie, and some one bull or brief might be feigned, and so some other and one by one — and so forth — of all the remnant. For like possibility is there in every one as is in any one. And peradventure,<sup>520</sup> as for your own self, have never yet talked with twenty that have told you they have been at Rome.”

“No, no,” quoth he, “nor, I ween, with ten neither.”

“And how many bulls,” quoth I, “and briefs have ye seen that came thence?”

“By our Lady,” quoth he, “bulls very few, and briefs never none; for I never ask after them.”

“Then,” quoth I, “might you by your own reason as well doubt whether there were any Rome or no, as whether that man lied and were forsworn or no. But in this point I will not long stick<sup>521</sup> with you. For surely, standing the matter in such case<sup>522</sup> that his judges could not otherwise think of him but that he was faulty of things which he still in virtue of his oath denied — all were it<sup>523</sup> so that they might think therewith<sup>524</sup> that by possibility they might be in that mind deceived, yet while<sup>525</sup> they could not think, nor they could have none other mind,<sup>526</sup> but that he (though it might by possibility be true that<sup>527</sup> he swore) yet was forsworn in deed,<sup>528</sup> and in very deed persevered in perjury. Now the matter, I say, standing in such case, since he that with so plain appearing perjury standeth<sup>529</sup> in the denial of his fault and false defense of himself cannot be reckoned of his fault penitent, and unto penance ought none impenitent person to be admitted, I will not say that his judges did wrong. But surely methinketh I may well say that they showed him great favor in that they received him to penance without the confession of his fault. And I think verily it was a favorable<sup>530</sup> fashion of abjuration, and so strange

508 severity 509 trust 510 all were it: even if it were 511 regarding 512 in virtue of his oath: under oath 513 commands 514 publicly 515 given that 516 perjures 517 with certainty 518 forged

519 all 520 perhaps 521 keep arguing 522 standing... case: the situation being such 523 all were it: even if it were 524 also 525 as long as 526 opinion 527 what 528 was forsworn indeed: had lied under oath in truth 529 persists 530 beneficial (to him); showing partiality (on their part) that the like hath been very seldom seen, if ever it were seen before. And that did they in hope that God shall send him more grace in time to come, and so I beseech him to do. For, I promise you, for my part I never can conceive good hope of his amendment all the while that I see that pride abide still in his heart that cannot suffer<sup>531</sup> him for shame to confess his fault.”

THE SIXTH CHAPTER

10 The author showeth that the person abjured for his own worldly honesty,<sup>532</sup> and for the more fruit of his preaching — if he be suffered to preach in time to come — it were much better for him openly<sup>533</sup> and willingly to confess the truth. And that now
 15 by the standing still in the denial, he both shameth himself, and should, if he preached, slander the Word of God.

“It is,” quoth he, “peradventure better thus. For then should he slander himself — and the Word of God also, if he should hereafter preach again.”

20 “Nay, marry,” quoth I, “then should he rather deliver himself from slander, and the Word of God also. For then should every man see the devil cast clean<sup>534</sup> out of his heart, and hope that he should 25 be from thenceforth a very good man. Where now, thinking him to persevere in a proud perjury, we can none other think but that he must needs be very naught<sup>535</sup> still, though we should hereafter hear him preach never so well. And that were a sore<sup>536</sup>
 30 slander to the Word of God, that men should see him, whom they hear preach well, so proud a hypocrite, and therewith so foolish too, that for a false hope of his own estimation<sup>537</sup> preserved, he labor-eth as much as in him is<sup>538</sup> to make the world ween that twenty true men were forsworn<sup>539</sup> against him. Wherein while<sup>540</sup> there is no man so mad<sup>541</sup> to believe him, he loseth (if he preach in this plight)<sup>542</sup> all his whole purpose, and winneth nothing but the contrary: that is, double shame of his proud perjury 35 and high malicious mind, instead of the praise that he looketh and preacheth for.”

THE SEVENTH CHAPTER

The messenger moveth a question: if a man be sworn by a judge to say the truth of himself in a crime whereof he is had<sup>543</sup> suspect, whether he may not lawfully<sup>544</sup> on his oath swear untruth, where he thinketh the truth cannot be proved against him. Whereunto the author answereth that he is bounden upon peril of perjury to say and confess truth. And the much more sin and folly both was it, then, for the man that thus was abjured to forswear himself in the thing that he wist<sup>545</sup> well would be proved, and a shameless folly to stand still by his perjury when he saw the matter so clearly proved indeed. And with this finisheth he the matter of his abjuration. 45 50 55

“In good faith,” quoth he, “I begin in this matter to be of your mind. For the matter being so plain and clearly proved, it was and is both sin and folly to stand in the denying. But there cometh a thing in my mind, though it be somewhat out of our matter,<sup>546</sup> wherein I would be glad to hear what ye think.”

“What thing is that?” quoth I.

60 “Marry,” quoth he, “I have heard some well-learned men say if a man were accused of a fault that were true indeed, yet if it be secret<sup>547</sup> and cannot be proved, in an oath put unto him he may, and ought, to swear nay, because that<sup>548</sup> of secret and unknown things no man can be his judge. For only God is judge of man’s heart. And if he should confess it where he needeth not, before no competent judge — that is to wit,<sup>549</sup> his secret fault openly before men, whereof only God is judge — then should he defame himself; and that were great sin. For Holy Scripture saith, Curam habe de bono nomine (‘Take heed of thy good name.’)<sup>550</sup> Et melior est nomen bonum quam divitie multe (‘Better is a good name than much riches’).<sup>551</sup> And it saith also, Maledictus homo qui negligit famam suam (‘Accursed is that man that careth not what men say of him’).<sup>552</sup> And therefore I have heard some well-learned men say that in this case a man may boldly deny the matter<sup>553</sup> upon his oath, be it never so true, so that<sup>554</sup> it be so secret as it be not able to be proved by witnesses.”

531 allow 532 reputation 533 publicly 534 completely 535 wicked 536 serious 537 reputation 538 as much . . . him is:
 as hard as he can 539 were forsworn:
 committed perjury 540 Wherein

while: About which since 541 so mad:
 so insane as 542 state 543 held 544 morally 545 knew 546 out of our matter: outside our subject matter 547 hidden; private 548 because that:

because 549 say 550 Ecclus 41:15
 551 Prv 22:1 552 This verse is not in the Vulgate. 553 charge 554 so that: as long as

“Forsooth,” quoth I, “it is a large and a long matter to speak of perjury. But as for this point, I hold it in my mind little question. For I hold this once<sup>555</sup> for a sure and an infallible conclusion: that a man may never lawfully be forsworn.<sup>556</sup> Marry, truth it is that a man’s oath receiveth<sup>557</sup> interpretation, and is not always bounden precisely to the words, as if a judge would swear me generally<sup>558</sup> in a court to make true answer to such things as should be asked of me, and after mine oath given, he would ask me certain questions of matters nothing belonging to him,<sup>559</sup> I were not by mine oath bounden to make him answer, forasmuch as no such thing was in mine oath intended. And therefore if a priest that had heard a man’s confession were called before a judge and sworn for a witness, he might boldly swear he knew nothing of the matter — not for<sup>560</sup> the common gloss<sup>561</sup> (that the confession was not made to him as to himself, but as to God’s minister), but for that the law dischargeth him of showing any such thing, no less than if his oath were given<sup>562</sup> him in this manner: ‘What know ye of this matter out of<sup>563</sup> confession?’ For else if there were a tyrant that would compel him by express words to swear<sup>564</sup> what he knew by<sup>565</sup> the man’s confession, the confessor had<sup>566</sup> in my mind no remedy but to tell him plainly, ‘Sir, I will not swear for you, nor in such matter make you any answer to die therefor, not for anything that I know in the man for<sup>567</sup> this matter though<sup>568</sup> I told you all his whole confession anon,<sup>569</sup> but for the evil that should grow by such a precedent. For if I should now excuse<sup>570</sup> an innocent, swearing truly that I heard no such things in his confession, I should in some other cause<sup>571</sup> either be forsworn, or by my refusing to swear I should make the man the more suspect, in that I refuse to swear as much for him as I did for another. And therefore will I not make any answer in this, for the peril that may fall in other.’<sup>572</sup> And with this answer, or such other, must he plainly refuse to swear, what pain soever he should endure therefor. And in like wise, if any judge would give<sup>573</sup> an oath to any person to tell him the truth of any crime which were so secret as that judge had never heard anything thereof, but would for his only pleasure<sup>574</sup> know by the man’s oath whether there were peradventure any such thing or not, the party may deny<sup>575</sup> to swear or to make him answer therein. But on the other side, if he be denounced or detected<sup>576</sup> unto him, either by common fame<sup>577</sup> or other information, with such conjectures and likelihoods as the law giveth the judge authority to give the party an oath for the further search<sup>578</sup> of the matter, there is he plainly bounden upon pain of eternal damnation, without covering or cautel,<sup>579</sup> to show and disclose the plain truth, and to have more respect<sup>580</sup> to his soul than to his shame. For as for those texts which ye alleged,<sup>581</sup> be far from this point.<sup>582</sup> For they none other mean but that a man should in his living avoid not only sin, but also all occasions whereby men might have reasonable cause falsely to defame him. And it was never meant of<sup>583</sup> the shame that a man taketh of his own confession for his sin committed in deed. For by that he loseth not his good name, but getteth his good name, among good folk. And as for of evil men’s words,<sup>584</sup> there is no reckoning. But surely, as I say, if a man had been all ill<sup>585</sup> as a devil, and after repenting his sin would, for part of his penance, willingly offer himself to the sufferance of open<sup>586</sup> shame, there were no good Christian man that would after that like the man the worse, but a great deal the better. And if all such open confession were sin, there was much sin used<sup>587</sup> among good folk many day<sup>588</sup> in Christ’s Church when it was much better than it is now.

“Lo, Achan, that had committed sacrilege, whereof is written in Joshua,<sup>589</sup> was exhorted by Joshua to confess his fault openly, and give glory to God, that had detected him by lots.<sup>590</sup> And so did he, and meekly suffered for his sin as well the shame and wonder<sup>591</sup> of the world as the pain and bitterness of death. And therefore I no more doubt of that thief but that he is a glorious saint in heaven than I doubt of that thief that Christ promised

555 once and for all 556 lawfully be forsworn: morally commit perjury 557 admits of 558 swear me generally:
put me under a general oath 559 nothing belonging to him: not at all under his jurisdiction 560 because of 561 interpretation 562 administered to 563 out of: outside of 564 tell under oath 565 from 566 would have 567 concerning 568 even if 569 right now 570 help acquit 571 court case 572 other cases 573 wanted to administer

574 his only pleasure: his pleasure alone 575 refuse 576 denounced or detected:
publicly charged or accused 577 common fame: public report 578 investigation 579 covering or cautel: concealment or crafty deceit 580 respect to: regard for 581 cited 582 be far... point: they are far from relevant here 583 about 584 of... words: what evil men say 585 evil

586 sufferance of open: endurance of public 587 practiced 588 many day: at many times 589 See Jo 7:10–26. 590 that... lots: who had found him out through drawings of lots 591 stares, gapes

paradise hanging on the cross.<sup>592</sup> And surely if men's old faults were still their infamy after their amendment, then was Saint Peter little beholden to Saint Matthew and others of his fellows that have slandered him in their gospels, telling how shamefully, after all his crakes,<sup>593</sup> he forsook his Master and forswore<sup>594</sup> him both.<sup>595</sup> If a good man wax naught,<sup>596</sup> the better he was, the more sin it is, and the more shame also. And is it not then in reason,<sup>597</sup> on the other side, if a naughty man wax good, the worse he was, the better is for him, and the more worship<sup>598</sup> also? Our Lord saith himself that for one sinner coming again to grace there is more joy in heaven than upon almost an hundred good folk that never sinned.<sup>599</sup> And reckon we then that man shamed by the knowledge of his sin here among sinful men, whose humble confession and meek amendment winneth him so much worship in heaven? Trust me truly when a man hath done evil, if he be duly sworn, it is a worshipful shame and a joyful sorrow to confess the truth. And good folk, though they abhor the sin, yet love they and commend the man, as one that was naught and is good. And the shame that he conceiveth in his heart afore the world getteth him great honor afore God; and the short glowing heat in his cheeks speedily burneth up and wasteth the never-wasting<sup>600</sup> fire of hell, standing him further in stead<sup>601</sup> of great part of his purgatory. And therefore to the point that we speak of, without long process<sup>602</sup> I tell you plainly my mind: that no man can be excused from the peril of endless damnation that would — upon boldness of any doctor's<sup>603</sup> opinion — hide or cover his fault by any cautel<sup>604</sup> after a lawful oath given<sup>605</sup> him to tell the plain truth therein. And whoso will say the contrary, he must needs hold plain against the law, and say that no judge may lawfully give an oath to the party. For whereof should the oath serve,<sup>606</sup> if the party might lawfully forswear<sup>607</sup> himself? And also if the judge may not lawfully give him the oath, then may he refuse to swear, and<sup>608</sup> may not first swear and then say false, which every man must upon damnation eschew<sup>609</sup> though he follily<sup>610</sup> take an oath, where he lawfully might refuse it.”

“Forsooth,” quoth he, “methinketh ye take the sure way.”

“Well,” quoth I, “if this be so in one that<sup>611</sup> is sworn where the matter,<sup>612</sup> as he thinketh, cannot be well proved, how far wrong went the man that we spoke of, to forswear himself in a matter of preaching that he wist<sup>613</sup> well was so open<sup>614</sup> that it would be plainly proved what sin was therein? And what sin, and folly thereto,<sup>615</sup> was there to stick still in his perjury, when he saw the matter already proved so clearly, and by so many, so good, so honest, and so indifferent,<sup>616</sup> that he could nothing now win by the denying but evil opinion<sup>617</sup> and almost a despair of his amendment in all that ever heard him?”

“In good faith,” quoth he, “all this is very truth, and therefore we shall let him alone till God send him better mind.”<sup>618</sup>

THE EIGHTH CHAPTER

The author showeth why the New Testament of Tyndale's translation<sup>619</sup> was burned, and showeth for example certain words evil,<sup>620</sup> and of evil purpose,<sup>621</sup> changed.

“But now I pray you let me know your mind concerning the burning of the New Testament in English, which Tyndale lately translated, and (as men say) right well, which maketh men much marvel of the burning.”

“It is,” quoth I, “to me great marvel that any good Christian man having any drop of wit in his head would anything marvel or complain of the burning of that book if he know the matter.<sup>622</sup> Which whoso calleth ‘the New Testament’ calleth it by a wrong name, except<sup>623</sup> they will call it ‘Tyndale's Testament,’ or ‘Luther's Testament.’ For so had Tyndale, after<sup>624</sup> Luther's counsel, corrupted and changed it from the good and wholesome doctrine of Christ to

592 See Lk 23:39–43. 593 brags; boasts 594 denied under oath 595 See Mt 26:33–35, 69–74. 596 wax naught: grows evil 597 is it... reason: does it not then stand to reason 598 honor 599 See Lk 15:7. 600 wasteth the never-wasting: put an end to the never-ending 601 standing... stead: benefiting him even more

by taking the place 602 argument 603 scholar's 604 crafty deceit 605 administered to 606 whereof... serve: what would be the point of the oath 607 perjure 608 but 609 avoid 610 though... follily: even if foolishly
611 who 612 case (against him)
613 knew 614 public 615 as well

616 impartial 617 evil opinion: a bad reputation 618 judgment 619 the... translation: Tyndale's translation of the New Testament 620 badly 621 of evil purpose: with a bad intent 622 content; situation 623 unless 624 in accord with the devilish heresies of their own, that it was clean<sup>625</sup> a contrary thing.”

“That were marvel,” quoth your friend, “that it should be so clean contrary. For to some that read it, it seemed very like.”

“It is,” quoth I, “nevertheless contrary—and yet the more perilous. For like<sup>626</sup> as to a true silver groat,<sup>627</sup> a false copper groat is nevertheless contrary though it be quicksilvered over, but so much the more false in how much it is counterfeited the more like to the truth, so was the translation so much the more contrary in how much it was craftily devised like, and so much the more perilous in how much it was, to folk unlearned, more hard to be discerned.”

“Why,” quoth your friend, “what faults were there in it?”

“To tell you all that,” quoth I, “were in a manner to rehearse you<sup>628</sup> all the whole book, wherein there were founden and noted wrong and falsely translated above a thousand texts by tale.”<sup>629</sup>

“I would,” quoth he, “fain<sup>630</sup> hear some one.”

“He that should,” quoth I, “study for that should study where to find water in the sea. But I will show you for example two or three such as every one of the three is more than thrice three in one.”

“That were,” quoth he, “very strange except<sup>631</sup> ye mean more in weight. For one can be but one in number.”

“Surely,” quoth I, “as weighty be they as any lightly<sup>632</sup> can be. But I mean that every one of them is more than thrice three in number.”

“That were,” quoth he, “somewhat like a riddle.”

“This riddle,” quoth I, “will soon be read.<sup>633</sup> For he hath mistranslated three words of great weight, and every one of them is, as I suppose, more than thrice three times repeated and rehearsed in the book.”

“Ah, that may well be,” quoth he, “but that was not well done. But I pray you, what words be they?”

“The one is,” quoth I, “this word, ‘priests’; the other, ‘the Church’; the third, ‘charity.’ For priests, wheresoever he speaketh of the priests of Christ’s Church, he never calleth them ‘priests,’ but always ‘seigniors’; the Church he calleth always ‘the congregation’; and charity he calleth always ‘love.’ Now do these names in our English tongue neither express the things that be meant by them, and also there appeareth (the circumstances well considered) that he had a mischievous mind in the change. For first, as for priests and priesthood, though that of old they used commonly to choose well elderly men to be priests, and therefore in the Greek tongue priests were called presbyteri (as we might say, ‘elder men’), yet neither were all priests chosen old—as appeareth by Saint Paul writing to Timothy, Nemo iuventutem tuam contemnat (‘Let no man contemn<sup>634</sup> thy youth’)<sup>635</sup>—nor every elder man is not a priest. And in our English tongue, this word ‘seignior’ signifieth nothing at all, but is a French word used in English more than half in mockage, when one will call another ‘my lord’ in scorn. And if he mean to take the Latin word senior, that word in the Latin tongue never signified a priest, but only an elder man. By which name of ‘elder men,’ if he would call the priests Englishly, then should he rather signify their age than their office. And yet the name doth in English plainly signify the aldermen of the cities, and nothing the priests of the Church. And thus may we perceive that rather than he would call a priest by the name of ‘a priest,’ he would seek a new word, he neither wist<sup>636</sup> nor cared what.

“Now, where he calleth the Church always ‘the congregation,’ what reason had he therein? For every man well seeth that though the Church be indeed a congregation, yet is not every congregation the Church, but a congregation of Christian people; which congregation of Christian people hath been in England always called and known by the name of the Church; which name, what good cause or color<sup>637</sup> could he find to turn into the name of ‘congregation,’ which word is common to a company of Christian men or a company of Turks?

“Like wisdom was there in the change of this word ‘charity’ into ‘love.’ For though charity be always love, yet is not—ye wot well—love always charity.”

“The more pity, by my faith,” quoth your friend, “that ever love was sin. And yet it would not be so much so taken if the world were no more suspicious than they say that good Saint Francis was, which,<sup>638</sup> when he saw a young man kiss a girl once in way of good company,<sup>639</sup> kneeled down and held up his hands into heaven, highly thanking God

625 completely 626 just 627 four-pence coin 628 relate to you; read aloud 629 above . . . tale: over a thousand passages

by number 630 like to 631 unless 632 probably 633 solved 634 despise 635 1 Tm 4:12 636 knew 637 pretext

638 who 639 in way . . . company: in an erotic way that charity was not yet gone out of this wretched world.”

“He had,” quoth I, “a good mind,<sup>640</sup> and did like a good man, that deemed all things to the best.”<sup>641</sup>

5 “So say I too,” quoth he. “But how far be folk fallen from the good mind now. Men be nowadays waxen so full of mistrust that some man would, in faith, ween his wife were naught<sup>642</sup> if he should but find her in bed with a poor friar.”

10 “Forsooth, ye be a wanton!”<sup>643</sup> quoth I. “But yet, in earnest, how like you the change of these words?”

“Surely,” quoth he, “very naught. And that it was not well nor wisely done, there will, I trow,<sup>644</sup> no good wise man deny. But yet whether Hutchins<sup>645</sup> had, in the translation thereof, any malicious purpose or not, therein will I, till I see further, play Saint Francis’s part, and judge the man no worse than the matter requireth.”

20 “First,” quoth I, “would ye that the book should go forth and be read still in that fashion?”<sup>646</sup>

“Nay, in good faith,” quoth he, “that would I not, if he use it so very often.”

25 “With that word,” quoth I, “ye hit the nail on the head. For surely, if he changed the common known word into the better, I would well allow<sup>647</sup> it. If he changed it into as good, I would suffer<sup>648</sup> it. If somewhat into worse, so<sup>649</sup> he did it seldom, I would wink at it. But now, when he changeth the known, usual names of so great things into so far the worse, and 30 that not repeateth seldom, but so often and so continually inculketh<sup>650</sup> that almost in the whole book his lewd<sup>651</sup> change he never changeth, in this manner could no man deem other but that the man meant mischievously<sup>652</sup> — scant<sup>653</sup> such a good seely<sup>654</sup> soul as would ween all were well when he found his wife where ye said right now. If he called charity sometimes by the bare<sup>655</sup> name of ‘love,’ I would not stick thereat.<sup>656</sup> But now, whereas ‘charity’ signifieth in Englishmen’s ears not every common love, but a 35 good, virtuous, and well-ordered love, he that will studiously flee from that name of good love, and always speak of ‘love’ and always leave out ‘good,’ I would surely say that he meaneth naught.”<sup>657</sup>

“In good faith,” quoth he, “so is it not unlikely.”

45 “Then,” quoth I, “when ye see more, ye shall say it is much more than likely.”

“For now it is to be considered that at the time of this translation Hutchins was with Luther in Wittenberg, and set certain glosses in the margent,<sup>658</sup> framed<sup>659</sup> for the setting forth of the ungracious<sup>660</sup> sect.”

55 “By Saint John,” quoth your friend, “if that be true — that Hutchins were at that time with Luther — it is a plain token<sup>661</sup> that he wrought somewhat after his counsel, and was willing to help his matters forward here. But whether Luther’s matters be so mad as they be made for,<sup>662</sup> that shall we see hereafter.”

60 “Very true,” quoth I. “But as touching the confederacy<sup>663</sup> between Luther and him, is<sup>664</sup> a thing well known and plainly confessed by such as have been taken<sup>665</sup> and convicted here of heresy, coming from thence — and some of them sent hither to sow that seed about here, and to send word thither from time to time how it sprang.<sup>666</sup>”

65 “But now, the cause why he changed the name of ‘charity,’ and of ‘the Church,’ and of ‘priesthood,’ is no very great difficulty to perceive. For since Luther and his fellows, among other their damnable heresies, have one that all our salvation standeth<sup>667</sup> in faith alone, and toward our salvation nothing force of good works,<sup>668</sup> therefore it seemeth that he labor-
70 eth of purpose to diminish the reverent mind that men bear to charity, and therefore he changeth that name of holy, virtuous affection into the bare name of ‘love,’ common to the virtuous love that man beareth to God and to the lewd love that is between
75 fleck and his make.<sup>669</sup> And for because that Luther utterly denieth the very<sup>670</sup> Catholic Church in earth, and saith that the Church of Christ is but an unknown congregation of some folk, here two and there three, no man wot where, having ‘the right
80 faith’ (which he calleth only his own new-forged faith), therefore Hutchins in the New Testament cannot abide the name of ‘the Church,’ but turn-85 eth it into the name of ‘congregation,’ willing that

640 disposition; judgment 641 that... best: who judged everything in the best light 642 ween... naught: believe that his wife was being immoral 643 rogue; rake 644 trust 645 another surname used by the Tyndale family 646 in that fashion: as it is written 647 approve of 648 allow 649 so long as 650 inculcates 651 evil

652 wickedly 653 short of; save for 654 poor; simple; innocent 655 simple; mere 656 stick thereat: object to that 657 meaneth naught: means “bad” (i.e., a bad kind of love); means badly (i.e., has a bad intention) 658 margin 659 designed 660 wicked 661 indication 662 made for: construed

663 conspiracy; collusion 664 it is 665 arrested for 666 how it sprang: as to how well it sprouted 667 consists 668 nothing... works: i.e., good works count for nothing 669 fleck... make: man and his paramour 670 true

it should seem to Englishmen either that Christ in the Gospel had never spoken of the Church, or else that the Church were but such a congregation as they might have occasion to say that a congregation of some such heretics were the Church that God spoke of.

“Now as touching the cause why he changed the name of ‘priest’ into ‘seignior,’ ye must understand that Luther and his adherents hold this heresy: that all holy orders<sup>671</sup> is nothing, and that a priest is nothing else but a man chosen among the people to preach, and that by that choice<sup>672</sup> to that office he is priest by and by,<sup>673</sup> without any more ado<sup>674</sup>—and no priest again whensoever the people choose another in his place—and that a priest’s office is nothing but to preach. For as for saying Mass and hearing of confession, and absolution thereupon to be given—all this he saith that every man, woman, and child may do as well as any priest. Now doth Hutchins therefore—to set forth this opinion withal—after<sup>675</sup> his master’s heresy put away the name of ‘priest’ in his translation, as though priesthood were nothing. Wheresoever the Scripture speaketh of the priests that were among the Jews, there doth he in his translation call them still<sup>676</sup> by the name of ‘priests.’ But wheresoever the Scripture speaketh of the priests of Christ’s Church, there doth he put away the name of ‘priest’ in his translation, because he would make it seem that the Scripture did never speak of any priests different from laymen among Christian people. And he saith plainly in his book of Obedience that priesthood and all holy orders among Christian people be but feigned inventions, and that priests be nothing but officers chosen to preach, and that all the consecration whereby they be consecrated is nothing worth. And for this cause in all his translation wheresoever he speaketh of them, the name of ‘priest’—which to us, in our own tongue, hath always signified an anointed person and with holy orders consecrated unto God—he hath changed into the name of ‘seignior’: no word of our language, but either used half in mockage, when we speak French in sport (Dieu vous garde, Seignior),<sup>677</sup> or at the furthest, nothing betokening but ‘elder.’ So that it is easy to see what he meant in the turning<sup>678</sup> of these names.”

“In good faith,” quoth your friend, “it seemeth verily that he meant not well.”

“Surely,” quoth I, “ye would well say so if ye saw all the places which I shall cause you to see when ye will,<sup>679</sup> and ye shall soon<sup>680</sup> judge them yourself. For it were too long to rehearse them all now. Nor these have I not rehearsed you as for<sup>681</sup> the chief, but for that they came first to mind. For else I might shortly rehearse you many things more as far out of tune as these be. For he changeth commonly the name of ‘grace’ into this word, ‘favor,’ whereas every favor is not grace in English; for in some favor is there little grace. ‘Confession’ he translateth into ‘acknowledging,’ ‘penance’ into ‘repentance.’ A ‘contrite’ heart he changeth into a ‘troubled’ heart, and many more things like, and many texts untruly translated for the maintenance<sup>682</sup> of heresy, as I shall show you some when we look in the book. Which things we shall not now reason upon, for they be not worthy to be brought in question.<sup>683</sup> But I tell you this much only for this cause: that ye may perceive that he hath thus used<sup>684</sup> himself in his translation to the intent that he would set forth Luther’s heresies and his own thereby. For first he would make the people believe that we should believe nothing but plain Scripture, in which point he teacheth a plain, pestilent heresy. And then would he, with his false translation, make the people ween<sup>685</sup> further that such articles of our faith as he laboreth to destroy, and which be well proved by Holy Scripture, were in Holy Scripture nothing spoken of, but that the preachers have all this fifteen hundred years misreported the Gospel, and Englished the Scripture wrong, to lead the people purposely out of the right way.”

THE NINTH CHAPTER

*The author showeth another great token<sup>686</sup>
that the translation was perilous, and made for an evil purpose.*

“But to the intent ye shall yet the less doubt what good fruit was intended by this translation, and

671 holy orders: the sacrament of ordination 672 election 673 by and by: immediately 674 labor 675 following 676 always 677 Dieu

vous garde, Seignior: “God keep you, sir.” 678 changing 679 want 680 quickly; readily 681 as for: because they are 682 support 683 in question: into debate

684 habitually conducted 685 believe, suppose 686 indication easily judge yourself whether it was well worthy to be burned or not, ye shall understand that there hath been since that time another book made in English, and imprinted, as it saith, in Almain<sup>687</sup> — 5 a foolish railing book against the clergy, and much part made in rhyme, but the effect thereof was all against the Mass and the holy sacraments. In this book, the maker raileth<sup>688</sup> upon all them that caused Tyndale’s translation of the New Testament to be 10 burned, saying that they burned it because that it destroyed the Mass. Whereby ye may see that he reckoned that translation very good for their purpose toward the destruction of the Mass.”

“By Saint Mary Mass,”<sup>689</sup> quoth your friend, “that book is a shrewd gloss<sup>690</sup> for the other. For it showed a cause for which it was well worthy to be burned — and the maker with it — if it were made to destroy the Mass. But who made that second book?”

“Forsooth,” quoth I, “it appeareth not in the book. For the book is put forth nameless,<sup>691</sup> and was in the beginning reckoned to be made by Tyndale. And whether it so were or not, we be not yet very sure. Howbeit, since that time Tyndale hath put out in his own name another book, entitled Mammona,<sup>692</sup> which book is very mammona iniquitatis (a very “treasury and wellspring of wickedness”).<sup>693</sup> And yet hath he since put forth a worse also, named The Obedience of a Christian Man,<sup>694</sup> a book able to make a Christian man — that would 30 believe it — leave off all good Christian virtues and lose the merit of his Christendom.<sup>695</sup> In the preface of his first book, called Mammona, he saith that one Friar Jerome made the other book that we talk of; which Friar Jerome, giving up his order
 35 (of the Friar Observants),<sup>696</sup> came to him where he was, showing him that he would cast off his habit and leave his religion,<sup>697</sup> and ‘assay<sup>698</sup> now to serve God,’ and that afterward he left him and went unto Roie<sup>699</sup> — which is, as I think ye know, another 40 apostate — by whose counsel Tyndale saith that the friar Jerome made the book, wherein Tyndale saith that he misliketh his rhymes and his overmuch railing, and saith also that he feareth lest Friar Jerome shall not well prove all that he promiseth in that book.”

“Why,” quoth your friend, “is that all the fear that he findeth in himself, and all the fault that he findeth in the friar and his book?”

“Yea, in good faith,” quoth I, “every whit.”<sup>700</sup>

“Then findeth he,” quoth your friend, “no fault in his apostasy?”

“No more,” quoth I, “than I show you.”

“Nor findeth he,” quoth your friend, “no fault in that the friar’s book saith that the New Testament of Tyndale was burned because it destroyed 55 the Mass?”

“Never a whit,” quoth I, “more than you hear.”

“And feareth he,” quoth your friend, “nothing else but lest the friar should fail of performing of somewhat<sup>701</sup> that his book promiseth?”

“That is all,” quoth I. “And what he promiseth therein, in faith I remember not. But it seemeth whatsoever it be, Tyndale would it were well performed.”

“He had,” quoth your friend, “much more cause, as methinketh, to fear lest men should reckon high default<sup>702</sup> in his translation, in that he nothing answereth to those words of the friar’s book, wherein he saith that the New Testament that was burned
 65 did destroy the Mass.”

“Ye say,” quoth I, “very truth, in my mind; and so would he of likelihood if himself had not meant as the friar said. But surely, for<sup>703</sup> the translation, I shall show you so many texts in such wise corrupted that ye shall not, I suppose, greatly doubt what he 75 meant in his doing.” And therewithal I showed your friend a book with the places ready noted — which book I had, by license,<sup>704</sup> a little before lent unto me for the nonce.<sup>705</sup> Wherein he saw so many corruptions, and of such manner sort,<sup>706</sup> that albeit upon 80 some we somewhat reasoned in<sup>707</sup> the way, yet at the last himself said ho,<sup>708</sup> and verily confessed that the book in such wise translated was very naught<sup>709</sup> and nothing meetly<sup>710</sup> to be read.

687 Germany 688 rants abusively
 689 Saint Mary Mass: the Mass in honor of Mary 690 shrewd gloss: sinister interpretation 691 anonymously 692 The Parable of the Wicked Mammon (1528) contains a translation into English of Luther’s sermon on Lk 16:1–13. 693 Lk

16:9 694 The Obedience of a Christian Man: also published 1528 695 Christianity 696 Franciscans 697 religious order 698 try 699 William Roie, who helped Tyndale publish his New Testament 700 every whit: entirely; every little bit 701 something 702 defects 703 as for

704 by license: with permission 705 the nonce: that express purpose 706 manner sort: a kind 707 reasoned in: argued along 708 enough 709 bad 710 nothing meetly: not at all fit

THE TENTH CHAPTER

The author showeth that the translation of Tyndale was too bad to be mended.

5 But yet he said that the faults might be by some good men amended, and then the book printed again, if nothing letted<sup>711</sup> but that.

10 “Surely,” quoth I, “if we go thereto, the faults be—as ye see—so many, and so spread through the whole book, that likewise as it were as soon done to weave a new web of cloth as to sew up every hole in a net, so were it almost as little labor, and less, to translate the whole book all new as to make in his translation so many changes as need must be ere it were made good. Besides this, that there would no wise man, I 15 trow,<sup>712</sup> take the bread which he well wist was of<sup>713</sup> his enemy’s hand once poisoned, though he saw his friend after scrape it never so clean.”

THE ELEVENTH CHAPTER

20 The messenger findeth fault with the clergy, in that he saith they have made a constitution provincial<sup>714</sup> that no Bible in English should be suffered.<sup>715</sup> And in this chapter incidentally<sup>716</sup> the messenger much reproveth the living of the clergy. Whereunto<sup>717</sup> the author somewhat showeth his mind, deferring for 25 the while<sup>718</sup> his answer to the objection made against the constitution.

30 “Sir,” quoth your friend, “I will not greatly stick<sup>719</sup> with you in that point. But surely the thing that maketh in this matter the clergy most suspect, and wherein, as it seemeth, it would be full hard to excuse them, is this: that they not only damn<sup>720</sup> Tyndale’s translation (wherein there is good cause), but over<sup>721</sup> that do damn all others, and, as though a layman were no Christian man, will suffer no layman
35 have any at all. But when they find any in his keeping, they lay heresy to him therefor.<sup>722</sup> And thereupon they burn up the book, and sometimes the good man withal, alleging, for the defense of their doing, a law of their own making: a constitution

40 provincial, whereby they have prohibited that any man shall have any, upon pain of heresy. And this is a law very provincial;<sup>723</sup> for it holdeth but here. For in all other countries of Christendom, the people have the Scripture translated into their own tongue, and the clergy there findeth no such fault therein; 45 wherefore either our people be worst of all people, or else our clergy is worst of all clergies. But, by my troth, for aught<sup>724</sup> that I can see here or perceive by<sup>725</sup> them that have been elsewhere, our lay people be as good and as honest as be anywhere. And if 50 any be otherwise, the occasion and example cometh of the clergy, among whom we see much more vice than among ourselves.

55 “Whereas they should give us example of virtue and the light of learning, now their examples—what they be—we see. And as for learning, they neither will teach us but seldom—and that shall be but such things as pleaseth them, some glosses<sup>726</sup> of their own making—nor suffer us to learn by ourselves, but by their constitution pull Christ’s Gospel out of Christian people’s hands. I cannot well see why, but lest we should see the truth. The Jews be not letted to read<sup>727</sup> their law—both learned and lewd.<sup>728</sup> And yet are there in the Old Testament things for unlearned folk far more strange and per- 60 ilous than in the New. And why should, then, our laymen be forbidden the Gospel, but if they<sup>729</sup> will make us worse than Jews?<sup>730</sup> Wherein I can, in good faith, see no excuse they can find. For the Scripture is to good folk the nourisher of virtue, and to them 70 that be naught, it is the means of amendment. And therefore while<sup>731</sup> the clergy doth withdraw it<sup>732</sup> us, if our souls be in good health, they take away our food; if our souls be sick, they take away the medicine. And therefore, as I said, the fault is not in the 75 damning of Tyndale’s translation, but in that they have by an express law forbidden that we should have any at all.”

80 “Your words,” quoth I, “be somewhat pugnacious<sup>733</sup> and sharp. But surely they prick somewhat more the men than the matter. For where ye touch in effect two things—one, the constitution provincial by

711 hindered 712 trust 713 by 714 constitution provincial: ecclesiastical law enacted by the bishops of a province of the Church (in this case, the province of England). The decree in question was one of many passed by a synod at Oxford in 1407 presided over by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Arundel, and thus sometimes known as the Arundel Constitutions. 715 allowed 716 in passing 717 about which 718 time being 719 persist in arguing 720 condemn 721 in addition to 722 lay... therefor: charge him with heresy for it 723 local 724 anything 725 perceive by: understand from 726 interpretations

727 letted to read: hindered from reading 728 learned and lewd: the educated and the uneducated 729 but if they: unless the clergy 730 worse . . . than: inferior to Jewish readers 731 as long as 732 withdraw it: withhold it from 733 hostile which ye think the clergy of this realm have evil<sup>734</sup> prohibited all translations of Scripture into our tongue; another, the vice of the clergy in general—the first point, which indeed toucheth our matter, I 5 can and will with few words answer you. But as for the other, which toucheth the men, as<sup>735</sup> where ye accuse the clergy in their persons of very vicious living, as<sup>736</sup> men much worse than ye say that we be—and yet, as though their own faults were too few,

 10 charge them with ours too, whereof ye call them the cause—in this point will I keep no schools<sup>737</sup> with you, nor enter into dispicions<sup>738</sup> thereof, nor gladly meddle with the matter. For as I told you in the beginning, since we talk but of men’s learning, I
 15 will not meddle of men’s living, nor, in that treating of this matter, either praise or dispraise any man’s manner, except some such as are, for their heresies and evil doctrine, cast out of Christ’s Church, and through all Christendom damned and defamed al-
 20 ready by their own obstinate malice. But yet where ye speak of other countries, making an argument that our clergy is the worst of all others, I wot<sup>739</sup> well the whole world is so wretched that spiritual and temporal<sup>740</sup> everywhere all be bad enough; God
 25 make us all better! But yet for that<sup>741</sup> I have myself seen, and by credible folk have heard, like<sup>742</sup> as ye say by our temporality<sup>743</sup> that we be as good and as honest as anywhere else, so dare I boldly say that the spirituality<sup>744</sup> of England, and specially that part in 30 which ye find most fault—that is to wit, that part which we commonly call the secular clergy<sup>745</sup>—is, in learning and honest living, well able to match (and, saving the comparisons be odious, I would say further) far able to overmatch, number for num-
 35 ber, the spirituality of any nation Christian. I wot well there be therein many very lewd and naught.<sup>746</sup> And surely wheresoever there is a multitude, it is not, without miracle, well possible to be<sup>747</sup> otherwise. But now if the bishops would once take unto 40 priesthood better laymen and fewer (for of us be they made), all the matter were more than half amended. Now where ye say that ye see more vice in them than in ourselves, truth it is that everything in them is greater, because they be more bounden to be better. But else<sup>748</sup> the things that they misdo 45 be the selfsame that we sin in ourselves; which vices that, as ye say, we see more in them than in ourselves, the cause is, as I suppose, for<sup>749</sup> we look more upon theirs than on our own, and fare as Aesop saith in a fable—that every man carrieth a dou- 50 ble wallet<sup>750</sup> on his shoulder, and into the one that hangeth at his breast he putteth other folks’ faults, and therein he tooteth and poreth<sup>751</sup> often. In the other he layeth up all his own, and swingeth it at his back, which himself never listeth<sup>752</sup> to look in, 55 but others that come after him cast an eye into it among.<sup>753</sup> Would God<sup>754</sup> we were all of the mind that every man thought no man so bad as himself! For that were the way to mend both them and us. Now they blame us, and we blame them, and both 60 blameworthy, and either party more ready to find other’s faults than to mend their own. For in reproach of them we be so studious that neither good nor bad passeth unreproved. If they be familiar,<sup>755</sup> we call them light.<sup>756</sup> If they be solitary, we call them 65 fantastic. If they be sad,<sup>757</sup> we call them solemn. If they be merry, we call them mad. If they be companionable,<sup>758</sup> we call them vicious.<sup>759</sup> If they be holy, we call them hypocrites. If they keep few servants, we call them niggards.<sup>760</sup> If they keep many, we call 70 them pompous. If a lewd<sup>761</sup> priest do a lewd deed, then we say, ‘Lo, see what example the clergy giveth us!’—as though that priest were the clergy. But then forget we to look what good men be therein, and what good counsel they give us, and what good 75 example they show us. But we fare as do the ravens and the carrion crows, that never meddle with any quick<sup>762</sup> flesh, but where they may find a dead dog in a ditch, thereto they flee, and thereon they feed apace.<sup>763</sup> So where we see a good man, and hear or 80 see a good thing, there we take little heed. But when we see once an evil deed, thereon we gape, thereof we talk, and feed ourselves all day with the filthy delight of evil communication. Let a good man preach a short tale<sup>764</sup> shall serve us thereof, and we shall nei- 85 ther much regard his exhortation nor his good example. But let a lewd friar be taken<sup>765</sup> with a wench, we will jest and rail upon the whole order<sup>766</sup> all the

734 wrongly 735 such as 736 being 737 keep no schools: not engage in any academic discussion 738 debates 739 know 740 spiritual and temporal:
 clerics and lay people 741 what 742 just 743 by our temporality: about our laity 744 clergy 745 secular clergy:

priests who are not members of religious orders 746 lewd and naught: uneducated or rude and wicked 747 to be: for it to be 748 otherwise 749 because 750 double wallet: knapsack with two pockets 751 tooteth and poreth: looks and peers 752 wishes 753 now and then 754 Would God: I wish to God 755 friendly 756 frivolous 757 serious 758 sociable 759 corrupt 760 misers

 761 bad 762 living 763 quickly 764 sermon 765 caught 766 the whole order: i.e., all the clergy

year after, and say, ‘Lo what example they give us!’ And yet, when we have said,<sup>767</sup> we will follow the same, and then say that we learned it of them, forgetting that we list<sup>768</sup> not to hear and follow some other, whose word and deed would give us light to do better if we listed as well to learn the better as to follow the worse.”

“Indeed,” quoth he, “because ye speak<sup>769</sup> of light, they say that if a woman be fair, then is she young, and if a priest be good, then he is old. But yet have I seen a priest give light to the people that was but very young.”

“Marry,” quoth I, “God forbid else. Ye may see that often and ye will.”<sup>770</sup>

“Truly,” quoth he, “it is pity that we see such light so seldom, being this wretched world in such darkness as it is. For I never saw it but once. Nor, as it seemed, few of the people neither. For in faith they wondered as fast thereon<sup>771</sup> as though they had never seen it before.”

“How happed that?” quoth I.

“Marry,” quoth he, “it happed that a young priest very devoutly, in a procession, bore a candle before the cross for lying with a wench, and bore it lighted all the long way. Wherein the people took such spiritual pleasure and inward solace that they laughed apace. And one merry merchant said unto the priests that followed him, Sic luceat lux vestra coram hominibus (‘Thus let your light shine afore the people’).”<sup>772</sup>

“Forsooth,” quoth I, “it were pity but that an evil priest were punished.<sup>773</sup> But yet it is as much pity that we take such a wretched pleasure in the hearing of their sin, and in the sight of their shame. Good is it for them to look on their faults, but for us were it better to look less to theirs and more unto our own. But surely many of us have such delight to hear of their harm<sup>774</sup> that it seemeth we be glad when one of them doth any such thing as we may have occasion to see them punished or had<sup>775</sup> in derision. Which wretched appetite and sinful affection yet is much worse, and much more worthy the curse of God, than the lewd mind of Ham, which fell into<sup>776</sup> the curse of his father, Noah, for that<sup>777</sup> he made a gaud<sup>778</sup> and showed forth in scorn the secret members<sup>779</sup> of his father, that of adventure<sup>780</sup> lay and slept uncovered, which parts Shem and Japheth, the blessed children, reverently covered, going backward to him because they would not<sup>781</sup> see him.<sup>782</sup> And surely we have little cause to laugh at their lewdness. For undoubtedly, if the clergy be naught, we must needs be worse, as I heard once Master Colet,<sup>783</sup> the good dean of Paul’s,<sup>784</sup> preach. For he said that it can be none other but that we must ever be one degree under them. For surely as he said, it can be no lie that<sup>785</sup> our Savior saith himself, which<sup>786</sup> saith of them that they ‘be salt of the earth.’ And if the salt once appall,<sup>787</sup> the world must needs wax unsavory.<sup>788</sup> And he saith that they ‘be the light of the world. And then if the light,’ saith he, ‘be darkened, how dark will then the darkness be!’<sup>789</sup> — that is to wit, all the world besides, whereof he called the clergy, only, the light. Howbeit,<sup>790</sup> though there be both among us and them many very naught — whose faults be neither the faults of the temporality nor of the spirituality, but of those lewd persons themselves — yet are, I trust, neither their party nor ours come to that point but that there be many good men among us, and as for among them, I wot nere<sup>791</sup> whether I may say many more or not, but surely I think many better.”

“I fear me,” quoth your friend, “that those ‘many’ be very few in comparison of the multitude.”

“I cannot,” quoth I, “look into their hearts to see who is good and who is bad, nor have the leisure, if they were all known, to go about and tell them by the polls,<sup>792</sup> to see which side were the more. And therefore, in the meanwhile, I trust in God the better part is the greater. Howbeit, if there were indeed among them very few, yet think I verily that for those few all the world fareth the better, and is in their virtue and prayer, by God’s great mercy, maintained and upholden — as we find in Scripture places more than one declaring plainly the profit that a whole sinful city, or sometimes a whole region, taketh by the prayer of a few godly men.<sup>793</sup> And no doubt is there but, likewise<sup>794</sup> as he that is in the clergy naught is far the worse because he is

767 finished speaking 768 desire 769 because ye speak: i.e., speaking 770 and ye will: if you want to 771 wondered... thereon: stared as intently at it 772 Mt 5:16 773 were pity... punished: would be a pity if a bad priest were not punished 774 pain 775 held 776 fell into: incurred 777 for that: because 778 mockery 779 secret members: private parts 780 that of adventure: who by chance 781 would not: did not want to 782 See Gn 9:21–23. 783 John Colet (1467–1519) was a noted scholar and humanist. 784 St. Paul’s Church in London 785 what 786 who 787 once appall: ever loses its flavor 788 wax unsavory: grow insipid, lose its flavor 789 See Mt 5:13, 14; 6:23. 790 However 791 wot nere: know not 792 tell... polls: do a head count 793 See Gn 18:23–32; 19:20–21. 794 just therein, so he that therein is good is for his clergy<sup>795</sup> very far the better — and his prayer to God for himself and all others far the more available.<sup>796</sup>

THE TWELFTH CHAPTER

5 The author toucheth one special prerogative that we have by<sup>797</sup> a priest, be he never so bad, in that his naughtiness cannot take from us the profit of his Mass. Whereupon is by the messenger moved a doubt:<sup>798</sup> whether it were better to have fewer 10 priests and better, with fewer Masses, or more and worse for<sup>799</sup> to have the more Masses. Whereunto the author answereth.

“And be a priest never so naught, albeit that he do some way<sup>800</sup> much harm both to himself and others, 15 yet this advantage take we by the privilege and prerogative of his priesthood, besides the ministrations of the sacraments unto us, the goodness whereof his naughtiness cannot appair:<sup>801</sup> that, be he never so vicious, and therewith so impenitent and so far from 20 all purpose of amendment that his prayers were afore the face of God rejected and abhorred, yet that sacred sacrifice and sweet oblation of Christ’s holy Body offered up by his office can take none impairing<sup>802</sup> by the filth of his sin, but highly help-
 25 eth to the upholding of this wretched world from the vengeance of the wrath of God, and is to God as acceptable, and to us as available, for the thing itself, as though it were offered by a better man, though percase<sup>803</sup> his prayers joined therewith nei-30 ther much profit others, nor the oblation himself, as with whom<sup>804</sup> God is the more greatly grieved, in that, being so bad, he durst presume to touch it.”

“Marry,” quoth your friend, “if this be thus I marvel then why ye said right now that it were good to 35 make fewer priests, that<sup>805</sup> they might be taken only of the better, and the worse refused. For if their Masses be so good for us, be themselves never so naught, then seemeth it better for us to make yet more, though<sup>806</sup> they were yet worse, that we might 40 have more Masses.”

“That reason,”<sup>807</sup> quoth I, “will not hold. For though God of his goodness — how bad soever the priest be — well accepteth the oblation of Christ’s holy Body for other folk, yet is he with that priest’s presumption highly discontented. And we never 45 ought to seek our own commodity<sup>808</sup> with our neighbor’s harm. And also we should, of<sup>809</sup> our duty to God, rather forbear the profit that ourselves might attain by a Mass than to see his majesty disre-

 50 veyed by the bold presumption of such an odious minister as he hath forbidden to come about him. Like<sup>810</sup> as if ye sent a present unto a prince which were very pleasant unto him, though the messenger much disliked him, so far that he had been for-55 bidden<sup>811</sup> the court, yet if ye were not aware thereof, your gift could not lose his thank,<sup>812</sup> but his malapert<sup>813</sup> boldness might peradventure<sup>814</sup> be punished, and well were worthy to be. But, on the other side, if ye knew the messenger for such as the prince would not have come at<sup>815</sup> him, ye would rather keep your 60 present at home and forbear the thank, than wittingly<sup>816</sup> to send it by such a messenger; or else, though your present were very great, your thank would be very little. And surely, in like manner wise,<sup>817</sup> whoso surely knoweth a priest to be naught, 65 vicious, and in deadly displeasure of God,<sup>818</sup> should get, I think, little thank if he made him say Mass. And therefore well shall the prelates do, as much as they may, to provide that God shall rather be more 70 seldom presented with the pleasant present of the Mass than more often offended with a displeasing messenger. And verily, were all the bishops of my mind (as I know some that be), ye should not of priests have the plenty that ye have. The time hath been when there were very few in a great city, and in 75 a monastery of five hundred in one house scanty<sup>819</sup> would there four monks be bold<sup>820</sup> to be priests. Then was all holy orders in high honor. Then find we that the degree<sup>821</sup> of a deacon was a great thing, and of such dignity that when one of them went 80 sometimes in<sup>822</sup> pilgrimage, he would not be acknowledged of his order,<sup>823</sup> because he would not that folk should do him worship<sup>824</sup> in the way. But as for nowadays if he be deacon and priest too, he shall 85 need to fear no such pride, but rather rebuke and

795 for his clergy: because of his being a member of the clergy 796 effectual, efficacious 797 have by: get with 798 is . . . moved a doubt: is . . . raised a question 799 in order 800 some way: in some way 801 diminish 802 can . . . impairing: can in no way be lessened

803 perhaps 804 as with whom: since he is someone with whom 805 so that 806 even if 807 argument 808 benefit; profit 809 out of; from 810 just 811 forbidden admission to 812 value; credit 813 his malapert: its presumptuous 814 perhaps 815 to;

near 816 knowingly 817 in . . . wise: in the same way 818 in . . . God: mortally displeasing to God 819 scarcely 820 be bold: venture 821 rank 822 on a 823 be . . . order: let it be known that he was ordained 824 reverence villainy.<sup>825</sup> Which though it have<sup>826</sup> happened by the lack of virtue among them, and decay of devotion among us, yet hath much of all this gear<sup>827</sup> grown by the means of so great a number of priests, and so familiar among us. Which thing needs must diminish on our part reverence and estimation<sup>828</sup> toward them, which we never have but in things rare and scarce. Gold would we not set by<sup>829</sup> if it were as common as chalk or clay. And whereof is there now such plenty as of priests?”

“In faith,” quoth he, “there is more plenty of priests than of good men, and there be too many but if<sup>830</sup> they were better chosen.”

“Doubtless,” quoth I, “there would<sup>831</sup> be more diligence used in the choice, not of their learning only, but much more specially of their living. For without virtue, the better they be learned, the worse they be — saving<sup>832</sup> that learning is good store against God send<sup>833</sup> them grace to mend. Which else<sup>834</sup> it would be then haply<sup>835</sup> too late to look for, specially if the proverb were true that ye spoke of, that ‘if a priest be good, then he is old.’ But this is a very surety.<sup>836</sup> that it is not well possible to be without many very naught of that company<sup>837</sup> whereof there is such a main multitude.<sup>838</sup> The time was, as I say, when few men durst<sup>839</sup> presume to take upon them the high office of a priest — not even when they were chosen and called thereunto. Now runneth every rascal and boldly offereth himself for able.<sup>840</sup> And where the dignity passeth<sup>841</sup> all princes, and they that lewd<sup>842</sup> be desireth it for worldly winning,<sup>843</sup> yet cometh that sort thereto with such a mad mind that they reckon almost God much bounden<sup>844</sup> to them, that they vouchsafe<sup>845</sup> to take it. But were I pope —”

“By my soul,” quoth he, “I would ye were, and my lady your wife popess too!”

“Well,” quoth I, “then should she devise<sup>846</sup> for nuns. And as for me, touching the choice of priests, I could not well devise better provisions than are by the laws of the Church provided already, if they were as well kept as they be well made. But for the number, I would surely see such a way therein that we should not have such a rabble<sup>847</sup> that every mean<sup>848</sup> man must have a priest in his house to wait upon his wife — which no man almost lacketh now, to the contempt of priesthood in as vile office as his horse-keeper.”<sup>849</sup>

“That is,” quoth he, “truth indeed and in worse too — for they keep hawks and dogs. And yet meseemeth surely a more honest service to wait on a horse than on a dog!”

“And yet I suppose,” quoth I, “if the laws of the Church, which Luther and Tyndale would have all broken, were all well observed and kept, this gear<sup>850</sup> should not be thus, but the number of priests would be much diminished and the remnant much the better. For it is by the laws of the Church provided — to the intent no priest should, unto the slander of priesthood, be driven to live in such lewd manner or worse — there should none be admitted unto priesthood until he have a title of<sup>851</sup> a sufficient yearly living, either of his own patrimony or otherwise. Nor at this day they be none otherwise accepted.”

“Why,” quoth he, “wherefore<sup>852</sup> go there, then, so many of them a-begging?”

“Marry,” quoth I, “for<sup>853</sup> they delude<sup>854</sup> the law — and themselves also. For they never have grant of a living that may serve them in sight<sup>855</sup> for that purpose, but they secretly discharge<sup>856</sup> it ere they have it, or else they could not get it. And thus the bishop is blinded by the sight of the writing;<sup>857</sup> and the priest goeth a-begging, for all his grant of a good living; and the law is deluded; and the order is rebuked<sup>858</sup> by the priest’s begging and lewd living, which either is fain to walk at rovers<sup>859</sup> (and live upon trentals<sup>860</sup> or worse) or else to serve in a secular man’s house, which should not need<sup>861</sup> if this gap were stopped.<sup>862</sup> For ye should have priests few enough if the law were truly observed that none were made but he that were, without collusion, sure of a living already.”

“Then might it hap,” quoth he, “that ye might

825 insult 826 though it have: even if it has 827 matter 828 esteem 829 set by: value 830 but if: unless 831 should 832 except 833 good... send: a good provision toward such time as God may send 834 Which else: And if it were otherwise 835 perhaps 836 very surety: real certainty 837 to... company: for there not to be many very bad people in any group 838 huge number 839 dared 840 qualified 841 surpasses that of

842 lowborn 843 advancement; gain 844 obliged 845 agree graciously 846 should she devise: would she make the arrangements 847 mob 848 common 849 to the... horse-keeper: with the result that priesthood is scorned as being as low-status an office as that of a man’s horse-keeper 850 matter 851 a title of: an entitlement to 852 Why... wherefore: Well... why 853 because 854 elude or evade the purpose of (with pun) 855 in sight: publicly 856 waive 857 document 858 order is rebuked: priesthood is brought into contempt 859 which... rovers: who is made either to wander with no home or destination 860 payments for sets of thirty Masses said for the soul of a deceased person 861 be necessary 862 gap were stopped: deficiency where corrected have too few to serve<sup>863</sup> the rooms and livings<sup>864</sup> that be provided for them, except<sup>865</sup> the prelates would provide that orders<sup>866</sup> were not so commonly given, but always receive into orders as rooms and livings 5 fall void to bestow<sup>867</sup> them in, and no faster.”

“Surely,” quoth I, “for aught<sup>868</sup> I see suddenly,<sup>869</sup> that would not be much amiss. For so should they need no such titles<sup>870</sup> at all, nor should need neither run at rovers nor live in laymen’s houses—by reason whereof there groweth among<sup>871</sup> no little corruption in the priests’ manners,<sup>872</sup> by the conversation of<sup>873</sup> lay people and company of women in their houses.”

“Nay, by our Lady,” quoth he, “I will not agree with you therein. For I think they cannot lightly<sup>874</sup> meet with much worse company than themselves, and that they rather corrupt us than we them.”

THE THIRTEENTH CHAPTER

The messenger moveth<sup>875</sup> that it would do well 20 that priests should have wives.

Whereunto the author maketh answer.

“But I would ween it would amend much part of this matter if they might have wives of their own.”

“Marry,” quoth I, “so saith Luther and Tyndale
25 also, saving that they go somewhat further forth. For Tyndale (whose books be nothing else, in effect, but the worst heresies picked out of Luther’s works, and Luther’s worst words translated by Tyndale, and put forth in Tyndale’s own name) doth, in his 30 frantic<sup>876</sup> book of Obedience—wherein he raileth at large<sup>877</sup> against all popes, against all kings, against all prelates, all priests, all religious, all the laws, all the saints, against the sacraments of Christ’s Church, against all virtuous works, against all Divine Service,<sup>878</sup> and, finally, against all-thing,<sup>879</sup> in effect, that good is—in that book, I say, Tyndale holdeth 35 that priests must have wives. And that he groundeth wisely upon the words of Saint Paul, where he writeth to Timothy, Oportet episcopum esse irreprehensibilem, unius uxoris virum (‘that a bishop must be a man unreprouable,<sup>880</sup> and the husband of one wife’),<sup>881</sup> and that it must be considered whether he have well brought up his children, and well governed his household. By these words doth Tyndale, after<sup>882</sup> Luther, conclude for a plain matter 45 that priests must needs have wives, and that Saint Paul would there should<sup>883</sup> in no wise be none other priests but married folk. Is it not now a wonder with what spectacles Luther and Tyndale have spied this thing now in these words of Saint Paul? In which,
40

50 of so many great cunning<sup>884</sup> fathers and holy saints as have often read, and deeply considered, those words before, there was never none that had either the wit<sup>885</sup> or the grace to perceive that great special commandment these fifteen hundred years, till now
55 that God hath at last by revelation showed this high secret mystery to these two goodly creatures Luther and Tyndale, lest that holy friar should have lost<sup>886</sup> his marriage of<sup>887</sup> that holy nun, and Tyndale some good marriage that I think him toward.<sup>888</sup> Tyndale
60 nothing answereth in his book to that point, but runneth and raileth over without reason, and saith that the Scripture is plain therein for him.

And ever he passeth over, as though he heard it not, that all the holy doctors that ever were in 65 Christ’s Church said that the Scripture which he allegeth to be very plain for him is very plain against him—as it is indeed. For Saint Paul in that place,<sup>889</sup> forasmuch as<sup>890</sup> yet at that time, except<sup>891</sup> none but young men should have been priests (which he 70 thought not commonly convenient),<sup>892</sup> else could they make no priests then but such as either were or had been married; therefore the Apostle,<sup>893</sup> having in the choice of priests a special respect to chastity,<sup>894</sup> and willing to go as near to ‘no wife’ as
75 might be, did ordain, as God had instructed him, that whosoever should be admitted to priesthood should be ‘the husband of one wife,’ meaning such as then had, or before had had, no more but one,
80 and that never had had twain. He meant not, as mad Luther and Tyndale would now make the world so mad to believe, that a priest must needs have one, nor that he may never lack one, nor that

863 fill 864 rooms and livings: positions and benefices 865 unless 866 holy orders 867 fall void to bestow: become vacant to place 868 anything 869 at the moment 870 entitlements 871 groweth among: comes about now and then 872 morals 873 conversation of:

consorting with 874 easily 875 proposes 876 insane 877 raileth at large: rant abusively at length 878 all Divine Service: praying the Mass and the Prayers of Hours 879 everything 880 irreprouable 881 1 Tm 3:2–4 882 following 883 would . . . should: wants there to

884 learned; wise 885 intelligence 886 missed out on 887 to 888 inclined toward 889 passage 890 forasmuch as: seeing that 891 unless 892 commonly convenient: ordinarily appropriate 893 the Apostle: Saint Paul 894 respect to chastity: regard for celibacy

he may have one after another, nor the only<sup>895</sup> forbidding of twain at once; but he meant only that none should be admitted to priesthood but only such a man as never had had, nor should have, but only one, which is the thing that ever was and hath been by those words understood. And not only where Saint Paul taught, but also through Christendom, where the other apostles planted the faith, hath it ever been so observed. Which is a plain proof that, concerning the prohibition of any more wives than one, and the forbidding of bigamy by the wedding of one wife after another, was the special ordinance of God, and not of Saint Paul, whose epistles wherein he writeth anything of this matter, was peradventure not comen to the hands of other apostles when they took yet the same order by<sup>896</sup> the same Spirit that taught it him. For this is certain: that ever and everywhere in Christendom, the bigamy of two wives each after other hath been a let<sup>897</sup> and impediment against the taking of holy orders, and hath of long time been a let though the one wife had been married and buried before the man's baptism. And now these two wise men, against the old holy fathers and cunning doctors, and against the continual custom of Christ's Church so many hundred years begun and continued by the Spirit of God, have spied at last that Saint Paul saith and meaneth that a priest may marry twice, and have one wife after another — and that he must so have. For by<sup>898</sup> Tyndale, a priest must ever have one wife at the least. And surely if we leave the true understanding of Saint Paul's words, and believe Tyndale that it is there meant and commanded, because of this word oportet,<sup>899</sup> that a priest must have one, then may Tyndale, as for that place,<sup>900</sup> tell us that a priest is at liberty to have twain at once — or twenty and<sup>901</sup> he will — because Saint Paul saith no more but that the bishop must be 'the husband of one wife.' Which words Tyndale may tell us be verified if he be the husband of ten wives. For the husband of ten wives were the husband of one, as the father of ten children is the father of one — if the wives were as compatible<sup>902</sup> as the children be — as it is no doubt but Luther and Tyndale would soon make them by Scripture, if their own interpretation may be taken for authority against the perceiving<sup>903</sup> that God hath given to all good Christian people this fifteen hundred years. Now, as I say, upon Tyndale's taking, Saint Paul should mean not that a priest should have but one wife (for that 'but' is not in Saint Paul's words), but he should mean that a priest must have one at the least — as though Saint Paul had liefer<sup>904</sup> that the priest had twenty, save for overcharging.<sup>905</sup> Yet it seemeth that Tyndale so take it indeed, and that a priest might have diverse wives at once, specially for the great reason<sup>906</sup> that he setteth thereto. For whereas<sup>907</sup> Saint Paul, since there was at that time little choice to make priests of but married men, willed therefore that in the choice of the bishop there should be considered how he had governed his own household, because he that had mistetched<sup>908</sup> his wife and his children were unmeet for a great cure,<sup>909</sup> therefore saith Tyndale that never should there any priest be made but such as hath a wife and children and by the governance of them showed that he is meet to bear a rule.<sup>910</sup> As though we never saw any man that never had wife govern a household better than many that have had wife. And if the having and good ruling of a wife be so special a proof of a man meet to be a priest as Tyndale taketh it, then — since Saint Paul, after<sup>911</sup> Tyndale's interpretation, cannot appear to forbid the having of diverse together<sup>912</sup> — best were it, after Tyndale, specially to make that man a priest that had many wives, and all at once, and many children by each of them, if he guide them all well. For more proof is it of a wise governor to rule well five wives than one, and forty children than four.

But now that every child may see the wisdom of Tyndale and his master Luther in the construction<sup>913</sup> of Holy Scripture — whereof he speaketh so much and understandeth so little — I beseech you consider like words of Saint Paul in a much like matter. Saint Paul, as he writeth to Timothy that a bishop must be 'the husband of one wife,' so writeth he also to him that no widow should be specially chosen and taken in to be founden of<sup>914</sup> the goods of the Church that were 'younger than sixty years,' and that she should be one that 'had been the wife of one husband.'<sup>915</sup> Now set these two texts together, of the bishop and 895 the only: only the 896 took...

by: adopted yet the same arrangement 897 hindrance 898 according to 899 "it is necessary; it is becoming"
900 as for that place: on the basis of that text 901 if 902 agreeable 903 understanding 904 rather 905 the excessive expense 906 argument 907 because 908 taught bad habits to 909 unmeet for a great cure: unfit for spiritual responsibility

910 position of authority 911 according to 912 concurrently 913 construing; interpreting 914 founden of: provided for out of 915 1 Tm 5:9

the widow, and consider the words of ‘one wife’ in the one, and ‘one husband’ in the other. If we shall, after Tyndale, take the one words for the bishop, that Saint Paul should mean not that he have, or 5 have had, but one wife, but that he must needs have one wife, then must we likewise take the words spoken by Saint Paul of the widow as though Saint Paul should mean not a widow which<sup>916</sup> had never had more than one husband, but a widow that had 10 had one husband, as though Saint Paul had nothing feared nor forbidden but lest Timothy should take in such a widow as never had no husband at all. Were not this wisely construed?<sup>917</sup> Now if Tyndale will agree, as he needs must but if<sup>918</sup> he be mad, that Saint Paul, in giving commandment that the 15 widow should be such as had had ‘one husband,’ meant thereby such one as never had had more than one, then must he needs grant — and his master Luther too — that Saint Paul, in like wise, where he said that a bishop must be a good man and the husband of ‘one wife’ meant that he must never have, nor have had, any more than one, and not that he must needs have one, or that he must have one at the least, and might have many more than one, either each after other, or all together, and he list.<sup>919</sup>
 20 And in this matter hath Tyndale no shift.<sup>920</sup> For since this word ‘one’ in ‘one wife’ and ‘one husband’ was not by Saint Paul set in for nought,<sup>921</sup> it must needs signify either that there should be no more but one, or that there should be one at the least. If he should mean that a bishop should have one wife at the least, and that the widow should have had one husband at the least, then would he rather that they should have more than so few; which every man seeth how foolish that construction is. Now if 35 Tyndale will say that by this word ‘one’ Saint Paul meant there should be but one wife at once and one husband at once, then did Saint Paul so speak of the bishop as though he had said, ‘A bishop must be a good man and have but one wife at once.’ In which words, Tyndale had lost his purpose.<sup>922</sup> For so were<sup>923</sup> only a prohibition for any more than one — and no commandment — but a bare<sup>924</sup> permission for one. And yet were it little to purpose; for in 40 Saint Paul’s days, a layman had but one wife at once.

And the folly of this construction appeareth in the words spoken of Saint Paul in<sup>925</sup> the choice of the widow, wherein Tyndale would, by this way, make Saint Paul to say thus: ‘Take and choose in but such a widow as hath had but one husband at once’ — 50 as though the guise<sup>926</sup> were in his days that wives might have two husbands at once.”

“In faith,” quoth your friend, “I think Saint Paul meant not so. For then had wives been in his time little better than grass widows<sup>927</sup> be now. For they 55 be yet as several<sup>928</sup> as a barber’s chair, and never take but one at once.”

“In faith,” quoth I, “the folly of such folk doth well appear that seek in the Scripture of God such new constructions against the very<sup>929</sup> sense that God
 60 hath this fifteen hundred years so taught his whole Church that never was there pope so covetous yet that durst dispense in<sup>930</sup> this point, seeing the consent<sup>931</sup> of Christ’s Church so full and whole therein, and the mind of Saint Paul so clear to suffer<sup>932</sup> only 65 one, with utter exclusion of any more than one, that whosoever would construe him otherwise must needs fall into such open follies as Tyndale and Luther do. And thus ye see how substantially<sup>933</sup> Tyndale and his master construe the Scripture, and with 70 what authority they confirm this noble new doctrine of theirs, by which they would condemn all Christendom as breakers of the Law of God as long as they suffer not any priest take a wife — or rather 75 as long as they suffer him to be without a wife. For wives they must needs have, by Tyndale’s tale,<sup>934</sup> whether they will or no.”

“By my troth,” quoth your friend, “if Tyndale and Luther have none other hold<sup>935</sup> than that place of Saint Paul, they be likely to take a fall. But I think they say more than that.”

“Surely,” quoth I. “Tyndale hath another reason<sup>936</sup> indeed. He saith that chastity is an exceeding seldom<sup>937</sup> gift, and unchastity exceeding perilous for that estate.<sup>938</sup> And thereon he concludeth that 85 priests must needs have wives. But now what if a man would deny him — though chastity be a great gift, that yet it is a seldom gift? For though it be rare and seldom in respect of the remnant of the people that have it not, yet is it not seldom indeed; for 90

916 who 917 interpreted; constructed 918 but if; unless 919 and he list; if he desires 920 means out 921 nothing 922 argument 923 there would be 924 mere 925 about 926 custom

927 grass widows: women who cohabit with men, but never marry 928 exclusive 929 true 930 durst dispense in: dared give a dispensation on 931 consensus 932 allow 933 soundly 934 telling;

meaning 935 support; leg to stand on 936 argument 937 rare 938 state of life (the priesthood)

many men have it. And Christ saith that all men take<sup>939</sup> it not, but he saith not that no man taketh it, nor that few men take it. And highly he commendeth them that for his sake do take it. What inconvenience<sup>940</sup> is it, then, to take into his special service men of that sort that he most specially commendeth? Or if we granted to Tyndale that few men can live chaste — which is plainly false, for many hath done and doth — but now if we did, I say, grant him that thing, though he might peradventure thereupon conclude that there should not be so many priests made and bounden to chastity as could not live chaste, yet could he not conclude as he now concludeth: that no priest should be suffered to live chaste, but that every priest must needs have a wife. For this is his argument: few men can live chaste; ergo, every priest must take a wife. If we should impugn the form of this argument, Tyndale would rail and say we meddle with sophistry; and wise men would say we were idly occupied, to labor to show that folly that so evidently showeth itself. And therefore we shall let his wise argument alone, since it sufficeth us that every man that any wit hath may well see that upon his unreasonable reason one of two things must needs follow: either that Christ, in commending perpetual chastity, did commend a thing not commendable, or else, if every priest must needs have a wife, then were it not lawful<sup>941</sup> to make a priest of that sort that is of God's own mouth commended.”

“Surely,” quoth your friend, “methink they go far<sup>942</sup> therein, to say that priests must needs have wives. But methink that this they might well say, and I too: that it is not well done to bind them with a law that they shall have none, but it may be well done to suffer them have wives that would, as they have in Wales. And I hear say that in Almain<sup>943</sup> they find great ease<sup>944</sup> therein. For like as here the goodwife keepeth her husband from her maids, so there the parson's wife keepeth her husband from all the wives in the parish.”

“As for Wales,” quoth I, “ye be wrong informed; for wives have they not. But truth it is that incontinence is there in some places little looked unto, whereof much harm groweth in the country. And as for Almain, such part thereof as that is used<sup>945</sup> in — which is only where Luther's sect is received — whoso consider well what commodity<sup>946</sup> hath comen to them by such ungodly ways, I think shall have no great fantasy<sup>947</sup> to follow them.”

“Well,” quoth he, “let Wales and Almain go; yet priests had wives of old, when they were better than they be now, and yet have in Greece, where they be better than they be here.”

“As for the priests of Greece, I will not dispraise<sup>948</sup> them,” quoth I, “for I know them not. But somewhat<sup>949</sup> was not well there, that God hath suffered all that empire to fall into heathen men's hands.<sup>950</sup> And yet be they there not so loose<sup>951</sup> as ye reckon them. For though a wedded man taken there into the clergy be not, nor cannot be, put<sup>952</sup> from his wife, but is there suffered to minister in the office of a priest notwithstanding his marriage, yet if he be unmarried at the time that he taketh priesthood, he then professeth perpetual continence and never marrieth after, as I have learned by such as have comen from thence.

“Now where ye speak of old time, surely ye shall understand that there married not so many as ye would haply ween.”<sup>953</sup>

“Peradventure,” quoth he, “no more there would now. Some of them would have no wives though<sup>954</sup> that law were set at large.<sup>955</sup> For as a good fellow said once to his friends — that marveled why he married not, and thought him unnatural if he cared not for the company of a woman — he said unto them that he had liefer<sup>956</sup> lose a finger than lack a woman; but he had liefer lack the whole hand than have a wife. So if the priests were at liberty, some of the worst sort would yet, I ween, rather have women than wives. But others that would<sup>957</sup> be more honest would, I suppose, be married. And yet would some peradventure live in perpetual continence, as few do now.”

“God forbid,” quoth I.

“Well,” quoth he, “they that would were not restrained. But if I shall be bold to say what I think, it seemeth me surely a very hard thing that the Church should make a law to bind a man to chastity — maugre his teeth<sup>958</sup> — to which God would never bind any man.”

939 receive 940 impropriety; offense; trouble 941 ethical 942 too far 943 Germany 944 convenience 945 practiced 946 profit 947 inclination 948 criticize 949 something

950 empire . . . hands: Constantinople, the capital of the Greek (Byzantine) Empire, fell to the Turks in 1453. The last island holdouts fell in 1475, and the Greeks were under Muslim rule at More's time.

951 free 952 separated 953 haply ween: perhaps imagine 954 even if 955 set at large: relaxed 956 rather 957 wanted to 958 maugre his teeth: against his will

“The Church,” quoth I, “bindeth no man to chastity.”

“That is truth,” quoth he, “except<sup>959</sup> a priest be a man.”

5 “Ye mistake the matter,” quoth I, “as I shall show you after.”

“There would,” quoth he, “many harms be avoided, and much good would there grow thereof, if they might have wives that would.”

10 “What good or harm,” quoth I, “would come thereof, the proof<sup>960</sup> would show, wherein we might be the more bold to trust well, were it not that we now find it naught<sup>961</sup> in Saxony, where we newly see it assayed.<sup>962</sup> And as for that ye spoke of ‘old time

15 when the priests were better’ — surely as I would, if ye had not stopped me, have said further before — we perceive well by writers of old time that, of those good men, very few were married, and none in effect after that office taken. And many such as had

20 wives before, willingly with the assent of their wives forbore the carnal use of them. And since the good or harm growing of the matter best appeareth by the proof, besides the experience that we have now in Saxony where this change is begun with an infinite

25 heap of heresies, it is easy to see that the good fathers which<sup>963</sup> gave their advice to the making of that law, with the thing almost received in general custom before, and with the consent<sup>964</sup> of all Christendom in effect that ratified and received it after,

30 had a good proof thereof, and found this the best way before the law made;<sup>965</sup> and therefore I will not dispute with you thereupon. But forasmuch as ye lay unreasonableness to their charge that made it,<sup>966</sup> because they bind men as ye reckon against their

35 will to chastity, somewhat were it that ye say,<sup>967</sup> if the Church compelled any man to be priest. But now when every man is at his liberty not to be priest but at his pleasure, how can any man say that the Church layeth a bond<sup>968</sup> of chastity in any man’s

40 neck against his will? The Church doth, in effect, no further but provide that — whereas men will of their own minds some live chaste and some will not — the ministers of the Sacrament shall be taken of<sup>969</sup> that sort only that will be content to profess chastity.

45 Wherewith whoso findeth fault blameth not only the clergy, but also the temporalty,<sup>970</sup> which be, and have been all this while, partners in the authority of the making and conservation of this law. Whereof there can no man blame the provision<sup>971</sup> but if<sup>972</sup> he be either in that heresy that he think that the clean-

50 ness of chastity is no more pleasant to God than the carnal use of matrimony, or else that he think it evil done to provide that the priests which shall serve

God in his holy sacraments should be taken of the purest and most pleasant sort. Whereunto the very

55 paynims<sup>973</sup> had such respect that their priests durst not presume to the sacrifice of their maumets but<sup>974</sup> after certain time of corporal cleanness,<sup>975</sup> kept from their wives, and some of them bounden<sup>976</sup> to 60 perpetual chastity with the loss of that part of their body wherewith they might do the contrary.”

“Yea, marry,” quoth he, “that was a good sure way.”

“It was,” quoth I, “sure indeed, but not so good as this. For therein would be lost the merit that good

65 men have in resisting of the devil, and the refraining<sup>977</sup> of their fleshly motion.<sup>978</sup> But as I would and was about to say, in the Old Law given to Moses, the priests of the Temple, for the time of their min-

70 istration, forbore their own house and the company of their wives. And therefore they served the Temple by course,<sup>979</sup> as it well appeareth in the beginning of Saint Luke’s Gospel. So that<sup>980</sup> chastity was thought, both to<sup>981</sup> God and man, a thing

75 meet and convenient<sup>982</sup> for priests among them<sup>983</sup> which most magnified<sup>984</sup> carnal generation. And then how much more specially now to<sup>985</sup> the priests of Christ, which<sup>986</sup> was both born of a virgin, and lived and died a virgin himself, and exhorted all his to the same? Whose counsel in that point, since

80 some be content to follow and some to live otherwise, what way were,<sup>987</sup> I say, more meetly than to take into Christ’s temple, to serve about the Sacrament, only such as be of that sort that are content and minded to live after the cleanness<sup>988</sup> of Christ’s holy counsel?”

85 “Truth — if they so would,”<sup>989</sup> quoth he.

“They say,” quoth I, “that they will when they come thereto, being already warned<sup>990</sup> of the law.

959 unless 960 result 961 bad
962 tried 963 who 964 consensus
965 was made 966 lay... made it: accuse those who made it of being unreasonable
967 somewhat... say: there would be something to what you say 968 chain 969 from 970 laity 971 blame...

provision: fault the law 972 but if:
unless 973 pagans 974 durst... but:
dared not to offer sacrifice to their idols except 975 abstinence 976 were bound 977 restraining 978 desires 979 taking turns 980 So that: So 981 by 982 meet and convenient:

fitting and appropriate 983 the Jewish people 984 honored 985 with regard to 986 who 987 would be 988 after the cleanness: in accord with the purity 989 desired 990 informed

And to the intent that fewer should break it, therefore would I (as I said) have the better respect taken to the choosing.<sup>991</sup> And since it is hard to have so many so good, I would have the fewer made. But to say that the Church bindeth men to chastity against their will—because they take not a priest but if<sup>992</sup> he first professed chastity—is as far against reason as if he would say that they bind men to chastity against their will because they will make no monks but such as will promise to live chaste. Which promise every man well wotteth they make of their own minds, though the Church will neither make monks nor priests but such as so will. And as touching whether the order<sup>993</sup> of the Church therein be better than the contrary, good men and wise men both had the proof of both<sup>994</sup> before the law made, and it<sup>995</sup> well allowed through Christendom long time since. Which, ere I would assent to change, I would see a better author thereof than such a heretic as Luther and Tyndale, and a better example than the seditious and schismatic priests of Saxony.”

“Surely,” quoth he, “ye have well declared<sup>996</sup> the Church touching that law. But whatsoever the cause be, by my troth naught<sup>997</sup> they be, and as far worse than we as they be bounden to be better—and yet be we the worse for them.”

“There be,” quoth I, “many right good among them, and else were it<sup>998</sup> wrong with us. And many be there bad also, and some the worse for us. But whether<sup>999</sup> party is the better or the worse will I not dispute. But this will I say: that it were best that they thought themselves the worse, and we ourselves—and every man himself—worst.”

“I would that we were all in case<sup>1</sup> with our own faults as my father saith that we be with our wives. For when he heareth folk blame wives and say that there be so many of them shrews, he saith that they defame them falsely. For he saith plainly that there is but one shrewd<sup>2</sup> wife in the world; but he saith indeed that every man weeneth he hath her, and that one is his own. So would I fain<sup>3</sup> that every man would ween there were but one man naught in all the whole world, and that one were himself, and that he would thereupon go about to mend that one, and thus would all wax<sup>4</sup> well. Which thing we should shortly do, if we would once turn our wallet<sup>5</sup> that I told you of, and the bag with other folks’ faults cast at our back, and cast the bag that beareth our own faults—cast it once before us—at our breast. It would be a goodly broach<sup>6</sup> for us to look on our own faults another<sup>7</sup> while. And I dare boldly say, both they and we should much the better amend if we were so ready each to pray for other as we be ready to seek each other’s reproach and rebuke.”

“In faith,” quoth he, “I trow<sup>8</sup> that be true, and pray God we so may.”

THE FOURTEENTH CHAPTER

The author answereth the doubt moved<sup>9</sup> before (in the eleventh chapter) concerning the constitution provincial,<sup>10</sup> and that the clergy is therein far from the fault that is imputed to them in that point, showing also that the clergy hath not forbidden the Bible to be made and read in English.

“But now to the matter we were in hand with:<sup>11</sup> ye said ye would make answer for the law whereby the clergy of this realm hath forbidden all the people to have any Scripture translated into our tongue—which is, as I said, in my mind an evil-made law.”

“Marry,” quoth I, “that is soon answered. Lay the charge<sup>12</sup> to them that made it.”

“Marry,” quoth he, “so I do. For who made that constitution but they?”

“Surely,” quoth I, “nobody else—nor they neither.”

“No?” quoth he. “What? Every man knoweth it.”

“Verily,” quoth I, “many men talk of it; but no man knoweth it. For there is none such indeed. There is of truth a constitution that speaketh of such matter, but nothing of such fashion. For ye shall understand that the great arch-heretic Wycliffe<sup>13</sup>—whereas the whole Bible was, long before his days, by virtuous and well-learned men translated into the English

991 respect taken to the choosing: consideration used in the selection 992 but if; unless 993 arrangement; rule 994 both approaches 995 priestly celibacy 996 clarified 997 bad 998 else were it: otherwise it would be 999 which 1 the same position 2 shrewish;

bad-tempered 3 wish 4 grow 5 once turn our wallet: for once turn around our knapsack 6 goad; brooch 7 once in a 8 believe 9 doubt moved: question raised 10 constitution provincial: decree of the synod 11 were in hand with: had in hand 12 Lay the charge: Impute the fault

13 John Wycliffe (1324–84) was a priest and scholar who translated the Vulgate into English near the end of his life. His teachings were declared heretical by synods in England in 1377, 1382, and 1407, and by the Ecumenical Council of Constance in 1415.

tongue, and by good and godly people with devotion and soberness well and reverently read—took upon him, of a malicious purpose, to translate it of new.<sup>14</sup> In which translation, he purposely corrupted that 5 holy text, maliciously planting therein such words as might in the readers' ears serve to the proof of such heresies as he went about to sow, which he not only set forth with his own translation of the Bible, but also with certain prologues and glosses which he
 10 made thereupon. And these things he so handled (which was no great mastery),<sup>15</sup> with reasons probable<sup>16</sup> and likely to lay people and unlearned, that he corrupted in his time many folk in this realm. And by other ill books which he made in Latin, being after 15 borne into Bohemia and there taught by John Hus and others, he was the occasion of the utter subversion of that whole realm, both in faith and good living, with the loss also of many a thousand lives. And as he began again the old heresies of those ancient 20 heretics whom, and whose errors, the Church of Christ had condemned and subdued many diverse ages<sup>17</sup> before, so doth Luther again begin to set up his.<sup>18</sup> For all that he hath, in effect, he hath of him—saving that, lest he should seem to say nothing 25 of his own, he added some things of himself of such manner sort<sup>19</sup> as there was never heretic before his days neither so wicked that he would for<sup>20</sup> sin nor so foolish that he durst for shame write, say, or, I trow, think the like.”

30 “I long,” quoth he, “to hear some of them; for the man is taken for wiser than to mean so madly as men bear him in hand.”<sup>21</sup>

“Well,” quoth I, “that shall we see soon, when we come thereto. But for our present purpose, after 35 that it was perceived what harm the people took by the translation, prologues, and glosses of Wycliffe, and also of some others that after him helped to set forth his sect, then, for that cause—and ‘forasmuch as it is dangerous to translate the text of Scripture 40 out of one tongue into another, as holy Saint Jerome testifieth, forasmuch as in translation it is hard always to keep the same sentence whole<sup>22</sup>—it was, I say, for these causes at a council held at Oxford, provided upon great pain<sup>23</sup> that ‘no man should from thenceforth translate into the English 45 tongue (or any other language) of his own authority, by way of book, libel,<sup>24</sup> or treatise,<sup>25</sup> nor no man, openly or secretly,<sup>26</sup> any such book, libel, or treatise read, newly made in the time of the said John Wycliffe or since, or that should be made any time after,

 50 till the same translation were by the diocesan<sup>27</sup>—or, if need should require, by a provincial council—approved.’<sup>28</sup> And this is a law that so many so long have spoken of, and so few have, in all this while, rough<sup>29</sup> to seek whether they say truth or no. For 55 I trow that in this law ye see nothing unreasonable. For it neither forbiddeth the translations to be read that were already well done of old, before Wycliffe’s days; nor dammeth<sup>30</sup> his because it was new, but because it was naught; nor prohibiteth new to be 60 made, but provideth that they shall not be read if they be mismade, till they be by good examination amended, except<sup>31</sup> they be such translations as Wycliffe made, and Tyndale, that the malicious mind of the translator had in such wise handled it as it 65 were<sup>32</sup> labor lost to go about to mend them.”

“I long, by my troth,” quoth he, “and even sit on thorns,<sup>33</sup> till I see that constitution. For not myself only, but every man else hath ever taken it far 70 otherwise, that ever I have heard spoken thereof<sup>34</sup> till now. But surely I will see it myself ere I sleep.”

“Ye shall be sooner eased,” quoth I. “For I cannot suffer<sup>35</sup> to see you sit so long on thorns. And therefore ye shall see it by and by.”<sup>36</sup>

And therewith I fetched him forth the constitutions provincial with Lyndwood thereupon,<sup>37</sup> and 75 turned him to the place in the title De magistris.<sup>38</sup> Which, when himself had read, he said he marveled much how it happened that in so plain a matter men be so far abused<sup>39</sup> to report it so far wrong.

80 “This groweth,” quoth I, “partly by malice, partly by sloth and negligence, in that folk be more glad to

14 of new: anew 15 achievement
 16 reasons probable: arguments that sounded plausible 17 diverse ages: different times 18 Wycliffe’s 19 manner sort: a kind 20 on account of 21 bear him in hand: make him out (to mean)
 22 sentence whole: full sense. More quotes the opening words of the seventh constitution of the 1407 Synod of Oxford. The synod is not directly quoting Jerome.

They seem to have had in mind his letter to Pammachius (#57), where Jerome addresses criticism about his “sense for sense” (rather than word for word) method of translation. 23 provided upon great pain: stipulated on pain of severe punishment 24 pamphlet 25 tract 26 openly or secretly: publicly or privately 27 bishop of the diocese 28 no man . . . approved: another literally translated quote from the seventh constitution 29 cared 30 condemns 31 unless 32 as it were: that it would be 33 on thorns: in painful suspense 34 spoken thereof: speak of it 35 bear 36 by and by: right now 37 constitutions . . . thereupon: the edition of the synodal decrees published with Bishop William Lyndwood’s (1375–1446) commentary 38 De magistris: “On teachers” 39 misled believe and tell forth a thing that may sound to the dispraise of the clergy than to search and be sure whether they say true or no.”

THE FIFTEENTH CHAPTER

5 The messenger moveth against the clergy that, though they have made no law thereof, yet they will indeed suffer none English Bible in no man's hand, but use<sup>40</sup> to burn them where they find them—and sometimes to burn the man too. And for example
 10 he layeth<sup>41</sup> one Richard Hunne, showing that the Chancellor of London murdered him in prison and after hanged him—feigning<sup>42</sup> that he hanged himself—and after condemned him of heresy, because he had an English Bible, and so 15 burned the Bible and him together. Whereunto the author answereth.

“I suppose,” quoth he, “that this opinion is rather grown another way: that is to wit, by the reason that the clergy—though the law serve them not
 20 therefor<sup>43</sup>—do yet indeed take all translations out of every layman's hand. And sometimes with those that be burned or convicted of heresy, they burn the English Bible without respect, be the translation old or new, bad or good.”

25 “Forsooth,” quoth I, “if this were so, then were it in my mind not well done. But I believe ye mistake it. Howbeit,<sup>44</sup> what ye have seen I cannot say. But myself have seen, and can show you, Bibles fair and old, written in English, which have been known and 30 seen by the bishop of the diocese, and left in laymen's hands—and women's too—such as he knew for good and Catholic folk, that used it with devotion and soberness. But of truth all such as are founden in the hands of heretics they use<sup>45</sup> to take away.
 35 But they do cause none to be burned, as far as ever I could wit,<sup>46</sup> but only such as be founden faulty. Whereof many be set forth with evil prologues or glosses maliciously made by Wycliffe and other heretics. For no good man would, I ween, be so mad to burn up the Bible wherein they found no fault, nor any law that letted it to be<sup>47</sup> looked on and read.” 40

“Marry,” quoth he, “but I have heard good men say that even here in London, not many years ago, in the days of the bishop that last died, they burned up as fair Bibles in English as any man hath lightly<sup>48</sup>
 45 seen—and thereto<sup>49</sup> as faultless, for aught<sup>50</sup> that any man could find, as any Bible is in Latin. And yet, besides this, they burned up the dead body of the man himself whom themselves had hanged in the bishop's prison before, making as though the man
 50 had hanged himself. And of the burning of his body had they no color but<sup>51</sup> only because they found English Bibles in his house. Wherein they never found other fault but because they were English.”

“Who told you this tale?” quoth I. 55

“Forsooth,<sup>52</sup> diverse honest men,” quoth he, “that saw it, and specially one that saw the man hanging in the bishop's prison ere he was cut down. And he told me that it was well and clearly proved that the 60 Chancellor and his keepers<sup>53</sup> had killed the man first, and then hanged him after, and that they had laid heresy to him<sup>54</sup> only for hatred that he sued a Praemunire<sup>55</sup> against diverse persons for a suit taken about a mortuary<sup>56</sup> in the Audience<sup>57</sup> of the Arch-
 65 bishop of Canterbury.<sup>58</sup> And then they proved the heresy by nothing else but by the possession of a good English Bible. And upon heresy so proved against him whom they had hanged, lest he should say for<sup>59</sup> himself, they burned up the Holy Scripture 70 of God, and the body of a good man therewith. For I have heard him called a very honest person and of a good substance.”<sup>60</sup>

“Forsooth,” quoth I, “of good substance; he was, I think, well worth a thousand marks. And of his worldly conversation<sup>61</sup> among the people, I have 75 heard none harm. But surely as touching his faith toward Christ, methinketh I may be bold to say that he was not honest. And as touching truth in words, he that hath told you this tale was not so honest indeed as methinketh ye take him for.” 80

“Why,” quoth he, “do ye know the matter well?”

40 are accustomed 41 cites 42 alleging falsely 43 serve them not therefor: does not help them in this 44 However 45 are accustomed 46 ascertain 47 letted... to be: is there any law which prevents it from being 48 readily 49 also 50 anything 51 excuse; pretext 52 In truth 53 guards 54 laid heresy to him: charged him with heresy 55 The Statute of Praemunire (1393) forbade British subjects from appealing any legal decisions to any foreign person or body. It specifically targeted appeals made to Church courts in Rome. 56 fee paid to the priest presiding at a funeral 57 The Court of Audience heard civil suits filed under canon law. 58 sued... Canterbury: Hunne refused to pay the customary fee for burying his infant son. A year later, after a real estate dispute, the priest sued Hunne, ostensibly to recover the fee. In response, Hunne filed the Praemunire suit, alleging that he could not be sued in the Archbishop's court, because that court derived its authority from Rome. 59 say for: speak in defense of 60 wealth 61 conduct

“Forsooth,” quoth I, “so well I know it, from top to toe, that I suppose there be not very many men that knoweth it much better. For I have not only been diverse times present myself at certain examinations thereof, but have also diverse and many times sunderly<sup>62</sup> talked with almost all such, except the dead man himself, as most knew of the matter. Which matter was many times in sundry places examined. But especially at Baynard’s Castle one day was it examined at great length, and by<sup>63</sup> a long time, every man being sent for before, and ready there all that could be found that anything could tell, or that had said they could anything tell, in the matter. And this examination was had before diverse great lords, spiritual and temporal,<sup>64</sup> and others of the King’s honorable Council, sent thither by his Highness for the nonce,<sup>65</sup> of his blessed zeal and princely desire borne to the searching of the truth. Whereunto his gracious mind was much inclined, and had been by a right honorable man informed that there was one<sup>66</sup> had showed a friend of his that he ‘could go take him by the sleeve that killed Hunne’ — for Richard Hunne was his name, whom ye speak of. I was also myself present at the judgment given<sup>67</sup> in Paul’s, whereupon<sup>68</sup> his books and his body were burned. And by all these things I very well know that he of<sup>69</sup> whom ye have heard this matter hath told you tales far from the truth.”

“In good faith,” quoth your friend, “he told me one thing that ye speak of now: that there was one that said he ‘could go take him by the sleeve that killed Richard Hunne,’ and that he did so indeed, before the lords, and came even there to the Chancellor,<sup>70</sup> and said, ‘My lords, this is he.’ But when he was asked how he knew it, he confessed that it was by such an unlawful<sup>71</sup> craft as was not taken for a proof. For it was, they say, by necromancy. And the bishops that were there would have had that man burned, too, for witchcraft. And told<sup>72</sup> me also that there was another which<sup>73</sup> had seen many men that had hanged themselves: a man that had been long in office under diverse of the King’s almoners<sup>74</sup> — to whom the goods of such men as kill themselves be appointed by the law, and his office, as deodands<sup>75</sup> to be given in alms. This man, as I have heard say, showed unto the lords, by such experience as he had, good and plain tokens by which they perceived well that Hunne did never hang himself. I have heard also that a spiritual<sup>76</sup> man — and one that loved well the Chancellor, and was a laborer for that party — yet could not deny before all the lords but that he had told a temporal man,<sup>77</sup> and a friend of his, that Hunne had never<sup>78</sup> been accused of heresy if he had never sued the Praemunire.<sup>79</sup> And by Saint Mary, that was a shrewd word. Howbeit, indeed it went not so near the matter<sup>80</sup> as the other two things did.”

“Yes, in good faith,” quoth I, “all three like near, when they were all heard. But of truth, many other things were there laid<sup>81</sup> that, upon the hearing, seemed much more suspicious than these, which yet, when they were answered, always lost more than half their strength. But as for these three matters, I promise you, proved<sup>82</sup> very trifles — and such as, if ye had heard them, ye would have laughed at them seven years after.”

“I beseech you,” quoth he, “let me hear how they proved.”

“I am loath,” quoth I, “to let you, and lose your time in such trifles. Howbeit, since ye long so sore therefor,<sup>83</sup> rather than ye should lose your child for them, ye shall have them all three, as shortly<sup>84</sup> as I can. First ye must understand that because<sup>85</sup> the coming together of the lords from Greenwich to Baynard’s Castle for the trying out of<sup>86</sup> the matter should not be frustrate, there was such diligence done before that every man that aught had said therein<sup>87</sup> was ready there against their coming,<sup>88</sup> where they began with the first point that ye spoke of, as the special motion<sup>89</sup> whereupon the King’s Highness had sent them thither. Wherefore, after the rehearsal<sup>90</sup> made of the cause of their coming, the greatest temporal lord there present said unto a certain servant of his own standing there beside,<sup>91</sup>

62 separately 63 for 64 spiritual and temporal: ecclesiastical and secular 65 particular purpose 66 someone 67 judgment given: trial held 68 after which 69 from 70 of the diocese of London 71 wicked 72 my informant told 73 who 74 officers who distribute alms to the poor 75 things forfeited to the Crown for charitable use 76 ecclesiastical 77 temporal man: layman 78 had never: would never have 79 sued the praemunire: filed the praemunire suit 80 went . . . matter: had not so much relevance to the case 81 alleged 82 they proved 83 sore therefor: greatly for it 84 quickly 85 in order that 86 trying out of: judicial inquiry into 87 ought . . . therein: anything had said about the matter 88 against their coming: in advance of the lords’ arrival 89 as the special motion: it being the specific reason 90 recounting, report 91 beside him

'Sir, ye told me that one showed you that he could go take him by the sleeve that killed Hunne. Have ye brought him hither?'

5 "Sir,' quoth he, 'if it like<sup>92</sup> your Lordship, this man it was that told me so' — pointing to one that he had caused to come thither. Then my lord asked that man, 'How say ye, sir? Can ye do as ye said ye could?'

10 "Forsooth, my lord,' quoth he, 'and<sup>93</sup> it like your Lordship, I said not so much; this gentleman did somewhat mistake me. But, indeed, I told him that I had a neighbor that told me that he could do it.'

"Where is that neighbor?' quoth my lord.

15 "This man, sir,' quoth he, bringing forth one which had also been warned<sup>94</sup> to be there. Then was he asked whether he had said that he could do it.

"Nay, forsooth,' quoth he, 'my lord, I said not that I could do it myself, but I said that one told me that he could do it.'

20 "Well,' quoth my lord, 'who told you so?'

"Forsooth, my lord,' quoth he, 'my neighbor here.'

"Then was that man asked, 'Sir, know you one that can tell who killed Richard Hunne?'

25 "Forsooth,' quoth he, 'and it like your lordship, I said not that I knew one surely<sup>95</sup> that could tell who had killed him; but I said, indeed, that I know one which I thought verily<sup>96</sup> could tell who killed him.'

30 "Well,' quoth the lords, 'at the last — yet with much work — we come to somewhat.<sup>97</sup> But whereby<sup>98</sup> think you that he can tell?'

"Nay, forsooth, my lord,' quoth he, 'it is a woman. I would she were here with your lordships now.'

"Well,' quoth my lord, 'woman or man, all is one; she shall be had, wheresoever she be.'

35 "By my faith, my lords,' quoth he, 'and<sup>99</sup> she were with you, she would tell you wonders. For, by God, I have wist her tell<sup>100</sup> many marvelous things ere now.'

"Why,' quoth the lords, 'what have you heard her told?'<sup>101</sup>

40 "Forsooth, my lords,' quoth he, 'if a thing had been stolen, she would have told who had it. And therefore I think she could as well tell who killed Hunne as who stole a horse.'

45 "Surely,' said the lords, 'so think all we too, I trow.<sup>102</sup> But how could she tell it? By the devil?'

"Nay, by my troth, I trow,' quoth he, 'for I could never see her use any worse way than looking in one's hand.'

"Therewith the lords laughed, and asked, 'What is she?'

50 "Forsooth, my lords,' quoth he, 'an Egyptian;<sup>103</sup> and she was lodged here at Lambeth,<sup>104</sup> but she is gone overseas now. Howbeit, I trow she be not in her own country yet; for they say it is a great way hence, and she went over little more than a month ago.'

55 "Now, forsooth," quoth your friend, "this process came to a wise purpose.<sup>105</sup> Here was a great post well thwitted to a pudding prick.<sup>106</sup> But I pray you, to what point came the second matter: of him that had been in office under so many of the King's almoners that he knew by his own experience, and proved, that Richard Hunne had not hanged himself?"

60 "Forsooth," quoth I, "he was called in next. And then was he asked whereby he knew it. But would God ye had seen his countenance. The man had of likelihood said somewhat too far, and was much amazed,<sup>107</sup> and looked as though his eyes would have fallen out of his head into the lords' laps. But to the question he answered and said that he saw that very well, for he saw him both ere he was taken down and after."

65 "What then?' quoth the lords. 'So did there many more, which<sup>108</sup> yet upon the sight could not tell that.'

70 "No, my lords,' quoth he, 'but I have another insight in such things than other men have.'

"What insight?' quoth they.

75 "Forsooth,' quoth he, 'it is not unknown that I have occupied<sup>109</sup> a great while under diverse of the King's almoners, and have seen and considered many that have hanged themselves; and thereby, if I see one hang, I can tell anon<sup>110</sup> whether he hanged himself or not.'

80 "By what token can you tell?' quoth the lords.

85 "Forsooth,' quoth he, 'I cannot tell the tokens; but I perceive it well enough by mine own sight.'

90 "But when they heard him speak of his own sight, and therewith saw what sight he had, looking as though his eyes would have fallen in their laps, there

92 please 93 if 94 informed; notified 95 certainly 96 truly 97 come to somewhat: are getting somewhere 98 whereby think you: for what reason do you think 99 if 100 wist her tell: known her to tell

101 tell 102 trust 103 an Egyptian: a Gypsy 104 a place near Westminster;
Lambeth Palace was the residence of the Archbishop of Canterbury 105 this... purpose: this discussion came to a sensible end 106 thwitted to a pudding prick:

whittled to a toothpick 107 terrified 108 who 109 been employed 110 at once

could few forbear<sup>111</sup> laughing, and said, ‘We see well, surely, that ye have a sight by yourself.’<sup>112</sup> And then said one lord merrily, ‘Peradventure as<sup>113</sup> some man is so cunning by<sup>114</sup> experience of jewels that he can 5 perceive by his own eyes whether a stone be right<sup>115</sup> or counterfeit, though he cannot well make another man to perceive the tokens, so this good fellow, though he cannot tell us the marks,<sup>116</sup> yet he hath such an experience in hanging that himself
10 perceiveth upon the sight whether the man hanged himself or no.’

“‘Yea forsooth, my lord,’ quoth he, ‘even as<sup>117</sup> your lordship saith. For I know it well enough myself, I have seen so many by reason of mine office.’

15 “‘Why,’ quoth another lord merrily, ‘your office hath no more experience in hanging than hath a hangman. And yet he cannot tell.’

“‘Nay, sir,’ quoth he, ‘and it like<sup>118</sup> your lordship, he meddleth not with them that hang themselves, as I do.’

“‘Well,’ quoth one of the lords, ‘how many of them have ye meddled with in your days?’

“‘With many, my lord,’ quoth he, ‘for I have been officer under two almoners, and therefore I have 25 seen many.’

“‘How many?’ quoth one of the lords.

“‘I cannot tell,’ quoth he, ‘how many, but I wot<sup>119</sup> well I have seen many.’

“‘Have ye seen,’ quoth one, ‘a hundred?’

30 “‘Nay,’ quoth he, ‘not a hundred.’

“‘Have ye seen fourscore and ten?’<sup>120</sup> Thereat a little he studied,<sup>121</sup> as one standing in a doubt and that were loath to lie; and at last he said that he thought nay, not fully fourscore and ten. Then was he asked 35 whether he hath seen twenty. And thereto, without any sticking,<sup>122</sup> he answered, ‘Nay, not twenty.’ Thereat the lords laughed well, to see that he was so sure that he had not seen twenty, and was in doubt whether he had seen fourscore and ten. Then was 40 he asked whether he had seen fifteen. And thereto he said shortly nay. And in like wise of ten. At last they came to five, and from five to four. And there he began to study again. Then came they to three, and then — for shame — he was fain<sup>123</sup> to say that he had seen so many, and more too. But when he was asked 45 when, whom, and in what place, necessity drove him at last unto the truth; whereby it appeared that he never had seen but one in all his life. And that was an Irish fellow called Crookshank, whom he had 50 seen hanging in an old barn. And when all his cunning<sup>124</sup> was come to this, he was bid walk like<sup>125</sup> himself. And one said unto him that because he was not yet cunning enough in the craft of hanging, it was pity that he had no more experience thereof by one more.’

“‘Forsooth,’ quoth your friend, “this was a mad fellow. Came the third tale to as wise a point?”

“‘Ye shall hear,’ quoth I. “The temporal man that had reported it upon the mouth of<sup>126</sup> the spiritual man was a good worshipful<sup>127</sup> man, and for his 60 troth<sup>128</sup> and worship was in great credit. And surely the spiritual man was a man of worship also, and well known both for cunning and virtuous. And therefore the lords much marveled, knowing them both for such as they were, that they should be 65 like<sup>129</sup> to find either the one or the other either make an untrue report or untruly deny the truth. And first the temporal man — before the lords, in the hearing of the spiritual person standing by — said:

“‘My lords all, as<sup>130</sup> help me God and halidom,<sup>131</sup> Master Doctor here said unto me his<sup>132</sup> own mouth that if Hunne had not sued the Praemunire, he should never have been accused of heresy.’

“‘How say you, Master Doctor?’ quoth the lords. ‘Was that true? Or else why said you so?’

“‘Surely, my lords,’ quoth he, ‘I said not all things so; but marry, this I said indeed: that if Hunne had not been accused of heresy, he would never have sued the Praemunire.’

“‘Lo, my lords,’ quoth the other, ‘I am glad ye 80 find me a true man. Will ye command me any more service?’

“‘Nay, by my troth,’ quoth one of the lords, ‘not in this matter; by my will, ye may go when ye will. For I have espied, good man, so<sup>133</sup> the words be all 85 one,<sup>134</sup> it maketh no matter to you which way they stand,<sup>135</sup> but all is one to you: a horse mill and a mill horse, “Drink ere ye go” and “Go ere you drink.”’

111 keep from 112 by yourself: all your own 113 Peradventure as: Perhaps just as 114 cunning by: knowledgeable on account of his 115 genuine 116 signs; criteria 117 even as: (it is) just as 118 and it like: if it please 119 know 120 ninety

121 reflected 122 hesitating 123 obliged; forced 124 knowledge, cleverness 125 walk like: do the same 126 upon the mouth of: as having been said by 127 distinguished; honorable 128 integrity; truth; trustworthiness 129 likely 130 so

131 all things holy 132 with his 133 as long as 134 the same 135 which way they stand: what order they are in

“Nay, my lords,’ quoth he, ‘I will not drink, God yield<sup>136</sup> you.’ And therewith he made courtesy<sup>137</sup> and went his way, leaving some of the lords laughing to see the good plain old honest man, how that, as 5 contrary as their two tales were, yet when he heard them both again, he marked no difference between them, but took them both for one because the words were one.”

“By my troth,” quoth your friend, “these three 10 things came merrily to pass, and I would not for a good thing but I had heard them. For here may a man see that misunderstanding maketh misreporting. And a tale that flieth through many mouths catcheth many new feathers, which, when 15 they be pulled away again,<sup>138</sup> leave him as pilled as a coot<sup>139</sup>—and sometimes as bare as a bird’s ass. But I think verily, for all this, there was great evidence given against the Chancellor;<sup>140</sup> for he was at length indicted of<sup>141</sup> Hunne’s death, and was a great 20 while in prison, and in conclusion never durst abide the trial of<sup>142</sup> twelve men for his acquittal, but was fain<sup>143</sup> by friendship to get a pardon. But I beseech you, for my mind’s sake, show me what thought yourself therein.”

“Of truth,” quoth I, “there were diverse suspicious things laid against him, and all those well and substantially answered again for him.<sup>144</sup> Howbeit, upon the telling of a tale oftentimes happeth<sup>145</sup> that when all is heard that can be said therein, yet shall 30 the hearers some think one way and some another. And therefore, though I cannot think but that the jury, which were right honest men, found<sup>146</sup> the verdict as themselves thought in their own conscience to be truth, yet in mine own mind, for aught that 35 ever I heard thereof in my life—as help me God—I could never think it.”<sup>147</sup>

“If he had not been guilty,” quoth your friend, “he would never have sued<sup>148</sup> his pardon.”

“Yes,” quoth I, “right wise men have I heard say 40 ere this that they will never refuse neither God’s pardon nor the King’s. It were no wisdom in a matter of many suspicious tales, be they never so false, to stand<sup>149</sup> on twelve men’s mouths where one may find a surer<sup>150</sup> way. But I think verily that if he had been guilty, he should never have gotten his pardon. For albeit that there was never, I trow, brought 45 in this world a prince of more benign nature, nor of more merciful mind, than is our sovereign lord that now reigneth (and long mote<sup>151</sup> reign) upon us, whereby never king<sup>152</sup> could find in his heart more 50 freely to forgive and forget offenses done and committed unto<sup>153</sup> himself, yet hath his Highness such a fervent affection to right and justice in other men’s causes, and such a tender zeal to the conservation of his subjects (of whose lives his high wis-55 dom considereth many to stand in peril by the giving of pardon to a few willful murderers), that never was there king, I believe, that ever wore the crown in this realm, which<sup>154</sup> hath in so many years given

60 unto such folk so few. And therefore I make myself sure that in such a willful, purpensed,<sup>155</sup> heinous, cruel deed as this had been if it had been true, all the friends that could have been founden for the Chancellor in this world could never have gotten his pardon to pass in such wise,<sup>156</sup> had it not been that upon 65 the report of all the circumstances, the King’s high prudence—which, without flattery, pierceth as deep into the bottom of a doubtful matter as ever I saw man in my life—had well perceived his innocence. And since I verily believe that if he had been guilty, 70 he never could have gotten, in such a heinous murder, any pardon of the King’s Highness, I dare make myself much more bold<sup>157</sup> of his innocence now. For ye shall understand that he never sued pardon there-
75 for.<sup>158</sup> But after long examination of the matter, as well the Chancellor as the others,<sup>159</sup> being indicted of<sup>160</sup> the deed, and arraigned upon the indictment in the King’s Bench,<sup>161</sup> pleaded that they were not guilty. And thereupon the King’s Grace—being well and sufficiently informed of the truth, and, of<sup>162</sup> his 80 blessed disposition, not willing that there should in his name any false matter be maintained<sup>163</sup>—gave in commandment to his attorney to confess their pleas to be true without any further trouble. Which thing, in so faithful a prince, is a clear declaration that the 85 matter laid to the Chancellor was untrue.

136 reward 137 obeisance (to the lords) 138 away again: back off 139 pilled as a coot: bald as a guillemot, a seabird with a black head 140 William Horsey, who was indicted by the coroner’s jury for Hunne’s murder, and eventually pardoned by Henry VIII, thereby avoiding a trial 141 at length indicted of:

eventually indicted for 142 durst . . .
of: dared to stand trial by 143 glad;
obliged 144 substantially answered again for him: solidly answered in response in his favor 145 it happens 146 gave; returned 147 it was true 148 petitioned for 149 rely on 150 safer 151 may (he) 152 whereby never king: because of which (merciful mind) there was never a king who 153 against 154 who 155 premeditated

156 pass . . . wise: come about in such a way 157 confident 158 for it 159 i.e., the Chancellor’s guards 160 for 161 King’s Bench: a civil court 162 on account of 163 matter . . . maintained: charge be sustained

“And as for myself, in good faith as I told you before, I never heard in my life (and yet have I heard all, I ween, that well could be said) therein anything that moved me, after both the parties heard,<sup>164</sup> to think that he should be guilty.

“And besides all this, considering that Hunne was (as they that well know him say he was indeed), though he were a fair dealer among his neighbors, yet a man high-minded and set on the glory of a victory which he hoped to have in the Praemunire — whereof he much boasted, as they said, among his familiar<sup>165</sup> friends, that he trusted to be spoken of long after his days, and have his matter<sup>166</sup> in the Years and Terms<sup>167</sup> called ‘Hunne’s Case’ — which, when he perceived would go against his purpose, and that in the temporal law<sup>168</sup> he should not win his spurs, and over<sup>169</sup> that in the spiritual law<sup>170</sup> perceived so much of his secret sores unwrapped and discovered that he began to fall in<sup>171</sup> fear of worldly shame, it is to me much more likely that for<sup>172</sup> weariness of his life he rid himself out thereof; which manner of affection<sup>173</sup> we see not seldom happen, specially since the devil might peradventure join therewith a marvelous hope of that which after happened: that the suspicion of his death might be laid to the charge and peril of the Chancellor. This is, I say, much more likely to me than the thing whereof I never heard the like before: that the Bishop’s Chancellor should kill in the Lollards’ Tower<sup>174</sup> a man so sore<sup>175</sup> suspected and convicted of heresy, whereby he might bring himself in business,<sup>176</sup> whereas if he hated the man (for kill him he would not, ye wot well, if he loved him), he might easily bring him to shame and peradventure to shameful death also.”

“In good faith,” quoth your friend, “wist I that it were<sup>177</sup> true that he was a heretic indeed, and in peril to be so proved, I would well think that in malice and despair he hanged himself.”

“God,” quoth I, “knoweth of all things the truth. But what I have heard therein, that shall I show you.

“Myself was present in Paul’s<sup>178</sup> when the Bishop, in the presence of the Mayor and the aldermen of the city, condemned him for a heretic after his death. And then were there read openly the depositions, by which it was well proved that he was convicted as well of diverse other heresies as of misbelief toward the Holy Sacrament of the altar. And thereupon was the judgment given that his body should be burned; and so was it.

“Now this is,” quoth I, “to me a full proof. For I assure you, the Bishop was a very wise man, a virtuous and a cunning.”

“By Saint Mary,” quoth he, “the proof is the better by so much.”

“I shall tell you,” quoth I, “another thing, which, when ye hear, ye shall peradventure believe it yet the better.”

“That would I gladly know,” quoth he. “For as far as I can hear, never man had<sup>179</sup> him suspect of any such thing before.”

“Forsooth,” quoth I, “that can I not tell. But so it happened that — as I remember, six or seven years after that Hunne was thus hanged and his body burned for a heretic — there was one in Essex, a carpenter that used to make pumps, which had intended, with others such as he was himself, to do great robbery; and thereupon was he brought unto the Court, where by the commandment of the King’s Grace, a great honorable estate<sup>180</sup> of this realm and myself had him in examination. Wherein, among other things, he confessed that he had long held diverse heresies, which he said that his brother, being a clerk<sup>181</sup> of a church, had taught both his father and him. And I promise you, those heresies were of a height.<sup>182</sup> Then he showed us what other cunning masters<sup>183</sup> of that school he had heard read,<sup>184</sup> and specially in a place which he named us in London, where he said that such heretics were wont to resort<sup>185</sup> to their readings in a chamber at midnight. And when we asked him the names of them that were wont to haunt those midnight lectures, he rehearsed<sup>186</sup> us diverse; and among others he named Richard Hunne. Whereof we somewhat marveled in our minds; but nothing said we thereto, but let him rehearse on all such as he could call to mind. And when he stopped and could remember no more, then asked we of<sup>187</sup> them that he had named,

164 were heard 165 close 166 lawsuit
167 Years and Terms: The set of books covering all the court proceedings in England. 168 temporal law: civil court
169 besides 170 spiritual law: ecclesiastical court 171 into 172 because of

173 manner of affection: kind of mental disposition 174 Lollards’ Tower: a part of Lambeth Palace used as a prison for heretics 175 strongly 176 in business: into trouble 177 wist I that it were: if I knew that it was 178 St. Paul’s Church

179 held 180 nobleman 181 someone in minor orders (not a priest); scholar
182 serious nature 183 cunning masters: learned teachers 184 give lectures
185 wont to resort: accustomed to go
186 named 187 about what they were and where they dwelled. And he told us of some of them that were convicted, and some that were fled, and some that were yet at that time dwelling still in the town. And in<sup>188</sup> the way, when we asked him what man was that ‘Hunne’ that he spoke of, he told us his person<sup>189</sup> and his house. ‘And where is he now?’ said we. ‘Marry,’ quoth he, ‘I went to Tournai,<sup>190</sup> and when I came thence again, then heard I say<sup>191</sup> that he was hanged in the Lollards’ Tower, and his body burned for a heretic.’ And thus there learned we, long after, that Hunne had haunted heretics’ lectures by night long before, which we declared unto the King’s Highness as he<sup>192</sup> had confessed. And his Highness, though he was sorry that any man should be so lewd,<sup>193</sup> yet highly did rejoice that the goodness of God brought such hid mischief<sup>194</sup> more and more to light. So after<sup>195</sup> had we (by the King’s commandment) that man’s brother in examination, which<sup>196</sup> did indeed confess nothing, neither of the felonies<sup>197</sup> nor of the heresies. But yet his brother did abide<sup>198</sup> by them and avowed them in<sup>199</sup> his face, with such marks and tokens as it might well appear that he said truth. And surely marvel were it<sup>200</sup> if he would falsely have feigned such heinous things against his own brother, his own father, and himself, being thereto nothing compelled, nor put either in pain or fear. Now was the father dead; and others could we not come by, whom we might further examine of<sup>201</sup> that night school, saving<sup>202</sup> that he which, as I told you, confessed this matter, showed us also, at the first time, of one man in London, taken for good and honest, which<sup>203</sup> was (as he said) a scholar<sup>204</sup> also of his brother in those heresies—which man, for his honesty,<sup>205</sup> we forbore to meddle with till we should have the other brother. Whom, as soon as we had in hands, and that he was committed to the Marshalsea,<sup>206</sup> this other man, which was, as I told you, detected<sup>207</sup> unto us for a heretic and a scholar of his, came to me to labor and sue<sup>208</sup> for him, pretending that he did it for charity. And forasmuch as we thought we could not fail of him when we would have him,<sup>209</sup> we forbore therefore to examine him till we should have examined the other whom he labored for. But then were we not aware in what wise we should be disappointed of him. For so mis-happened it indeed that, after his being at<sup>210</sup> me to labor for him whose scholar in heresy he was detected to be, he was in his own house suddenly stricken and slain. And that wretched end had he. What conscience he died with, God knoweth; for I can tell you no further.”

“By Saint John,” quoth your friend, “but, upon the whole tale, it seemeth to me very clear that Hunne was himself not clear of the matter.”

“Surely,” quoth I, “so seemed it, as far as I could wit,<sup>211</sup> unto as many as ever heard it, and would yet, I ween,<sup>212</sup> have seemed so more clearly if they had been present at the examinations, and seen under what manner the man came forth therewith.”

“But yet,” quoth your friend, “as for his English Bible, though Hunne were himself a heretic, yet might the book be good enough. And no good reason is there why a good book should be burned with an evil man.”

“Ye call me well home,”<sup>213</sup> quoth I, “and put me well in mind.<sup>214</sup> For that was the thing whereby ye took occasion to talk of Hunne, of whom we talked so long that at last I had forgotten wherefore and whereupon<sup>215</sup> we entered into that communication. And yet make those books not a little<sup>216</sup> to the matter that we had in hand—I mean toward the perceiving what opinion that Hunne was of. For surely at such time as he was denounced for a heretic, there lay his English Bible open (and some other English books of his), that every man might see the places noted with his own hand:<sup>217</sup> such words, and in such wise, that there would no wise man that good were have any great doubt, after the sight thereof, what naughty<sup>218</sup> minds the men had, both he that so noted them and he that so made them. I remember not now the specialties of the matter,<sup>219</sup> nor the formal<sup>220</sup> words as they were written. But this I remember well: that besides other things framed for the favor of diverse other heresies, there were in the prologue of that Bible such

188 along 189 his person: what he looked like 190 a French town captured by England in 1513 and returned to the French in 1518 191 heard I say: I heard it said 192 that thief 193 wicked 194 evil 195 afterward 196 who 197 the felonies: their crimes of grand larceny 198 stand firm 199 to 200 were it: would it be

201 concerning 202 except 203 who 204 pupil; student 205 for his honesty: because of his reputation 206 a famous prison near London 207 informed on; accused 208 labor and sue: advocate and petition 209 fail... have him: fail to get hold of him whenever we wanted to 210 being at: coming to

211 know; discern 212 think 213 to the point 214 put... mind: i.e., remind me 215 wherefore and whereupon: why and on what basis 216 make... little: those Bibles have no little relevance 217 with... hand: in his own handwriting 218 wicked 219 specialties of the matter: particulars of the content 220 exact words touching the Blessed Sacrament as good Christian men did much abhor to hear, and which gave the readers undoubted occasion to think that the book was written after Wycliffe's copy,<sup>221</sup> and by 5 him translated into our tongue. And yet whether the book be burned or secretly kept, I cannot surely say. But truly—were the clergy of my mind—it should be somewhere reserved for the perpetual proof of the matter, there hath gone so much sus-10 picious rumor thereof. Which, as I believe, were<sup>222</sup> all well answered and the mind fully satisfied of any man that wise were and good therewith, that once had overlooked,<sup>223</sup> read, and advisedly<sup>224</sup> considered that book."

15 THE SIXTEENTH CHAPTER

The messenger rehearseth<sup>225</sup> some causes which he hath heard laid<sup>226</sup> by some of the clergy wherefore the Scripture should not be suffered<sup>227</sup> in English.

And the author showeth his mind: that it were 20 convenient<sup>228</sup> to have the Bible in English.

And therewith endeth the Third Book.

"Sir," quoth your friend, "yet for all this can I see no cause why the clergy should keep the Bible out of laymen's hands, that can<sup>229</sup> no more but their 25 mother tongue."

"I had weened," quoth I, "that I had proved you plainly that they keep it not from them. For I have showed you that they keep none from them but such translation as be either not yet approved for 30 good, or such as be already reprov'd for naught,<sup>230</sup> as Wycliffe's was, and Tyndale's. For as for other old ones, that were before Wycliffe's days, remain<sup>231</sup> lawful, and be in some folks' hands had and read."

"Ye say well," quoth he. "But yet, as women say, 35 somewhat it was always that the cat winked when her eye was out.<sup>232</sup> Surely so is it not for nought<sup>233</sup> that the English Bible is in so few men's hands, when so many would so fain<sup>234</sup> have it."

"That is very truth," quoth I. "For I think that, 40 though the favorers of a sect of heretics be so fervent in the setting forth of their sect that they let<sup>235</sup> not to lay their money together and make a purse<sup>236</sup> among them for the printing of an evil-made or evil-translated book (which, though it hap-45 to be forbidden and burned, yet some be sold ere they be spied,<sup>237</sup> and each of them lose but their part),<sup>238</sup> yet I think there will no printer lightly<sup>239</sup> be so hot to put any Bible in print at his own charge—whereof the loss should lie wholly in<sup>240</sup> his own neck—and then hang<sup>241</sup> upon a doubtful 50 trial<sup>242</sup> whether the first copy of his translation was made before Wycliffe's days or since. For if it were made since, it must be approved before the printing. And surely how it hath happened that in all this while, God hath either not suffered or not provided 55 that any good virtuous man hath had the mind in faithful wise<sup>243</sup> to translate it, and thereupon either the clergy or at the leastwise some one bishop to approve it, this can I nothing tell. But howsoever it be, I have heard and hear so much spoken in<sup>244</sup> the 60 matter, and so much doubt made therein,<sup>245</sup> that peradventure it would let and withdraw<sup>246</sup> any one bishop from the admitting thereof without the assent of the remnant. And whereas<sup>247</sup> many things be laid against it, yet is there in my mind not one 65 thing that more putteth good men of the clergy in doubt to suffer it than this: that they see sometimes much of the worse sort more fervent in the calling for it than them whom we find far better, which maketh them to fear lest such men desire it 70 for no good, and lest if it were had in every man's hand, there would great peril arise, and that seditious people should do more harm therewith than good and honest folk should take fruit thereby.

Which fear, I promise you, nothing feareth me;<sup>248</sup> 75 but that<sup>249</sup> whosoever would of their malice or folly take harm of that thing that is of itself ordained to do all men good, I would never, for the avoiding of their harm, take from others the profit which they might take and nothing deserve to lose. For else,<sup>250</sup> 80 if the abuse of a good thing should cause the taking away thereof from others that would use it well, Christ should himself never have been born, nor 221 written . . . copy: copied from Wycliffe's edition 222 would be 223 examined; inspected 224 carefully 225 relates 226 alleged 227 allowed 228 appro-229 can speak 230 reprov'd for naught: condemned as bad 231 they remain 232 the cat . . . out: Proverbial:

a one-eyed cat has no choice but to wink (the bishops have no choice but to say they approve of some English translations, but they don't really approve) 233 nothing 234 gladly 235 hesitate 236 fund 237 noticed 238 own share (of the cost) 239 likely 240 on 241 depend

242 investigation 243 faithful wise: an accurate way 244 about 245 doubt made therein: question expressed about it 246 let and withdraw: prevent and deter 247 while 248 nothing feareth me: does not at all frighten me 249 but that: rather 250 otherwise

brought his faith into the world, nor God should never have made it<sup>251</sup> neither, if he should — for<sup>252</sup> the loss of those that would be damned wretches — have kept away the occasion of reward from them that would, with help of his grace, endeavor them to deserve it.”<sup>253</sup>

“I am sure,” quoth your friend, “ye doubt not but that I am full and wholly of your mind in this matter, that the Bible should be in our English tongue. But yet that the clergy is of the contrary, and would not have it so, that appeareth well in that they suffer it not to be so. And over that, I hear in every place almost where I find any learned man of them,<sup>254</sup> their minds all set thereon to keep the Scripture from us. And they seek out for that part<sup>255</sup> every rotten reason that they can find, and set them forth solemnly to the show,<sup>256</sup> though five of those reasons be not worth a fig. For they begin as far<sup>257</sup> as our first father, Adam, and show us that his wife and he fell out of Paradise with desire of knowledge and cunning.<sup>258</sup> Now if this would serve, it must from the knowledge and study of Scripture drive every man — priest and other — lest it drive all out of Paradise. Then say they that God taught his disciples many things apart because the people should not hear it. And therefore they would<sup>259</sup> the people should not now be suffered to read all. Yet they say further that it is hard to translate the Scripture out of one tongue into another — and specially, they say, into ours, which they call a tongue vulgar and barbarous. But of all things specially they say that Scripture is the food of the soul, and that the common people be as infants that must be fed but with milk and pap.<sup>260</sup> And if we have any stronger meat, it must be chammed<sup>261</sup> afore by the nurse and so put into the baby’s mouth. But methink though they make us all<sup>262</sup> infants, they shall find many a shrewd brain among us that can perceive chalk from cheese well enough, and if<sup>263</sup> they would once take<sup>264</sup> us our meat in our own hand. We be not so evil-toothed<sup>265</sup> but that within a while they shall see us cham it ourselves as well as they. For let them call us young babies and<sup>266</sup> they will — yet by God they shall, for all that, well find in some of us that an old knave is no child!”

“Surely,” quoth I, “such things as ye speak, is the thing that, as I somewhat said before, putteth good folk in fear to suffer the Scripture in our English tongue: not for the reading and receiving,<sup>267</sup> but for the busy chaming thereof, and for much meddling with such parts thereof as least will agree with their capacities. For undoubtedly, as ye spoke of our mother Eve, inordinate appetite of knowledge is a means to drive any man out of Paradise. And inordinate is the appetite when men unlearned, though they read it in their language, will be busy to ensearch and dispute the great secret mysteries of Scripture, which though they hear they be not able to perceive. This thing is plainly forbidden us that<sup>268</sup> be not appointed nor instructed thereto. And therefore holy Saint Gregory Nazianzen — that great solemn doctor — sore toucheth and reproveth<sup>269</sup> all such bold busy<sup>270</sup> meddlers in the Scripture, and showeth that it is in Exodus (by Moses ascending up upon the hill, where he spoke with God, and the people tarrying beneath) signified that the people be forbidden to presume to meddle with the high mysteries of Holy Scripture, but ought to be content to tarry beneath and meddle none higher<sup>271</sup> than is meet<sup>272</sup> for them, but receiving from the height of the hill by Moses that that<sup>273</sup> is delivered them — that is to wit, the laws and precepts that they must keep, and the points they must believe, look well thereupon, and often, and meddle well therewith, not to dispute it but to fulfill it.<sup>274</sup> And as for the high secret mysteries of God, and hard texts of his Holy Scripture, let us know that we be so unable to ascend up so high on that hill that it shall become<sup>275</sup> us to say to the preachers appointed thereto as the people said unto Moses: ‘Hear you God, and let us hear you.’<sup>276</sup> And surely the blessed holy doctor Saint Jerome greatly complaineth<sup>277</sup> and rebuketh that lewd<sup>278</sup> homely manner<sup>279</sup> that the common lay people — men and women — were in his days so bold in the meddling, disputing, and expounding of Holy Scripture, and showeth plainly that they shall have

251 the world 252 on account of 253 endeavor . . . deserve it: exert themselves to earn it 254 of them: among the clergy 255 side; cause 256 view 257 that far back 258 learning 259 desire that 260 See Heb 5:12–14; 1 Cor 3:1–3. 261 chewed 262 all out to be 263 and if: if 264 give 265 ill-toothed; poorly equipped with teeth 266 if 267 accepting 268 who 269 sore toucheth and reproveth: strongly rebukes and criticizes 270 prying 271 none higher: with no higher things 272 appropriate; fitting 273 which 274 St. Gregory (329–90)

was Archbishop of Constantinople; see his Defense of his Flight to Pontus (PG 35: 495–96). 275 be proper for 276 Ex 20:19 277 laments; deplores 278 uneducated; vulgar; bad 279 practice; custom evil proof<sup>280</sup> therein, that will reckon themselves to understand it by themselves without a reader.<sup>281</sup> For it is a thing that requireth good help, and long time, and a whole mind given greatly thereto. And surely since as the holy apostle Saint Paul in diverse of his epistles saith, God hath by his Holy Spirit so instituted and ordained his Church that he will have some readers and some hearers, some teachers and some learners,<sup>282</sup> we do plainly pervert and turn upside down the right order of Christ's Church when the one party meddleth with the other's office. Plato, the great philosopher, specially forbiddeth such as be not admitted thereunto, nor men meet therefor,<sup>283</sup> to meddle much and embusye<sup>284</sup> themselves in reasoning and disputing upon the temporal laws of the city, which would<sup>285</sup> not be reasoned upon but by folk meet therefor and in place convenient.<sup>286</sup> For else they that cannot very well attain to perceive<sup>287</sup> them begin to mislike, dispraise, and contemn<sup>288</sup> them. Whereof followeth the breach of the laws and disorder of the people. For till a law be changed by authority, it rather ought to be observed than contemned. Or else the example of one law boldly broken and set at nought<sup>289</sup> waxeth a precedent for the remnant to be used like.<sup>290</sup> And commonly the best laws shall worst like<sup>291</sup> much of the common people, which most long (if they might be heard and followed) to live all at liberty under none at all. Now if Plato, so wise a man, so thought good<sup>292</sup> in temporal laws — things of men's making — how much is it less meet for every man boldly to meddle with the exposition of Holy Scripture, so devised and indited<sup>293</sup> by the high wisdom of God that it far exceedeth, in many places, the capacity and perceiving<sup>294</sup> of man. It was also provided by the Emperor,<sup>295</sup> in the law civil, that the common people should never be so bold to keep dispicions<sup>296</sup> upon the faith or Holy Scripture, nor that any such thing should be used<sup>297</sup> among them or before them.<sup>298</sup> And therefore, as I said before, the special fear in this matter is lest we would be too busy in chaming of the Scripture ourselves — which ye say we were<sup>299</sup> able enough to do — which undoubtedly the wisest and the best-learned, and he that therein hath by<sup>300</sup> many years bestowed his whole mind, is yet unable to do. And then far more unable must he needs be that boldly will, upon the first reading, because he knoweth the words, take upon him therefore to teach other men the sentence,<sup>301</sup> with peril of his own soul and other men's too, by the bringing men into mad ways, sects, and heresies, such as heretics have of old brought up and the Church hath condemned. And thus in these matters, if the common people might be bold to cham it, as ye say, and to dispute it, then should ye have the more blind, the more bold; the more ignorant, the more busy;<sup>302</sup> the less wit,<sup>303</sup> the more inquisitive; the more fool, the more talkative of great doubts<sup>304</sup> and high questions of Holy Scripture and of God's great and secret mysteries — and this not soberly, of any good affection,<sup>305</sup> but presumptuously and unreverently, at meat and at meal. And there when the wine were in and the wit out, would they take upon them with foolish words and blasphemy to handle Holy Scripture in more homely<sup>306</sup> manner than a song of Robin Hood. And some would, as I said, solemnly take upon them, like as<sup>307</sup> they were ordinary readers,<sup>308</sup> to interpret the text at their pleasure, and therewith<sup>309</sup> fall themselves, and draw down others with them into seditious sects and heresies, whereby the Scripture of God should lose his<sup>310</sup> honor and reverence, and be, by such unreverent and unsitting demeanor,<sup>311</sup> among much people quite and clean abused,<sup>312</sup> unto the contrary of that holy purpose that God ordained it for. Whereas if we would no further meddle therewith but well and devoutly read it; and in that that is plain and evident (as<sup>313</sup> God's commandments and his holy counsels) endeavor ourselves to follow, with help of his grace asked thereunto; and in his great and marvelous miracles consider his Godhead;<sup>314</sup> and in his lowly birth, his godly life, and his bitter Passion, exercise ourselves in such meditations, prayer, and virtues as the matter shall minister<sup>315</sup> us occasion; acknowledging our own ignorance where we find a

280 outcome 281 a reader: an interpreter
282 See 1 Cor 12:28–30; Eph 4:11.
283 meet therefor: suitable for it 284 busy 285 should 286 appropriate. See Laws (Book 1). 287 attain to perceive: manage to understand 288 disregard 289 set at nought: values as nothing 290 used like: treated the same way 291 please

292 so thought good: thought this way good 293 inspired; composed; dictated 294 understanding 295 Justinian (482–565) 296 keep dispicions: engage in disputations 297 practiced; engaged in 298 See the Code of Justinian, 1.1.4.
299 would be 300 for 301 meaning 302 meddlesome 303 intellect;

sense 304 difficulties 305 inclination 306 rough 307 like as: as if 308 ordinary readers: ordained lectors trained to read the Scripture 309 by that 310 its 311 unsitting demeanor: unbecoming behavior 312 quite... abused: utterly and completely misused 313 such as 314 divinity 315 supply

doubt, and, therein leaning to<sup>316</sup> the faith of the Church, wrestle with no such text as might bring us in a doubt and weresty of<sup>317</sup> any of those articles wherein every good Christian man is clear — by this manner of reading can no man nor woman take hurt in Holy Scripture. Now then, the things on the other side that unlearned people can never by themselves attain<sup>318</sup> — as in the Psalms and the prophets and diverse parts of the Gospel, where the words be sometimes spoken as in the person of the prophet himself, sometimes as in the person of God, sometimes of some others, as angels, devils, or men, and sometimes of our Savior Christ (not always of one fashion,<sup>319</sup> but sometimes as God, sometimes as man, sometimes as head of this mystical body his Church militant here in earth, sometimes as head of his Church triumphant in heaven, sometimes as in the person of his sensual<sup>320</sup> parts of his own body, otherwhile<sup>321</sup> in the person of some particular part of his body mystical), and these things, with many others, oftentimes interchanged,<sup>322</sup> and suddenly sundry things of diverse matters diversely mingled together — all these things which is not possible for unlearned men to attain unto, it were more than madness for them to meddle withal, but leave all these things to them whose whole study is beset<sup>323</sup> thereupon, and to the preachers appointed thereunto, which<sup>324</sup> may show them such things in time and place convenient,<sup>325</sup> with reverence and authority, the sermon so tempered<sup>326</sup> as may be meet<sup>327</sup> and convenient always for the present audience. Whereunto it appeareth that our Savior himself, and his apostles after him, had ever special respect.<sup>328</sup>

“And therefore, as I say, forsooth, I can in no wise agree with you that it were meet for men unlearned to be busy with the chamming<sup>329</sup> of Holy Scripture, but to have it chammed unto them. For that is the preachers’ part, and theirs that after long study are admitted to read<sup>330</sup> and expound it. And to this intent weigh all the words, as far as I perceive, of all holy doctors that anything have written in this matter. But never meant they, as I suppose, the forbidding of the Bible to be read in any vulgar tongue.

Nor I never yet heard any reason laid<sup>331</sup> why it were not convenient to have the Bible translated into the English tongue, but all those reasons, seemed they never so gay<sup>332</sup> and glorious at the first sight, yet when they were well examined, they might, in effect, for aught that I can see, as well be laid against the holy writers that wrote the Scripture in the Hebrew tongue, and against the blessed evangelists that wrote the Scripture in Greek, and against all those in like wise that translated it out of every of those tongues into Latin, as to their charge that<sup>333</sup> would well and faithfully translate it out of Latin into our English tongue. For as for that our tongue is called barbarous, is<sup>334</sup> but a fantasy. For so is, as every learned man knoweth, every strange<sup>335</sup> language to other.<sup>336</sup> And if they would call it barren of words, there is no doubt but it is plenteous enough to express our minds in anything whereof one man hath used<sup>337</sup> to speak with another.

“Now as touching the difficulty which a translator findeth in expressing well and lively<sup>338</sup> the sentence<sup>339</sup> of his author — which is hard always to do so, surely, but that he shall sometimes diminish either of the sentence or of the grace that it beareth in the former tongue — that point hath lain in their light that<sup>340</sup> have translated the Scripture already, either out of Greek into Latin or out of Hebrew into any<sup>341</sup> of them both, as by many translations which we read already (to them that be learned) appeareth. Now as touching the harm that may grow by such blind bayards<sup>342</sup> as will, when they read the Bible in English, be more busy<sup>343</sup> than will become them: they that touch that point harp upon the right string, and touch truly the great harm that were likely to grow<sup>344</sup> to some folk — howbeit, not by the occasion yet of the English translation, but by the occasion of their own lewdness and folly, which yet were not, in my mind, a sufficient cause to exclude the translation and to put other folk from<sup>345</sup> the benefit thereof, but rather to make provision against such abuse, and let a good thing go forth. No wise man were there that would put all weapons away because manquellers<sup>346</sup> misuse them.

316 leaning to: relying on 317 weresty of: uncertainty about 318 come to understand 319 of one fashion: in the same way 320 physical 321 other times 322 alternated 323 spent 324 who 325 suitable; appropriate 326 properly constituted 327 fitting

328 regard; consideration 329 chewing 330 admitted to read: officially authorized to interpret 331 alleged 332 never so gay: no matter how brilliant 333 who 334 that is 335 foreign 336 another 337 been accustomed 338 vividly 339 meaning 340 in . . . that: in the full view of those who 341 either 342 blind bayards: proverbial for recklessness and self-confident ignorance 343 inquisitive 344 come 345 put . . . from: deprive other people of 346 murderers

Nor this letted<sup>347</sup> not, as I said, the Scripture to be first written in a vulgar tongue. For the Scripture, as I said before, was not written but in a vulgar tongue, such as the whole people understood, nor in no secret ciphers, but such common letters as almost every man could read. For neither was the Hebrew, nor the Greek tongue, nor the Latin neither, any other speech than such as all the people spoke. And therefore if we should lay that it were evil done to translate the Scripture into our tongue, because it is vulgar and common to every Englishman, then had it been as evil done to translate it into Greek or into Latin, or to write the New Testament first in Greek or the Old Testament in Hebrew, because both those tongues were as very vulgar as ours. And yet should there, by this reason, also not only the Scripture be kept out of our tongue, but, over that, should the reading thereof be forbidden both all such lay people and all such priests, too, as can<sup>348</sup> no more than their grammar, and very scantily<sup>349</sup> that. All which company, though they can understand the words, be yet as far from the perceiving of the sentence<sup>350</sup> in hard and doubtful texts as were our women if the Scripture were translated to our own language. Howbeit, of truth seldom hath it been seen that any sect of heretics hath begun of such unlearned folk as nothing could<sup>351</sup> else but the language wherein they read the Scripture, but there hath always commonly these sects sprung of<sup>352</sup> the pride of such folk as had, with the knowledge of the tongue, some high persuasion in themselves of their own learning besides. To whose authority some other folk have soon after — part of malice, part of simpleness, and much part of pleasure and delight in newfangledness — fallen<sup>353</sup> in and increased the faction. But the head hath ever commonly been either some proud learned man, or at the least, besides the language, some proud smatterer<sup>354</sup> in learning, so that if we should, for fear of heretics that might hap to grow thereby, keep the Scripture out of any tongue, or out of unlearned men's hands, we should for like fear be fain<sup>355</sup> to keep it out of all tongues — and out of learned men's hands too — and wot not whom we might trust therewith. Wherefore there is, as methinketh, no remedy but if any good thing shall go forward, somewhat must needs be adventured.<sup>356</sup> And some folk will not fail to be naught.<sup>357</sup> Against which things provision must be made, that as much good may grow, and as little harm come, as can be devised, and not to keep the whole commodity<sup>358</sup> from any whole people because of harm that — by their own folly and fault — may come to some part. As though a lewd<sup>359</sup> surgeon would cut off the leg by the knee to keep the toe from the gout, or cut off a man's head by the shoulders to keep him from the toothache. There is no treatise<sup>360</sup> of Scripture so hard but that a good virtuous man, or woman either, shall somewhat find therein that shall delight and increase their devotion — besides this, that every preaching shall be the more pleasant and fruitful unto them when they have in their mind the place of Scripture that they shall there hear expounded. For though it be, as it is indeed, great wisdom for a preacher to use discretion in his preaching, and to have a respect unto the qualities<sup>361</sup> and capacities of his audience, yet letteth that nothing but<sup>362</sup> that the whole audience may without harm have read and have already the Scripture in mind that he shall in his preaching declare<sup>363</sup> and expound. For no doubt is there but that God and his Holy Spirit hath so prudently tempered their speech through the whole corpus of Scripture that every man may take good thereby and no man harm, but he that will in the study thereof lean proudly to the folly of his own wit.<sup>364</sup> For albeit that Christ did speak to the people in parables and expounded them secretly<sup>365</sup> to his especial disciples<sup>366</sup> — and sometimes forbore to tell some things to them also, because they were not as yet able to bear them,<sup>367</sup> and the apostles in like wise did sometimes spare to speak<sup>368</sup> to some people the things that they did not let<sup>369</sup> plainly to speak to some others<sup>370</sup> — yet letteth<sup>371</sup> all this nothing the translation of the Scripture into our own tongue, no more than in<sup>372</sup> the Latin. Nor it is no cause to keep the corpus of Scripture out of the hands of any Christian people, so many years fastly<sup>373</sup> confirmed in faith, because Christ and his apostles used such provision<sup>374</sup> in their utterance of so strange and wicked 360 book 361 respect unto the qualities: consideration of the dispositions or characters 362 letteth that nothing but: this in no way prevents 363 explain 364 intellect 365 in private 366 See Mk 4:33–34. 367 See Jn 16:12.

347 prevented 348 know 349 hardly, barely 350 meaning 351 knew 352 from 353 joined 354 dabbler 355 obliged 356 somewhat...adventured: something must be risked 357 bad 358 benefit 359 ignorant, unskillful;

368 spare to speak: refrain from saying 369 hesitate 370 See 1 Cor 3:1–3. 371 prevents 372 into 373 steadfastly; solidly 374 foresight unheard mysteries either unto Jews, paynims,<sup>375</sup> or newly christened folk — except<sup>376</sup> we would say that all the expositions which Christ made himself upon his own parables unto his secret<sup>377</sup> servants and disciples, withdrawn from the people, should now at this day be kept in like wise from the commons, and no man suffered<sup>378</sup> to read or hear them but those that in his Church represent the state<sup>379</sup> and office of his apostles. Which there will, I wot well, no wise man say, considering that those things which were then commonly most kept from the people be now most necessary for the people to know, as it well appeareth by all such things, in effect, as our Savior at the time taught his apostles apart. Whereof I would not for my mind withhold the profit that one good, devout, unlearned layman might take by the reading — not for the harm that a hundred heretics would fall in by their own willful abusio<sup>380</sup> — no more than our Savior letted,<sup>381</sup> for the weal<sup>382</sup> of such as would be with his grace of his little chosen flock, to come into this world and be lapis of fensionis, et petra scandali ('the stone of stumbling, and the stone of falling')<sup>383</sup> and ruin to all the willful wretches in the world besides. Finally, methinketh that the constitution provincial<sup>384</sup> of which we spoke right now hath determined this question already. For when the clergy therein agreed that the English Bibles should remain which were translated afore Wycliffe's days, they consequently did agree that to have the Bible in English was none hurt.<sup>385</sup> And in that they forbade any new translation to be read till it were approved by the bishops, it appeareth well thereby that their intent was that the bishop should approve it if he found it faultless,<sup>386</sup> and also of reason amend it where it were faulty, but if the man were a heretic that made it, or the faults such and so many as it were more easy to make it all new than mend it — as it happed for both points in the translation of Tyndale.

"Now if it so be that it would haply<sup>387</sup> be thought not a thing meetly to be adventured<sup>388</sup> to set all on a flush<sup>389</sup> at once, and dash rashly out Holy Scripture in every lewd fellow's teeth,<sup>390</sup> yet thinketh me there might such a moderation be taken therein as neither good virtuous lay folk should lack it, nor rude and rash brains abuse it. For it might be with diligence well and truly translated by some good, Catholic, and well-learned man, or by diverse, dividing the labor among them, and after,<sup>391</sup> conferring<sup>392</sup> their several parts together, each with other. And after that might the work be allowed and approved by the ordinaries,<sup>393</sup> and by their authorities so put unto print as all the copies should come whole unto the bishop's hand. Which he may, after<sup>394</sup> his discretion and wisdom, deliver to such as he perceiveth honest, sad,<sup>395</sup> and virtuous, with a good monition and fatherly counsel to use it reverently, with humble heart and lowly mind, rather seeking therein occasion of devotion than of dispicion,<sup>396</sup> and providing as much as may be that the book be, after the decease of the party, brought again<sup>397</sup> and reverently restored<sup>398</sup> unto the ordinary, so that, as near as may be devised, no man have it but of the ordinary's hand, and by him thought and reputed for such as shall be likely to use it to God's honor and merit of his own soul. Among whom, if any be proved after to have abused it, then the use thereof to be forbidden him, either forever or till he be waxen<sup>399</sup> wiser."

"By our Lady," quoth your friend, "this way misliketh<sup>400</sup> not me. But who should set the price of the book?"

"Forsooth," quoth I, "that reckon I a thing of little force.<sup>401</sup> For neither were it a great matter for any man in manner to give a groat or twain<sup>402</sup> above the mean<sup>403</sup> price for a book of so great profit, nor for the bishop to give them all free, wherein he might serve his diocese with the cost of ten pounds (I think) or twenty marks. Which sum, I dare say, there is no bishop but he would be glad to bestow about<sup>404</sup> a thing that might do his whole diocese so special a pleasure with such a spiritual profit."

"By my troth," quoth he, "yet ween I that the people would grudge<sup>405</sup> to have it on this wise<sup>406</sup> delivered them at the bishop's hand, and had liefer pay for it to the printer<sup>407</sup> than have it of the bishop free."

375 pagans 376 unless 377 trusted; confidential 378 allowed 379 status; rank 380 misuse; perversion 381 refrained; hesitated 382 well-being 383 1 Pt 2:8 384 constitution provincial: decree of the synod 385 none hurt: not at all harmful 386 free of error 387 perhaps 388 meetly to be adventured:

suitably to be risked 389 set all on a flush: suddenly increase the number (of Bibles) all 390 dash . . . teeth: rashly throw a Bible into every bum's face 391 afterward 392 collecting and comparing 393 bishops 394 according to 395 sober-minded; serious 396 debate 397 back 398 returned 399 be waxen: grows, becomes 400 displeases 401 importance 402 groat or twain: fourpence or two 403 average 404 bestow about: spend on 405 complain 406 on this wise: in this way 407 had . . . printer: would rather pay the printer for it

“It might so happen with some,” quoth I. “But yet, in mine opinion, there were in that manner more willfulness than wisdom, or any good mind, in such as would not be content so to receive them. And therefore I would think, in good faith, that it would so fortune<sup>408</sup> in few. But, ’fore God, the more doubt<sup>409</sup> would be lest they would grudge and hold themselves sore grieved<sup>410</sup> that would require<sup>411</sup> it and were haply denied it. Which I suppose would not often happen unto any honest householder, to be<sup>412</sup> by his discretion reverently read in his house. But though<sup>413</sup> it were not taken to every lewd<sup>414</sup> lad in his own hands, to read a little rudely<sup>415</sup> when he list,<sup>416</sup> and then cast the book at his heels—or, among others such as himself, to keep a quodlibet<sup>417</sup> and a pot parliament<sup>418</sup> upon—I trow there will no wise man find a fault therein. Ye spoke right now of the Jews, among whom the whole people have, ye say, the Scripture in their hands. And ye thought it no reason<sup>419</sup> that we should reckon Christian men less worthy thereto than them. Wherein I am, as ye see, of your own opinion. But yet would God we had the like reverence to the Scripture of God that they have. For I assure you, I have heard very worshipful<sup>420</sup> folk say, which<sup>421</sup> have been in their houses, that a man could not hire<sup>422</sup> a Jew to sit down upon his Bible of the Old Testament; but he taketh it with great reverence in hand when he will read, and reverently layeth it up again when he hath done. Whereas we, God forgive us, take little regard<sup>423</sup> to sit down on our Bible with the Old Testament and the New too. Which homely<sup>424</sup> handling, as it proceedeth of<sup>425</sup> little reverence, so doth it more and more engender in the mind a negligence and contempt of God’s holy words. We find also that among the Jews, though all their whole Bible was written in their vulgar tongue, and those books thereof wherein their laws were written were usual<sup>426</sup> in every man’s hands, as things that God would<sup>427</sup> have commonly known, repeated, and kept in remembrance, yet were there, again,<sup>428</sup> certain parts thereof which the common people of the Jews of old time, both of reverence and for the difficulty, did forbear to meddle with. But now since the veil of the Temple is broken asunder that divided, among the Jews, the people from the sight of the secrets,<sup>429</sup> and that God had sent his Holy Spirit to be assistant<sup>430</sup> with his whole Church to teach all necessary truth, though it may therefore be the better suffered<sup>431</sup> that no part of Holy Scripture were kept out of honest laymen’s hands, yet would I that no part thereof should come in theirs which,<sup>432</sup> to their own harm and haply their neighbors’ too, would handle it over-homely, and be too bold and busy<sup>433</sup> therewith. And also, though Holy Scripture be, as ye said while ere,<sup>434</sup> a medicine for him that is sick, and food for him that is whole,<sup>435</sup> yet since there is many a body sore<sup>436</sup> soul-sick that taketh himself for whole, and in Holy Scripture is a whole feast of so much diverse viand<sup>437</sup> that, after the affection<sup>438</sup> and state of sundry stomachs, one may take harm by the selfsame that shall do another good—and sick folk often have such a corrupt tallage in their taste<sup>439</sup> that they most like the meat that is most unwholesome for them—it were not, therefore, as methinketh, unreasonable that the ordinary (whom God hath in the diocese appointed for the chief physician, to discern between the whole and the sick and between disease and disease) should, after his wisdom and discretion, appoint everybody their part, as he should perceive to be good and wholesome for them. And therefore as he should not fail to find many a man to whom he might commit all the whole,<sup>440</sup> so, to say the truth, I can see none harm therein though<sup>441</sup> he should commit unto some man the Gospel of Matthew, Mark, or Luke, whom he should yet forbid the Gospel of Saint John, and suffer<sup>442</sup> some to read the Acts of the Apostles whom he would not suffer to meddle with the Apocalypse.<sup>443</sup> Many were there, I think, that should take much profit by Saint Paul’s epistle Ad Ephesios,<sup>444</sup> wherein he giveth good counsel to every kind of people, and yet should find little fruit for their understanding in his epistle Ad Romanos,<sup>445</sup> containing such high difficulties as very few learned men can very well attain.<sup>446</sup> And in like

408 happen 409 more doubt: greater fear or danger 410 sore grieved: severely offended or incensed 411 request 412 to be: i.e., who wanted it in order for it to be 413 even if 414 ignorant; base; immoral 415 roughly; unskillfully 416 desires 417 academic disputation 418 pot parliament: drinkers’ assembly 419 no reason: not reasonable 420 respectable 421 who 422 pay 423 take little regard: give no care 424 rough 425 from 426 ordinarily 427 wanted to 428 on the other hand 429 mysteries. See Mt 27:51. 430 present to help 431 allowed 432 who 433 prying; inquisitive 434 while ere: a while earlier 435 healthy

436 grievously 437 food, fare 438 after the affection: according to the disposition 439 corrupt . . . taste: distorted sense of taste 440 commit . . . whole: entrust the whole Bible 441 even if 442 allow 443 Book of Revelation 444 Ad Ephesios: to the Ephesians 445 Ad Romanos: to the Romans 446 come to understand wise would it be in diverse other parts of the Bible, as well in the Old Testament as the New, so that, as I say, though the bishop might unto some layman be-

 5 take<sup>447</sup> and commit, with good advice and instruction, the whole Bible to read, yet might he to some man, well and with reason, restrain the reading of some part, and from some busybody, the meddling with any part at all more than he shall hear in ser-
 10 mons set out and declared<sup>448</sup> unto him — and in like wise, too, take the Bible away from such folk again as be proved by their blind presumption to abuse the occasion of their profit unto their own hurt and harm. And thus may the bishop order<sup>449</sup> the Scrip-
 15 ture in our hands, with as good reason as the father doth by his discretion appoint which of his children may for his sadness<sup>450</sup> keep a knife to cut his meat, and which shall for his wantonness<sup>451</sup> have his knife taken from him, for cutting off<sup>452</sup> his fingers. And thus am I bold, without prejudice of<sup>453</sup> other men's 20 judgment, to show you my mind in this matter: how the Scripture might, without great peril and not without great profit, be brought into our tongue and taken to lay men and women both, not yet meaning thereby but that the whole Bible might,<sup>454</sup> for my mind, be suffered to be spread abroad in English. 25

 But if that were so much doubted<sup>455</sup> that percase<sup>456</sup> all might thereby be letted,<sup>457</sup> then would I rather have used such moderation as I speak of, or some such other as wiser men can better devise. Howbeit, upon that<sup>458</sup> I read late in the epistle that the King's 30 Highness translated into English, of his own,<sup>459</sup> which his Grace made in Latin, answering to the letter of Luther,<sup>460</sup> my mind giveth me that his Majesty is of his blessed zeal so minded to move<sup>461</sup> this matter unto the prelates of the clergy — among whom I 35 have perceived some of the greatest and of the best of their own minds well inclinable thereto already — that we lay people shall, in this matter, ere long time pass, except the fault be found in ourselves, be well and fully satisfied and content." 40

"In good faith," quoth he, "that will, in my mind, be very well done. And now am I, for my mind, in all this matter fully content and satisfied."

"Well," quoth I, "then will we to dinner, and the remnant will we finish after." And therewith went 45 we to meat.<sup>462</sup>

The end of the Third Book

447 entrust 448 explained 449 arrange 450 for his sadness: because of his maturity 451 playfulness 452 for cutting off:
 lest he cut off 453 to 454 not yet . . .

might: not, however, meaning by this that the whole Bible might not 455 feared 456 perhaps 457 prevented 458 upon that: from what 459 of his own: by himself 460 read . . . Luther: the King's letter was published in Latin in 1526 and 1527, and in English in 1526 and 1528.

 461 propose 462 (our) meal

THE FOURTH BOOK

THE FIRST CHAPTER

The author showeth wherefore<sup>1</sup> it were not well done to suffer<sup>2</sup> Luther's books—or any other heretic's—to go abroad and be read among the people, though there were some good things in them among the bad.

When we had after dinner a little paused, your friend and I drew ourselves aside into the garden. And there, sitting down in an arbor, he began to enter forth into the matter, saying that he had well perceived that, not in his country<sup>3</sup> only, but also in the university where he had been, there were that<sup>4</sup> had none evil opinion of Luther, but thought that his books were by the clergy forbidden of<sup>5</sup> malice and evil will, to the end that folk should not surely see and perfectly perceive what he saith—or, at the least, what thing he meaneth by his words. Which will not appear, they think, by a line taken out in the mids of a leaf,<sup>6</sup> but by the diligent consideration of the whole matter. Without which, men might impute a wrong blame, they say, to the best writers that ever wrote in this world. But they think that the clergy will not have his books read because that in them laymen may read the priests' faults, which was, they say, the very<sup>7</sup> cause of the condemnation. For else<sup>8</sup> whether he had written well or evil, yet they say his books had<sup>9</sup> been kept in men's hands and read. For there is, they think, therein, though some part were naught,<sup>10</sup> many things yet well said, whereof there was no reason that men should lose the profit for<sup>11</sup> the bad. And also, reason men think it were<sup>12</sup> that all were heard that can be said touching the truth to be known concerning the matters of our salvation, to the intent that, all heard and perceived,<sup>13</sup> men may for their own surety<sup>14</sup> the better choose and hold the right way.

"Forsooth,"<sup>15</sup> quoth I, "if it were now doubtful and ambiguous whether the Church of Christ were in the right rule of doctrine or not, then were it very necessary to give them all good audience that<sup>16</sup> could and would anything dispute on either part,<sup>17</sup> for it or against it, to the end that if we were now in a wrong way, we might leave it and walk in some better. But now, on the other side, if it so be—as indeed it is—that Christ's Church hath the true doctrine already, and the selfsame that Saint Paul would not give an angel of heaven audience to the contrary,<sup>18</sup> what wisdom were it<sup>19</sup> now therein to show ourselves so mistrustful and wavering that, for to search whether our faith were false or true, we should give hearing, not to an angel of heaven, but to a fond<sup>20</sup> friar, to an apostate, to an open incestuous<sup>21</sup> lecher, a plain limb<sup>22</sup> of the devil, and a manifest messenger of hell? In which words, if ye would haply<sup>23</sup> think that I use myself too sore<sup>24</sup> to call him by such odious names, ye must consider that he spareth not—both untruly and without necessity—in his railing<sup>25</sup> books to call, by as evil,<sup>26</sup> them whom his duty were highly to reverence, whereas I do between us twain<sup>27</sup> call him but as himself hath showed him,<sup>28</sup> in his writing, in his living, and in his mad marriage. And yet I neither do it, nor would, were it not that the matter itself of reason doth require it. For my part is it of necessity to tell how naught<sup>29</sup> he is, because that the worse the man is, the more madness were it for wise men to give his false fables hearkening against God's undoubted truth, by his Holy Spirit taught unto his Church, and—by such multitude of miracles, by so much blood of holy martyrs, by the virtuous living of so many blessed confessors,<sup>30</sup> by the purity and cleanness of so many chaste widows<sup>31</sup> and undefiled virgins, by the wholesome doctrine of so many holy doctors,<sup>32</sup> and, finally, by the whole consent and agreement of all Christian people this fifteen hundred years—confirmed. And, therefore, not any respect unto<sup>33</sup> his railing against the clergy is, as some would have it seem, the cause of his condemnation and suppression of his books. For the good men of the clergy be not so sore grieved with<sup>34</sup> them that

1 why 2 were . . . suffer: would not be good to allow 3 part of the country 4 those who 5 out of 6 mids of a leaf: middle of a page 7 true 8 otherwise 9 would have 10 bad 11 on account of 12 reason . . . were: people think it reasonable 13 understood 14 safety; certainty 15 Indeed 16 who 17 side

18 to the contrary: if it spoke against. See Gal 1:8. 19 were it: would it be 20 foolish 21 because he married a nun, Katharina von Bora. In canon law monks and nuns are regarded as siblings. 22 agent 23 perhaps 24 use myself too sore: am being too severe 25 ranting 26 bad words 27 both 28 showed him:

presented himself 29 bad 30 saints who gave heroic witness but were not martyred 31 chaste widows: widows who remained celibate for the rest of their lives 32 theologians 33 respect unto: regard for 34 grieved with: offended by touch the faults of the bad, nor the bad themselves be not so tender-cared that for the only<sup>35</sup> talking of their faults they would banish the books that were good in other things besides. For else could not the books of many old holy fathers have endured so long, wherein the vices of them that in the clergy be naught<sup>36</sup> be very vehemently rebuked.

“But the very cause why his books be not suffered<sup>37</sup> to be read is because his heresies be so many, and so abominable, and the proofs wherewith he pretendeth<sup>38</sup> to make them probable<sup>39</sup> be so far from reason and truth, and so far against the right understanding of Holy Scripture — whereof, under color<sup>40</sup> of great zeal and affection, he laboreth to destroy the credence and good use — and, finally, so far stretcheth all things against good manner and virtue, provoking the world to wrong opinions of God and boldness in sin and wretchedness, that there can no good, but much harm grow by the reading. For if there were the substance good, and of<sup>41</sup> error or oversight some cockle among the corn which might be sifted out and the remnant stand in stead,<sup>42</sup> men would have been content therewith, as they be with such others. But now is his not besprent<sup>43</sup> with a few spots, but, with more than half venom, poisoned the whole wine — and that right rotten of itself — and this done of purpose and malice,<sup>44</sup> not without an evil spirit in such wise<sup>45</sup> walking with his words that the contagion thereof were likely to infect a feeble soul, as the savor<sup>46</sup> of a sickness sore<sup>47</sup> infecteth a whole body. Nor the truth is not to be learned of<sup>48</sup> every man’s mouth. For as Christ was not content that the devil should call him God’s Son, though it were true, so is he not content that a devil’s limb,<sup>49</sup> as Luther is, or Tyndale, should teach his flock the truth, for infecting them with their false devilish heresies besides. For likewise as the Holy Scripture of God, because of the good Spirit that made it, is of his own nature apt to purge and amend the reader, though some that read it, of their invincible malice, turn it to their harm, so do such writings as Luther’s is — in the making whereof the devil is of counsel<sup>50</sup> and giveth therewith a breath of his assistance — though the goodness of some men master the malice thereof, walking harmless<sup>51</sup> with God’s help, as the prophet saith, upon the serpent and the cockatrice,<sup>52</sup> and treading upon the lion and the dragon,<sup>53</sup> yet be such works of themselves always right unwholesome to meddle with, meet<sup>54</sup> and apt to corrupt and infect the reader. For the proof whereof, we need none other example than this that we be in hand withal,<sup>55</sup> if we consider what good the reading of his books hath done in Saxony. And this find we more than too much proved here among us: that of ten that use<sup>56</sup> to read his books, ye shall scantly find twain<sup>57</sup> but that they not only cast off prayer, and fasting, and all such godly virtues as Holy Scripture commendeth, and the Church commandeth, and virtuous people have ever had in great price,<sup>58</sup> but also fall in<sup>59</sup> plain contempt and hatred thereof, so that what fruit should grow of the reading ye may soon guess.”

THE SECOND CHAPTER

The author showeth many of Luther’s heresies to be so abominable, and some part also so peevish,<sup>60</sup> that the very bare rehearsal<sup>61</sup> is enough, without any further dispicion<sup>62</sup> thereupon, to cause any good man abhor them, and to be ashamed also to seem so foolish as to hold them. And for an example the author rehearseth diverse, whereof some be new set forth by Tyndale in his English books, worse yet in some part than his master Luther is himself.

“And in good faith, I would ween<sup>63</sup> that any good man, except<sup>64</sup> some reasonable necessity should compel him thereto, else would, if he heard but his opinions once rehearsed, be very loath to lose his time in the reading, either of his fond<sup>65</sup> proof, or of the very titles and names thereof again.”

“If they be such indeed,” quoth your friend, “and that they be not mistaken or misreported.”

“Methinketh,” quoth I, “that the fruit which ye see spring of them should suffice to make you perceive them for naught. And iwis<sup>66</sup> a friar’s living<sup>67</sup> that weddeth a nun — when his living is such — should make it easy to wit<sup>68</sup> that his teaching is not very good.”

35 the only: only the 36 bad 37 allowed 38 professes 39 believable 40 pretext
41 by 42 See Mt 13:24–30. 43 sprinkled
44 of... malice: on purpose and out of malice 45 (a) way 46 stench 47 greatly; grievously 48 from

49 agent 50 of counsel: one of the advisors
51 unharmed 52 a two-legged dragon with a rooster’s head 53 See Ps 90(91):13. 54 suitable 55 with 56 are accustomed 57 two 58 had in great price: held in great esteem 59 into

60 foolish 61 recounting 62 disputation
63 think 64 unless 65 foolish 66 certainly 67 state of life; manner of life or conduct 68 know

“Surely,” quoth he, “I cannot say nay but<sup>69</sup> that these be shrewd tokens.”<sup>70</sup>

“I shall,” quoth I, “do more for you. For I shall find the means that ye shall see his own books, and therein perceive yourself that men belie<sup>71</sup> him not.”

“I pray<sup>72</sup> you,” quoth he, “let me hear some of his opinions by mouth the while, and for<sup>73</sup> the seeing of them in his own books, I shall bethink me after.”

“First he began,” quoth I, “with pardons<sup>74</sup> and with the Pope’s power, denying finally any of both to be of any effect at all.

“And soon after — to show what good spirit moved him — he denied all the seven sacraments except baptism, penance, and the Sacrament of the altar, saying plainly that all the remnant be but feigned<sup>75</sup> things and of none effect.

“Now, these that he leaveth for good, it is good to see how he handleth them. For in penance, he saith that there neither needeth<sup>76</sup> contrition nor satisfaction. Also he saith that there needeth no priest for the hearing of confession, but that every man, and every woman too, is as sufficient to hear confession and assoil<sup>77</sup> and do all that longeth<sup>78</sup> to a confessor, as is a priest.”

“Marry,<sup>79</sup> sir,” quoth your friend, “this were an easy way for one thing.<sup>80</sup> For the sorest<sup>81</sup> thing that I find in confession is that when I see many confessors at a pardon,<sup>82</sup> yet can I scant<sup>83</sup> like one of them so well upon the sight that I would tell any such tales to, once in seven years, and<sup>84</sup> I might choose. But now, if I might — after<sup>85</sup> Luther’s way — be confessed to a fair woman, I would not let<sup>86</sup> to be confessed weekly.”

“Ye would,” quoth I, “peradventure<sup>87</sup> tell her a tale that ye would not tell every man. But yet if some men told some tales to a fair woman that they tell in confession to a foul friar, they would wish, I ween, among<sup>88</sup> that they had kept their counsel in their own breast.”

“Marry,” quoth he, “that may happen also in the confession that is made unto a priest.”

“Possible it were indeed,” quoth I. “And Tyndale, in his book of Obedience — or rather disobedience — saith that the curates<sup>89</sup> do go and show the bishops

the confessions of such as be rich in their parishes, and that the bishops thereupon do cite<sup>90</sup> them, and lay their secret sins to their charge,<sup>91</sup> and either put them to open<sup>92</sup> shameful penance, or compel them to pay at the bishop’s pleasure. Now, dare I be bold to say — and I suppose all the honest men in this realm will say and swear the same — that this is a very foolish falsehood imagined of his own mind, whereof he never saw the example in his life. We see in some rather the contrary fault: that not only the rich, but the poor also, keep open queans,<sup>93</sup> and live in open adultery, without payment or penance or anything almost once said unto them. But therewith findeth Tyndale no fault in the bishops. For he saith plainly that the bishop hath none authority to punish any such thing at all. But he letteth not, on the other side, to belie the bishops and the curates too, feigning<sup>94</sup> that the one doth utter folks’ confessions to the other. And when he hath so belied them, then forthwith,<sup>95</sup> as though he had proved his tale true, he taketh the same false, feigned<sup>96</sup> lie for a ground thereupon to build the destruction of that holy sacrament of penance. For upon that lie and such others like,<sup>97</sup> he saith plainly that confession to the priest is the worst thing that ever was found. Now if that were true as it is as false as he that said it, how happed it then — which question Luther and he be asked often, and always make as<sup>98</sup> they heard it not — how happed it, I say, that of so many virtuous, wise, and cunning<sup>99</sup> fathers as have been in Christ’s Church in so many hundred years, never none had the wit<sup>100</sup> nor the grace to spy this great thing, but all teach confession, till now that Tyndale came, which yet in this point passeth<sup>101</sup> his master, Luther? For he saith he would in any wise<sup>102</sup> have confession stand, but he would have it made at liberty as well to women as men. But Tyndale will have none at all, because he listeth<sup>103</sup> to belie both the bishops and the curates, feigning that they should between them disclose our confessions.”

“In faith,” quoth your friend, “that is a thing that I never heard to have happened.”

“Nor he neither,” quoth I, “that dare I boldly say. And yet, I wot<sup>104</sup> well, as ye said right now, that priests

69 say nay but: deny 70 shrewd tokens: malicious signs 71 slander 72 ask 73 as for 74 indulgences 75 invented 76 is required 77 pardoned; give absolution 78 belongs 79 from “by Mary,” indeed 80 for . . . thing: in one respect

81 most grievous 82 a service making the sacrament of confession available, in which indulgences would be granted 83 hardly, barely 84 if 85 according to 86 hesitate 87 perhaps 88 from time to time 89 parish priests 90 formally summon 91 blame 92 public 93 prostitutes 94 pretending 95 immediately 96 fabricated 97 similar 98 as if 99 learned 100 intelligence 101 surpasses 102 in any wise: by all means 103 chooses 104 know should utter folks' confession were well possible — and in<sup>105</sup> many of them nothing in this world more likely neither — if God and his Holy Spirit were not, as it is, assistant<sup>106</sup> and working with his holy sacrament. But surely whereas there be many things that well and clearly prove the sacrament of confession to be a thing instituted and devised by God, yet if all the remnant lacked,<sup>107</sup> this one thing were unto me a plain persuasion and a full proof, which thing I find in the noble book that the King's Highness made against Luther: that is to wit,<sup>108</sup> that in so common a custom of confession, often than once in the year — where no man letteth<sup>109</sup> boldly to tell such his secrets as upon the discovering<sup>110</sup> or close<sup>111</sup> keeping thereof his honesty<sup>112</sup> commonly, and oftentimes his life also, dependeth, so many simple<sup>113</sup> as be of that sort that hear them, and in all other things so light and lavish of their tongue,<sup>114</sup> and some therewith so lewd<sup>115</sup> in all their living that for money they force<sup>116</sup> little to steal, rob, and murder too, and might many times with the disclosing of some such things get so much as some of them would kill a man for less — yet find we never any man take harm by his confession, or cause given of complaint, through any such secrets uttered and showed by the confessor.”

“In good faith,” quoth he, “this is very truth, and a great thing in mine opinion. But undoubtedly if confession came once to women's ears, there would be a sore<sup>117</sup> change. For it would be hard for God and the devil too to keep their tongues.”

“Yes, yes,” quoth I, “a woman can keep a counsel<sup>118</sup> well enough. For though she tell a gossip, she telleth it but in counsel yet, nor that gossip to her gossip neither; and so, when all the gossips in the town know it, yet is it but counsel still. And therefore I say it not for any harm that would come by them, but for the novelty thereof.”

“Now, in earnest,” quoth your friend, “this was a much merry mad invention of Luther; and Luther is in a manner as mad as Tyndale. For it were as good, almost, to have no confession at all as to set women to hear it.”

“Forsooth,” quoth I, “if it had been wisdom and not against God's will, it would of likelihood have been founden by some good men before these days, in this long time of so many hundred years.

Howbeit,<sup>119</sup> he goeth near enough to take it all away. And diverse of his scholars<sup>120</sup> — besides Tyndale — do now deny it utterly. And himself leaveth little substance and little fruit therein. For he would that we should<sup>121</sup> not care much for any full confession of all deadly<sup>122</sup> sins, nor be very studious in the gathering of our faults to mind, nor pondering the circumstances, nor the weight and gravity thereof, nor taking any sorrow therefor.<sup>123</sup> Now these things taken away, and the sacrament of penance left such as he would have it, consider in yourself what fruit were a man likely to find in it. He that taketh a confessor he forceth<sup>124</sup> not whom, and then confesseth he forceth not what, disposing him to repentance he forceth not how, good works in satisfaction accounteth for nought:<sup>125</sup> what manner of amendment shall this man come to? And specially if, besides all this, he may take to<sup>126</sup> his confessor a fair woman such as a young man would have a lust to break his mind unto. Doth it not plainly appear that this fond<sup>127</sup> fellow so playeth with this holy sacrament of penance that he goeth about utterly to destroy it? And yet is this one of the three he leaveth, taking four away expressly.”

“Surely,” quoth your friend, “so doth he this too as thinketh me.”

“Forsooth,” quoth I, “and he handleth the sacrament of baptism not much better. For he magnifieth baptism but to the suppression of penance and of all good living. For therein he teacheth that the sacrament itself hath no virtue<sup>128</sup> at all, but the faith only.

“Item: he teacheth that only faith<sup>129</sup> sufficeth to our salvation with our baptism — without good works. He saith also that it is sacrilege to go about to please God with any works, and not with faith only.

“Item: that no man can do any good work.

“Item: that the good and righteous man always sinneth in doing well.

“Item: that no sin can damn any Christian man, but only lack of belief. For he saith that our faith suppleth<sup>130</sup> up all our sins, how great soever they be.

“Item: he teacheth that no man hath no free will, nor can anything do therewith — not though<sup>131</sup> the help of grace be joined thereunto — but that

105 with 106 present to help 107 were lacking 108 say 109 refrains 110 disclosing 111 secret 112 reputation 113 poor; deficient 114 light...

tongue: prone to speaking easily and too much 115 wicked 116 care 117 great 118 secret 119 However 120 students; disciples 121 would... should: wants us to

122 mortal. See Jn 5:16–17. 123 for them 124 cares 125 nothing 126 for 127 foolish 128 power 129 only faith: faith alone 130 swallows 131 even if everything that we do, good and bad, we do nothing at all therein ourselves, but only suffer<sup>132</sup> God to do all things in us, good and bad, as wax is wrought into an image or a candle by the man's hand, without anything doing thereto itself.

"Item: he saith that God is as verily<sup>133</sup> the author and cause of the evil will of Judas in betraying of Christ as of the good will of Christ in suffering of his Passion.

"In<sup>134</sup> matrimony, he saith plainly that it is no sacrament; and so saith Tyndale too.

"Item: that if a man be not able to do his duty to his wife, he is bounden secretly without slander<sup>135</sup> to provide another to do it for him."

"Forsooth," quoth your friend, "this was courteously considered of him — he is a very gentleman, I warrant<sup>136</sup> you. It is no marvel though his wife be well teeming,<sup>137</sup> if he make her such provision."

"Surely," quoth I, "this wise device<sup>138</sup> hath he. And much other beastliness he saith in<sup>139</sup> such things, and his disciple after him, of such sort as honest ears could scant abide the hearing.

"In the sacrament of orders, he saith that priesthood and all holy orders<sup>140</sup> be but a feigned<sup>141</sup> invention.

"Item: that every Christian man and every Christian woman is a priest.

"Item: that every man may consecrate the body of Christ."

"This is a shameful saying, in good faith," quoth your friend.

"Abide<sup>142</sup> ye," quoth I, "and ye shall hear worse yet. For he saith further that every woman and child may consecrate the body of our Lord."

"Surely," quoth he, "then is the man mad outright."

"He saith," quoth I, "further yet, that the Canon<sup>143</sup> of the Mass is false.

"Item: that the Host<sup>144</sup> in the Mass is none oblation nor sacrifice.

"Item: that the Mass with its canon — after<sup>145</sup> the form that is and ever hath been used in Christ's Church — is sacrilege and abomination.

"And though much of this concerneth his damnable heresies touching the Blessed Sacrament of the altar, yet saith he thereof many lewd<sup>146</sup> doctrines more. And among others, he teacheth that it is heresy to believe that there is not very<sup>147</sup> bread and very wine in the Sacrament of the altar joined with the body and blood of our Lord.

"Item: Zwingli and Oecolampadius,<sup>148</sup> scholars<sup>149</sup> of Luther, have builded further upon this ungracious<sup>150</sup> ground of their master, and teach that the Sacrament of the altar is not the very body nor blood of our Lord at all. And Luther himself, albeit<sup>151</sup> he now writeth against them therein, yet (as it by many things appeareth) minded and intended to put forth by<sup>152</sup> leisure the same heresy himself, till he changed his mind for envy that he bare toward them, when he saw that they would be heads of a sect themselves — for that could he suffer no man to be but himself. But before, as I say, he did intend it himself. And therefore he made a way toward it by these other heresies that I have rehearsed<sup>153</sup> you, and by diverse others more.

"For he teacheth also that the Mass availeth no man, quick<sup>154</sup> nor dead, but only to the priest himself.

"Item: he teacheth that men should go to Mass as well after supper as before breakfast,<sup>155</sup> and in his common clothes, as he goeth all day, without light<sup>156</sup> or any other honorable rite used therein.

"Item: he saith it were best that men should never be houseled<sup>157</sup> but once in their life — and that never till they lie a-dying, as they be but once christened, and that at their beginning.

"Item: he teacheth that every man and woman should take the Holy Sacrament, and spare not to touch it and handle it as much as them list.<sup>158</sup>

"Item: he saith that the Blessed Sacrament of the altar is ordained of God to be received, but not to be worshipped."

"In faith," quoth your friend, "these things be far out of course."<sup>159</sup>

"Ye see," quoth I, "now how he handleth all the blessed sacraments.

"But now hath he other wild heresies at large.<sup>160</sup>

132 allow 133 truly 134 Concerning 135 causing discredit or scandal 136 guarantee 137 pregnant 138 scheme; invention 139 about 140 holy orders: the diaconate, subdiaconate, and so forth 141 fictitiously devised
142 Wait 143 prayer of consecration 144 the consecrated body of Christ

145 in 146 wicked 147 true; actual 148 Zwingli and Oecolampadius: Ulrich Zwingli (1484–1531) and Johannes Oecolampadius (1482–1531) were prominent Protestant theologians in Switzerland and Germany, respectively. 149 pupils 150 without grace; wicked 151 although 152 at (his) 153 recounted to 154 living

155 go . . . breakfast: Church law at the time required fasting from at least midnight before receiving Communion at Mass.
156 candlelight 157 given Communion
158 wish 159 out of course: unorthodox
160 at large: freely circulating; written of at great length

For he teacheth, against Scripture and all reason, that no Christian man is or can be bounden by any law made among men, nor is not bounden to observe or keep any.

5 “Item: he teacheth that there is no purgatory.

“Item: that all men’s souls lie still and sleep till the Day of Doom.<sup>161</sup>

10 “Item: that no man should pray to saints nor set by<sup>162</sup> any holy relics nor pilgrimages,<sup>163</sup> nor do any reverence to any images.”

15 “By my troth,”<sup>164</sup> quoth your friend, “I had forgotten that when I was now in the university,<sup>165</sup> in the communication that I had with my friends there in that matter, one of them objected against me that the worship of images hath been, ere this, condemned by a great council in Greece.”

20 “There was indeed,” quoth I, “a council once in Greece gathered by an emperor that then was a heretic<sup>166</sup> there, which was after—in the eighth synod by the general council<sup>167</sup>—damned<sup>168</sup> and annulled. But this no more doth to<sup>169</sup> the matter than if there would now, in Saxony and Switzerland and such other places, such people as be swerved from the faith gather themselves together and keep, as they would call it, a ‘general council’, wherein they might determine what they would. And yet were all that no prejudice to the right belief of the Catholic Church, which is always that known people that still persevere as one body with our Savior Christ in their former fast-confirmed<sup>170</sup> faith, from which faithful body these other withering branches<sup>171</sup> be blown away by the devil. And therefore, as a council of Lutherans assembling themselves in Saxony could make none authority against the true faith of the Church, so could that council in Greece nothing prove their purpose, which<sup>172</sup> made none interruption of the right belief and godly custom of worship<sup>173</sup> done to saints and images, that yet did for all that continue still in all the Catholic Church of Christ, and ever since hath done.”

40 “Forsooth,” quoth he, “that is truth.

“But yet,” quoth he, “was there one at our communication learned in the law, and in his chamber were we, which<sup>174</sup> said that if he list,<sup>175</sup> he could show a fair law, incorporated in the decrees<sup>176</sup> of the Church, which law, if it were laid in their light that<sup>177</sup> would take upon them the defense of any worship to be done to images, would make all their eyes daze. Then longed not only I but all the remnant also, very sore<sup>178</sup> to see that law. In bringing forth whereof, he made<sup>179</sup> a while somewhat strange,<sup>180</sup> as of a thing kept for a secret mystery.

55 “But in conclusion, he set forth a book of the decrees; and therein he read us, in good faith, a plain text (as methought and all that were present) by which Saint Gregory<sup>181</sup> writeth unto a certain bishop<sup>182</sup> that had broken down the images<sup>183</sup> in his church; and there Saint Gregory, albeit that he blameth<sup>184</sup> him for breaking them, yet for all that, he commendeth him for that<sup>185</sup> he would not suffer them to be worshipped.”

“Did you,” quoth I, “read that law yourself?”

“In good faith,” quoth he, “I stood by and looked on that book while he read it.”

65 “Did he,” quoth I, “or you either, read the next law following in the book?”

“Nay, verily,” quoth he, “for methought this was enough.”

70 “So was it, verily,” quoth I, “and too much too—without more. But and if<sup>186</sup> ye had either read the next law following or the gloss upon the selfsame law that ye read, ye should then have seen that the law which he showed you made little for<sup>187</sup> his purpose.”

75 “By my troth, as for the gloss,” quoth he, “neither I nor any man else that there was had list once to look on,<sup>188</sup> considering that the text was plain and easy to understand. And as for the law next following, we looked not after, for we thought to find it contrary. And if we should, then should we not yet have wist<sup>189</sup> which we should believe.”

“Yes, yes,” quoth I. “Ye would not much have

161 the Day of Doom: Judgment Day
162 set by: value 163 shrines 164 trustworthiness; faithfulness 165 now in the university: at the university this last time
166 worship . . . beretic: The Council of Hieria was called by Byzantine Emperor Constantine V (an iconoclast) in 753.
167 eighth . . . general council: This was the Second Ecumenical Council of Nicaea, held in 787. It was the seventh, not the eighth Ecumenical Council, but he may be referring to the eighth (and last) session of that council, at which the new Empress, Irene, signed the statement of faith issued by the Council. 168 condemned 169 no more doth to: has no more to do with 170 steadfastly or certainly confirmed

171 See Jn 15: 4–6. 172 which council
173 honoring; veneration 174 who 175 wished 176 canon-law decrees

177 laid . . . light: given them to understand
178 greatly 179 acted 180 strangely, peculiarly 181 Saint Gregory: Pope Saint Gregory the Great (540–604) 182 a certain bishop: Serenus 183 representations of saints or the divinity (e.g., icons, statues, sculptures) 184 rebukes 185 for that: because 186 and if: even if 187 made little for: gave little support to 188 at it 189 not yet have wist: still not have known doubted if ye had read the law that followeth; for it is a law synodal, made in the sixth synod,<sup>190</sup> in which there is well and plainly showed that images be to be worshipped among Christian men, and well declar-

 5 eth in what wise we worship them, and owe to do: that is to wit, none image to be worshipped as God; nor the hope of our health<sup>191</sup> to be beset<sup>192</sup> upon the image; nor to look<sup>193</sup> that the image shall be he which shall judge our souls in time to come; but we
 10 worship the image, and reverence<sup>194</sup>—and well owe to do—for the remembrance of the thing that the image representeth. And yet though we do the image honor and reverence, yet for divine honor, and service<sup>195</sup> only done to God, that kind of worship
 15 called latria we neither do nor may do, neither to image nor any creature in all the whole world, either in heaven or earth.<sup>196</sup> And this should ye have seen if ye had either read, as I say, the law next following or the gloss of that law that ye read.”

20 “Marry,” quoth he, “but in the law itself that we read, good Saint Gregory saith plain the contrary. For he commendeth the bishop there because he would not suffer the images to be worshipped at all.”

25 “That word ‘at all,’” quoth I, “ye set to<sup>197</sup> yourself, more than ye find in the book. For indeed the book saith no more but that they ‘should not be worshipped;’ by this Latin word: adorare. By which word, he understood the divine worship called 30 latria.”

“Whereby know we,” quoth he, “he understood it so? For I believe not much the gloss.”

35 “Ye may,” quoth I, “perceive<sup>198</sup> it by the law that followeth. Wherein, albeit that there be the same word, adorare, yet is it there showed how we may adorare—that is to wit, how we may worship—images.”

“Why,” quoth he, “if that law say quod possumus adorare<sup>199</sup> and Saint Gregory saith quod non licet adorare,<sup>200</sup> be not they twain<sup>201</sup> plain repugnant?”<sup>202</sup>

40 “Yes,” quoth I, “if they both took that word adorare in one<sup>203</sup> sense. But when the synod used that word for such worship as we may do to a creature, and Saint Gregory useth it for such worship only as may not be done but only to the Creator, then they be nothing repugnant at all.” 45

“But yet,” quoth he, “whereby shall I be sure that Saint Gregory took it so? For it appeareth by the law, as yourself saith, that the word may be taken otherwise. For the same law itself taketh it otherwise; and then peradventure<sup>204</sup> so did he, and thereby forbade 50 all manner worship to be done unto images.”

“That were very unlikely,” quoth I, “that Saint Gregory were of one mind and the whole synod of the contrary.

“But now, since ye make the matter so clear upon 55 the words of Saint Gregory incorporated in the decrees, and will not believe the gloss—which appeareth plainly that he meant only to forbid us to do such worship to images as is only due to God—will ye be content therein to believe Saint Gregory 60 himself if he tell you himself that he meant none other?”

“Yea, fore God,” quoth he, “that will I well.”

“Then,” quoth I, “we shall agree well enough.”
 And therewith I took down of<sup>205</sup> a shelf, among 65 my books, the Register<sup>206</sup> of Saint Gregory’s epistles, and therein turned to the very words which are by Gratian taken out of his second epistle ad Serenum, episcopum Massiliensem,<sup>207</sup> and incorporated in the decrees. And then caused I him to read the 70 formal<sup>208</sup> words as they be couched in the decree. And by the collation<sup>209</sup> of the one with the other, I caused him to see that Gratian had taken but a part of the epistle, and that by other words of the epistle itself, it appeareth evidently that Saint Gregory
 75 spoke of none other worship to be withdrawn from images but only divine worship and observance due to God, as by diverse other things in the epistle appeareth plain, as in that he saith that it is not lawful to worship anything wrought by hand, because it is 80 written, Dominum Deum tuum adorabis, et illi soli servies (‘Thou shalt worship thy Lord God, and only him shalt thou serve’).

“Now is it in this place of Scripture meant
 85 none other worship nor service than divine honor and service called latria, as is to learned men well

190 the sixth synod: The law following Gregory’s letter is from the Second Ecumenical Council of Nicaea, which was the seventh, not the sixth, Ecumenical Council.
 191 soundness or well-being; salvation
 192 set 193 expect 194 reverence it

195 worship 196 none... earth: More closely paraphrases ch. 28 of Distinctio III.
 197 set to: add in 198 understand
 199 quod... adorare: “which we are able to adore” 200 quod... adorare: “which it is not permitted to adore”

201 both 202 contradictory 203 the same 204 perhaps 205 from 206 a published collection of his letters 207 ad Serenum, episcopum Massiliensem: “to Serenus, Bishop of Marseille” 208 exact 209 comparison known. And he that will affirm the contrary and say that in Scripture is forbidden from images all manner of worship, he must affirm also that all manner worship, and all manner service, is forbidden by Scripture from all manner creatures. For the Scripture saith there, ‘Thou shalt worship and serve only God,’ and so should we, by that construction,<sup>210</sup> neither worship nor serve father nor mother, master nor prince, nor king. And in the same place Saint Gregory saith that we do worship only the Holy Trinity; which showeth that he speaketh only of divine worship called latria, which is done with a mind that reputeth<sup>211</sup> the thing worshipped to be very God. For else by those words, if he forbade any manner worship for to be done to anything, saving the Trinity, then did he forbid any worship to be done to any saint, or to our blessed Lady either. And every man well wotteth how reverently himself worshipped both our Lady and all saints, as well by many books and epistles of his as by the litany which (as his epistles well showeth) he ordained to be, with great devotion, used in honor of God, our Lady, and all holy saints — and over<sup>212</sup> that, by the great honor that he did to saints in churches specially dedicated unto them, and also great honor and reverence used<sup>213</sup> unto their holy relics, as in his own books and epistles appeareth. And finally if his epistles had been lost out of which the decree is taken, yet the words of the decree itself would well enough suffice. For therein is it specified that images be ‘the books of lay people, wherein they read the life of Christ.’ And then if it be, as it is indeed, well and virtuously done devoutly to kiss a book in which Christ’s life and his death is expressed by writing, why should it be evil done reverently to kiss the images by which Christ’s life and his Passion be represented by scripture<sup>214</sup> or painting?”

“In good faith,” quoth he, “I am well satisfied in this matter. And so would they that then were with me, if they had seen all that I see now.”

“They may,” quoth I, “soon see as much whensoever they list to look therefor.”<sup>215</sup>

“But now, to turn again to the matter, neither the bishop of Marseilles that broke the images that they speak of, nor the council of Greece neither, schismatical as it was, went never yet so far as Luther and Tyndale and their company do, which<sup>216</sup> not only set at nought<sup>217</sup> images, but also leave no saint unblasphemed — nor Christ’s own mother neither. 50

“For Luther cannot abide the common anthem of our Lady and the most devout Salve Regina because we therein call that blessed virgin our advocate.

“Item: he saith that every other woman now living, if she have the same faith, may be prayed unto as well as our Lady, and with her prayer as much profit us. 55

“Item: he teacheth that men should do no worship to the holy cross that Christ died on, saying that if he had it whole, or all the pieces thereof, he would cast it in such a place as no sun should shine thereon, to the end it should never be founden to be worshipped more. 60

“Item: of all feasts, he saith that he hateth the Feast of the Holy Cross and the Feast of Corpus Christi. 65

“He teacheth also that no man or woman is bounden to keep and observe any vow that he hath made to God of virginity, or widowhood, or other chastity out of marriage, but that they may marry at their liberty, their vow notwithstanding.” 70

“And how proveth he that?” quoth your friend.

“Marry,” quoth I, “by the breaking of his own, when he married the nun. And now he railleth against all chastity, and saith that if a priest live chaste, he is like to the priests of the idol Cybele.”<sup>218</sup> 75

“Long would it be to write you all the abominable heresies of this new sect. But some of them have I rehearsed, that ye may thereby consider whether he that teacheth such things go not about utterly to destroy the whole faith, religion, and virtue of Christendom. And that he is not in any of these points belied,<sup>219</sup> I shall find the means that ye shall see it in his own books. And there shall ye see how madly he laboreth to prove them.” 80 85

“Prove them?” quoth your friend. “The substance of these matters be too abominable to be reasoned. And to make him hated of all good folk, is<sup>220</sup> enough to hear them rehearsed. But I marvel me much how he fell into such a heap of heresies.” 90

210 interpretation 211 regards

212 besides 213 i.e., customarily shown

214 This may be an error for “sculpture.”

215 list to look therefor: wish to look for it 216 who 217 set at nought:

value as nothing 218 a Phrygian mother goddess whose priests castrated themselves

219 slandered 220 it is

THE THIRD CHAPTER

The author showeth by what occasion that Luther first fell to the devising of these heresies; and that the occasion was such as well declareth<sup>221</sup> that he was pricked<sup>222</sup> thereto by malice, and ever proceeded from evil to worse, not witting where to hold him;<sup>223</sup> and that he refuseth to stand to the judgment of any folk earthly concerning the truth or falsehood of his opinions save<sup>224</sup> only himself.

10 “Now, that is,” quoth I, “somewhat worth to consider: how this lewd<sup>225</sup> friar began to fall in these mischievous matters. Ye shall understand that there was a pardon<sup>226</sup> obtained<sup>227</sup> in Saxony, for which pardon, as the manner<sup>228</sup> is there, Luther was the preacher, and preached to the people, exhorting them thereto and advancing the authority thereof all that he possibly might — not without his great advantage<sup>229</sup> therefor. So happed it then, soon after, that the setting forth of the pardon<sup>230</sup> — with the advantage thereof — was taken from him and set to another. For anger whereof, he fell into such a fury that forthwith he began to write against all pardons.<sup>231</sup> Howbeit, because the matter<sup>232</sup> was new and strange,<sup>233</sup> he began first by way of doubts and questions only, submitting himself and his writing to the judgment of the Pope, and desiring<sup>234</sup> to be informed of the truth. Whereupon when he was by writing answered by the master of the Pope’s palace, then waxed he more wood<sup>235</sup> and fell to railing against him, and made also another book against the power of the Pope, affirming that his power upon the Church was never instituted of<sup>236</sup> God, but ordained only by the common consent of Christian people, for avoiding of schisms. But yet he said that all Christian men were bounden to stand<sup>237</sup> and obey thereunto, and that the Bohemians were damnable heretics for doing the contrary. But soon after, when he was in such wise answered by good and cunning<sup>238</sup> men that he perceived himself unable to defend that<sup>239</sup> he had affirmed, then fell he from reasoning to railing, and utterly denied that he had before affirmed, and then began to write that the Pope had no power at all, neither by<sup>240</sup> God nor man, and that the Bohemians, whom he had in his writings before called damnable heretics, were good Christian men, and all their opinions good and Catholic. Then when he was cited<sup>241</sup> by the Pope’s Holiness to appear, he appealed to the next general council which should be gathered in the Holy Ghost, so that whatsoever general council were after assembled, he might jest and rail thereon, and say it was not it that he appealed unto, for it was not assembled in the Holy Ghost.”

“He took,” quoth your friend, “a good wily way.”

“As wily as it was,” quoth I, “yet would he not stand thereby,<sup>242</sup> but fled from that to another. For now shall ye understand that yet soon after this, in the book by which he not answereth but railleth against that book wherein our sovereign lord the King — like a most faithful, virtuous, and most erudite prince — evidently and effectually revinced and confuted<sup>243</sup> the most venomous and pestilent book of Luther, entitled The Captivity of Babylon, in which he laboreth to destroy the holy sacraments of Christ’s Church: in that book, I say, Luther, which<sup>244</sup> had before appealed to the next general council, utterly denieth the authority of all general councils, and setteth them all at nought.”<sup>245</sup>

“By my troth,” quoth your friend, “either was the man very negligent before — or very naught<sup>246</sup> after — when he changeth so often, and writeth ever the longer the more contrary,<sup>247</sup> not to his adversary only, but also to himself. But I pray you, how excuseth he his inconstancy?”

“Marry,” quoth I, “he saith that he seeth further than he saw before. Whereunto the King’s Grace showeth him that it were unlikely that he should see better through a pair of evil spectacles of ire and envy.”

“Very true,” quoth your friend, “by my troth. But yet I hear say that he hath offered to stand at<sup>248</sup> the judgment of learned men in all his matters, if his offer had been taken in time.”

“Indeed,” quoth I, “once he promised to stand to the judgment of the University of Paris; and

221 clarifies 222 spurred, incited; stung 223 not witting where to hold him: not knowing where to stop himself 224 except 225 wicked 226 a service making the sacrament of confession available, in which indulgences would be granted 227 held 228 custom 229 benefit; profit 230 setting forth of the pardon: officiating at the service 231 indulgences 232 the matter: this doctrine 233 unfamiliar 234 requesting 235 waxed he more wood: grew he more angry 236 by 237 submit to 238 learned 239 what 240 from 241 summoned 242 stand thereby: remain firm in it 243 revinced and confuted: refuted and disproved 244 who 245 setteth . . . nought: values them all as nothing 246 bad; wicked 247 writeth . . . contrary: his writing is more and more contradictory as time goes by 248 stand at: submit to thereupon was there open dispicions kept,<sup>249</sup> and the very words written by notaries sworn for both the parties. But when his opinions were after at Paris by the University condemned, then he refused to stand to their judgment, and fell again to his old craft of railing.

“He appeared also at Worms, before the Emperor and the princes of the Empire,<sup>250</sup> by a safe-conduct, and there recognized and acknowledged as well the said pestilent book written against the sacraments as many others of like sort, to be his own, and offered to abide by them.<sup>251</sup> Which he might boldly do, being by the safe-conduct in good surety of<sup>252</sup> himself that he could take none harm. Then was he moved to dispicions upon the articles, so that he should<sup>253</sup> agree upon some persons, virtuous and well-learned, that should be judges of that disputations, and that he should be content to stand to their judgment upon the same. Whereupon he agreed to come to dispicions; but he would in no wise agree to make any men living judges upon it, nor stand to no man’s judgment earthly.”

THE FOURTH CHAPTER

The author showeth how that Luther, in the book that himself made of his own acts at the city of Worms in Almain,<sup>254</sup> doth so madly oversee<sup>255</sup> himself that he discloseth unaware certain follies of<sup>256</sup> himself which a man will well laugh at, and marvel much to see it.

“And that these things be true, it well appeareth to all the world in the book that he made himself of his demeanor<sup>257</sup> and his acts at the city called Worms,<sup>258</sup> in Almain. Which book, whoso readeth shall have a great pleasure to see therein both the frantic<sup>259</sup> vainglory of that fond<sup>260</sup> friar and yet therewithal<sup>261</sup> to see him carried out<sup>262</sup> with folly so far from himself that in a line or twain he discovereth<sup>263</sup> all that he went about to hide in all the book beside. For ye shall understand that, albeit he made that book himself, yet he made it so that he would it should<sup>264</sup> seem to have been of some other man’s making, and not of his own, to the intent that such worshipful<sup>265</sup> words as he speaketh of himself might make him, in the ears of the reader, seem some honorable person. Which words else,<sup>266</sup> he wist<sup>267</sup> well, spoken of his own mouth, all the world would wonder on. Now in this book — besides that he leaveth out some things there said and spoken where the words written in could do him no worship, and some things reciteth with advantage for his part, rehearsing the other side nakedly and barely,<sup>268</sup> and some part pared off too to make it seem the more slender<sup>269</sup> — one thing he observeth diligently: that whereas speaking of the Emperor he calleth him never but simply and singly ‘Charles,’ he never speaketh of himself but he setteth forth his name in great capital letters and solemn titles — ‘The Man of God Luther.’ And whereas they that spoke against his errors, he writeth that they ‘burst out’ in ‘virulent’ and venomous words, when he cometh to his own answer, then he writeth in this wise: ‘But then Doctor Martin, for his incredible humanity and bounty, answered in this wise benignly.’ And sometimes with these words: ‘The most benign Father most mildly made answer.’ And finally, he finisheth and endeth his book, as it were, with a Gloria Patri to the whole psalm, in this wise: ‘This holy, devout man, therefore, even born to teach and preserve the Gospel of God, our Lord long preserve for his Church, with his holy Word also, Amen.’<sup>270</sup> Now, who was there ever born so suspicious that ever would have suspected that he which wrote such glorious words of Luther should be Luther himself? For where should a man find so very a vainglorious fool that would not in himself be ashamed of himself to think such things?

“But now, ye that read this, I pray you, for God’s sake see how utterly this itch and tickling of vanity and vainglory had cast him clean beside<sup>271</sup> his mind and memory. For whereas all the book beside<sup>272</sup> was so devised and handled that it should seem some other to have made it and not himself, suddenly the fond fellow bewrayed<sup>273</sup> himself unaware. For in one place, forgetting himself, he speaketh in this wise:

249 open dispicions kept: public disputations held 250 the Holy Roman Empire 251 i.e., (the judgment of) the Emperor and princes 252 surety of: security about 253 moved... should: invited to disputations on his claim, provided he would 254 Germany 255 fail to see;

misjudge 256 about 257 conduct 258 book... Worms: Acta et res gestae, D. Martini Lutheri, in comitiis principum uormaciae (May 1521) 259 insane 260 foolish 261 also; in addition 262 away 263 reveals 264 would... should: wanted it to 265 honorable

266 otherwise 267 knew 268 nakedly and barely: in isolation (i.e., out of context) and poorly or scantily 269 deficient, inadequate 270 WA 7: 857 271 clean beside: completely out of 272 book beside: rest of the book 273 exposed

‘When this was spoken, then the orator of the Empire, in a chiding manner, said that I had not answered to the purpose, and that those things which had been damned<sup>274</sup> and determined in General Councils of old ought not now of new<sup>275</sup> to be brought again in question by me; and therefore I should give a plain answer whether I would revoke mine errors or not. Then unto this I answered in this wise: “Since that it is so,” etc.’<sup>276</sup>

10 Lo, here may ye see the incredible humility and lowly mind of this ‘most benign father,’ which<sup>277</sup> under the visor of a strange<sup>278</sup> herald bloweth out himself his own boast. Then may ye see therewith his marvelous, profound prudence, that had not 15 the wit<sup>279</sup> to beware that himself bewrayed not<sup>280</sup> his own so foolish a device, in the vain avaulting<sup>281</sup> of his own false boast and praise, that though the words had been true, yet would almost a very natural<sup>282</sup> fool have been ashamed of himself to write 20 them.”

“By my troth,” quoth your friend, “this device was madly minded of<sup>283</sup> Luther, and madly handled, and madly overseen,<sup>284</sup> to show himself so fond,<sup>285</sup> but if<sup>286</sup> pride, as the proverb is, must needs have a 25 shame.”

THE FIFTH CHAPTER

The author showeth the perpetual inconstancy of Luther and his contrariety and repugnance<sup>287</sup> against himself.

30 “Now, as for his constancy, appeareth,”<sup>288</sup> quoth I, “by that<sup>289</sup> I have before rehearsed of his continual change in his heresies from day to day, from worse to worse, which course he kept not only in the matters above rehearsed, but almost in all the remnant.
35 For as concerning purgatory, he wrote first that, although it could not be proved by evident Scripture (as he affirmed), yet was there no doubt but that there is purgatory; and that thing, he said, was of all Christian men firmly to be believed. And then he 40 wrote that he wondered of<sup>290</sup> the madness of such false and foolish heretics as were born within one hundred years past and are not ashamed to deny purgatory, which the whole Church of Christ hath believed this fifteen hundred years. Now, what constancy is there in this friar, that wrote this of heretics that deny purgatory, and within a while after 45 denieth it himself, saying, in the sermon that he wrote of the rich man and Lazarus, that all men’s souls ‘lie still and sleep till Doomsday?’”<sup>291</sup>

“Marry,” quoth your friend, “then hath some man had a sleep of a fair length. They will, I ween, when they wake forget some of their dreams.”

“By my faith,” quoth I, “he that believeth Luther that his soul shall sleep so long shall when he dieth sleep in shrewd<sup>292</sup> rest.”

55 “I much marvel,” quoth your friend, “what evil ailed him to find out this fond folly.”

“To this opinion,” quoth I, “or rather to the feigning of this opinion — for I verily think that himself thinketh not as he writeth — he fell for envy and hatred that he bore to priesthood; by the malice 60 of which his ungracious mind, he rather were content that all the world lay in the fire of purgatory till Doomsday than that there were one penny given to a priest to pray for any soul.”

65 “This is,” quoth your friend, “very likely.”

“Like constancy,” quoth I, “hath he used<sup>293</sup> in the matter of holy vows. For in his book of The Captivity of Babylon, he writeth that ‘neither man nor angel’ is able to dispense with the vow made by man to 70 God.<sup>294</sup> And soon after, he wrote that no vow could bind any man, but that every man may boldly break them of his own head.<sup>295</sup> But it well appeareth that he wrote the first of<sup>296</sup> anger and malice toward the Pope, and then changed to the second of a lecherous 75 lust to the nun that he minded to marry.”

THE SIXTH CHAPTER

The author showeth how that Luther hath been fain,<sup>297</sup> for the defense of his undefensible errors, to go back and forsake all the manner of proof and trial which he first promised to stand<sup>298</sup> to, and now, like a man shameful and shameless, hath no proof in the world but his own word, and calleth that the Word of God.

274 condemned 275 of new: anew
276 WA 7: 835–38 277 who 278 visor of a strange: guise of an unknown
279 understanding, intelligence 280 bewrayed not: did not expose unintentionally 281 bragging 282 born 283 minded of: conceived by 284 overlooked 285 foolish 286 but if: unless 287 contradiction, inconsistency 288 this is shown 289 what 290 at 291 See

WA 10.3: 192, 195. 292 evil; undesirable;
malicious 293 exercised 294 WA 6: 542 295 accord, i.e., on the basis of his own mind or invention 296 out of 297 obliged 298 submit

“His inconstant wit<sup>299</sup> and very devilish intent specially showed itself by this also, which I shall now rehearse<sup>300</sup> you. In the beginning the man had the mind that commonly such fools have: he reckoned
 5 all the world wild geese save<sup>301</sup> himself, and all the wit and learning to stand<sup>302</sup> in his own head. And then, weening that he should find no match, but that he should — as he list<sup>303</sup> — be able to prove the moon made of green cheese, he professed in his
 10 books that he would, for the proof or reproof<sup>304</sup> of his opinions, stand<sup>305</sup> to natural reason, to the authority of the old holy fathers, the laws and canons of Christ’s Church, and to the Holy Scripture of God, with the interpretations of the old holy doct-
 15 tors. But soon after, when he perceived himself in his opinion deceived,<sup>306</sup> and that he saw himself confuted and concluded<sup>307</sup> evidently, both by Scripture, natural reason, the laws and determinations of the Church, and the whole consent of the holy 20 fathers, interpreters of Holy Scripture, then began he to sing another song. For then, as for reason, he refused to stand to, saying that the matters of our faith be things above reason, and that reason hindereth us in our faith, and is unto faith an enemy.
 25 And as for the laws of the Church, he with other blasphemous heretics burned up openly at Wittenberg, singing in derision a dirge about<sup>308</sup> the fire for the law’s soul. And then would he stand to nothing but only Scripture — nor to that neither, but if<sup>309</sup>
 30 it were very plain and evident. But now, if it were in question whether the Scripture were evident for him or against him, therein would he stand to no man’s judgment but his own. For as for the whole faith of Christ’s Church — continued by<sup>310</sup> so many 35 hundred years — he set utterly at nought,<sup>311</sup> calling it men’s devices.<sup>312</sup> And in Scripture, the interpretation of Saint Jerome, Saint Augustine, Saint Ambrose, and all the old holy fathers of so many years past, he nothing would esteem, but with blasphemous words letted<sup>313</sup> not to write, ‘I care not for 40 Augustine; I care not for a hundred Cyprians; I care not for a thousand Jeromes; I care not but for Scripture alone; and that is plainly on my part.’<sup>314</sup> As though none of these old holy cunning<sup>315</sup> men had understood any Scripture till he came. Now was he by this unreasonable manner<sup>316</sup> driven to another devilish device against saints. For to the intent that their authority should not, by the devotion and reverence that all good men bear them, diminish his credence, he was forced to labor to 50 bring men in<sup>317</sup> that heresy that they should pray to no saints, but would have their images drawn down, all their pilgrimages left up,<sup>318</sup> all their relics cast out, all their honor and men’s devotion toward them withdrawn — so far-forth<sup>319</sup> that he could nei-
 45

 55 ther abide the honor of our blessed Lady, nor the holy cross, nor Christ’s blessed body — as plainly declareth his abominable books.”

THE SEVENTH CHAPTER

The author showeth what things caused the people to fall into Luther’s fond and furious<sup>320</sup> sect. And he showeth also what mischief the followers of that sect have done in Almain,<sup>321</sup> Lombardy, and Rome.

“It is,” quoth your friend, “a wonder to me that the people, being before brought up in the right belief, 65 could find in their hearts to give him audience in some such heresies as these be.”

“Ye must understand, and may perceive,” quoth I, “that he did not set forth all at once. But as Tyn-
 70 dale hath begun here in England with the thing that had a good visage<sup>322</sup> (though he had corrupted it and meant naught<sup>323</sup> indeed), putting forth first the New Testament in such wise handled that un-
 75 learned folk were likely to take harm and conceive diverse heresies in their hearts ere they could perceive his falsehood, and then hath since, by two other books, openly showed himself to lack nothing of Luther but that he hath not yet married a
 80 nun, so did Luther also put forth, in the beginning, no more but the matter of pardons,<sup>324</sup> as I told you, and therein nothing affirmed neither against the determination of the Church, but submitted himself thereto. Now with this demeanor was there no 85 man offended. But yet did he that time intend a further mischief, which he little and little pursued and brought to pass. And one special thing with which he spiced all the poison was the liberty that

299 mind 300 relate to 301 except 302 reside 303 wished 304 refutation 305 submit 306 to be mistaken; to be in error 307 refuted 308 around 309 but if: unless 310 for 311 set...

nought: valued it as absolutely nothing 312 inventions 313 hesitated 314 side
 315 learned 316 habitual mode, fashion 317 into 318 pilgrimages left up: shrines abandoned 319 so far-forth: to such an extent 320 fond and furious: foolish and irrational 321 Germany 322 appearance 323 evil 324 indulgences

he so highly commended unto the people, bringing them in belief that, having faith, they needed nothing else. For as for fasting, prayer, and such other things, he taught them to neglect and set at nought as vain and unfruitful ceremonies, teaching them also that, being faithful Christians, they were so near cousins to Christ that they be in a full freedom and liberty: discharged of all governors and all manner laws, spiritual or temporal, except the Gospel only. And albeit he said that of a special perfection it should be well done to suffer<sup>325</sup> and bear the rule and authority of popes, princes, and other governors — which rule and authority he calleth but only<sup>326</sup> tyranny — yet he saith that the people be so free by faith that they be no more bounden thereto than they be bounden to suffer wrong. And this doctrine also teacheth Tyndale, as the special matter<sup>327</sup> of his holy book of disobedience. Now was this doctrine in Almain, of<sup>328</sup> the common uplandish<sup>329</sup> people, so pleasantly heard that it blinded them in the looking upon the remnant, and could not suffer them to consider and see what end the same would in conclusion come to. The temporal<sup>330</sup> lords were glad, also, to hear this gear<sup>331</sup> against the clergy — and the people as glad to hear it against the clergy and against the lords too and against all their governors of every good town and city. And finally, so far went it forward that, at the last, it began to burst out and fall to open force and violence. For, intending to begin at the feeblest, there gathered them together, for the setting forth of these ungracious<sup>332</sup> heresies, a boistous<sup>333</sup> company of that unhappy<sup>334</sup> sect, and first rebelled against an abbot, and after against a bishop, wherewith the temporal lords had good game and sport, and dissembled the matter — gaping after<sup>335</sup> the lands of the spirituality<sup>336</sup> — till they had almost played as Aesop telleth of the dog, which, to snatch at the shadow of the cheese in the water, let fall and lost the cheese that he bore in his mouth. For so was it shortly after that those uplandish Lutherans took so great boldness, and so began to grow strong, that they set also upon the temporal lords. Which had they not set hand thereto the sooner, while they looked for other men's lands, had been like<sup>337</sup> shortly to lose their own. But so quit<sup>338</sup> they themselves that they slew upon the point of<sup>339</sup> seventy thousand Lutherans in one summer, and subdued the remnant in that part of Almain to a right miserable servitude. Howbeit, in the meanwhile many mischievous<sup>340</sup> deeds they did.

“And yet in diverse other parts of Almain and Switzerland, this ungracious sect, by the negligence of the governors in great cities, is so far-forth grown that finally the common people have compelled the rulers to follow them, whom, if they had taken heed in time, they might have ruled and led.

“And now is it too piteous a sight to see the despiteous despites<sup>341</sup> done there in many places to God and all good men, with the marvelous<sup>342</sup> change from all face and fashion<sup>343</sup> of Christendom into a very tyrannous persecution, not only of all good Christian people, quick<sup>344</sup> and dead, but also of Christ himself. For there shall ye see now the goodly monasteries destroyed, the places burned up, the religious people<sup>345</sup> put out and sent to seek their living — or in many cities the places yet standing, with more despite to God than if they were burned up to ashes. For the religious people — monks, friars, and nuns — be clean<sup>346</sup> drawn and driven out, except such as would agree to forsake their vows of chastity and be wedded, and the places dedicated to cleanness and chastity left only to these apostates and brothels,<sup>347</sup> to live there in lechery. Now the parish churches, in many places, not only defaced, all ornaments withdrawn,<sup>348</sup> the holy images pulled down and either broken or burned, but also the Holy Sacrament cast out, and the abominable beasts (which abhorreth<sup>349</sup> me to think on) not abhorred in despite to file in the pyxes,<sup>350</sup> and use, in many places continually, the churches for a common siege.<sup>351</sup> And that in so despiteful wise that when a stranger of<sup>352</sup> other places, where Christ is worshipped, resorteth to<sup>353</sup> these cities, some of those unhappy wretched citizens fail not, as<sup>354</sup> it were for courtesy and kindness, to accompany them in walking abroad, to show them the pleasures and commodities<sup>355</sup> of the town, and then bring them to no place

325 allow 326 but only: nothing but 327 special matter: particular subject 328 by 329 rustic, uncultivated 330 secular 331 discourse; business 332 graceless; wicked 333 violent; rough 334 troublesome 335 longing for 336 clergy 337 likely 338 acted, acquitted 339 upon the point of: nearly 340 evil 341 despiteous despites: cruel outrages 342 terrible; amazing 343 face and fashion: appearance and semblance 344 living 345 religious people: those in religious orders 346 completely 347 prostitutes

348 removed 349 horrifies 350 file... pyxes: defecate in the boxes that held the Eucharist 351 common siege: communal privy 352 from 353 resorteth to: visits 354 as if 355 pleasures and commodities: pleasing sights and goods lightly<sup>356</sup> but only the churches, to show them in derision what uses the churches serve for.

“Of this sect was the great part of those ungracious people also which late entered into Rome with the Duke of Bourbon<sup>357</sup> — not only robbing and spoiling<sup>358</sup> the city (as well their own friends as the contrary party), but, like very beasts, did also violate the wives in the sight of their husbands, slew the children in the sight of the fathers. And to extort the discovering<sup>359</sup> of more money, when men had brought out all that ever they had, to save themselves from death or further pain, and were at pacts and promises of rest<sup>360</sup> without further business,<sup>361</sup> then the wretched tyrants and cruel tormentors, as though all that stood<sup>362</sup> for nothing, ceased not to put them eftsoons<sup>363</sup> into intolerable torments. And old ancient honorable men, those fierce heretics letted<sup>364</sup> not to hang up by the privy members,<sup>365</sup> and from many they pulled them off and cast them in the street. And some<sup>366</sup> brought out naked, with his hands bounden behind him and a cord tied fast unto his privy members. Then would they set before him, in his way, others of those tyrants with their Moorish pikes, the points toward the breasts of these poor naked men. And then one or two of those wretches would stand behind those Moorish pikes and draw the poor souls by the members toward them. Now, then was all their cruel sport and laughter either to see the seely<sup>367</sup> naked men, in shrinking from the pikes, to tear off their members, or, for pain of that pulling, to run their naked bodies in deep upon the pikes. Too piteous and too abominable were it to rehearse the villainous pain and torments that they devised on the seely women — to whom, after that they had beastily abused them (wives in the sight of their husbands, and the maidens in the sight of their fathers), they were reckoned for piteous<sup>368</sup> that did no more but cut their throats. And very certain is it that not in Rome only, but also in the country<sup>369</sup> of Milan that they kept and oppressed, after torments used<sup>370</sup> and money fetched out that way, then some<sup>371</sup> calling himself a gentleman in Almain or Spain would feign himself fallen in love of his host’s daughter, and that he would marry her in any wise,<sup>372</sup> and then make much earnest business for to have some money with<sup>373</sup> her. And whether he got aught or got nought by that device, he letted not soon after to put the father, the mother, the fair daughter, and all the whole house to new torments, to make them tell where any more money were — were there any or none. And some failed not to take the child and bind it to a broach,<sup>374</sup> and lay it to the fire to roast — the father and mother looking on — and then begin to common of<sup>375</sup> a price for the sparing of the child, asking first a hundred ducats, then fifty, then forty, then twenty, then ten, then five, then twain, when the seely father had not one left, but these tyrants had all before. Then would they let the child roast to death. And yet in derision, as though they pitied the child, they would say to the father and the mother, ‘Ah, fie, fie, for shame. What marvel is it though<sup>376</sup> God sent a vengeance among you. What unnatural people be you, that can find in your hearts to see your own child roasted afore your face, rather than ye would out with one ducat to deliver it from death.’

“Thus devised these cursed wretches so many diverse fashions of exquisite cruelties that I ween they have taught the devil new torments in hell that he never knew before, and will not fail to prove himself a good scholar and surely render them his lesson when they come there, where it is to be feared that many of them be by this.<sup>377</sup> For soon after that they had in Rome exercised a while this fierce and cruel tyranny, and entered into the holy churches, spoiled<sup>378</sup> the holy relics, cast out the Blessed Sacrament, pulled the chalice from the altar at Mass, slain priests in the church — left no kind of cruelty or spite undone, but from hour to hour imbruing<sup>379</sup> their hands in blood, and that in such wise as any Turk or Saracen would have pitied or abhorred — our Lord sent, soon after, such a pestilence among them that he left not of them the third part alive. For this purpose I rehearse you this their heavy mischievous<sup>380</sup> dealing: that ye may perceive by their deeds what good cometh of their sect. For as our Savior saith, ye shall know the tree by the fruit.”<sup>381</sup>

356 swiftly 357 late. . . Bourbon: Rome was sacked May 6, 1527, by troops under Duke Charles, who had died in the battle. 358 despoiling 359 revealing 360 freedom from further violence or trouble 361 trouble 362 counted 363 soon afterwards 364 hesitated 365 privy members: private parts 366 someone would be 367 helpless, defenseless, pitiable 368 merciful 369 province 370 practiced 371 someone 372 in any wise: by any means 373 have . . . with:

get some money along with 374 spit 375 common of: discuss 376 that 377 this time; now 378 despoiled 379 staining 380 evil 381 Mt 7:16–20

THE EIGHTH CHAPTER

The messenger saith that the malice of the men is not to be imputed to the sect, since that of every sect, some be naught.<sup>382</sup> And the author showeth that in the Lutherans, the sect itself is the cause of the malice that the men fall to.

“Sir,” quoth your friend, “in good faith, I neither can nor will defend that sect. But yet reason it is to take everything as it is. And if it be naught, it hath the less need to be made worse. But as for the malicious cruel dealing of men of war, is<sup>383</sup> not, in my mind, to be imputed to the sect of Luther. For there is no sect so saintly but they fall in cruelty when they fall to war. And of every sect, also, be some bad. And therefore the malice of the men is not, as meseemeth, to be imputed unto the sect.”

“It is not,” quoth I, “all one to be some naught and all naught. But they that fall in this sect wax<sup>384</sup> naught, all the whole meinie.<sup>385</sup> For forthwith upon this sect once begun, the whole flocks of such as were infected therewith fell unto those mischievous deeds that I before rehearsed you. And also though men in war wax furious and cruel, yet was there never none that went therein so far — and specially in such kind of cruelty as hath been among Christian men in their wars always forborne,<sup>386</sup> as is the despites done to the Blessed Sacrament, wherein these beasts were more hot and more busy than would<sup>387</sup> the great Turk — and that because their sect is yet, in manner, worse than his. Moreover, the unhappy<sup>388</sup> deeds of that sect must needs be imputed to the sect itself while the doctrine thereof teacheth and giveth occasion to their evil deeds. A Christian man’s evil living cannot be imputed to his Christendom.<sup>389</sup> For his living is contrary to the doctrine and living of Christ. But as for the doctrine of this unhappy sect, and the living<sup>390</sup> also of the beginners of the same, is<sup>391</sup> such as every wise man well perceiveth doth teach and give occasion of their evil deeds. For what good deed shall he study or labor to do, that<sup>392</sup> believeth Luther that he hath no free will of his own, by which he can with help of grace either work or pray? Shall he not say to himself that he may sit still and let God alone?

“What harm shall they care to forbear, that believe Luther that God alone, without their will, worketh all the mischief that they do themselves?”

“What shall he care how long he live in sin, that believeth Luther that he shall, after this life, neither feel well nor ill in body nor soul till the Day of Doom? Will not he, trow<sup>393</sup> you, say as the Welshman said? ‘If thou give her<sup>394</sup> that day, by God, Davy will have thy coat too!’<sup>395</sup> And this thing I say but for an example. For look his opinions through, and ye shall find that they plainly set forth<sup>396</sup> all the world to wretched living. If they would say that we misconstrue their words, their books be open,<sup>397</sup> and the words plain, and inculked<sup>398</sup> again and again so often and so openly that men cannot err therein, nor they by any cloak or color<sup>399</sup> defend them.”

“And besides that, not only the commonalty<sup>400</sup> of their sect show the effect and fruit of their doctrine by their abominable dealing, as I have rehearsed you, but also the doctors<sup>401</sup> and the archheretics themselves well declare<sup>402</sup> the holiness of their doctrine by their own living. For as they live, they teach; and as they teach, they live.”

THE NINTH CHAPTER

The author showeth that it is a great token that the world is near at an end while<sup>403</sup> we see the people so far fallen from God that they can abide it to be content with this pestilent frantic<sup>404</sup> sect, which no people — Christian or heathen — could have suffered<sup>405</sup> afore our days.

“If the world were not near at an end, and the fervor of devotion so sore<sup>406</sup> cooled that it were almost quenched among Christian people, it could never have comen to pass that so many people should fall to the following of such a beastly sect. For albeit that<sup>407</sup> the Muhammadans, being a sensual and filthy sect, did in few years draw the great part of the world unto it by the selfsame ways which now the Lutherans use — that is to wit, voluptuous living and violence, offering delight unto the receivers and death to the refusers — yet was there before

382 bad 383 it is 384 grow 385 group 386 refrained from, avoided 387 more... would: more active than would be 388 objectionable 389 Christianity 390 conduct 391 it is 392 who

393 believe, suppose 394 a Welsh idiom for “him” (Davy) 395 lf... too: i.e., If he can wait that long to pay back or be punished, he’ll take your coat in addition to your money. 396 set forth: direct

397 public 398 repeated 399 pretext 400 general body of followers 401 theologians 402 make manifest 403 when 404 insane 405 tolerated 406 greatly 407 albeit that: although this abominable sect never any sect so shameless that would still avow themselves for Christian folk, granting the Scripture to be true, and there-without so enviously<sup>408</sup> blaspheme and oppugn<sup>409</sup> 5 the Church of Christ, the sacraments of Christ, the saints of Christ, the cross of Christ, the mother of Christ, and the holy body of Christ: so shamefully living, and openly professing a bestial manner of living, clean<sup>410</sup> contrary to the doctrine and life 10 of Christ. The Arians, the Pelagians, the Manichae-ans, and so forth — every sort of heretics — began of such as, though they wickedly erred in substantial articles of the faith, yet was their outward fashion of living so honest and spiritual in appearance that 15 men thought themselves bounden the better to believe their doctrine as Christian, for<sup>411</sup> some spiritual form and fashion of their Christian living. But now, the chieftains of these execrable heresies both teach and use<sup>412</sup> more sensual and licentious liv-20 ing than ever did Muhammad. Which, though he license men to<sup>413</sup> many wives, yet he never taught nor suffered his folk to break their chastity promised once and solemnly dedicated to God. Whereas Luther not only teacheth monks, friars, and nuns 25 to marriage, but also, being a friar, hath married a nun himself, and with her liveth, under the name of wedlock, in open incestuous<sup>414</sup> lechery, without care or shame, because he hath procured and gotten so many shameful and shameless companions.

 30 “Who could have bidden<sup>415</sup> to look any man in the face that should have done thus in Saint Jerome’s and Saint Augustine’s days? What<sup>416</sup> speak we of Saint Jerome and Saint Augustine? Who durst have done it for shame any time since Christ’s birth un-35 til our wretched days? Or who since Adam’s time, among the chosen people of God? What speak we of the chosen people of God? The very paynims<sup>417</sup> and pagans — idolaters — kept their chastity vowed once to their false gods, and rather chose to cut off 40 the members with which they might break it than to stand in the jeopardy to break it. And in Rome of old time, when they were pagans, if any vestal virgin (for so called they their nuns) were violated, they not only beat the man to death with rods in the marketplace, and buried the woman quick,<sup>418</sup> 45 but also reckoned it for a wonderful monster,<sup>419</sup> and a token of wrath and indignation of their gods toward their city and empire — putting thereupon themselves in devoi<sup>420</sup> with open<sup>421</sup> processions, and prayers, and sacrifice, to procure the recover-50 y of their gods’ favor. Is it not, then, now a wondrous case to see — since that the chastity<sup>422</sup> promised once to God, and also to the false idols under the name of ‘god,’ hath always been, since the world began, among Christian and heathen so highly es-55 teemed that the breakers thereof have always been,

 by the common consent of the whole world, as a thing taught by God unto good men, and by nature to all men, taken, reputed, and punished as abominable, wicked wretches — is it not, I say, now 60 a wondrous thing to see, that in the flock of Christian people, which by Christ himself, by all his apostles, by all his holy martyrs, confessors, and doctors, by all his whole Church, all the whole time of these fifteen hundred years past, chastity hath been 65 more highly praised and esteemed than ever it was of any other sect since the world began, we should see now a lewd<sup>423</sup> friar so bold and so shameless to marry a nun and bide thereby,<sup>424</sup> and be taken still for a Christian man, and, over that, for a man 70 meet<sup>425</sup> to be the beginner of a sect whom any honest man should vouchsafe<sup>426</sup> to follow? If our Lord God — whose wisdom is infinite — should have sat and studied to devise a way whereby he might cast in our face the confusion of our folly, how might 75 he have founden a more effectual openly to show us the shame of our sin than to suffer us that call ourselves Christian folk to see such a rabble spring up among us as, professing the faith and religion of Christ, let not to set at nought<sup>427</sup> all the doctors 80 of Christ’s Church and lean to the only<sup>428</sup> authority of Friar Tuck and mad<sup>429</sup> Marian?”

408 hostilely, spitefully 409 attack 410 completely 411 on account of 412 practice 413 to have 414 Under canon law, monks and nuns were considered brothers and sisters. 415 endured

416 why 417 heathens 418 alive
 419 marvel; something unnatural
 420 duty 421 public 422 celibacy 423 bad; lascivious 424 bide thereby:
 stick by this 425 fit 426 be willing 427 let . . . nought: do not hesitate to value as nothing 428 lean to the only: rely alone on 429 changed to “maid” in 1557

Workes

THE TENTH CHAPTER

The author inveigheth against this detestable article of this ungracious<sup>430</sup> sect whereby they take away the liberty of man's free will and ascribe all things to destiny.

“Surely, as I say, this world is either, after the words of Saint John, totus positus in maligno (‘all set in malice’),<sup>431</sup> that we be so prone wittingly<sup>432</sup> to take so wrong a way, or else is it in a marvelous blindness, if we can neither perceive by the naughty living of the persons that their sect is naught, nor can perceive by their doctrine that their sect must make their persons naught, their heresies being such as ye have heard. Whereby every man that any faith hath, and any manner knowledge of Christian belief, may well and surely perceive that Luther and all his offspring, with all those that favor and set forth his sect, be very limbs<sup>433</sup> of the devil and open enemies to the faith of Christ. And not only to the faith and manhood of our Savior Christ, but also against the Holy Ghost, and the Father himself, and utterly against all goodness of the Godhead—as those that wretchedly lay all the weight and blame of our sin to the necessity and constraint of God's ordinance, affirming that we do no sin of ourselves by any power of our own will, but by the compulsion and handiwork of God, and that we do not the sin ourselves, but that God doth the sin in us himself. And thus these wretched heretics, with this blasphemous heresy alone, lay more villainous rebuke<sup>434</sup> to the great majesty of God than ever any one ribald laid unto<sup>435</sup> another. For who was there ever that laid unto another all the particular evil deeds of any one other man, where these ribalds lay to the charge and blame of God all the malice and mischief, from the first fault to the last, that ever was wrought or thought by man, woman, or devil. And by this give they wretches great boldness to follow their foul affections, as things—after<sup>436</sup> their opinion—more verily wrought in them by God than the best minds be in good men, and that it were therefore in vain for them to resist their sinful appetites. And if they shall be damned, yet they say it shall be long ere they feel it. For Luther saith that all souls shall sleep, and feel neither good nor bad after this life till Doomsday.<sup>437</sup> And then they that shall be damned, shall be damned, he saith, for no deserving of their own deeds, but for such evil deeds as God only forced and constrained them unto, and wrought in them himself, using them in all those evil deeds but as a dead instrument, as a man heweth with a hatchet. And that God shall damn all that shall be damned for his own deeds only, which himself shall have done in them, and finally for his only pleasure,<sup>438</sup> because it liked<sup>439</sup> him not to choose them as he did his chosen people, whom they say that he chose in such wise, before the beginning of the world, that they can never sin.”

THE ELEVENTH CHAPTER

The messenger saith that howsoever Luther and his followers in Almain believe, yet he cannot think that such as be Lutherans in England—of whom some, he saith, have seemed good and honest—be so mad and unhappy to believe that all hangeth upon destiny. Whereupon the author showeth the contrary, and that they be naught<sup>440</sup> indeed, seem they never so good. And for proof that howsoever they color their words, they mean that all dependeth upon only destiny, he rehearseth a certain dispicion<sup>441</sup> had with a heretic detected<sup>442</sup> to the bishop and examined—the author being present—where the heretic, being learned and a preacher, made many shifts<sup>443</sup> to make it seem that in his evil words he meant but well.

When your friend had heard all this, he said at last that albeit the words of Luther seemed very plain toward the affirming of such opinions, yet were the things so far out of all frame<sup>444</sup> that it gave him occasion to doubt lest Luther meant not all things so evil as his words seem to weigh<sup>445</sup> to. And if he so meant himself, with others of his flock and affinity<sup>446</sup> in Almain, yet thought your friend that such as here favor and follow his sect, in England—of whom some seem right honest, and far from his manner of living—do not so take his words, nor understand them that way, but construe them to some better sense.

430 graceless, wicked 431 1 Jn 5:19
432 knowingly 433 agents 434 insult, disgrace 435 ribald laid unto: scoundrel attributed to 436 according to 437 Judgment Day 438 only pleasure: pleasure only 439 pleased 440 bad 441 disputation 442 reported; accused 443 evasions; fraudulent devices

444 established order 445 amount 446 association

“Forsooth,” quoth I, “they cannot but know his open living in lechery with his lewd leman<sup>447</sup> the nun, and that all the captains of that sort — some late<sup>448</sup> Carthusians, some Observants,<sup>449</sup> some of other religions,<sup>450</sup> and all now apostates and wedded — live in like manner and teach others the same. And by this can they not doubt but that their doctrine is naught, except themselves allow<sup>451</sup> that way for good. Now as for their own goodness, ye find few that fall to that sect but that soon after they fall into the contempt of prayer, and fasting, and of all good works, under the name of ‘ceremonies.’ And if any do otherwise, it is for some purpose for the while to blind the people and keep themselves in favor till they may find the time, by leisure, to fashion and frame them better to their purpose, which<sup>452</sup> in the beginning — if they showed themselves plainly — could haply<sup>453</sup> not abide to hear them. Of which their demeanor,<sup>454</sup> and that in these heresies they mean here no better than Luther doth himself, I have had good experience, and among many other things, this that I shall show you. It happed me to be lately present whereas<sup>455</sup> one in the Lutheran books deeply learned — and of truth neither in Holy Scripture nor in secular literature unlearned (as I perceive not only by the testimony of other men and the degrees that he had taken in the university, but also by his words and his writing) — was, in the presence of right honorable, virtuous, and very cunning<sup>456</sup> persons, examined. For he was at that time in ward<sup>457</sup> for heresy, because that, being learned, and using to hear<sup>458</sup> confessions, and among many folk meetly well allowed<sup>459</sup> in preaching, and thereby growing in good opinion and favor of many good, simple people, abused all these open and apparent good things to the secret sowing and setting forth of Luther’s heresies. And had for that intent not only taught and written and covertly corrupted diverse light and lewd<sup>460</sup> persons, but also had bought great number of the books of Luther, and Wycliffe, Hus, and Zwingli, and such other heretics — and of many one sort<sup>461</sup> diverse books — to be delivered, as he could find occasion, unto young scholars of the universities, such as he thought, of<sup>462</sup> youth and lightness, most likely to be soon corrupted. This man, I say, being examined and long keeping himself close<sup>463</sup> from disclosing of the matter, and more ready to go straight to the devil with lying and false forswearing<sup>464</sup> than to be acknown of<sup>465</sup> his evil demeanor and confess the truth, at the last perceiving the matters (partly by the confession of other folk, partly by his own handwriting) so far-forth comen to light that they could in no wise be cloaked, then began he somewhat plainly to confess and declare, not only what he had done for the setting forth of that sect, but also partly what opinions he and others, his fellows, had holden<sup>466</sup> and were of. Setting,<sup>467</sup> nevertheless, all the colors<sup>468</sup> he could to make it seem that though<sup>469</sup> the words which they spoke or wrote were strange and contrary to right belief, yet the effect of their meaning was not much discrepant<sup>470</sup> from the true faith of Christ’s Church. Howbeit, when he was reasoned withal,<sup>471</sup> and saw that he could not so shift it off, but that, for any color he could find, one part of his tale ever contraried<sup>472</sup> another, at last he showed plainly their opinions, and laid forth (as in part for his own excuse, as things inducing him thereto) all the texts of Scripture by which they pretend<sup>473</sup> to prove their opinions true. Among which opinions, when he came to the opinion by which they hold that only faith alone is sufficient, without good works, unto that he said in the beginning that they meant nothing else thereby but that men should put their faith in God’s promises and hope to be saved thereby, and that they should not put their trust in their works, for that would turn them to pride.

“Then was it answered him that he and his fellows could not mean so. For if they did, then could they not blame the Church as they do, making as though the Church had all this while hid the true faith from the people, and that themselves were now shent<sup>474</sup> for preaching the Gospel truly. For if this were their meaning, they then meant none other than every common preacher of the Church hath always preached before Luther’s days. For what preacher hath not told the people the parable of the poor publican ashamed of his sins and

447 lewd leman: lascivious beloved 448 former 449 Observant Franciscans 450 religious orders 451 except themselves allow: unless they approve 452 who 453 perhaps 454 conduct 455 where 456 intelligent 457 custody

458 using to hear: accustomed to hearing 459 approved 460 light and lewd: gullible and ignorant 461 kind of 462 on account of 463 shut up, concealed 464 denying under oath 465 be acknown of: acknowledge

466 held 467 Showing 468 pretences 469 even if 470 different than 471 with 472 contradicted 473 allege 474 disgraced, ruined

the proud Pharisee boasting of his virtues?<sup>475</sup> Who hath not bidden them do well, and, albeit that God will reward them for their good deeds, yet put not their trust in themselves and their own deeds, but in God's goodness? Who hath not told them that they should, as God biddeth them in the Gospel, that when they have done all they can do, yet say to themselves, 'We be but unprofitable servants; we have done but our duty'?<sup>476</sup> These things and such others the Church hath always taught against the putting of a proud trust in our own deeds, because that we cannot always surely<sup>477</sup> judge our own deeds, for the blind favor<sup>478</sup> that we bear toward ourselves. And therefore was it said to him, 'If ye meant but thus, as the Church meaneth, then would ye preach but as the Church preacheth, and not blaspheme the Church in your sermons, as though ye began true preaching of the Gospel and that the Church had hitherto preached false. And also ye must needs mean some other thing. For Luther, whose sect ye confess that ye have leaned unto, writeth in this matter far otherwise. For he saith plain that faith alone, without any good works, doth justify us and sufficeth for our salvation.' Then answered he that therein they meant none other but that faith is sufficient alone if one happen, after he have faith and baptism, to die ere he have time to do any good works. Then was it said unto him, if they should teach this opinion, under such words, for a great, secret mystery new founden out, and thereby blame the Church for misteaching the people — as though the Church taught them to put less trust in God and in faith of<sup>479</sup> Christ than they should do, and induced them to put their trust in themselves and their own good works — they used themselves marvelously,<sup>480</sup> considering that if they meant none other, the Church and they meant all one thing. But they could not mean so. For then why should they blame the Church, that<sup>481</sup> saith not the contrary? And also, if they meant none other thing, few<sup>482</sup> words would serve them. They should not need so often to speak thereof. For then that tale can do little good here or anywhere else where folk be christened in their cradles. For either they die ere they have time to do good works, and then they be too young to hear that sermon, or else they live and have time to do good works. And then that sermon were not wholesome for them: that good works need not,<sup>483</sup> but only faith is sufficient, without them. 'And when the people take it as ye speak it — that faith alone is enough for them — then is it now a bare gloss<sup>484</sup> for you to say that ye meant not so, but only that faith alone had been enough for them if they had died in their swaddling clothes.'

"To this he said that they thought also that faith alone doth justify a man without any good works, not only in children, but also in every age. 'For whensoever a man that hath been a sinner doth repent and amend in his mind with a full faith in the promises of God, he is justified ere ever he do any of these good works: alms, fasting, or any such other. For he cannot work well till he be good already. For as Christ saith, Arbor mala non potest bonum fructum facere ("An evil tree cannot bring forth good fruit");<sup>485</sup> and therefore, since good works be good fruit, an evil man cannot work them. Whereby it appeareth well that the man is justified before by his faith alone, without the works, and then out of that faith groweth the good fruit of good works. But faith did justify the man before, and the man was as good before the works as he is after. For his faith did justify him. And as for the works, be<sup>486</sup> but things that the faith in the man, or the man by the faith, bringeth forth, as the tree bringeth forth his<sup>487</sup> leaves and can do none other, faith being in the heart.'

"Then was it said unto him that in this tale he seemed to make the good works to be much like a shadow that the body maketh of necessity while it standeth in the sun, and is never the better therefor.<sup>488</sup> And then was it asked him whether a man must not, if his faith shall serve him, have charity therewith, and a purpose to do good works. 'Yes,' quoth he, 'that he must, if he have age and discretion thereto.'<sup>489</sup> Then was it answered him that then was all gone that himself had said before. For then did not faith alone justify the man; but the charity, with the purpose of good works, must — by his own granting — needs go therewith, or else would his faith justify nothing at all. For if he had never so great a faith and never so sure a belief in God's promises, yet if he purposed to do no good deeds

475 See Lk 18:9–14. 476 Lk 17:10
477 with certainty 478 for the blind favor: because of the blind partiality 479 in 480 used themselves marvelously:

conducted themselves wondrously 481 which 482 a few 483 need not: are not necessary 484 bare gloss: worthless commentary 485 Mt 7:18; see also Lk

6:43. 486 they are 487 its 488 for it 489 sufficient for that (purpose)

therewith, but peradventure harm, he should have little justification by his only faith. And therefore it was false that<sup>490</sup> he had said — ‘a man is never the better for his good works’ — while<sup>491</sup> his good works 5 be so taken and reputed with<sup>492</sup> God that the purpose of them, yet undone, so far-forth worketh to his justification that without that purpose he cannot be justified. And that it is also false that<sup>493</sup> he said — that ‘faith alone justifies a man’ — when himself is fain<sup>494</sup> to grant that faith without charity and 10 purpose of good works cannot justify, which is as much to say as faith alone cannot justify.

“To this he answered that he had said that faith only was sufficient, and that faith alone doth justify,
 15 because that if a man had faith, it could not be but that he should work good works. ‘For faith,’ he said, ‘could never be idle, as the fire must needs burn and give heat. And therefore, as a man may say, “The fire is enough to burn a tree,” though he speak nothing 20 of heat, and yet the fire doth it by heat; and a man may say “The fire maketh me see by night,” and yet the fire doth it but by the light, so may a man say that faith doth save us, though faith do it not without hope, and charity, and other virtuous works, because that faith hath always good hope and charity with it, and cannot but work well — no more than the fire can be without heat and light and burn all combustible things that it may touch and tarry with.’
 25

“Then was it said unto him that albeit a man might 30 so speak by<sup>495</sup> the fire, yet would not this thing serve their sect. ‘For he that saith fire alone is enough to burn would not say nay to<sup>496</sup> him that would say the fire could not burn but if<sup>497</sup> it had heat. But your sect scorneth and blameth the Church because the Church saith that faith will not suffice but if it have charity and good works. For else<sup>498</sup> ye had no cause in this matter to preach contrary to the Church. Moreover, where ye say that faith hath always good hope with it, that seemeth not always true. For he that hopeth that by faith alone he shall be saved, without any good works — as Lutherans do believe indeed — he hath an evil hope, and a damnable. Now where ye say that ye preach faith alone to be sufficient because that faith hath always charity joined therewith — if 40 this were true, why preach ye not as well that charity alone is sufficient, which were as near the truth as the other? Now, where ye make all the ground upon 45

this — that faith hath ever charity therewith, and that it cannot be but that charity, which is indeed the thing that specially bringeth forth good works, 50 much more properly than faith, for faith bringeth them forth by charity when it is joined therewith, as the Apostle saith, Fides quae per dilectionem operatur (“Faith worketh by charity”)<sup>499</sup> — where ye say it cannot be but that this charity is always joined unto 55 faith, this ground will fail you, and make your foundation false, and all your building fall. The apostle Paul in many places of his epistles saith the contrary thereof. For he saith that if a man have so great faith that he might by the force of his faith work miracles, and also such fervent affection to the faith that he would give his body to the fire for the defense thereof, yet if he lacked charity, all his faith sufficed not.”<sup>500</sup>

“In good faith,” quoth your friend, “he was well and properly answered. But yet methinketh he might have replied a little again<sup>501</sup> to those words of Saint Paul, and might have avoided<sup>502</sup> them well with other words of his own.<sup>503</sup> For where he writeth also to the Galatians that if any angel would come 65 down from heaven and preach a contrary gospel to that that he had preached already, ‘accursed should he be,’ and not to be believed,<sup>504</sup> he did not in these words affirm nor intend thereby that ever it should so be, or could so be, that any angel so should do indeed. For he knew right well it was impossible that any angel of heaven should come down and tell a false tale. But he said it only by a manner of speaking (which is among learned men called ‘hyperbole’) for the more vehement expressing of a matter, 70 nothing meaning else but that the gospel which he had preached was the plain, sure, and undoubtable truth, against which no man were to be believed. And in like wise methinketh the man that ye speak of might have said that though Saint Paul said ‘If he had so great faith that he were able thereby to remove hills, except<sup>505</sup> he had charity therewith’ it would not serve him, he meant thereby no more but to show the great need that men have to<sup>506</sup> charity, and not that it were possible that faith could be 75 without charity, no more than he meant that an angel may come down from heaven to preach a false faith. And therefore might it yet stand right well with all those words of Saint Paul that faith cannot 80
 85 90

490 what, that which 491 since 492 reputed with: regarded by 493 what 494 obliged 495 about 496 say nay to: disagree with; contradict 497 but if: unless 498 otherwise 499 Gal

 5:6 500 See 1 Cor 13:2. 501 back

502 refuted 503 his own: Saint Paul's 504 See Gal 1:8. 505 unless 506 for fail of salvation, since it cannot fail of charity. And of truth, meseemeth as that man said: that faith cannot be idle, but it must needs work well.”

“Forsooth,” quoth I, “the man lacked<sup>507</sup> you there; for he found not that gloss, which though<sup>508</sup> he had, yet would it not have served him. For between those two places of Saint Paul is there great difference. For in the one is there an impossible excess and hyperbole; in the other is there not so. For angels of heaven never can come down and teach a false faith, but faith may be severed from charity. And in the one place he none other thing intended than (as ye say) to show, by that great exceeding word, the undoubted truth of the faith which himself had preached. But in the other place his special purpose was to teach the Corinthians that they should neither trust that any gift of nature, or gift of God above nature, or any manner virtue — alms-deed, faith, or other — were able to stand them in stead<sup>509</sup> without charity. And this did he specially for that he would<sup>510</sup> that no man should be in such error as to reckon that either excellent gift of cunning,<sup>511</sup> great labor spent in preaching, great alms spent on poor people, or a very fervent faith might suffice to their salvation if charity lacked.<sup>512</sup> Against which error, he doth in such wise exhort them to charity, in avoiding the rancor which by occasion of schisms did arise among them, that he showed them precisely that without charity they lost clearly<sup>513</sup> the merit of all their other virtues and graces that God had given them — cunning, alms-deed, faith, and all — putting the example by his own self, which, though he were a chosen servant and apostle, yet if he were in language equal with all the whole world and with angels too and had all the cunning that possibly could be had, and the spirit of all prophecy therewith, and would give all his goods in alms, and had also all the full faith so great that it sufficed to work wonders with, and so fervent that he would abide to be burned for it, yet if he lacked charity, all this would not serve him. So that ye may see now that your gloss would not have relieved<sup>514</sup> this man. For though none angel could come down and teach an untruth, and therefore the words that ye allege<sup>515</sup> can be none otherwise taken than, as ye say, by way of excess and hyperbole, to declare the vehemence of his mind in the matter of faith which he then spoke of, yet this other place of Saint Paul, that was laid<sup>516</sup> against that heretic that I speak of, as great and vehement as the words be, yet do they plainly prove that the Apostle showeth that faith may be without charity — and that both so great that it may suffice to the doing of great wonders and so fervent that it may suffer a painful death, and yet, for fault<sup>517</sup> of charity, not sufficient to salvation, and that this may hap as well in faith as in alms-deed, which the Apostle putteth in the same case.<sup>518</sup> And therefore, where that man said, and ye seem to confirm the same — that faith cannot be idle from the working of good works — the Apostle, to show the contrary, and that all the works of faith, though they seem never so good, be yet naught<sup>519</sup> indeed if they be not wrought with charity, commendeth only the faith that worketh by charity, signifying that all other works of faith be not available.<sup>520</sup> And surely faith alone, without charity, may be besides this not only idle, without the busyness of good works, but also, for lack of good works, it may be utterly dead. And therefore, as it was there objected unto that man, the holy apostle James saith to them that reckon faith sufficient for salvation without good works that they be worse than devils.<sup>521</sup> For he saith that the devils do believe, and tremble for the fear of God, and that men which by the hope and boldness of their belief think their faith without good works sufficient be worse than devils, because they stand out of dread<sup>522</sup> of God, that menaceth<sup>523</sup> unto them the pains of hell except<sup>524</sup> they do good works. Without which, Saint James, for a final conclusion, saith that the faith is but dead.

“But here was it also said unto him, yet again, that though Saint James do say that ‘faith without good works is dead,’<sup>525</sup> he should not thereby run to his old gloss and say that therefore he and other Lutherans meant that faith sufficeth to salvation because they think it cannot be but that it shall needs bring forth good works, and that therefore, on the contrary side, if one have no good works, he hath no faith, because a dead faith is no faith, as a dead man is no man. It was told him that this gloss would not serve him. For Saint James meant not that the faith that he calleth dead for lack of good works is no

507 fell short of 508 even if 509 stand them in stead: avail or support them
510 for that he would: because he wished 511 knowledge, wisdom 512 was lacking 513 completely 514 aided, assisted 515 quote 516 cited 517 lack 518 situation 519 bad 520 efficacious 521 See Jas 2:18–26. 522 stand out of dread: have no fear or reverence 523 that menaceth: who holds out as a punishment 524 unless 525 Jas 2:26

faith — no more than Saint Paul meant that a widow living in delight and pleasure is no woman, though he said that she ‘is dead even as she goeth alive’<sup>526</sup> — but Saint James meant only that such faith shall not stand them in stead.<sup>527</sup> For Saint James denieth not but that such a dead faith as he calleth dead because it is unprofitable is yet a very faith indeed, though it be not quick<sup>528</sup> in good works. And therefore he resembleth<sup>529</sup> such a faith in a man unto the unprofitable faith that is in a devil. For he saith that where such a man is bold of<sup>530</sup> his faith, the devil hath faith as well as he; for the devil doth believe such things as we believe. To this the man answered that some ‘right well-learned men’ were of the mind that without<sup>531</sup> a man wrought good works, it was a good proof that he had no faith at all; for very faith could not but work, and that the devil had no faith but by equivocation of this word ‘faith.’ For the very faith, indeed, is a faith in the promises of God. And the devil is desperate,<sup>532</sup> and hath not nor cannot have faith and trust in God’s promises.

“Then was it answered him that those ‘right well-learned men’ were Luther and Tyndale and their fellows, that take themselves for better learned than Christ’s blessed apostles Saint Paul or Saint James, which<sup>533</sup> in their holy writing affirm fully the contrary. And where they say that the devil hath no faith, but hath the knowledge of the things that we believe, and so he hath not faith, they affirm therein more than they may make good.<sup>534</sup> For Saint James saith they ‘believe,’ and saith not they ‘know.’ And he, when he wrote it, knew much better than Luther, and Tyndale too, what manner<sup>535</sup> perceiving the devils have in the articles of our faith. In which, as there be some whereof the devils have peradventure not a belief, but a certain and sure knowledge — as of Christ’s descension into hell, and spoiling<sup>536</sup> of their possession — so are they of likelihood in<sup>537</sup> any other articles of our faith whereof they have only belief and persuasion, without the very knowledge and science.<sup>538</sup> And where those ‘well-learned men’ Luther and Tyndale say that the devil hath not faith but by the equivocation of the word ‘faith’ — being indeed (as ye say) a faith in the promises of God, whereby Christian men hope to come to heaven, whereas the devils be desperate and can have no such faith in God’s promises, nor hope or look for heaven — these ‘well-learned men’ that so say go about to set Saint James to school.<sup>539</sup> For they would we should ween<sup>540</sup> that Saint James did speak of faith like one that wist<sup>541</sup> not what faith meant, but were deceived by equivocation of the word, calling faith the thing that is not faith indeed; whereas indeed Saint James speaketh of it as he should, and useth the word in his<sup>542</sup> right signification, and these Lutherans abuse the word of<sup>543</sup> a malicious mind to deceive unlearned people with equivocation. For whereas faith signifieth the belief and firm credence given, not only to such things as God promiseth, but also to every truth that he telleth his Church, by writing or without, which thing he will have us bounden to believe; and whereas of truth, the devils, as Saint James saith, do believe such things and have<sup>544</sup> them in a reverent dread: now would these heretics blind us with their equivocation by which they not only restrain<sup>545</sup> the faith unto the promises alone, from all other articles of the faith — of which many be no promises, as<sup>546</sup> to believe that there is a God, and that there be three Persons, and many such other articles — but also abuse the word ‘faith’ altogether, turning it slyly from belief into trust, confidence, and hope, and would have it seem as though our faith were nothing else but a sure trust and a faithful hope that we have in God’s promises. And this sophistical handling of ‘faith’ is the thing that, as appeareth by Tyndale in his book of Obedience, these Lutherans ween to deceive all the world withal,<sup>547</sup> and to make men ween that ‘faith’ betokeneth not belief, but hope and trust; and so to make men ween that Saint James wist not what ‘faith’ meant when he laid<sup>548</sup> against them that put their trust, as these Lutherans teach us, in their only faith,<sup>549</sup> the comparison between them and devils, which believe as surely as they. And therefore to reprove<sup>550</sup> Saint James, they would make us believe that our faith were nothing but hope, whereas every man wotteth<sup>551</sup> that faith and hope be two distinct virtues, and that hope is not faith, but followeth faith, in him that hath hope. For no man can hope for heaven if he believe it not. But on the other side,

526 1 Tim 5:6 527 stand them in stead: do them any good 528 alive 529 compares 530 is bold of: presumes upon 531 unless 532 in despair 533 who 534 make good: prove 535 kind of, custom of

536 despoiling 537 with regard to 538 understanding 539 set... to school: correct 540 would... ween: want us to think 541 knew 542 its 543 abuse the word of: misuse the word out of 544 hold

545 restrict, limit 546 such as 547 with 548 alleged, set forth 549 faith alone 550 refute 551 knows

he may as the devil doth, though he believe it, and know it too, yet fall far from all hope thereof. And if these Lutherans will defend their heresy by that 5 sophistical gloss, they must then change their article and say no more that faith alone is sufficient, but they must say that hope alone is sufficient. And yet shall they then lie as loud<sup>552</sup> as they do now. For hope without charity will but beguile<sup>553</sup> them.’

“After such reasoning, the man said that he and 10 the other Lutherans, when they spoke that ‘only faith was sufficient,’ they mean not of a dead faith, that is without charity and good works, but a very<sup>554</sup> faith, that is quick<sup>555</sup> and worketh by charity, and that such faith, he thought, was sufficient. But then 15 was it answered that neither they nor he could mean so. For how could they call that thing ‘faith only’ that is joined with charity and good works? Or how can it stand<sup>556</sup> that they mean that faith which by charity worketh good works, when they say that 20 it is sufficient alone without good works, and that it is, as Luther saith, ‘great sin and sacrilege’ to go about to please God by good works, and not by only faith? How could they say that ‘only faith’ sufficeth, if they should mean that without charity and good 25 works, no faith sufficeth? For it were a mad thing to say that faith alone sufficeth, without good works, and therewith to say that without good works, faith sufficeth nothing. And so was it said unto him that therefore, though they color<sup>557</sup> their matters when 30 they be examined, yet it cannot be but that he and other Lutherans, where they sow their heresy, mean plainly as they speak: that folk need no more but believe, and then howsoever they live shall make no matter. For nothing, as Luther saith, ‘can damn a 35 Christian man save only lack of belief.’ For all other sins—if belief and faith stand fast—be quite absorbed and ‘supped up,’<sup>558</sup> he saith, in that faith.

“When this man was, with such reasoning and much better than I do or can rehearse you, some-40 what sore<sup>559</sup> pressed upon, then brought he forth another gloss, and said that they meant not but that faith, if it should suffice for salvation, must needs have with it charity and good works, or else it were no very faith, as a dead man is no very man. How-45 beit, he said that though it be nothing without good works, yet when it is joined with good works, all the merit cometh of our faith only, and no part thereof for our works, so that God giveth us heaven for our faith only, and nothing for our works. For though 50 he give it not for our faith if we lack good works, yet if we have both, he regardeth not in his reward our works anything,<sup>560</sup> but only our faith. And he said that for this cause they say that only faith causeth our salvation.

“To this, it was answered that, if this opinion
 55 were true, yet it well appeared that this is not the thing that they mean. For the words of Luther and Pomeranus<sup>561</sup> and all the archheretics of that sect be very plain. For they say that it is sacrilege to go about to please God by any good works but faith 60 only. And then why should good works be joined to faith? Or why should God exact good works of us? Whereof should they serve, if they be nothing pleasant to God? And when Luther saith that nothing can damn any Christian man but only lack of 65 belief, he showeth manifestly that we not only need no good works with our faith, but also that, so<sup>562</sup> we have faith, none evil works can hurt us. And so he meaneth plainly that faith only, without any good works joined thereto—and also with all kind of evil 70 works joined thereto—is sufficient to save us. ‘And therefore, if ye be of his sect,’ was it said to the man, ‘ye cannot avoid but that this is your very doctrine, howsoever ye color it.’

“Then was it further asked him: If their meaning 75 should be such as he had said, what should move him and others, his fellows, so to think that in faith and good works joined together, the good works were nothing worth, but that all the merit should be in the faith, and all the thank<sup>563</sup> and reward should 80 be given to the faith, and right nought<sup>564</sup> to the good works?

“Whereunto he answered that many texts of Scripture induced them thereto, and special texts of Saint Paul: Fides iustificat (‘Faith justifies’);<sup>565</sup> and 85 Credidit Abraham Deo, et reputatum est ei ad iustitiam (‘Abraham believed God, and it was accounted in him for justice’);<sup>566</sup> Si ex operibus, habet quidem gloriam, sed non apud Deum (‘If he were justified by the works, then had he glory, but not with God’);<sup>567</sup>
 90 Si ex operibus, Christus pro nobis gratis mortuus est (‘If we be justified by the works, then did Christ die

552 openly, palpably 553 disappoint, cheat, delude 554 true 555 alive 556 be consistent 557 disguise, cloak 558 supped up: swallowed up; consumed

559 strongly 560 at all 561 John Bugenhagen (1485–1558), a Protestant humanist from Pomerania, a region near the Baltic Sea in present-day Germany and Poland 562 so long as 563 credit 564 nothing 565 Rom 5:1. See also Gal 3:24. 566 Rom 4:3 567 Rom 4:2

for us for nought’);<sup>568</sup> Gratis redempti estis (‘Ye be redeemed freely’).<sup>569</sup> And thereby may we see that our works were no part of the cause. And yet specially these words of Our Savior Christ, he said, much 5 moved them to be of that mind, where he saith, Qui crediderit et baptizatus fuerit salvus erit (‘He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved’),<sup>570</sup> where Christ requireth nothing but only faith.’

“By all these texts, he said, it plainly appeared that 10 all our salvation came of faith, as Abraham was justified by faith and not by his works, and that if our good works should be the cause of our salvation, then, as Saint Paul saith, Christ died for nought. For he needed not to die for us if our own works 15 might save us. Nor we were not<sup>571</sup> redeemed freely if we should redeem ourselves with the payment of our own works.

“To this was it answered that those texts, and all others alleged<sup>572</sup> for that purpose, signify none
 20 other but that after the faith of Christ brought<sup>573</sup> into the world by the Incarnation and Passion of our blessed Savior, men are no longer bounden to the observance of Moses’ law. Nor that all the law of Moses, nor all the good works of man, were not able 25 to save one man of<sup>574</sup> themselves, nor without faith, and that Christ freely redeemed us. For neither had he, or ever shall have, any reward of us for the bitter pains taken in his blessed Passion for us. Nor never 30 deserved we unto<sup>575</sup> him that he should so much do for us. Nor the first faith, nor the preaching thereof, nor the first justification of man thereby, nor the sacrament and fruit of our baptism, was not given to the world for any good works that ever the world had wrought, but only of God’s mere<sup>576</sup> liberal
 35 goodness. But yet there is never a text of them, nor any other in all Scripture, so meant that after the baptism, the faith only shall save us without good works, if we live and have reason<sup>577</sup> to do them. For though it be said by the mouth of our 40 Savior, ‘He that believeth shall be saved,’ where he nothing speaketh of any good works, yet meaneth he not that he that believeth shall be saved without good works if he live to do them. For else why should ye not as well say that men shall be saved for 45 keeping of the commandments without faith, since Christ saith, ‘If thou wilt enter into the kingdom of heaven, keep the commandments,’<sup>578</sup> and saith also, ‘Do that and thou shalt have life?’<sup>579</sup> At which time, he spoke no word of<sup>580</sup> any faith. he saith also in Holy Scripture, Date elemosinam, et omnia munda sunt vobis (‘Give alms, and all is clean in you’).<sup>581</sup> Which words, if men should as largely<sup>582</sup> construe for the preeminence of alms-deed<sup>583</sup> as ye that are of Luther’s sect construe the texts that speak of faith, they might take a false gloss<sup>584</sup> and color to say that 55 without faith, or penance either, or any other virtue, alms-deed alone sufficeth for salvation, how wretchedly soever we lead our life besides. But if we should so say of alms-deed, we should say wrong, as ye do when ye say so of faith. For likewise as it is 60 understood that faith must needs go with good works if they shall be fruitful, though it be not spoken of in those texts that speak of good works, so is it understood that in them which after baptism have 65 time and reason to work well, good works must walk with faith, and sorrow at heart for fault<sup>585</sup> of good works, if the faith shall aught<sup>586</sup> avail them. For if both good works and final repentance of the lack of good works do fail us, having time and reason to them,<sup>587</sup> we be like to fare much the worse for 70 our faith. And that this is thus, we may well know by the texts of Holy Scripture if we set them together, and take not one text for our part<sup>588</sup> and set another at nought.<sup>589</sup>

“To this answered he that albeit that these texts set
 75 together do prove that faith alone doth not suffice without good works (which thing he said that himself denied not), yet he said that none of those texts prove anything the contrary, but that when faith and good works be joined together, all the merit cometh 80 yet of our faith only, and nothing of our works.

“Whereunto he was answered that though it so were indeed that no texts of Scripture proved the 85 contrary, yet since there is none that saith so, and the whole Church saith and believeth the contrary, what reason have ye to say so, and to give the whole merit unto faith, and no part of the reward to good works? And now have ye much less reason so to do, when the plain words of Holy Writ be openly to 90 the contrary. For did not God say to Cain, ‘If thou do well, thou shalt have well?’<sup>590</sup> Saith not Christ of them that doth alms, ‘A good measure, shaken

568 Gal 2:21 569 Rom 3:24 570 Mk 16:16 571 were not: would not have been 572 cited 573 was brought 574 by 575 from 576 sheer 577 sufficient reason 578 Mt 19:17 579 Lk 10:28 580 about 581 Lk 11:41 582 fully; widely; without restraint 583 alms-giving 584 interpretation 585 lack

586 anything 587 to perform them 588 side 589 set another at nought: value another as nothing 590 Gn 4:7

together, heaped and running over shall they give into your bosom?<sup>591</sup> Doth not our Lord show that in the Day of Judgment he will give the kingdom of heaven to them that have done alms—in meat,<sup>592</sup> 5 drink, clothes, and lodging—because of their charity used<sup>593</sup> in those deeds?<sup>594</sup> Which deeds, though he will not reward with heaven except<sup>595</sup> faith went with them, yet if they were wrought in faith, he promiseth to reward those works, and not their 10 faith only; and that so far-forth,<sup>596</sup> that it appeareth by the words of our Savior in the same places, and by his words in which he said he would in the Day of Judgment speak to them that had by faith wrought wonders in his name without good works and char-15 ity, whom he would then bid walk<sup>597</sup> workers of wickedness, and tell them that he knoweth them not<sup>598</sup>—by these things, I say, it well appeareth, that be a man’s faith never so great, yet if those good works fail him, his faith shall fail of heaven.’

20 “Then said he yet again that faith can never be without good works—but and if<sup>599</sup> a man have faith, his faith shall not fail nor cease to bring forth the fruit of good works, as the tree bringeth forth his leaves.

25 “Then was it answered him that he was driven from that point before, as well by the authority of Saint Paul as of Saint James, and also that he wist well that faith or belief is not contrary to every sin, but only to infidelity and lack of belief, so that with 30 other sins it may stand. Then said he that if men believed surely,<sup>600</sup> he thought they would not sin. ‘For who would sin,’ said he, ‘if he believed verily and surely that sin should bring him to hell?’ Whereunto it was answered, ‘Whoso believed after<sup>601</sup> your Lu-35 theran faith should never let<sup>602</sup> to sin, since Lutherans believe that no sin could damn them but only lack of belief, and that no good work needeth<sup>603</sup> them, but that they shall be saved howsoever they live, for their only faith. Whereby it well appeareth 40 that ye Lutherans have but half a faith. For ye believe God only in his promises, and in his threats ye believe him not at all. Howbeit, if one believed indeed surely, as ye would now seem to believe, truth is it that it would let<sup>604</sup> many a man from sin, but yet not every man. For albeit that many men there be, either the more bold in sin or the more negligent 45 in good virtues, because their faith is very faint and feeble, which<sup>605</sup> would, if they had a sure and an undoubted faith, be in such dread of God—and love also—that it would withdraw them from sin and set 50 them in the way of virtue, yet many men be there, on the other side, that, were their faith never so strong, yet should it not master the frowardness<sup>606</sup> of their malicious appetites. And this would happen sometimes—and daily doth—in men not deeply 55 drowned in malice, nor folk out of the faith neither, which<sup>607</sup> yet fall into the breach of God’s commandment by the subtle suggestion of the devil, or by the frailty of their own flesh. Whereof it seemeth that the holy Apostle was himself so sore afraid—for 60 all his faith—that he thrice prayed God to take the temptation away.<sup>608</sup> I cannot see but that Adam believed the words of God, and yet he broke his commandment. And I think that King David fell not from his faith, though he fell first in adultery and 65 eft<sup>609</sup> in manslaughter.<sup>610</sup> And some examples have we seen of them that have sought the revenging of<sup>611</sup> their own malicious minds<sup>612</sup> by such ways as they saw, when they went about it, their own undoubted death before their eyes. And therefore it is but a 70 tale<sup>613</sup> to say that faith draweth always good works with it, and that ye Lutherans, in that ye say that faith is sufficient alone, without good works, should say so because it bringeth always good works with it. For this were a very vain<sup>614</sup> doctrine—that faith 75 is alone sufficient to save them that have the use of reason, without good works—if in such as have the use of reason, faith be never without good works.’

“After such objections, then fell he to another 80 point, and said that if our good works and faith be joined, yet might it well appear by Scripture that all the merit was in our faith, and nothing in man’s works. ‘For all the works of man,’ he said, ‘be stark naught,<sup>615</sup> as things all spotted with sin.’ And for that he laid<sup>616</sup> diverse texts of Scripture, but spec-85 ially, as the most plain proof, the words of the prophet, Omnis iustitia nostra velut pannus menstruatae.<sup>617</sup> ‘And since that all our works,’ he said,

591 Lk 6:38 592 food 593 exercised 594 See Mt 25:34–36. 595 unless 596 so far-forth: to such an extent
 597 depart as 598 See Mt 7:22–23.
 599 and if: if 600 securely; certainly 601 in accordance with 602 hesitate

603 is necessary for 604 hinder 605 who 606 perversity 607 who 608 See 2 Cor 12:7–9. 609 soon afterwards 610 See 2 Kgs (2 Sm) 11:2–15.
 611 the revenging of: vengeance in accord with 612 intentions, thinking, judgment

613 falsehood 614 useless, futile 615 wicked 616 cited 617 Omnis... menstruatae: “All our justice is like the rag of a menstruating woman” (Is 64:6).

‘be spotted and sinful and naught, how good soever they seem, it must needs follow that all the merit cometh of our faith.’

“To this was answered him: ‘Lo, now by this ye
5 have somewhat opened yourself unware,<sup>618</sup> and declared<sup>619</sup> your opinion in this matter to be far other than ye said before. For in the glosses that ye have used before, ye have always said that ye—and all the sect of Luther, as far as ye knew and thought—
10 believed that faith could not save us, if we had reason, without good works. But ye said that faith was enough alone because it brought of necessity good works with it. And yet all the merit and reward due to the faith only, and not to the good works that 15 it bringeth forth. And now ye say that there be no good works at all, but all our works be stark naught. Now if ye think that there be no good works, how can ye say, as ye said before, that ye think that faith always bringeth forth good works? Moreover, the 20 words of the prophet, though it be generally spoken, may be well understood to be verified in far the most part of mankind, though not of all; or of the justice of man, if it were compared with the sovereign justice of God; or that justice of right good men is yet sore spotted with sin, for that<sup>620</sup> the frailty of our nature seldom constantly standeth any while together in good works, but that the perseverance is interrupted, often spotted and besprent<sup>621</sup> with sin. And thereof is it said, Septies in die cadit iustus, et resurget (“Seven times in the day falleth the righteous man, and riseth again”).<sup>622</sup> It may be also understood of all the righteousness of a man alone wrought of himself and his pure<sup>623</sup> natural powers, without the aid and help of special grace. For surely all such justice of ours—as is only ours—is all spotted, and, in effect, all one foul spot, for any beauty that it hath in the glorious eye of God. But surely the holy prophet never meant, as Luther and his fellows would have seem, that the grace of God is in all his people so 35 feeble of itself, and of so little force and effect, that no man may with the help thereof be able to do one good virtuous deed. For Luther saith plainly that no man, though<sup>624</sup> he have the help of God’s grace thereto, is able to keep and observe the commandments of God. Which blasphemous words seem to signify that both Saint John the Baptist and our blessed Lady also were sinners, and over<sup>625</sup> all this that God were not able, by the aid and help of his grace, to make a man keep his commandments, and keep him out of sin, though he would.<sup>626</sup>

“All the old fathers that wrote against Pelagius<sup>627</sup>—which<sup>628</sup> held opinion that man is of<sup>629</sup> nature, or, at the leastwise with the general influence of grace, able and sufficient to do good and meritorious works without help of any special grace toward every good deed itself—misliked and condemned his doctrine, for that it diminished the necessity of man’s recourse unto God for calling help of his grace. But ye that hold all men’s deeds for utterly naught, though grace wrought with them, be double and treble<sup>630</sup> more enemies to grace than they. For where they said we might do good sometimes without it, ye say we can at no time do no good with it. And then were grace, by your tale, a very void thing. Was then all the labor and the pain that the apostles took in preaching all naught and sinful? All the torments that the martyrs suffered in their passion altogether sin? All the deeds of charity that Christ shall (as himself saith) reward with everlasting life at the general judgment—be they sin altogether?<sup>631</sup> Saint Paul reckoned it otherwise. For he said boldly of himself, Bonum certamen certavi, cursum consummavi, et nunc super est mihi corona iustitiae (“I have labored and striven a good strife;<sup>632</sup> I have performed<sup>633</sup> my course; now lacketh me no more for me but the crown of justice”).<sup>634</sup>

“Thereunto he answered that Saint Paul would not say that our deeds were sufficient of themselves, but that all our sufficiency is of God. Whereunto it was answered that this was little to the matter.<sup>635</sup> For no more is our faith sufficient of itself, but the sufficiency thereof is also of God, in that our Lord, with our endeavor, giveth us grace to believe, and in that it liketh<sup>636</sup> our Lord, of his goodness so highly to reward it. For surely as it is very true that<sup>637</sup> Saint Paul saith, that non sunt condignae passiones huius vitae ad futuram gloriam quae revelabitur in nobis (“all that ever we can suffer in this world is not worthy the glory to come that shall be showed in us”)<sup>638</sup>—for what thing could a seely<sup>639</sup>

618 opened yourself unware: revealed yourself without realizing 619 shown yourself for that: because 621 besprikled 622 Prv 24:16 623 mere 624 even if 625 beyond 626 though he would:

even if he wanted to 627 British monk (354–418) who denied original sin and emphasized free will 628 who 629 by 630 double and treble: two or three times 631 See Mt 25:34–36. 632 striven a good

strife: fought a good fight 633 accomplished 634 2 Tm 4:7–8 635 point 636 pleases 637 what 638 Rom 8:18 639 poor; pitiable wretched creature do or suffer for God in the brief time of this short life that might of right<sup>640</sup> require to be rewarded everlastingly, with such inestimable joy as neither eye hath seen nor tongue can express, nor heart can imagine or conceive?<sup>641</sup> — so is it also as true that all the faith we have or can have, can of his<sup>642</sup> own nature as little or much less deserve heaven, as our other good deeds. For what great thing do we to God, or what great thing could we ask him of right, because we believe him? As though he were much beholden unto us, in that we vouchsafe<sup>643</sup> to trust him! As though his worship<sup>644</sup> hung in our hands, and his estimation lost if he were out of credence with<sup>645</sup> us. And therefore, among many foolish words of Luther — as foolish as ever heretic spoke — he never spoke a more frantic<sup>646</sup> than in that he saith that God hath need of our faith. For he saith that God hath no need of our good works, but he hath need of our faith, and hath need that we should believe him. Truth is it that he needeth neither our faith nor our works. But since that he hath determined that he will not save us without both, if we be of discretion<sup>647</sup> to have both, therefore have we need of both. And yet neither is there the one nor the other, nor they both together between them, that be of their own nature worthy the reward of heaven. But as we see that one ounce of gold — whereof ten pounds' weight were not of his<sup>648</sup> own nature toward<sup>649</sup> man worth one ounce of wheat, nor one hundred pounds' weight thereof of the nature itself<sup>650</sup> worth one seely<sup>651</sup> sheep — is yet among men, by a price appointed and agreed, worth many whole<sup>652</sup> sheep, and many a pound's weight of bread, so hath it liked the liberal goodness of God to set as well our faith as our deeds (which were else, both twain, of their own nature right little in value) at so high a price as none is able to buy them and pay for them but himself, because<sup>653</sup> we should work them only to<sup>654</sup> him, and have none other paymaster, nor none other chapman<sup>655</sup> to sell our ware and work unto but only him, except<sup>656</sup> we would be so mad, and toward him so unkind, that we would sell it to another for less rather than to him for more, as some do that had liefer<sup>657</sup> travel far off and sell for less than they would for more sell to their neighbors at home, and as do these foolish hypocrites, which rather than they would sell their work to God for everlasting joy of heaven, sell it all to the world for the peevish<sup>658</sup> pleasure of the vain praise puffed out of poor mortal men's mouths with a blast of wind.' 45 50

“Unto this he said that very true it was that all our works took their value and price after the acceptation<sup>659</sup> of God, and as he list to allow<sup>660</sup> them. But he said that God rejected, disallowed,<sup>661</sup> and set at nought<sup>662</sup> all the works of infidels wrought without faith — for sine fide impossibile est placere Deo (‘without faith it is impossible to please God’)<sup>663</sup> — and that of his faithful chosen people, that believe and trust in him, he accepteth and alloweth all the deeds. ‘And that is,’ said he, ‘well proved by the words of Saint Paul: Nihil damnationis est iis qui sunt in Christo Iesu.’<sup>664</sup> And albeit that in the rehearsing of the communication had with this man, it may well be that my remembrance may partly miss the order<sup>665</sup> — partly peradventure add or diminish in some part of the matter — yet in this point, I assure you faithfully, there is no manner change or variance from his opinion, but that, after many shifts,<sup>666</sup> he brought it plainly to this point at last, that he and his fellows that were of Luther's sect were firmly of this opinion: that they believed that only God worketh all in every man, good works and bad. Howbeit, such as he foreknoweth to be damned, no manner works be profitable to them. For God taketh them for naught,<sup>667</sup> be they never so good. But on the other side, in those he hath chosen from the beginning and predestinate to glory, all works be good enough. For God accepteth and taketh them well a-worth<sup>668</sup> be they never so bad. 65 70 75 80

“It was asked him then whether that the forsaking of Christ by Peter<sup>669</sup> was allowed<sup>670</sup> and well approved by Christ, and whether the adultery and manslaughter was by God well allowed in David.<sup>671</sup>

“Whereunto he said that because they were chosen and predestinate, therefore those sins were not — nor 85

640 justice 641 See 1 Cor 2:9; Is 64:4.
642 its 643 deign 644 honor 645 out of credence with: not believed by 646 mad 647 i.e., at the age of reason and so capable of good judgment 648 its 649 to; for 650 the nature itself: its own nature 651 feeble 652 healthy 653 in order that; so that 654 for 655 customer 656 unless 657 had liefer: would rather 658 silly 659 acceptance, approval 660 list to allow: pleases to permit or count 661 refused to reward 662 set at nought: valued as nothing 663 Heb 11:16 664 Nihil... Iesu: “There is no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus” (Rom 8:1). 665 miss the order: have the order wrong 666 evasions 667 bad 668 in esteem or honor, or at their worth 669 See Mt 26:69–75; Mk 14:66–72; Lk 22:54–62; Jn 18:15–27. 670 permitted 671 See 2 Kgs (2 Sm) 11:2–17.

the sins of any such men be not—imputed unto them. But God, because he hath from the beginning chosen them to everlasting bliss, therefore he arrecteth<sup>672</sup> no blame of their deeds unto them; but all the works of a just man—‘that is to say,’ quoth he, ‘of a person by God predestinate to glory’—turn him to good, how evil soever they be. And this for conclusion he declared to be their very plain mind and opinion, for all the cloaks that he had set upon the matter before, to make it seem that they meant in their words none harm. And there it clearly appeared that he and his fellows, which<sup>673</sup> in their preaching do covertly and craftily set out<sup>674</sup> the damnable sect of Luther, hope and gape<sup>675</sup> always for some other time in which they trust openly and boldly to play the ravenous wolves and devour the sheep and mar the whole flock. And in the mean season<sup>676</sup> be content to play the wily foxes and worry<sup>677</sup> simple souls and poor lambs as they may catch them straggling from the fold—or rather like a false shepherd’s-dog that would but bark in sight, and seem to fetch in the sheep, and yet kill a lamb in a corner. Men speak of some that bear two faces in one hood. I never saw any that more verily play that pageant than do this kind of such preachers. For in preaching to the people, they make a visage as though they came straight from heaven to teach them a new better way—and more true than the Church teacheth, or hath taught this many hundred years. And then to the Church, in examination, they show themselves as poor men of middle earth,<sup>678</sup> and as though they taught none other wise than the Church doth. But in conclusion, when they be well examined, and, with much work, that falsehood of their cloaked collusion is pulled off, then appeareth there all the malicious treachery, and what poison they put forth under the cloak of honey. As this man that I tell you of, laboring all that he might, by many means, to make it seem that, in preaching that faith alone was sufficient for our salvation and that good works were nothing worth, had nothing intended but well and according to the doctrine of the Church, and that he and his fellows never meant otherwise than the Church meaneth, yet in conclusion he plainly showed himself, that he and his fellows intend thereby to bring the people to this point at last: that all things hangeth only upon destiny; and that the liberty of man’s will should serve of right nought,<sup>679</sup> nor men’s deeds, good or bad, made no difference afore God; but that in his chosen people, nothing misliketh him, be it never so bad, and in the other sort, nothing pleaseth him, be it never so good—the very worst and most mischievous<sup>680</sup> heresy that ever was thought upon, and thereto<sup>681</sup> the most mad. For, as it was said unto him, if this were true, whereto preach they at all, and counsel any man one thing or other? What fruit could come of their exhortation, if all should hang upon destiny? There were showed unto him many things for the reproof<sup>682</sup> of that unreasonable and detestable heresy, and that the texts which he alleged<sup>683</sup> nothing made for his purpose.<sup>684</sup> For as for that he alleged of Saint Paul—that ‘there is no damnation<sup>685</sup> to them that be in Christ Jesus’<sup>686</sup>—was meant of good faithful folk that live virtuously; and therefore where he saith that ‘there is no damnation to them that be in Christ Jesus,’ it followeth forthwith<sup>687</sup> in the text, ‘those that walk not after the flesh,’<sup>688</sup> meaning, plainly, that there is no man so planted in Christ Jesus but and<sup>689</sup> if he follow the fleshly ways of his sensual appetites, he shall be damned, for all his faith in Christ. For else it should follow, upon this false opinion—if God accept well all the works of them that are predestinate—then is sin no sin in them, but in the other sort only, whom God hath not predestinate. And then is it as much to say as no man may lawfully be naught<sup>690</sup>—no man lawfully do theft or adultery, nor lawfully be a manqueller,<sup>691</sup> nor lawfully forswear<sup>692</sup> himself—but God’s good sons and his special chosen children.

“Now, where he alleged the words of Saint Paul, Quod iustis omnia cooperantur in bonum (‘To a just man all things work together to his weal’),<sup>693</sup> it was said that it meant that all the evils that men did unto them, turn them to good, and be to good men occasion of their merit, as was to Job all the torments by which the devil assaulted his patience, and all the pains that pagan tyrants did unto the holy martyrs. And sometimes the sin in which a good man is, by God’s sufferance,<sup>694</sup> permitted to fall is an occasion to him of a greater good, or of the avoiding

672 imputes 673 who 674 set out: propagate 675 long 676 mean season: meantime 677 strangle, choke 678 middle earth: the world, understood as a middle region between hell and heaven 679 serve of right nought: deserve or merit nothing 680 evil; harmful 681 also 682 refutation 683 cited 684 contention, argument 685 condemnation 686 Rom 8:1 687 immediately

688 Rom 8:4 689 but and: that 690 wicked 691 murderer 692 perjure 693 well-being; Rom 8:28 694 allowance of a greater sin, as the eschewing<sup>695</sup> of a high spiritual pride, into which peradventure<sup>696</sup> the continual course of his virtuous life might, by the devil's subtle suggestion, have brought him, whereas one 5 fowl act of lechery hath showed him his frailty, and instead of pride brought him into penance and humility, and make him run the faster forward in virtue because he hath letted<sup>697</sup> and sat still awhile in sin; and therefore will he run forth to win again in

 10 his way that<sup>698</sup> he before cast himself behind.<sup>699</sup> But it was not meant that ever their sins so turned them to good that they were accepted<sup>700</sup> the more, and rewarded the better, for their evil deeds. Nor God remitteth not the sins of his chosen people, nor 15 forbeareth not to impute the blame thereof unto them, because they be his chosen people. For he accepteth not folk for their persons, but for their merits. But whereas they have sinned, he punisheth as well them as others, and sometimes more, because 20 their former good living somewhat of congruence<sup>701</sup> deserved that they should by punishment be called again to grace, and not be for their fault so soon cast clean away, as some others, obdurate in malice and evil custom<sup>702</sup> of sin, deserve to have the grace
 25 of God and his calling-on nevermore offered unto them, and unto some it is offered that will not receive<sup>703</sup> it. God called on David by the prophet Nathan, and yet punished his offense. Christ looked on Peter after he had forsaken and forsworn him,
 30 and Peter therewith took repentance. God looked on Judas, and kissed him too and he turned to none amendment.<sup>704</sup> Now God from the beginning, before the world was created, foreseeing in his divine prescience—or rather in the eternity of his God-head presently<sup>705</sup> beholding—that Peter would re-35 pent and Judas would despair, and that the one would take hold of his grace and the other would reject it, accepted and chose the one and not the other, as he would have made the contrary choice if 40 he had foreseen in them the contrary change.”

THE TWELFTH CHAPTER

The author inveigheth against<sup>706</sup> the most pestilent sect of these Lutherans, which ascribe our salvation and damnation, and all our deeds, to destiny.

“But now, for to say (as that heretic said after all his shifts,<sup>707</sup> at last) that all that shall be saved shall be saved only because that God from the beginning hath chosen them; and because of that choice all their deeds be good, or, if they be evil, yet God, for cause<sup>708</sup> of his eternal choice, taketh them well in worth<sup>709</sup> and imputeth no blame unto them; and that all other people whom God hath created shall be damned only because he would not choose them; and that all their deeds either be naught,<sup>710</sup> or not well accepted, because God list<sup>711</sup> not in the beginning to choose them; and that he worketh, both in the one sort and in the other, all their deeds himself alone, and they do nothing therein themselves; and so that God, whose goodness is inestimable, doth damn so huge a number of people to intolerable and interminable torments only for his pleasure, and for his own deeds wrought in them only by himself—this false opinion is, as the King's Highness most virtuously writeth in his epistle to Luther, the most abominable heresy that ever was. And surely it is so far against all Holy Scripture well understood, so far against all natural reason, so utterly subverting all virtue and all good order in the world, so highly blaspheming the goodness and majesty of almighty God in heaven, that it is more than wonder how any man earthly that hath either one spark of wit<sup>712</sup> in his head, or toward God or man one drop of good will in his heart, should not abhor to hear it. For this execrable heresy maketh God the cause of all evil; and such cruel appetite as never tyrant and tormentor had, ascribe they to the benign nature of almighty God. For whereas Our Savior Christ took upon himself all our sin, and of his endless pity bore the pain of them for our sake, this damnable heresy holdeth that God should be, first, so untrue that he should lay unto us the wite<sup>713</sup> and blame of his own faults—that is to wit, the evil works which (as they say) be not wrought by us but in us by God—and thereunto they make him so despiteous<sup>714</sup> and cruel

695 avoiding 696 perhaps 697 hesitated 698 that which 699 himself behind: behind himself 700 approved 701 of congruence: fittingly, reasonably, rightly 702 habit 703 accept 704 See

Mt 26: 49–50; 27: 3–5; Lk 22: 47–48. 705 instantly, now 706 inveigheth against: denounces 707 evasions 708 for cause: because 709 well in worth: as acceptable and good 710 bad

711 wished 712 intelligence 713 punishment; torments of hell 714 spiteful; malevolent that for his own deeds so done he shall have a perpetual delight and pleasure to torment us.

“Now turn they the treacle<sup>715</sup> of Holy Scripture quite into poison. For this false error once taken for truth, whereof should all Scripture serve? Whereof should serve the exhortations to good works, if men neither any do, nor any can do, neither of themselves nor with help of grace? Or if any be done by them which<sup>716</sup> be not chosen, their deeds be not accepted of God, because he hath not chosen their persons, whereof shall serve the preachings and exhortations to the faith, if the hearers have no liberty of their own will by which they may, together with God’s grace, labor to submit and subdue the rebellion of their reason to the obedience of faith and credence of the Word of God? Whereof shall serve all the dehortations and comminations<sup>717</sup> and threats in Scripture by which God calleth men from sin and evil works, if the world were once of mind that they believed after Luther: that no man doth any evil deed himself, but God doth them all himself; and that every man is either chosen or unchosen; and if we be of the chosen sort, none evil deed can damn us; and if we be of the unchosen sort, no good deed can avail us? He that thus believeth, what careth he what he doth, except for the fear of temporal laws of this world? And yet if his false faith be strong, he forceth little of<sup>718</sup> them also. For he shall think dying in his bed or on the gallows cometh not after<sup>719</sup> his deserving, but hangeth all upon destiny. And therefore all laws they set at nought. And they hold that no man is bounden to obey any, but would be at liberty to believe what they list, and do what they list—as they say that God doth with us not what we deserve, but what himself list.

“Whereof shall reason serve, if man had no power of himself toward the direction of his own works, but that all our works were brought forth of us without our will, worse than the works be indeed out of a brute beast by the appetite of his sensual motion?<sup>720</sup> For ours should be, by this opinion, brought forth as the leaves come out of the tree, or as a stone falleth downward and the smoke upward by the power of nature—so should, I say, all our deeds good or bad, ascend or descend by the violent hand of God, maugre our minds.<sup>721</sup> And thus the beasts be not ashamed to say, when they prove hourly by their own experience in themselves that when they will do a thing, they do it, and when they list,<sup>722</sup> they leave it. I say not by themselves alone, without God. But his assistance is always at hand, if we be willing to work therewith, as the light is present with the sun, if we list not willfully to shut our eyes and wink.

“Whereof should serve all laws, and where were become<sup>723</sup> all good order among men, if every misordered wretch might allege that his mischievous<sup>724</sup> deed was his destiny?

“If free will serve for nought, and every man’s deed is his destiny, why do these men complain upon<sup>725</sup> any man, except<sup>726</sup> they will say they do it because it is their destiny to do so? And why will they then be angry with them that punish heretics, except they will say because it is their destiny to be so? For if they will hold them to their own sect, and say men do them wrong to burn them for their heresies because it was their destiny to be heretics, they may be then well answered with their own words, as one of their sect was served in a good town in Almain—which, when he had robbed a man and was brought before the judges, he could not deny the deed, but he said it was his destiny to do it, and therefore they might not blame him. They answered him, after<sup>727</sup> his own doctrine, that if it were his destiny to steal, and that therefore they must hold him excused, then it was also their destiny to hang him, and therefore he must as well hold them excused again.<sup>728</sup> And undoubtedly among men these takers-away of free will may never avoid<sup>729</sup> that answer by reason. But then fall the wretches to the desperate ways of devils and damned souls. Then fall they to railing and reproving<sup>730</sup> the justice of God, and say that himself hath wrought their evil works, and wrongfully punished them, and cruelly created them to wretchedness. Our mother Eve laid the wite<sup>731</sup> of her sin to the serpent, and God was offended that she took not her own part<sup>732</sup> to herself.<sup>733</sup> But these wretches excuse themselves, and the devils and all, and lay both their own faults and the devils’ too, to the blame of almighty God. But

715 antidote, remedy 716 who
717 dehortations and comminations: dissuasions and warnings of punishment 718 forceth little of: cares little about 719 according to 720 impulses

721 maugre our minds: regardless of our intentions 722 choose 723 where were become: what would become of 724 evil 725 about; against 726 unless 727 in accord with 728 in turn 729 refute

730 railing and reproving: complaining vehemently about and reproaching 731 blame 732 share 733 See Gn 3:13, 16.

surely whatso they say, they little care indeed of hell or of heaven, but would in this world live in lewd<sup>734</sup> liberty, and have all run to riot. And since they see that they cannot so be suffered,<sup>735</sup> nor their sect al-5 lowed in judgment,<sup>736</sup> they devise by all the ways they can to get so many to fall into their sort that they may be able to turn the world upside down, and defend their folly and false heresy by force.
 And this they call ‘the liberty of the Gospel’ — to 10 be discharged of all order and of all laws, and do what they list — which be it good, be it bad, is (as they say) nothing but the works of God wrought in them. But they hope that by this means God shall for the while work in them many merry pastimes.
 15 Wherein if their heresy were once received, and the world changed thereby, they should find themselves sore<sup>737</sup> deceived. For the laws and orders among men with fear of punishment once taken away, there were no man so strong that could keep his pleasure 20 long, but that he should find a stronger take it from him. But after that it were once come to that point, and the world once ruffled<sup>738</sup> and fallen in a wildness, how long would it be, and what heaps of heavy mischiefs would there fall, ere that way were foun-25 den to set the world in order and peace again?”

THE THIRTEENTH CHAPTER

The author showeth his opinion concerning the burning of heretics, and that it is lawful, necessary, and well done, and showeth also that the clergy 30 doth not procure it, but only the good and politic<sup>739</sup> provision of the temporality.<sup>740</sup>

“The fear of these outrages and mischiefs to follow upon such sects and heresies, with the proof<sup>741</sup> that men have had in some countries thereof, have 35 been the cause that princes and people have been constrained to punish heresies by terrible death, whereas else more easy ways had<sup>742</sup> been taken with them. And therefore here will I somewhat,” said I to your friend, “answer the points which 40 ye moved at our first meeting, when ye said that many men thought it a hard<sup>743</sup> and an uncharitable way taken by the clergy, to put men convicted of heresy sometimes to shame, sometimes to death, and that Christ so far abhorred all such violence that he would not any of his flock should<sup>744</sup> fight 45 in any wise, neither in the defense of themselves or any others — not so much as in the defense of Christ himself, for which he blamed Saint Peter — but that we should all live after him in sufferance<sup>745</sup> and patience, so far-forth<sup>746</sup> that folk thought, as 50 ye said, that we should not fight in defense of ourselves against the Turks and infidels. These objections be soon answered. For neither doth the clergy therein any such thing as is laid<sup>747</sup> and imputed 55 unto them, nor the temporalty neither. For albeit with good reason they might, yet had they never indeed fallen so sore to force and violence against heretics if the violent cruelty first used by the heretics themselves against good Catholic folk had not driven good princes thereto for preservation, not 60 of the faith only, but also of the peace among their people. For albeit that forthwith upon the death of Christ, in the beginning of the Church, many sects and heresies began (as well appeareth by the Apoc-65 alypse of Saint John the Evangelist and the epistles of the apostle Paul), and after, almost continually diverse heresies sprang in diverse places (as we plainly see by the story<sup>748</sup> of the Church by the books of Saint Jerome, Saint Augustine, Saint Euse-70 bius, Saint Basil, Saint Ambrose, Saint Gregory Nazianzen, Saint Chrysostom, and many other doctors of the Church), yet in all this time, by a long space of many years, was there never other punishment done upon them, in effect, but only redargution and reproving by dispicions<sup>749</sup> (either in words<sup>750</sup> 75 or writing), or condemnations of their opinions in synods and councils, or finally excommunications and putting out of Christ’s flock, saving that they were put sometimes to silence upon pain of forfei-80 ture of certain<sup>751</sup> money. But, as I said before, if the heretics had never begun with violence, though<sup>752</sup> they had used all the ways they could to allect<sup>753</sup> the people by preaching, though they had therewith done as Luther doth now, and as Muhammad did before — bring up opinions pleasant to the peo- 85 ple, giving them liberty to lewdness<sup>754</sup> — yet if they had set violence aside, good Christian people had 734 wicked 735 allowed 736 allowed in judgment: approved in court 737 greatly 738 thrown into confusion 739 prudent

 740 secular authorities 741 experience 742 easy ways had: moderate ways would have 743 harsh, cruel 744 would... should: would not want any of his flock to 745 after him in sufferance: following him in endurance 746 so far-forth: to such an extent 747 (being) attributed 748 history 749 redargution... dispicions: rebuking and refuting (them) by disputations 750 spoken words 751 a certain amount of 752 even if 753 allure 754 liberty to lewdness: license for evil

peradventure<sup>755</sup> yet unto this day used less violence toward them than they do now. And yet were heresy well worthy to be as sore punished as any other fault, since there is no fault that more offendeth God. Howbeit, while<sup>756</sup> they forbore violence, there was little violence done to them. And surely though God be able, against all persecution, to preserve and increase his faith among the people — as he did in the beginning for<sup>757</sup> all the persecution of the paynims<sup>758</sup> and the Jews — yet is it no reason to look<sup>759</sup> that Christian princes should suffer<sup>760</sup> the Catholic Christian people to be oppressed by Turks, or by heretics worse than Turks.”

“By my soul,” quoth your friend, “I would all the world were all agreed to take all violence and compulsion away upon all sides, Christian and heathen, and that no man were constrained to believe but as he could be by grace, wisdom, and good words induced, and then he that would go to God, go on a<sup>761</sup> God’s name, and he that will go to the devil, the devil go with him.”

“Forsooth,” quoth I, “and if it so were, yet would I little doubt but that the good seed, being sown among the people, should as well come up and be as strong to save itself as the cockle,<sup>762</sup> and God should always be stronger than the devil. But yet be heretics and heathen men in two diverse cases. For in case<sup>763</sup> the Turks, Saracens, and paynims would suffer the faith of Christ to be peaceably preached among them, and that we Christian men should therefore suffer, in like wise, all their sects to be preached among us, and violence taken away by assent on both the sides, I nothing mistrust that the faith of Christ should much more increase than decay. And albeit that we should find among us that would,<sup>764</sup> for the lewd liberty of these sects, draw to the devil, yet so should we find, I doubt not, among them also many a thousand that should be content to leave that beastly pleasure and come to the faith of Christ, as came in the beginning to Christendom out of the paynims, that lived as voluptuously<sup>765</sup> as the Turks do now. But since violence is used on that part,<sup>766</sup> and Christ’s faith not there suffered to be preached and taken, he that would now suffer that sect to be preached or taught among Christian men, and not punish and destroy the doers,<sup>767</sup> were a plain enemy to Christ as he that were<sup>768</sup> content to suffer Christ lose his worship in many souls on this side without any one won in their stead on the other side. But now if violence were withdrawn on that side, then this way that ye speak of were peradventure between Christendom and Turkey or pagans — if the world were assented thereunto and could hold<sup>769</sup> it — none evil way. For since we should nothing so much regard as the honor of God, and increasing of the Christian faith, and winning of men’s souls to heaven, we should seem to dishonor God if we mistrusted<sup>770</sup> that his faith preached among others indifferently,<sup>771</sup> without disturbance, should not be able to prosper. And believing that it were, we should hinder the profit if we would refuse the condition, where there be many more to be won to Christ on that side than to be lost from him on this side. But yet, as for heretics rising among ourselves, and springing of ourselves, be<sup>772</sup> in no wise to be suffered, but to be oppressed<sup>773</sup> and overwhelmed in the beginning. For by any covenant with them, Christendom can nothing win. For as many as we suffer to fall to them, we lose from Christ. And by all them we cannot win to Christ one the more, though we won them all home again; for they were our own before. And yet, as I said, for all that, in the beginning never were they by any temporal punishment of their bodies anything<sup>774</sup> sharply handled, till that they began to be violent themselves.

“We read that in the time of Saint Augustine, the great doctor of the Church, the heretics of Africa called the Donatists<sup>775</sup> fell to force and violence: robbing, beating, tormenting, and killing such as they took of the true Christian flock, as the Lutherans have done in Almain.<sup>776</sup> For avoiding whereof, that holy man Saint Augustine, which<sup>777</sup> long had with great patience borne and suffered their malice, only writing and preaching in the reproof<sup>778</sup> of their errors — and had not only done them no temporal harm, but also had letted<sup>779</sup> and resisted others that would have done it — did yet at the last, for the peace of good people, both suffer<sup>780</sup> and exhort

755 had peradventure: would perhaps have 756 as long as 757 despite 758 of the paynims: inflicted (on Christians) by pagans 759 no reason to look: not reasonable to expect 760 allow 761 in 762 See Mt 13: 24–30. 763 the case that

764 those who would 765 sensually; indulgently 766 side 767 preachers 768 that were: who would be 769 stick to 770 doubted 771 equally 772 be they 773 suppressed 774 at all 775 They believed that sacraments could not be conferred by priests who had at one time fallen away from the faith. 776 Germany 777 who 778 the reproof: refutation 779 hindered; prevented 780 allow the Count Boniface<sup>781</sup> and others to repress them with force and fear<sup>782</sup> them with bodily punishment.<sup>783</sup> Which manner of doing, holy Saint Jerome and other virtuous fathers have in other places allowed.<sup>784</sup> And since that time hath there upon necessity — perceived by great outrages committed against the peace and quiet of the people in sundry places of Christendom, by heretics rising of a small beginning to a high and unruly multitude — many sore<sup>785</sup> punishments been devised for them, and specially by fire, not only in Italy and Almain, but also in Spain, and in effect in every part of Christendom. Among which in England, as a good Catholic realm, it hath been long punished by death in the fire. And specially forasmuch as in the time of that noble prince of most famous memory, King Henry the Fifth,<sup>786</sup> while the Lord Cobham<sup>787</sup> maintained certain heresies — and that by the means thereof the number so grew and increased that, within a while, though himself was fled into Wales, yet they assembled themselves together in a field near unto London in such wise and such number that the King with his nobles were fain to put harness<sup>788</sup> on their backs for the repression of them, whereupon they were distressed<sup>789</sup> and many put to execution, and after that, the Lord Cobham taken in Wales and burned in London — the king, his nobles, and his people, thereupon considering the great peril and jeopardy that the realm was like to have fallen in by those heresies, made at a Parliament<sup>790</sup> very good and substantial provisions (besides all such as were made before) as well for the withstanding as the repressing and grievous punishment of any such as should be founden faulty<sup>791</sup> thereof, and by the clergy left unto the secular hands.<sup>792</sup>

“For here ye shall understand that it is not the clergy that laboreth to have them punished by death. Well may it be that as we be all men and not angels, some of them may have sometimes either over-fervent mind<sup>793</sup> or indiscreet zeal, or percase<sup>794</sup> an angry and a cruel heart, by which they may offend God in the selfsame deed whereof they should else<sup>795</sup> greatly merit. But surely the order of the spiritual<sup>796</sup> law therein is both good, reasonable, piteous, and charitable, and nothing desiring the death of any man therein. For at the first fault,<sup>797</sup> he is abjured,<sup>798</sup> forsweareth all heresies, doth such penance for his fault as the bishop assigneth him, and is in such wise graciously received again into the favor and suffrages<sup>799</sup> of Christ’s Church. But and if<sup>800</sup> he be taken eftsoons<sup>801</sup> with the same crime again, then is he put out of the Christian flock by excommunication. And because that, being such, his conversation<sup>802</sup> were perilous among Christian men, the Church refuseth<sup>803</sup> him, and thereof the clergy giveth knowledge to the temporality<sup>804</sup> — not exhorting the prince, or any man else, either to kill him or punish him; but only in the presence of the temporal officer, the spirituality<sup>805</sup> not delivereth him but leaveth him to the secular hand, and forsaketh him as one excommunicated and removed out of the Christian flock. And though the Church be not light and sudden in receiving him again, yet at the time of his death, upon his request with tokens<sup>806</sup> of repentance, he is absolved and received again.”

THE FOURTEENTH CHAPTER

The author somewhat showeth that the clergy doth no wrong in leaving heretics to secular hand, though their death follow thereon. And he showeth also that it is lawful to resist the Turk and such other infidels, and that princes be bounden thereto.<sup>807</sup>

“Marry,” quoth your friend, “but as methinketh, the bishop doth as much as though he killeth him, when he leaveth him to the secular hand in such time and place as he wotteth<sup>808</sup> well he shall soon be burned.”

“I will not here enter into the question,” quoth I, “whether a priest might for any cause — and if for any, whether, then, for heresy — without blame of irregularity,<sup>809</sup> put or command any man to death, either by express words or under the general name of right and justice. In which matter, I could not lack both reason, authority, and example of holy men. But in this matter that we have in hand, it is

781 last Roman governor of Africa, d. 432
782 threaten 783 See Augustine’s Letter 185. 784 approved 785 severe 786 Henry V reigned 1413–22. 787 John Oldecastle (executed 1417), a follower of Wycliffe 788 fain to put harness: obliged to put on armor 789 subjected to penalties 790 in 1401, under Henry IV 791 guilty 792 authorities 793 purpose 794 perhaps 795 otherwise 796 order... law: procedure of the canon law 797 offense 798 made to renounce the heresy under oath 799 prayers; approval; rights 800 and if: if 801 afterwards 802 company 803 rejects 804 civil authorities 805 ecclesiastical authorities 806 signs 807 to do so 808 knows 809 action incompatible with holy orders sufficient that the bishop neither doth it nor commandeth it. For I think there will no reason bear<sup>810</sup> it that, when the heretic if he went abroad<sup>811</sup> would with the spreading of his error infect other folk, the bishop should have such pity upon him that he should, rather than other men should punish his body, suffer<sup>812</sup> him to kill other men's souls.

“Indeed,” quoth I, “there be some, as ye say, that either of high<sup>813</sup> pretended pity, or of a feigned observance of the counsels of Christ, would<sup>814</sup> that no man should punish any heretic or infidel either—not though<sup>815</sup> they invaded us and did us all the harm they possibly could. And in this opinion is Luther, and his followers, which among their other heresies hold for a plain conclusion that it is not lawful to any Christian man to fight against the Turk, or to make against him any resistance, though he come into Christendom with a great army and labor to destroy all. For they say that all Christian men are bounden to the counsels of Christ, by which they say that we be forbidden to defend ourselves, and that Saint Peter was, as ye rehearsed, reprov'd of<sup>816</sup> Our Savior when he struck off Malchus's ear, albeit that he did it in the defense of his own master, and the most innocent man that ever was.<sup>817</sup> And unto this they lay,<sup>818</sup> as ye said in the beginning, that since the time that Christian men first fell to fighting, it<sup>819</sup> hath never increased, but always diminished and decayed—so that at this day the Turk hath estraited us very near,<sup>820</sup> and brought it in within a right narrow compass, and narrower shall do, say they, as long as we go about to defend Christendom by the sword. Which, they say, should be as it was in the beginning increased, so be continued and preserved: only by patience and martyrdom. Thus holily speak these godly fathers of Luther's sect, laboring to procure that no man should withstand the Turk, but let him win all. And when it should come to that, then would they, as it seemeth, win all again<sup>821</sup> by their patience, high virtues, and martyrdom, by which now they cannot suffer<sup>822</sup> to resist their beastly voluptuousness, but break their vows, and take them harlots under the name of wives. And where they may not fight against the Turk, arise<sup>823</sup> up in great plumps<sup>824</sup> to fight against their even<sup>825</sup> Christian. It is, I trow,<sup>826</sup> no great mastery to perceive whom they labor to please, that have that opinion. And if the Turk happen to come in, it is little doubt whose part<sup>827</sup> they will take, and that Christian people be like to find none so cruel Turks as them. It is a gentle<sup>828</sup> holiness to abstain for<sup>829</sup> devotion from resisting the Turk, and in the meanwhile to rise up in routs<sup>830</sup> and fight against Christian men, and destroy—as that sect hath done—many a good religious house; spoiled,<sup>831</sup> maimed, and slain many a good virtuous man; robbed, polluted,<sup>832</sup> and pulled down many a goodly church of Christ.

“And now where they lay<sup>833</sup> for a proof, that God were not contented with battle made against infidels, the loss and diminishment of Christendom since that guise<sup>834</sup> began, they fare<sup>835</sup> as did once an old sage father-fool in Kent at such time as diverse men of worship<sup>836</sup> assembled old folk of the country<sup>837</sup> to common and devise<sup>838</sup> about the amendment of Sandwich haven.<sup>839</sup> At which time, as they began first to ensearch<sup>840</sup> by reason, and by the report of old men thereabout, what thing had been the occasion that so good a haven was in so few years so sore<sup>841</sup> decayed, and such sands risen, and such shallow flats<sup>842</sup> made therewith, that right small vessels had now much work to come in at diverse tides, where great ships were within few years past accustomed to ride without difficulty—and some laying the fault to Goodwin Sands,<sup>843</sup> some to the lands inned<sup>844</sup> by diverse owners in the Isle of Thanet out of the Channel, in which the sea was wont to compass the Isle and bring the vessels round about it, whose course at the ebb was wont to scour the haven, which now the sea, excluded thence for lack of such course and scouring, is choked up with sand—as they thus alleged (diverse men, diverse causes). There started up one good old father and said, ‘Ye masters, say every man what he will, ’cha<sup>845</sup> marked this matter well as some other. And by God, I wot how it waxed naught<sup>846</sup> well enough. For I knew it

810 support 811 free; wandering about 812 allow 813 proud 814 wish 815 even if 816 by 817 See Mt 26:51–42; Lk 22:49–51; Jn 18:10–11. 818 unto this they lay: in addition to this they allege 819 Christendom 820 estraited us very near: enclosed us very tightly 821 back 822 endure 823 they arise 824 bands 825 fellow 826 trust 827 side 828 courteous 829 because of 830 rabbles; mobs 831 despoiled 832 desecrated, profaned 833 put forth; cite 834 practice 835 act; behave 836 repute 837 area 838 common and devise: discuss and figure something out 839 amendment of Sandwich

haven: improvement of Sandwich harbor 840 inquire; investigate 841 greatly 842 sandbars 843 a ten-mile-long sandbar lying about six miles off the coast 844 reclaimed 845 I've (ch is a contracted form of Ich, the form of I still used in Kent at that time) 846 waxed naught: became bad good, and have marked — so ch'ave<sup>847</sup> — when it began to wax worse.' 'And what hath hurt it, good father?' quoth these gentlemen. 'By my faith, masters,' quoth he, 'yonder same Tenterden<sup>848</sup> steeple, and nothing else. That, by the Mass, ch'ould<sup>849</sup> 'twere a fair fish pole!'

"'Why<sup>850</sup> hath the steeple hurt the haven, good father?' quoth they. 'Nay, by'r Lady, masters,' quoth he, 'ich cannot tell you well why; but ch'ot<sup>851</sup> well it hath. For, by God, I knew it a good haven till that steeple was builded. And by the Mary Mass<sup>852</sup> — 'cha marked it well — it never throve since!'

"And thus wisely speak these holy Lutherans, which, sowing schisms and seditions among Christian people, lay the loss thereof to the withstanding of the Turk's invasion and the resisting of his malice, where they should rather, if they had any reason in their heads, lay it to the contrary. For when Christian princes did their devoir<sup>853</sup> against miscreants<sup>854</sup> and infidels, there be stories<sup>855</sup> and monuments enough that witness the manifest aid and help of God in great victories given to good Christian princes by his almighty hand. But, on the other side, since that the ambition of Christian rulers desiring each other's dominion have set them at war and deadly dissension among themselves — whereby while each hath aspired to the enhancing of his own, they have little forced<sup>856</sup> what came of the common corps of Christendom — God, for the revenging<sup>857</sup> of their inordinate appetites, hath withdrawn his help and showed that he careth as little: suffering<sup>858</sup> while each of them laboreth to eat up other, the Turk to prosper and so far-forth to proceed that, if their blind affections<sup>859</sup> look not thereto the sooner, he shall not fail (which our Lord forbid) within short process<sup>860</sup> to swallow them all.

"And albeit Christ forbade Saint Peter (being a priest, and under himself prince of his priests) to fight with the temporal sword toward the impeachment<sup>861</sup> and resistance of his fruitful Passion, whereupon depended the salvation of mankind — which affection our Savior had before that time so sore

reproved and rebuked in him that he called him therefor Satan<sup>862</sup> — yet is it nothing to the purpose to allege that by that example temporal princes should, without the let<sup>863</sup> of such spiritual profit, and the sufferance<sup>864</sup> of much spiritual harm, suffer their people to be invaded and oppressed by infidels, to their utter undoing not only temporal, but also of a great part perpetual, which were like of<sup>865</sup> their frailty for fear of worldly grief and incommodity,<sup>866</sup> to fall from the faith and renay<sup>867</sup> their baptism.

"In which peril, since our Lord would<sup>868</sup> not that any man should willfully put himself — and for that cause advised his disciples that if they were pursued<sup>869</sup> in one city, they should not come forth and foolhardily put themselves in peril of renaying Christ by impatience of<sup>870</sup> some intolerable torments, but rather flee thence into some other place where they might serve him in quiet,<sup>871</sup> till he should suffer them to fall in such point<sup>872</sup> that there were no way to escape; and then would he have them abide by their tackling<sup>873</sup> like mighty champions, wherein they shall not, in such case, fail of his help — now, albeit so<sup>874</sup> that Christ and his holy apostles exhort every man to patience and sufferance, without requiting of an evil deed or making any defense, but using<sup>875</sup> further sufferance, and doing also good for evil, yet neither doth this counsel bind a man that he shall of necessity, against the common<sup>876</sup> nature, suffer another man causeless to kill him, nor letteth<sup>877</sup> not any man from the defense of another, whom he seeth innocent and invaded<sup>878</sup> and oppressed by malice. In which case, both nature, reason, and God's behest bindeth first the prince, to the safeguard of his people with the peril<sup>879</sup> of himself as he taught Moses to know himself bounden to kill the Egyptians in the defense of Hebrew;<sup>880</sup> and after, he bindeth every man to the help and defense of his good and harmless neighbor against the malice and cruelty of the wrongdoer. For as the Holy Scripture saith, Unicuique dedit Deus curam de proximo suo ('God hath given every man charge of his neighbor'),<sup>881</sup> to keep him

847 I have 848 a nearby village 849 I wish 850 How 851 I know 852 Mary Mass: Mass in honor of Mary 853 duty; utmost 854 misbelievers 855 historical records 856 cared 857 punishing 858 allowing 859 passions 860 course of time 861 hindrance 862 therefor

Satan: Satan for it; see Mt 16:23. 863 prevention 864 allowance 865 like of: likely because of 866 grief and incommodity: hardship and discomfort 867 renounce 868 wants 869 persecuted 870 impatience of: inability to endure 871 peace. See Mt 10:23.

872 state 873 abide by their tackling: maintain their position; hold their ground 874 albeit so: although it is true 875 practicing 876 the common: shared human 877 prevents 878 attacked 879 with the peril: at the risk 880 See Ex 2:11–12. 881 Ecclus (Sir) 17:14

from harm of body and soul as much as may lie in his power.<sup>882</sup>

“And by this reason<sup>883</sup> is not only excusable, but also commendable, the common<sup>884</sup> war which every people taketh in the defense of their country against enemies that would invade it, since that every man fighteth, not for the defense of himself of a private affection to<sup>885</sup> himself, but of a Christian charity, for the safeguard and preservation of all others. Which reason, as it hath place in all battle of defense, so hath it most especially in the battle by which we defend the Christian countries against the Turks, in that we defend each other from far the more peril and loss, both of worldly substance,<sup>886</sup> bodily hurt, and perdition of men’s souls. And now if this be lawful, and enjoined<sup>887</sup> also to every private person,<sup>888</sup> how much more belongeth it to princes and rulers? Which if they may not, upon the peril of their souls, wittingly suffer<sup>889</sup> among the people whom they have in governance anyone to take away another’s horse, how may they, without eternal damnation, suffer other people, and specially infidels, to come in, spoil<sup>890</sup> and rob, and captive<sup>891</sup> them all? And if they be bounden to the defense and may not do it alone, what madness were it to say that the people may not help them.”

THE FIFTEENTH CHAPTER

That princes be bounden to punish heretics, and that fair<sup>892</sup> handling helpeth little with many of them.

“And surely, as the princes be bounden that they shall not suffer their people by infidels to be invaded, so be they as deeply bounden that they shall not suffer their people to be seduced and corrupted by heretics, since the peril shall in short while grow to as great, both with men’s souls withdrawn from God, and their goods lost and their bodies destroyed by common<sup>893</sup> sedition, insurrection, and open war within the bowels of their own land. All which may

in the beginning be right easily avoided by punishment of those few that be the first. Which few well repressed, or if need so require utterly pulled up,<sup>894</sup> there shall far the fewer have lust<sup>895</sup> to follow. For if they were handled in a contrary manner, and, as ye seemed to mean in the beginning of our matter,<sup>896</sup> instead of punishment, entreated, favored, and by fair words and rewards brought home again, I fear me then that you should find little fruit in that fashion. For first, whereas they fall into heresy by pride, that way should make them prouder, and set the more by<sup>897</sup> themselves. And then would many more fall thereto, of purpose to be hired<sup>898</sup> again therefrom. So that, as Mamelukes<sup>899</sup> and Janissaries<sup>900</sup> about<sup>901</sup> the Turk and sultan have used to christen their children of purpose,<sup>902</sup> that by the renaying of their faith after,<sup>903</sup> they might be made Mamelukes or Janissaries as their fathers were, and may be had the more in estimation and favor about the great Turk, even likewise within a while, if we take that way with heretics, we shall have young fresh fellows first become heretics, that they may be prayed and hired after to come to Christ’s faith again. I would not they were over-hastily handled, but little rigor and much mercy showed where simpleness appeared, and not high<sup>904</sup> heart or malice. For of such as be proud and malicious, much proof hath been made<sup>905</sup> already. For of some sort, many full fair handled, little change themselves or come to good amendment. I told you myself, and very true it was, of twain that were detected<sup>906</sup> of heresy unto the most honorable prelate of this realm, and in what benign, fatherly manner—and liberal<sup>907</sup> also—he dealt with them. And yet what amendment made his genteel and courteous entreaty in their stubborn stomach?<sup>908</sup> Were they not after worse than they were before, and so used<sup>909</sup> themselves that after much harm done by them, they came in short space after to their open<sup>910</sup> conviction? They be, ye wot well, at the first customably received to grace;<sup>911</sup> and verily for such merits, forgiveness is reward enough. And if they cannot by that warning be

882 See Lv 19:18; Lk 10:27-37; Rom 15:2. 883 reasoning 884 shared; public 885 of a private affection to: because of a private regard for 886 wealth; goods 887 prescribed as a duty 888 citizen 889 allow 890 despoil 891 enslave 892 kind; mild 893 public 894 pulled up: rooted out 895 desire 896 discussion 897 set the more by: value more highly 898 bribed 899 an army unit in Egypt formed by drafting the children of slaves, mostly Christians 900 an elite military force of the Ottoman Empire consisting entirely of boys taken from Christian families at around the age of six, raised as Muslims, and trained to fight Christians 901 around 902 used... purpose: made a practice of having their children baptized for the purpose 903 afterward 904 proud 905 proof hath been made: experience has been had 906 accused 907 generous 908 heart(s) 909 conducted 910 public 911 at... grace: after a first offense customarily allowed to confess their sin warned, surely, as Saint Paul saith, he is not to be trusted often, but rather of all good Christian people to be eschewed and avoided<sup>912</sup> from the flock. For they be so far waxen crooked that seldom can they be righted again.”<sup>913</sup>

“Forsooth,” quoth your friend. “yet, as I said at my first coming to you, were I worthy to be of counsel with<sup>914</sup> the clergy when there were a man founden faulty<sup>915</sup> therein whom the people have in good estimation for some great opinion<sup>916</sup> of learning and virtue, they should be secretly<sup>917</sup> and soberly admonished, and not the matter published among the people. And finally, if they so should needs be openly convicted and corrected<sup>918</sup> in face of the world, then would I not yet have them called ‘Lutherans,’ lest the people which had good opinion of them may peradventure like Luther the better for them; or if they happen to perceive them for naught and so take them, then shall they peradventure give the less credence to all good men, and set the less by all good preachers after.”

“Surely,” quoth I, “certain rule that were always best were hard to give in such case. Sometimes there may peradventure such honesty be joined with such repentance that it would not be much amiss to preserve the man’s estimation among the people, to whom his perfect change may percase<sup>919</sup> more than recompense his former error and oversight. But whereas<sup>920</sup> the contrary shall seem convenient,<sup>921</sup> there can I not see why we should forbear to call them ‘Lutherans,’ since it is both an old usage to call heretics after the name of him whom they follow in their heresy, and also — as Luther’s sect is, in effect, the whole heap of all heresies gathered together — it is now all one to call him a ‘Lutheran’ or to call him a ‘heretic,’ those two words being in manner equivalent, Luther teaching almost nothing but heresies, nor none heresies founden anywhere almost that the Lutherans have not among them. And since it so is, reason doth (in my mind) require that the name of ‘Lutherans’ should be customably<sup>922</sup> brought in men’s ears<sup>923</sup> as odious as the name of ‘heretics.’ Nor I see not so great fear that either folk shall, for opinion of any man’s virtue in<sup>924</sup> whom they see themselves deceived, withdraw their favor and affection from such as are good indeed, or fall into the favor of Luther’s sect for the estimation<sup>925</sup> of the man whom they now see proved naught. For this will no man do but such as either be so foolish that they would hate all Christ’s apostles for the falsehood<sup>926</sup> of Judas, or so naughty that they would fain<sup>927</sup> have all the world fall to the same sect and be of their own suit.”<sup>928</sup>

THE SIXTEENTH CHAPTER

Of simple unlearned folk that are deceived by the great good opinion that they have percase in the learning and living of some that teach them errors.

“Forsooth,” quoth your friend. “yet would there, methinketh, be much pity used in those matters among.<sup>929</sup> For many a man unlearned, when he heareth one that he taketh for cunning,<sup>930</sup> and seeth such a man as he taketh for virtuous, commend Luther’s way, he is of simpleness and good mind moved to follow the same.”

“Surely,” quoth I, “therein I say not nay but<sup>931</sup> that these things being such, great pity it is to see many good simple souls deceived and led out of the right way by the authority of such as they reckon for good men and cunning, whom they have, either by open<sup>932</sup> sermons or secret<sup>933</sup> communication, perceived to be favorers of that ungracious<sup>934</sup> sect, thinking that men of such cunning and knowledge in Scripture, being therewith of such virtuous behavior as they seem to be, would never lean to<sup>935</sup> that way but if<sup>936</sup> they knew it for good. And surely where it so happeneth that any simple soul is, by the good opinion that he hath in<sup>937</sup> his master, led out of the right belief of the faith, weening that were the very faith which he seeth his master (whom he reckoneth good and cunning) follow and lean unto, it is a very pitious thing. And as that person is less in blame and more easily cured, so is that master doubly damned, as the cause both of his own sin and his that<sup>938</sup> followeth him; and very hard is he to mend. Howbeit, sometimes we deserve with our sin that God, for the

912 eschewed and avoided: shunned and expelled 913 See Tit 3:10–11. 914 of counsel with: consulted by 915 guilty 916 for some great opinion of: because they have a high opinion of (his) 917 privately 918 punished 919 perhaps

920 wherever 921 appropriate 922 customarily, habitually 923 brought . . . ears: made to sound 924 about 925 for . . . of: because of the regard for 926 for the falsehood: because of the treachery 927 gladly 928 kind; group 929 from time to time 930 learned 931 say not nay but: do not deny 932 public 933 private 934 without grace; wicked 935 lean to: favor 936 but if: unless 937 of 938 who punishment thereof, suffereth<sup>939</sup> us to have lewd<sup>940</sup> leaders and evil teachers. And surely for the more part, such as be led out of the right way do rather fall thereto of a lewd lightness<sup>941</sup> of their own mind than 5 for any great thing that moveth them in their master that teacheth them. For we see them as ready to believe a purser,<sup>942</sup> a glover,<sup>943</sup> or a weaver, that nothing can do but scantily<sup>944</sup> read English, as they would be to believe the wisest and the best-learned doctor<sup>945</sup>

 10 in a realm. Howbeit, be a man never so well-learned, and seem he never so virtuous, yet can we with no reason excuse ourselves if we leave the right belief for the trust that we have in any man earthly. For our belief is taught us by God surely planted in the 15 Church of Christ, and the articles thereof not new begun, but now continued many a hundred years in the great congregation of Christian people as things certain, sure, and stable, and out of<sup>946</sup> all question — which none heretic doth or can deny — and in the 20 hearts of this congregation be they written by the holy handiwork of God. And therefore accursed is he that, through his trust put in any man, believeth the contrary of any point that the Church of Christ is taught to believe by God.

25 “This faith was taught by Christ, preached by his apostles; of this, wrote his evangelists, and many more things were taught than are written.<sup>947</sup> And this faith should have been taught and firmly stood although<sup>948</sup> nothing had been written. And the articles of this faith had in men’s hearts be the just 30 and sure rules of construction<sup>949</sup> by which we construe and understand the Holy Scripture that is written. For very sure are we that whoso would construe any text of Holy Scripture in such wise as he would make it seem contrary to any point of this 35 Catholic faith which God hath taught his Church, he giveth the Scripture a wrong sentence,<sup>950</sup> and thereby teacheth a wrong belief. And as Saint Paul saith, cursed be he, and though<sup>951</sup> he were an angel of heaven. And therefore be we not excusable if we believe any man to the contrary of the faith, how good or how cunning soever he seem, while<sup>952</sup> we see that he teacheth us a wrong way — which we may soon know if we be good Christians and know the 40 belief already.

“And we may have also a great guess thereat, if he teach us secretly, as a privy<sup>953</sup> mystery, the doctrine that he would not were<sup>954</sup> uttered and showed openly. For such things be they, commonly, that
 50 these heretics teach in hugger-mugger<sup>955</sup> against the faith that all the Church believeth. Now would I give this counsel to every unlearned man: When any man so teacheth thee whom thou hast in great estimation for virtue or cunning, then consider in 55 thyself that he neither hath more virtue nor more cunning than had Saint Augustine, Saint Jerome, Saint Ambrose, Saint Gregory, Saint Cyprian, Saint Chrysostom, with many old fathers and holy doctors, which<sup>956</sup> believed all their days — and died in — the belief that thou believest already, whereof he 60 teacheth the contrary. And so say boldly to him. But then if he would beguile thee, and say that those holy doctors believed not as thou dost, but as he saith, bring him to the reckoning before some other good and well-learned men. And I dare be bold to 65 warrant<sup>957</sup> that thou shalt find him doubly false. For neither shalt thou find it true that<sup>958</sup> he told thee, and, besides that, he shall not let to belie<sup>959</sup> thee, saying — and swearing too — that thou sayest wrong on him, and that he never told thee so.”

70 “Marry, sir,” quoth your friend, “he will haply say that he were peradventure in that point to be pardoned, because of the jeopardy that he might fall into by the maintenance of his opinion.”

75 “Pardon him if ye will,” quoth I. “But yet is he not then so good as were those good fathers. For either is his way naught — and then doth he naught to teach it — or, if it be good, then is he naught that for any fear forsaketh<sup>960</sup> it. For he that forsaketh any truth of Christ’s faith, forsaketh Christ. And then 80 saith our Savior that whoso doth shall be forsaken of<sup>961</sup> him.<sup>962</sup> And he that so doth is not to be believed like those holy fathers which<sup>963</sup> have taught us far the contrary. For they did abide by the right faith that they taught, which is, as by their books 85 appeareth, the selfsame faith that we believe. And so far-forth abide they thereby, that diverse of them sustained great persecution therefor,<sup>964</sup> and some of them death and martyrdom. So that we were more than mad if we had not liefer<sup>965</sup> send our souls to 90

939 allows 940 evil 941 lewd
 lightness: wicked thoughtlessness 942 purse-maker 943 glove-maker 944 barely 945 scholar 946 out of:
 beyond 947 See Jn 21:25. 948 even if 949 interpretation 950 meaning 951 and though: even if 952 when 953 private, secret 954 would not were:

 does not want to be 955 a secret way 956 who 957 guarantee 958 what

959 let to belie: hesitate to slander
 960 denies 961 by 962 See Lk 12:9.
 963 who 964 for it 965 had not liefer:
 would not rather

the souls of those holy fathers — of whose cunning, virtue, and salvation we be sure — than to cast them away with these folk, which, how holy soever they seem, yet show themselves naught in that they teach 5 the contrary of such things as those undoubted holy doctors taught.”

“I marvel, then,” quoth your friend, “why they live so virtuously — fasting, and giving their goods in alms, with other virtuous exercises, both in for-10 bearing<sup>966</sup> the pleasure of the world, and also taking pain in their bodies?”

“To this matter,” quoth I, “our Savior himself answereth where he saith (in the Gospel of Matthew), Attendite a falsis prophetis, qui veniunt ad vos in vestimentis ovium, intrinsecus autem sunt lupi rapaces (‘Beware of the false prophets, that come to you in the clothing of sheep and yet withinforth<sup>967</sup> be ravenous wolves’).<sup>968</sup> For since that they by false doctrine labor to devour and destroy men’s souls, we 20 are sure enough that wolves they be indeed, how sheepishly soever they look. And hypocrites must they needs be, since they be so denounced by God’s own mouth. And well may we perceive that he meaneth not well, when he teacheth evil. And that evil he 25 teacheth we may well wit,<sup>969</sup> when we see him teach the contrary of that which God hath already taught his whole Church. In which hath been so many holy fathers, so many cunning doctors, and so many blessed martyrs — that so have bidden<sup>970</sup> by the faith 30 to the death — that it were a frenzy<sup>971</sup> if we would now, against so many such, believe any false heretic and feigning hypocrite teaching us the contrary.

“Of those holy fathers of our faith, whom their books showeth to have believed as we believe, we
 35 have seen and known their virtuous life well proved by their blessed end, in which our Lord hath testified by many a miracle that their faith and their lives hath liked<sup>972</sup> him. But never have we yet seen any such thing by<sup>973</sup> any of these heretics. Nor yet 40 so much as any constancy in their doctrine; but and if<sup>974</sup> they were once found out and examined, we see them always first ready to lie and forswear<sup>975</sup> themselves, if that will serve. And when that will not help, but their falsehood and perjury proved in their faces, then ready be they to abjure and for-45 sake<sup>976</sup> it, as long as that may save their lives. Nor never yet found I anyone but he would once<sup>977</sup> abjure though he never intended to keep his oath. So holy would he be, and so wise therewith, that he 50 would with perjury kill his soul forever, to save his body for a while. For commonly soon after, such as so do, show themselves again — God, of his righteousness, not suffering<sup>978</sup> that their false forswearing<sup>979</sup> should stand them long in stead.”<sup>980</sup>

THE SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER

The author showeth that some which be Lutherans and seem to live holily, and therefore be believed and had in estimation,<sup>981</sup> intend a further purpose than they pretend, which they will well show if they may once find their time.<sup>982</sup>

“And as for their living, the good appearance whereof is the thing that most blindeth us. As much surety as we have of the godly life of our old holy fathers — whereof the world hath written, and God
 65 hath borne witness by many great miracles showed for their sakes — as uncertain be we of these men, with whom we neither be always present, and little also can tell what abominations they may do too 70 some of them secretly. Nor yet can know their intent and purpose that they appoint<sup>983</sup> upon, and the cause for which they be for the while content to take all the pain.

“Very certain is it that pride is one cause where-
 75 fore<sup>984</sup> they take the pain. For pride is, as Saint Augustine saith, the very mother of all heresies.<sup>985</sup> For of a high<sup>986</sup> mind to be in the liking of the people hath comen into many men so mad a mind, and so 80 frantic,<sup>987</sup> that they have not rought<sup>988</sup> what pain they took without any other recompense or reward but only the fond<sup>989</sup> pleasure and delight that themselves conceive in their heart when they think what 85 worship<sup>990</sup> that people talketh of them. And they be the devil’s martyrs, taking much pain for his pleasure, and his very apes,<sup>991</sup> whom he maketh to tumble through the hoop of that ‘holiness’ that putteth

966 abstaining from 967 inwardly
 968 Mt 7:15 969 know 970 stood 971 craziness, wild folly 972 pleased 973 concerning 974 and if: if 975 per-976 abjure and forsake: renounce under oath and repudiate 977 at some point 978 permitting 979 false forswearing: deceitful renouncing under oath 980 stand...stead: benefit them for long 981 had in estimation: held in high regard 982 opportunity 983 agree 984 why 985 See Sermon 46, ch. 18.

 986 proud 987 insane; wild and ungovernable 988 cared 989 foolish 990 honor 991 dupes

them to pain without fruit, and yet oftentimes maketh them miss of<sup>992</sup> the vain praise whereof only they be so proud. For while they delight to think how they be taken for holy, they be many times well perceived and taken for hypocrites, as they be.

“But such is this cursed affection<sup>993</sup> of pride, and so deep setteth in the claws where it catcheth, that hard it is to pull them out. This pride hath ere this made some learned men to devise new fantasies in<sup>994</sup> our faith because they would be singular among the people, as did Arius, Faustus,<sup>995</sup> Pelagius, and diverse other old heretics, whose false opinions have been, long time past, openly<sup>996</sup> condemned by many holy synods and General Councils — and now, God be thanked, not only their opinions quenched, but also all their books clean<sup>997</sup> gone and vanished quite away, ere ever any law was made for such books’ burning, so that it well appeareth to have been the only work of God that hath destroyed those works, which wrought in their times much harm in his Church. This affection of pride hath not only made some learned men to bring forth new fantasies, but maketh also many men of much less than mean<sup>998</sup> learning so sore<sup>999</sup> to long to seem far better learned than they be that, to make the people have<sup>1</sup> them in authority, they devise new sects and schisms to the pleasure of newfangled folk, sparing no pain, for the while, to set forth their sect withal, rewarding their labor with only delight of beholding what pleasure the people have in their preaching.

“And albeit that this frantic pleasure with which the devil inwardly feedeth them be the only thing that satisfieth and contenteth some, yet many are there, of those that evil teacheth and appear holy, which<sup>2</sup> are both secretly more loose and voluptuous<sup>3</sup> than they seem. And some also, which warily keep<sup>4</sup> themselves for the while, intend toward more liberal lewdness at length.<sup>5</sup> Will ye see example thereof? Look on Tyndale, that translated the New Testament, which<sup>6</sup> was indeed (as ye said in the beginning) before his going over<sup>7</sup> taken for a man of sober<sup>8</sup> and honest living, and looked and preached holily, saving that yet sometimes it savored so shrewdly<sup>9</sup> that he was once or twice examined thereof. But yet because he glossed then his words with a better sense, and said and swore that he meant none harm, folk were glad to take all to the best. But yet ye see that though he dissembled himself<sup>10</sup> to be a Lutheran or to bear any favor to his sect while he was here, yet as soon as he got him<sup>11</sup> hence, he got him to Luther straight. And whereas in the translation of the New Testament he covered and dissimulated<sup>12</sup> himself as much as he could, yet when he perceived his cloaked heresies espied and destroyed, then showed he shortly himself in his own likeness, sending forth first his wicked book of Mammona, and after, his malicious book of Obedience. In which books he showeth himself so puffed up with the poison of pride, malice, and envy, that it is more than marvel that the skin can hold together. For he hath not only sucked out the most poison that he could find through all Luther’s books or take of<sup>13</sup> him by mouth<sup>14</sup> — and all that hath spit out in these books — but hath also in many things far passed his master, running forth so mad for malice, that he fareth as though he heard not his own voice. He barketh against the sacraments much more than Luther. For whereas Luther left yet some confession, and reckoned his secret<sup>15</sup> confession necessary and profitable, though he set a lewd<sup>16</sup> liberty therein, Tyndale taketh it away quite,<sup>17</sup> and railleth thereon, and saith it was begun by the devil. Which thing had undoubtedly never been obtained<sup>18</sup> among the people — that folk should show themselves<sup>19</sup> their secret sins to another man — if God had not brought it up<sup>20</sup> himself. Nor never could it have continued so many hundred years without great harm grown by disclosing of many men’s offenses, if the Holy Spirit of God had not assisted his holy sacrament, as the King’s Highness most prudently writeth. Luther also sometimes affirmeth purgatory, sometimes doubteth, and sometimes denieth. But Tyndale putteth<sup>21</sup> no doubt at all, but denieth it as utterly, as foolishly, without ground, cause, or color laid wherefore.<sup>22</sup> Concerning the holy Mass, Luther, as mad as he is, was never yet as mad as Tyndale is, which like himself<sup>23</sup> so railleth thereupon in his frantic book of

992 miss of: fail to obtain 993 inclination; disposition 994 regarding 995 a contemporary of Augustine and a Manichean 996 publicly 997 completely 998 average 999 greatly 1 hold 2 who 3 sensual 4 restrain 5 at length: eventually 6 who 7 overseas

8 serious, temperate 9 savored so shrewdly: smelled so badly 10 dissembled himself: pretended not 11 himself 12 covered and dissimulated: concealed and disguised 13 from 14 word of mouth 15 private 16 wicked 17 completely 18 been obtained: become established and customary 19 show themselves: themselves reveal 20 brought it up: introduced it 21 expresses 22 color laid wherefore: pretext given why 23 which like himself: who, in his habitual manner

Obedience that any good Christian man would abhor to read it. And yet writing as he doth, he is not ashamed to say that the Church will not believe holy Saint Jerome, Saint Augustine, and such others — as though these holy doctors were on his side. Among all whom he shall scant read one leaf wherein he shall not find one or other of his abominable heresies reprov'd.<sup>24</sup> Luther himself was never so shameless to say that these holy fathers held<sup>25</sup> on his side. But because they were against him, he rejected the authority of them all. But what conscience hath this Tyndale, that thus can write to blind unlearned people with, when himself well knoweth that they do all, with one voice, prove that shrift<sup>26</sup> and confession is of necessity requisite to our salvation, and that they lay for them<sup>27</sup> the Holy Scripture plentifully for the further proof of this part<sup>28</sup> — which Tyndale would wickedly, with only railing and jesting against all their wholesome doctrine, drive away clean and<sup>29</sup> he could? He knoweth also himself that all they with one voice teach, and prove by Scripture too that there is the fire of purgatory, which I marvel why Tyndale feareth so little, but if he be at a plain point with himself<sup>30</sup> to go straight to hell. They teach also all with one voice the great profit of the Mass and honor that ought to be done thereto — which Tyndale teacheth to dishonor.

“They teach all<sup>31</sup> the worshipping of images and relics, and praying to saints, going on pilgrimages, and credence to be given to miracles, of all which Tyndale teacheth the contrary.

“All they teach also chastity,<sup>32</sup> and preach high preeminence of virginity and widowhood<sup>33</sup> above wedding, and ever have had<sup>34</sup> in abomination the breach of any vow of chastity, whereas Tyndale, against them all teaching the contrary, is therein so shameless, and so little respect hath of his own conscience, that — seeing all them to write against him and himself against them all, and that every man that learned is must needs perceive his shameless boldness therein — letteth<sup>35</sup> not yet both to rail against Christ's Church for saying as these old holy saints said before, and also to say that the Church will not hear them, whereas himself seeth that the Church and they say all one thing, and as well they

as the Church abhor and condemn his deadly damnable heresies.

“Now ween I that we need little to doubt how he liveth that thus writeth. He liveth of likelihood as evil as he teacheth — and worse he cannot. But, as I began to say, this Tyndale in the beginning bore forth a fair face, and seemed unto the people peradventure an honest man, as some others haply do now whom ye speak of, which,<sup>36</sup> when they see their time,<sup>37</sup> shall, if they may be suffered,<sup>38</sup> cast off their visors<sup>39</sup> of hypocrisy and show themselves at length in their own likeness, as he doth now.

“I pray you look on Luther himself. If he should in the beginning have said all that he hath said since, who could have suffered him? If he should in the beginning have married a nun, would not the people have burned him? And yet now, by little and little, he hath brought them to be content therewith. And let us not think the contrary but that of those heretics that here seem so good (if there be any such), we see not yet their stomachs,<sup>40</sup> but shall, if they be upholden<sup>41</sup> a while, see them follow their author<sup>42</sup> in lewd living — Doctor Luther with his leman<sup>43</sup> — and shall, by the devil's help, induce good and simple souls so far into wrong ways that they shall at length well like and commend the things which now their uncorrupted conscience abhorreth.

“And therefore let all good Christian people knock and break, as Holy Scripture counseleth, the young children's heads of Babylon against the stone:<sup>44</sup> that is to say, let good Christian folk suspect, abhor, and pursue<sup>45</sup> in the beginning all such evil doctrine as is contrary to the faith and teaching of Christ's Catholic Church, which God and his Holy Spirit, both by writing and without writing, hath taught his Church, and which hath in his Church continued from Christ's days hitherto, as it well appeareth by the good and godly books of all our forefathers, holy doctors of Christ's Church Militant here in earth, and now glorious saints in his Church Triumphant in heaven. From whose firm faith joined with good works (which as two wings carried them up to heaven) there shall, but<sup>46</sup> we be more than mad, no fond<sup>47</sup> heretic lead us, seem he never so saintish with any new construction<sup>48</sup> of Christ's Holy Gospel or

24 refuted 25 believed 26 penance
27 lay for them: cite for themselves 28 side of the argument 29 clean and:
completely if 30 but... himself: unless he is resolved, determined 31 teach all: all teach 32 celibacy 33 remaining in widowhood 34 held 35 hesitates 36 who 37 opportunity 38 allowed 39 masks

40 hearts 41 supported 42 creator; founder; instigator 43 mistress; beloved 44 See Ps 136(137):8–9. 45 attack
46 unless 47 foolish 48 interpretation

other part of Holy Scripture—which no wise man will doubt but that those holy cunning<sup>49</sup> men, illumined with the grace of God, much better understood than all the rabble of these lewd heretics. Of 5 all which that ever sprang in Christ’s Church, the very worst and the most beastly be these Lutherans, as their opinions and their lewd living showeth.

“And let us never doubt but all that be of that sect, if any seem good (as very few do), yet will 10 they in conclusion decline to the like lewd living as their master and their fellows do, if they might once<sup>50</sup> (as by God’s grace they never shall) frame<sup>51</sup> the people to their own frantic fantasy. Which dissolute living, they be driven to dissemble because 15 their audience is not yet brought to the point to bear it; which they surely trust to bring about, and to frame this realm after the fashion of Switzerland, or Saxony and some other parts of Germany, where their sect hath already fordone<sup>52</sup> the faith, pulled
 20 down the churches, polluted<sup>53</sup> the temples, put out and spoiled<sup>54</sup> all good religious folk,<sup>55</sup> joined friars and nuns together in lechery, despited<sup>56</sup> all saints, blasphemed our blessed Lady, cast down Christ’s cross, thrown out the blessed Sacrament, refused
 25 all good laws, abhorred all good governance, rebelled against all rulers, fallen to fight among themselves (and so many thousands slain, that the land lieth in many places in manner deserted and desolate), and finally—that most abominable is of all—
 30 of<sup>57</sup> all their own ungracious<sup>58</sup> deeds lay the fault in God, taking away the liberty of man’s will, ascribing all our deeds to destiny, with all reward or punishment pursuing upon all our doings, whereby they take away all diligence and good endeavor to virtue, all withstanding and striving against vice, all 35 care of heaven, all fear of hell, all cause of prayer, all desire of devotion, all exhortation to good, all dehortation<sup>59</sup> from evil, all praise of well-doing, all rebuke of sin, all the laws of the world, all reason among men; set all wretchedness abroad,<sup>60</sup> no man at liberty, and yet every man do what he will, calling it not his will but his destiny, laying their sin to God’s ordinance, and their punishment to God’s cruelty, and finally turning the nature of man into 45 worse than a beast, and the goodness of God into worse than the devil. And all this good fruit would a few mischievous<sup>61</sup> persons—some for desire of a large liberty to an unbridled lewdness, and some of a high, devilish pride cloaked under pretext of good zeal and simpleness—undoubtedly bring into this 50 realm, if the prince and prelates, and the good faithful people, did not in the beginning meet with<sup>62</sup> their malice.”

THE EIGHTEENTH CHAPTER

The author showeth that in the condemnation of heretics the clergy might lawfully do much more sharply<sup>63</sup> than they do, and that indeed the clergy doth now no more against heretics than the Apostle<sup>64</sup> counseleth, and the old holy doctors did.

“For as for the clergy—whom they labor to bring in hatred under the false accusation of cruelty—do<sup>65</sup> no more therein than Saint Augustine, Saint Jerome, and other holy fathers have been wont<sup>66</sup> to do before, nor no further than the Apostle ad-viseth himself. For they do no more but—when one heretic, after warning, will not amend but waxeth<sup>67</sup> worse—eschew him then, and avoid<sup>68</sup> him out of Christ’s flock. Which is the very thing that Saint Paul counseleth where he writeth to Titus, Haereticum hominem post primam et secundam correptionem devita.<sup>69</sup> And this is much less that the clergy doth to heretics, than Saint Peter did unto Ananias and Sapphira for a far smaller matter: that is to wit, for their untrue saying,<sup>70</sup> and keeping aside a portion of their own money, when they made sem-75 blance as though they brought to the apostles altogether.<sup>71</sup> For though they were not killed by his own hand, yet appeareth it well that God killed them both twain by Saint Peter—his means as governor of his Church—to the fearful example of all such as would after that break their promise and vow to God, willingly made, of themselves or their own goods. Which thing Luther and Tyndale would have all men do now. Did not Saint Paul write unto the Corinthians that they should del-80 iver to the devil him that had defouled his father’s wife, ‘to the punishment of his body, that the spirit

49 learned 50 ever 51 shape, form
 52 abolished 53 desecrated, profaned 54 robbed 55 religious folk: members of religious orders 56 shown contempt for 57 for 58 graceless; wicked

59 dissuasion 60 abroad; flowing freely as from a broached cask 61 evil 62 meet with: grapple with, take precautions against 63 harshly 64 St. Paul 65 they do 66 accustomed 67 grows 68 expel

69 Haereticum . . . devita: “Shun the heretical person after the first and second reproof” (Tit 3:10). 70 untrue saying:
 speaking untruthfully 71 all of it; Acts 5:1–10

might be saved in the Day of Judgment’?<sup>72</sup> What say we of Hymenaeus and Alexander, of whom he writeth (unto the Corinthians also),<sup>73</sup> Hymenaeum et Alexandrum tradidi Satanae, ut discant non blasphemare (‘I have,’ quoth he, ‘betaken<sup>74</sup> Hymenaeus and Alexander to the devil, to teach them to leave their blasphemy.’)<sup>75</sup> In which words we may well learn that Saint Paul, as apostle and spiritual governor in that country, finding them twain fallen from the faith of Christ into the blasphemy of that<sup>76</sup> they were bounden to worship, did cause the devil to torment and punish their bodies, which every man may well wit<sup>77</sup> was no small pain, and peradventure not without death also. For we find nothing of their amendment. And this bodily punishment did Saint Paul, as it appeareth, upon heretics, so that if the clergy did, unto much more blasphemous heretics than I ween they twain were, much more sorrow<sup>78</sup> than Saint Paul did to them, they should neither do it without good cause nor without great authority and evident example of Christ’s blessed apostles. And surely when our Savior himself calleth such heretics ‘wolves cloaked in sheep’s skins,’<sup>79</sup> and would<sup>80</sup> that his shepherds, the governors of his flock, should in such wise avoid<sup>81</sup> them as very shepherds would avoid very wolves, there is little doubt but (as an honorable prelate of this realm, in his most erudite book, answereth unto Luther)<sup>82</sup> the prelates of Christ’s Church rather ought temporally to destroy those ravenous wolves than suffer<sup>83</sup> them to worry<sup>84</sup> and devour everlastingly the flock that Christ hath committed unto their cure,<sup>85</sup> and the flock that himself died for to save it from the wolves’ mouth.<sup>86</sup> But now, though it well appear (as methinketh it doth) that the clergy might in this case right sore procure<sup>87</sup> against heretics, yet do they indeed no further than the old holy fathers did in their time, and the blessed Apostle<sup>88</sup> counsel-eth them to do. But all the sore<sup>89</sup> punishment of heretics wherewith such folk as favor them would fain<sup>90</sup> defame the clergy, is and hath been — for the great outrages and temporal harms that such heretics have been always wont to do, and seditious commotions that they be wont to make, besides the far passing<sup>91</sup> spiritual hurts that they do to men’s souls — devised and executed against them of necessity by good Christian princes and politic<sup>92</sup> rulers of the temporalty,<sup>93</sup> forasmuch as their wisdoms well perceived that the people should not fail to fall into many sore and intolerable troubles if such seditious sects of heretics were not by grievous punishment repressed<sup>94</sup> in the beginning, and the spark well quenched ere it were suffered to grow to over-great a fire.”

“Forsooth,” quoth your friend, “it appeareth well that the clergy is not in this matter to be blamed, as many men reckon. For it seemeth that the sore punishment of heretics is devised, not by the clergy, but by temporal princes and good lay people — and not without great cause.”

“Well,” quoth I, “and to the intent that ye shall perceive it much the better — and over that believe your own eyes, and not my words, in many things that ye have heard of my mouth — we will not part this night but I shall deliver into your hands here more books than ye will read over till<sup>95</sup> tomorrow. But for<sup>96</sup> that ye shall neither need to read all, nor lose time in seeking for that ye should see, I have laid you the places ready with rushes<sup>97</sup> between the leaves, and notes marked in the margents,<sup>98</sup> where the matter is touched.”

So caused I to be borne into his chamber a book of decrees,<sup>99</sup> and certain works of Saint Cyprian, Saint Augustine, and some other holy doctors, and therewithal, a work or twain of Luther, and as many of Tyndale. And in this wise went we to supper; and on the morrow forbore I to speak with him till near dinnertime. At which our meeting, he showed me that in the decrees where the rushes lay — namely in Causa XXII quaestione quinta<sup>100</sup> and diverse others of the questions consequently<sup>101</sup> following — he had seen at full that the clergy doth at this day no further for the punishment of heretics than did the old fathers and holy doctors and saints in time past, as by their own words there alleged<sup>102</sup> doth open and plain appear, and that as well the clergy in the 72 1 Cor 5:5 73 unto the Corinthians also: actually not to them, but to Timothy 74 handed over 75 1 Tim 1:20 76 that which 77 know 78 physical pain 79 Mt 7:15 80 wants 81 expel. See Acts 20:28–31. 82 as... Luther: St. John Fisher (1469–1535), Bishop of Rochester; his book is Assertionis Lutheranae confutatio (1523). 83 allow 84 struggle, choke 85 care. See 1 Pt 5:2; see also Jn 21:15–17; Acts 20:28. 86 See Jn 10:11–16. 87 right sore procure: very strongly act 88 St. Paul 89 severe 90 like to 91 surpassing 92 prudent 93 temporal estate of the realm 94 suppressed 95 read over till: i.e., be able to read through before 96 so 97 plant stems used as bookmarks 98 margins 99 Decretals of Gratian 100 quaestione quinta: question five; in fact Causa 23, not 22 101 consecutively; sequentially 102 quoted persecution<sup>103</sup> of heretics lawfully may do, as the temporal princes in war against infidels be deeply bounden to do, much more than they now do, or of long time have done—or yet, as it seemeth, go about to do. And over<sup>104</sup> this he said that he had seen of Luther's own words worse than he had ever heard rehearsed,<sup>105</sup> and in Tyndale worse yet in many things than he saw in Luther himself. And in Tyndale's book of Obedience he said that he had founden what things Tyndale saith against miracles and against the praying to saints.

"Marry," quoth I, "and these two matters made us two much business<sup>106</sup> before your going to the university. I would it had happed you and me to have read over that book of his before. Howbeit, in good faith if ye will, we shall yet peruse over his reasons in those points, and consider what weight is in them."

"Nay, by my troth," quoth your friend, "we shall need now to lose no time therein. For as for miracles, he saith nothing in effect but that which I laid against them before—that the miracles were the works of the devil—saving that where I said that it might peradventure be said so, he saith that indeed it is so, and proveth it yet less than I did. And therefore, as for that word<sup>107</sup> of his, without better proof is<sup>108</sup> of little weight."

"Forsooth," quoth I, "Tyndale's word alone ascribing all the miracles to the devil ought not to weigh much among Christian men against the writing of holy Saint Augustine, Saint Jerome, Saint Ambrose, Saint Chrysostom, Saint Gregory, and many another holy doctor, writing<sup>109</sup> many a great miracle done at holy pilgrimages<sup>110</sup> and saints' relics—done in open presence of many substantial folk, and diverse done in their own sight. All which miracles all those blessed saints do ascribe unto the work of God, and to the honor of those holy saints that were worshipped at those pilgrimages. Against all whom, when Tyndale ascribeth them all to the devil, he plainly showeth himself as faithful as he would seem: very near sib<sup>111</sup> to the infidelity of those Jews that ascribed Christ's miracles to the devil, saying that he did 'cast out devils by the power of Beelzebub, prince of devils.'"<sup>112</sup>

"Surely," quoth your friend. "And as for that he reasoneth against praying to saints, is very bare."<sup>113</sup> 45

"It must needs," quoth I, "be bare, except he well avoid<sup>114</sup> the miracles. Whereto, when he hath nothing to say but to ascribe God's works to the devil, he showeth himself driven to a narrow strait.<sup>115</sup> For he and his fellows, as touching miracles, neither have God willing, nor the devil able, to show any for the proof of their part<sup>116</sup>—nor, I trust in God, never they shall." 50

"In faith," quoth your friend, "as for reasoning the matter<sup>117</sup> of praying to saints, he is not worth the reading now. For all the substance, in effect, that ye prove it by, is by him clean<sup>118</sup> untouched." 55

"That is," quoth I, "no marvel, for he hath not heard it." 60

"In faith," quoth your friend. "And of his own making he layeth<sup>119</sup> arguments for it, such as he list,<sup>120</sup> which he layeth forth faintly, and then doth answer them so slenderly<sup>121</sup>—and all his whole matter,<sup>122</sup> in those points and others, so plainly confuted by the old holy fathers—that if I had seen so much before, it had been likely to have shorted much part of our long communication." 65

"For by my troth," quoth he, "when I consider both the parts<sup>123</sup> well, and read Luther's words and Tyndale's in some places where ye laid me the rushes, I cannot but wonder that either any Almain could like the one, or any Englishman the other." 70

"I cannot much marvel," quoth I, "though many like them well. For since there is no country wherein there lacketh plenty of such as be naught,<sup>124</sup> what wonder is it that vicious folk fall to the favor of their like? And then, as for such, when their hearts are once fixed upon their blind affections,<sup>125</sup> a man may with as much fruit preach to a post as reason with them to the contrary. For they nothing ponder what is reasonably spoken to them; but whereto their fond<sup>126</sup> affection inclineth, that thing they lean to, and that they believe; or, at the leastwise, that way they walk and say they believe it. For in good faith, that they so believe indeed, their matters<sup>127</sup> be so mad that I believe it not. And yet make they semblance as though they believed that 85

103 prosecution 104 beyond
105 related 106 trouble, difficulty 107 statement 108 it is 109 writing of 110 shrines 111 akin 112 See Lk 11:15. 113 is very bare: it is paltry or poor in quality 114 except he well avoid:

unless he disprove 115 to a narrow strait:
into a tight spot 116 side 117 as for... matter: i.e., as for the purpose of discussing the issue 118 completely 119 presents

120 pleases 121 inadequately 122 case 123 sides 124 wicked 125 passions; inclinations 126 foolish 127 beliefs

no man were able to confute Luther or Tyndale, where methinketh, for these matters of their heresies that they so set forth, if the audience were indifferent,<sup>128</sup> there were not in this world a man more meet<sup>129</sup> to match them both twain in dispicions<sup>130</sup> than were mad Collins<sup>131</sup> alone, if he were not of the same sect. For he lasheth out<sup>132</sup> Scripture in Bedlam as fast as they both in Almain. And, in good faith, they both expound it as madly as he. And so help me God, as methinketh that man is as mad as any of all three, which,<sup>133</sup> when he seeth the right faith of Christ continued in his Catholic Church so many hundred years; and on that side so many glorious martyrs, so many blessed confessors, so many godly virgins. And in all that time, virtue had<sup>134</sup> in honor; fasting, prayer, and alms had in price;<sup>135</sup> God and his saints worshipped; his sacraments had in reverence; Christian souls tenderly prayed for; holy vows kept and observed; virginity preached and praised; pilgrimages devoutly visited; every kind of good works commended. And seeth now suddenly start up a new sect setting forth clean the contrary: destroying Christ's holy sacraments; pulling down Christ's cross; blaspheming his blessed saints; destroying all devotion; forbidding men to pray for their fathers' souls; contemning fasting days; setting at nought<sup>136</sup> the holy days; pulling down the churches; railing against the Mass; villainously demeaning the Blessed Sacrament of the altar, the sacred body of our Savior Christ. And seeth the one side, and the continuance thereof, so clearly proved<sup>137</sup> by the virtuous and erudite books of all the old holy doctors from the apostles' time to our days; and seeth on the other side a fond friar and his fellows without wit<sup>138</sup> or grace bear us in hand<sup>139</sup> that all those holy fathers never understood the Scripture, but only these beasts that teach us vice as fast<sup>140</sup> as ever the others taught us virtue. And that seeth on the one side Saint Cyprian, Saint Jerome, Saint Ambrose, Saint Augustine, Saint Basil, Saint Chrysostom, Saint Gregory, and all the virtuous and cunning<sup>141</sup> doctors, by row,<sup>142</sup> from the death of Christ and the time of his apostles till now, and seeth among all these neither priest, monk, nor friar that ever did, after his profession made, marry and take a wife, or any suffered<sup>143</sup> to break their vowed chastity,<sup>144</sup> in all their time; and seeth on the other side none other doctors of this new sect but Friar Luther and his wife, priest Pomeranus<sup>145</sup> and his wife, Friar Hussgen<sup>146</sup> and his wife, priest Karlstadt<sup>147</sup> and his wife, Dan Otho,<sup>148</sup> monk, and his wife, Friar Lambert<sup>149</sup> and his wife, frantic<sup>150</sup> Collins, and more frantic Tyndale, that saith all priests, monks, and friars must needs have wives — that man were, I say, as frantic as they both, that would rather send his soul with such a sort as these be than with all those holy saints that ever since Christ's days have testified by their holy handwriting that they died in the same faith that the Church believeth yet, and all this fifteen hundred years hath done, and shall do till the world's end. Go there never so many heretics out thereof, and leave it never so little, yet shall it remain and be well known always by the profession of that faith and those holy sacraments that have continued therein from the beginning thereof, and the holy doctors thereof ever had<sup>151</sup> in honor and reverence, and their acceptation with<sup>152</sup> God incessantly testified by miracles, which never one sort of so many sects of heretics could yet allege for any doctor of theirs, nor never shall, I think, till the great indignation of God, provoked by our sin and wretchedness, shall suffer<sup>153</sup> the head of all heretics, Antichrist (of whom these folk be the forewalkers),<sup>154</sup> to come into this wretched world, and therein to work such wonders that the sight thereof shall be able to put right wise men and good men in great doubt of the truth, seeing false Antichrist proving his preaching by miracles;<sup>155</sup> whereas now neither good man nor wise man can have any color<sup>156</sup> of excuse, if men were so mad to believe these mad masters of whom they see the principal archheretics, and first authors of the sect, neither show miracle for the proof of their doctrine, and yet their teaching and their living all

128 impartial; unbiased 129 fit, proper 130 debates 131 an English gentleman whose wife's infidelity drove him mad.
He was eventually executed for heresy
after mocking the Eucharist. 132 lasheth out: pours forth impetuously 133 who 134 held 135 esteem 136 setting at nought: valuing as nothing 137 attested 138 intelligence 139 bear us in hand:

try to make us believe 140 steadfastly 141 learned 142 by row: one after the other 143 allowed 144 celibacy 145 John Bugenhagen married in 1522. 146 the original surname of Johannes Oecolampadius, who married in 1528 147 Andreas Bodenstein
(1486–1541) married in 1522. 148 Otho
Brunfels (1488–1534), a former Carthusian monk, married in 1524. 149 Francis Lambert (1486–1530), a former Observant

Franciscan, married in 1523. 150 insane 151 held 152 acceptation with: approval by 153 allow 154 forerunners 155 See Mt 24:24; Mk 13:22; 1 Jn 2:18–22; 4:2–3; 2 Jn 1:7; Rv 13:1–4, 11–18; 16:13–14; 19:20;
2 Thes 2:3–12. 156 pretext set upon sin and beastly concupiscence — and so,<sup>157</sup> clean contrary to the doctrine of all the old holy doctors, for whom God hath and doth show so many miracles in his Church. Which, as I said, shall 5 not fail to be conserved, and his right faith therein to be preserved, in despite of all the heretics that ever shall spring — Antichrist and all — and in spite of the devil, the great master of them all, whom 10 Antichrist, ‘with the Spirit of his holy mouth,’<sup>158</sup> repairing and dilating<sup>159</sup> his Church again, and, gathering thereinto as well the remnant of the Jews<sup>160</sup> as all other sects abroad about the world, shall 15 make all folk one flock under himself the Shepherd,<sup>161</sup> and shall deliver a glorious kingdom to his Father<sup>162</sup> of all the saved people from our former father Adam to the last day, from thenceforth to reign in heaven, in joy and bliss incogitable,<sup>163</sup> one everlasting day with his Father, himself, and the Holy Ghost<sup>164</sup> — which<sup>165</sup> send these seditious sects 20 the grace to cease, and the favorers of those factions to amend, and us the grace that, stopping our ears from<sup>166</sup> the false enchantments<sup>167</sup> of all these heretics, we may, by the very faith of Christ’s Catholic 25 Church, so walk with charity in the way of good works in this wretched world that we may be partners of the heavenly bliss which the blood of God’s own Son hath bought us unto.<sup>168</sup> And this prayer,” 30 quoth I, “serving us for grace, let us now sit down to dinner.” Which we did.

And after dinner, departed he home toward you, and I to the Court.

Finis

Cum privilegio regali<sup>169</sup>
Anno Domini 1531 mense Maii<sup>170</sup>

20

25

30

35

157 so thus 158 2 Thes 2:8 159 expanding 160 See Rom 11:14–26. 161 See Jn 10:16. 162 See 1 Cor 15:24. 163 unthinkable, inconceivable 164 See

Ps 144(145):13; Dn 2:44; 7:27; 1 Pt 2:11. 165 whom may it please to 166 against 167 See Ps 57(58):5. 168 See 1 Pt 1:18–19; Acts 20:28; 1 Cor 6:20; 7:23;

Rv 5:9. 169 Cum privilegio regali: “With royal privilege”; i.e., published with royal permission 170 Anno . . . Maii: “In the month of May in the year of our Lord 1531”

ADDENDA TO BOOK 3, CHAPTER 7<sup>1</sup>

Every act of perjury is (as it seems to me) a mortal sin without any exception whatsoever.

5 But I think that perjury is a violation of a lawful oath. Otherwise, he who swears to kill someone would sin if he did not kill. If anything secret is entrusted to someone, he is bound by the divine law to conceal it: unless it be such a misdeed that, even if he is not called upon to do so, he is bound to reveal it—of which sort are plots of treason, or homicide and the like, unless such things are revealed in sacramental confession, where the seal of secrecy has another prerogative from divine law beyond the seal of secrecy born of natural law. If therefore any lawful secret is entrusted to anyone outside of confession, and if it is of such a kind that the revelation of it might harm the person who entrusted it, then he is bound by a double bond to conceal it: both because the thing was entrusted to him for safekeeping as a deposit, and because he is bound to conceal every-thing which, if it were not concealed, would harm his neighbor, no matter how it came to his knowledge, provided it is not a misdeed which it would benefit the state to reveal. No one has the power to tender an oath to anyone else binding him to reveal such a secret as can and should be kept hidden. If a general oath is tendered, it is always understood that it applies to misdeeds, the knowledge of which was acquired by the swearer in such a way that he can lawfully reveal them. If a particular kind of oath is tendered, even with the express clause saying: “whether you can lawfully or cannot lawfully, you will swear that you will indeed reveal,” he ought to refuse this oath as unlawful, no less unlawful than if he were constrained to swear to kill a man. If, overcome by force, he swears, nevertheless he is not only not bound to discharge what he has sworn, but on the contrary he is bound not to discharge it. So where are we then? Will it be lawful for him to lie? I shall deny this if I follow Augustine’s opinion; if I follow Jerome’s, I won’t deny it; for their opinions regarding the “official” lie do not agree. But in the meanwhile I decide as follows: should he lie, he is not guilty of perjury because he is not violating a lawful oath. In Augustine’s opinion, he must also, once he has taken the oath, stand fast on this point—that he will say that, even if he knew anything secret, he is unwilling to reveal it. And I say “according to Augustine,” not because I remember that he said this in so many words, but because it seems to me clearly to follow from the way his thought develops. For I have satisfied myself that Augustine, even though he is unwilling that anyone should lie to preserve either his own or another’s life, does not, nevertheless, want anyone, rather than he should lie, either to kill himself or someone else, or to bring that killing about by what he had said. Neither could he, therefore, betray a lawful secret, entrusted to him, if the revelation of it might harm whoever entrusted it to him.

I have treated this subject in the fourth<sup>2</sup> book of my Dialogue, not thoroughly enough, I think, but I don’t remember.

<sup>1</sup> This discussion of perjury “appears to have been composed by More as a brief

note to himself during his incarceration in the Tower,” as editor and translator Richard

Sylvester notes (CW 6: 768). <sup>2</sup> Actually, in the third book, chapter 7.

Sir Thomas More, bronze statue by L. Cubitt Bevis, on the banks of the Thames in front of Old Chelsea Church, London. This statue was unveiled in 1969 by the Speaker of the House of Commons. On the three other sides of the pedestal are inscribed: SCHOLAR, STATESMAN, SAINT. More's head is turned slightly to the left looking downstream toward his last journey. Beneath the statue is a reproduction of his signature, the signature that would have saved his life if he had taken the oath. The face, cross, hands, and chain are in gold leaf.

Sir Thomas More, by Hans Holbein the Younger, 1526–27. This early charcoal sketch, so different from Plate 2, is described in K. T. Parker's catalogue as agreeing "essentially with the head of More in the Basel drawing (fifth figure from the left) and presumably [having] preceded it" (see Plate 4a).

This life-size drawing in colored chalks indicates the careful preparation Holbein took before painting his famous oil portrait of More (facing page). As can be seen above, the outlines of More's face, nose, eyes, and neck have been pricked with a needle; the reverse of this drawing shows that charcoal was "pounced" through these holes for transfer to another preparatory cartoon or to Holbein's main canvas.

The rich, opulent colors of the clothing contrast with More's apparent disregard for appearances, as indicated by the facial stubble and the hair sticking out from his cap. Holbein portrays More with work in hand, thoughtfully gazing outward. He wears a chain of office as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. At the lower left, the year M.D.XXVII (i.e., 1527) appears, the year Holbein painted this portrait, More's fiftieth year.

(a) In this preparatory sketch from 1526–27 for his More Family Portrait, Hans Holbein the Younger depicts from left to right: Elizabeth (age 21), Margaret Giggs (22), Judge John More (76), Anne Cresacre (15), Sir Thomas (50), John (18), Henry Pattenson (“fool,” 50), Cecily (20), Margaret (22), Lady Alice (57), and the family monkey. The names and ages are in the hand of Nicholas Kratzer. Emendation notes are in brown ink.

(b) The Family of Sir Thomas More, ca. 1530. The canvas and painting were likely begun by Hans Holbein the Younger and then completed by Rowland Lockey ca. 1593. The emendations indicated in the sketch above have been added (musical instruments, family monkey, classical books and not just small psalters, Lady Alice sitting, daughters shown pregnant...). The two dogs were added generations later. The life-size watercolor original of 1527 was destroyed in a fire in the eighteenth century.

(a-b) Details of Plate 4(b): The book identified on the shelf is Boethius's Consolationis Philosophiae, and under Elizabeth's arm is Seneca's Epistulae, which comprises 124 letters addressed to young Lucilius about the quest for wisdom. On the right, Margaret is shown deeply in thought, pointing to the word demens ("mad") in the chorus of the fourth act of Seneca's Oedipus. Lines 893–898 are shown on the right-hand page: "... while mad, the lad [Icarus] sought the stars, in strange arts trusting, and strove to vanquish true birds in flight." The opposite page of her book gives another approach to the troubles that "fate" seems to bring. Using terms from sailing, the Chorus of the play advises: "Were it mine to shape fate at my will, I would trim my sails to gentle winds, lest my yards tremble, bent 'neath a heavy blast."

(c) With the garden of More's Chelsea estate in the background and London in the far distance, Thomas More II (1531–1606) is seated with his wife Maria Scrope (1534–1607). Between them is their youngest son and heir Cresacre More (1572–1649), great-grandson and biographer of Sir Thomas More. More's love for gardens is seen in the settings of Utopia and of his 1529 Dialogue, in this "fair garden" of Chelsea (see pp. 1396, 1408), and in his wife's final plea to him in prison (p. 1411). For his imagery of the "garden of [the] soul," see pp. 477, 610, 1095, and 1116. An artistic rendition of his gardens at Chelsea is on page 264.

(a) Sir John More (1451–1530), 76, became a judge of the King’s Bench in 1520, and was married for the fourth time when this sketch was done. His promotion to serjeant-at-law in 1503 may have been the occasion for his son’s “Merry Jest” (p. 7).

(b) Elizabeth More (1506–64) married William Dauncey, son of Sir John Dauncey, Knight of the Body to Henry VIII. Like others in the More clan, he was imprisoned and found guilty of treason, but he was pardoned in 1544.

(c) John More (1508–47) married Anne Cresacre in 1529, signed the Oath of Supremacy in 1534, moved to Anne’s Barnborough estate in Yorkshire, and was imprisoned in connection with the Plot of Prebendaries in 1543. He was convicted of treason but pardoned in 1544 upon signing again the Oath of Supremacy.

(d) Cecily More (1507–?) in 1525 married Giles Heron, wealthy heir of Sir John Heron, Treasurer of the Chamber of Henry VIII. Giles was attainted by Parliament for treason in 1540 and was hung, drawn, and quartered. No records exist about her life after 1540. Her eldest son, Thomas, regained the family lands in 1554.

(a) Adopted as a ward by the More family in 1524, Anne (1510–77) married John More in 1529; their son Thomas More II was born in 1531 and grandson Cresacre wrote a biography of his grandfather, published in 1630. Anne's estate became the family homestead.

(b) Margaret Giggs (1508–70), an adopted daughter, was a scholar of Greek, mathematics, and medicine. In 1526 she married John Clement (present but silent in Utopia). The only family member at More's execution in 1535, Giggs later escaped to Louvain in 1547 and helped with More's 1557 Workes.

(c) Lady Alice More (ca. 1474–ca. 1551) had been married to the wealthy London merchant John Middleton, who died in 1509. She married Thomas More in 1511, and Erasmus marveled at how well the two, with quite different temperaments, worked and lived together.

(d) Hans Holbein the Younger (ca. 1497–1543) painted this self-portrait in 1542–43, when he had long established his reputation in England. He first came to England in late 1526, stayed at More's home, and received his first commissions from and through More.

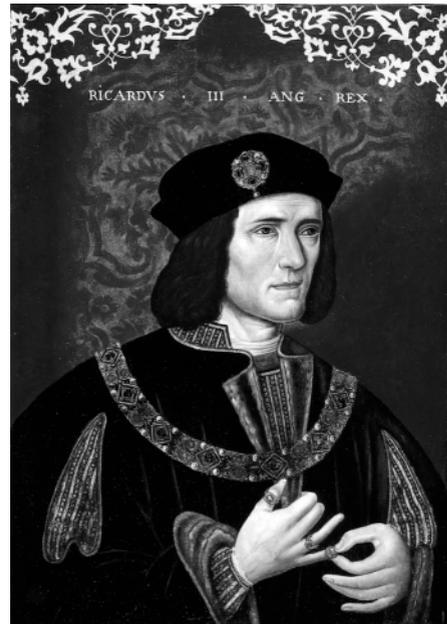

(a) Margaret Roper (1505–44), “Meg,” was the oldest of More’s children and the most intellectually accomplished. Above she is depicted at “30 years,” which would be the year of her father’s death in 1535. She holds her Book of Hours and is wearing a medallion on which St. Michael grapples with Lucifer. She was the first non-royal woman to publish a book in England, and she was proficient in Greek, Latin, medicine, and liberal learning. Her daughter Mary Basset was also exceptionally learned, translating books from Greek and Latin, including her grandfather’s De tristitia.

(b) William Roper (1496–1578) lived in the More household from ca. 1518 to 1534. He married Margaret More in 1521, served as a member of four Parliaments, and kept his office of prothonotary of the Court of King’s Bench for fifty-four years. In 1543 he was imprisoned for four months, allegedly for plotting to discredit Cranmer. He was later released with a severe reprimand, a fine of £100, and the requirement to sign again the Oath of Succession. In 1568, he was called before the Privy Council for helping finance Catholic exiles. He wrote his Life of More ca. 1555, but it was not printed until 1626. Here he is depicted at “42 years.” This is the only known portrait of Roper.

(c) The title page of Margaret’s Devout Treatise, published in 1524; it shows a young teacher sitting at her lectern.

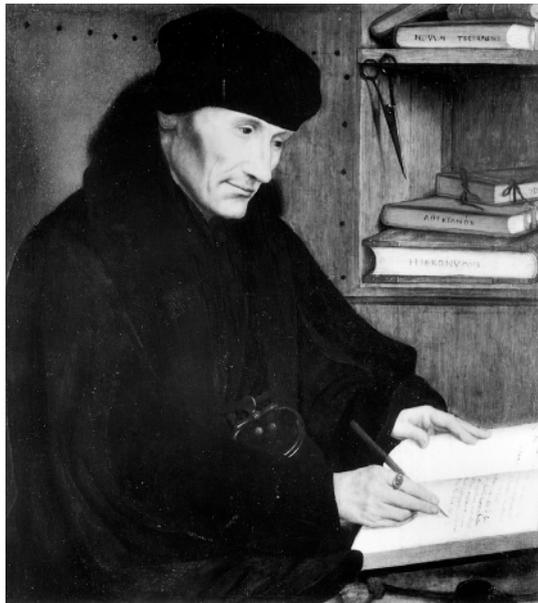

(d) Richard III, last of the kings of York, reigned from 1483 until he was defeated and killed at Bosworth Field by Henry Tudor in 1485. Shakespeare’s first tetralogy is on the Wars of the Roses, based largely on Thomas More’s History of King Richard III.

(a) Queen Elizabeth of York (1465–1503) is featured in More’s early poem “Rueful Lamentation.” Elizabeth is holding a white rose of the Yorks, but having married Henry VII, a red rose Lancastrian, she wears a pendant in the shape of the famous “Tudor rose,” uniting red and white.

(b) Henry Tudor (1457–1509), holding a red rose, defeated Richard III in 1485 and ended the Wars of the Roses; he assumed the throne as Henry VII. Thomas More’s “Coronation Ode” for Henry VIII does not speak favorably of Henry VII and his approach to government.

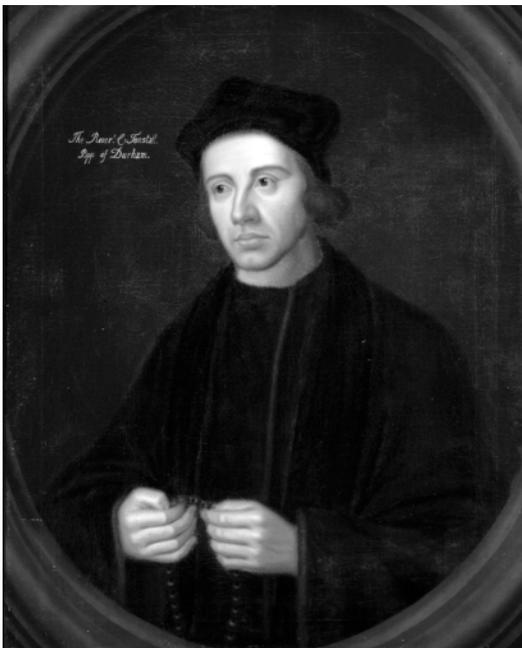

(c–d) Thomas More wrote Epigram 276 to thank Erasmus and Peter Giles for the gift of this diptych they had commissioned Quentin Metsys to paint in 1517. In his portrait, Erasmus wears a ring given to him by More; among the books identified on his shelf are Lucian and Mor[iae] Encomium, the latter having been written in More’s house, at More’s suggestion, and playing upon More’s name. Other books identified are Erasmus’s edition of Saint Jerome and his Greek edition of the New Testament. See the detail of this painting on p. 1368. Giles is holding in his hand a letter from More; the books identified on his shelves are Plutarch, Seneca, Suetonius, and Erasmus’s Education of a Christian Prince.

(a) Both Thomas More and Thomas Cromwell began their careers at Court by working closely with Thomas Wolsey (1473–1530), here depicted ca. 1520, when serving as Lord Chancellor, Archbishop of York, Cardinal, and Papal Legate.

(b) On the outside of the letter on Cromwell's table is written, "To our trusty and right well beloved Counsaillor Thomas Cromwell, Maister of o[u]r Jewell House." Holbein painted this portrait in 1532–33. Cromwell was arrested and executed in 1540.

(c) Praised in the opening of Utopia and a longtime friend of More, Cuthbert Tunstall (1474–1559), skilled diplomat and humanist, became bishop of London and then of Durham, living during the reigns of four Tudor monarchs and dying under house arrest for refusing the Oath of Supremacy in 1559 under Elizabeth I.

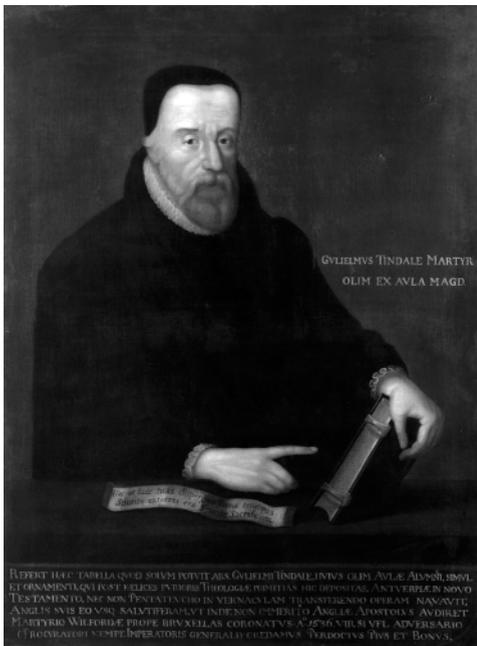

(d) In 1532, octogenarian William Warham (ca. 1450–1532), Archbishop of Canterbury, incurred the wrath of Henry VIII in February by formally protesting anticlerical legislation; in May, Warham and leaders of Convocation accepted Henry's Supremacy; in August, Warham died writing a legal defense repeatedly invoking St. Thomas Becket.

(a) John Fisher (ca. 1469–1535), Bishop of Rochester, promoted education at both Oxford and Cambridge, became Queen Catherine’s major defender, and was imprisoned in the Tower and then attainted and executed like More.

(b) In 1522, Henry VIII asked his counselor Thomas More to respond “in kind” to Martin Luther’s strident and scatological Against Henry, written in reply to Henry’s 1521 Defense of the Seven Sacraments. Erasmus strongly opposed Luther’s alleged denial of free will, and More encouraged Erasmus to write Hyperaspistes I & II.

(c) William Tyndale (1494–1536) and Thomas More had extensive exchanges. More’s Confutation of Tyndale is over 1,000 pages in cw 8. The couplet beneath Tyndale’s hand has been translated: “To scatter Roman darkness by this light / The loss of land and life I’ll reckon slight.”

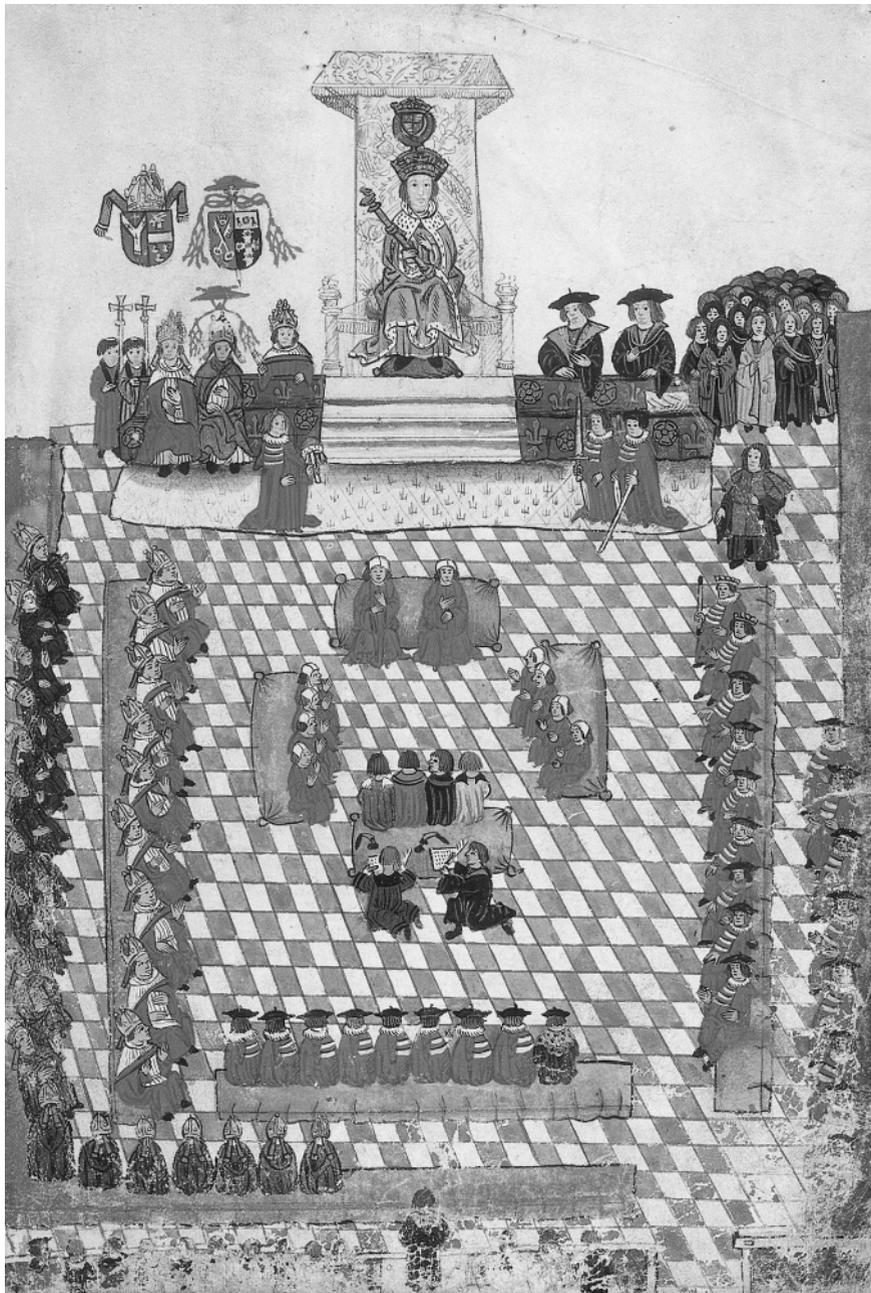

(d) Thomas Cranmer (1489–1556) became Archbishop of Canterbury in October 1532, annulled Henry’s marriage to Catherine May 23, 1533, validated Henry’s marriage to Anne on May 28, and anointed Anne queen on June 1. He compiled the first two editions of The Book of Common Prayer during Edward VI’s reign.

The Field of the Cloth of Gold, artist unknown, ca. 1545, Hampton Court. In this spectacular display of wealth and power, Henry VIII brought 6,000 in his English entourage and 2,000 horses to a field outside of Guisnes, France, in addition to the 6,000 workmen from England and Flanders who had been sent ahead to build the temporary palace, the city of tents, and the tournament fields. The occasion was peace talks with King Francis I on June 7–24, 1520. The painting is a composite of several major events: on the left, Henry's procession to meet Francis on June 7; on the right, the feasting, meetings, and jousts of the days following.

Directly in back of the temporary palace is the King's gold dining tent; further back in another tent of gold can be seen the wrestling match between King Henry (who lost) and King Francis. In front of the two-story temporary palace is a fountain that flowed with red and white wines. In the upper left is a flying dragon, part of the celebratory display. In the distant left is Calais; in the distant right is the French town of Ardres, where the French contingent stayed. Queen Catherine, Thomas More, Erasmus, and William Budé were among the many who attended.

At the bottom, center, Thomas More as Speaker of the House stands behind the bar with members of the Commons. This is the earliest known depiction of More. In watercolor and goldleaf, this elaborate seating plan depicts the 1523 Parliament. On King Henry's immediate right are seated Archbishops Warham and Wolsey; standing behind the bench is Bishop of London Tunstall holding the roll of his opening speech. To the King's left, behind the bench, are the Treasurer and Comptroller of the Royal Household. Three earls stand on the carpet decorated with lilies; one holds the cap of maintenance; one, the upraised sword of state; another, the white wand of office. Between the throng of eldest sons of peers and the front temporal bench is the Garter King of Arms, Thomas Wriothesley. At the top of the front temporal bench are the Duke of Norfolk (with gold baton as Earl Marshall) and Duke of Suffolk wearing coronets and four ducal bars of white miniver. Below them are seven earls (with three ducal bars), behind whom and on the cross bench are sixteen barons (with two ducal bars) and the prior of St. John's in black. Ten bishops in red and seventeen abbots in black are seated to the King's right. Seated in the middle on wool sacks are ten judges (the two chief judges on the top bench; More's father, Judge John More, among the others) and four sergeants of law, behind whom are two recording clerks.

This painting is one of eight depicting “The Building of Britain” in St. Stephen’s Hall, the main entrance to Great Britain’s Parliament in the Palace of Westminster. The caption below this mural reads: “Sir Thomas More as Speaker of the Commons in spite of Cardinal Wolsey’s imperious demand refuses to grant King Henry the Eighth a subsidy without due debate by the House, 1523.” At the beginning of that same Parliament of 1523, More made the first recorded petition and defense for freedom of speech (see Roper’s Life and Edward Hall’s Chronicles for accounts of both events, pp. 1387, 1393–94). In this 10’ × 14.5’ painting, More calmly points to the mace and the book of laws that are on the table, symbols of an authority greater than either Cardinal and Lord Chancellor Thomas Wolsey or himself. Wolsey’s youthful attendants carry the instruments of Wolsey’s royal and ecclesiastical power: “his maces, his pillars, his pole-axes, his crosses, his hat, and the Great Seal, too” (p. 1395). Behind More are the older and serious faces of the burgesses and knights of the shire. Thomas Cromwell is standing behind Speaker More’s chair.

This 1667 copy of the original 1537 mural (9' × 12') shows a triumphant King Henry VIII, his father King Henry VII, his mother Queen Elizabeth of York, and his wife Jane Seymour, mother of Prince Edward. The poem in the middle is “couched in the forcefully panegyric language of an imperial conqueror, neatly complementing the visual symbolism of the ‘imperial Roman’ bust in the roundel above the central plinth” (catalogue, London: Walker Museum, 2003). Gerald Malsbary’s translation of the poem is: “If it pleases you to gaze upon the glorious figures of heroes, / Behold these: no painting ever brought any greater to view. / The contest, the dispute, the question is great: / Who is the greater, father or son? Well, both win the prize: / The former put down his enemies, and often stopped the destructive / Fires of his country, so as finally to restore peace to his citizens. / The son, born to greater things, removed unworthy priests / From the altars, and replaced them with good ones. / The arrogance of popes has yielded to sure virtue, / Now that Henry the Eighth holds the scepter in his hand. / Religion has been restored, now that he is king, / And the teachings of God are beginning to be held in their proper honor.”

Hans Holbein's The Ambassadors commemorates these two French diplomats' involvement in a London event that took place at 10:30 a.m. on April 11, 1533 (see pillar dial and sundials) — Good Friday (see crucifix in upper left), the day and time when Archbishop Thomas Cranmer asked to hear Henry VIII's case for annulling the marriage to Catherine of Aragon. On the left is Jean de Dinteville, 29, the resident ambassador from France; his estate, "Policy," is identified on the terrestrial globe. On the right is bishop-elect and French ambassador-at-large George de Selve, 25. The mosaic on the floor replicates the one around Edward the Confessor's tomb in the sanctuary of Westminster Abbey, the spot where Anne Boleyn would be crowned queen on June 1, 1533. The death's head or skull in the middle of the floor is clearly visible only when viewed from a particular angle and is a famous example of anamorphism. The broken string on the lute, the open book of division, the Lutheran hymnal, and the instruments of navigation all contribute to the puzzling assortment of elements in this painting.

(a) Catherine of Aragon (1485–1536) often said “More alone was worthy of the position and the name” of counselor (Stapleton 76). She was married to Prince Arthur 1501–02. In 1509, she married Henry VIII and was divorced in 1533. Mary was born in 1516.

(b) Anne Boleyn (1501–36) married Henry VIII secretly in January 1533. Thomas More refused to attend her coronation in June 1533. Elizabeth was born September 7. Anne was accused of high treason in April 1536 and executed May 19 for incest, adultery, and plotting to kill the King.

(c) John Colet (1467–1519) was a leading humanist, dean of St. Paul’s, and founder of St. Paul’s School. Young Thomas More chose him as his spiritual guide (see Letters 3 and 8), and Colet is probably the one who introduced More to Pico della Mirandola’s writings.

(d) John Houghton was prior of the London Charterhouse, which More had frequented during and after his law-school days. Houghton was one of four monks whom Thomas More and Margaret saw from his prison window being dragged to Tyburn on May 4, 1535 for execution.

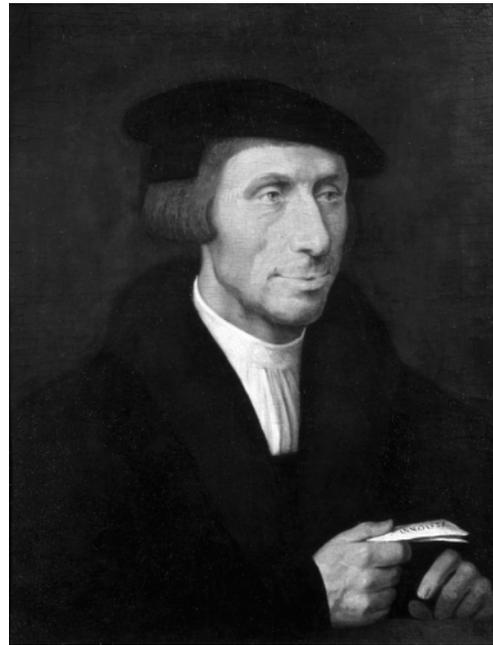

(a) John Morton (ca. 1420–1500), Archbishop of Canterbury and Lord Chancellor of England, persuaded More's father to send More to Oxford. At twelve, More served as a page in Morton's palace at Lambeth. Morton has a prominent place in More's Richard III and Utopia.

(b) Thomas Howard (1473–1554), Duke of Norfolk, is shown here with gold baton as Earl Marshal, white wand as Lord Treasurer, and collar of the Order of the Garter with the St. George pendant. He was one of the nineteen commissioners appointed to preside at More's trial.

(c) William Grocyn (ca. 1446–1519), one of More's most learned teachers, invited the twenty-three-year-old More to give lectures on Augustine's City of God at his church in London. The six medallions cite these features of his life: Born 1446, died 1519; Educated at New College, Oxford; Divinity Reader at Magdalen; Prebendary of Lincoln; Taught Greek at Oxford; Rector of St. Lawrence Jewry, 1496.

(d) Thomas Linacre (ca. 1460–1524) studied Greek and medicine in Italy. He achieved fame as a physician and translator of Aristotle and Galen, became the King's physician, and was a founder and first president of the Royal College of Physicians in London. He was a mentor to young Thomas More and part of the "More circle."

More was imprisoned on the first floor of the Bell Tower (upper left). He expected to be hung, drawn, and quartered on July 6, but the day before was informed that King Henry remitted his execution to beheading. The 1555 engraving (bottom) shows the 1535 hanging and quartering of the Carthusians. More (upper right) on his way to execution.

The Supplication of Souls

In February 1529 Simon Fish smuggled into England his sixteen-page anticlerical pamphlet entitled A Supplication for the Beggars, published in Antwerp and dedicated to King Henry VIII. The pamphlet described the helpless condition of England's poor and blamed the English clergy for their ravenous greed in requiring that the poor pay for the clergy's prayers for those souls of relatives and friends who were supposedly in purgatory. In October 1529, More published his response, over ten times longer than Fish's pamphlet, defending the clergy and the existence of purgatory. Addressed "to all good Christian people," this refutation takes the form of a letter from the souls suffering in purgatory, writing to their relatives and friends in England for "help, comfort, and relief."

The three main motives More identifies for Fish's attack in A Supplication of Beggars are: the hatred of the clergy; the desire to confiscate the clergy's property; and the desire to spread the teachings of Luther and Tyndale. Germain Marc'hadour explains the power and danger of Fish's appeal, given the broader political context in which his pamphlet first appeared: "Since Henry was already aware of the plea for royal supremacy over the Church contained in Tyndale's Obedience of a Christian Man, Fish's tirade against the clergy, accusing them of every abomination from extortion to adultery, and his plea for confiscation of all their properties and income, made a potentially dangerous appeal to a king already impatient of clerical delays in the great matter of his divorce" (CW 7: lxxvii). More also manifests concern that the author has used "a very wise fashion of flattery" in addressing his pamphlet to the King. More's rapid and lengthy response to Fish's pamphlet is explained in part by More's identification here of the strategy that eventually prevailed against the clergy and their liberty: begin with known abuses of some clergy; extend and exaggerate those abuses to all clergy, while inventing new crimes worthy of removing the clergy's traditional independence in matters of spiritual jurisdiction. As the purgatorial souls strongly put it, A Supplication of Beggars "is much grounded upon many great lies" — slanders they repeatedly call "malicious" and "seditious," with the intent to bring the clergy "in displeasure of the King and hatred of the people" and thus to "destroy the Church" and its long-standing "spiritual jurisdiction" in England.

More responds to Fish in Book 1 by arguing that Fish's claims are marred by dissimulation, false calculations, and railing rhetoric, as well as numerous lies and foolish assertions about the clergy. More contends that Fish's arguments really aim to support the "new gospel" of Luther and Tyndale, which promises "Christian freedom" while "spurring forward the devilish unbridled appetite of lewd, seditious, and rebellious liberty." More fears that this new theology will "infect and corrupt the people," who do not perceive its character and motivation clearly, and will ultimately lead them to adopt an "obstinate, rebellious mind against all laws, rule, and governance." More's emphasis on the appeal of reformers to a new doctrine of liberty links his thinking here in the Supplication to his other polemical books such as The Response to Luther, The Dialogue of Sir Thomas More, and Confutation of Tyndale, which also address free will and the "spice" of the new theology's rhetoric about liberty.

Book 2 of The Supplication of Souls is More's defense of purgatory, beginning with reason and proceeding through arguments based on Scripture, the Church fathers, and Church tradition. The Yale edition includes an account of the teaching about purgatory, conciliar definitions of purgatory, and disputes between More, Fisher, Luther, and John Frith (CW 7: lxxxvii–cxvii).

CONTENTS

Book 1

The malice of this recent book . . . . .	738
Poor pleaders for beggars; almost as many lies as lines . . . . .	740
The souls in purgatory pray for beggars . . . . .	742
False calculations, false accounting . . . . .	743
Rude railing rhetoric . . . . .	744
Lies to the King . . . . .	745
Malicious makebate . . . . .	746
About Richard Hunne . . . . .	747
Clergy blamed for all; time trieth out the truth . . . . .	749
Beggars' proctor ignorant of how Parliament works . . . . .	751
Similar heresies fought by Henry V and St. Augustine . . . . .	753
The Bible does not impose manual labor on priests . . . . .	754
Hoping for profit from clergy's loss . . . . .	755
Merry mad malicious devices . . . . .	757
Bind and beat clergy to work and to wed . . . . .	758
Clergy attacked to promote Luther and Tyndale . . . . .	760
Proctor's lies against the whole clergy . . . . .	763
The end and effects of Luther's gospel . . . . .	764

Book 2

The badge of the seditious . . . . .	766
Reason, justice, and mercy require purgatory . . . . .	767
Good folks' prayers abridge the pain of purgatory . . . . .	768
Scriptural proofs: 1 Kings, Zechariah, Maccabees . . . . .	770
Scriptural proofs: Maccabees, 1 John, Revelation . . . . .	772
Scriptural proofs: Acts, 1 Corinthians; pains of purgatory . . . . .	774
Christ and the Church fathers on purgatory . . . . .	776
The Church has always believed in purgatory . . . . .	778
The souls of purgatory are members of the Church . . . . .	780
Prayers for the dead in earliest liturgies . . . . .	781
Souls departed incessantly pray for those alive . . . . .	782
Luther and Tyndale overmatched by saints . . . . .	784
Mortmain, escheat, benefices . . . . .	786
Souls beg help from family and friends . . . . .	788
How soon forgotten . . . . .	790
Remember us; bring us comfort . . . . .	793

The Supplication of Souls

made by Sir Thomas More — Knight, Councilor to our Sovereign Lord the King, and Chancellor of his Duchy of Lancaster — against The Supplication of Beggars

5        To all good Christian people.

1        In most piteous wise<sup>1</sup> continually calleth and crieth upon your devout charity and most tender pity, for help, comfort, and relief, your late<sup>2</sup> acquaintance — kindred, spouses, companions, playfellows, and 10 friends — and now your humble and unacquainted and half-forgotten suppliants, poor prisoners of God, the seely<sup>3</sup> souls in purgatory, here abiding and enduring the grievous pains and hot cleansing fire that fretteth<sup>4</sup> and burneth out the rusty and filthy 15 spots of our sin till the mercy of almighty God, the rather<sup>5</sup> by your good and charitable means, vouchsafe<sup>6</sup> to deliver us hence.

From whence if ye marvel why we more now molest<sup>7</sup> and trouble you with our writing than ever we 20 were wont<sup>8</sup> before, it may like you to wit<sup>9</sup> and understand that hitherto, though we have been with many folk much forgotten of<sup>10</sup> negligence, yet hath always good folk remembered us; and we have been recommended unto God and eased, helped, and re-25 lieved both by the private prayers of good virtuous people, and specially by the daily Masses and other ghostly suffrages<sup>11</sup> of priests, religious, and folk of Holy Church. But now since that of late there are sprungen up certain seditious persons, which<sup>12</sup> not 30 only travail and labor to destroy them by whom we be much helped, but also to sow and set forth such a pestilent opinion against ourselves as, once received and believed among the people, must needs take from us the relief and comfort that ever should 35 come to us by the charitable alms, prayer, and good works of the world, ye may take it for no wonder though<sup>13</sup> we seely souls that have long lain and cried so far from you that we seldom break your sleep, do now in this our great fear of our utter loss forever of your loving remembrance and relief, not 40 yet importunately bereave<sup>14</sup> you of your rest with crying at your ears at unseasonable time when ye would (as we do never) repose yourselves and take ease, but only procure<sup>15</sup> to be presented unto you this poor book, this humble supplication of ours, 45 which it may please you parcelmeal<sup>16</sup> at your leisure to look over for all seely souls' sake, that it may be as a wholesome treacle<sup>17</sup> at your heart against the deadly poison of their pestilent persuasion that would bring you in that error to ween<sup>18</sup> there were 50 no purgatory.

Of all which cruel persons so procuring,<sup>19</sup> not the diminishment of your mercy toward us but the utter spoil and robbery of our whole help and com-55 fort that should come from you, the very worst and thereby the most deadly deviser of our pains and heaviness<sup>20</sup> (God forgive him) is that dispite-ous and despiteful<sup>21</sup> person which<sup>22</sup> of late, under pretext of pity, made and put forth among you a book that he named The Supplication for the Beg- 60 gars: a book indeed nothing less intending than the pity that it pretendeth, nothing minding the weal<sup>23</sup> of any man, but, as we shall hereafter show you, much harm and mischief to all men, and among other great sorrow, discomfort, and heaviness unto 65 us, your even-Christian and nigh kin,<sup>24</sup> your late neighbors and pleasant companions upon earth, and now poor prisoners here.

And albeit that<sup>25</sup> his unhappy book doth for our own part touch us very near, yet we be much more 70 moved to give the world warning of his venomous writing for the dear love and charity that we bear to you than for the respect<sup>26</sup> of our own relief. For as for us, albeit that the gracious help of your prayer, alms-deeds, and other good works for us may be 75

1 ways    2 former; recent    3 pitiable, poor; helpless    4 consumes; chafes    5 sooner
6 grant    7 disturb    8 accustomed 9 know    10 out of, due to    11 ghostly suffrages: spiritual prayers for the dead

12 who    13 if    14 importunately bereave:
in an untimely way deprive    15 endeavor;
ask    16 piecemeal; a little at a time 17 antidote    18 believe    19 endeavoring 20 sadness, grief    21 despiteous and despiteful: pitiless and cruel    22 who 23 well-being    24 even-christian... kin: fellow Christians and close relatives 25 albeit that: although    26 consideration; regard

the means of relieving and releasing of our present pains, yet such is the merciful goodness of God that, though the whole world would clean forget us, yet would his mercy so remember us, that, after temporal punishment and purging here, he will not finally forget to take us hence, and wiping all the tears out of our eyes, translate<sup>27</sup> us at sundry times, as his high wisdom seeth convenient,<sup>28</sup> into that eternal heavenly bliss to which his holy blessed blood hath bought us. But surely to you worldly people living there upon earth — not only for this present time, but also for as long as this world shall endure — the wretched maker of that ungracious<sup>29</sup> book (whom God give once the grace to repent and amend), if folk were so fond<sup>30</sup> to follow him, should not fail to work as well much worldly trouble to every kind of people as, over<sup>31</sup> that (which most loss were of all) to bring many a good simple soul, for lack of belief of purgatory, the very straight way to hell.

And the case so standing, there would, we think, no man doubt but though<sup>32</sup> the man that made the book were well known among you, and in hold<sup>33</sup> also — whereby, his heinous treason to God and the world disclosed and declared by us, he might be in peril of exquisite<sup>34</sup> painful punishment — yet we both might and ought, rather to put him in the danger of his own demeanor,<sup>35</sup> than for the sparing of his just correction, to suffer him abuse<sup>36</sup> the people with his pestilent writing, to the inestimable harm of the whole world in goods, body, and soul. And since we so might of reason, and so should of charity, though the man were known and taken,<sup>37</sup> how much may we now more frankly tell you all, and nothing<sup>38</sup> shall need to spare him, since his book is nameless,<sup>39</sup> and so himself among you unknown and thereby out of the peril of any punishment for his unhappy deed?

But for<sup>40</sup> that both ye and he shall well perceive that we desire but your weal<sup>41</sup> and ours by giving you warning of his malice, and nothing intend to procure his punishment — which we rather beseech our Lord of his mercy to remit — ye shall understand that neither is his name nor person unknown among us, and therefore we might well discover him if we were so minded. For there is not only some of his acquaintance and counsel, whom God gave at their death the grace to repent, come hither to purgatory — nothing more now lamenting among us than their cruel unkindness toward us, in giving counsel against us to the making of that ungracious book, with infidelity and lack of belief of the purging fire which they now find and feel — but he is also named and boasted among us by that evil angel of his, our and your ghostly<sup>42</sup> enemy, the devil. Which<sup>43</sup> as soon as he had set him awork with that pernicious book, ceased not to come hither and boast it among us; but, with his envious and envious laughter, gnashing the teeth and grinning, he told us that his people had by the advice and counsel of him and of some heretics almost as evil as he, made such a book for beggars that it should make us beg long ere we get aught,<sup>44</sup> whereby he trusted that some of us should not so soon creep out of our pain as we had hoped.

Wit<sup>45</sup> ye well, these words were heavy tidings to us. But yet because the devil is wont<sup>46</sup> to lie, we took some comfort in that we could not believe him, specially telling a thing so far incredible. For who could ever have thought that any Christian man could for very pity have founden in his heart to seek and study the means whereby a Christian man should think it labor lost to pray for all Christian souls?

But alack the while,<sup>47</sup> we found soon after that the falsehood and malice of the man proved the devil true. For by some that died soon after the book put forth, we have heard and perceived the wretched contents thereof, well and plainly declaring what evil spirit inspired him while it was in making. For albeit that<sup>48</sup> it is so contrived and the words so couched that, by the secret inward working of the devil that helped to devise it, a simple reader might by delight in the reading be deadly corrupted and venomd, yet if a wise man well warned advisedly will weigh the sentence,<sup>49</sup> he shall find the whole book nothing else but falsehood under pretext of plainness, cruelty under the cloak of pity, sedition under the color<sup>50</sup> of counsel, proud arrogance under the name of supplication, and under the pretense of favor unto poor folk, a devilish desire of noyance<sup>51</sup> both to poor and rich, priest, religious,

27 transport 28 appropriate; suitable 29 devoid of grace; wicked 30 foolish as 31 beyond 32 even if 33 custody 34 excruciating 35 behavior 36 suffer him abuse: allow him to deceive

37 arrested 38 not at all 39 published anonymously 40 so 41 well-being 42 spiritual 43 Who 44 ere . . . aught:
before we get anything 45 Know 46 accustomed 47 alack the while:

alas the times 48 albeit that: although 49 meaning, sense 50 appearance, pretext 51 harm

and layman, prince, lord, and people, as well quick<sup>52</sup> as dead.

He deviseth a piteous bill of complaint and supplication, feigned to be by the poor, sick, and sore<sup>53</sup> beggars put up to the King, lamenting therein their number “so sore<sup>54</sup> increased” that, good folks’ alms “not half” sufficing to find them meat,<sup>55</sup> they be constrained heavily to “die for hunger.”<sup>56</sup> Then layeth<sup>57</sup> he the cause of all these poor beggars—both their increase in number and their default in finding<sup>58</sup>—all this he layeth to the only<sup>59</sup> fault of the clergy, naming them in his bead-roll:<sup>60</sup> “bishops, abbots, priors,<sup>61</sup> deacons, archdeacons,<sup>62</sup> suffragans,<sup>63</sup> priests, monks, canons,<sup>64</sup> friars, pardoners,<sup>65</sup> and summoners.”<sup>66</sup> All these he calleth mighty, sturdy<sup>67</sup> beggars and “idle holy thieves,” which, he saith, hath “begged so importunately that they have gotten into their hands” the “third part”<sup>68</sup> of all the realm of England, besides tithes, privy tithes,<sup>69</sup> probates of testaments<sup>70</sup> and offerings, with mass-pennies<sup>71</sup> and mortuaries,<sup>72</sup> blessing and cursing, citing,<sup>73</sup> suspending, and soiling.<sup>74</sup> Then cometh he particularly to friars, to whom he maketh, as he thinketh, a plain and open reckoning<sup>75</sup> that they receive by begging through the realm yearly 43,333 pounds, six shillings, eight pence sterling. Then showeth he that all this cast<sup>76</sup> together amounteth yearly far above the half of the whole substance<sup>77</sup> of the realm.

After this, presupposing as though he had proved it that the clergy hath the half, he then, to prove the two-hundredth part of that<sup>78</sup> they have were more than sufficient for them, taketh for his ground that if the number of them be compared with the number of laymen, the clergy be not the hundredth part; and that if they be compared with the lay men, women, and children, the clergy is not then the four-hundredth person of that number. And then intendeth he thereby to prove and conclude that since they have, as he saith, more than the half of altogether,<sup>79</sup> and be themselves not fully the four-hundredth part, therefore if that better half that they have were divided into two hundred parts, then were yet one part of those two hundred parts, as he thinketh, too much for them—specially because they labor not. After this, he gathereth a great heap of evils wherewith he beliieth<sup>80</sup> the clergy to bring them in displeasure of the King and hatred of the people.

And lest men should anything<sup>81</sup> esteem the clergy for the suffrages of their prayer in relief of us seely<sup>82</sup> Christian souls in purgatory, to take away that good mind out of good Christian men’s hearts, he laboureth to make the world ween<sup>83</sup> that there were no purgatory at all. Wherein, when he hath done what he can, then laboreth he to the King for a license to rail upon the clergy—saying that there is none other effectual remedy against them but<sup>84</sup> that it might please the King to give him and such others free license and liberty to defame the clergy at their pleasure among the people. For he saith that if any of them be punished anything in the temporal<sup>85</sup> laws, then they sore<sup>86</sup> trouble the laborers thereof by the spiritual<sup>87</sup> law, and then the heads of the clergy do so highly more than recompense the loss of their fellows<sup>88</sup> that they may be bold to do the like offense again at their pleasure.

And for to prove that it is always so, he layeth that it hath been so thrice, and as it shall after be showed, he lieth in all three. The first he layeth that the Bishop of London was in a great rage “for indicting of certain curates<sup>89</sup> of extortion and incontinency<sup>90</sup> the last year, in the wardmote quests.”<sup>91</sup> And for the second he layeth that Doctor Alen,<sup>92</sup> after that he was punished by Praemunire<sup>93</sup> for his contempt committed against the King’s temporal law, was therefor<sup>94</sup> by the bishops highly recompensed

52 living 53 physically suffering
54 greatly 55 find them meat: provide them with food 56 He . . . hunger: See A Supplication for the Beggars in CW 7: 412/3–10. The quotation here, as well as the quotations and paraphrases below, is from CW 7: 412–22. 57 ascribes; alleges 58 default in finding: lack of being provided for 59 to the only: solely to the 60 prayer-list, but here ironic since a bead-roll is normally a list of people to be prayed for, rather than blamed 61 assistants to the abbots in monasteries 62 assistants to the bishops 63 bishops not in charge of dioceses 64 members of religious orders who are not as strictly bound as monks, but more so than friars 65 priests authorized to collect money donated to obtain papal indulgences 66 ecclesiastical officers who summoned people to appear in the bishop’s or archdeacon’s court 67 violent; strong 68 the “third part”: one-third 69 privy tithes: tithes levied on eggs, fowl, and fruit 70 wills 71 an offering given for having a Mass said for a person who has died 72 payments to priests for funerals 73 cursing, citing: excommunicating, summoning to appear before an ecclesiastical court 74 absolving (either from sin or from ecclesiastical censure) 75 open reckoning: public calculation 76 put 77 wealth 78 what 79 everything 80 slanders 81 at all 82 poor; helpless 83 think 84 except 85 civil 86 grievously 87 ecclesiastical 88 fellow clergymen 89 parish priests 90 unchastity 91 wardmote quests: the inquests held in each ward in London 92 John Alen (1476–1534), at that time Cardinal Wolsey’s commissary 93 a statute that forbade appealing to any foreign court or authority, e.g., Rome 94 for that in benefices.<sup>95</sup> And for the third he layeth that Richard Hunne,<sup>96</sup> because he had sued a Praemunire against a priest for suing him in the spiritual court in a matter determinable in the King's court, was accused of heresy and committed to Bishop's Prison, where he saith that "all the world knoweth" that he was murdered by Doctor Horsey with his accomplices, then the Bishop's Chancellor, and that the same Doctor Horsey (he saith upon other men's mouths) "paid six hundred pounds for him and his accomplices," and after obtained the King's "most gracious pardon." Whereupon he saith the "captains" of the spirituality,<sup>97</sup> because he had "foughten so manfully against the King's crown and dignity," "promoted" him forth "with benefice upon benefice, to the value of four times as much." And by these examples he concludeth there will no such punishment serve against the spirituality, and also who that<sup>98</sup> justly punish a priest by the temporal law is unjustly troubled again<sup>99</sup> in the spiritual law. Whereof he would conclude that of necessity, for a special remedy, the King must needs grant a license to such lewd<sup>100</sup> fellows to rail upon them.

Then cometh he at last unto the device<sup>101</sup> of some remedy for the poor beggars—wherein he would in no wise have none hospitals made, because he saith that therein the profit goeth to the priests. What remedy then for the poor beggars? He deviseth nor desireth nothing to be given them, nor none other alms or help requireth<sup>102</sup> for them, but only that the King's Highness would first take from the whole clergy all their whole living, and then set them "abroad in the world to get them wives" and "to get their living with the labor" of their hands and "in the sweat of their faces," as he saith it is "the commandment of God" in the first chapter of Genesis,<sup>103</sup> and finally to tie them "to the carts to be whipped naked about every market town till they fall to labor."<sup>104</sup> And then if these petitions were once granted and performed, he showeth many great commodities<sup>105</sup> that would, as he saith, ensue thereupon, both to the King and the people, and

95 gifts; ecclesiastical livings 96 Richard Hunne: He was a merchant tailor in London who in 1511 refused to pay the funeral fee for burying his infant son. After Hunne filed a lawsuit against another priest over a real estate dispute, his own parish priest sued him for the funeral fee. After the Church court ruled against Hunne, he filed a Praemunire suit challenging the jurisdiction of that court. There were other lawsuits filed on both sides. Eventually, Hunne's home was raided, heretical materials were found, and he was imprisoned on the charge of heresy. He died in prison under suspicious circumstances in December 1514. 97 clergy 98 who that: whoever 99 in return 100 evil 101 devising 102 requests 103 See Gn 3:19. 104 fall to labor: start doing manual labor 105 advantages; to the poor beggars. Which things we shall, ere<sup>106</sup> we leave, in such wise repeat and ponder that your wisdoms<sup>107</sup> may consider and perceive in yourselves what good fruit would follow the speed<sup>108</sup> of his goodly supplication, whereof we have rehearsed<sup>109</sup> you the whole sum and effect.

Truth it is that many things wherewith he flourisheth<sup>110</sup> his matters to make them seem gay<sup>111</sup> to the readers at a sudden show, we leave out for the while<sup>112</sup> because we would,<sup>113</sup> ere we come thereto, that ye should first have the matter itself in short set forth before your eyes. And then shall we peruse his proofs and in such wise consider everything apart<sup>114</sup> that we nothing doubt but whoso<sup>115</sup> shall read his worshipful<sup>116</sup> writing after shall soon perceive therein flourishing without fruit, subtlety without substance, rhetoric without reason, bold babbling without learning, and wiliness without wit.<sup>117</sup> And finally, for the foundation and ground of all his proofs, ye shall find in his book not half so many leaves<sup>118</sup> as lies, but almost as many lies as lines.

And albeit<sup>119</sup> we lie here in that case<sup>120</sup> that about the examination and answering of such a mad malicious book we have neither lust<sup>121</sup> nor leisure to bestow the time, whereof misspent in our life we give now a hard and a heavy reckoning, yet not only the necessity of our cause driveth us to declare unto you the feebleness of his reasons wherewith he would bring you in the case to care nothing for us, believing that there were no purgatory, but also most specially doth our charity toward you stir us to show you the mischief that he mindeth<sup>122</sup> to yourselves as well in that point of infidelity as in all the remnant of his seditious book. In answering whereof, we would gladly let his folly and lack of learning pass if it were not more than necessary that all folk should perceive his little learning and less wit, lest simple folk, weening<sup>123</sup> him wise and well-learned, might unto their harm esteem his evil writing the better for their wrong opinion of his wit and learning. As for his malicious mind and untruth, there can no benefits 106 before 107 your wisdoms: you wise people 108 success 109 told 110 embellishes 111 fine, beautiful; enjoyable 112 time 113 desire 114 everything apart: each thing by itself 115 nothing... whoso: have no doubt that whoever 116 honorable 117 intelligence 118 pages 119 although 120 condition, state 121 desire 122 intends 123 thinking man look<sup>124</sup> that we should leave untouched but he that would rather the man were believed than answered, and would wish his bill sped<sup>125</sup> were it never so malicious and false.

5 For where he so deviseth his introduction as<sup>126</sup> all his purpose should have a great face of charity, by that he speaketh all in the name of the poor beggars, this is nothing else but the devil's drift,<sup>127</sup> always covering his poison under some taste of sugar.

10 As for us, we trust there will no wise man doubt what favor we bear to beggars as folk of their own fellowship and faculty,<sup>128</sup> and of all whom there be nowhere in the world neither so needy nor so sore<sup>129</sup> and so sick, nor so impotent and so sore<sup>130</sup> in pains, as we and that so far-forth<sup>131</sup> that if ye might see them all on the one side and but one of us on the other side, we be very sure that the world would pity one of us more than them all. But although we be more beggars than your beggars be, as folk daily
20 begging our alms of you and them both, yet envy we not them as one of them doth another, but we pray and require<sup>132</sup> you to give<sup>133</sup> them for our sakes, whereby your gift greatly comforteth us both. And they be also our proctors<sup>134</sup> and beg in our name, 25 and in our name receive your money, whereof we receive both your devotion and their prayers, so that ye may be well assured there could be put no bill nor supplication forth for their advantage which we would in any wise hinder, but very gladly further in 30 all that ever we might.

But in good faith, as our poor brethren the beggars be for many causes greatly to be pitied for their disease and sickness, sorrow, pain, and poverty, so do we much in this case sorrow their mishap that 35 they have not had at the leastwise so much fortune as to fall upon a wiser scrivener<sup>135</sup> to make their supplication; but upon such a one as under his great wiliness showeth so little wit that, beginning with a cloak of charity, doth by and by<sup>136</sup> no less disclose
40 his hatred and malice than if he nothing else had intended but to cast off the cloak and set out his malice naked to the show. Wherein like a beggars' proctor he goeth forth so nakedly that no beggar is there so bare of cloth or money as he showeth himself bare of faith, learning, troth,<sup>137</sup> wit, or charity. Which thing, as it already well appeareth to wise men, so will we make it evident to all men, taking 45 our beginning at the declaration of his untruth, which one thing well perceived will be sufficient to answer and overturn all his whole enterprise. Howbeit,<sup>138</sup> we neither shall need nor do purpose to cumber<sup>139</sup> you with rehearsal and reproof<sup>140</sup> of all his lies, for that were too long a work, whereof we fear

50 ye should be weary to abide the hearing. But of so many we shall pray you take patience while we show you some, and such as for the matter be requisite to be known, forasmuch as all his proofs be specially<sup>141</sup> grounded upon them.

And first, to begin where he beginneth, when he saith that the number of such beggars as he pretendeth to speak for—that is, as himself calleth them, “the wretched, hideous monsters, on whom,” he saith, “scarcely any eye dare look, the foul unhappy sort of lepers and other sore people, needy, impotent, blind, lame, and sick, living only of alms”<sup>142</sup>—
60 have their number now “so sore increased that all the alms of all the well-disposed people of the realm is not half enough to sustain them, but that for very constraint they die for hunger”—unto all those words of his, were it not that, though we well wist<sup>143</sup> ourselves he said untrue, yet would we be loath so 70 to lay as a lie to his charge anything whereof the untruth were not so plainly perceived but that<sup>144</sup> he might find some favorers which<sup>145</sup> might say he said true, else would we peradventure not let<sup>146</sup> to tell 75 him that, for a beginning, in these few words he had written two lies at once.

If we should tell you what number there was of poor sick folk in days passed long before your time, ye were at liberty not to believe us. Howbeit, 80 he cannot yet on the other side,<sup>147</sup> for his part neither, bring you forth a bead-roll<sup>148</sup> of their names, wherefore we must for both our parts be fain to remit<sup>149</sup> you to your own time, and yet not from your childhood (whereof many things men forget 85 when they come to far greater age), but unto the days of your good remembrance. And so doing, we suppose if the sorry sights that men have seen

124 expect 125 to meet with success
126 as if 127 scheme; device 128 occupation; power 129 physically suffering 130 grievously 131 so far-forth: to such an extent 132 pray and require: beg and ask 133 give to 134 representatives;

alms-collectors 135 scribe 136 by and by: immediately 137 trustworthiness; truth 138 However 139 burden 140 rehearsal and reproof: recounting and rebuttal 141 particularly 142 of alms: from charity 143 knew 144 but that:

unless 145 who 146 peradventure not let: perhaps not hesitate 147 hand 148 prayer list 149 fain to remit: obliged to refer had left as great impression still remaining in their hearts as the sight maketh of the present sorrow that they see, men should think and say that they have in days past seen as many sick beggars as they 5 see now. For as for other sicknesses, they reign not, God be thanked, but after such rate as they have done in times past. And then of the French pox, thirty years ago went there about sick, five against one that begeth with them now. Whereof, whoso

 10 list<sup>150</sup> to say that he seeth it otherwise, we will hold no great dispicions<sup>151</sup> with him thereupon, because we lack the names of both the sides to make the trial with. But surely whoso shall say the contrary, shall as we suppose either say so for his pleasure, 15 or else shall it fare by his sight as folks fare with their feeling; which what they feel they whine at, but what they have felt they have more than half forgotten, though they felt it right late.<sup>152</sup> Which maketh one that hath but a poor boil upon his finger think the grief more great than was the pain of a great botch<sup>153</sup> that grieved his whole hand little more than a month afore.<sup>154</sup> So that in this point of the number of sick beggars so sore<sup>155</sup> increased so late, albeit we will forbear so to say to him as we 20 might well say, yet will we be so bold to deny it him till he bring in some better thing than his bare word for the proof.

And in good faith, if he be put to the proof of the other point also — that is to wit,<sup>156</sup> that “for very constraint” those poor sick folk “die for hunger” — we verily<sup>157</sup> trust and think he shall seek far and find very few if he find any at all, for albeit that<sup>158</sup> poor householders have these dear years<sup>159</sup> made right hard shift<sup>160</sup> for corn, yet, our Lord be thanked, men 30 have not been so far from all pity as to suffer<sup>161</sup> poor impotent persons die at their doors for hunger.

Now whereas he saith that “the alms of all well-disposed people of this realm is not half enough to sustain them,” and the “well-disposed people”
 40 he calleth in this matter all them that giveth them alms, and he speaketh not of one year nor twain<sup>162</sup> but of these many years now passed, for neither be the number of the clergy nor their possessions nor the friars’ alms, in which things he layeth<sup>163</sup> 45 the cause why the alms of good people is not half sufficient to keep and sustain the poor and sick beggars from famishing, any great thing increased in these ten or twelve or twenty years last past, and therefore if that<sup>164</sup> he said were true, then by all these ten years at the least, the alms of good people hath not been half able to sustain the poor and sick beggars from famishing. And surely if that were so — that in four or five years in which was plenty of corn,<sup>165</sup> the poor and sick beggars, for lack of men’s alms, died so fast for hunger — though many should 55 fall sick never so fast again, yet had they in the last two dear years died up of likelihood almost every one. And whether this be true or not we purpose not to dispute, but to refer and report ourselves to every man’s eyes and ears, whether any man hear of so many dead or see so many the fewer.

When he hath laid these sure stones to begin the ground and foundation of his building with — that sore and sick beggars be so “sore increased” that the alms of all the good people of this realm “is not half enough to sustain them,” and that therefore by “very constraint” they daily “die for hunger” — upon them he layeth another stone: that the cause of all this evil is the great possessions of the spirituality,<sup>166</sup> and the great alms given to the friars.
 70

But herein first he layeth that — besides tithes and all such other profits as rise unto the Church by reason of the spiritual<sup>167</sup> law or of men’s devotion — that they have “the third part of all” the temporal<sup>168</sup> lands of the realm. Which, whoso<sup>169</sup> can tell as much of the revenues of the realm as he can tell little that made the book, doth well know that though they have much, yet is the “third part of all” far another thing, and that he saith in this point untrue.
 75

Then goeth he to the poor friars. And there, as we told you, he showeth that the alms given them of certainty amounteth yearly unto 43,333 pounds, six shillings, eight pence, sterling. Peradventure<sup>170</sup> men would ween<sup>171</sup> the man were some apostate and that he never could be so privy to the friars’ reckoning but if<sup>172</sup> he had been long their limiter<sup>173</sup> and seen some general view of all their whole accounts. But surely since the man is bad enough besides, we would be loath folk should reckon him for apostate, for surely he was never friar for aught<sup>174</sup> 80
 85 90

150 whoso list: whoever chooses, desires 151 debates 152 right late: very recently 153 swelling 154 before 155 greatly 156 say 157 truly 158 albeit that:
 although 159 dear years: years of scarcity 160 right hard shift: every effort 161 allow 162 two 163 alleges 164 what 165 grain 166 clergy

 167 ecclesiastical; canon 168 secular
 169 whoever 170 perhaps 171 suppose

172 but if: unless 173 friar licensed to beg within certain boundaries 174 anything that we know, for we never wist<sup>175</sup> that ever in his life he was half so well disposed. And also when ye hear the ground of his reckoning, ye will yourselves think that he neither knoweth much of their matters, and of all the realm beside make as though he knew many things for true which many men know for false.

For first he putteth for the ground of his reckoning that there are in the realm two-and-fifty thousand parish churches, which is one plain lie to begin with. Then he putteth that every parish, one with another,<sup>176</sup> hath ten households in it — meaning besides such poor houses as rather ask alms than give; for of such, ye wot<sup>177</sup> well, the friars get no quarterage.<sup>178</sup> And that point, albeit that the ground be not sure, yet because it may to many men seem likely, therefore we let it pass. But then he showeth further for a sure truth a thing that all men know surely for a great lie: that is to say, that of every household in every parish, “every of<sup>179</sup> the five orders of friars” hath every quarter a penny. For we know full well, and so do many of you too, first, that the common people speak but of four orders — the White,<sup>180</sup> the Black,<sup>181</sup> the Augustinian, and the Grey<sup>182</sup> — and which is the fifth, in many parts of the realm few folk can tell you.

For if the question were asked about, there would be peradventure<sup>183</sup> founden many more, the more pity it is, that could name you the Green friars<sup>184</sup> than the Crutched.<sup>185</sup> Ye know right well also that in many a parish in England, of forty households ye shall not find four pay neither five pence a quarter nor four neither, and many a parish never a penny. And as for the five pence quarterly, we dare boldly say that ye shall find it paid in very few parishes through the realm, if ye find it paid in any. And yet this thing, being such a stark lie, as many men already knoweth and every man shortly may find it, he putteth as a plain well-known truth for a special post<sup>186</sup> to bear up his reckoning.

For upon these grounds now maketh he a clear reckoning in this manner ensuing, which is good also to be known for folk that will learn to cast account:<sup>187</sup>

There be 52,000 parishes; and in each of them ten households. So have ye the whole sum of the households, five hundred thousand and twenty thousand. Even just.<sup>188</sup> Go now to the money, then. Every order of the five orders of friars hath of<sup>189</sup> every of these households a penny a quarter. Summa:<sup>190</sup> for every house among all the five orders, every quarter, five pence; and hereby may ye learn that five times one maketh five. Now this is, he showeth you, among the five orders of every house for the whole year twenty pence, and so learn ye there that four times five maketh twenty.

“Summa,” saith he: “five hundred thousand and twenty thousand quarters of angels.”<sup>191</sup> Here we would<sup>192</sup> not that because the realm hath no coin called the “quarter angel,” ye should therefore so far mistake the man as to ween<sup>193</sup> that he meant so many quarter sacks of angels. For indeed (as we take him), by the naming and counting of so many “quarters of angels,” he meaneth nothing else but to teach you a point of reckoning and to make you perceive and know that twenty pence is the fourth part<sup>194</sup> of six shillings, eight pence. For after that rate it seemeth that he valueth the angel noble.<sup>195</sup> Then goeth he forth with his reckoning and showeth you that “five hundred thousand and twenty thousand quarters of angels maketh two hundred threescore<sup>196</sup> thousand half angels.” And by this, lo, ye may perceive clearly that he meant not quarter sacks of angels, for then they would have held, ye wot<sup>197</sup> well, many more pieces of forty pence than forty times this whole sum cometh to. Then he showeth you further that “260,000 half angels amount just<sup>198</sup> unto 130,000 angels,” wherein every man may learn that the half of sixty is thirty and that the half of twain<sup>199</sup> is one. Finally then he casteth it all together and bringeth it into pounds. “Summa totalis:<sup>200</sup> forty-three thousand pounds, three hundred and thirty-three pounds, six shillings, eight pence.”

But here, to continue the plainness of his reckoning, he forgot to tell you that three nobles make twenty shillings, and that twenty shillings make a pound. But who can now doubt of this reckoning

175 knew 176 one with another: on average 177 know 178 quarterly payment 179 every of: each of; every one of 180 Whitefriars; Carmelites 181 Blackfriars; Dominicans 182 Greyfriars; Franciscans 183 perhaps 184 Green friars: Reformed Franciscans at Greenwich

185 Friars of the Holy Cross 186 pillar 187 cast account: do accounting 188 Even just: Just so 189 from 190 Total 191 angels: The angel, or angel noble (see below), was a gold coin with St. Michael the Archangel engraved on it. 192 wish 193 think 194 the fourth part: one-fourth

(there were 12 pennies to a shilling and 20 shillings to a pound) 195 For... noble: The angel had been revalued by the King in 1526, going from 6 shillings, 8 pence, to 7 shillings, 6 pence. 196 sixty 197 know 198 exactly 199 two 200 Summa totalis: Grand total

when it cometh so round that of so great a sum he leaveth not out the odd noble?

But now since all this reckoning is grounded upon two false grounds—one, upon 52,000 parish churches; the other, that every of the five orders hath every quarter, of every household, a penny—this reckoning of 43,333 pounds, six shillings, eight pence, seemeth to come much like to pass as if he would make a reckoning with you that every ass hath eight ears. And for to prove it with, bear you first in hand<sup>201</sup> that every ass hath four heads, and then make Summa: four heads. Then might he boldly tell you further that every ass head hath two ears, for that is commonly true except<sup>202</sup> any be cut off. Summa then: two ears, and so summa totalis: eight ears. At this account of eight ears of one ass, ye make a lip<sup>203</sup> and think it so mad that no man would make no such. Surely it were a mad count indeed; and yet, as mad as it were, it were not so mad by half as is his sad<sup>204</sup> and earnest count that he maketh you now so solemnly of the friars' quarterage.<sup>205</sup>

For this should he ground but upon one lie, where he groundeth the other upon twain<sup>206</sup> as open lies as this and as great. Now might we, and we would, say that all his reckoning were nought,<sup>207</sup> because he reckoneth twenty pence for the quarter of the angel, and all the remnant of his reckoning followeth forth upon the same rate. But we would be loath to put him in the fault that he deserve not. For surely it might be that he was not ware<sup>208</sup> of the new valuation, for he ran away<sup>209</sup> before the valuation changed.

But now upon this great sum of 43,333 pounds, six shillings, eight pence—upon these good grounds heaped up together, he bringeth in his ragman's roll<sup>210</sup> of his rude<sup>211</sup> rhetoric against the poor friars, beginning with such a great exclamation that we heard him hither,<sup>212</sup> and suddenly were all afraid when we heard him cry out so loud, "O grievous and painful exactions thus yearly to be paid, from the which the people of your noble progenitors, ancient Britons, ever stood free." And so goeth he forth against the poor friars with "Danes" and "Saxons" and "noble King Arthur," and "Lucius the Emperor," the Romans, the Greeks, and the great Turk, showing that all these had been utterly marred and never had been able to do nothing in the war, if their people had given their alms to friars.

After his railing rhetoric ended against the friars, then this sum of 43,333 pounds, six shillings, eight pence he addeth unto all the others that he said before that all the clergy hath besides; which he summeth not, but saith that this and that together amount unto more between them "than half of the whole substance<sup>213</sup> of the realm." And this he affirmeth as boldly as though he could reckon the whole revenues and substance of all England, as readily as make the reckoning of his beggar's purse.

Then showeth he that this better half of the whole substance is shifted<sup>214</sup> among fewer than the four-hundredth part of the people. Which he proveth by that he saith that all the clergy compared unto the remnant of the men only, be "not the hundredth person;"<sup>215</sup> and if they be compared unto the remnant of "men, women, and children," so "are they not," he saith, "the four-hundredth person." But now some folk that have not very long ago, upon great occasions, taken the reckoning of priests and religious places in every diocese, and on the other side, the reckoning and the number of the temporal men<sup>216</sup> in every county, know well that this man's mad reckoning goeth very far wide,<sup>217</sup> and seemeth that he hath heard these wise reckonings at some congregation of beggars. And yet, as though because he hath said it he had therefore proved it, he runneth forth in his railing rhetoric against the whole clergy and that in such a sort and fashion that very hard it were to discern whether it be more false or more foolish.

For first, all the faults that any lewd<sup>218</sup> priest or friar doth, all that layeth he to the whole clergy, as well and as wisely as though he would lay the faults of some lewd lay people to the default<sup>219</sup> and blame of all the whole temporality.<sup>220</sup> But this way liketh him so well that thus laying to the whole clergy the faults of such as be simple<sup>221</sup> and faulty therein, and yet not only laying to their charge the breach of chastity and abuse in fleshly living of such as be naught,<sup>222</sup> but also madly, like a fond<sup>223</sup> fellow, laying much more to their charge and much more earnestly reproving the good and honest living of those that be good, whom he rebuketh and

201 bear you first in hand: tries first to make you believe 202 unless 203 face 204 serious 205 quarterly payment 206 two 207 nothing; worthless 208 aware 209 ran away: i.e.,

from England 210 ragman's roll: list of complaints 211 unskilled; ignorant; harsh 212 here (in purgatory) 213 wealth 214 apportioned 215 i.e., not even 1 percent 216 temporal men: lay people

217 goeth very far wide: is far from accurate 218 wicked 219 fault 220 laity 221 ignorant; deficient 222 wicked 223 foolish abhorreth because they keep their vows and persevere in chastity—for he saith that they be the marrers and destroyers of the realm, bringing the land into wilderness for lack of generation by their ab-5 staining from wedding—then aggrieveth<sup>224</sup> he his great crimes with heinous words, gay repetitions, and grievous exclamations, calling them “blood-suckers” and “drunken in the blood” of holy martyrs and saints, which he meaneth for the condemn-10 ing of holy heretics. “Greedy golofers”<sup>225</sup> he calleth them, and “insatiable whirlpools,” because the temporalty hath given them possessions, and give to the friars their alms. And all virtuous good priests and religious folk he calleth “idle holy thieves” because 15 they spend their time in preaching and prayer.

And then saith he:

These be they that make so many sick and sore<sup>226</sup> beggars. These be they that make these whores and bawds. These be they that make these thieves.
 20 These be they that make so many idle persons.
 These be they that corrupt the generations. And these be they that with the abstaining from wedding hinder so the generation of the people that the realm shall at length fall in wilderness but if<sup>227</sup> 25 they wed the sooner.

And now upon these heinous crimes laid unto the whole clergy—and laid, as every wise man seeth, some very falsely, and some very foolishly—after his goodly repetitions he falleth to his great 30 and grievous exclamations, crying out upon the “great, broad, bottomless ocean sea of evils,” and upon the “grievous shipwreck of the commonwealth,” the translating<sup>228</sup> of the King’s kingdom, and the “ruin of the King’s crown.” And there-35 with rolling in his rhetoric from figure to figure, he falleth to a vehement invocation of the King, and giveth him warning of his great loss, asking him fervently, “Where is your sword, power, crown, and dignity become?” As though the King’s Grace had 40 clean lost his realm specially for lack of people to reign upon, because that priests have no wives. And surely the man cannot fail of such eloquence, for he hath gathered these goodly flowers out of Luther’s garden almost word for word, without any more labor but only the translating out of the Latin into the English tongue. 45

But to inflame the King’s Highness against the Church, he saith that the clergy laboreth nothing else but to make the King’s subjects “fall into disobedience and rebellion” against his Grace. 50

This tale is a very likely thing. As though the clergy knew not that there is nothing earthly that so much keepeth themselves in quiet, rest, and surety,<sup>229</sup> as doth the due obedience of the people to the virtuous mind of the prince, whose high good-55 ness must needs have much more difficulty to defend the clergy and keep the Church in peace if the people fell to disobedience and rebellion against their prince. And therefore every child may see that the clergy would never be so mad as to be glad 60 to bring the people to disobedience and rebellion against the prince, by whose goodness they be preserved in peace, and were, in such rebellion of the people, likely to be the first that should fall in peril.
 But neither is there desired by the clergy, nor never 65 shall by God’s grace happen, any such rebellion as the beggars’ proctor<sup>230</sup> and his fellows, whatsoever they say, long full sore<sup>231</sup> to see.

But this man against the clergy fetcheth forth old fern<sup>232</sup> years and runneth up<sup>233</sup> to King John’s 70 days,<sup>234</sup> spending much labor about the praise and commendation of that good gracious king, and crying out upon the pope that then was, and the clergy of England, and all the lords and all the commons<sup>235</sup> of the realm, because King John, as 75 he saith, made the realm “tributary” to the Pope;
 wherein he meaneth, peradventure,<sup>236</sup> the Peter Pence.<sup>237</sup> But surely therein is all his hot accusation a very cold tale when the truth is known. For so is it indeed that, albeit there be writers that say the 80 Peter Pence were granted by King John for the release of the interdiction, yet were they paid indeed ere<sup>238</sup> ever King John’s great-grandfather was born, and thereof is there proof enough. Now if he say, as indeed some writers say, that King John made 85 England and Ireland tributary to the Pope and the See Apostolic by the grant of a thousand marks,<sup>239</sup> we dare surely say again<sup>240</sup> that it is untrue, and that all Rome neither can show such a grant nor 90 never could, and if they could, it were right nought

224 aggravates 225 gluttons 226 physically suffering 227 but if: unless 228 transferring, removing 229 safety, security 230 representative; agent; alms-collector 231 full sore: very greatly 232 fern years: far bygone times 233 runneth up: goes back 234 King John’s days:

 He reigned 1199–1216. 235 commoners

236 perhaps 237 Peter Pence: a collection taken in every parish and sent to Rome 238 before 239 A mark was half of a pound. 240 in reply

worth.<sup>241</sup> For never could any king of England give away the realm to the pope, or make the land tributary, though he would;<sup>242</sup> nor no such money is there paid, nor never was. And as for the Peter

5 Pence, if he mean them, neither was the realm tributary by them, nor King John never granted them. For they were paid before the Conquest<sup>243</sup> to the Apostolic See toward the maintenance thereof, but only by way of gratitude and alms.

10 Now, as for the Archbishop Stephen,<sup>244</sup> whom, he saith, being a traitor to the King, the Pope<sup>245</sup> made Archbishop of Canterbury against the King's will, therein be there, as we suppose, two lies at once. For neither was that Stephen ever traitor against the 15 King, as far as ever we have heard, nor the Pope none otherwise made him Archbishop than he made all others at that time. But the same Stephen was well and canonically chosen Archbishop of Canterbury by the convent of the monks at Christ's Church in

20 Canterbury, to whom, as the King well knew and denied it not, the election of the Archbishop at that time belonged. Nor the King resisted not his election because of any treason that was laid<sup>246</sup> against him, but was discontented therewith;<sup>247</sup> and after that his election was passed and confirmed by the Pope, he would not of long season suffer<sup>248</sup> him to enjoy the bishopric because himself had recommended another unto the monks, whom they rejected, and preferred Stephen. And that this is as

25 we tell you, and not as the beggars' proctor writeth for a false foundation of his railing, ye shall mow<sup>249</sup> perceive not only by diverse chronicles but also by diverse monuments<sup>250</sup> yet remaining as well of the election and confirmation of the said Archbishop as of the long suit and process<sup>251</sup> that after followed thereupon.

Now showeth he himself very wroth<sup>252</sup> with the spiritual<sup>253</sup> jurisdiction, which he would<sup>254</sup> in any wise<sup>255</sup> were clean taken away, saying that it must

40 needs destroy the jurisdiction temporal.<sup>256</sup> Whereas the good princes past have granted, and the nobles in their times and the people too have by plain

Parliaments confirmed them,<sup>257</sup> and yet hitherto,<sup>258</sup> blessed be God, they<sup>259</sup> agree better together than to fall at variance for the wild words of such a malicious makebate<sup>260</sup> — which, for<sup>261</sup> to bring the spirituality into hatred, saith that they call their jurisdiction a “kingdom.” In which word he may say his pleasure, but of truth, he seldom seeth any spiritual man<sup>262</sup> at this day that so calleth any spiritual jurisdiction that he useth.<sup>263</sup>

Now where this man useth as a proof thereof that the spirituality nameth themselves always before the temporality, this manner of naming cometh not of them but of the good mind<sup>264</sup> and devotion of the temporality — so far-forth<sup>265</sup> that at the Parliament, when that any acts be conceived, the words be commonly so couched that the bill saith it is enacted first by our Sovereign Lord the King, and by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons,<sup>266</sup> in that present Parliament assembled. And these bills be often drawn, put forth, and passed first in the Common House, where there is not one spiritual man present.

But such truth as the man useth in this point, such useth he where he calleth the poor friars' alms an “exaction,” surmising that it is exacted by force and the people compelled to pay it, where every man well wotteth<sup>267</sup> that they have, poor men, no way to compel no man to give them aught,<sup>268</sup> not though<sup>269</sup> they should die for default.<sup>270</sup> But this good honest true man saith that whoso will not pay the friars their quarterage, they will make him be taken<sup>271</sup> as a heretic. We be well content that ye take this for no lie, as many as ever have known it true. But who

75 heard ever yet that any man taken for a heretic did so much as once say that he thought it conveyed<sup>272</sup> by the malice of any friar for refusing to pay the friar's quarterage? This lie, lo, is a little too loud<sup>273</sup> for any man that were not waxen<sup>274</sup> shameless.

Like truth is there in this that he saith: if any man trouble a priest for any temporal suit, the clergy forthwith<sup>275</sup> will make him a heretic and burn him but if he be content<sup>276</sup> to “bear a fagot<sup>277</sup>

241 were right nought worth: would be altogether worthless 242 though he would: even if he wanted to 243 the Norman Conquest of 1066 244 Stephen Langton (ca. 1155–1228) 245 Pope Innocent III (1161–1216) 246 alleged 247 i.e., with the monks' choosing of Langton 248 of long season suffer: for a long time allow 249 be able to 250 official records

251 suit and process: legal proceedings 252 angry 253 ecclesiastical 254 wishes 255 way 256 civil 257 the legal rights of the Church 258 yet hitherto: still to this day 259 the clergy and the lay people 260 troublemaker 261 in order to 262 spiritual man: clergyman 263 exercises 264 disposition; judgment 265 so far-forth: to such an extent 266 House of Commons 267 knows 268 anything 269 even if 270 lack 271 arrested and taken into custody 272 brought about 273 flagrant 274 become 275 immediately 276 but if he be content: unless he is willing 277 bear a fagot: carry a bundle of sticks for their pleasure.” The falsehood of this cannot be unknown. For men know well in many a shire how often that many folk indict priests of rape at the sessions.<sup>278</sup> And as there is sometimes a rape committed indeed, so is there ever a rape surmised,<sup>279</sup> were the women never so willing, and oftentimes where there was nothing done at all. And yet of any such that so procured priests to be indicted, how many have men heard taken and accused for heretics? Ye see not very many sessions pass, but in one shire or other this pageant<sup>280</sup> is played; whereas through<sup>281</sup> the realm, such as be put to penance for heresy be not so many in many years as there be priests indicted in few years. And yet of all such so taken for heresy, he shall not find four this four-score<sup>282</sup> years, peradventure<sup>283</sup> not this four hundred years, that ever pretended themselves so troubled for indicting of a priest, so that his lie is herein too large to get any cloak to cover it.

Now where he saith that the captains of Doctor Alen’s kingdom have heaped him up benefice<sup>284</sup> upon benefice, and have rewarded him ten times as much as the five hundred pounds which he paid for a fine by the Praemunire, and that thus hath the spirituality<sup>285</sup> rewarded him because he fought so manfully against the King’s crown and his dignity—all that know the matter do well perceive that the man doth in this matter as he doth in others: either lieth for his pleasure or else little wotteth how that the matter stood. For it is well known that Doctor Alen was in the Praemunire pursued<sup>286</sup> only by spiritual men and had much less favor and much more rigor showed him therein by the greatest of the clergy than by any temporal men.

He saith also to the King’s Highness, “Your Grace may see what a work there is in London, how the Bishop rageth for indicting of certain curates<sup>287</sup> of extortion and incontinency<sup>288</sup> the last year in the wardmote quest.”<sup>289</sup> Would not upon these words every stranger ween<sup>290</sup> that there had been in London many curates indicted of extortion and rape, and that the Bishop would labor sore<sup>291</sup> to defend their faults, and that there were about that matter a great commotion in all the city? How shameless is he that can tell this tale in writing to the King’s Highness, for a truth, whereof neither bishop nor curate nor mayor nor alderman nor any man else ever heard word spoken? It were hard to say whether we should take it for wiliness or lack of wit<sup>292</sup> that he saith all this work was in the city “the last year,” and then his book neither was put up<sup>293</sup> to the King, nor beareth any date, so that a man would ween he were a fool that so writeth of “the last year” that the reader cannot wit<sup>294</sup> which year it was. But yet ween we he doth it for a wiliness. For since he knoweth his tale false, it is wisdom to leave the time unknown, that his lie may be uncontrolled.<sup>295</sup> For he would that men should<sup>296</sup> ween always that it was in one year or other.

But finally for a special point he bringeth in Richard Hunne, and saith that if he had not “commenced an action of Praemunire against a priest, he had been yet alive and none heretic at all.” Now is it of truth well known that he was detected<sup>297</sup> of heresy before the Praemunire sued or thought upon. And he began that suit to help to stop the other withal,<sup>298</sup> as indeed it did for the while. For albeit that<sup>299</sup> he that was sued in the Praemunire was nothing belonging to<sup>300</sup> the Bishop of London, before whom Richard Hunne was detected of heresy, yet, lest such as would be glad sinisterly to misconstrue everything toward the blame of the clergy might have occasion to say that the matter were hotly handled against him to force him to forbear his suit of the Praemunire, the Bishop therefore did the more forbear till it appeared clearly to the temporal judges and all that were anything<sup>301</sup> learned in the temporal law that his suit of the Praemunire was nothing worth in the King’s Law, forasmuch as by plain statute the matter was out of question that the pleas to be held upon mortuaries<sup>302</sup> belong unto the spiritual court. After which thing well appearing, the matter went forth afore<sup>303</sup> the Bishop,<sup>304</sup> and he<sup>305</sup> there well proved naught,<sup>306</sup> and his books after brought forth, such, and so noted with his own hand in the margins, as every wise man well saw what he was, and was full sorry to see that he was such as they there saw him proved.

278 court sessions 279 alleged 280 show 281 throughout 282 cighty
283 perhaps 284 gift; ecclesiastical living 285 ecclesiastical authorities
286 prosecuted 287 parish priests
288 unchastity 289 wardmote quest: an inquest held in each ward in London

290 stranger ween: foreigner think 291 hard 292 intelligence 293 put up: submitted (since all books in England were legally required to obtain a license from the King) 294 know 295 untested for accuracy 296 would... should: wants men to 297 accused 298 with it; thereby 299 albeit that: although 300 nothing belonging to: not at all under the jurisdiction of 301 at all 302 upon mortuaries: about payments to priests for funerals 303 before 304 Cuthbert Tunstall 305 Hunne (was) 306 wicked

Now goeth he further and asketh the King,

Did not Doctor Horsey and his accomplices most heinously, as all the world knoweth, murder in prison that honest merchant Richard Hunne, for that<sup>307</sup> he sued your writ of Praemunire against a 5 priest that wrongfully held him in plea in a spiritual court, for a matter whereof the knowledge belonged unto your high courts? And what punishment hath he for it? After that he had paid, 10 as it is said, six hundred pounds for him and his accomplices, as soon as he had obtained your most gracious pardon, he was immediately promoted by the captains of his kingdom with benefice upon benefice, to the value of four times as 15 much. Who is he of their kingdom that will not rather take courage to commit like offense, seeing the promotions that fell to such men for their so offending?—so weak and blunt is your sword to strike at one of the offenders of this crooked and 20 perverse generation!

We have here somewhat cumbered<sup>308</sup> you with a piece of his own words, because ye should have a show of his vehement eloquence, with which the bold beggars' proctor so arrogantly presumeth in 25 his bill to ask the King a question, and to bind his Highness to answer as<sup>309</sup> his Mastership appointed him. For if his Grace say nay, then he telleth him before that "all the world" wotteth yes. But surely if he call "all the world" all that ever God made, 30 then is there three parts<sup>310</sup> that knoweth the contrary. For we dare be bold to warrant you that in heaven, hell, and here among us in purgatory, of all that this man so boldly affirmeth, the contrary is well and clearly known. And if he call "the world" 35 but only men among you there living upon middle earth,<sup>311</sup> yet so shall he peradventure<sup>312</sup> find in some part of the world, if he seek it well, more than four or five good honest men that never heard speak of the matter. And of such as have heard of the mat-40 ter and known it well, he shall find enough—and specially, we think, the King's Grace himself (whose Highness he is so homely<sup>313</sup> to ask the question and appoint him his answer himself)—that of all five things which he hath here in so few lines affirmed, there is not one true, but lies every one. 45

For first, to begin where he leaveth, when he saith that the clergy have, since the death of Richard Hunne, "promoted" Doctor Horsey with "benefice upon benefice," "four times as much" as "six hundred pounds"—the plain untruth of this point may 50 every man soon know that will soon inquire. For he liveth yet at Exeter, and there liveth upon such as he had before, without that new heap of benefices given him by the "captains of his kingdom" for killing of Richard Hunne—or thanks, either, save only 55 of<sup>314</sup> God for his long patience in his undeserved trouble. But to the end that ye may see how little this man forceth<sup>315</sup> how loud the lie, consider that he saith that the clergy gave unto Doctor Horsey, after he came out of prison, "benefice upon bene- 60 fice, to the value of four times as much" as "six hundred pounds." Now, if this be true, then hath Doctor Horsey had in benefices—besides all such as he had before his trouble—the value of two thousand four hundred pounds. We trust that the man, his 65 substance,<sup>316</sup> and his livelihood is so well known that we need not to tell that the beggars' proctor<sup>317</sup> in this point hath made one loud lie.

Another is that he saith that Hunne was kept in plea in the spiritual<sup>318</sup> law for a matter determinable 70 in the King's court; for the matter was for a mortuary,<sup>319</sup> which by plain statute is declared to pertain to the spiritual law. The third is that Hunne was "honest"—except<sup>320</sup> heresy be honest. The fourth is that "Doctor Horsey and his accomplices" 75 murdered him in prison; for thereof is the contrary well known, and that the man hanged himself for despair, despite,<sup>321</sup> and for lack of grace. We might, and we would, lay for the fifth the payment which he speaketh of: the "six hundred pounds," 80 with which money he would men should ween<sup>322</sup> that he bought his pardon. Wherein he layeth<sup>323</sup> a good great sum, to the end that folk, well witting<sup>324</sup> that Doctor Horsey was not like<sup>325</sup> to have so much money of his own, should ween therewith that the 85 clergy laid<sup>326</sup> out the money among them, and then gave him benefices whereof he might pay them again.<sup>327</sup> But this<sup>328</sup> layeth he from<sup>329</sup> himself, and 307 for that: because 308 burdened 309 as if 310 three parts: three-fourths of it 311 middle earth: so called because it is a place between the high region (heaven) and the lower regions (hell and purgatory) 312 perhaps 313 familiar;

direct 314 from 315 cares 316 wealth
317 advocate; representative; alms-collector
318 ecclesiastical 319 payment to a priest for a funeral 320 unless 321 spite;

malice 322 would... ween: wants people to think 323 asserts; alleges 324 knowing 325 likely 326 paid 327 back 328 i.e., this supposition 329 away from

showeth not to whom;<sup>330</sup> for he saith “it is said” so. And yet were it no wrong that it were accounted his own, till he put it better from<sup>331</sup> him, and prove of whom he heard it.

5 Howbeit,<sup>332</sup> since there is other store enough, we shall leave this lie in question between him and we wot nere<sup>333</sup> whom else, and we shall for the fifth lay you that lie that he layeth forth himself: that is to wit,<sup>334</sup> where he saith that the Chancellor purchased
10 the King’s “most gracious pardon” for the murdering of Hunne. For this is the truth: that he never sued<sup>335</sup> any pardon therefor;<sup>336</sup> but after that the matter<sup>337</sup> had been by long time and great diligence so far-forth<sup>338</sup> examined that the King’s Highness at 15 length (as time always trieth<sup>339</sup> out the truth) well perceived his innocency, and theirs also that were accused and indicted with him, his noble Grace, when they were arraigned upon that indictment, and thereto pleaded that they were not guilty, com-
20 manded his attorney general to confess their plea to be true; which is the thing that his Highness, as a most virtuous prince, useth for<sup>340</sup> to do when the matter is not only just, but also known for just, upon the part of the party defendant. Because that, like<sup>341</sup>
25 as where the matter appeareth doubtful, he doth, as reason is,<sup>342</sup> suffer<sup>343</sup> it to go forth and letteth the truth be tried, so where he seeth and perceiveth the right to be on the other side, his Highness will in no wise<sup>344</sup> have the wrong set forth or maintained in 30 his name. Now when it was then thus indeed — that neither the Chancellor nor any man else ever sued any charter of pardon for the matter — this is then the fifth lie that this man hath made in so few lines. Which things, whoso well consider cannot but marvel of the sore pithy<sup>345</sup> point wherewith he knitteth up all his heavy matter, saying to the King, “Who is there of their kingdom that will not take courage to commit like offense, seeing the promotions that fall to such men for their offending? — so weak and so 35 blunt is your sword to strike at one of the offenders of this crooked and perverse generation!”

Lo, how this great zelator of the commonwealth crieth out upon the King, that his sword is not strong and sharp to strike off innocents’ heads! He hath of likelihood ransacked up all Dame Rhetoric’s rolls to find out this goodly figure — to call 45 upon the King and ask his Highness, “Where is your sword?” and tell him his sword is too dull — as though he would bid him bear it to the cutler’s to grind,<sup>346</sup> that he might strike off Doctor Horsey’s

50 head, whom his Grace had found faultless, and testified him himself for an innocent. If this man were here matched with some such as he is himself — that hath the eloquence that he hath, that could find out such comely<sup>347</sup> figures of rhetoric as he findeth, set 55 forth and furnished with such vehement words as he thundereth out like thunder blasts, that hath no less matters in his mouth than the “great, broad, bottomless ocean sea full of evils,” the weakness and dullness of the King’s sword, the translation<sup>348</sup> of 60 the King’s kingdom, the “ruin of the King’s crown,” with great exclamations (“O grievous and painful exactions!” “O case most horrible!” “O grievous shipwreck of the commonwealth!”) — what might one that had such like eloquence say here to him?
65 Surely so much, and in such wise, as we seely poor puling<sup>349</sup> souls neither can devise nor utter.

But verily,<sup>350</sup> two or three things we see and may well say: that neither be these great matters meet<sup>351</sup> for the mouth of the beggars’ proctor; nor 70 such preaching of reformation and amendment of the world meet matters for him to meddle with, which,<sup>352</sup> with open heresies and plain pestilent errors busily goeth about to poison and infect the world; nor very convenient<sup>353</sup> for him to take upon
75 him<sup>354</sup> to give counsel to a king, when he showeth himself to have so much presumption and so little wit<sup>355</sup> as to ask the King a question and appoint him his answer — and therein to tell him that “all the world” knoweth that thing to be true which the 80 King hath himself already, by his attorney and his judges in open judgment<sup>356</sup> and in his high court of record, testified and confessed<sup>357</sup> for false. If that man were not for malice as mad, not as a March hare but as a mad dog that runneth forth and 85 snatcheth he seeth not at whom, the fellow could never else<sup>358</sup> with such open folly so suddenly oversee<sup>359</sup> himself.

330 showeth not to whom: says not to whom (he ascribes this allegation) 331 away from 332 However 333 wot nere: know not 334 say 335 petitioned; sought to obtain 336 for that 337 case 338 so far-forth: to such an extent

339 sifts 340 useth for: makes it his practice 341 just 342 as reason is: as stands to reason 343 allow 344 way 345 sore pithy: very small 346 sharpen 347 pretty 348 transference, removal 349 seely poor puling: poor pitiful crying

350 truly 351 appropriate 352 who 353 appropriate 354 himself 355 sense 356 open judgment: a public trial 357 testified and confessed: attested and acknowledged 358 otherwise 359 fail to perceive

But it were wrong with the world if malice had as much wit, circumspection, and providence<sup>360</sup> in the pursuit of an ungracious<sup>361</sup> purpose, as it hath haste, evil will, and wiliness in the first enterprising.<sup>362</sup> For as an ape hath some similitude of a man, and as a fox hath a certain wiliness somewhat resembling an unperfect wit, so fareth this fellow, that beginneth, as one would ween, at<sup>363</sup> good zeal and charity borne toward the poor beggars, but forthwith<sup>364</sup> he showeth himself that he nothing else intendeth but openly to destroy the clergy first, and after that, covertly, as many as have aught<sup>365</sup> above the state of beggars. And whereas he would in the beginning, by the touching<sup>366</sup> of great matters, fain<sup>367</sup> seem very wise, within a while in the progress he proveth himself a very stark fool. And where he would seem to show many notable things which no man had marked but he, he provideth wisely that no man may believe him, he maketh so many lies; and all that ever he doth further, he buildeth upon the same.

He layeth<sup>368</sup> that the living which the clergy hath is the only cause that there be so many beggars that be sick and sore.<sup>369</sup> Very well and wisely — as though the clergy by their substance<sup>370</sup> made men blind and lame! The clergy also is the cause, he saith, why they “die for hunger” — as though every layman gave to beggars all that ever he could, and the clergy give them never a groat;<sup>371</sup> and as though there would not more beggars walk abroad if the clergy left off<sup>372</sup> such laymen as they find.<sup>373</sup>

But he proveth you that the clergy must needs be the cause why there be so many poor men and beggars. For he saith that before the clergy came in, there were but few poor people — and yet they begged not neither, but men, he saith, gave them “enough unasked.” But now, where sat he when he saw the people give poor folk so fast their alms unasked that no man needed to beg, before the clergy began? This man of likelihood is of great age, and, or ere<sup>374</sup> the clergy began, was wont<sup>375</sup> to sit at Saint Savior’s with a sore leg; but he begged not, men gave him so much unasked. For whereas he allegeth<sup>376</sup> the Bible for him, in the Acts of the Apostles,<sup>377</sup> verily we marvel much what the man meaneth. For there he may see that the apostles and the deacons, which were then the clergy, had altogether in their own hands, and distributed to every man as themselves thought good. And therefore we wonder what he meaneth, to speak of that book. For we think that he meaneth not to hurt the clergy so now as to put all into their hands. And surely but if<sup>378</sup> he mean so, else<sup>379</sup> is this place nothing for his purpose.

Now herein he showeth also a high point of his wit: where he saith that the great living that the clergy hath, which he layeth<sup>380</sup> and lieth to be more than half of the whole revenues and substance<sup>381</sup> of the realm, is shifted<sup>382</sup> among fewer than the four-hundredth part of the people. As though that of the clergy’s part there had<sup>383</sup> no lay people their living — no servant any wages, none artificer<sup>384</sup> any money for working, no carpenter, no mason any money for building — but all the money that ever cometh in their hands, they put it by and by<sup>385</sup> in their own bellies, and no layman hath any relief thereof. And therefore this point was wisely written, ye see as well as we.

Now for the truth thereof: If it were true that<sup>386</sup> he saith, that the clergy compared to the residue of the men only be not one to a hundred, then shall ye not need to fear the great Turk and<sup>387</sup> he came tomorrow — except ye suffer<sup>388</sup> among you to grow in great number these Lutherans that favor him. For we dare make you the warrantise<sup>389</sup> that if his lie be true, there be more men a great many in London and within four shires next adjoining than the great Turk bringeth into Hungary.

But in this ye must hold him excused, for he meddleth not much with algorism,<sup>390</sup> to see to what sum the number of men ariseth that is multiplied by a hundred. All his practice in multiplication meddleth with nothing but lies; and therein match him with whom ye will, he will give you a hundred for one. Whereof if ye lack, let this be the example: that he saith, “If the Abbot of Westminster should sing every day as many Masses for his founders as he is bounden to do by his foundation,<sup>391</sup> a thousand monks were too few.” Ye doubt not, we think, but he can tell you who hath bound them to how

360 prudent foresight 361 devoid of spiritual grace; wicked 362 attempt 363 with 364 immediately 365 anything 366 treating 367 desire to 368 alleges 369 physically suffering 370 wealth 371 a coin worth four pence

372 left off: abandoned 373 provide a living for (by employing them) 374 or ere: before 375 accustomed 376 allegeth... him: cites the Bible to support him 377 See Acts 4:34–35. 378 but if: unless 379 otherwise 380 alleges 381 wealth

382 distributed 383 received 384 craftsman 385 by and by: directly 386 what 387 if 388 allow 389 guarantee 390 arithmetic 391 founding charter

many, and so can make ye the plain reckoning that the Abbot is bound in the year to no fewer Masses than 365,000. He knoweth what is every man's duty save<sup>392</sup> his own. He is meet<sup>393</sup> to be a beggars' proctor,<sup>394</sup> that can so prowle about and can tell all things.

5 But now were all his painted process,<sup>395</sup> ye wot well, nothing worth but if<sup>396</sup> he devised against all these mischiefs some good and wholesome help. It is therefore a world<sup>397</sup> to see what politic<sup>398</sup> devices he findeth against the "great, broad, bottomless ocean sea of evils" — what remedies to repair the ruin of the King's crown, to restore and uphold his honor and dignity, to make his sword sharp and strong, and, finally, to save all the "shipwreck of the commonwealth." Ye would peradventure ween<sup>399</sup> that the man would now devise some good wholesome laws for help of all these matters. Nay, he will none thereof. For he saith he doubteth that the King is not able to make any law against them. For he saith that the clergy is stronger in the Parliament than the King himself. For in the higher House, he reckoneth that the spirituality<sup>400</sup> is more in number and stronger than the temporality.<sup>401</sup> And in the Common House he saith that "all the learned men of the realm" except the King's "learned council" be feed with<sup>402</sup> the Church to speak against the King's crown and dignity in the Parliament for them, and therefore he thinketh the King unable to make any law against the faults of the clergy.

30 This beggars' proctor would fain<sup>403</sup> show himself a man of great experience, and one that had great knowledge of the manner<sup>404</sup> and order used in the King's Parliaments. But then he speaketh so savorly<sup>405</sup> thereof that it well appeareth, of his wise words, he neither canneth any skill<sup>406</sup> thereof, nor never came in the House. For as for the higher House, first, the King's own royal person alone more than counterpoiseth<sup>407</sup> all the lords spiritual present with him and the temporal too. And over<sup>408</sup> this, the spiritual lords can never in number exceed the lords temporal, but must needs be far underneath them if it please the King. For his Highness may call thither by his writ many more temporal lords at his own pleasure.

And being as they be, there was never yet seen 45 that the spiritual lords banded themselves there as a party against the temporal lords. But it hath been seen that the thing which the spiritual lords have moved and thought reasonable, the temporal lords have denied and refused, as appeareth upon the 50 motion made for legitimation of the children born before the marriage of their parents. Wherein, albeit that<sup>409</sup> the reformation which the lords spiritual moved was a thing that nothing pertained to their own commodity,<sup>410</sup> and albeit that they laid<sup>411</sup> also for their part<sup>412</sup> the constitution and ordinance of the Church and the laws of other Christian countries, yet could they not obtain<sup>413</sup> against the lords temporal that<sup>414</sup> nothing alleged<sup>415</sup> to the contrary but their own wills. And therefore in the 60 higher House the spiritual party never appeared yet so strong that they might overmatch the temporal lords. And then how much are they too feeble for them and the King too — whose Highness alone is over-strong for them both, and may by his writ call to his Parliament more temporal lords when he will.

Now where he saith that in the Common House "all the learned men" of the realm are feed<sup>416</sup> to speak for the clergy except the King's "learned council," there be two follies at once. For neither be all 70 the learned men of the realm knights or burgesses in the Common House, and the King's "learned council" is not there at all. And therefore it seemeth that he hath heard somewhat of<sup>417</sup> some men that had seen as little as himself. And surely if he had been in 75 the Common House (as some of us have been), he should have seen the spirituality not gladly spoken for. And we little doubt but that ye remember acts and statutes passed at sundry Parliaments such, and in such wise and some of them so late,<sup>418</sup> as yourselves may see that either the clergy is not the stronger party in the King's Parliament, or else have no mind<sup>419</sup> to strive.

And for the further proof that the King's Highness is not so weak and unable in his own Parliament as this beggars' proctor so presumptuously telleth him, his Grace well knoweth, and all his people too, that in their own convocations his Grace 85

392 except 393 fit 394 representative; advocate; alms-collector 395 painted process: deceptive line of argument 396 but if: unless 397 wonder 398 scheming, crafty; prudent 399 peradventure ween: perhaps think 400 clergy 401 laity

402 feed with: hired by 403 gladly 404 custom 405 wisely 406 canneth... skill: has any knowledge 407 balances in power, counterbalances 408 beyond 409 albeit that: although 410 advantage 411 cited 412 side (in the debate)

413 prevail 414 who 415 cited as evidence 416 hired for a fee 417 somewhat of: something from 418 recently 419 intention never devised nor desired anything in his life that ever was denied him. And therefore this gay<sup>420</sup> invention of this beggars' proctor — that he feigneth the King's Highness to be in his high court of Parliament more weak and feeble than the clergy — is a very feeble device.<sup>421</sup>

But now since he will have no law devised for the remedy of his great complaints, what help hath he devised else? <sup>422</sup> The help of all this gear<sup>423</sup> is, he saith, none other thing but to let him and such royal railers rail and jest upon the Church, and tell the people the priests' faults — and for the lewdness<sup>424</sup> of part, bring the whole clergy in contempt and hated among all the temporal folk. Which thing, he saith, the King must needs suffer<sup>425</sup> if he “will eschew<sup>426</sup> the ruin of his crown and dignity.” And this thing, he saith, shall be more “speedful”<sup>427</sup> and effectual “in the matter than all the laws that ever can be made, be they never so strong.”

Lo, good Lords and Masters,<sup>428</sup> then shall ye need no more Parliaments! For here is, God be thanked, an easy way wisely founden to remedy with railing the “great, broad, bottomless ocean sea of evils,” and to save the commonwealth from shipwreck, and the King's crown from ruin.

But now to the poor beggars. What remedy findeth their proctor for them? To make hospitals? Nay, wary of that; thereof he will none in no wise.<sup>429</sup> For thereof he saith “the more the worse,” because they be profitable to priests. What remedy then? Give them any money? Nay, nay, not a groat.<sup>430</sup> What other thing then? Nothing in the world will serve but this: that “if the King's Grace will build a sure<sup>431</sup> hospital that never shall fail to relieve” all the sick beggars forever, let him give nothing to them, but look what the clergy hath, and take all that from them.

Is not here a goodly mischief for a remedy? Is not this a royal feast, to leave these beggars meatless,<sup>432</sup> and then send more to dinner to them?<sup>433</sup> Oh, the wise! Here want<sup>434</sup> we voice and eloquence to set out an exclamation in the praise and commendation of this special high provision. This bill putteth he forth in the poor beggars' name. But we verily<sup>435</sup> think if themselves have as much wit as their proctor lacketh, they had liefer<sup>436</sup> see their bill-maker burned than their supplication sped.<sup>437</sup> For they may soon perceive that he mindeth not<sup>438</sup> their alms, but only the spoil<sup>439</sup> of the clergy. For so that<sup>440</sup> the clergy lose it, he neither deviseth further, nor further forceth<sup>441</sup> who have it.

But it is easy to see whereof springeth all his displeasure. He is angry and fretteth at the spiritual jurisdiction for the punishment of heretics and burning of their erroneous books, for ever upon that string he harpeth: very angry with the burning of Tyndale's testament.<sup>442</sup> For these matters he calleth them “blood-suppers<sup>443</sup> drunken in the blood of holy saints and martyrs.” Ye marvel peradventure<sup>444</sup> which “holy saints and martyrs” he meaneth. Surely by his “holy saints and martyrs” he meaneth their holy schismatics and heretics, for<sup>445</sup> whose just punishment these folk that are of the same sect fume, fret, froth, and foam, as fierce and as angrily as a new-hunted sow. And for the rancor conceived upon this displeasure cometh up all his complaint of the possessions of the clergy. Wherein he spareth and forbearth<sup>446</sup> the nuns yet,<sup>447</sup> because they have no jurisdiction upon<sup>448</sup> heretics; for else he would have cried out upon their possessions too.

But this is now no new thing, nor the first time that heretics have been in hand with<sup>449</sup> the matter. For first was there, in the eleventh year of King Henry the Fourth, one John Badby<sup>450</sup> burned for heresy. And forthwith<sup>451</sup> thereupon was there at the next Parliament, held the same year, a bill put in declaring how much temporal land was in the Church, which reckoning the maker thereof guessed at by the number of knights' fees, of which he had weened<sup>452</sup> he had made a very just account. And in this bill was it devised to take their possessions out again.<sup>453</sup> Howbeit,<sup>454</sup> by the bill it appeared well unto them which well understood the matter that the maker of the bill neither wist<sup>455</sup> what land there was, nor how many knights' fees there was in the Church, nor well what thing a knight's fee

420 brilliant; excellent 421 plan; scheme 422 instead 423 matter 424 wickedness 425 allow 426 avoid 427 successful 428 Lords and Masters: titles of the members of the upper and lower houses of Parliament, respectively 429 way 430 a coin worth four pence 431 safe, secure 432 without food 433 to them: in addition to them 434 lack 435 truly 436 had liefer: would rather 437 succeed 438 mind-eth not: cares not for 439 despoiling; plundering 440 so that: so long as 441 cares 442 translation of the New Testament 443 bloodsuckers 444 perhaps 445 on account of 446 leaves alone 447 still 448 over 449 been... with: taken up 450 a follower of Wycliffe executed in 1410 451 immediately 452 thought 453 out again: back out 454 However 455 knew is; but the bill devised of<sup>456</sup> rancor and evil will by some such as favored Badby, that<sup>457</sup> was burned, and would have his heresies fain<sup>458</sup> go forward.

And so that bill, such as it was, such was it esteemed and set aside for nought.<sup>459</sup> So happed it then, soon after, that in the first year of the King's most noble progenitor King Henry the Fifth, those heresies secretly creeping on still among the people, a great number of them had first covertly conspired and after openly gathered and assembled themselves, purposing by open war and battle to destroy the King and his nobles and subvert the realm, whose traitorous malice that good Catholic king prevented,<sup>460</sup> withstood, overthrew, and punished by many of them taken in the field,<sup>461</sup> and after, for their traitorous heresies, both hanged and burned. Whereupon, forthwith, at the Parliament held the same year, likewise<sup>462</sup> as that royal prince, his virtuous nobles, and his good Christian commons<sup>463</sup> devised good laws against heretics, so did some of such as favored them eftsoons<sup>464</sup> put in the bill against the spirituality. Which, eftsoons considered for such as it was, and coming of such malicious purpose as it came, was again rejected and set aside for nought.

Then was there long after that one Richard Hundon<sup>465</sup> burned for heresy. And then forthwith were there a rabble of heretics gathered themselves together at Abingdon, which<sup>466</sup> not intended to lose any more labor by putting up of bills in the Parliaments, but to make an open insurrection and subvert all the realm, and then to kill up<sup>467</sup> the clergy and sell priests' heads as good cheap<sup>468</sup> as sheep's heads—three for a penny, buy who would. But God saved the Church and the realm both, and turned their malice upon their own heads. And yet after their punishment, then were there some that renewed the bill again.

And yet long after this was there one John Goose roasted at the Tower Hill.<sup>469</sup> And thereupon, forthwith, some other john-goose<sup>470</sup> began to bear that bill abroad again, and made some gaggling a while, but it availed him not. And now because some heretics have been of late abjured,<sup>471</sup> this gosling therefore hath made this beggars' bill, and gaggles again upon the same matter—and that, as he thinketh, by a proper<sup>472</sup> invention likely to speed now (because he maketh his bill in the name of the beggars), and his bill couched as full of lies as any beggar swarmeth full of lice.

We neither will nor shall need to make much business about this matter. We trust much better in the goodness of good men than that we should need for this thing to reason against an unreasonable body. We be sure enough that good men were they that gave this gear<sup>473</sup> into the Church, and therefore naught<sup>474</sup> should they be of likelihood that would pull it out thence again. To which ravin<sup>475</sup> and sacrilege, our Lord, we trust, shall never suffer<sup>476</sup> this realm to fall.

Holy Saint Augustine in his days, when he perceived that some evil people murmured at the possessions that then were given into his church, did, in an open<sup>477</sup> sermon among all the people, offer them their lands again,<sup>478</sup> and that his church and he would forsake them,<sup>479</sup> and bade them take them who would. And yet was there not founden in all the town—albeit that<sup>480</sup> the people were (as these Africans be) very barbarous, fierce, and boistous<sup>481</sup>—yet was there none, as we say, founden anyone so bad that his heart would serve him to enter into one foot.<sup>482</sup>

When Pharaoh, the king of Egypt, bought up in the dear years<sup>483</sup> all the lands that were in every man's hand, so that all the people were fain<sup>484</sup> to sell their inheritance for hunger, yet, idolater as he was, he would never suffer, for any need, the possessions of the priests to be sold, but made provision for them beside,<sup>485</sup> and suffered them to keep their lands still, as the Bible beareth witness.<sup>486</sup> And we verily trust that the good Christian princes of the Christian realm of England shall never fail of more favor toward the clergy of Christ than had that prince idolater to the priests of his idols. Yet is it not enough to the cruel mind of this man to take from the whole clergy all that ever they have,

456 devised of: was made out of 457 who 458 gladly 459 for nought: as nothing 460 anticipated 461 taken in the field: taken captive on the battlefield 462 just 463 members of the House of Commons 464 for a second time 465 Richard Hundon: executed 1430 466 who

467 off 468 as good cheap: for as cheap a price 469 And yet... Hill: executed 1474 470 a male goose 471 of late abjured: recently made to recant 472 fine 473 stuff, matter 474 bad 475 pillage 476 allow 477 public 478 back 479 forsake them: give them up

480 albeit that: although 481 savage 482 i.e., a measure of any of those properties 483 dear years: years of dearth or famine 484 obliged 485 separately 486 See Gn 47:13, 20–22.

but that he would further have them bounden unto carts and whipped, to drive them to labor.<sup>487</sup>

Of all thieves is this one of the worst and most cruel kind. For of all thieves men most abhor them that,<sup>488</sup> when they have taken a man's money from him, then take and bind him and beat him too. But yet is this wretch much worse. For he fareth<sup>489</sup> as a cruel thief that would, without respect of his own commodity,<sup>490</sup> take a man's money from him and cast it he care not where, and then bind the man to a tree and beat him for his pleasure. O, the charity!

But he saith he would have them whipped to compel them to labor and "get their living in the sweat of their faces." And this would he not, good man, but for fulfilling of God's commandment. For he saith that it is commanded them in the first chapter of Genesis. And therefore is he therein so indifferent that he excepteth none, but calleth the best but idle holy thieves, and so would have them all robbed and spoiled, bounden and beaten, to compel them to work with their hands, to "get their living in the sweat of their faces" for the fulfilling of God's commandment. Among this company that he would suddenly send forth new-robbed, with right nought<sup>491</sup> left them, is there many a good man that hath lived full godly many a fair day, and duly served God and prayed for us (which we have well found), many an old man, many a sore<sup>492</sup> sick man, and many blind and many lame too. All which, as soon as they be driven out of their own doors, this charitable man would be very well content to see them bounden and beaten too, because they be of the clergy. For exception maketh he none in this world.

He layeth unto the charge of the clergy that they live idle all, and that they be all bound to labor and get their living in the sweat of their faces by the precept that God gave to Adam in the first chapter of Genesis. Here this man showeth his cunning. For if this be so, then were the priests in the Old Law bound thereto as well as is the clergy now. And then how happed it that of this point there was no mention made by Moses? How happed it that God in that law provided them much larger living than he did the lay people? And that, such kind of living as declared that his pleasure was that they should live out of labor and upon the labor of other men's hands?<sup>493</sup> The holy apostle Saint Paul, although himself in some places forbore to take his living freely, but rather chose to live of his own labor than to be in their danger which would haply<sup>494</sup> have said that he preached because he would live at ease thereby — and this did he specially to put such false apostles to silence as for such desire of idle living fell somewhere<sup>495</sup> to false preaching — yet neither did he so in every place, and also confessed and said that he might well and lawfully have done the contrary, affirming it for good reason that he that serveth the altar should live of the altar, and saying also, "If we sow unto you spiritual things, is it a great thing if we reap your carnal things?"<sup>496</sup> Now, Christ his own mouth said unto the people that they should not leave their duties unpaid unto the priests.<sup>497</sup> And this good Christian man would have them all clean taken from them, and yet the priests well beaten too.

He reckoneth all the clergy idle because they labor not with their hands till their faces sweat. But our Savior Christ reckoned far otherwise in blessed Mary Magdalene, whose idle sitting at her ease and hearkening<sup>498</sup> he accounted and declared for better business than the busy stirring and walking about of his good hostess Martha, which was yet of all worldly business occupied about the best, for she was busy about alms and hospitality, and the guesting<sup>499</sup> of the best poor man and most gracious guest that ever was guested in this world.<sup>500</sup>

Now if this cannot yet content this good man because of God's commandment given unto Adam that he should eat his bread in the sweat of his face, then would we fain wit<sup>501</sup> whether himself never go to meat<sup>502</sup> till he have wrought so sore<sup>503</sup> with his hands that his face sweateth. Surely we believe he laboreth not so sore before every meal. But yet it were not good to trust his answer, for he will haply say yes, and not let for<sup>504</sup> one lie among so many. Howbeit,<sup>505</sup> he thinketh it peradventure<sup>506</sup> enough for him that he sitteth and studieth till he sweat in seeking out old heresies and devising new. And verily if he look<sup>507</sup> that such business should serve him for a discharge of hand labor,<sup>508</sup> much better may we

487 i.e., manual labor 488 who 489 acts 490 profit 491 right nought:
absolutely nothing 492 grievously
493 See Lv 7:32-36; Nm 5:9-10; 18:20-21, 35:2-8; Dt 18:1-4. 494 perhaps

495 fell somewhere: resorted in some places 496 1 Cor 9:11 497 See Mt 8:4; Mk 1:44; Lk 5:14. 498 listening carefully 499 hosting 500 See Lk 10:38-42. 501 fain wit: like to know 502 dinner 503 wrought so sore:

worked so hard 504 let for: refrain from 505 However 506 perhaps 507 expects 508 discharge... labor: exemption from manual labor

think discharged thereof many good men whom he would have beaten thereto, living their lives in fasting, prayer, and preaching, and studying about the truth.

5 But it is good to look betimes<sup>509</sup> what this beggars' proctor meaneth by this commandment of hand labor that he speaketh of. For if he confess that it bindeth not every man, then is it laid to no purpose against the clergy. For there was a small clergy when 10 that word was said to our first father, Adam. But now, if he call it a precept, as he doth, and then will that it extend unto all the whole kind<sup>510</sup> of man, as a thing by God commanded unto Adam and all his offspring, then, though he say little now, he meaneth to go further hereafter than he speaketh of yet. For if he might first have the clergy put out of their living, and all that they have clean taken from them, and might have them joined to these beggars that be now, and, over<sup>511</sup> that, added unto them and sent 15 a-begging too, all those that the clergy find<sup>512</sup> now full honestly — this pageant<sup>513</sup> once played, and his beggars' bill so well sped<sup>514</sup> — then, when the beggars should have so much less living and be so many more in multitude, surely likewise<sup>515</sup> as for the beggars he now maketh his bill to the King's Highness against bishops, abbots, priors, prelates, and priests, so would he then, within a while after, make another bill to the people against merchants, gentlemen, kings, lords, and princes, and complain that 20 they have all, and say that they do nothing for it but live idle, and that they be commanded in Genesis to live by the labor of their hands in the sweat of their faces, as he saith by<sup>516</sup> the clergy now. Wherein if they ween<sup>517</sup> that they shall stand in other case than the clergy doth now, they may peradventure sore<sup>518</sup> deceive themselves. For if they will think that their case shall not be called all one because they have lands and goods to live upon, they must consider so hath the clergy too. But that is the thing that 25 this beggars' proctor complaineth upon, and would have them taken away.

Now if the landed men<sup>519</sup> suppose that their case shall not seem one with the case of the clergy because they shall haply think that the Church hath their possessions given them for causes which they fulfill not, and that if their possessions happen to be taken from them, it shall be done upon that ground, and so the lay landed men out of that fear<sup>520</sup> because they think that such like occasion and ground and consideration faileth and cannot be found in them 30 and their inheritance, surely if any man, clerk or lay, have lands in the gift whereof hath been any condition adjoined which he fulfilleth not, the giver may well with reason use therein such advantage as the law giveth him. But on the other side,<sup>521</sup> whoso will

35 advise princes or lay people to take from the clergy their possessions, alleging matters at large<sup>522</sup> — as laying to their charge that they live not as they should, nor use not well their possessions, and that therefore it were well done to take them from them by 40 force and dispose them better — we dare boldly say whoso giveth this device,<sup>523</sup> as now doth this beggars' proctor, we would give you counsel to look well what will follow. For he shall not fail, as we said before, if this bill of his were sped, to find you
45 soon after in a new supplication new bald<sup>524</sup> reasons enough that should please the people's ears, wherewith he would labor to have lords' lands and all honest men's goods to be pulled from them by force and distributed among beggars. Of which there
50 should, in this wise that he deviseth, increase and grow so many that they should be able for a sudden shift<sup>525</sup> to make a strong party. And surely as the fire ever creepeth forward and laboreth to turn all into fire, so will such bold beggars as this is never cease
55 to solicit and procure all that they can, the spoil<sup>526</sup> and robbery of all that aught<sup>527</sup> have, and to make all beggars as they be themselves.

We be content that ye believe us not but if it have<sup>528</sup> so proved already by those uplandish<sup>529</sup> Lutherans that rose up in Almain.<sup>530</sup> Which,<sup>531</sup> being once raised by such seditious books as is this Beggars' Supplication, and such seditious heretics as is he that made it, set first upon spiritual prelates. But shortly thereupon they so stretched unto the temporal princes that they were fain<sup>532</sup> to join, in aid of themselves, with those whom they laughed at first to see them put in the peril — hoping to have had the profit of their loss, till they saw that they were likely to lose their own with them. And for all the 60
65 70
75 80 85
90

509 next 510 race 511 in addition to 512 employ 513 scene on a stage 514 met with success 515 just 516 about 517 think 518 greatly 519 landed men: men possessed of land 520 out of that fear: are not afraid 521 hand 522 alleging matters at large: making general allegations 523 advice 524 meager, paltry 525 for a shift: for want of something better 526 despoiling, plundering 527 anything 528 but if it have: except that it has been 529 rustic 530 Germany (a reference to the Peasants' Revolt of 1525) 531 Who 532 obliged punishment that they pursued<sup>533</sup> upon those rebellious persons — of whom there were in one summer slain above sixty thousand — yet is that fire rather covered than quenched, because they suffered<sup>534</sup> it creep forth so far at first that dissension grew thereby among the lords themselves, as there can never lack some needy ravenous landed men that shall be ready to be captains in all such rebellions, as was the Lord Cobham called Oldcastle, sometime a captain of heretics in England in the days of King Henry the Fifth.<sup>535</sup> And surely there would soon follow some sore change in the temporalty if this beggars' proctor have his malicious supplication sped against the spirituality.

But yet, lest folk should abhor his hard heart and cruelty, the man tempereth his matter with a goodly visage of the sore inward sorrow that he taketh for the diminishment of mankind, and with the great zeal that he beareth to generation<sup>536</sup> for the good increase of Christian people in the land. For he would for that cause in any wise that all the clergy should have wives. For he asketh the King's Highness (as the man hath caught a great pleasure to appose<sup>537</sup> the King, wherein he useth a figure of rhetoric that men call "sauce malapert"<sup>538</sup>), "what an infinite number of people might have been increased to have peopled your realm, if this sort of folk had been married like other men."

This matter that priests must needs have wives he bringeth in diversely in three or four places. And among others he hath one wherein he showeth, in railing against the clergy, a principal part of his excellent eloquence. For there he useth his royal figure of rhetoric called "repetition," repeating often, by<sup>539</sup> the whole clergy, "these be they" in the beginning of his clause: "These be they that have made a hundred thousand idle whores in your realm;" "These be they that corrupt the generation of mankind in your realm;" "These be they" that draw men's wives into incontinency in your realm. And after diverse of such "these be theys," he concludeth and knitteth up the matter with his accustomed vehemence fetched out of Luther's volumes, asking, "Who is able to number the great broad bottomless ocean sea full of evils that this mischievous and sinful generation bringeth up upon us?" As though all the whole clergy were of this condition and no man else but they! But among all his "these be theys," this is one which, as the sorest<sup>540</sup> and the most vehement, he setteth in the forefront of them all: "These be they that by their abstaining from marriage do let<sup>541</sup> the generation of the people, whereby all the realm at length,<sup>542</sup> if it should be continued, shall be made desert and uninhabitable."

Lo, the deep insight that this beggars' proctor hath in the "broad bottomless ocean sea full of evils" to save the "grievous shipwreck of the commonwealth." He seeth far farther than ever Christ was aware of, or any of his blessed apostles, or any of the old holy fathers of Christ's faith and religion since his holy ascension hitherto, till now that Luther came of late and Tyndale after him, and spied out this great secret mystery that neither God nor good man could espy. If their abstaining from marriage should make all the land "desert" and "uninhabitable," how happeth it that habitation endureth therein so long? For the land hath lasted since the beginning of their abstaining from marriage, ye wot<sup>543</sup> well, many a fair day. And now if, their abstaining from marriage notwithstanding, the land hath been upholden with the generation of you that are the temporalty so long, ye shall likewise hereafter, by God's grace and the help of good prayers for keeping the land from wilderness, be able to get children still yourselves, and shall not need to call neither monks nor friars to help you.

Now if it be so that the clergy be, as he saith, but the hundredth part of the men, and yet not so much neither, there is not then so great peril of the land to fall to wilderness, but that the ninety-nine parts may maintain it populous, though the hundredth part abstain. But he, for to show that he hath not left his anxious favor toward his native country though he be run away from it for heresy, feareth sore<sup>544</sup> lest the hundredth part forbearing marriage, all the ninety-nine parts shall not be able so to preserve it with generation, but that it shall wax,<sup>545</sup> not only deserted, but also (whereof we most wonder) uninhabitable: that is to say, such as of itself shall not be able<sup>546</sup> for man's habitation. But

533 inflicted 534 allowed 535 as was . . . Fifth: Sir John Oldcastle, a Lollard, was imprisoned for heresy in 1413, but escaped. He then raised a rebel army and was involved in several plots to overthrow the King. He was captured in 1417, and executed on December 14 that year. 536 procreation 537 interrogate

538 sauce malapert: impudent sauciness 539 about 540 worst 541 prevent, hinder 542 at length: eventually 543 know 544 greatly 545 become 546 suitable

he peradventure<sup>547</sup> taketh “unhabitable” for desert, desolate, and not inhabited, because<sup>548</sup> men should see that he can so roll in his rhetoric that he wotteth not what his own words mean.

5 And somewhat yet is it to be considered that in such part of his book that he would have it appear that their living<sup>549</sup> is too much, there he would make it seem that they were very few. And where he would have them take wives, he would have 10 them seem so many that their abstaining from marriage were able to bring all the land into desolation and wilderness. And thus he handleth either part so wisely that there lacketh him nothing earthly therein but even a pennyweight of wit. For fault
15 whereof, his wily folly foreseeeth not that one part of his process<sup>550</sup> ever impugne<sup>551</sup> another. For they that were right now so small a part of people that a little would suffice for their living be now suddenly so many that if they were married, “infinite number 20 of people,” he saith to the King, would increase to people his realm with.

Now if that be true—that of them alone, if they were married, so infinite number of people would increase that it would make the realm populous—
25 then either are they, contrary to his count, more than the hundredth part (for one out of a hundred is no very perceivable miss, nor one added to a hundred no very perceivable increase), or else, if they be but the hundredth part, as he made his reckon-
30 ing right now, yet if it be then true that<sup>552</sup> he saith since—that of the hundredth part married, so infinite number of people might increase to people the realm—then can he not deny but that of the ninety-nine parts there may grow ninety-nine times
35 “infinite number of people.” And then, that being so, though the clergy, being (as he saith) but the hundredth part, never marry, yet shall the poor fool not need to wake and wax lean<sup>553</sup> for fear of the realm falling to wilderness. In which, he seeth that 40 there may of the ninety-nine parts residue<sup>554</sup> grow and increase ninety-nine times “infinite number of people” to make the land populous.

Yet marvel we much of one thing: that in all his fear that generation should fail because the clergy 45 marrieth not, he seeth no man unmarried in all the realm but them. How many servants? How many tall serving men are there in the realm that might, if men saw such a sudden necessity, rather marry than the clergy that have vowed to God the contrary? But he forceth<sup>555</sup> not so much for the matter 50 that he maketh his pretext as he doth indeed to have all vows void, that he might get Luther some lewd companions in England.

But now what if this good man had the rule of this matter, and would put out all the clergy and 55 bid them go wed? He should peradventure find some that would not much stick<sup>556</sup> thereat; but they should be of the worst sort, and such as now be slander of their order, and whom it were most need to keep from generation, lest evil crows bring 60 you forth evil birds. But as for the good priests and good religious whose children were like<sup>557</sup> to be best and to be best brought up, they would not marry for breach of their vows. And thus should ye have the naughty<sup>558</sup> generations increase, whereof there 65 be too many already, and of the better never the more.

What would this good man do now with good folk of the clergy, that would not marry? He would of likelihood bind them to carts and beat them, and 70 make them wed in the waniand.<sup>559</sup> But now, what if women will not wed them, namely since he sendeth them out with right nought,<sup>560</sup> saving<sup>561</sup> slander, shame, and villainy? What remedy will he find therefor?<sup>562</sup> He will of likelihood compel the 75 women to wed them; and if the wench be nice and play the wanton<sup>563</sup> and make the matter strange,<sup>564</sup> then will he beat her to bed too.

Surely we cannot but here confess the truth: These nice<sup>565</sup> and wanton words do not very well<sup>566</sup>
80 with us; but we must pray God and you to pardon us. For in good faith, his matter of monks’ marriages is so merry and so mad that it were able to make one laugh that lieth in the fire, and so much the more in how much he more earnestly presseth
85 upon the King in this point, to have in any wise the clergy robbed, spoiled, bounden, beaten, and wedded. Whereby what opinion he hath of wedding ye may soon perceive, for ye see well that if he thought it good, he would not wish it them.<sup>567</sup>
90

547 perhaps 548 so that 549 income
550 line of argument 551 contradicts
552 what 553 wake...lean: lose sleep and become thin 554 remainder 555 cares

556 hesitate 557 likely 558 wicked
559 in the waniand: with a vengeance
560 right nought: absolutely nothing 561 except 562 for that 563 nice...

wanton: coy and dally 564 make... strange: make difficulties; seem unwilling 565 loose-mannered 566 do...well: are not appropriate 567 for them

Many that read his words ween<sup>568</sup> that he were some merry mad guest, but he seemeth us far otherwise. For except<sup>569</sup> he were a wondrous sad<sup>570</sup> man of himself, he could never speak so earnestly in so mad a matter.

Yet one thing would we very fain wit<sup>571</sup> of him: When he had robbed, spoiled, bounden, beaten, and wedded all the clergy, what would he then? Should any of them be curates of men's souls and preach and minister the sacraments to the people or not?

If they should, it were a very strange fashion to rob him, bind him, and beat him on the one day, and then kneel to him, and confess to him, and receive the Sacrament of his hand on the other day — reverently hear him preach in the pulpit, and then bid him go get him home and clout<sup>572</sup> shoes. Either he must mean to have it thus (which none honest man could endure to see) or else (of which twain<sup>573</sup> we wot nere well whether<sup>574</sup> is the worse) he intendeth to have all holy orders<sup>575</sup> accounted as nothing, and to have no more sacraments ministered at all, but whereas soon after Christ's ascension his Church buried the ceremonies of the Jews' synagogue with honor and reverence, so would he now that Christian people should kill and cast out on a dunghill the blessed sacraments of Christ with villainy, rebuke, and shame. And surely to tell you the truth, this is his very<sup>576</sup> final intent and purpose, and the very mark that he shooteth at, as a special point and foundation of all Luther's heresies, whereof this man is one of the banner bearers.

And therefore here would his own high sore words have good place against himself. For this mischievous device<sup>577</sup> of his is indeed a "great broad bottomless ocean sea full of evils" wherein would not fail the "grievous shipwreck of the commonwealth," which God would soon forsake if the people once forsook his faith and contemned his holy sacraments, as this beggars' proctor laboreth to bring about. Which thing his device and conveyance<sup>578</sup> well declareth, although he forbear<sup>579</sup> expressly to say so far, because of the good and gracious Catholic mind that he well knoweth, and by his Grace's excellent writings perceiveth, to be borne by the King's Highness to the Catholic faith. For which, he covereth his malicious intent and purpose toward the faith under the cloak of many temporal benefits that he saith should succeed and follow to the King's Highness and his realm if these his high politic devices were once by his Grace agreed.

For in the end of all his bill, he gathereth his high commodities<sup>580</sup> together, saying that if the King take all from the clergy, set them abroad at the wide world with right nought to wed and take wives, and make them labor for their living till they sweat; bind them to carts and beat them well — he saith to the King in the beggars' names:

Then shall as well the number of our foresaid monstrous sort, as of the bawds, whores, thieves, and idle people, decrease. Then shall these great yearly exactions cease. Then shall not your sword, power, crown, dignity, and obedience of your people be translated<sup>581</sup> from you. Then shall you have full obedience of your people. Then shall the idle people be set awork. Then shall matrimony be much better kept. Then shall the generation<sup>582</sup> of your people be increased. Then shall your commons<sup>583</sup> increase in riches. Then shall none take our alms from us. Then shall the gospel be preached. Then shall we have enough and more. Then shall be the best hospital that ever was founded for us. Then shall we pray to God for your noble estate long to endure.

Lo, here hear ye heaped up many great commodities, if they were all true. But we showed you before, and have also proved you, that his bill is much grounded upon many great lies, whereof he by and by<sup>584</sup> began with some and after went forth with more. And now to the intent that the end should be somewhat suitly<sup>585</sup> to the remnant, as he began with lies and went forth with lies, so will he with lies likewise make an end — saving<sup>586</sup> that in the beginning he gave them out by tale,<sup>587</sup> and in the end he bringeth them in by heaps.

For first he saith that then shall the number of sore<sup>588</sup> and sick beggars decrease. How so? Shall there by the robbing, wedding, binding, and beating of the clergy, blind beggars get their sight again, or lame beggars their legs? Is there no man in all the clergy sick and sore that shall be by this way sent

568 think 569 unless 570 serious
571 fain wit: gladly know 572 mend 573 two 574 wot . . . whether: know not well which 575 holy orders: the sacrament of ordination 576 true 577 scheme 578 manner of expression 579 refrain 580 high commodities:

great benefits 581 transferred away,

removed 582 births 583 commoners 584 by and by: immediately 585 suitable 586 except 587 number; counting one by one 588 physically suffering

unto them? Should there not many, that now be in good health, wax shortly<sup>589</sup> sick and sore and sit and beg with them? Were this a diminishment of sick and sore beggars: to make more and send to them?<sup>590</sup>

5 “Then shall,” he saith, “bawds and whores, thieves, and idle people decrease.” This man weeneth<sup>591</sup> he were cousin to God and could do as he did: Dixit et facta sunt.<sup>592</sup> For as soon as he hath devised it, now weeneth he that if they were all put out and so 10 served by and by, then were all forthwith<sup>593</sup> in good order. As soon as he saith “Let them wed,” now he weeneth that forthwith every priest, monk, and friar hath a wife. As soon as he hath said “Bind them and beat them to work,” forthwith, he weeneth, every 15 man is at his work. And all this he reckoneth sure ere<sup>594</sup> ever he provide work for them, or where they shall dwell, or who shall take so many to work<sup>595</sup> at once that never were wont<sup>596</sup> to work before — and this where he seeth many walk idle already, that either 20 no beating can drive to work, or else no man will take to work.

First, we trust that among the clergy there be many men of that goodness and virtue that scant<sup>597</sup> a devil could find in his heart to handle them in 25 such dispiteous and despiteful<sup>598</sup> manner. But go to,<sup>599</sup> let their honest living and virtue lie still in question, yet at the leastwise he will grant they be good or naught.<sup>600</sup> Now then if they be good, he is too very<sup>601</sup> a villain that would serve good men so.
30 And on the other side if they be all as he would have them all seem — unthrifty, lewd, and naught — how can it be that by the reason of so many so naughty, so suddenly set out at large, ye should have bawds, harlots, thieves, and idle people decrease? Except<sup>602</sup> he
35 think that those whom he calleth naught already — being, as they now be, kept in, and in honest fashion refrained,<sup>603</sup> and many kept up in cloisters — will be better ruled abroad, running at the wild world as bucks broken out of a park. Over<sup>604</sup> this, how can 40 there, by the marriages of priests, monks, and friars, be fewer whores and bawds, when by the very marriage itself — being as it were incestuous<sup>605</sup> and abominable — all were stark harlots that married

them, and all stark bawds that should help to bring them together? 45

“Then shall,” he saith, “these great yearly exactions cease.” How can such things cease as never yet began? Ye remember what things he called exactions: the friars’ quarterage,<sup>606</sup> which he said that they exact of every household, and compel them to 50 pay it upon pain of heresy — bearing of a fagot or burning. Can he, among so many as payeth it not, lay<sup>607</sup> you one example that ever any said he was so served this seven years, this seven-score<sup>608</sup> years, this seven hundred years? Can he say that ever it was 55 exacted of himself? We know where he dwelled, and that if he had had none other cause to run away, surely for any fear of friars that ever exacted of him quarterage, he would not have been afraid to dwell 60 by the best of their beards.<sup>609</sup>

“Then shall idle folk,” he saith, “be set awork.” By what means? Whom hath he devised more to set idle men awork? — but if he look<sup>610</sup> that idle men shall be set awork by them whom he sendeth out of their own houses without money or ware,<sup>611</sup> neither 65 he nor they wot whither.<sup>612</sup>

“Then shall matrimony be much better kept.” Why so? Because there be more men unmarried sent out abroad to break it? Who (if they be such 70 as he calleth them) were, if they went all abroad, well likely to break many another man’s marriage ere they made all their own.

“Then shall the generation of your people be increased.” Is that the greatest fault he findeth, the 75 lack of generation? If he saw as far as he would seem to see, then should he spy that it were first more need to provide houses to dwell in, with land laid<sup>613</sup> thereto for tillage; or else experience teacheth that there is generation enough for the corn<sup>614</sup> that the 80 ground beareth. And that thing once well provided for, there will enough be founden to multiply more generation of such as may lawfully wed and would wed, if they wist<sup>615</sup> where after wedding their wife and their children should dwell.

“Then shall not your sword, power, crown, and 85 dignity, and obedience of your people, be taken

589 wax shortly: become soon 590 send to them: i.e., send them to join the others 591 thinks 592 “He spoke and they were made” (Ps 32(33):9, 147(148):5). 593 immediately 594 before 595 take...work: employ so many 596 accustomed

597 scarcely 598 insulting; vicious 599 go to: come now 600 bad; wicked 601 truly 602 Unless 603 restrained 604 Beyond 605 In canon law, monks and nuns are regarded as siblings. 606 quarterly payment 607 cite 608 A score is twenty. 609 by...beards:

Friars and the poor wore beards. See Whiting B112. 610 but...look: unless he expects 611 goods 612 wot whither: know to where 613 adjoined 614 grain 615 knew from you.” Who hath taken it away now? Who hath his sword borne but his Highness himself, or such his deputies as he appointeth it unto? His crown no man weareth but himself, as far as ever any of us

 5 heard. And yet if his Highness have any crowned kings under him, his “sword, power, crown, and dignity” is nothing defaced<sup>616</sup> nor diminished, but honored and enhanced by that. But all the mischief is that the spiritual court hath examination of heretics;
 10 this is all the grief. For as for obedience of the King’s people, his Highness findeth none taken from him. Was there ever king in this realm better obeyed than he? Hath his Highness of any part of his realm been better obeyed or more humbly served than of his 15 clergy? Was there ever any king in the realm that had his crown translated<sup>617</sup> from him because the clergy had lands given them, or because men gave alms to the poor friars? In good faith, ye may trust us, we never knew none such. When the beggars’ proctor 20 proveth any such, ye may then believe him; and in the meantime, ye may well believe he lieth.

“Then shall ye have obedience of your people.” Yet again? Till he find in the King’s realm some that dare disobey him, it were not much against reason 25 that, harping so much upon that string, that every man’s ear perceiveth so false and so far out of tune, he should confess himself a fool.

“Then shall your people increase in riches.” Wherefore the rather?<sup>618</sup> Not one halfpenny for 30 aught<sup>619</sup> that he hath spoken yet, except<sup>620</sup> he mean, when he taketh the land from the clergy, then to divide it among the people and make a dole of the friars’ alms too. And if he mean so, when he saith it out plainly, then will we tell you what he meaneth more.
 35 But in the mean season<sup>621</sup> to prove him both false and foolish, it is enough to tell him that the people cannot wax rich by their coming to them that are sent out naked and bring nought with them.

“Then shall none beg our alms from us.” No, pardie<sup>622</sup> — none but all they that ye will have sent 40 out naked to you — which would be more than ye would be glad to see sit and beg with you, and see them ask your alms from you that were wont to give alms to you.

45 “Then shall the gospel be preached.” Yea, marry,<sup>623</sup> that, that.<sup>624</sup> There is the great matter that all this gaping<sup>625</sup> is for. For undoubtedly all the gaping is for a new gospel. Men have been wont this many years to preach the gospel of Christ in such wise as 50 Saint Matthew, Saint Mark, Saint Luke, and Saint John hath written it, and in such wise as the old holy doctors<sup>626</sup> — Saint Jerome, Saint Augustine, Saint Ambrose, Saint Gregory,<sup>627</sup> Saint Chrysostom, Saint Basil, Saint Cyprian, Saint Bernard, Saint Thomas, and all the old holy fathers since Christ’s days un-

 55 til your own days — have understood it. This gospel hath been, as we say, always thus preached. Why saith he now that if the clergy were cast out for nought,<sup>628</sup> that then the gospel should be preached? Who should then be these preachers? He meaneth
 60 not that the clergy shall; ye may see that well. Who, then? Who but some lay Lutherans? And what gospel shall they preach? Not your old Gospel of Christ, for that is it which was wont to be preached
 65 unto you. And he would ye should<sup>629</sup> now think that the gospel shall begin to be preached — and yet not begin to be preached among you till the clergy be cast out. What gospel shall that be then that shall then be preached? What gospel but Luther’s gospel and Tyndale’s gospel? — telling you that only faith<sup>630</sup>
 70 sufficeth you for salvation, and that there needeth no good works, but that it were sacrilege and abomination to go about to please God with any good works, and that there is no purgatory, nor that the sacraments be nothing worth, nor that no law can
 75 be made by man to bind you, but that by your only faith ye may do what ye will — and that if ye obey any law or governor, all is of your own courtesy and not of any duty at all; faith hath set you in such a lewd<sup>631</sup> liberty.
 80

This and many a mad frantic folly shall be the gospel that then shall be preached, whereof he boasteth now as of one of the most special commodities<sup>632</sup> that shall succeed upon his goodly and 85 godly devices.<sup>633</sup>

Will ye plainly perceive that he meaneth thus? After all his mischiefs rehearsed<sup>634</sup> against the Church, he hath another matter in his mind, which he dare not yet speak of, but he maketh thereof a secret over-90 ture, leaving it in such wise at large<sup>635</sup> as he would

616 nothing defaced: not at all discredited
617 transferred, removed 618 Wherefore the rather?: Why more? 619 anything
620 unless 621 mean season: meantime
622 an exclamation (from “by God,”

French); certainly 623 an exclamation (from “by Mary”); indeed 624 i.e., that is the point 625 eager longing
626 theologians 627 Pope Saint Gregory the Great (Pope Gregory I) 628 nothing

629 would ye should: wants you to
630 only faith: faith alone 631 licentious
632 benefits; improvements 633 plans; schemes 634 recounted 635 at large: unspecified that men should guess what he meant, and yet he reserveth himself some refuge to flit therefrom when he list.<sup>636</sup> For if he should see that men should mislike it, he would in such case say that he meant some other thing. And therefore he purposeth<sup>637</sup> it under these words:

Here leave we out the greatest matter of all, lest we, declaring such a horrible carrion of evil against the ministers of iniquity, should seem to declare the one only fault—or rather, the ignorance—of our best-beloved minister of righteousness, which is to be hid till he may be learned,<sup>638</sup> by these small enormities<sup>639</sup> that we have spoken of, to know it plainly himself.

This thing put forth like a riddle—hard to read what it should signify—we have had since (by such as we before showed you, that died and came hither) plainly declared unto us. And surely whoso well adviseth<sup>640</sup> his words, and well pondereth his whole purpose, and the summary effect of his book, shall mow soon<sup>641</sup> perceive what he meaneth in that place. For what should that thing be that he leaveth out, that should be the “greatest of all,” and that should be laid<sup>642</sup> against the “ministers of iniquity” (which he meaneth and calleth the whole clergy), and that should be “such a horrible carrion of evil” that it should pass<sup>643</sup> and exceed any mischievous matter that he had already spoken against before? What manner of mischievous matter should this be?

This “horrible carrion of evil” that he “leaveth out” since it is, he saith, the “greatest matter of all,” must needs, ye wot<sup>644</sup> well, be greater against the clergy than all that “great broad bottomless ocean sea of evils”; more than all his “these be theys”; more than the making of such great number of beggars, of idle men, bawds, whores, and thieves; more than the hindering of matrimony, corrupting of generation; more than translating<sup>645</sup> the King’s kingdom; more than bringing the King’s crown to ruin; more than bringing the commonweal to shipwreck, and all the realm to wilderness.

What thing can this “horrible carrion” be that the clergy doth, that he “leaveth out” for the while, that so far exceedeth these mischievous matters before remembered,<sup>646</sup> that in comparison of it he calleth them all “small enormities” and, as a man would say, little pretty peccadilloes<sup>647</sup> Verily,<sup>648</sup> by this thing meaneth he none other but the preaching of the very whole corps and body of the blessed faith of Christ, and the ministering of the blessed sacraments of our Savior Christ—and of all those, in especial the consecrating of the Sacred Body, the flesh and blood, of our Savior Christ. For the teaching and preaching of all which things, this beggars’ proctor—or rather, the devil’s proctor—with other beggars that lack grace and neither beg nor look for none, bear all this their malice and wrath to the Church of Christ.

And seeing there is no way for attaining their intent but one of the twain<sup>649</sup>—that is to wit,<sup>650</sup> either plainly to write against the faith and the sacraments (wherein if they got themselves credence and obtained,<sup>651</sup> they then see well the Church must needs fall therewith), or else to labor against the Church alone, and get the clergy destroyed (whereupon they perceive well that the faith and sacraments would not fail to decay)—they, perceiving this, have therefore first assayed<sup>652</sup> the first way already, sending forth Tyndale’s translation of the New Testament in such wise handled as it should have been the fountain and wellspring of all their whole heresies. For he had corrupted and purposely changed in many places the text, with such words as he might make it seem to the unlearned people that the Scripture affirmed their heresies itself. Then came, soon after, out in print the dialogue of Friar Roy and Friar Jerome, between the father and the son, against the Sacrament of the altar,<sup>653</sup> and the blasphemous book entitled The Burying of the Mass.<sup>654</sup> Then came forth, after, Tyndale’s wicked book of Mammona,<sup>655</sup> and after that, his more wicked book of Obedience.<sup>656</sup> In which books afore specified, they go forth plainly against the faith and holy sacraments of Christ’s Church—and most especially against the Blessed Sacrament of the altar with as villainous words as the wretches could devise.

But when they have perceived by experience that

636 wants 637 proposes 638 taught 639 transgressions 640 considers 641 mow soon: be able easily to 642 alleged 643 surpass 644 know 645 transferred, removed 646 before remembered: above-mentioned 647 minor faults 648 Truly 649 two

650 say 651 succeeded 652 tried out 653 the dialogue... altar: Friar William Roy’s English adaptation (A Brief Dialogue between a Christian Father and His Stubborn Son) of a book by Wolfgang
Capito 654 The Burying of the Mass:
Better known as Read Me and Be Not

Wroth, this book is an adaptation (by Friar Jerome Barlowe, published in 1528) of Niklaus Manuel’s *Die Krankheit der Messe
(The Illness of the Mass)*. 655 The Parable of the Wicked Mammon (1528) 656 The Obedience of a Christian Man (1528)

good people abhorred their abominable books, then they, being thereby learned that the first way was not the best for the furtherance of their purpose, have now determined themselves to assay the second way: that is to wit, that forbearing to write so openly and directly against all the faith and the sacraments as good Christian men could not abide the reading, they would, with little touching of their other heresies, make one book specially against the Church, and look how that would prove. Which, if it succeeded after their appetites — that they might with false crimes laid unto some, or with the very faults of some, bring the whole Church in hatred and have the clergy destroyed — then should they more easily win their purpose that way. For when the preachers of the faith and very gospel were destroyed or far out of credence with the people, then should they have their own false gospels preached, as ye may perceive that this man meaneth where he saith that “then shall the gospel be preached.”

And therefore this is the thing which this man as yet “leaveth out” against them: that is to wit, the preaching of the right faith and the sacraments, which thing he reckoneth in the clergy a more horrible carrion than all the crimes wherein he hath belied<sup>657</sup> them before. And therefore saith he that he leaveth it out lest he should “seem to declare the one and only fault” of the King’s Highness. Which<sup>658</sup> “one only fault” he meaneth his Grace’s most famous and most gracious book that his Highness, as a prince of excellent erudition, virtue, and devotion toward the Catholic faith of Christ, made — of The Assertion of the Sacraments — against the furious book of Martin Luther. This godly deed done by his Highness, with the acceptation of his godly well-deserved title of Defensor of the Faith, given his Grace by the See Apostolic — this calleth this beggars’ proctor the King’s “one and only fault,” and “ignorance” of their false faith (in estimation of these heretics), which this beggars’ proctor saith that he will for the while hide and cover under his cloak of silence, till the King may by these “enormities” wherewith he believeth the Church in his beggars’ bill (which enormities he calleth “small enormities” in comparison of the preaching of the Catholic faith and the sacraments) be learned. What lesson, trow ye?<sup>659</sup> None other surely but that they hope that as well his Highness as his people may by such beggars’ bills be first allured and brought in to contemn, hate, and destroy the Church, and then thereby learn the other lesson which he now “leaveth out” for the while: that is to wit, to set at nought<sup>660</sup> the Catholic faith and all the blessed sacraments, after<sup>661</sup> the teaching of Luther’s and Tyndale’s gospel. And therefore saith he, as we told you before, that “then shall the gospel be preached.”

And in the meantime the man useth, as he weeneth<sup>662</sup> himself, toward the King’s Grace a very wise fashion of flattery, calling him their “best-beloved minister of righteousness,” yet be they not only run away for fear of the righteousness of their “best-beloved minister of righteousness,” but also would it should seem that his Highness were such a minister of righteousness as either set so little by righteousness that he would wittingly suffer,<sup>663</sup> or else had so little insight in<sup>664</sup> righteousness that he could not perceive so great a matter and “such a horrible carrion of evil” committed by the Church, as were so heinous, so huge, and so great, that in comparison thereof, the translating of his kingdom, the ruin of his crown, the shipwreck of his commonwealth, the dispeopling of his realm, and bringing all his land into desolation and wilderness were but slight matters and “small enormities.” And that his Highness should, toward this great horrible and intolerable mischievous demeanor of the Church, be aiding and assistant, either of evil mind or of “ignorance,” till that, by their beggarly bill, being turned into the hatred and the destruction of the Church, he might thereby be illumined to learn and perceive that the faith which his Grace had before both learned and taught, and whereof himself is the Defensor, is false and feigned, and that the sacraments be but men’s inventions, and that thereupon he should be content to learn the gospel of Luther and the testament of Tyndale. And thus ye may see what the beggars’ proctor meant by his proper invented riddle; by which, as ye see, under a fond<sup>665</sup> face of flattery he useth toward his prince and sovereign lord (whose Majesty, both by the law of God and the duty of his allegiance, he were highly bounden to reverence) an open plain despite and contumely.<sup>666</sup>

Now to the intent that ye may yet further perceive and see that they, by the destruction of the

657 slandered 658 By which 659 trow ye: do you think 660 set at nought: regard as nothing 661 following 662 believes 663 wittingly suffer: knowingly allow 664 into 665 foolish 666 despite and contumely: contempt and insolence

clergy, mean the clear abolition of Christ's faith, it may like you to confer and compare together two places of his beggars' bill. In one place, after that he hath heaped up together all his lies against the whole clergy (and thereto adjoined his grievous exclamation, "O the grievous shipwreck of the commonweal!"), he saith that "in ancient time, before the coming of" the clergy, "there were but few poor people, and yet they did not beg, but there was given them enough unasked," because "at that time," he saith, there was no clergy — whom he calleth always "ravenous wolves" — "to ask it from them"; and this, saith he, "appeareth in the book of the Acts of the Apostles."

In this place we let pass his threefold folly: one, that he would, by that<sup>667</sup> there were no beggars in one place, prove thereby that there were none in all the world beside. For as he, for lack of wit and understanding, mistaketh the book, he weeneth<sup>668</sup> that there were none that begged in Jerusalem. Which if it were true, yet might there be enough in other places.

Another of his follies is in that he allegeth<sup>669</sup> a book for him that nothing proveth his purpose. For in all that whole book shall he neither find that there was at that time few poor people, nor that poor people at that time begged not. For of truth, there were poor people and beggars, idle people, and thieves too, good plenty, both then and always before, since almost as long as Noah's flood — and yet peradventure<sup>670</sup> seven years afore that too. And so were there, indeed, in Jerusalem also, among them all, till Christendom came in, and yet remained then among such people there as turned not to the faith of Christ.

The third folly is, he layeth<sup>671</sup> that book for him which indeed proveth plain against him. For where he saith it appeareth there that the clergy was not then come, we cannot in the world devise<sup>672</sup> of what people he speaketh: paynims,<sup>673</sup> Jews, or Christian men. If he mean among paynims, his folly and his falsehood both is too evident. For who knoweth not that among the paynims they had always their priests — whose living was well and plenteously provided for, as ye may perceive not only by many other stories, but also by many places in the Bible, and specially in the forty-seventh chapter of Genesis? If he speak of the Jews, every man wotteth<sup>674</sup> well that they had a clergy thousands of years before the book that he allegeth — and their living far more largely provided for than any part of the people beside, and that by God's own ordinance. Now if he speak of the Christian people that was at that time in Jerusalem, where the faith began, his book maketh sore<sup>675</sup> against him. For there was a clergy as soon as there was any Christian people — for the clergy began then. And that clergy had,<sup>676</sup> not a part of the Christian people's substance,<sup>677</sup> but had it altogether, and did distribute it as they saw need<sup>678</sup> — which no man doubteth but that the parties showed them,<sup>679</sup> or else in some needs they must needs have lacked. So that here were many poor men, if they be poor that have nought<sup>680</sup> left, and all they beggars if they be beggars that be fain<sup>681</sup> to show their need and ask, and the clergy had altogether.<sup>682</sup> And yet layeth this wise man this book for him, being such as, if he should have sitten and studied therefor,<sup>683</sup> he could not have found a book that made more against him.

But as we said before, we shall let his false folly pass, and pray<sup>684</sup> you to consider what he would have you believe. He saith, and would ye should ween, that there were few poor folk — and no beggars nowhere — before the clergy of Christendom came in, but that all the poverty and beggary came into the world with the Christian clergy. Now knoweth every man that the Christian clergy and the Christian faith came in to the Christian people together, so that in effect his words weigh to this: that all poverty and beggary came into the world with the Christian faith.

Set now to this place the other place of his, in the end and conclusion of his book, where he saith that after the clergy spoiled<sup>685</sup> once and cast out, "then shall the gospel be preached," and "then shall we beggars have enough and more." Lo, like as in the one place he showeth that all beggary came in with the clergy that brought in the faith, so showeth he in the other that there should with the clergy all beggary go forth again, if they were so clean cast out that — Christ's gospel being cast out with them, and the faith which came in with them — they might

667 by that: because 668 thinks 669 cites 670 yet peradventure:
perhaps even 671 cites 672 in the world devise: for all the world figure out

673 pagans 674 knows 675 maketh sore: counts greatly 676 held; controlled 677 wealth 678 See Acts 4:34–35.
679 showed them: i.e., declared when they had needs 680 nothing 681 obliged 682 everything 683 for it 684 ask 685 are despoiled

have that gospel preached as they say they should, and as indeed they should, which they call the gospel: that is to wit,<sup>686</sup> Luther's gospel and Tyndale's testament, preaching the destruction of Christ's 5 very<sup>687</sup> faith and his holy sacraments, advancing and setting forth all boldness of sin and wretchedness, and, under the false name of "Christian freedom," spurring forward the devilish unbridled appetite of lewd<sup>688</sup> seditious and rebellious liberty that slew in 10 one summer, as we showed you before, above sixty thousand of the poor uplandish<sup>689</sup> Lutherans in Almain.<sup>690</sup> And this is all that these heretics look for as the fruit of their seditious books and beggars' bills—trusting by some such ways to be eased of 15 their beggary which they now sustain, being run out of the realm for heresy. For if they might (as they fain<sup>691</sup> would) have the clergy cast out, and Christ's gospel cast off, and their own gospel preached, then hope they to find that word true where he saith, 20 "Then shall we have enough and more."

For of all that ever he hath said, he hath not, almost, said one true word save this. And surely this word would, after their gospel once preached and received, be founden over-true. For then should 25 the beggars—not such beggars as he seemeth to speak for, that be sick, sore, and lame, but such bold presumptuous beggars as he is indeed, whole and strong in body, but weak and sick in soul, that have their bodies clean from scabs and their soul foul infect
 30 with ugly great pocks and leprosy—these beggars would hope to have, and except<sup>692</sup> good men take good heed would not fail to have, enough and a great deal more. For after that they might, the clergy first destroyed, bring in once<sup>693</sup> after that the preaching of Luther's gospel and Tyndale's testa-
 35 ment, and might with their heresies and false faith infect and corrupt the people, causing them to set the blessed sacraments aside; to set holy days and fasting days at nought; to condemn all good works;
 40 to jest and rail against holy vowed chastity; to blaspheme the old holy fathers and doctors of Christ's Church; to mock and scorn the blessed saints and martyrs that died for Christ's faith; to reject and refuse the faith that those holy martyrs lived—45 and died for—and in the stead of the true faith of Christ continued this fifteen hundred years, to take

now the false faith of a fond<sup>694</sup> friar, of old condemned and of new reformed within so few days, with contempt of God and all good men, and obstinate rebellious mind against all laws, rule, and 50 governance, with arrogant presumption to meddle with every man's substance, with every man's land, and every man's matter,<sup>695</sup> nothing pertaining to them—it is, we say, no doubt but that such bold presumptuous beggars will, if ye look not well to 55 their hands, not fail to have, as he writeth, enough and more too. For they shall gather together at last, and assemble themselves in plumps<sup>696</sup> and in great routs,<sup>697</sup> and from asking fall to the taking of their alms themselves, and under pretext of reformation
 60 (bearing every man that aught hath in hand<sup>698</sup> that he hath too much) shall assay<sup>699</sup> to make new division of every man's land and substance—never ceasing, if ye suffer<sup>700</sup> them, till they make all beggars as they be themselves, and at last bring all the realm 65 to ruin—and this not without butchery and foul bloody hands.

And therefore this beggars' proctor, or rather the proctor of hell, should have concluded his supplication not under the manner that he hath done:
 70 that after the clergy cast out, then shall the gospel be preached; then shall beggars and bawds decrease; then shall idle folk and thieves be fewer; then shall the realm increase in riches, and so forth. But he should have said: "After that the clergy is thus
 75 destroyed and cast out, then shall Luther's gospel come in; then shall Tyndale's testament be taken up; then shall false heresies be preached; then shall the sacraments be set at nought; then shall fasting and prayer be neglected; then shall holy saints be blas-
 80 phemed; then shall Almighty God be displeased; then shall he withdraw his grace and let all run to ruin; then shall all virtue be had<sup>701</sup> in derision; then shall all vice reign and run forth unbridled; then shall youth leave labor and all occupation; then shall 85 folk wax<sup>702</sup> idle and fall to unthriftiness;<sup>703</sup> then shall whores and thieves, beggars and bawds, increase; then shall unthrifts flock together and swarm about, and each bear him bold of other;<sup>704</sup> then shall all laws be laughed to scorn; then shall the servants set 90 nought by their masters, and unruly people rebel against their rulers; then will rise up rifling and

686 say 687 true 688 licentious
 689 rustic; rural 690 Germany 691 gladly 692 unless 693 at some time 694 foolish 695 affair;

business 696 bands 697 mobs 698 bearing... band: falsely telling every man that has anything 699 attempt 700 allow 701 held 702 become

703 wastefulness; dissoluteness 704 each... other: behave aggressively toward the other

robbery, murder and mischief, and plain insurrection, whereof what would be the end, or when you should see it, only God knoweth.”

5 All which mischief may yet be withstood easily, and with God's grace so shall it if ye suffer no such bold beggars to seduce you with seditious bills. But well perceiving that their malicious purpose is to bring you to destruction, ye, like good Christian people, avoiding their false trains and grins,<sup>705</sup> give 10 none ear to their heinous heresies, nor walk their seditious ways, but, persevering in your old faith of Christ, and observing his laws with good and godly works and obedience of your most gracious king and governor, go forth in goodness and virtue, 15 whereby ye cannot fail to flower and prosper in riches and worldly substance, which, well employed, with help of God's grace, about charitable deeds to the needy – and the rather<sup>706</sup> in remembrance and relief of us, whose need is relieved by your charity showed for our sake to your neighbor – be able to 20 purchase you much pardon of the bitter pain of this painful place, and bring you to the joyful bliss to which God hath with his blessed blood bought you and with his holy sacraments ensigned<sup>707</sup> you.

And thus will we leave the man's malicious folly,
25 tending to the destruction, first of the clergy and after of yourselves, wherein his mad reckoning hath constrained us to trouble you with many trifles, God wot,<sup>708</sup> full unmeet<sup>709</sup> for us; and now will we turn us to the treating of that one point which, though 30 it specially pertaineth to ourselves, yet much more specially pertaineth it unto you: that is to wit, the impugnation<sup>710</sup> of that uncharitable heresy wherewith he would make you, to our great harm and 35 much more your own, believe that we need none help, and that there were no purgatory.

The end of the First Book

<sup>705</sup> false trains and grins: treacherous lures and snares    <sup>706</sup> the rather: all the more    <sup>707</sup> marked    <sup>708</sup> knows <sup>709</sup> full unmeet: highly inappropriate

<sup>710</sup> refutation

THE SECOND BOOK

When we consider in ourselves, dear brethren and sistren in our Savior Christ, the present painful pangs that we feel, and therewith ponder 5 upon the other part the perilous estate<sup>1</sup> of you that are our friends there living in that wretched world, wit<sup>2</sup> you very surely that this pestilent opinion begun against purgatory, not so much grieveth us for the lack that we should find thereby in the relief of 10 our own intolerable torments, as doth — for the love that we bear you — the fear and heaviness<sup>3</sup> that we take for<sup>4</sup> that peril and jeopardy that should everlastingly fall to your own souls thereby. Nor of all the heavy tidings that ever we heard here was there 15 never none so sore<sup>5</sup> smote us to the heart as to hear the world wax<sup>6</sup> so faint in the faith of Christ that any man should need now to prove purgatory to Christian men, or that any man could be founden which<sup>7</sup> would in so great a thing, so fully and fastly<sup>8</sup> 20 believed for an undoubted article this fifteen hundred year, begin now to stagger and stand in doubt, for<sup>9</sup> the unwise words of any such malicious person as is he that made The Beggars' Supplication. For whose answer and full confutation it seemeth us<sup>10</sup> 25 sufficient that ye may clearly perceive his words to be of little weight while<sup>11</sup> ye see that the man hath neither learning, wisdom, nor good intent, but all his bill utterly grounded upon error, evil will, and untruth. And surely this were<sup>12</sup> to us great wonder, 30 if Christian men should need any other proof in this world to reprove<sup>13</sup> such seditious folk withal<sup>14</sup> than the only<sup>15</sup> token of the devil's badge which themselves bear ever about them — the badge, we mean, of malice and of a very deadly devilish hate.
 35 For whereas our Savior Christ hath so left love and charity for the badge of his Christian people, that he commandeth every man so largely to love others that his love should extend and stretch unto his enemy, nor there is no natural man, nei-40 ther paynim,<sup>16</sup> Jew, Turk, nor Saracen, but he will rather spare his foe than hurt his friend; this kind of folk is so far fallen not only from all Christian charity but also from all humanity and feeling of any good affection<sup>17</sup> natural, and so changed into a wild fierce cruel appetite more than brutish and 45 bestial that they first, without ground or cause, take their friends for their foes, hating the Church deadly<sup>18</sup> because it willeth their weal<sup>19</sup> and laboreth to amend them, and after to do the Church hurt, whom they take for their enemies; they labor to do 50 us much more hurt whom they call still for their friends. For they, to get pulled from the clergy the frail commodities<sup>20</sup> of a little worldly living, labor to have us — their fathers, their mothers, their friends, and all their kin — left lying in the fire here 55 helpless and forgotten — they little force<sup>21</sup> how long.

 And in this they show their affection much more unnatural and abominable than he that would with his sword thrust his friend through the whole body to the hard haft,<sup>22</sup> to give his enemy behind him a 60 little prick with the point.

This way of theirs were very naught<sup>23</sup> and detestable, although<sup>24</sup> they truly meant indeed as much good as they falsely pretend. For whereas they cloak their cruel purpose and intent under color<sup>25</sup> of a 65 great zeal toward the commonwealth, which they lay<sup>26</sup> to be sore impaired by great pomp and inordinate living used<sup>27</sup> in the Church, we be so far from the mind of defending any such spiritual vice, carnal uncleanness, or worldly pomp and vanity used 70 in the clergy that we would to God it were much less than it is, not in them only but also in the temporalty.<sup>28</sup> And there is none of neither sort but if he were here with us but one half hour, he would set little by<sup>29</sup> all such worldly vanities all his life after, 75 and little would he force or reck<sup>30</sup> whether he wore silk or sackcloth.

But surely this man, if he meant well, the faults of evil folk he would lay<sup>31</sup> to themselves, and not unto the whole clergy. He would also labor for amend-80 ment and bettering, not for destruction and undoing finally. He would hold himself within his bounds, only devising against men's vices, and not start out therewith into plain and open heresies.
 But surely so hath it ever hitherto proved that never 85

1 state 2 know 3 grief, sadness 4 on account of 5 so sore: that so greatly 6 become 7 who 8 steadfastly; firmly 9 on account of 10 to us 11 when 12 would be 13 refute 14 with 15 mere 16 pagan 17 disposition; inclination 18 implacably; excessively 19 well-being 20 benefits 21 care 22 handle 23 were very naught: would be very wicked 24 even if 25 appearance, pretense 26 allege 27 practiced 28 laity 29 set little by: value little 30 force or reck: care or mind 31 attribute 32 never... while: as hidden as possible for the time

was there any that showed himself an enemy to the Church but, though he covered it never so close for the while,<sup>32</sup> yet at the last always he proved himself in some part of his works so very<sup>33</sup> an enemy to 5 Catholic faith of Christ that men might well perceive that his malice toward the clergy grew first and sprang of<sup>34</sup> infidelity and lack of right belief. And of this point was there never a clearer example than this beggars' proctor,<sup>35</sup> which was so far-forth farced,<sup>36</sup>
 10 stuffed, and swollen with such venomous heresies that, albeit<sup>37</sup> he longed sore<sup>38</sup> to keep them in for the season,<sup>39</sup> and only to rail against the clergy and hide his envious intent toward the faith, yet was he not able to contain and hold, but was fain,<sup>40</sup> for<sup>41</sup> bursting, to puff out one blast of his poisoned sect against 15 us seely<sup>42</sup> souls, the goodness of God driving him to the disclosing and discovering of his malicious heresy, to the intent ye should thereby perceive out of what ungracious<sup>43</sup> ground his enmity sprang that he bore against the Church. Which<sup>44</sup> things once perceived and considered must needs diminish and be-20 reave him<sup>45</sup> his credence among all such as are not affectionate toward his errors and infected and envenomed with his mortal<sup>46</sup> heresies, and of such folk we trust he shall find very few.

For surely not only among Christian people and Jews — of whom the one hath, the other hath had, the perceiving and light of faith — but also among the very miscreant<sup>47</sup> and idolaters (Turks, Saracens, and paynims),<sup>48</sup> except only such as have so far fallen from the nature of man into a brutish beastly persuasion as to believe that soul and body die both at once — else<sup>49</sup> hath always the remnant commonly 35 thought and believed that after the bodies dead and deceased, the souls of such as were neither deadly<sup>50</sup> damned wretches forever, nor on the other side, so good but that their offenses done in this world hath deserved more punishment than they had suffered and sustained there, were punished and purged by 40 pain after the death ere<sup>51</sup> ever they were admitted unto their wealth<sup>52</sup> and rest.

This faith hath always not only faithful people had, but also, as we say, very miscreants and idolaters have ever had a certain opinion and persuasion 45 of the same, whether that, of<sup>53</sup> the first light and revelation given of such things to our former fathers, there hath always remained a glimmering that hath gone forth from man to man, from one generation to another, and so continued and kept among 50 all people, or else that nature and reason have taught men everywhere to perceive it. For surely that they have such belief not only by such as have been traveled in many countries among sundry sects, but also by the old and ancient writers that have been among them, we may well and evidently perceive.

And in good faith, if never had there been revelation given thereof nor other light than reason, yet — presupposed the immortality of man's soul, which no reasonable man distrusted, and thereto agreed 60 the righteousness of God and his goodness, which scant<sup>54</sup> the devil himself denieth — purgatory must needs appear. For since that God of his righteousness will not leave sin unpunished, nor his goodness will<sup>55</sup> perpetually punish the fault after the man's conversion, it followeth that the punishment shall 65 be temporal. And now, since the man often dieth before such punishment had, either at God's hand by some affliction sent him or at his own by due penance done, which the most part of people wantonly<sup>56</sup> doth forsloth,<sup>57</sup> a very child almost may see
 70 the consequent: that the punishment at the death remaining due and undone is to be endured and sustained after. Which, since his Majesty is so excellent whom we have offended, cannot of right and justice be but heavy and sore.<sup>58</sup>

Now if they would, peradventure<sup>59</sup> as in magnifying of God's high goodness, say that after a man's conversion once to God again, not only all his sin is forgiven but all the whole pain also, or that they will under color<sup>60</sup> of enhancing the merit and goodness of Christ's Passion tell us that his pain suffered 80 for us standeth in stead<sup>61</sup> of all our pain and penance, so that neither purgatory can have place nor any penance need to be done by ourselves for our own sin — these folk that so shall say shall, under 85 pretext of magnifying his mercy, not only sore diminish his virtue of justice, but also much hinder the opinion and persuasion that men have of his goodness. For albeit that God of his great mercy may forthwith<sup>62</sup> forgive some folk freely their sin
 90

33 truly 34 from 35 representative; agent; alms-collector 36 so far-forth farced: to such an extent crammed 37 although 38 greatly 39 time 40 forced 41 to keep from 42 poor 43 devoid of grace;

wicked 44 These 45 bereave him: deprive him of 46 lethal; mortally sinful 47 unbelieving 48 pagans 49 otherwise 50 fatally; implacably 51 before 52 well-being 53 from 54 scarcely

55 his goodness will: will his goodness 56 light-heartedly; recklessly 57 neglect 58 grievous; severe; intense 59 perhaps 60 the appearance, the pretext 61 the place 62 immediately and pain both, without prejudice of his righteousness, either of his liberal bounty or for some respect had<sup>63</sup> unto the fervent sorrowful heart that fear and love, with help of special grace, have brought into the penitent at the time of his return to God, and also that the bitter Passion of our Savior, besides the remission of the perpetuity of our pain, do also lessen our purgatory and stand us here in marvelous high stead, yet if he should use this point for a general rule — that at every conversion from sin with purpose of amendment and recourse to confession, he shall forthwith fully forgive without the party's pain or any other recompense for the sins committed save only Christ's Passion paid for them all — then should he give great occasion of lightness<sup>64</sup> and bold courage to sin.

For when men were once persuaded that be their sins never so sore,<sup>65</sup> never so many, never so mischievous, never so long-continued, yet they shall never bear pain therefor,<sup>66</sup> but by their only faith<sup>67</sup> and their baptism, with a short return again to God, shall have all their sin and pain also clean<sup>68</sup> forgiven and forgotten — nothing else but only to cry him mercy as one woman would that treadeth on another's train — this way would, as we said, give the world great occasion and courage not only to fall boldly to sin and wretchedness, but also careless to continue therein, presuming upon that thing that such heretics have persuaded unto some men already: that three or four words ere they die shall sufficiently serve them to bring them straight to heaven.

Whereas, besides the fear that they should have, lest they shall lack at last the grace to turn at all, and so for fault of those three or four words fall to the fire of hell, if they believe therewith the thing that truth is besides — that is to wit,<sup>69</sup> that though<sup>70</sup> they hap to have the grace to repent and be forgiven the sin and so to be delivered of the endless pain of hell, yet they shall not so freely be delivered of purgatory, but that, besides the general relief of Christ's holy Passion extended unto every man not after<sup>71</sup> the value thereof but after the stint<sup>72</sup> and rate appointed by God's wisdom, great and long pain abideth<sup>73</sup> them here among us, whereof their willingly taken penance in the world, and affliction

there put unto them by God, and there patiently borne and suffered with other good deeds there in their life done by them, and finally the merits and prayers of other good folks for them, may diminish and abridge the pain which will else hold them here with us in fire and torments intolerable only God knoweth how long — this thing, we say, as it is true indeed, so if the world well and firmly for a sure truth believe it, cannot fail to be to many folk a good bridle and a sharp bit to refrain<sup>74</sup> them from sin. And on the other side, the contrary belief would send many folk forward to sin, and thereby, instead of purgatory, into everlasting pain.

And therefore is this place of our temporal pain of purgatory not only consonant unto his righteous justice, but also the thing that highly declareth his great mercy and goodness, not only for that<sup>75</sup> the pain thereof, huge and sore as it is, is yet less than our own sin deserveth, but also most especially, in that by the fear of pain to be suffered and sustained here, his goodness refraineth men from the boldness of sin and negligence of penance, and thereby keepeth and preserveth them from pain everlasting, whereas the light forgiveness of all together would give occasion, by boldness of sin and presumption of easy remission, much people to run down headlong thither. And therefore were, as we said, that way very far contrary not only to God's justice and righteousness, but also to his goodness and mercy. Whereupon, as we said before, it must needs follow that since the pain is always due to sin, and is not always clean forgiven without convenient<sup>76</sup> penance done or other recompense made, nor pain is not always done, nor any recompense made in the man's life, and yet the man discharged of hell by his conversion, all the pain that remaineth must needs be sustained here with us in purgatory.

But now, if these heretics, as they be very self-willed and willful, will set at nought<sup>77</sup> the common opinion and belief and persuasion of almost all the world, and, as they be very unreasonable, make little force<sup>78</sup> of reason and ever ask for Scripture, as though they believed Holy Scripture, and yet when it maketh against them, they then with false and fond<sup>79</sup> glosses of their own making do but mock and shift over<sup>80</sup> in such a trifling manner that it may

63 respect had: consideration taken

64 frivolity, thoughtlessness 65 grievous; severe 66 on that account 67 only faith: faith alone 68 completely 69 say

70 even if 71 according to 72 measure 73 awaits 74 restrain 75 for that: because 76 appropriate 77 set at nought: value as nothing 78 make little force of: attach little importance to 79 foolish 80 shift over: change positions well appear they believe not Scripture neither—yet since they make as<sup>81</sup> they believed Scripture and nothing else, let us therefore see whether that purgatory do not appear opened and revealed unto 5 Christian people in Holy Scripture itself.

And first it seemeth very probable and likely that the good king Hezekiah for none other cause wept at the warning of his death given him by the Prophet,<sup>82</sup> but only for the fear of purgatory.<sup>83</sup> For 10 albeit that<sup>84</sup> diverse doctors<sup>85</sup> allege diverse causes of his heaviness<sup>86</sup> and loathness at that time to depart and die, yet seemeth there none so likely as the cause that ancient doctors allege: that is to wit, that he was loath to die for the fear of his estate<sup>87</sup> after his 15 death, forasmuch as he had offended God by over-much liking of himself, wherewith he wist<sup>88</sup> that God was displeased with him, and gave him warning, by the Prophet, that he should live no longer.

Now considered he so the weight of his offense 20 that he thought and esteemed the only<sup>89</sup> loss of this present life far under the just and condign<sup>90</sup> punishment thereof, and therefore fell in great dread of far sorer punishment after. But being as he was a good faithful king, he could not lack sure<sup>91</sup> hope, through 25 his repentance, of such forgiveness as should preserve him from hell. But since his time should be so short that he should have no leisure to do penance for his fault, he therefore feared that the remnant of his righteous punishment should be performed 30 in purgatory. And therefore wept he tenderly and longed to live longer, that his satisfaction done there in the world, in prayer and other good virtuous deeds, might abolish and wear out all the pain that else were toward<sup>92</sup> him here among us. To which his 35 fervent boon<sup>93</sup> and desire, at the contemplation of his penitent heart, our Lord of his high pity condescended and granted him the lengthening of his life for fifteen years, making him for his further comfort sure thereof by the show of a manifest miracle.

40 But whereto<sup>94</sup> granted our Lord that longer life?
To be bestowed upon worldly delight and pleasure?
Nay, nay verily.<sup>95</sup> But to the intent it might appear that it was of God's great mercy granted for the redeeming of his purgatory by good works for his sat-45 isfaction, he was promised by the Prophet not only that he should within three days be recovered and whole, but also that he should go into the Temple to pray. So that it may thereby appear for what end and intent he longed so sore<sup>96</sup> for a longer life.

Now if the beggars' proctor,<sup>97</sup> or Tyndale or Lu-50 ther either, list<sup>98</sup> to say that in this point we do but guess at that good king's mind, and therefore purgatory thereby rather somewhat reasoned than well and surely proved, thereto may we well answer and say that, the circumstance of the matter considered, 55 with the virtuous holiness and cunning<sup>99</sup> of such as so long ago have taken the Scripture thus, that place alone is a far better proof for purgatory than ever any of them could hitherto lay against it yet.
For albeit this beggars' proctor saith that right wise 60 and cunning men will say that there is no purgatory at all—by which wise men he meaneth Luther and Tyndale and himself—yet was there never any of them all that yet laid any substantial thing, either reason or authority, for them, but only jest and rail, 65 and say that purgatory is a thing of the pope's own making, and that souls do nothing till Doomsday<sup>100</sup> but lie still and sleep.

And thus telling such wise tales for their own part,<sup>101</sup> and making mocks and mows<sup>102</sup> at every-70 thing that maketh against their folly for our part, they go forth in their evil will and obstinacy and,
with murmur and grudge<sup>103</sup> of their own conscience, content themselves with the only<sup>104</sup> feeding of their malicious minds by the increase of their 75 faction of such as fall into their fellowship rather of a light mind and lewd pleasure to take a part than of any great credence that they give unto them or greatly force<sup>105</sup> which way they believe. For surely if these folk were reasonable and indifferent,<sup>106</sup> as 80 it is not well possible for them to be after that they refuse once to believe the Catholic Church, and in the understanding of Scripture lean only to their own wits—but else, as we say, if they could with an equal and indifferent mind consider and weigh 85 what they hear, they should soon see their heresy re-proved<sup>107</sup> and purgatory surely confirmed, not only by probable reason taken of the Scripture, as in the place that we rehearsed<sup>108</sup> you of Hezekiah, but also 90 by plain and evident texts.

81 make as: act as if 82 Isaiah 83 See Is 38, 2 Kgs 20, and 2 Chr 32. 84 albeit that: although 85 theologians 86 sadness 87 condition, state 88 knew 89 mere 90 deserved 91 secure; certain

92 approaching 93 request 94 to what end 95 truly 96 greatly; intensely 97 representative; agent; alms-collector 98 wishes 99 knowledge, cleverness 100 Judgment Day. See Mt 10:15.

101 side 102 derisive grimaces 103 murmur and grudge: muttered complaints and discontent 104 mere 105 care 106 impartial 107 refuted 108 cited

For have ye not the words of Scripture, written in the book of the Kings, Dominus deducit ad inferos et reducit (“Our Lord bringeth folk down into hell and bringeth them thence again”)?<sup>109</sup> But they that be in that hell where the damned souls be— they be never delivered thence again. Wherefore it appeareth well that they whom God delivereth and bringeth thence again be in that part of hell that is called purgatory.

What say they to the words of the prophet Zechariah, Tu quoque in sanguine testamenti tui eduxisti vinctos tuos de lacu in quo non erat aqua (“Thou hast in the blood of thy testament<sup>110</sup> brought out thy bounden prisoners out of the pit,” or “lake,” “in which there was no water”)?<sup>111</sup> In that they whom the prophet there speaketh of were “bounden,” we may well perceive that they were in a prison of punishment. And in that he calleth them the prisoners of God, it is easy to perceive that he meaneth not any that were taken and imprisoned by any other than the damned spirits, the very jailers of God. And in that he saith that there is in that lake no water, we may well perceive that he spoke it in description of that dry pit of fire, wherein there is no refreshing, for as hot are we here as they are in hell. And what heat is in the pit where there lacketh water our Savior himself declareth by the words of the rich glutton lying in such a lake from whence, at sight of poor Lazarus in Abraham’s bosom, he desired heavily to have him sent unto him with one drop of water to refresh his tongue, that after all the delicacies that it had tasted in his life, lay there then sore burning, and never set half so much by<sup>112</sup> twenty tons of wine as he set by one poor drop of water.<sup>113</sup> So that, as we show you, these words of the prophet Zechariah, “Thou hast brought out thy bounden prisoners out of the lake wherein is no water,” do right well appear to be spoken of these poor imprisoned souls whom Christ, after his bitter Passion, by his precious blood wherewith he consecrated his Church in his new testament, delivered out of the lake of fire wherein they lay bounden for their sins. But now is there no man that doubteth whether Christ delivered the damned souls out of hell or not. For in that hell is there no redemption, and in limbo patrum<sup>114</sup> the souls were in rest.

Wherefore it appeareth clearly that those prisoners whom he brought out of their pain he brought only out of purgatory. And so see these heretics purgatory clearly proved by the plain words of this holy prophet.

Another place is there also in the Old Testament that putteth purgatory quite out of question. For what is plainer than the places which in the book of the Maccabees make mention of the devout remembrance, prayer, alms, and sacrifice to be done for souls when the good and holy man Judas Maccabeus gathered money among the people to buy sacrifice withal to be offered up for the souls of them that were dead in the battle?<sup>115</sup> Doth not this place of Scripture so openly declare the need that we souls have in purgatory, and the relief that we find by the prayer and suffrages<sup>116</sup> of good people upon earth, that all the heretics that bark so fast against us can find neither gloss nor color<sup>117</sup> to the contrary?

What shift<sup>118</sup> find they here? Surely a very shameless shift, and are fain<sup>119</sup> to take them to that tackling that is their sheet-anchor always when they find the storm so great that they see their ship goeth all to wreck. For first they use<sup>120</sup> to set some false gloss to the text that is laid against them, and deny the right sense.

But now if the text be so plain that they can have no such color, then when they can have no more hold, but see that their part goeth all to nought,<sup>121</sup> they fall to a shameless boldness and let<sup>122</sup> not to deny the Scripture and all, and say the Holy Scripture which is laid against them is none Holy Scripture at all, as Luther playeth with the godly epistle of Christ’s blessed apostle Saint James. And even the same do those heretics with the authority of this holy book of Maccabees: they be not ashamed to say that it is not Scripture.

But upon what ground do they deny it for Scripture? Because it is not founden and accounted for Holy Scripture among the Jews? They neither do nor can deny but that it is taken for Holy Scripture by the Church of Christ. For if they would deny that—both the whole Church beareth witness against them at this day, and it also appeareth plainly by Saint Jerome, Saint Augustine, and other

109 1 Sm 2:6 110 covenant 111 Zec 9:11 112 set half so much by: valued half as much 113 See Lk 16:19–31. 114 limbo patrum: the limbo of the fathers; the place in which good departed souls were detained until Jesus ascended into heaven 115 See 2 Mc 12:38–45. 116 intercessory prayers for the dead 117 gloss nor color:

interpretation nor ground 118 stratagem 119 obliged, forced 120 are accustomed 121 nothing 122 hesitate old holy doctors that the Church so took it also in their days and before — then would we gladly wit<sup>123</sup> of these new men (these enemies, we mean, of ours) whether the Church of Christ be not of as great authority and as much to be believed in the choice and election of Holy Scripture as the Jews. If they will say yes, then answer they themselves, for then is the book of the Maccabees by the choice of the Church proved Holy Scripture, though the Jews never accounted it so. Now if they will say no and will contend that it cannot be accounted Holy Scripture, though the Church of Christ so take it, but if<sup>124</sup> the Jews so took it too, then go they near to put out Saint John's Gospel out of Scripture too, for the Jews never took it for none. And surely if they admit for Scripture that book that the Jews admitted, and deny that book to be Scripture which the Church of Christ receiveth for Scripture, then do they say that the Spirit of God was more effectually present and assistant unto the synagogue of the Jews in the law of his prophet Moses than unto the Church of his own only-begotten Son in the law of Christ's Gospel.

If they consider well the books of the Maccabees, they shall find such things therein as may give them good occasion to put little doubt but that it should be of great and undeniable authority. For they shall find there that the great good and godly valiant captain of God's people did institute and ordain the great feast of the Dedication of the Temple of Jerusalem called Festum encaeniorum,<sup>125</sup> of the annual institution of which feast we read nowhere else but in the book of the Maccabees. And yet find we that feast ever after continued and had in honor until Christ's own days, and our Savior himself went to the celebration of that same feast, as appeareth in the Gospel of Saint John.<sup>126</sup> So that it may well appear that the books of that noble history, whereof remaineth so noble a monument and remembrance, continually kept and reserved<sup>127</sup> so long after, and honored by Christ's own precious person, and testified by his holy Evangelist in the book of his holy Gospel, cannot be but undoubted truth and of divine authority.

And surely if they deny the book of the Maccabees for Holy Scripture because the Jews account it not for such, then shall they by the same reason refuse the authority of the book of Sapience,<sup>128</sup> and prove themselves insipients.<sup>129</sup> And likewise if they take all Scripture besides the New Testament to be of none other force and authority than it is accounted in the rule and canon of the Jews, then shall the whole Psalter of David (the very sum<sup>130</sup> of clear and lightsome prophecies) lose among them great part of his authority, since it is not taken in like force and strength among the Jews as it is in Christ's Church.

Finally for the book of the Maccabees, since the Church of Christ accounteth it for Holy Scripture, there can no man doubt thereof but he that will take away all credence and authority from the whole Scripture of God — the very Gospels and all. For if these heretics deny for Holy Scripture any book that the Church of Christ accounteth for Holy Scripture, then deny they one of the greatest foundations of all Christian faith, and the thing which their master Martin Luther himself hath already confessed for true. For he affirmeth himself that God hath given unto the Church of Christ that gift — that the Church cannot fail surely and certainly to discern between the words of God and the words of men, and that it cannot be deceived in the choice of Holy Scripture and rejecting of the contrary — so far-forth<sup>131</sup> that he confesseth (as he needs must, of necessity) that the noble doctor and glorious confessor Saint Augustine said very well when he said that he should not have believed the Gospel but for the authority of the Church.<sup>132</sup> For he had not known which had been the very<sup>133</sup> book of the Gospels and which not, among so many as were written, but by the authority of the Church, whom the Spirit of God assisted as it ever doth and ever shall, in the choice and receiving of Holy Scripture and rejection of the counterfeit and false. Whereby it appeareth clearly not only by that holy doctor Saint Augustine, but also by the confession of the arch-heretic Luther himself, that the Church cannot be deceived in the choice of Holy Scripture and rejection of the contrary, so far-forth that it neither can receive as Holy Scripture any book that is none, nor reject for other than Holy Scripture any book that is Holy Scripture indeed. And surely 123 know 124 but if: unless 125 Festum encaeniorum: the Feast of Lights, Hanukkah 126 See Jn 10:22–23.

127 preserved 128 Wisdom 129 unwise persons 130 summit 131 so far-forth: to such an extent 132 See Luther, De

captivitate Babylonica (WA 6: 561); St. Augustine, Against the Fundamental Epistle of Manichaeus 1.5 (PL 42: 176). 133 true if the Church might so be deceived in the choice of Holy Scripture that they might take and approve for Holy Scripture any book that were none, then stood all Christendom in doubt and unsurety<sup>134</sup> whether Saint John's Gospel were Holy Scripture or not, and so forth of all the New Testament.

And therefore since, as we have showed you by the heretics' own confessions, the Church of Christ cannot be deceived in the choice and election of Holy Scripture, by which their confession they must needs abide and not flit therefrom — as they daily do change and vary from their own words in many other things, except that they will in the falling from that point refuse the strength and authority of the New Testament of Christ — and since, as yourselves well perceiveth also, the Church of Christ receiveth and taketh and (as ye see by Saint Jerome and other old holy doctors this thousand year) hath approved and firmly believed the holy book of the Maccabees to be one of the volumes of Holy Scripture, and then in that book ye see so manifestly purgatory proved that none heretic, as shameless as they be, can yet for shame say the contrary, but are by the plain and open words of that holy book so driven up to the hard wall that they can no farther but are fain<sup>135</sup> to say that the book is no part of Scripture, which shift<sup>136</sup> they must needs forsake again or else revoke their own words and therewith also the authority of all Christ's Gospel, there shall, if either reason or shame can hold, never need any further thing for the proof of purgatory to stop the mouths of all the heretics that are or shall be to the world's end.

But yet, since they be so shameless and unreasonable that the thing which they can in no wise<sup>137</sup> defend they cannot yet find in their proud heart to give over, but when it is proved by diverse plain texts of the Old Testament, then having no probable reason for their part, they never the more give place to truth, but stick to their obstinate nay, let us see whether our purpose be not proved by good and substantial authority in the New Testament also.

And first let us consider the words of the blessed apostle and evangelist Saint John, where he saith, Est peccatum usque ad mortem; non dico ut pro eo roget quis. "There is," saith he, "some sin that is unto the death; I bid not that any man shall pray for that."<sup>138</sup> This sin, as the interpreters agree, is understood of<sup>139</sup> desperation and impenitence, as though Saint John would say that whoso depart out of this world impenitent or in despair, any prayer after made can never stand him in stead.<sup>140</sup> Then appeareth it clearly that Saint John meaneth that there be others which die not in such case, for whom he would men should pray, because that prayer to such souls may be profitable. But that profit can no man take neither being in heaven where it needeth<sup>141</sup> not, nor being in hell where it booteth<sup>142</sup> not. Wherefore it appeareth plain that such prayer helpeth only for purgatory, which they must therefore needs grant except<sup>143</sup> they deny Saint John.

What say they to the words of Saint John in the fifth chapter of the Apocalypse? "I have heard," saith he, "every creature that is in heaven and upon the earth and under the earth and that be in the sea and all things that be in them — all these have I heard say, 'Benediction and honor and glory and power forever be to him that is sitting in the throne, and unto the Lamb.'"<sup>144</sup>

Now wotteth<sup>145</sup> every man well that in hell among damned souls is there none that giveth glory to Christ for the redemption of man. For they, for anger that by their own default<sup>146</sup> they have lost their part thereof, and cannot, for proud heart, take their fault to themselves, fall to blasphemy as the devil doth himself, and impute their sin to the fault of God's grace, and their damnation to the blame of his creation. So that the praise and glory that is given by creatures in hell unto the Lamb for man's redemption is only by the souls in purgatory, that be and shall be partners of that redemption, as the creatures walking upon earth or sailing in the sea that give the honor to Christ for man's redemption be only the Christian people, which look and hope to be partners thereof, and not infidels, that believe it not. But the blessed creatures in heaven give honor to Christ for man's redemption, for that joy and pleasure that their charity taketh in the society and fellowship of saved souls.

And in this place it is a world<sup>147</sup> to see the folly of some heretics, what evasion they seek to void<sup>148</sup> from this place of Scripture. They say that it is no more to be understood by<sup>149</sup> souls here in purgatory, nor Christian men living upon earth, than by fishes in the sea and the devil and damned souls in

134 uncertainty 135 obliged, forced 136 stratagem 137 way 138 1 Jn 5:16

139 as 140 stand him in stead: benefit him 141 is needed 142 helps 143 unless

144 Rv 5:13 145 knows 146 fault 147 wonder 148 escape 149 as hell, because the text saith that every creature in the sea and in hell spoke that laud and honor to the Lamb. But by this wise way might they prove that when ye pray for “all” Christian souls, ye mean to pray for our Lady’s soul, and for Judas’s too, and that our Savior, when he sent his apostles and bade them preach his Gospel to “every creature,”<sup>150</sup> they may bear you in hand<sup>151</sup> that he bade them preach to oxen and kine<sup>152</sup> and their calves too, because all they be creatures. But as they were sent to none other creature than such as he meant of, though he spoke of all, nor ye mean to pray for no souls but such as have need and may have help, though ye speak of “all,” so though Saint John spoke of every creature in hell giving honor to Christ for man’s redemption, yet meant he but such as be in that hell in which they rejoice therein and shall be partners thereof, which be only we in purgatory, and not the devils and damned souls that blaspheme him, though their just punishment redound<sup>153</sup> against their will to the glory of God’s righteousness.

If all this will not satisfy them, will ye see yet another clear place, and such as none heretic can avoid? Doth not the blessed apostle Saint Peter, as appeareth in the second chapter of the Apostles’ Acts, say of our Savior Christ in this wise,<sup>154</sup> Quem Deus suscitavit, solutis doloribus inferni?<sup>155</sup> In these words he showeth that pains of hell were loosed.<sup>156</sup> But these pains were neither pains of that hell in which the damned souls be pained—which neither were loosed then nor never be loosed, but be and shall be, as our Savior saith himself, everlasting—nor these pains that were then loosed were not the pains in limbo patrum,<sup>157</sup> for there were none to be loosed, for the good souls were there, as our Savior showeth himself, in quiet comfort and rest.<sup>158</sup> And so appeareth it evidently that the pains of hell that were loosed were only the pains of purgatory, which is also called “hell,” by occasion of the Latin word and the Greek word both.

For in these tongues (forasmuch as before the resurrection of our Savior Christ there was never none that ascended up into heaven) there was no people that any otherwise spoke of souls than that they were gone down “beneath,” into the “low place.” And therefore in the words of the common<sup>159</sup> Creed is it said of our Savior Christ after his Passion, Descendit ad inferna (that is to say, “He descended down beneath, into the low places”), instead of which “low places” the English tongue hath ever used this word “hell.” And certain is it and very sure that Christ descended not into all these low places, nor into every place of hell, but only into limbus patrum and purgatory. Which two places, because they be parts of habitations of souls beneath (all which habitations beneath have in English been always called “hell”), therefore are these two places, among others, taken and comprehended under the name of “hell.” Which word “hell” nothing else signifieth unto us in his general signification but the habitations of souls beneath or under us, in the low places under the ground. Albeit, because limbus patrum and purgatory be called in English also by their special names besides, therefore is most commonly this word “hell” restrained to the special signification of that low place beneath in which the damned souls be punished.

This much have we showed you of this word “hell,” because we would not that the common taking thereof might bring you into any error. So that by this place ye see proved, by the plain words of Saint Peter, that Christ at his resurrection did loose and unbind pains in hell, which, as we have showed you, could be nowhere there but in purgatory. For in the special hell of damned souls the pains were not loosed. And in limbus patrum was no pains to be loosed. And therefore, except they deny Saint Peter, they cannot deny purgatory.

And yet if they deny Saint Peter, we shall then allege<sup>160</sup> them Saint Paul, whom they be best content to hear of, because that of the difficulty of his writing, they catch sometimes some matter of contention for the defense of their false exposition. This blessed apostle in his First Epistle to the Corinthians, the third chapter, speaking of our Savior Christ, the very foundation and the only foundation of all our faith and salvation, saith,

If any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, or straw, every man’s work shall be made open, for the Day of our Lord<sup>161</sup> shall declare it, for in the fire it shall be

<sup>150</sup> See Mt 28:19–20. <sup>151</sup> bear you in hand: assert against you <sup>152</sup> cattle <sup>153</sup> contributes <sup>154</sup> way <sup>155</sup> Quem... inferni: “Whom God has raised up, having loosed the sorrows of hell” (Acts 2:24). <sup>156</sup> dissolved <sup>157</sup> limbus patrum: the limbo of the fathers; the place in which good departed souls were detained until

Jesus ascended into heaven <sup>158</sup> See Lk 16:20–22, 25. <sup>159</sup> i.e., Apostles’ <sup>160</sup> quote <sup>161</sup> Doomsday

showed, and the fire shall prove what manner of thing every man's work is. If any man's work that he hath builded thereon do abide,<sup>162</sup> he shall have a reward. If any man's work burn, he shall suffer harm, but he shall be safe, but yet as by fire.<sup>163</sup>

In these words the Apostle showeth that likewise as some men abiding upon Christ and his very lively<sup>164</sup> faith build up thereupon such good works as are so good and so pure that they be like fine gold, fine silver, or such fine precious stones as when they be cast in the fire it can find no filth to fetch out of them, and therefore they remain in the fire safe and undiminished, so are there some on the other side which, though they do not (as many others do), with mortal sins and lack of good works, wound their faith unto the death and fall from Christ, the foundation that they must build upon, yet do they, abiding upon that foundation, build up thereupon many such simple and frail and corruptible works as can never enter heaven. And such be venial sins, as<sup>165</sup> idle words, vain and wanton<sup>166</sup> mirth, and such other things like, which be but like wood, hay, or straw. Which works, when the soul after his departing out of the world bringeth hither into purgatory, he cannot so get through it as doth the soul whose works were wrought clean, or fully purged by penance ere he died.

For that soul in the fire can feel no harm, like<sup>167</sup> as fine gold can in the fire nothing lose of its weight. But this soul that bringeth with him such frail works, either wrought by themselves or inserted peradventure<sup>168</sup> and mixed amidst of some good and virtuous work — as, for example, some lack peradventure sufficient attention and heed, taken by some sudden wavering of the mind, in time of prayer, or some surreption<sup>169</sup> and creeping in of vainglory and liking of their own praise in their alms given or other good deed done, not forthwith<sup>170</sup> resisted and cast out, but kept and fed upon too long, and yet neither so long peradventure nor so great as our Lord will for that thought deprive him the merit and reward of his work — lo, in such cases, as the Apostle saith, the Day of our Lord, which is to the whole world the day of the general judgment, and to every man particular the day of his own judgment after his death, shall show his work; what manner thing it is the fire shall prove and declare.

For here in purgatory, like as the fire can in the clean souls take none hold, but they shall be therein without any manner<sup>171</sup> pain or grief, so shall it in the souls that are uncleansed and have their works imperfect, unclean, and spotted hastily catch, hold, and keep them fast and burn them with incessant pain, till the filthiness of their sins be clean<sup>172</sup> purged and gone, and that shall be in some sooner, in some later, as their sins or the spots remaining thereof be more easy or more hard to get out. And that is the thing that Paul signifieth by the “wood,” “hay,” and “straw,” of which the one is a light flame, soon ended; the other smoldereth much longer, and the third is hottest and endureth longest. But yet hath it an end, and so shall have, at length, all the pains of them that shall be purged here. But whatsoever soul mishap to die in deadly<sup>173</sup> sin and impenitent, since he is thereby fallen off forever from our Savior Christ that was his foundation, and hath builded up wretched works upon your ghostly<sup>174</sup> enemy the devil, where-with he hath so thoroughly poisoned himself that he can never be purged, the fire shall therefore lie burning upon him forever, and his pain never lessed, nor his filthy spots never the more diminished.

And forasmuch as ye never can conceive a very right imagination of these things which ye never felt, nor it is not possible to find you any example in the world very like unto the pains that seely<sup>175</sup> souls feel when they be departed thence, we shall therefore put you in remembrance of one kind of pain, which though it be nothing like for<sup>176</sup> the quantity of the matter, yet may it somewhat be resembled by reason of the fashion and manner. If there were embarked many people at once to be by ship conveyed a long journey by sea, of such as never came thereon before, and should hap<sup>177</sup> all the way to have the seas rise high and sore wrought,<sup>178</sup> and sometime soon upon a storm to lie long after wallowing at an anchor, there should ye find diverse fashions of folk. Some peradventure (but of them very few) so clean from all evil humors and so well attempered<sup>179</sup> of themselves that they shall be all that long voyage by sea as lusty<sup>180</sup> and as jocund as if they were on land. But far the most part shall ye see sore<sup>181</sup> sick, and

162 remain 163 1 Cor 3:12–15 164 very lively: true living 165 such as 166 lustful; unruly, unrestrained 167 just 168 perhaps 169 surprise attack 170 immediately 171 kind of 172 completely 173 mortal 174 spiritual 175 poor 176 in terms of 177 happen 178 sore wrought: severely rough 179 balanced 180 healthy 181 greatly; grievously

yet in many sundry manners: some more, some less, some longer time diseased, and some much sooner amended. And diverse that a while had weened<sup>182</sup> they should have died for pain, yet after one vomit
 5 or twain<sup>183</sup> so clean rid of their grief that they never feel displeasure of it after. And this happeth after as<sup>184</sup> the body is more or less disposed in itself thereto. But then shall ye sometimes see there some other whose body is so incurably corrupted that 10 they shall walter and tolter,<sup>185</sup> and wring their hands, and gnash the teeth, and their eyes water, their head ache, their body fret, their stomach wamble,<sup>186</sup> and all their body shiver for pain, and yet shall never vomit at all, or if they vomit, yet shall they vomit 15 still and never find ease thereof.

Lo, thus fareth it, as a small thing may be resembled to a great, by<sup>187</sup> the souls deceased and departed the world, that such as be clean and unspotted can in the fire feel no disease<sup>188</sup> at all, and on the 20 other side, such as come thence so deadly poisoned with sin that their spots be indelible and their filthiness unpurgeable lie fretting and frying in the fire forever. And only such as neither be fully cleansed nor yet sore defiled but that the fire may fret out<sup>189</sup>
 25 the spots of their sin — of this sort only be we that here lie in purgatory, which these cruel heretics would make you believe that we feel none harm at all, whereof the blessed Apostle, as we have showed you, writeth unto the Corinthians the contrary.

Now if they would bear you in hand<sup>190</sup> that because some doctors do construe those words of the Apostle in diverse other senses — as they do construe in diverse senses almost every text in Scripture, sometimes after the letter,<sup>191</sup> sometimes moral,<sup>192</sup> and 35 sometimes otherwise, and all to the profit and edifying of the hearers — if these heretics would therefore pretend that Saint Paul in that place meant nothing of purgatory but the fire that shall be sent before the Doom,<sup>193</sup> or worldly tribulation, or some such other 40 thing, ye shall well understand that though his words may be verified and well and profitably applied unto such things also, yet letteth that nothing<sup>194</sup> these words to be properly by Saint Paul spoken of purgatory, no more than it letteth these words to be properly spoken by<sup>195</sup> Christ, Ego in flagella paratus sum,<sup>196</sup> and many another verse in the Psalter also, though the same words may be well applied and verified of<sup>197</sup> many another man offering himself patiently to the sufferance of unjust punishment.

And therefore, lest these heretics should with 50 any such inventions beguile you and make you believe that we, for the furtherance of our own cause, expound the Apostle's words wrong and so make them seem to say for our part, ye shall understand that those words have been expounded and understood of purgatory this thousand year and more
 55 by the ancient holy doctors of Christ's Church, as well Greeks as Latins. And among others the great clerk<sup>198</sup> Origen, in more places of his works than one, declareth plainly that the afore-remembered<sup>199</sup>
 60 words of the Apostle are spoken by<sup>200</sup> the pains of purgatory. The holy confessor and great pillar of Christ's Church Saint Augustine, in diverse of his godly and erudite books, expoundeth that place of Saint Paul to be clearly spoken of purgatory. And 65 over this,<sup>201</sup> the blessed pope Saint Gregory,<sup>202</sup> in the fourth book of his godly Dialogues, beareth witness that the Apostle in the place aforesaid wrote those words of purgatory.<sup>203</sup> So that ye may plainly perceive that this exposition is neither our device<sup>204</sup> nor 70 any new-founden fantasy, but a very truth well perceived and witnessed by great cunning<sup>205</sup> men and holy blessed saints more than a thousand years ago.

Now if these heretics will be so mad to flit in this case from Saint Paul, and say they be bounden to 75 believe nothing but only the Gospel, let us then yet see further whether we may not plainly prove you purgatory by the very words of the Gospel itself. Doth not our blessed Savior himself say that there is a certain sin which a man may so commit "against the Holy Ghost" that it shall never be remitted nor forgiven "neither in this world nor in the world to come"?<sup>206</sup> Now as for to dispute what manner sin that should be, both the matter were very hard,<sup>207</sup>
 80 and also we shall here nothing<sup>208</sup> need to touch it. But of one thing both ye and we may make us very sure: that there is nor can be any sin committed in the world so sore,<sup>209</sup> so grievous, nor so abominable

182 thought 183 two 184 after as: according to how 185 walter and tolter: toss and turn 186 feel nausea 187 with 188 discomfort 189 fret out: eat away 190 bear you in hand: assert to you 191 after the letter: according to the literal sense 192 allegorical 193 Last

Judgment 194 letteth that nothing: hinders that not at all 195 about 196 "I am ready for scourges," Ps 37(38):18. 197 applied and verified of: applied to and borne out by 198 scholar 199 above-cited 200 with reference to 201 in addition to 202 Gregory the Great

(ca. 540–604) 203 See Dialogorum libri quatuor 4:39 (PL 77: 396). 204 invention 205 intelligent; learned 206 See Mt 12:31–32. 207 were very hard: would be very difficult 208 not at all 209 great; severe but that if a man work with God's grace by contrition and heaviness of heart, with humble confession of mouth and good endeavor of penance and satisfaction in deed, against his thought, word, and deed by which God was offended, he shall obtain of God's goodness remission, forgiveness, and pardon.

But it may peradventure<sup>210</sup> so befall that by some kind of unkindness<sup>211</sup> used toward God extending to the blasphemy of his Holy Spirit, the committer of that sin may so far offend that he shall, for his desert and demerit, have the grace of almighty God so clearly<sup>212</sup> withdrawn from him that our Lord shall never offer his grace after, nor nevermore call upon him. And then his grace once clearly withdrawn from a man, he can never be able to repent and return again to God. For grace is the light wherewith men see the way to walk out of sin, and grace is the staff without help whereof no man is able to rise out of sin, according to the words of Holy Writ spoken to man in the person of our Lord God, Ex te perditio tua, ex me salvatio tua ("Thy perdition cometh of thyself, but thy salvation cometh of me by the aid and help of my grace)."<sup>213</sup> Which grace, as we tell you, being from some man utterly withdrawn for some manner<sup>214</sup> unkind behavior toward God and blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, that sin, for lack of repentance, which can never come where grace is clean gone, shall "never be forgiven in this world nor in the world to come." And in such a manner kind of unkindness toward God and blasphemy toward the Holy Ghost fall also all such wretches as have the grace of God ever calling and knocking upon them for repentance all the days of their life, and yet all that notwithstanding, will not use it, nor work therewith, nor turn to God, but willingly will die desperate and impenitent wretches.

This kind of blasphemers of God's goodness and his Holy Spirit have in the miserable passing of their sinful souls out of their sensual bodies the grace of God so fully and so finally withdrawn from them forever that they be thereby fixed and confirmed in an unchangeable malice, which, eternally dwelling with them, is the very special<sup>215</sup> cause of their everlasting torment. But in this matter, as we said, we wade out of our purpose, saving<sup>216</sup> that it seemed us yet necessary, since our Savior in the place that we speak of doth himself show that there is a certain sin so touching the Holy Ghost that it shall "never be forgiven, neither in this world nor in the world to come" — it seemed, as we say, somewhat necessary to say somewhat therein, lest some that read it might conceive a wrong opinion and a false fear drawing them toward despair, that if they mishappened (which our Lord forbid) to fall into blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, they could never after be forgiven how sore<sup>217</sup> soever they repented, or how heartily and how busily soever they should pray therefor.<sup>218</sup>

In which thing, since we have showed you what we take for truth, we shall leave that matter and show you how those words of Christ prove you our principal purpose: that is to say, that there is a purgatory. Howbeit,<sup>219</sup> we shall scantily<sup>220</sup> need to show you that, for the very words be plain and evident of themselves. For when our Lord saith that the "blasphemy against the Holy Ghost" shall not be forgiven "neither in this world nor in the world to come," he giveth us clear knowledge that of other sins, some shall be forgiven in this world and some in the world to come.

Now are there in this world every sin forgiven in such as shall be saved souls, except such venial sins and such temporal pain as yet due to the deadly<sup>221</sup> sins rest and remain to be purged here in purgatory. For none other place is there than this in the world to come after man's life, in which either sin or pain due to any sin shall be remitted. For into heaven shall neither sin nor pain enter, and in hell shall never none be released. And therefore when Christ, by showing that some kind of sin shall not be remitted in the world to come, doth give men knowledge that, on the other side, some sins shall in the world to come be remitted and forgiven, and then since no man doubteth but that neither in hell shall any sins be forgiven nor in heaven, very reason teacheth that the place in which some sins shall be forgiven after this life can be none other but purgatory.

There is, as we suppose, no Christian man living but he will think that any one place of Holy Scripture is enough to the proof of any truth. Now have we proved you purgatory by the plain texts of more places than one, two, or three. And yet shall we give you another so plain, as we suppose, and so evident for the proof of purgatory, as none heretic consideration; hostility 212 completely 213 Hos 13:9 214 kind of 215 particular

210 perhaps 211 unnaturalness; ingratitude; absence of natural affection or

216 except 217 greatly 218 for it 219 However 220 scarcely 221 mortal shall find any good color<sup>222</sup> of escape. For our Savior Christ saith, as it is rehearsed<sup>223</sup> in the twelfth chapter of Matthew, that men shall “yield a reckoning of every idle word,”<sup>224</sup> and that shall be after this present life. Then wotteth<sup>225</sup> every man that by that “reckoning” is understood a punishment therefor, which shall not be in hell, and much less in heaven. And therefore can it be nowhere else but in purgatory.

Lo, thus may ye see purgatory clearly proved by the very Scripture itself—by the book of the Kings, by the prophet Zechariah, by the holy book of the Maccabees, by the words of Saint John, by the apostle Saint Peter, by the writing of<sup>226</sup> our Savior Christ himself<sup>227</sup>—so that we not a little marvel either of<sup>228</sup> the ignorance or shameless boldness of all such as having any learning dare call themselves Christian men and yet deny purgatory. For if they have learning and perceive not these clear and open texts, we marvel of their ignorance. With which, while they join a proud pretense of learning, they fall into the reproof that Saint Paul spoke of the paynim<sup>229</sup> philosophers: Dicentes se esse sapientes, stulti facti sunt (“While they called themselves wise, they proved stark fools”).<sup>230</sup> Now if they perceive well these texts of Holy Scripture so plainly proving purgatory, and yet themselves stick stiff in the denying, we then marvel much more that they dare for shame call themselves Christian men, and then deny the thing which the blessed apostles of Christ, the sacred majesty of our Savior himself, in the Holy Scripture, in his holy Gospels, so manifestly and so plainly affirmeth.

And yet many another plain text is there in Holy Scripture that, as the old holy doctors bear witness, well proveth our purpose<sup>231</sup> for purgatory, which we speak here nothing of, since fewer texts than we have already showed you both might and ought to suffice you. For any one plain text of Scripture sufficeth for the proof of any truth, except<sup>232</sup> any man be of the mind that he will have God tell his tale twice ere<sup>233</sup> he believe him.

Now if these heretics fall to their accustomed forwardness<sup>234</sup> and, as they be wont<sup>235</sup> to do, will rather deny that the swan is white and the crow black than agree that any text in Holy Scripture hath any other sense than themselves list<sup>236</sup> to say, and will in this point, for the maintenance of their heresy, set at nought<sup>237</sup> Saint Augustine, Saint Jerome, Saint Ambrose, Saint Gregory, Saint Chrysostom, Saint Basil, Saint Cyprian,<sup>238</sup> and finally all the old holy fathers and blessed saints that anything say against them, yet can they neither deny that the Catholic Church of Christ hath always believed purgatory, condemning for heretics all such as would hold the contrary. Nor if they grant that, can they then by any manner means avoid it but that<sup>239</sup> the thing is true that all the Church so full and whole so long hath in such wise believed, although<sup>240</sup> there were not founden in all Holy Scripture one text that so plainly proved it, as they might find many that seemed to say the contrary, except<sup>241</sup> they will not only say that our blessed Lady lost her virginity after the birth of Christ, but over<sup>242</sup> that be driven further to diminish the strength and authority of the very Gospel itself, which, if the Church may err in the right faith, had<sup>243</sup> clearly lost its credence.

And therefore, as we say, whereas we by plain Scripture have proved you purgatory, yet if there were therein not one text that anything seemed to say for it, but diverse and many texts which as far seemed unto the misunderstanders to speak against purgatory, as many diverse texts of the Gospel appeared unto the great heretic Helvidius<sup>244</sup> to speak against the perpetual virginity of Christ’s blessed mother, yet since the Catholic Church of Christ hath always so firmly believed it for a plain truth that they have always taken the obstinate affirmers of the contrary for plain erroneous heretics, it is a proof full and sufficient for purgatory to any man that will be taken for a member of Christ’s Church, and is alone a thing sufficient in any good Christian audience to stop the mouths of all the proud high-hearted<sup>245</sup> malicious heretics that anything would bark against us.

But when they be so confuted and concluded<sup>246</sup> that they have nothing to say, yet can they not hold their peace, but fall to blasphemy and ask why there

222 appearance; pretext 223 related 224 Mt 12:36 225 knows 226 about 227 See 1 Sm 2:6; Zec 9:11; 2 Mc
12:38–45; 1 Jn 5:16; Acts 2:24; Mt
12:31–32. 228 at 229 pagan 230 Rom
1:22 231 case 232 unless 233 before 234 willful obstinacy 235 accustomed

236 wish; choose 237 set at nought:
regard as nothing 238 St. Ambrose, Bishop of Milan (d. 397 AD); St. Chrysostom, Archbishop of Constantinople (347–407 AD); St. Basil the Great (329–79 AD); St. Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage (200–58 AD) 239 but that: that 240 even if 241 unless 242 in addition to 243 would have 244 Helvidius’s non-extant work against the perpetual virginity of Mary was answered by Jerome’s treatise The Perpetual Virginity of Blessed Mary in the fourth century. 245 haughty, proud 246 overcome

cometh none of us out of purgatory and speak with them. By which blasphemous question they may as well deny hell and heaven too, as they deny purgatory. For there cometh as many to them out of 5 purgatory as out of either of the other twain. And surely if there came one out of any of them all three, unto folk of such incredulity as those heretics be, yet would they be never the better. For if they believe not now them whom they should believe, no
 10 more would they believe him neither that should come out of purgatory to tell it them, as Abraham answered the rich man that required<sup>247</sup> the same in hell,<sup>248</sup> and as it well appeared also by the miscreant<sup>249</sup> Jews, which were so little amended by the 15 coming again of Lazarus out of limbus patrum<sup>250</sup> that, lest others should believe him, they devised to destroy him.<sup>251</sup> And yet if the thing that they require would content them, it hath not lacked. For there hath in every country and in every age apparitions been had, and well known and testified, by 20 which men have had sufficient revelation and proof of purgatory, except such as list<sup>252</sup> not to believe them, and they be such as would be never the better if they saw them.

25 For whoso listeth to believe that altogether is lies that he heareth so much people speak of and so many good men write of—for no country is there in Christendom in which he shall not hear credibly reported of such apparitions diverse times there
 30 seen and appearing, and in the books of many a holy saint's writing shall he find such apparitions in such wise told and testified, as no good man could in any wise mistrust them, and over this, when the apostles at Christ's appearing to the eleven in the
 35 house took him at the first for a spirit,<sup>253</sup> it well appeareth that apparitions of spirits was no new thing among the Jews, which ye may well perceive also by that the better sort of them said in excusing<sup>254</sup> of Saint Paul, "What if some angel or some spirit
 40 have spoken to him?" (as is mentioned in the Apostles' Acts)<sup>255</sup>—so that, as we say, whoso list to take all this for lies, and is so faithless and so proudly curious<sup>256</sup> that he looketh ere he believe them to have such apparitions specially showed unto him-45 self and miracles wrought in his presence, would wax<sup>257</sup> the worse and<sup>258</sup> he saw them, and would ascribe it either to some fantasy or to the devil's work, as did those Jews that ascribed Christ's miracles to Beelzebub.<sup>259</sup>

For surely if such people were in the case of Saint Thomas of India<sup>260</sup>—that they were otherwise very virtuous and good, having in that only point some hardness of belief as he had in Christ's resurrection<sup>261</sup>—our Lord, we doubt not, would of his special goodness provide some special way for 55 their satisfaction to recover them with. But now, since they be plain, carnal, high-hearted, and malicious, longing for miracles as did these crooked-hearted Jews, which said unto Christ that they longed to see him show some miracle, he doth 60 therefore with these folk as Christ did with them. For as he answered them, by the example of Jonah the prophet, that he would none show before that perverse and faithless people till he were dead,<sup>262</sup> so answereth he these perverse and crooked malicious people that he will show them no such apparition 65 till they be dead. And then shall he send them where they shall see it so surely, and to their pain see such a grisly sight as shall so grieve their hearts to look thereon, that they shall say as Christ said to Saint Thomas of India: Beati qui non viderunt et crediderunt ("Blessed and happy be they that believed this gear<sup>263</sup> and never saw it").<sup>264</sup>

For surely in this world the goodness of God
 so tempereth such apparitions as his high wis-75 dom seeth it most profitable for help and relief of the dead and instruction and amendment of the quick,<sup>265</sup> keeping such apparitions, of his great mercy, most commonly from the sight of such as would turn his goodness into their own harm. And 80 surely of his tender favor toward you doth his great goodness provide that such apparitions, revelations, and miracles should not be too copious and common, whereby good men, seeing the thing at eye,<sup>266</sup> should lose the great part of that<sup>267</sup> they now merit 85 by faith, and evil folk, when they were once familiar with it, would then as little regard it as they now little believe it.

Now it is a world<sup>268</sup> to see with what folly they fortify their false belief, and into what fond fan- 90

247 requested 248 See Lk 16:27–35.
 249 unbelieving 250 limbus patrum: the limbo of the fathers; the place in which good departed souls were detained until Jesus ascended into heaven 251 See Jn

12:9–11. 252 choose, wish 253 See Lk 24:37. 254 defense 255 Acts 25:9
 256 cautious; fastidious 257 become 258 if 259 See Mt 12:24. 260 the apostle Thomas, who is believed to have established the Church in modern-day Kerala 261 See John 20:24–25. 262 See Mt 12:38–40. 263 matter 264 Jn 20:29 265 living 266 at eye: with their eyes

 267 what 268 marvel

tasies<sup>269</sup> they fall, while they decline<sup>270</sup> from the truth. For while they deny purgatory, they now affirm (and specially Luther himself) that souls unto Doomsday do nothing else but sleep. Woe would they be if they fell into such a sleep as many a soul sleepeth here, and as Judas hath already slept fifteen hundred years in hell.

Then say they that if there were any purgatory out of which the pope might deliver any soul by his pardon, then were he very cruel in that he delivereth them not without money, and also that he rideth them not hence all together at once. The first is a great folly — that since our Lord sendeth them thither for satisfaction to be made in some manner for their sin, the pope should rather, against God's purpose, deliver them free than change the manner of their satisfaction from pain into prayer, alms-deed, or other good works to be done by their friends for them, in some point profitable and necessary for the whole corps of Christendom or some good member of the same.

Now is there in the second not only much more folly, but it importeth also plain and open blasphemy. For presupposed that the pope may deliver all souls out of purgatory, yet if he were therefore cruel as often as he leaveth any there, this unreasonable reason layeth cruelty to the blame of God, which may undoubtedly deliver all souls thence and yet he leaveth them there. This blasphemy should also touch his high Majesty for keeping any soul in hell, from whence no man doubteth but that he might, if he list,<sup>271</sup> deliver them all forever. But as he will not deliver any thence, so will he not without good order deliver any soul hence. For as of his justice they be worthy to lie there forever, so be we worthy to lie here for the while, and in God no cruelty though he suffer<sup>272</sup> his mercy to be commonly suspended and tempered with the balance of his justice. And though he take us not hence all at once, orderless and at adventure,<sup>273</sup> his high wisdom is praiseworthy and not worthy blame. Our Lord forbid that ever we so should (and such is his grace that we never shall for<sup>274</sup> any pain possible that we can suffer here) hold ourselves content to hear such foolish words as imply so plain blasphemy against God's high merciful Majesty. For surely these folk, in putting forth of this their unwise argument, make a countenance<sup>275</sup> to throw it against the pope, but in very deed they cast it at God's head.

For as for the pope, whoso consider it well goeth further from the example of God, that is set for Christ's vicar in his Church by giving overliberal pardon than by being therein too scarce and strait.<sup>276</sup> For God remitteth not here at adventure, though he may do his pleasure, but observeth right good and great respect, as<sup>277</sup> the prayers and intercessions made for us or other satisfaction done for us by some other men. And this order useth, and of reason ought to use, his vicar also in the dispensing toward our relief, the precious treasure of our comfort that Christ hath put in his keeping. For else,<sup>278</sup> if either the pope or God should always forthwith<sup>279</sup> deliver every man here — or rather keep every man hence, as these heretics would make men believe that God doth indeed, and would that the world should<sup>280</sup> so take it — then should God or the pope, as we somewhat have said before, give a great occasion to men boldly to fall in sin, and little to care or force<sup>281</sup> how slowly they rise again. Which thing neither were meet<sup>282</sup> for the pope's office nor agreeable to the great wisdom of God, and much less meet for his mercy. For by that means should he give innumerable folk great occasion of damnation, which,<sup>283</sup> presuming upon such easy short remission, would lustily<sup>284</sup> draw to lewdness with little care of amendment.

And so appeareth it that the thing which these wise men would have ye take for cruel is of truth most merciful, and the thing which they would have to seem very benign and piteous is in very deed most rigorous and most cruel, likewise as a sharp master that chastiseth his servant is in that point more favorable than is an easy one that for lack of punishment letteth them run on the bridle<sup>285</sup> and giveth them occasion of hanging. Which thing hath place also between the father and the child. And therefore in Holy Scripture, that father is not accounted for unloving and cruel that beateth his child, but rather he that leaveth it undone. For "he that spareth the rod," saith Holy Writ, "hateth the child."<sup>286</sup> And God therefore, that is of all fathers the most tender, loving, and most benign and

269 fond fantasies: foolish delusive imaginations 270 turn away 271 chooses 272 allows 273 random 274 instead of 275 make a countenance: appear

276 scarce and strait: sparing and strict 277 such as 278 otherwise 279 immediately 280 would... should: want the world to 281 heed 282 fit 283 who

284 cheerfully, enthusiastically 285 on the bridle: out of control 286 Prv 13:24 merciful, leaveth no child of his uncorrected, but “scourgeth every child that he taketh to him.”<sup>287</sup>

 And therefore neither God remitteth at adventure
 the pains of purgatory, nor no more must the pope 5 neither, but if that he will,<sup>288</sup> while he laboreth to do good and be piteous to us that are dead, be cruel and do much more harm to them that be quick,<sup>289</sup> and while he will draw us out of purgatory, drive many of them into hell. From desire of which kind 10 of help we so far abhor<sup>290</sup> that we would all rather choose to dwell here long in most bitter pain than by such way to get hence as might give occasion of any man’s damnation.

Now where they likewise object in countenance<sup>291</sup> 15 against the clergy — but yet in very deed they strike the stroke at us, whom they would bereave<sup>292</sup> the suffrages of good people — objecting that no man may satisfy for another, nor that the prayer nor alms nor other good deed done by one man may 20 stand another in stead,<sup>293</sup> but that every man must needs all-thing<sup>294</sup> that he will have help of, do it every whit<sup>295</sup> himself, and so that no man’s good deed done among you for us in relief of our pain could in any manner serve us — this opinion, as it is toward 25 us very pestilent and pernicious, so is it of itself very false and foolish. For first, if all that ever must avail any man must needs be done by himself, and no man’s merit may be applied to the help of another, then were wiped away from all men all the merits of 30 Christ’s bitter Passion, in which, though it be true that God died on the cross because of the unity of God and man in person, yet had his tender manhood all the pain for us, and his impassible<sup>296</sup> Godhead felt no pain at all. Whereof<sup>297</sup> serveth also the 35 prayers that every man prayeth for others? Wherefore<sup>298</sup> did Saint Paul pray for all other Christian men, and desire them all to pray for him also and each of them for others, that they might be saved?<sup>299</sup>

And why is there so special a mention made in 40 the Acts of the Apostles, that at the delivery of Saint Peter out of prison the Church made continual prayer and intercession for him but for to show that God the rather<sup>300</sup> delivered him for other men’s prayers?<sup>301</sup> And think ye that if God have pity upon 45 one man for another’s sake, and delivereth him at another man’s petition from a little pain or imprisonment in the world there upon earth, he hath not at other men’s humble and hearty prayer much more pity upon such as lie in much more heavy pain and torment here in the hot fire of purgatory? 50

Then find these folk another knot hard (as they think) to undo. For they say that “if another man’s merits may serve me, whereto should I need to do any good myself?” This objection is much like as if they would say, “If other men may take me out of 55 the fire, whereto should I labor to rise myself?” Very truth it is that sometimes the good works of one man, wrought with good affection,<sup>302</sup> may purchase another man grace for to amend and work for himself. But surely, of common course, he that will not 60 himself work with them getteth little good of other men’s good deeds. For if thyself do still draw backward while other good men with their prayer labor to pull thee forward, it will be long ere thou make any good day’s journey. And therefore that holy 65 doctor Saint Augustine, in the blessed book that he made of the cure<sup>303</sup> and care that men should have of us seely parted<sup>304</sup> souls, toucheth quickly<sup>305</sup> the very point that there can none take profit of other men’s good deeds, but only such as have deserved 70 by some good thing in their own deeds that other men’s deeds should help them, and that hath every man done, at the leastwise by his final repentance and purpose of amendment, that departeth the world in the state of grace.<sup>306</sup> 75

For he that is out of that state cannot take the profit of other men’s merits done for him. And therefore damned souls cannot by other men’s merits be delivered of<sup>307</sup> damnation, nor in like wise he that intendeth to persevere in sin and do no good 80 for himself. But since that we be not in that case, but have with help of God’s grace deserved to be partners of such good deeds as ye that are our friends will of your goodness do for us, ye may by your merits highly relieve us here and help to get us hence. 85
 And surely great wonder were it if we should not be able to take profit of your prayers. For there will no wise man doubt but that the prayer of any member of Christendom may profit any other that it is made 90 for which hath need and is a member of the same.

287 Heb 12:6 288 but if... will:
 unless he will 289 living 290 recoil 291 appearance 292 deprive of 293 his place 294 everything 295 bit 296 incapable of experiencing suffering

297 To what purpose 298 Why 299 See Rom 10:1; Eph 1:15–18 and 6:18–20; Phil 1:9–10; 2 Thes 1:11–12; and 1 Tm 2:1–4. 300 the rather: sooner;
 all the more 301 See Acts 12:5–12.

302 disposition; inclination 303 concern
 304 seely parted: poor or helpless departed
 305 vigorously; perceptively 306 See Augustine, De cura pro mortuis 1.18.22 (PL 40: 609). 307 from, out of

But none is there yet living that is more very<sup>308</sup> member of Christ's mystical body—that is, his Church—than we be, nor no man living that hath more need of help than we. For in surety<sup>309</sup> of salvation we be fellows with angels; in need of relief we be yet fellows with you. And therefore being so sure members of one body with angels, holy saints, and you, and having necessity both of their help and yours, there is no doubt but since every member that need hath may take good by others, we stand in the case that both angels' and saints' intercessions and your good prayers and alms-deed done for us, whatsoever these heretics babble, may do us marvelously much good.

How many have by God's most gracious favor appeared unto their friends after the death and showed themselves helped and delivered hence by pilgrimage, alms-deed, and prayer—and special<sup>310</sup> by the sacred oblation of that Holy Sacrament offered for them in the Mass. If these heretics say that all such things be lies, then be they much worse yet than their master was, Luther himself, as long as any spark of shame was in him. For he confesseth in his sermons that many such apparitions be true, and his heart could not for very shame serve<sup>311</sup> him that so many so often told in so many places, so faithfully reported by so many honest folk, and so substantially<sup>312</sup> written by so many blessed saints, should be all false.

Wherein if these men list<sup>313</sup> like lusty<sup>314</sup> scholars to pass and overgo<sup>315</sup> their mad master in this point, and deny these things altogether, yet shall there stick in their teeth the scripture of the Maccabees, whereof we told you that Judas Maccabeus gathered and sent a great offering to Jerusalem for to buy sacrifice to be offered for them that he found slain in the field,<sup>316</sup> and certain things about them taken of the idols forbidden them by the Law, which caused him to fear lest they were for their sins fallen after their death into pain, and therefore made that gathering, that alms and offering (as himself saith), that they might thereby be loosed and delivered of their sins.<sup>317</sup> So that there appeareth plainly by Scripture that such suffrages stand us seely souls in stead.<sup>318</sup> Against which authority, if they will with their master labor to break out and deny that book for Holy Scripture, we have stopped them that gap already with such a bush of thorns as will prick their hands through a pair of hedging gloves ere<sup>319</sup> they pull it out.

And finally, for this point that the suffrages<sup>320</sup> of the Church and the prayers of good Christian people stand us here in relief and comfort, there needeth in this world (as Saint Augustine saith, and Saint Damascene)<sup>321</sup> none other manner<sup>322</sup> proof than that all Christendom hath ever used to do so, and have thought themselves always so bounden to do, damning always for heretics all them that would affirm the contrary.

And in this point may they have a marvelous great thing against them in the judgment of every good man: the great antiquity of the service<sup>323</sup> of Christ's Church, by which the Church hath so<sup>324</sup> long ago customably recommended in their prayers all Christian souls to God. For we trust that though<sup>325</sup> these heretics find many men both glad to hear and light<sup>326</sup> to believe every lewd<sup>327</sup> tale that can be surmised<sup>328</sup> against the Church that now is, yet trust we that they shall find few or none so far out of all frame<sup>329</sup> but that they will at the least believe that there hath been some good and godly men, wise and well learned too, among the clergy in days past one time or other. Go then to the old time and to the good men that then were, and hear what they said, and see what they did, and believe and follow them. There remaineth yet, and books enough thereof, the very Mass in the very form and fashion as Saint Basil, and Saint Chrysostom, and other holy fathers in that virtuous time said it,<sup>330</sup> in which ye shall find that in their daily Masses they prayed ever for all Christian souls.

Ye shall also perceive clearly by Saint Chrysostom in a sermon of his<sup>331</sup> that in his time there were in the funeral service, at the burying of the corpse, the selfsame psalms sung that ye sing now at the Dirge.<sup>332</sup> Whereby it well appeareth that it is no

308 truly a 309 security; certainty
310 especially 311 prompt 312 soundly
313 choose; wish 314 vigorous; self-confident 315 pass and overgo: surpass and overtake 316 battlefield 317 See 2 Mc 12:38-45. 318 stand...stead: benefit us poor souls 319 before 320 prayers for the dead 321 See Augustine's De cura

pro mortuis (PL 40: 593) and Sermones 172 (PL 38: 936-37). Also see De iis qui in fide dormierunt (PG 95: 249-50), a work incorrectly attributed to St. John Damascene (ca. 675-749) in More's time. 322 kind of 323 liturgy 324 from so 325 even if 326 frivolous, unthinking 327 rude; uneducated; wicked

328 alleged 329 order 330 See PG 31: 1641, 1656, 1672, 1675; 63: 905, 917. 331 See Chrysostom's In epistolam ad Philippenses commentarius 1.3.4 (PG 62: 204). 332 prayer service (taken from the Office for the Dead) which preceded the funeral Mass

new-found thing, for his time was far above a thousand years ago, and yet was that thing long used afore<sup>333</sup> his days. And because<sup>334</sup> ye shall know that the more surely, he saith that the guise<sup>335</sup> and custom to pray for souls was instituted and begun in the Church by the blessed apostles themselves. And so while so good men so long ago began it, and good folk hath ever since continued it, ye may soon guess whether they be good men or no that now provoke you to break it.

Now where they say that if the Mass could do us any good, that then the priests be very cruel that will say none for us but they be waged,<sup>336</sup> this word is as true as their intent is fraudulent and false. For their purpose is in those words to make the world ween<sup>337</sup> that the clergy were so covetous and cruel therewith that there will no priest pray for us poor souls here without<sup>338</sup> he be hired thereto, whereof, our Lord be thanked, we find full well the contrary. For albeit that<sup>339</sup> of Luther's priests we can have none help, since their Masses offer not up the sacrament to God neither for quick<sup>340</sup> nor dead, nor make no very<sup>341</sup> priests among them, since they take priesthood for no sacrament, yet of good Christian priests we find great relief, as well in their Dirges and much other suffrages by old institution of the Church specially said for us, though<sup>342</sup> no man give them one penny through the year. And so may all the world wit<sup>343</sup> that this word of these heretics hath much malice and little effect therein.

But now, though the priests pray for us of their own charity, yet when good people desire them thereto and give them their alms therefor,<sup>344</sup> then are they double bounden, and then riseth there much more good and profit upon all sides. For then take we fruit both of the prayer of the one and the alms of the other. And then taketh the priest benefit of his own prayer made both for the giver and for us. The giver also getteth fruit both of his own merciful alms, and of double prayer also — that is to wit,<sup>345</sup> both the prayer of the priest that prayeth for us, which commonly prayeth for him too, and also the prayer of us, which<sup>346</sup> with great fervor of heart pray for our benefactors incessantly and are so far-forth<sup>347</sup> in God's undoubted favor that very few men living upon earth are so well heard as we — besides that of all kinds of alms that any man can give, the most meritorious is that which is bestowed upon us, as well for that<sup>348</sup> it is unto the most needy and also to them that are absent, and finally for that of all manner alms it is most grounded upon the foundation of all Christian virtues: faith. For as for<sup>349</sup> to poor folk, a natural man will give alms either for pity of some piteous sight, or for weariness of their importunate crying, but as for us poor souls passed the world, whom he that giveth alms neither seeth nor heareth, would never bestow one penny upon us but if<sup>350</sup> he had a faith that we live still, and that he feared that we lie in pain, and hoped of his reward in heaven. Which kind of faith and good hope joined with his gift and good work must needs make it one of the best kinds of alms-deed that any man can do in the world.

And since that it so is (as indeed it is), what uncharitable and what unfaithful folk are these that for hatred which they owe to priested<sup>351</sup> would make you believe that there were no purgatory, and would rather wish by their wills that their own fathers should lie here in fire till the Day of Doom<sup>352</sup> than any man should give a priest one penny to pray for them?

And yet is there here one thing well to be considered: that they rather hate priests for hatred of Christ's faith than speak against purgatory for hatred of priests. Which thing, though it seem you dark<sup>353</sup> at the first hearing, ye shall yet, if ye look well, very well perceive. For if it so were that this kind of people did speak against purgatory only for the hatred of the pope and the clergy, then would they grant that saved souls are yet purged in the fire here for their sins unsatisfied<sup>354</sup> in the world, and it should then suffice them to say for their purpose that neither priest nor pope nor any man else, nor any man's alms or prayer, can in this place of punishment anything relieve us. For this were enough, ye see well, to serve their purpose against the clergy. But yet because they have a far further purpose against all good Christian faith, they be not content therefore to leave at this point, but step them forth farther and deny purgatory utterly, to the end that

333 before 334 so that 335 practice 336 but they be waged: unless they be paid 337 think 338 unless 339 albeit that: although 340 living 341 true; proper 342 even if 343 know

344 for it 345 say 346 who 347 so far-forth: to such an extent 348 for that: because 349 regards 350 but if:
unless 351 owe . . . priested: bear toward the ordained (those who have been made priests) 352 Day of Doom: Judgment Day 353 hard to understand or perceive 354 not absolved

men should take boldness to care the less for their sins. And if they might once be believed therein, then would they step yet farther and deny hell and all, and after that heaven too. But as for heaven, albeit that as yet they deny it not, yet pull they many a simple soul thence, which were it not for their mischievous<sup>355</sup> doctrine were else well likely to be there a full bright and glorious saint.

And surely the more that wise men advise themselves upon this matter, the more shall they marvel of the mad mind<sup>356</sup> of them that deny purgatory, or say that the prayers or good works of men living in the world can do us here no good. For every man that any wit<sup>357</sup> hath wotteth<sup>358</sup> well that the surest way were in every doubt best to be taken. Now suppose then that purgatory could in no wise be proved, and that some would yet say plainly that there were one, and some would say plainly nay; let us now see whether<sup>359</sup> sort of these twain<sup>360</sup> might take most harm, if their part<sup>361</sup> were the wrong. First, he that believed there were purgatory, and that his prayer and good works wrought for his friends' souls might relieve them therein, and because thereof used much prayer and alms for them, he could not lose the reward of his good will although his opinion were untrue, and that there were no purgatory at all, no more than he loseth<sup>362</sup> his labor now that prayeth for one whom he feareth to lie in purgatory whereas he is already in heaven. But on the other side, he that believeth there is none, and therefore prayeth for none, if his opinion be false and that there be purgatory indeed (as indeed there is), he loseth much good and getteth him also much harm, for he both feareth much the less to sin and to lie long in purgatory, saving<sup>363</sup> that his heresy shall save him thence and send him down deep into hell.

And it fareth between these two kinds of folk as it fared between a lewd<sup>364</sup> gallant and a poor friar. Whom when the gallant saw going barefoot in a great frost and snow, he asked him why he did take such pain. And he answered that it was very little pain if a man would remember hell. “Yea, Friar,” quoth the gallant, “but what and<sup>365</sup> there be none hell? Then art thou a great fool.” “Yea, Master,” quoth the friar, “but what and there be hell? Then is your Mastership a much more fool.”

Moreover, there was never yet any of that sort that could for shame say that any man is in peril for believing that there is purgatory. But they say only that there is none in deed,<sup>366</sup> and that they may without any sin affirm their opinion for truth. But now upon the other side, many a hundred thousand—that is to wit, all the whole Church of Christ that is or ever hath been—affirm that the affirming of their opinion against purgatory is a plain damnable heresy.

Wherefore it well and plainly appeareth, and every wise man well seeth, that it is the far surer<sup>367</sup> way to believe in such wise as both the parties agree to be out of all peril than that way which so far the greater party, and much further the better party, affirm to be undoubted deadly<sup>368</sup> sin. And now, whereas every fool may see that any wise man will take the surest way—which is, as ye see doubly proved, to believe that there is purgatory—yet said the wise proctor<sup>369</sup> of beggars that wise men will say there is none. For he saith that many great lettered men, and right cunning<sup>370</sup> men, will not let<sup>371</sup> to put themselves in jeopardy of shame, and of death also, to show their minds<sup>372</sup> that there is no purgatory. He is loath to say that these be heretics, but he saith these be they that men call heretics. Wherein he speaketh much like as if he would point with his finger to a flock of fat wethers,<sup>373</sup> and say, “These be such beasts as men call sheep.”

But now would we fain<sup>374</sup> see which be these wise men and well-lettered, which shall not fail upon their own confession to agree that their adversaries take the sure way and farthest out of peril, and themselves the most dangerous and farthest from all surety. But yet would we for the while fain hear who they be. Surely none other but Luther and Tyndale, and this beggars' proctor, and a few such of that sect—men of such virtue, wisdom, and learning as their lewd<sup>375</sup> writing, and much more their lewd living, showeth.

But now are they far another manner<sup>376</sup> sort, both in number, wisdom, learning, truth, and good living, which affirm and say the contrary. And surely if three or four hundred good and honest men would faithfully come forth and tell one that some of his friends were in a far country for debt kept in prison,

355 wicked 356 disposition; judgment
357 intelligence, sense 358 knows 359 which 360 two 361 side
362 wastes 363 except 364 wicked

365 if 366 truth; fact 367 safer 368 mortal 369 advocate; representative; alms-collector 370 intelligent; learned 371 hesitate 372 judgments;

opinions 373 rams 374 gladly; willingly 375 wicked 376 kind of

and that his charity might relieve<sup>377</sup> them thence, if then three or four fond<sup>378</sup> fellows would come and say the contrary and tell him plain there is no such prison at all, as he is borne in hand<sup>379</sup> that his friends
 5 are imprisoned in — if he would now be so light<sup>380</sup> to believe those three or four naughty<sup>381</sup> persons against those three or four hundred good and honest men, he then should well decipher<sup>382</sup> himself, and well declare thereby, that he would gladly catch 10 hold of some small handle<sup>383</sup> to keep his money fast<sup>384</sup> rather than help his friends in their necessity.

Now if ye consider how late<sup>385</sup> this lewd sect began, which among Christian men barketh against purgatory, and how few always, for very shame of 15 their folly, hath hitherto fallen into them, and then if ye consider on the other side how full and whole the great corps<sup>386</sup> of all Christian countries so many hundred years have ever told you the contrary, ye shall, we be very sure, for every person speaking 20 against purgatory find for the other part<sup>387</sup> more than many a hundred.

Now if these men will peradventure<sup>388</sup> say that they care not for such comparison, neither of time with time, number with number, nor company
 25 with company, but since some one man is in credence worth some seven score<sup>389</sup> — if they will therefore call us to some other reckoning and will that we compare of the best choice on both sides a certain,<sup>390</sup> and match them man for man, then have we
 30 (if we might for shame match such blessed saints with a sort as far unlike) Saint Augustine against Friar Luther, Saint Jerome against Friar Lambert,<sup>391</sup> Saint Ambrose against Friar Hussgen,<sup>392</sup> Saint Gregory against priest Pomeranus,<sup>393</sup> Saint Chrysostom against Tyndale,<sup>394</sup> Saint Basil against the beggars' proctor.

Now if our enemies will, for lack of other choice, help forth their own part with their wives, then have they some advantage indeed, for the other 40 holy saints had none. But yet shall we not lack blessed holy women against these friars' wives. For we shall have Saint Anastasia<sup>395</sup> against Friar

Luther's wife,<sup>396</sup> Saint Hildegard<sup>397</sup> against Friar Hussgen's wife, Saint Bridget<sup>398</sup> against Friar Lambert's wife, and Saint Catherine of Siena<sup>399</sup> against priest Pomeranus's wife. 45

Now if they will have in these matches the qualities of either side considered, then have we wisdom against folly, cunning against ignorance, charity against malice, true faith against heresies, humility against arrogance, revelations against illusions,
 50 inspiration of God against inventions of the devil, constancy against wavering, abstinence against gluttony, continence against lechery, and finally every kind of virtue against every kind of vice. 55

And over<sup>400</sup> this, whereas we be not yet very sure whether that all these naughty persons whom we have rehearsed you of the worse side be fully fallen so mad as utterly to deny purgatory, saving<sup>401</sup> in that we see them in many things all of one sect, yet if 60 there were of them far many such more, they shall not yet find of that simple suit<sup>402</sup> half so many as for our part remaineth holy blessed saints to match them. For likewise as many<sup>403</sup> their holy works, eruditely written and by the help of the Holy Ghost
 65 indited,<sup>404</sup> evidently declare that not only Saint Augustine, Saint Jerome, Saint Ambrose, and that holy pope Saint Gregory, with Saint Chrysostom, and Saint Basil afore-remembered,<sup>405</sup> and those holy women also that we have spoken of, but over that,
 70 the great solemn doctor Origen, all the three great doctors and holy saints of one name in Greece — Gregory Nazianzen, Gregory Nyssene, Gregory Emissenus<sup>406</sup> — Saint Cyril,<sup>407</sup> Saint Damascene, the famous doctor and holy martyr Saint Cyprian,
 75 Saint Hilary,<sup>408</sup> Saint Bede,<sup>409</sup> and Saint Thomas, and finally all such as are of that suit and sort, either Greeks or Latins, have ever taught and testified and exhorted the people to pray for all Christian souls and preached for purgatory, so doth there no man
 80 doubt but that all good and devout Christian people, from Christ's days hitherto, hath firm and fast been of the same belief, and with their daily prayers and alms-deed done for us have done us great relief.

377 release 378 foolish 379 borne in hand: being led to believe 380 unthinking 381 bad, wicked 382 reveal 383 excuse 384 secure 385 recently 386 body; collective 387 side 388 perhaps 389 140 390 certain one 391 Francis Lambert (1486–1530) 392 Johannes Oecolampadius (1482–1531) 393 John Bugenhagen (1485–1558) 394 William Tyndale (1494–1536)

395 St. Anastasia of Sirmium (d. 304), a martyr during the persecutions of Diocletian 396 Katherine von Bora (1499–1552), a Cistercian nun before her marriage to Luther 397 St. Hildegard (1098–1179), a German mystic 398 St. Bridget of Sweden (ca. 1303–73) 399 St. Catherine of Siena (1347–80), an Italian mystic 400 in addition to 401 except 402 simple suit: foolish company 403 many of 404 inspired 405 aforementioned 406 St. Gregory of Nazianzus (ca. 330–89), St. Gregory of Nyssa (ca. 335–94), St. Gregory of Neocaesarea (213–70) 407 St. Cyril of Alexandria (ca. 375–444) 408 St. Hilary of Poitiers (ca. 315–ca. 367) 409 St. Bede the Venerable (ca. 672–753)

So that, as we said, both for number of many folk and goodness of chosen folk our enemies are far under us. And yet have we for the vantage,<sup>410</sup> as we have before declared you, the fear of Hezekiah, the book of the Kings, the words of the prophet Zechariah, the faith of Maccabeus, the authority of Saint John, the words of Saint Peter, the sentence<sup>411</sup> of Saint Paul, the testimony of Saint Matthew, and the plain sentence of our Savior Christ.<sup>412</sup>

Now if these heretics be so stiff and stubborn that rather than they will confess themselves concluded<sup>413</sup> they will hold on their old ways and fall from worse to worse, and like as they have already against their former promise first rejected reason, and after law, and then all the doctors and old holy fathers of Christ's Church, and finally the whole Church itself, so if they will at length, as we greatly fear they will, reject all Scripture and cast off Christ and all — now, as we say, if they so do, yet have we left at the worst way<sup>414</sup> Luther against Luther, Hussgen against Hussgen, Tyndale against Tyndale, and finally every heretic against himself. And then when these folk sit in Almaine<sup>415</sup> upon their beer bench in judgment on us and our matters, we may as the knight of King Alexander appealed from Alexander to Alexander — from Alexander the drunk to Alexander the sober — so shall we appeal from Luther to Luther — from Luther the drunken to Luther the sober, from Luther the heretic to Luther the Catholic — and likewise in all the remnant.

For this doth no man doubt but that every one of them all, before they fell drunk of the dregs of old poisoned heresies, in which they fell a-quaffing<sup>416</sup> with the devil, they did full sadly<sup>417</sup> and soberly pray for all Christian souls. But since that they be fallen drunken in wretched and sinful heresies, they neither care for other men's souls nor for their own neither. And on the other side, if ever they work with grace to purge themselves of those poisoned heresies, wherewith they be now so drunk, they will then give sentence<sup>418</sup> on our side, as they did before. It were not evil that we showed you somewhat for example whereby ye may see what soberness they were in before, and in what drunkenness the devil's draught hath brought them. And in whom should we show it better than in Luther himself, arch-heretic and father abbot of all that drunken fellowship?

First, this man was so fast of<sup>419</sup> our side, while he was well and sober, that yet when he began to be well washed<sup>420</sup> he could not find in his heart utterly to fall from us. But when his head first began to daze of<sup>421</sup> that evil drink, he wrote that purgatory could not be proved by Scripture. And yet that notwithstanding, he wrote in this wise<sup>422</sup> therewith: "I am very sure that there is purgatory, and it little moveth me what heretics babble. Should I believe a heretic born of late, scant<sup>423</sup> fifty years ago, and say the faith were false that hath been held so many hundred years?"<sup>424</sup> Lo, here this man spoke well upon our side. But yet said he therewith one thing or twain<sup>425</sup> that could not stand therewith, and thereby may ye see that he began to reel. For he both affirmed that purgatory could not be proved by Scripture, and affirmed further that nothing could be taken for a sure and certain truth but if<sup>426</sup> it appeared by "clear and evident Scripture." Which two things presupposed, how could any man be sure of purgatory? But the help is that both those points be false. For both is purgatory proved by Scripture, and the Catholic faith of Christ's Church were<sup>427</sup> sufficient to make men sure thereof albeit<sup>428</sup> there were not in all Scripture one text for it, and diverse that seemed against it, as we have showed you before.

But here, as we say, ye see how shamefully he staggered and began to reel, howbeit soon after, being so dowsy<sup>429</sup> drunk that he could neither stand nor reel, but fell down sow-drunk in the mire, then like one that nothing remembered what he had said, nor heard not his own voice, he began to be himself that babbling heretic against whom he had written before, and being not fully fifty years old began to gainsay<sup>430</sup> the faith of almost fifteen hundred years afore his days in the Church of Christ, besides fifteen hundred years three times told among other faithful folk before.<sup>431</sup> For now in his drunken sermon that he wrote upon the Gospel of the rich man and Lazarus, whereas he had in his other books before framed of<sup>432</sup> his own fantasy new fond<sup>433</sup> fashions of purgatory, and told them forth for as plain

410 for the vantage: in addition 411 passage; insight 412 See Is 38; 1 Sm 2:6; Zec 9:11; 2 Mc 12:38–45; 1 Jn 5:16; Acts 2:24; 1 Cor 3:11–15; Mt 12:31–32, 36. 413 confuted, overcome 414 at the worst way:

if worst comes to worst 415 Germany 416 into drinking copiously 417 seriously 418 judgment; verdict 419 fast of: fixed on 420 soaked in wine 421 from 422 way 423 scarcely 424 WA 1: 555–56

425 two 426 but if: unless 427 would be 428 even if 429 stupid 430 deny 431 More is referring to the timeline of 4,500 years between Adam and Christ. 432 from 433 foolish matters as though he had been here and seen them, now in this mad sermon of his, he saith plainly that there is none at all, but that all souls lie still and sleep, and so sleep shall until the Day of Doom.

5 O sow-drunken soul, drowned in such an insensible sleep that he lieth and routeth<sup>434</sup> while the apostles, the evangelists, all the doctors of Christ's Church, all the whole Christian people, and among them Christ himself, stand and cry at his ear that 10 we seely<sup>435</sup> Christian souls lie and burn in purgatory, and he cannot hear, but lieth still in the mire and snorteth and there dreameth that we lie still and sleep as he doth.

And thus, whereas the beggars' proctor<sup>436</sup> writeth 15 that wise men say there is no purgatory, ye see now yourself how wise is he whom they take for the wisest of all that sort, as him that is now the very well-spring and arch-heretic of all their sect. Of all which wise men we leave it to your wisdom to consider,
20 whether ye find any whom your wisdoms would in wisdom compare with any of those old holy doctors and saints whom we have rehearsed<sup>437</sup> before. But this man, we wot<sup>438</sup> well, for another of these wise men meaneth William Tyndale. Whose wisdom well appeareth in that matter by that<sup>439</sup> he layeth against it nothing but scoffing, wherein he saith that the pope may be bold in<sup>440</sup> purgatory because it is, he saith, a thing "of his own making,"<sup>441</sup> whereas we have proved you by Scripture that purgatory was 30 perceived and taught, and dead men's souls prayed for, so long ere ever any pope began.

But forasmuch as he saith that wise men will say there is no purgatory—among which wise men we doubt not but the wise man accounteth himself, for he layeth for that part,<sup>442</sup> as himself weeneth,<sup>443</sup> very wise and weighty reasons, the wisdom whereof we have already proved you very plain frantic<sup>444</sup> folly—we will now finish the dispicions<sup>445</sup> of all this debate and question, with the declaration of one or 40 two points of his especial wisdom, and with one of which himself wisely destroyeth all his whole matter.

First, ye see well that albeit<sup>446</sup> indeed he intendeth to go further if his bill were once well sped,<sup>447</sup>

yet he pretendeth nothing in visage<sup>448</sup> but only the spoil,<sup>449</sup> wedding, and beating of the clergy, to whom he layeth<sup>450</sup> not all only such faults as ye have heard, and hath proved his purpose<sup>451</sup> with such grounds as we have proved false, but also layeth one great necessity to take all from them: because they 50 break the statute made of mortmain,<sup>452</sup> and purchase more lands still against the provision thereof. And then saith he that any land which once cometh in their hands cometh never out again. For he saith that they have such laws concerning their lands as they may neither give any nor sell. For which cause, 55 lest they should at length have all, he deviseth to let them have nothing.

Now first, where he maketh as though there came yet, for all the statute, daily much land into them,<sup>453</sup> and that there can none at all come from them, neither is the one so much as he would make it seem, and the other is very false. For truly there may come and doth come land from them by escheat,<sup>454</sup> as we be sure many of you have had experience, and also 60 what laws soever they have of their own that prohibit them to sell their lands, yet of this are we very sure, that notwithstanding all the laws they have, they may sell in such wise, if they will, all the lands they have, that they can never recover foot<sup>455</sup> again. And besides all that, albeit there be laws made by the Church against such sales as shrewd husbands<sup>456</sup> would else boldly make of the lands of their monasteries, yet is there not so precise provision made against all sales of their lands, but that they be alienated<sup>457</sup> for cause reasonable, approved by the advice and counsel of their chief head. And many a man is there in the realm that hath lands given or sold out of abbeyes and out of bishoprics both, so that this part is a plain lie.
80

The other part is also neither very certain nor very much to purpose. For truly, though that in the city of London, to which there is granted by authority of Parliament that men may there devise<sup>458</sup> their lands into mortmain by their testaments,<sup>459</sup> there is somewhat among<sup>460</sup> given into the Church—and yet not all to them, but the great part unto the companies and fellowships of the crafts—in other 85

434 snores 435 poor; helpless
436 advocate; representative; alms-collector
437 cited 438 know 439 by that: since 440 regarding 441 Tyndale, Obedience of a Christian Man (1528) 442 side of the controversy 443 thinks 444 insane 445 disputations 446 although

447 met with success 448 pretendeth
nothing in visage: claims nothing in appearance 449 despoiling 450 ascribes 451 case 452 the statute made of mortmain: statute forbidding transfer of lands into the inalienable ownership of any entity without license of the Crown 453 their possession 454 reversion of property to the Crown when there are no legal heirs 455 one square foot 456 shrewd husbands: cunning managers 457 parted with; transferred to their own ownership 458 bequeath 459 wills 460 somewhat among: something now and then places of the realm there is nowadays no great thing given, but if<sup>461</sup> it be sometimes some small thing for the foundation of a chantry.<sup>462</sup> For as for abbeys or such other great foundations, there be not nowadays many made, nor have been of good while, except somewhat done in the universities.

And yet whoso consider those great foundations, that have this great while been made anywhere, shall well perceive that the substance<sup>463</sup> of them be not all founded upon temporal<sup>464</sup> lands newly taken out of the temporal hands into the Church, but of such as the Church had long afore, and now the same translated<sup>465</sup> from one place unto another. And over<sup>466</sup> this shall he find that many an abbey, whose whole living this man weeneth stood all by<sup>467</sup> temporal lands given them in their foundation, have the great part thereof in benefices<sup>468</sup> given in and impropriated<sup>469</sup> unto them. So that if he consider the substance of all the great foundations made this great while, and all that hath into any such these many days been given, and then consider well therewith how cold the charity of Christian people waxeth<sup>470</sup> by the means of such devil's proctors as, under pretext of begging for the poor, intend and labor to quench the fervor of devotion to Godward<sup>471</sup> in simple and soon-led souls, he shall not need to fear that all the temporal land in the realm shall come into the spirituality.<sup>472</sup> And yet if men went now so fast to give in still to the Church as they did before, while devotion was fervent in the people and virtue plenteous in the Church, yet might it be — and in other countries is provided for well enough — both that men's devotion might be favored, and yet not the Church have all.

But this wise man, lest they should have all, would leave them right nought.<sup>473</sup> For his wisdom weeneth there were no mean<sup>474</sup> way between every whit<sup>475</sup> and never a whit but nothing at all. And surely where that he layeth so sore unto<sup>476</sup> them the new purchasing of more temporal lands, either bought or given them, it appeareth well he would say sore<sup>477</sup> to them if they pulled the land from men by force, which now layeth so highly to their charge<sup>478</sup> because they take it when men give it them, which thing we suppose himself, as holy as he is, would not much refuse. Nor they be not much to be blamed if they receive men's devotion, but if<sup>479</sup> they bestow it not well.

And yet where he saith there can no statute hold them, but they purchase still and break the statute — wherein he would seem cunning<sup>480</sup> because he had a little smattering in the law — it were good, ere he be so bold to put his ignorance in writing, that he should see the statute better. Which when he list<sup>481</sup> to look upon again and let some wiser man look with him, if he consider well what remedy the statutes provide and for whom, he shall find that the makers of the statute not so much feared the great high point that pricketh him now, lest the whole temporal lands should come into the Church, as they did the loss of their wards, and their unlikelihood of escheats<sup>482</sup> and some other commodities<sup>483</sup> that they lacked when their lands were alienated into the Church — and yet not into the Church only but also into any mortmain.<sup>484</sup> And for this they provided that if any more were alienated<sup>485</sup> into the Church or into any manner of mortmain, the king or any other lord, mediate or immediate,<sup>486</sup> that might take loss thereby might enter thereinto, to the intent that, ere ever the purchase were made, they should be fain in such wise<sup>487</sup> to sue to every one of them for his license and good will that each of them should be arbiter of his own hurt or loss and take his amends at his own hand.<sup>488</sup> And this statute is not made only for the advantage of the temporal lords against the clergy, but it is made indifferently<sup>489</sup> against all mortmain, which is as well temporal folk as spiritual, and for the benefit as well of spiritual men as temporal. For as well shall a bishop or an abbot have the advantage of that statute, if his tenant alienate his lands into any mortmain, as shall an earl or a duke.

And now when the Church pulleth not away the land from the owner by force, but hath it of<sup>490</sup> his

461 but if: unless 462 a chapel endowed for the daily singing of Masses for certain souls 463 subsistence, capital 464 secular 465 the same translated: i.e., the same capital has been transferred 466 in addition to 467 weeneth stood all by: thinks depended entirely on 468 ecclesiastical livings 469 annexed 470 is becoming 471 to Godward:

toward God 472 clergy's possession 473 nothing 474 middle 475 little bit 476 layeth so sore unto: charges so grievously against 477 say sore to: speak harshly 478 which . . . charge: who now so haughtily reproaches them 479 but if: unless 480 learned 481 chooses; wishes 482 reversions of property to the Crown when there are no legal heirs 483 benefits

484 statute forbidding transfer of lands into inalienable ownership of any entity without license of the Crown 485 parted with; transferred to other ownership 486 mediate or intermediate: possessing directly or through an intermediary (under feudal law) 487 fain . . . wise: obliged in such a way 488 discretion 489 impartially 490 out of devotion, and his gift given of his own offer unasked, and yet not without license of all such as the statute limiteth,<sup>491</sup> where is this great fault of theirs, for which, lest they should take more in the same 5 manner, he would they should<sup>492</sup> lose all that they have already? What wisdom is this, when he lay-eth<sup>493</sup> against them their deed wherein they break no law? And yet, since they cannot take it without<sup>494</sup> the king and the lords, his words, if they weighed 10 aught,<sup>495</sup> should run to the reproach and blame of them whom he would fain<sup>496</sup> flatter, without fault founden in them whom he so sore accuseth.

But now the special high point of his wisdom, for which we be driven to speak of this matter, he 15 specially declareth in this. Ye see well that he would that the temporal men should take from the clergy, not only all these lands purchased since the statute of mortmain, but also all that ever they had before too, and yet over this, all the whole living that ever 20 they have by any manner means besides, because he thinketh that they have too much by altogether.

And when he hath given his advice thereto and said that they have too much, then saith he by and by<sup>497</sup> that if there were any purgatory in deed,<sup>498</sup> it 25 were well done to give them yet more, and that they have then a great deal too little. But now so is it that purgatory there is in deed, nor no good Christian man is there but he will and must believe and confess the same. Whereof it plainly followeth that, his 30 own agreement added unto the truth (that is to say, that the Church hath, as he saith, too little if there be a purgatory, added unto the truth that there is a purgatory, and that every true Christian man doth and must confess it), then hath, lo, the wise man 35 brought all his purpose so substantially<sup>499</sup> to pass that, by his own plain agreement added unto the undoubtable truth, no man may do that<sup>500</sup> he would have all men do — spoil and pill<sup>501</sup> the Church — but he that will first plainly profess himself a plain and 40 undoubted heretic.

And therefore, since ye now see the wit<sup>502</sup> of this wise man that laboreth to bring us out of your remembrance; since ye see the simple<sup>503</sup> ground of his proud Supplication, and ye perceive the rancor and malice that his matter standeth on, for fulfill- 45

ing whereof he would by his will bring all the world in trouble; and since ye see that he hateth the clergy for the faith, and us for the clergy, and in reproving<sup>504</sup> purgatory proveth himself an infidel; since we have made it you clear that your prayers may do us 50 good, and have showed it you so plainly that a child may perceive it, not only by the common opinion of all people and the fast<sup>505</sup> infallible faith of all Christian people from Christ's days until your own time, confirmed by the doctrine of all holy doctors, de- 55
clared by good reason, and proved by the Scripture of God, both apostles and evangelists, and our Savior Christ himself, we will encumber you no further with disputing upon the matter, nor argue the thing as doubtful that is undoubted and questionless. 60

But letting pass over such heretics as are our malicious mortal enemies, praying God of his grace to give them better mind,<sup>506</sup> we shall turn us to you that are faithful folk and our dear loving friends, beseeching your goodness of your tender pity that we 65 may be remembered with your charitable alms and prayer. And in this part, albeit we stand in such case that it better becometh us to beseech and pray every man than to find any fault with any man, yet are we somewhat constrained not to make any matter 70 of quarrel or complaint against any man's unkindness,<sup>507</sup> but surely to mourn and lament our own hard fortune and chance in the lack of relief and comfort which we miss from our friends, not of evil mind withdrawn us<sup>508</sup> or of unfaithfulness, but of 75 negligence forslothed<sup>509</sup> and foded forth<sup>510</sup> of forgetfulness. If ye that are such (for ye be not all such) might look upon us and behold in what heavy<sup>511</sup> plight we lie, your sloth would soon be quickened,<sup>512</sup> and your oblivion<sup>513</sup> turn to fresh remembrance. 80

For if your father, your mother, your child, your brother, your sister, your husband, your wife, or a very stranger too, lay in your sight somewhere in fire, and that your means might help him, what heart were so hard, what stomach<sup>514</sup> were so stony, 85 that could sit in rest at supper, or sleep in rest abed, and let a man lie and burn? We find, therefore, full true that old-said saw,<sup>515</sup> “out of sight, out

491 restricts; prohibits 492 would they should: wants them to 493 charges; alleges 494 without the permission of 495 anything 496 desire to 497 by and by: immediately 498 truth 499 soundly 500 what 501 spoil and

pill: despoil and pillage 502 intellect; ingenuity 503 foolish 504 rejecting 505 fixed, steadfast 506 disposition; judgment 507 unnatural disposition; absence of natural affection or loyalty 508 of evil . . . us: on account of ill will withdrawn from us 509 neglected 510 foded forth: put off; deferred 511 grievous 512 enlivened 513 oblivion 514 disposition; temperament 515 old-said saw: old saying of mind.” And yet surely, to say the truth, we cannot therein with reason much complain upon you. For while we were with you there, for wantonness<sup>516</sup> of that wretched world we forgot in like wise our 5 good friends here. And therefore can we not marvel much though<sup>517</sup> the justice of God suffer<sup>518</sup> us to be forgotten of you as others have been before forgotten of us. But we beseech our Lord for both our 10 sakes to give you the grace to mend for your part that common fault of us both, lest when ye come hither hereafter, God of like justice suffer you to be forgotten of them that ye leave there behind you, as ye forget us that are hither afore you.

But albeit that we cannot well, as we say, for the 15 like fault in ourselves, greatly rebuke or blame this negligence and forgetfulness in you, yet would we for the better wish you that ye might, without your pain, once at the leastwise behold, perceive, and see what heaviness of heart and what a sorrowful shame
 20 the seely<sup>519</sup> soul hath at his first coming hither to look his old friends in the face here, whom he remembereth himself to have so foul forgotten while he lived there. When albeit that in this place no man can be angry, yet their piteous look and lamentable countenance casteth his unkind forgetfulness into his mind, wit<sup>520</sup> ye well, dear friends, that among the manifold great and grievous pains which he suffereth here (whereof God send you the grace to suffer either none or few) the grudge<sup>521</sup> and grief
 25 of his conscience in the consideration of his unkind forgetfulness is not of all them the least.

Therefore, dear friends, let our folly learn you wisdom. Send hither your prayer; send hither your alms before you — so shall we find ease thereof, and yet shall ye find it still. For as he that lighteth another the candle hath never the less light himself, and he that bloweth the fire for another to warm him doth warm himself also therewith, so surely, good friends, the good that ye send hither before 35 you, both greatly refresheth us, and yet is wholly reserved here for you, with our prayers added thereto for your further advantage.

Would God we could have done ourselves as we now counsel you. And God give you the grace which many of us refused, to make better provision 45 while ye live than many of us have done. For much have we left in our executors’ hands, which would God we had bestowed upon poor folk for our own souls and our friends’ with our own hands. Much

 50 have many of us bestowed upon rich men in gold rings and black gowns, much in many tapers<sup>522</sup> and torches, much in worldly pomp and high solemn ceremonies about<sup>523</sup> our funerals, whereof the brotle<sup>524</sup> glory standeth us here, God wot,<sup>525</sup> in very little stead,<sup>526</sup> but hath, on the other side, done us great
 55 displeasure. For albeit that the kind solicitude and loving diligence of the quick used about<sup>527</sup> the burying of the dead is well allowed and approved afore the face of God, yet much superfluous charge<sup>528</sup> used for boast and ostentation — namely devised by 60 the dead before his death — is of God greatly disliked, and most especially that kind and fashion thereof wherein some of us have fallen, and many besides us that now lie damned in hell.

For some hath there of us, while we were in 65 health, not so much studied how we might die penitent and in good Christian plight<sup>529</sup> as how we might be solemnly borne out to burying, have gay and goodly funerals with heralds at our hearses,<sup>530</sup> and offering up our helmets, setting up our escutcheon and coat armors<sup>531</sup> on the wall, though there never came harness<sup>532</sup> on our backs, nor never ancestor of ours ever bore arms before. Then devised we some doctor<sup>533</sup> to make a sermon at our Mass in our Month’s Mind,<sup>534</sup> and there preach to our praise
 70 with some fond fantasy devised of<sup>535</sup> our name, and after Mass, much feasting, riotous and costly, and finally like madmen made men merry at our death, and take our burying for a bridal.<sup>536</sup> For special punishment whereof, some of us have been by our evil
 80 angels brought forth full heavily,<sup>537</sup> in full great despite,<sup>538</sup> to behold our own burying, and so stood in great pain invisible among the press,<sup>539</sup> and made to look on our carrion corpse carried out with great pomp, whereof our Lord knoweth we have taken 85 heavy pleasure.

Yet would ye peradventure ween<sup>540</sup> that we were in one thing well eased: in that we were, for the time,

516 unruliness; lustfulness 517 if 518 allow 519 poor 520 know 521 murmur 522 candles 523 connected with; surrounding 524 brittle, fragile 525 knows 526 standeth . . .
stead: works very little to our advantage 527 the quick used about: the living customarily practiced concerning 528 expense 529 manner, state

 530 pagoda-like structures decorated with banners, heraldic devices, and lighted candles, sometimes bearing complimentary verses attached by loved ones 531 escutcheon and coat armors: shield with armorial

bearings and coats of arms 532 armor
 533 priest 534 Month’s Mind: a memorial Mass celebrated a month after the person’s death 535 devised of: contrived from 536 wedding feast 537 miserably 538 scorn; malice 539 crowd 540 peradventure ween: perhaps think

taken hence out of the fire of our purgatory. But in this point if ye so think, ye be far deceived. For likewise as good angels and saved souls in heaven never lose nor lessen their joy by changing of their places, but though<sup>541</sup> there be any special place appointed for heaven farthest from the center of the whole world, or wheresoever it be, be it bodily or above all bodily space, the blessed heavenly spirits, wheresoever they be come, be either still in heaven or in their heavenly joy; nor Gabriel when he came down to our Lady, never forbore any part of his pleasure, but he had it peradventure with some new degree increased by the comfort of his joyful message,<sup>542</sup> but diminished might it never be, not and<sup>543</sup> he had an errand into hell—right so fareth it, on the other side, that neither damned wretches at any time, nor we for the space of our cleansing time, though we have for the generality<sup>544</sup> our common place of pain appointed us here in purgatory, yet if it please our Lord that at any season our guardians convey some of us to be, for some considerations, any time elsewhere—as some percase<sup>545</sup> to appear to some friend of ours and show him how we stand, and by the sufferance<sup>546</sup> of God's sovereign goodness to tell him with what alms, prayer, pilgrimage, or other good deed done for us he may help us hence, in which thing the devil is loath to walk with us, but he may not choose and can no further withstand us than God will give him leave—but whithersoever he carry us, we carry our pain with us, and like as the body that hath a hot fever as fervently burneth if he ride on horseback as if he lay lapped<sup>547</sup> in his bed, so carry we still about no less heat with us than if we lay bounden here. And yet the despiteful<sup>548</sup> sights that our evil angels bring us to behold abroad so far augmenteth our torment that we would wish to be drowned in the darkness that is here rather than see the sights that they show us there.

For among<sup>549</sup> they convey us into our own houses, and there double us our pain with sight sometimes of the selfsame things which while we lived was half our heaven to behold. There show they us our substance<sup>550</sup> and our bags stuffed with gold, which when we now see, we set much less by them<sup>551</sup> than would an old man that found a bag of cherry stones which he laid up when he was a child. What a sorrow hath it been to some of us when the devils hath in despiteful mockage cast in our teeth our old love borne to our money, and then showed us our executors as busily rifling and ransacking our houses, as though they were men of war that had taken a town by force.

How heavily hath it, think you, gone unto our heart when our evil angels have grinned and laughed and showed us our late wives, so soon waxen<sup>552</sup> wanton, and forgetting us, their old husbands that have loved them so tenderly and left them so rich, sit and laugh and make merry, and more too sometimes, with their new wooers, while our keepers in despite keep us there in pain to stand still, and look on. Many times would we then speak if we could be suffered,<sup>553</sup> and sore we long to say to her, “Ah, wife, wife, iwis<sup>554</sup> this was not covenant, wife, when ye wept and told me that if I left you to live by,<sup>555</sup> ye would never wed again.” We see there our children too, whom we loved so well, pipe, sing, and dance, and no more think on their fathers' souls than on their old shoes, saving that sometimes cometh out, “God have mercy on all Christian souls.” But it cometh out so coldly, and with so dull affection, that it lieth but in the lips and never came near the heart. Yet hear we sometimes our wives pray for us more warmly. For in chiding with her second husband to spite him withal,<sup>556</sup> “God have mercy,” saith she, “on my first husband's soul, for he was iwis an honest man, far unlike you.” And then marvel we much when we hear them say so well by us. For they were ever wont<sup>557</sup> to tell us otherwise.

But when we find in this wise<sup>558</sup> our wives, our children, and friends so soon and so clearly forget us, and see our executors rap and rend<sup>559</sup> unto themselves—catch every man what he can, and hold fast that<sup>560</sup> he catcheth—and care nothing for us, Lord God, what it grieveth us that we left so much behind us, and had not sent hither more of our substance before us by our own hands. For happy find we him among us that sendeth before all that may be forborne. And he that is so loath to part with aught,<sup>561</sup> that hoardeth up his goods and had as lief<sup>562</sup> die almost as to break<sup>563</sup> his heap, and then at last, when there is none other remedy but that he must needs leave it, repenteth himself

541 even if 542 Lk 1:20–37 543 even if 544 most part 545 perhaps 546 allowance; leave 547 covered up 548 cruel 549 on occasion, now and then 550 possessions them: value them much less 551 set... 552 become 553 allowed 554 indeed 555 to live by: (money) to live on 556 with

557 accustomed 558 way 559 rap and rend: snatch and wrench away 560 what 561 anything 562 rather 563 break up, cut into

suddenly and lacketh time to dispose it, and therefore biddeth his friends to bestow it well for him, our Lord is yet so merciful that, of his goodness, he accepted the good deeds that his executors do
 5 in performing his device.<sup>564</sup> And since that late is better than never, our Lord somewhat alloweth the man's mind,<sup>565</sup> by which he would his goods that he hath immoderately gathered and greedily kept together as long as he might were yet at the leastwise
 10 well bestowed at last, when he must needs go from them. Which mind yet more pleaseth God than that a man cared not what were done with them. And therefore, as we say, the goodness of God somewhat doth accept it.

15 But yet surely, since we might and ought to have done it ourselves, and of a filthy affection toward our goods could not find in our heart to part from any part of them, if our executors now deceive us and do no more for us than we did for ourselves, 20 our Lord did<sup>566</sup> us no wrong though<sup>567</sup> he never gave us thank of all our whole testament,<sup>568</sup> but imputed the frustration and not-performing of our last will unto our own fault, since the delay of our good deeds, driven<sup>569</sup> off to our death, grew but of our
 25 own sloth and fleshly love to the worldward,<sup>570</sup> with faintness of devotion to Godward,<sup>571</sup> and of little respect and regard unto our own souls. And over<sup>572</sup> this, if our executors do these good things indeed that we do thus at last devise in our testament, yet
 30 our default<sup>573</sup> driving all to our death, as we told you before, though God, as we said, of his high goodness leaveth not all unrewarded, yet this warning will we give you, that ye deceive not yourselves; we that have so died have thus found it, that the goods
 35 disposed after us get our executors great thank, and be to usward<sup>574</sup> accounted afore God much less than half our own, nor our thank nothing like to that<sup>575</sup> it would have been if we had in our health given half as much for God's sake with our own hands.

40 Of which we give you this friendly warning not for that<sup>576</sup> we would discourage you to dispose well your goods when ye die, but for that we would advise you to dispose them better while ye live.

And among all your alms, somewhat remember us: Our wives there, remember here your husbands. 45

 Our children there, remember here your parents.
 Our parents there, remember here your children.
 Our husbands there, remember here your wives.
 Ah, sweet husbands, while we lived there in that 50 wretched world with you, while ye were glad to please us, ye bestowed much upon us and put yourselves to great cost, and did us great harm therewith. With gay<sup>577</sup> gowns and gay kirtles,<sup>578</sup> and much waste in apparel, rings and ouches,<sup>579</sup> with 55 partlets and pastes<sup>580</sup> garnished with pearls, with which proud picking up, both ye took hurt and we too, many more ways than one, though we told you not so then. But two things were there special<sup>581</sup> of which yourselves felt then the one and we feel now the other. For ye had us the higher-hearted<sup>582</sup> and 60 the more stubborn to you, and God had us in less favor, and that, alack, we feel. For now that gay gear<sup>583</sup> burneth upon our backs, and those proud pearled pastes hang hot about our cheeks; those partlets 65 and those ouches hang heavy about our necks and cleave fast<sup>584</sup> fire-hot—that woe be we there, and wish that while we lived, ye never had followed our fantasies, nor never had so cockered<sup>585</sup> us, nor made us so wanton,<sup>586</sup> nor had given us other ouches than onions or great garlic heads, nor other pearls for 70 our partlets and our pastes than fair orient<sup>587</sup> peas. But now forasmuch as that is passed and cannot be called again,<sup>588</sup> we beseech you, since ye gave them us, let us have them still; let them hurt none other 75 woman but help to do us good; sell them for our sakes to set in saints' copes,<sup>589</sup> and send the money hither by mass-pennies,<sup>590</sup> and by poor men that may pray for our souls.

Our fathers also, which while we lived fostered us
 80 up so tenderly, and could not have endured to see us suffer pain, now open your hearts and fatherly affection and help us, at the leastwise with a poor man's alms. Ye would not when we were with you have letted<sup>591</sup> to lay out much money for a great 85 marriage. Which if ye meant for our sakes and not for your own worldly worship,<sup>592</sup> give us now some part thereof and relieve us here with much less cost than one marriage, and more pleasure than fifteen,

564 will, intent 565 disposition 566 would be doing 567 even if 568 thank of . . . testament: credit for our whole will 569 put 570 to the worldward: directed toward the world 571 to Godward: directed toward God

572 in addition to 573 fault 574 to usward: in relation to us 575 what 576 for that: because 577 bright, showy 578 outer petticoats 579 pendants 580 partlets and pastes: add-on collars and decorative headdresses 581 in particular

582 haughtier 583 apparel 584 fixedly 585 pampered 586 rebellious 587 precious, lustrous; of the East 588 back 589 vaults 590 an offering given for having a Mass said for a person who has died 591 hesitated 592 prestige though<sup>593</sup> every one were a prince or a princess of a realm.

Finally, all our other friends, and every good Christian man and woman, open your hearts and have some pity upon us. If ye believe not that we need your help, alas the lack of faith. If ye believe our need and care not for us, alas the lack of pity. For whoso pitieth not us, whom can he pity? If ye pity the poor, there is none so poor as we that have not a brat<sup>594</sup> to put on our backs. If ye pity the blind, there is none so blind as we which are here in the dark, saving<sup>595</sup> for sights unpleasant and loathsome, till some comfort come. If ye pity the lame, there is none so lame as we, that neither can creep one foot out of the fire, nor have one hand at liberty to defend our face from the flame. Finally, if ye pity any man in pain, never knew ye pain comparable to ours, whose fire as far passeth<sup>596</sup> in heat all the fires that ever burned upon earth, as the hottest of all those passeth a feigned fire painted on a wall.

If ever ye lay sick and thought the night long, and longed sore<sup>597</sup> for day while every hour seemed longer than five, bethink you then what a long night we seely<sup>598</sup> souls endure, that lie sleepless, restless, burning, and broiling in the dark fire one long night of many days, of many weeks, and some of many years together. You walter peradventure and tolter<sup>599</sup> in sickness from side to side, and find little rest in any part of the bed; we lie bounden to the brands and cannot lift up our heads. You have your physicians with you, that sometimes cure and heal you; no physic<sup>600</sup> will help our pain, nor no plaster<sup>601</sup> cool our heat. Your keepers do you great ease and put you in good comfort; our keepers are such as God keep you from, cruel damned spirits, odious, envious, and hateful, spiteous<sup>602</sup> enemies and spiteful<sup>603</sup> tormentors, and their company more horrible and grievous to us than is the pain itself and the intolerable torment that they do us, wherewith from top to toe they cease not continually to tear us.

But now if our other enemies, these heretics almost as cruel as they, procuring to their power<sup>604</sup> that we should be long left in the devil's hands, will (as their usage<sup>605</sup> is to rail instead of reasoning) make a game and a jest now of our heavy pain, and peradventure laugh at our lamentation, because we speak of our heads, our hands, our feet, and such our other gross<sup>606</sup> bodily members as lie buried in our graves, and of our garments that we did wear, which come not hither with us, we beseech you, for our dear Lady's love, to let their folly go by, and to consider in your own wisdom that it were impossible to make any mortal man living perceive what manner<sup>607</sup> pain and in what manner wise we bodiless souls do suffer and sustain, or to make any man upon earth perfectly to conceive in his imagination and fantasy what manner of substance we be—much more impossible than to make a born-blind man to perceive in his mind the nature and difference of colors. And therefore, except<sup>608</sup> we should of our painful state tell you nothing at all (and there would they have it), we must of necessity use<sup>609</sup> you such words as yourself understand, and use you the similitudes of such things as yourself is in ure<sup>610</sup> with.

For since neither God, angel, nor soul is in such wise blind, dumb, deaf, or lame as be those men that for lack of eyes, legs, hands, tongue, or ears be weak and impotent in the powers that proceed from them, but have in themselves a far more excellent sight, hearing, deliverness,<sup>611</sup> and speech, by means uncogitable<sup>612</sup> to man, than any man can have living there on earth, therefore doth Holy Scripture in speaking of such things use to represent them to the people by the names of such powers, instruments, and members<sup>613</sup> as men in such things use and occupy themselves. Which manner of speaking in such case, whosoever have<sup>614</sup> in derision declareth very well how little faith he hath in Christ's own words, in which our Savior himself, speaking of the souls of the rich glutton and poor needy Lazarus, and of the patriarch Abraham also, speaketh in like manner as we do—of finger and tongue too, whereof they had neither nother<sup>615</sup> there. And therefore whoso maketh a mock at our words in this point, ye may soon see what credence ye should give him, wherein we be content ye give him even as much as ye see yourself that he giveth to God, for more ye ought not, and surely less ye cannot. For he

593 even if 594 rag, scrap of clothing 595 except 596 surpasses 597 greatly; intensely 598 poor 599 walter peradventure and tolter: toss perhaps and turn 600 medical treatment 601 salve

602 pitiless 603 cruel 604 procuring to their power: contriving to the best of their ability 605 wont, habit 606 material 607 kind of 608 unless 609 use with 610 practice 611 agility

612 inconceivable 613 body parts 614 holds 615 neither nother: neither the one nor the other

giveth God not a whit,<sup>616</sup> but taketh in his heart that story told by God for a very fantastic fable.

And therefore, as we say, passing over such jesting and railing of those uncharitable heretics, mortal
5 enemies unto us and to themselves both, consider you our pains, and pity them in your hearts, and help us with your prayers, pilgrimages, and other alms-deeds, and of all things in special<sup>617</sup> procure us the suffrages and blessed oblation of the holy Mass,
10 whereof no man living so well can tell the fruit as we that here feel it.

The comfort that we have here, except our continual hope in our Lord God, cometh at seasons from our Lady, with such glorious saints as either 15 ourselves with our own devotion while we lived, or ye with yours for us since our decease and departing, have made intercessors for us. And among others, right especially be we beholden to the blessed spirits, our own proper good angels.<sup>618</sup> Whom when 20 we behold coming with comfort to us, albeit that we take great pleasure and greatly rejoice therein, yet is it not without much confusion and shamefastness<sup>619</sup> to consider how little we regarded our good angels and how seldom we thought upon 25 them while we lived. They carry up our prayers to God and good saints for us, and they bring down from them the comfort and consolation to us. With which when they come and comfort us, only God and we know what joy it is to our hearts, and how 30 heartily we pray for you.

And therefore, if God accept the prayer after<sup>620</sup> his own favor borne toward him that prayeth and the affection that he prayeth with, our prayer must needs be profitable, for we stand sure of his grace.
35 And our prayer is for you so fervent that ye can nowhere find any such affection upon earth. And therefore, since we lie so sore in pains, and have in our great necessity so great need of your help, and that ye may so well do it, whereby shall also rebound 40 upon yourselves an inestimable profit, let never any slothful oblivion<sup>621</sup> erase us out of your remembrance, or malicious enemy of ours cause you to be careless of us, or any greedy mind upon<sup>622</sup> your goods withdraw your gracious alms from us.

Think how soon ye shall come hither to us; think 45 what great grief and rebuke would then your unkindness be to you, what comfort on the contrary part when all we shall thank you, what help ye shall have here of your goods sent hither. Remember what kin ye and we be together, what familiar 50 friendship hath ere this been between us, what sweet words ye have spoken and what promise ye have made us. Let now your words appear and your fair promise be kept.

Now, dear friends, remember how nature and 55 Christendom bindeth you to remember us. If any point of your old favor, any piece of your old love, any kindness of<sup>623</sup> kindred, any care of acquaintance, any favor of old friendship, any spark of charity, any tender point of pity, any regard of nature, 60 nature,<sup>624</sup> any respect of Christendom be left in your breasts, let never the malice of a few fond<sup>625</sup> fellows, a few pestilent persons borne toward priesthood, religion, and your Christian faith, erase out of your hearts the care of your kindred, all force<sup>626</sup> of your 65 old friends, and all remembrance of all Christian souls.

Remember our thirst while ye sit and drink, our hunger while ye be feasting, our restless watch<sup>627</sup> while ye be sleeping, our sore and grievous pain
70 while ye be playing, our hot burning fire while ye be in pleasure and sporting— so mote<sup>628</sup> God make your offspring after remember you; so God keep you hence or not long here, but bring you shortly to that bliss to which, for our Lord's love, help you to 75 bring us, and we shall set hand to help you thither to us.

Finis

Cum privilegio<sup>629</sup>

616 bit, jot 617 particular 618 i.e., guardian angels 619 confusion and shamefastness: embarrassment and shame 620 in accord with 621 obliviousness

622 mind upon: disposition toward 623 kindness of: natural disposition toward 624 regard of nature: natural regard 625 foolish 626 care 627 wakefulness

628 may 629 Cum privilegio: With [the King's] permission

Tyndale.

Judge whyther yt be possible that any good sholde come oute of theyr domme ceremonies and sacramentes in to thy soule. Judge theyr penance, pylgrymages, pardones, purgatorye, praynge to postes, domme blesynges, domme absolucyons, theyr domme paterynge and halowynge, theyr domme strange holy gestures, wyth all theyr domme dysgynges, theyr satisfacyons and iustifyenge. And because thou syndest them false in so many thynges / truste them in nothyng, but indge them in all thynges.

More.

Judge good crysten reader whyther yt be possible that he be any better then a beste / oute of whole bruty the bestly mouth, cometh such a fylthye some of blasphemyes agaynst crystes holy ceremonies and blessed sacramentes, sent in to his chyirche out of his owne blessed bloody syde. And for by cause ye fynde this felowe so frantike and so falle in the raylynge and iestyng agaynst the sacramentes of Cryste: ye may well iudge that who so can delyte or be cotent with his blasphemouse rybauldy, hath great cause in hym self to fere that his crysten fayth begynneth to fayle and faynte.

Tyndale.

Marke at the laste the practyse of our fleshely spirytualtye, and theyr wayes by whyche they haue walked aboue .viiij. hondred yeres / how they stablyshe theyr lyes fyrst wyth falsifyenge the scrypture, then thorow corruptyng with theyr ryches wherof they haue infynyte treasure in store, and laste of all with the swerde.

More.

ye may marke I praye you. For this is mych to be markeeth lo, Tyndale can not bere the flesshelynes of oure spyrytuall, by cause the flesshelynes of theyr chyrch is spyrytuall. For the flesshely wedded harlotes of theyr chyche be theyr chyef holy spyrytuall fathers, and holy spyrytuall mothers, monkes, freres, and nunnes. And by cause theyr holy chyche is but new bygonne / Tyndale wolde we shold wene, that this .viii. hondred yere and moze Criste hath had no chyche in the worlde at all. For so longe sayth Tyndale all hath be nought / by the reason that all this whyle the clergye hath falsyfyed the scrypture, and hyred men wyth gyftes, and compelled them wyth the swerde to byleue them / & so all this .viii. hondred yeres sayth Tyndale by these meanes all the crysten nacjons haue in stede of true fayth byleued false lyes, and so haue ben out of the fayth & all nought.

If Tyndale dyd not lye now, as blyssed be god he doth / here

This page, from the first edition of Thomas More's Confutation of Tyndale's Answer (London: Rastell, 1532, sig. 1<sub>4</sub>v), shows More's favored style toward the end of his life. As he would do later with St. German and then with George Joye, More responds here in great detail to William Tyndale's 1531 Answer to More's 1529 Dialogue — responding sometimes to a paragraph, sometimes to a sentence. More published three books of this reply — while serving as Lord Chancellor — in 1532. His full response fills 1,034 pages in CW 8.

The Confutation of Tyndale's Answer made by Sir Thomas More, Knight Lord Chancellor of England

In March 1528, London Bishop Cuthbert Tunstall formally requested Sir Thomas More to “play Demosthenes” in defending the Catholic faith in the vernacular, by “publishing in English for the common man.” More responded by first publishing The Dialogue of Sir Thomas More, Knight in 1529; William Tyndale published in 1531 his own response, An Answer unto Sir Thomas More's Dialogue. More then replied, not with a fictional frame as in the 1529 dialogue, but by quoting Tyndale's words, then analyzing and refuting his claims.

In his essay on More's polemical career, Louis Schuster summarizes More's approach: “More's method of confutation consists in quoting Tyndale's text in gobbets, seldom more than one paragraph at a time and often merely a single sentence, then overwhelming it with a varied barrage of polemical artillery: painstaking logic in isolating and reconstructing premises, copious invention of arguments to bolster the case of the opposition, biblical exegesis, invective, and ad hominem barbs, patristic documentation, heckling, legalistic analogy, occasional ribaldry, testimony of saints and martyrs, cautionary reference to past heretics, conciliar pronouncements, theological distinctions, mocking repetition, together with countless variations on these practices” (CW 8: 1260). More's practice of quoting a polemical opponent directly and responding in detail continues his practice from the Response to Luther (1523) onwards. As Schuster also notes, “so accurate is More's citation of Tyndale's text . . . that one could reconstruct verbatim the Preface of Tyndale's Answer from the first book of the Confutation.”

Comprising nearly 500 double-columned pages in the 1557 Workes, More's Confutation of Tyndale's Answer is his longest writing, and was completed in this order: Books 1–3 were published in March 1532, while More was Lord Chancellor; Books 4–8 were published in 1533, after his resignation; the fragmentary Book 9, intended as the conclusion but never published, Rastell printed from the manuscripts he saved, in his 1557 Workes. More's rhetorical strategy in the Confutation, marked by frequent repetition and recapitulation chapter by chapter of his chief arguments on behalf of the Church, is explained by the author in his Apology, published in 1533: “Now have I then considered that they would peradventure wax weary to read over a long book, and therefore have I taken the more pain upon every chapter, to the intent that they shall not read over any chapter but one, and that it shall not force greatly which one throughout the book.”

More explains his purposes in the excerpt given here, his “Preface to the Christian Reader” (CW 8: 3–41). In this text, More also addresses the case of Robert Barnes, doctor of theology, an Augustinian friar and prior in Cambridge who became a reformer. Barnes had abjured heresy in 1526, but then fled England to Antwerp and Germany, where he met Luther. Barnes had recently been allowed to return to England in 1531. In 1540, Barnes and two other Protestants were executed for heresy at Smithfield; joining them on the scaffold were three Catholics, who were executed for treason. After the opening discussion of the case of Barnes and others, More describes the structure of the Confutation as leading to the core issue, “the very breast of all this battle” — the nature of the Church. What is it? Where is the Church found? More understands his long book as providing the reader with the means — scriptural, rational, theological, legal, and historical — of confuting Tyndale and his writings.

The full text of More's Confutation, running to over 1,000 pages, is available in volume 8 of The Complete Works of St. Thomas More and online at www.essentialmore.org.

CONTENTS*

Prayer for good corn; warnings of harm and of God's punishment . . . . .	797
William Tyndale's and others' pestilent heresies and books . . . . .	799
The book of Friar Barnes . . . . .	800
Thomas Hitton and his heresies . . . . .	801
Richard Bayfield and George Constantine . . . . .	804
John Tewkesbury and Thomas Bilney . . . . .	806
Why More a layman meddles with this matter; his purpose . . . . .	809
As Lord Chancellor, More explains his duty to respond . . . . .	810
Strife and sedition; sedition and pride; law and conscience . . . . .	811
Obeying tyranny; exhortation to rebellion; "evangelical liberty" . . . . .	812
Tyndale's actual teaching . . . . .	812
More's purpose and plan restated . . . . .	813
Young Father Frith . . . . .	813
Watching about treason; More's promise . . . . .	814
Books that nourish . . . . .	814
Being well armed for confutation . . . . .	815

*These are pages 3–41 of CW 8.

The Confutation of Tyndale's Answer made by Sir Thomas More, Knight Lord Chancellor of England

The Preface to the Christian Reader

5 Our Lord send us now some years as plenteous of good corn<sup>1</sup> as we have had some years of late plenteous of evil books. For they have grown so fast and sprung up so thick, full of pestilent errors and pernicious heresies, that they have infected 10 and killed, I fear me, more seely<sup>2</sup> simple souls than the famine of the dear years<sup>3</sup> have destroyed bodies.
And surely no little cause there is to dread that the great abundance and plenty of the one is no little cause and occasion of the great dearth and scarcity 15 of the other. For since that<sup>4</sup> our Lord of his especial<sup>5</sup> providence useth temporally<sup>6</sup> to punish the whole people for the sins of some part to compel the good folk to forbear<sup>7</sup> and abhor the naughty<sup>8</sup> whereby they may bring them to amendment and avoid 20 themselves the contagion of their company, wisdom were it for us to perceive that, like as folk begin now to delight in feeding their souls of the venomous carrion of<sup>9</sup> those poisoned heresies (of which may well be verified the words of Holy Writ “Death 25 is in the pot”),<sup>10</sup> our Lord likewise againward,<sup>11</sup> to revenge<sup>12</sup> it with, beginneth to withdraw his gracious hand from the fruits of the earth, diminishing the fertility both in corn and cattle, and bringing all in<sup>13</sup> dearth, much more than men can remedy or 30 fully find out the cause. And yet besides this, somewhere<sup>14</sup> he sendeth war, sickness, and mortality, to punish in the flesh that odious and hateful sin of the soul that spoileth the fruit from all manner of virtues: I mean unbelief, false faith, and infidelity, 35 and to tell you all at once in plain English, heresy.
And, I say, that God now beginneth. For I fear me surely that, except<sup>15</sup> folk begin to reform that fault the sooner, God shall not fail in such wise<sup>16</sup> to go forward that we shall well perceive and feel by the increase of our grief that all this gear<sup>17</sup> hitherto 40 is but a beginning yet. The prophet Elijah, as it is written in the Third Book of Kings,<sup>18</sup> for the infidelity and idolatry that then was used<sup>19</sup> in Israel, by his hearty prayer made unto God, kept that whole country from rain by<sup>20</sup> the space of three years and 45 a half—not of evil will or malice, but of devotion and pity; by the pain and pinching of the bodies, to compel men to remember their souls, which else were in peril of perishing by false idolatry.

Now albeit that these bold shameless heretics 50 have of long while neither letted<sup>21</sup> nor ceased falsely to insimulate<sup>22</sup> and accuse the Church of God, calling all good Christian people idolaters for honoring of saints and reverent behavior used at<sup>23</sup> their images, yet that have they done so far against their 55 own conscience—by which themselves well wot<sup>24</sup> that the Church useth<sup>25</sup> to saints and images none honor but ordinate, not honoring images but for the saints’ sake, nor saints but for the sake of God, and neither image as saint nor saint as God—and this 60 knoweth, I say, Tyndale himself so well, and thereby so far hath railed against his own conscience—that now at the last, in his answer<sup>26</sup> to my book, he retreateth so far back that he revoketh<sup>27</sup> almost all that ever he said before, and is fain<sup>28</sup> now to grant 65 that Christian men may have images, and kneel before them too, as ye shall hereafter see when we shall come to the place.

But we, on the other side,<sup>29</sup> say plainly unto them that the things wherewith they corrupt the world 70 are of infidelity and faithless idolatry, the very most accursed kind. The chief evil in an idol was that it bore the name of God, either itself or the devil that it represented, and, being so reputed and worshipped for God, robbed the reverence and devout 75 honor from God.

1 grain 2 poor 3 dear years: years of dearth or scarcity 4 since that:
since, given that 5 special (as opposed to general) 6 useth temporally: is accustomed in the present life 7 avoid 8 wicked 9 by 10 4(2) Kgs 4:40 11 in response 12 avenge; punish 13 into 14 in some places 15 unless 16 a way 17 matter 18 3(1) Kgs 17–18. In More’s day, what are now 1 and 2 Samuel were 1 and 2 Kings. 19 practiced 20 for 21 refrained from 22 charge 23 used at: shown toward 24 know 25 gives 26 Tyndale’s *An Answer unto Sir Thomas

More’s Dialogue* 27 rescinds; retracts
28 obliged 29 hand

Now when Tyndale calleth his heresies by the name of faith, and maketh men serve the devil while they ween<sup>30</sup> to serve God—what abominable idolatry is this?

5 If it be idolatry to put trust in the devil, and serve the devil with faith, it is worse than idolatry to make men ween they serve God with faith while they despise<sup>31</sup> him with a false belief.

10 And if it be very infidelity to do as the Turks do—bid men believe in Muhammad's Koran—it is more infidelity to do as Tyndale hath done: purposely mistranslate Christ's holy Gospel, to set forth heresies as evil as the Koran.

15 And if it be idolatry to do as the paynims<sup>32</sup> did—make an idol God—it must needs be much worse idolatry to do as these heretics do, that call God the cause of all evil, and thereby make God not a vain idol but a very devil.

20 And what can be worse kind of infidelity than to make books of heresies, and call them the right faith?

And what more abominable infidelity than to abuse the Scripture of God to the color<sup>33</sup> of their false belief?

25 And what can be a worse belief than to believe that the sacraments that God hath ordained by his Holy Spirit be but inventions of man, or as Tyndale saith of confession, but invention of the devil?

30 And what can be worse belief than to believe that God's word is not to be believed but if<sup>34</sup> it be put in writing? Or what can be a worse belief than to believe that men's good works, be they never so<sup>35</sup> well done, be yet nothing worth, nor the man never the better for them, nor no reward for them coming toward<sup>36</sup> man in heaven?

35 Or what can be a worse belief than to believe that a man doth wrong to pray for his father's soul?

40 Or what can be a worse belief than to believe that a man may as slightly regard Whitsun<sup>37</sup> Sunday as Hock Monday,<sup>38</sup> and as boldly eat flesh<sup>39</sup> on Good Friday as on Shrove Tuesday?<sup>40</sup>

And what can be a worse belief than to believe that none other sin can damn a man but only lack of belief?

45 And if it be idolatry to do as the paynims<sup>41</sup> do—give worship unto an idol—how much is it worse than idolatry to do as Tyndale doth: forbid us to give worship to the very Body and blessed Blood of God in the holy Sacrament of the altar?

50 These pestilent infidelities, and these abominable kinds of idolatries, far exceed and pass,<sup>42</sup> and incomparably more offend the majesty of our Lord God than all the setting up of Bel, and Baal, and Beelzebub, and all the devils in hell. Wherefore, like as in other places where these heresies have taken deeper root and been more spread abroad, God hath taken 55 more deep and sore vengeance, not only by dearth<sup>43</sup> and death, but also by battle and sword: so is it to be feared that for the receipt of these pestilent books, our Lord sendeth us some lack of corn<sup>44</sup> and cattle for a beginning, and will not fail but if<sup>45</sup> our fault be 60 amended to send us as sore punishment as he hath sent already into such other places as would not be by like warning amended—according as he saith in the twenty-sixth chapter of Leviticus, where he speaketh in this wise:<sup>46</sup> 65

If ye will not give ear unto me, nor fulfill all my commandments, but set my laws at nought,<sup>47</sup> despise my judgments, and leave those things undone that are by me ordained, and break my pact and covenant, then will I againward<sup>48</sup> 70 do these things following<sup>49</sup> unto you. I will hastily visit you with penury<sup>50</sup> and burning heat (or "fever") which shall sore<sup>51</sup> vex and grieve your eyes, and consume you even to the death. Over<sup>52</sup> this, ye shall sow your seed in vain, for your enemies 75 shall devour it. I shall also set my face against you, and ye shall fall before your adversaries, and be made subjects unto them that hate you. Ye shall flee where no man chaseth you. And if ye will not yet for all this obey me, I shall for your sins add 80 and put<sup>53</sup> to these plagues sevenfold more, and I shall tread down the pride of your stubbornness (and so forth).

85 And who doth more properly<sup>54</sup> fall in the danger of this commination<sup>55</sup> and threat than they that despise Christ's sacraments, which are his holy ordinances and a great part of Christ's New Law and testament.<sup>56</sup> And who shall less set by his

30 while they ween: when they think
31 insult 32 pagans 33 pretext; show of reason 34 but if: unless 35 never so: to an unlimited degree 36 to 37 Pentecost 38 the second Monday after Easter

39 meat 40 the Tuesday before Ash Wednesday 41 pagans 42 surpass 43 scarcity 44 grain 45 but if: unless 46 way 47 no value 48 in turn 49 things following: following things

50 destitution 51 terribly 52 In addition to 53 attach 54 particularly 55 denunciation 56 covenant commandments than they that, upon the boldness of “only faith,” set all good works at nought, and little force<sup>57</sup> the danger of their evil deeds, upon the boldness that a bare<sup>58</sup> faith and slight repentance, without shrift<sup>59</sup> or penance, sufficeth, and that no vow made to God can bind a man to live chaste, nor let<sup>60</sup> a monk from marriage — all which things, with many pestilent errors besides, these abominable books of Tyndale and his fellows teach us.

Of these books of heresies there be so many made within these few years — what by Luther himself and by his fellows, and afterward by the new sects sprung out of his, which like the children of the viper would now gnaw out their mother’s belly — that the bare names of those books were almost enough to make a book; and of every sort of those books be some brought into this realm, and kept in huggemugger,<sup>61</sup> by some shrewd masters<sup>62</sup> that keep them for no good.

Besides the books of Latin, French, and Deutsch, in which there are of these evil sects an innumerable sort, there are made in the English tongue, first Tyndale’s New Testament, father of them all by reason of his false translating. And after that, the Five Books of Moses translated by the same man, we need not doubt in what manner, when we know by what man and for what purpose.

Then have ye his introduction<sup>63</sup> into Saint Paul’s epistle, with which he introduceth and bringeth his readers into a false understanding of Saint Paul, making them, among many other heresies, believe that Saint Paul were in<sup>64</sup> the mind that only faith were always sufficient for salvation, and that men’s good works were nothing worth, nor could no thank<sup>65</sup> deserve nor no reward in heaven, though<sup>66</sup> they were wrought<sup>67</sup> in grace. And these things teacheth Tyndale as the mind of Saint Paul, whereas Saint Paul saith himself that they which so misconstrue him to the depraving<sup>68</sup> of men’s good works be well worthy<sup>69</sup> damnation.

Then have we by Tyndale the Wicked Mammom, by which many a man hath been beguiled and brought into many wicked heresies, which thing — saving that the devil is ready to put out men’s eyes that<sup>70</sup> are content willingly to wax<sup>71</sup> blind — were else, in good faith, to me no little wonder, for never was there made a more foolish frantic<sup>72</sup> book.

Then have we Tyndale’s book of Obedience,<sup>73</sup> whereby we be taught to disobey the doctrine of Christ’s Catholic Church, and set his holy sacraments at nought.<sup>74</sup>

Then have we from Tyndale the First Epistle of Saint John in such wise expounded that I dare say that blessed apostle, rather than his holy words were in such a sense believed of all Christian people, had liefer<sup>75</sup> his epistle had never been put in writing.

Then have we the Supplication of Beggars, a piteous beggarly book wherein he<sup>76</sup> would have all the souls in purgatory beg all about for nought.

Then have we from George Joye, otherwise called clerk,<sup>77</sup> a goodly godly epistle, wherein he teacheth diverse other heresies, but specially that men’s vows and promises made of chastity<sup>78</sup> be not lawful nor can bind no man in conscience, but he may wed when he will.

And this man, considering that when a man teacheth one thing and doth himself another, the people set the less by<sup>79</sup> his preaching, determined therefore with himself that he would of his preaching show himself example. And therefore, being priest, he hath beguiled a woman and wedded her — the poor woman, I ween,<sup>80</sup> unaware that he is priest. Howbeit,<sup>81</sup> if it be not done already, it is well likely now that (but if<sup>82</sup> God be her special guide) he shall by leisure<sup>83</sup> work her and win her to his own heresy.

Then have ye an exposition also upon the seventh chapter of Saint Paul’s epistle to the Corinthians, by which exposition in like wise<sup>84</sup> priests, friars, monks, and nuns be taught that evangelical liberty that they may run out a caterwauling,<sup>85</sup> and so woo and wed and lawfully live in lechery.

That work hath no name of the maker,<sup>86</sup> but some ween it was Friar Roye,<sup>87</sup> which,<sup>88</sup> when he was fallen in heresy, then found it unlawful to live in chastity,<sup>89</sup> and ran out of his order,<sup>90</sup> and hath since sought many a false unlawful way to live by, wherein he made so many changes that, as Bayfield (another heretic, and lately burned in Smithfield)

57 take heed of 58 mere 59 confession 60 hinder 61 secret 62 shrewd masters:
wicked teachers 63 Its full title is A Compendious Introduction, Prologue, or Preface unto the Epistle to the Roman.

64 were in: was of 65 grace 66 even if 67 done, performed 68 disparaging

69 deserving of 70 who 71 become 72 crazy 73 The Obedience of a Christian Man, and How Christian Rulers Ought to Govern 74 no value 75 preferred 76 the author, Simon Fish 77 a cleric.
George Joye (ca. 1490–1533) was ordained in 1515. 78 celibacy 79 set... by:

value 80 suppose 81 However 82 but if: unless 83 by leisure: gradually 84 manner 85 a caterwauling: in heat;
in animalistic pursuit of sex 86 author 87 William Roye (d. 1536) 88 who 89 celibacy 90 religious order

told unto me, he made a meet<sup>91</sup> end at last and was burned in Portugal.

Then have we the Examination of Thorpe, put forth, as it is said, by George Constantine—by whom there hath been, I wot<sup>92</sup> well, of that sort great plenty sent into this realm. In that book the heretic, that<sup>93</sup> made it as a communication between the bishop and his chaplains and himself, maketh all the parties speak as himself liketh, and layeth<sup>94</sup> nothing spoken against his heresies but such as himself would seem solemnly to assoil.<sup>95</sup> Whose book, when any good Christian man readeth that hath either learning or any natural wit, shall not only be well able to perceive him for a foolish heretic, and his arguments easy to answer, but shall also see that he showeth himself a false<sup>96</sup> liar in his rehearsal<sup>97</sup> of the matter, wherein he maketh the other party sometimes speak, for his commodity,<sup>98</sup> such manner things as no man would have done that were not a very<sup>99</sup> wild goose.

Then have we Jonah made out by Tyndale<sup>100</sup>—a book that whoso<sup>101</sup> delight therein shall stand in peril that Jonah was never so swallowed up with<sup>102</sup> the whale, as by the delight of that book a man's soul may be so swallowed up by the devil that he shall never have the grace to get out again.

Then have we, by Tyndale also, the Answer to my Dialogue, whereof I shall nothing now need to say, because the confutation of that answer is the matter of my present book.

Then have we also the book of Frith<sup>103</sup> against purgatory—the errors of which book I shall hereafter, God willing, declare<sup>104</sup> you.

Then have ye a book of Luther translated into English in<sup>105</sup> the name of Brightwell, but as I am informed, the book was translated by Frith, a book of such sort as Tyndale never made a more foolish, nor more full of false lies. And surely Frith's prologue (if it be his, as it is said) is right suitly<sup>106</sup> and a very meet<sup>107</sup> cover for such a cup, as bringeth the people a draught of deadly poison.

Then have we the Practice of Prelates, wherein Tyndale had went<sup>108</sup> to have made a special show of his high worldly wit, and that men should have seen therein that there were nothing done among princes but that he was fully advertised<sup>109</sup> of all the secrets, and that so far forth that he knew the privy<sup>110</sup> practice made between the King's Highness and the late Lord Cardinal,<sup>111</sup> and the Reverend Father Cuthbert,<sup>112</sup> then bishop of London, and me: that it was devised wilily that the Cardinal should leave the chancellorship to me, and the bishopric of Durham to my said lord of London, for a while, till he list<sup>113</sup> himself to take them both again.<sup>114</sup> Was this not a wily drift,<sup>115</sup> trow<sup>116</sup> you? Which while every man well seeth there was no man so mad to tell Tyndale, no man doubteth but that Tyndale devised it of his own imagination; and then needeth no man to doubt what manner a brain Tyndale hath, that dreameth such frantic drifts.

Then have we now come forth the book of Friar Barnes,<sup>117</sup> sometime doctor in Cambridge, which<sup>118</sup> was for heresy before this time abjured,<sup>119</sup> and is at this day come to the realm by safe-conduct, which at his humble suit the King's Highness of his blessed disposition condescended to grant him to the end that, if there might yet any spark of grace be found in him, it might be kept, kindled, and increased, rather than the man to be cast away. Which manner of Christian zeal and princely benignity his Grace had before used,<sup>120</sup> both to Richard Bayfield and George Constantine, which came over hither without safe-conduct, upon the only<sup>121</sup> trust of his gracious forgiveness, and had it. And thereupon too, by and by,<sup>122</sup> both twain<sup>123</sup> deceitfully did abuse his goodness, and brought in again more of Tyndale's books and false heresies afresh; whereof<sup>124</sup> as God hath of his justice since required the one, so mote<sup>125</sup> his mercy by grace amend the other.

But to speak of Friar Barnes's book, surely of all their books that yet came abroad<sup>126</sup> in English—of all which was never one wise nor good—was never none yet so bad, so foolish, nor so false as his, as it hath since his coming been plainly proved in his face, and that in such wise that when the books that he citeth and allegeth in his book were brought forth before him, and his ignorance shown him, himself did in diverse things confess his oversight, and clearly acknowledged that he had mistaken and wrongly understood the places.<sup>127</sup> And was in

91 fitting 92 know 93 who 94 presents 95 absolve; acquit or clear of a crime 96 detestable 97 recounting 98 convenience, benefit 99 true 100 the Book of Jonah as translated by Tyndale 101 whoever 102 by 103 John

Frith (1503–33) 104 make known to 105 under 106 right suitly: quite suitable 107 fitting 108 thought 109 informed 110 secret 111 Thomas Wolsey 112 Cuthbert Tunstall (1474–1559) 113 wished 114 back 115 scheme, plot

116 think 117 Robert Barnes (d. 1540) 118 who 119 put on trial, and did recant 120 practiced 121 the only: solely the 122 by and by: right away 123 of the two 124 for which 125 might 126 out 127 passages such wise finally confounded with shame that he was in aammering<sup>128</sup> whether he would return again over the sea, or tarry still here and renounce his heresies again, and turn again to Christ's Catholic Church. And therefore he desired that he might have a learned man then present assigned unto him for the further instruction of his conscience, which his request was granted him, and what will further come thereon, God knoweth. If God give him the grace to amend, every good man will be glad thereof. If he have so far gone against God's truth, and thereby aggrieved God in such wise, that God have already given him over forever—or else that though God offer his grace again, the malice of the man's will withstand it yet and reject it—it is not then to be doubted but God will find a time for him well enough to show his justice on him, as he hath done upon such others, and namely of late, in Switzerland, upon Zwingli, which<sup>129</sup> was the first that brought Barnes's heresy thither,<sup>130</sup> concerning the Sacrament of the altar. But as for hence,<sup>131</sup> he shall, I am sure, have leave to depart safe, according to the King's safe-conduct. And yet hath he so demeaned<sup>132</sup> himself since his coming hither, that he hath clearly broken<sup>133</sup> and forfeited his safe-conduct, and lawfully might be burned for his heresies, if we would lay his heresies and his demeanor since his coming hither, both twain,<sup>134</sup> unto his charge. But let him go this once, for God shall find his time full well.

Then have we further yet, besides Barnes's book, the ABC for Children. And because there is no grace therein, lest we should lack prayers, we have the Primer, and the Ploughman's Prayer, and a book of other small devotions, and then the whole Psalter too. After the Psalter, children were wont to go to their donet<sup>135</sup> and their accidence,<sup>136</sup> but now they go straight to Scripture. And thereto have we as a donet the book of the Pathway to Scripture; and for an accidence, because<sup>137</sup> we should be good scholars<sup>138</sup> shortly and be soon sped,<sup>139</sup> we have the whole sum of Scripture in a little book; so that after these books well<sup>140</sup> learned, we be meet<sup>141</sup> for Tyndale's Pentateuch, and Tyndale's Testament, and all the other high<sup>142</sup> heresies that he and Joye and Frith and Friar

Barnes teach in all their books besides—of all which heresies the seed is sown, and prettily sprung up, in these little books before. For the Primer and Psalter, prayers and all, were translated and made in this manner by none other but heretics.

The Psalter was translated by George Joye the priest, that<sup>143</sup> is wedded now; and, I hear say, the Primer too, wherein the seven psalms<sup>144</sup> be set in without the litany, lest folk should pray to saints. And the Dirge<sup>145</sup> is left out clean,<sup>146</sup> lest a man might hap<sup>147</sup> to pray thereon for his father's soul.

In their calendar before<sup>148</sup> their devout prayers, they have set us a new saint: Sir Thomas Hitton, the heretic that was burned in Kent, of whom I shall tell you more after. Him have they set in on Saint Matthias' Eve, by the name of Saint Thomas the Martyr.

A long work would it be to rehearse<sup>149</sup> you all their books, for there be yet more than I know. Against all which the King's high wisdom politically<sup>150</sup> provided, in that his Highness by his proclamations forbade any manner English books printed beyond the sea to be brought into this realm, or any to be sold printed within this realm, but if<sup>151</sup> the name of the printer and his dwelling place were set upon the book.

But yet so is it, as I said before, that of these ungracious<sup>152</sup> books full of pestilent poisoned heresies—that have in other realms already killed by schisms and war many thousand bodies, and by sinful errors and abominable heresies, many more thousand souls—have now a few malicious mischievous<sup>153</sup> persons brought into this realm, and labor and enforce<sup>154</sup> themselves, in all that ever they may, to corrupt and infect all good and virtuous people.

Nor no man is there anywhere living more studious and busy to do himself good, than those envious<sup>155</sup> wretches be laborious and fervent to do all other men harm, in body, substance,<sup>156</sup> and soul.

There be fled out of this realm for heresy a few ungracious folk—what manner folk, their writing and their living showeth. For the captains be priests, monks, and friars that neither say Mass nor Matins, nor never come at church; talking still of faith and full of false heresies, would seem Christ's

128 state of doubt (as to) 129 who 130 over there 131 his departing
132 behaved 133 violated 134 together 135 introductory textbook 136 first, elementary catechism 137 so that 138 schoolgoers 139 skilled 140 are well 141 ready 142 high-level, lofty 143 who 144 penitential psalms: 6, 31(32), 37(38), 50(51), 101(102), 129(130),

142(143) 145 Office of the Dead 146 completely 147 happen 148 at the front of 149 name 150 prudently

151 but if: unless 152 without grace;
wicked 153 destructive, injurious 154 strongly exert 155 malicious 156 goods, possessions

apostles and play the devil's disours;<sup>157</sup> speaking much of the Spirit with no more devotion than dogs—diverse of them, priests, monks, and friars, not let<sup>158</sup> to wed harlots and then call them wives.

5 And when they have once villained<sup>159</sup> the sacrament of matrimony—then would they make us violate the Sacrament of the altar too, telling us, as Tyndale doth, that it is sin to do the blessed Body of Christ in that sacrament any honor or reverence, but only 10 take it for a token.

Now when their chief captains be such, we shall not need to doubt of what sort we shall reckon the remnant. These fellows that nought<sup>160</sup> had here, and therefore nought carried hence,<sup>161</sup> nor nothing find-15 ing there to live upon, be yet sustained and maintained with money sent them by some evil-disposed persons out of this realm thither—and that for none other intent but to make them sit and seek out heresies, and speedily send them hither.

20 Which books albeit that they neither can be there printed without great cost nor here sold without great adventure<sup>162</sup> and peril—yet cease they not with money sent from hence to print them there and send them hither by the whole vatfuls at once,
25 and in some places, looking for no lucre, cast them abroad by night; so great a pestilent pleasure have some devilish people caught, with the labor, travail, cost, charge, peril, harm, and hurt of themselves to seek the destruction of others. As the devil hath a 30 deadly delight to beguile good people and bring their souls into everlasting torment without any manner winning, and not without final increase of his own eternal pain, so do these heretics, the devil's disciples, beset<sup>163</sup> their whole pleasure and study, to their own final damnation, in the training<sup>164</sup> of simple souls to hell by their devilish heresies.

Much they cry out against the clergy, saying that the priests love to reign in men's consciences. But they themselves show that when they have made the 40 devil reign in a man's conscience, so far forth that he hath no conscience to eat flesh<sup>165</sup> on Good Friday, nor to cast Christ's cross in the cannel,<sup>166</sup> nor to throw his blessed Body out of the pyx—then after that, likewise as the false preachers that were Jews
45 labored to have all Christian people circumcised, to the intent that, as Saint Paul saith, they might

“glory in their flesh,”<sup>167</sup> so be these arch-heretics very glad, and great glory they take, when they may hear that any man is brought to burning through 50 their books. Then they boast that they have done a great mastery,<sup>168</sup> and say they have made a martyr, when their poisoned books have killed the Christian man both in body and soul.

Thus rejoiced Tyndale in the death of Hitton, of whose burning he boasteth in his Answer to my 55 Dialogue, where he writeth thereof that whereas I said that I had never found nor heard of any of them but that he would forswear<sup>169</sup> to save his life, I had heard, he saith, of Sir Thomas Hitton, whom the bishops of Rochester and Canterbury slew at 60 Maidstone.

Of this man they so highly rejoice that they have, as I said, set his name in the calendar before<sup>170</sup> a book of their English prayers, by the name of Saint Thomas the Martyr, in<sup>171</sup> the vigil of the blessed 65 apostle Saint Matthias, the twenty-third day of February, and have put out for him the holy doctor and glorious martyr Saint Polycarp, the blessed bishop and the disciple of Saint John the Evangelist—for that was his day in deed, and so is it in some calendars 70 marked.

Now to the intent that ye may somewhat see what good Christian faith Sir Thomas Hitton was of—this new saint of Tyndale's canonization, in whose 75 burning Tyndale so gaily glorieth, and which<sup>172</sup> hath his holy day so now appointed to him that Saint Polycarp must give him place in the calendar—I shall somewhat show you what wholesome heresies this holy martyr held.

First ye shall understand that he was a priest 80 and, falling to Luther's sect, and after that to the sect of Friar Hussgen, and Zwingli, cast off Matins and Mass and all divine service,<sup>173</sup> and so became an apostle sent to and fro between our English heretics beyond the sea and such as were here at home.

Now happed<sup>174</sup> it so that, after he had visited here his holy congregations, in diverse corners and 85 lusks' lanes,<sup>175</sup> and comforted<sup>176</sup> them in the Lord to stand stiff<sup>177</sup> with the devil in their errors and heresies—as he was going back again at Gravesend, God, considering the great labor that he had taken 90 already, and determining to bring his business to its

157 jester 158 hesitating 159 debased
160 nothing 161 (with them) out of here 162 risk 163 place 164 luring, deceitful leading 165 meat 166 gutter 167 Gal

6:13 168 feat 169 renounce under oath his faith 170 at the front of 171 on 172 who 173 divine service: liturgical prayer 174 happened 175 lusks' lanes:

places where idlers hang out 176 encouraged, strengthened 177 firm

well-deserved end, gave him suddenly such a favor, and so great a grace in the visage,<sup>178</sup> that every man that beheld him took him for a thief. For whereas<sup>179</sup> there had been certain linen cloths pilfered away
 5 that were hanging on a hedge, and Sir Thomas Hitton was walking not far off, suspiciously in the meditation of his heresies, the people, doubting<sup>180</sup> that the beggarly knave had stolen the cloths, fell in question with him and searched him—and so 10 found they certain letters secretly conveyed in his coat, written from<sup>181</sup> evangelical brethren here unto the evangelical heretics beyond the sea. And upon those letters found, he was with his letters brought before the most reverend father in God the Arch-
 15 bishop of Canterbury, and afterward as well by his Lordship as by the reverend father the Bishop of Rochester examined, and after, for his abominable heresies, delivered to the secular hands and burned.

In his examination he refused to be sworn to say 20 truth, affirming that neither bishop nor pope had authority to compel him to swear. Which point, although it be a false<sup>182</sup> heresy, yet is it likely that he refused the oath rather of frowardness<sup>183</sup> than of any respect<sup>184</sup> that he had either in keeping or break-
 25 ing. For never could I find heretic yet that any conscience<sup>185</sup> had in any oath. And of truth, Tyndale, in his Answer to my Dialogue, teacheth them that they may break their oath and be forsworn<sup>186</sup> without any scruple at all.

30 His father and his mother, he would not be acknowledged of what<sup>187</sup> they were; they were some so good folk, of likelihood, that he could not abide the glory.

He would not be acknownd that himself was 35 priest, but said that he had by the space of nine years been beyond the sea, and there lived by the joiners'<sup>188</sup> craft. Howbeit,<sup>189</sup> he said that he had always, as his leisure would give him leave, and as he could find opportunity in places where he came, taught 40 the Gospel of God after his own mind and his own opinion, not forcing of<sup>190</sup> the determination of the Church, and said that he intended, to his power, so to persevere still.

45 Of his teaching, these things were part. First, as for baptism, he agreed it for a sacrament necessary to salvation. Howbeit, every layperson, he said, might as well baptize as a priest, were the child in necessity or not, and that the form of baptizing used in the Church were much better if it were spoken in English. 50

Of matrimony, whether it were a sacrament or not, he said he wist ne'er.<sup>191</sup> But he said yet that it was a thing necessary, and of Christian people to be observed and kept. Howbeit, as for the solemnization of marriage at Church, he agreed it for 55 good, but said it needed not. The man meant by likelihood that it was good enough to wed upon a cushion when the dogs be abed, as their priests wed, I ween,<sup>192</sup> where their persons<sup>193</sup> be known. For else they let<sup>194</sup> not to wed openly at Church, and 60 take the whole parish for witnesses of their beastly bitchery.<sup>195</sup>

The extreme unction or aneling<sup>196</sup> and confirmation, he said be no sacraments of the Church, nor be nothing necessary to the soul. 65

The sacrament of order,<sup>197</sup> he said, is no sacrament of the Church, nor was never ordained<sup>198</sup> by God in the New Testament, but only by man.

The Mass, he said, should never be said. For he said that to say Mass after the manner of the 70 Church is rather sin than virtue.

As for confession made to a priest, he said nothing profiteth the soul; nor penance enjoined of<sup>199</sup> the priest unto the penitent confessed,<sup>200</sup> is nothing necessary. 75

Purgatory he denied, and said also that neither prayer nor fasting for the souls departed can do them any good.

To vow and enter into any religion approved by the law, he said availeth not, but he said that all that 80 enter into religion<sup>201</sup> sin in so doing.

He held also that no man hath any free will after that he hath once sinned.

He held that to say any divine service<sup>202</sup> after the ordinance of the Church availeth nothing, and that 85 all divine service may be left unsaid without any sin.

He held that all the images of Christ and his saints should be thrown out of the Church.

He held also that whatsoever the pope or the general council make,<sup>203</sup> beside that that is expressly 90

178 face 179 given that, since 180 suspecting 181 by 182 detestable; deceitful 183 contrariness, perversity 184 concern 185 qualm of conscience 186 commit perjury 187 be acknownd of what: admit anything about who 188 woodworkers' 189 However 190 forcing of: caring about 191 wist ne'er: knew not at all 192 suppose 193 identities 194 hesitate 195 lewdness 196 anointing 197 holy orders 198 established, instituted 199 by 200 after confessing 201 religious life 202 divine service: liturgical prayer 203 establishes as a law commanded in Scripture, every man may lawfully break it, without any manner sin at all, mortal or venial either.

He held also that it is not lawful neither for the king of England nor for any other Christian prince to make any law or statute for the punishment of any theft, or any other crime, by which law any man should suffer death. For he said that all such laws be contrary to the Gospel, which wills no man to die.

As touching the Blessed Sacrament of the altar, he said it is a necessary sacrament; but he held that after the consecration there was none other thing therein but only the very substance of material bread and wine; and so, he said, he firmly believed, and that he would hold that opinion to the death.

Finally, holding all these abominable heresies, with yet diverse others more of like suit and sort, he said that he was very certain and sure that he had the grace of God with him, and that the Holy Ghost was within him.

And so was he, after much favor shown him, and much labor charitably taken for the saving of him, delivered in conclusion, for his obstinacy, to the secular hands, and burned up in his false faith and heresies, whereof he learned the great part of Tyndale's holy books, and now the spirit of error and lying hath taken his wretched soul with him straight from the short fire to the fire everlasting.

And this is, lo, Sir Thomas Hitton, the devil's stinking martyr of whose burning Tyndale maketh boast. Wherefore since Tyndale alloweth his cause, he must needs defend his articles. And now wot I well that some of those articles Tyndale hath himself given over at last for shame—as the article against images, and the article against the liberty of man's free will, wherein he beareth me in hand, in his Answer to my Dialogue, that I belie Luther. But when I shall come to the place, I shall let you see Luther's own words in that point so plain that ye shall not marvel though Tyndale were ashamed of his master. And yet shall ye marvel that Tyndale was so shameless to deny the thing which ye shall see so plainly proved.

But ye see that, of this holy martyr, Tyndale hath not so great cause to glory but that he may scrape out his name again out of the calendar and restore the blessed bishop Saint Polycarp again into his place.

Then have ye had here burned since at London, of late, Richard Bayfield, late a monk and a priest, which fell to heresy and was abjured, and after that like a dog returning to his vomit, and being fled over the sea, and sending from thence Tyndale's heresies hither with many mischievous sorts of books, had yet the King's gracious forgiveness and, as it was after proved both by other men's and his own confession too, was occupied about two things at once: that is to wit, both in suing for remission and pardon of his offense for bringing in those books, and therewith also in selling them here still secretly, and sending over for more, with which at last he was taken. And to rehearse his heresies needeth little; the books that he brought well showeth them, and his holy life well declareth them when, being both a priest and a monk, he went about two wives, one in Brabant, another in England. What he meant I cannot make you sure—whether he would be sure of the one if the other should hap refuse him, or that he would have them both, the one here, the other there, or else both in one place, the one because he was priest, the other because he was monk.

Of Bayfield's burning hath Tyndale no great cause to glory. For though Tyndale's books brought him to burning, yet was he not so constant in his evangelical doctrine but that after that he was taken, all the while that he was not in utter despair of pardon, he was well content to have forsworn it again, and letted not to utter his evangelical brethren both in England and elsewhere, causing some of them to be taken—as George Constantine, ere he escaped, was ready to have, in word at the leastwise, abjured all that holy doctrine. What his heart was, God and he know, and peradventure the devil too, if he intended otherwise. But surely there was intended toward him somewhat more good than his dealing had before deserved. And so much the more favor was there minded him in that he seemed very penitent of his misusing of himself in falling to Tyndale's heresies again. For which he

204 from 205 cause for canonization as a martyr 206 articles of his creed 207 know 208 given over: abandoned 209 such as 210 beareth me in hand: makes against me the claim

211 misrepresent 212 that 213 teacher 214 back 215 who 216 required to recant 217 harmful 218 say 219 petitioning 220 relate, recount 221 makes known 222 went about:

sought 223 arrested, taken into custody 224 repudiated it under oath 225 letted... utter: did not hesitate to expose 226 before 227 perhaps 228 conduct 229 extended to; intended toward acknowledged himself worthy to be hanged—that he had so falsely<sup>230</sup> abused the King’s gracious remission and pardon given him before, and had, for all that, in the while both bought and sold of those heretical books and secretly set forth those heresies. Whereof he showed himself so repentant that he uttered and disclosed diverse of his companions, of whom there are some abjured<sup>231</sup> since, and some that he wist<sup>232</sup> well were abjured before—namely Richard<sup>233</sup> Necton, which<sup>234</sup> was by Constantine’s detection taken<sup>235</sup> and committed to Newgate, where except he hap<sup>236</sup> to die before in prison, he standeth in great peril to be, ere it be long, for his falling again to Tyndale’s heresies, burned. And thus it seemed by the manner of George Constantine while he was here in prison, that he so sore did forthink<sup>237</sup> his errors and heresies, and so perceived the pestilent poison of them, that he thought it better that such as were infected therewith might be by the means of his detection amended, and with the loss of his body the soul cured, than both twain cast away; or, if the man were peradventure of hard heart and malicious mind incurable, he thought it were then better to send him to the devil alone than let him live and draw many others with him.

This good mind it seemeth that Constantine had then, and therefore was there good hope of his amendment. And peradventure the man had amended, and stood still in grace, if some evil counsel had not come at him; of which there was left unsought no devilish invention or means to send him—insomuch that one of the letters I fortunèd to intercept myself, written unto him by one John Burt, otherwise calling himself Adrian, otherwise John Bookbinder, and yet otherwise now, I cannot tell you what.

Of truth, George Constantine, after he had confessed unto a faithful servant of mine, to be declared<sup>238</sup> to me, that Necton had of his delivery many of these heretical books—he sent word forthwith<sup>239</sup> to Necton that he should send the books home to me. Which if he did, and that I might have yet seen sure tokens of amendment in the man, Constantine perceived well that he had been yet likely to have had favor shown him. But when that

Necton had once made Burt of his counsel, they devised between them that Necton should not do so in no wise,<sup>240</sup> affirming to Constantine that it could not be done; and haply it could not indeed, for peradventure they were all sold already. Howbeit, Necton now, since he was taken,<sup>241</sup> said that his wife had burned them. But it is well known that Necton had himself, and a man<sup>242</sup> of his also, sold many such books of heresy, both in London and in other shires, since his abjuration. But howsoever the matter was, Burt by his letter advised Constantine, if he might possibly, to call back his confession again; wherein I think it good that ye hear his very letter itself. Lo, in these words he wrote:

The grace and peace of our Savior Jesus be with you, good brother Constantine. Sir, as for the matter that ye would have brought to pass, will<sup>243</sup> not be, in no manner wise; the person is not at home that should receive the stuff and deliver it according unto your mind. Therefore, if ye have not spoken so far in the matter that it may be none prejudice or hurt unto you, I would ye should go no further in the matter, but even,<sup>244</sup> as a man armed with faith, go forth in your matter boldly and put them to their proofs. As for one is none,<sup>245</sup> you know well, by the law of God or man.<sup>246</sup> If there be anything that I can do, send word and ye shall find me ready to my power, even to death, by God’s grace, who I pray long to preserve you and comfort<sup>247</sup> you in your trouble, to the confusion<sup>248</sup> of all tyrants.

Lo, here have ye heard an apostolical epistle counseling the man to go back with<sup>249</sup> the truth and arm himself with faith, and make him strong to lie loud and forswear<sup>250</sup> himself if need were, for Burt wist<sup>251</sup> well I were not likely to leave and believe him at his bare<sup>252</sup> word.

Here will Burt peradventure<sup>253</sup> preach, and bring us in<sup>254</sup> the midwives of Egypt that saved the children of Israel from Pharaoh, for which God gave them new houses.<sup>255</sup> Wherein Burt and I will not much dispute. For albeit that God hath given him no house yet, nor it is not all one with a lie to save

230 detestably 231 recanted 232 knew 233 actually Robert 234 who 235 arrested, taken into custody 236 happens 237 sore did forethink: seriously did repent of 238 made known 239 at once

240 manner 241 taken into custody
242 servant 243 it will 244 directly 245 As... none: As not one of their claims has any proof 246 2 Cor 13:1 247 encourage 248 ruin; confounding

249 on 250 perjure 251 knew 252 mere 253 perhaps 254 us in: up to us 255 See Ex 1:15–21.

a young innocent babe and with perjury to defend an old pestilent heretic; and though Saint Augustine saith that it is not lawful to lie for no thing, yet I tell not my tale to lay a lie so highly to any such men's charge as these folk be, whose whole sect is nothing else but lies, but I rehearse<sup>256</sup> you his letter because ye should see what truth there is in such folks' words.

Howbeit, as for Constantine—as I said before, seemed in prison here very penitent, and utterly minded to forsake such heresies and heretics forever. In proof whereof he not only detected,<sup>257</sup> as I said, his own deeds and his fellows', but also studied and devised how those devilish books which himself and others of his fellows had brought and shipped might come to the bishop's hands to be burned. And therefore he showed me the shipman's name that had them, and the marks of the fardels<sup>258</sup> by which I have since his escape received them. And it may be, by God's grace, that though the man fled hence for fear of such harm as he wist he had well deserved (and yet was nothing toward him but per-adventure more good than he was aware of), he is yet amended in his mind and hath in his heart forsaken all Tyndale's heresies, and so I pray God it be, for I would be sorry that ever Tyndale should glory and boast of his burning. Howbeit, in the meanwhile, till it may well appear that he be surely turned to the Catholic faith again, I will advise all good Christian folk, and especially the King's subjects, to forbear and eschew his company. For that Englishman which shall be found to be familiar with him there, before his conversion here known and proved, may thereby bring himself in suspicion of heresy, and haply<sup>259</sup> hear thereof at his returning hither.

I hear also that Tyndale highly rejoiceth in the burning of Tewkesbury,<sup>260</sup> but I can see no very great cause why but if<sup>261</sup> he reckon it for a great glory that the man did abide still by the stake when he was fast bound to it. For as for the heresies, he would have abjured them again with all his heart, and have accursed Tyndale too, if all that might have saved his life. And so he gave counsel unto one James<sup>262</sup> that was for heresy in prison with him. For as James hath since confessed, Tewkesbury said unto him, "Save you yourself and abjure. But as for me, because I have abjured before, there is no remedy with me but death." By which words, if he had not been in despair of life, it well appeareth he would with good will have once abjured, and once perjured, again. And yet at his examination he denied that ever he had held any such opinions as he was abjured for—notwithstanding that there were at his examination some persons present of much honesty and worship,<sup>263</sup> two that had been present at his abjuration before, to which also his own hand was subscribed.<sup>264</sup>

And afterward being further examined upon the same, some he denied, and some he defended again. Among other things, he said that he used to pray to saints, and that he believed them to be God's friends, and that their prayers were profitable to us, and well done to pray to them. Whereupon I said unto him myself that I was glad to see him in that point yet amended, and I showed him, as the truth was indeed, that James held the contrary, and that he had so great a trust in Tewkesbury that I doubted not but when he should hear that Tewkesbury had revoked that point, he would revoke it too. As soon as Tewkesbury heard that, he went from it again by and by<sup>265</sup>—and that so far that finally he would not agree that before the Day of Doom there were either any saint in heaven or soul in purgatory, or in hell either. Nor the right faith in the Sacrament of the altar would he not confess, in no wise. For which things and diverse other horrible heresies, he was delivered at last unto the secular hands and burned, as there was never wretch, I ween,<sup>266</sup> better worthy.

Yet is there one thing notable, and well declaring what good and charitable mind the man died in. For after that he was delivered unto the secular hands, neither while he was in prison nor at the time of his death would he by his will be acknownd of<sup>267</sup> any of his heresies unto any man that asked him any question, but covered and hid them by all the means he could make, and labored to make every man ween that he had never held any such opinion. And by this dealing<sup>268</sup> every man may see that he rought not so much for<sup>269</sup> his heresies, nor took them not in his own mind for such things as he so greatly

256 quote 257 disclosed (to the authorities) 258 marks... fardels: ways to identify the packs or parcels 259 maybe 260 John Tewkesbury (d. 1531) 261 but if; unless 262 There is no known record of this person's identity. 263 distinction, renown 264 own... subscribed: signature was given 265 immediately

266 suppose 267 be acknownd of: reveal 268 behavior 269 rought... for: attached not so much importance to forced<sup>270</sup> whether they went forward or backward, as he would fain<sup>271</sup> leave an opinion among the people that his judges had borne him wrong in hand<sup>272</sup> and condemned him for such heresies as he never held. And what conscience he had that died in that mind, there is no good man doubteth.

Now was his examination<sup>273</sup> not secret, but folk enough thereat, both spiritual and temporal, and of either party right worshipful,<sup>274</sup> so that his malicious mind can in that point little take effect. And yet did the same James also confess afterward that Tewkesbury had read unto him Wycliffe's Wicket against the blessed Sacrament. And over<sup>275</sup> that was there found about him, by the sheriff's officers in the prison, a book of heresy of his own handwriting: that is to wit,<sup>276</sup> the book of Martin Luther wherein he teacheth men under the name of Christian liberty to run into the devil's bondage. And in his house was found Tyndale's book of Obedience, which he well allowed,<sup>277</sup> and his wicked book also of the Wicked Mammon, saying at his examination that all the heresies therein were good and Christian faith, being in deed as full of false<sup>278</sup> heresies, and as frantic, as ever heretic made any since Christ was born. And yet, all this notwithstanding, when he was in the sheriff's ward, and at the time of his death, he would not speak of his heresies anything, nor say that he had held and would hold this point and that, but handled himself as covertly as he could, to make the people ween that he had held no manner<sup>279</sup> opinion at all, nor never had, I think, if Tyndale's ungracious<sup>280</sup> books had never come in his hand. For which the poor wretch lieth now in hell and crieth out on him, and Tyndale, if he do not amend in time, he is likely to find him, when they come together, a hot firebrand burning at his back, that all the water in the world will never be able to quench.

Another is there also whom his unhappy books have brought unto the fire: Thomas Bilney, that<sup>281</sup> was before abjured, which<sup>282</sup> was the man of whom without name<sup>283</sup> I spoke so much in my Dialogue, which, being convicted by twenty witnesses and above, did yet stick still in his denial, and said they were all forsworn<sup>284</sup> and had utterly belied<sup>285</sup> him.

But God, which is very truth, and bringeth at last always the truth to light, would not suffer<sup>286</sup> such obstinate untruth at length to pass unpunished, but of his endless mercy brought his body to death, and gave him yet the grace to turn and save his soul. For so was it that—after diverse sermons which he had after his abjuration, and against the prohibitions given him upon his abjuration, made in sundry secret corners, and some also openly, whereof the Bishop yet, because he heard of no heresy therein, had forborne to lay the disobedience to his charge—he went unto Norwich, where he had infected diverse of the city before. And being there secretly kept by a certain space,<sup>287</sup> had in the while resort unto an anchoress, and there began secretly to sow his cockle, and brought unto her diverse of Tyndale's books, and was there taken in the doing, and the books after found about<sup>288</sup> another man, that<sup>289</sup> was conveying them thence; and these things, whoso heard the whole process,<sup>290</sup> came in such wise to pass that he could nothing doubt but that it came to light by the very provision of God.

When he came to examination, he waxed<sup>291</sup> stiff and stubborn in his opinions. But yet was God so good and gracious Lord unto him that he was finally so fully converted unto Christ and his true Catholic faith that, not only at the fire, as well in words as writing, but also many days before, he had revoked, abhorred, and detested such heresies as he before had held; which notwithstanding, there lacked not some that were very sorry for it, of whom some said, and some wrote out of Norwich to London, that he had not revoked his heresies at all, but still had abided by them. And such as were not ashamed thus to say and write, being afterward examined thereupon, saw the contrary so plainly proved in their faces, by such as at his execution stood by him while he read his revocation himself, that they had in conclusion nothing else to say but that he read his revocation so softly that they could not hear it. Howbeit, they confessed that he looked upon a bill and read it, but they said that they could not tell whether it were the bill of his revocation or not. And yet rehearsed<sup>292</sup> they themselves certain things spoken by him to the people at the fire, whereby they could not but perceive well that he revoked his errors, albeit that some of them watered

270 cared 271 gladly 272 borne... hand: misrepresented him 273 at trial 274 right worshipful: very respectable 275 beyond 276 say 277 approved of

278 detestable; deceitful 279 kind of 280 without grace; wicked 281 who 282 who 283 mentioning his name 284 perjured 285 slandered 286 allow

287 kept by a space: put up for a length of time 288 in the possession of 289 who 290 story 291 grew 292 related his words with additions of their own—as it was well proved before them. They could not also deny but that forthwith<sup>293</sup> upon his judgment<sup>294</sup> and his degradation, he kneeled down before the Bishop's Chancellor,<sup>295</sup> in the presence of all the people, and humbly besought him of<sup>296</sup> absolution from the sentence of excommunication, and with his judgment held himself well content, and acknowledged that he had well deserved to suffer the death that he then wist<sup>297</sup> he should.

They could not say nay but that upon this humble request and prayer, he was there, in the presence of all the people, assoiled,<sup>298</sup> before that he was carried out of the court—which themselves well wist would never have been but if he had revoked.

Yet was there another thing that they could not deny (for albeit they said they were not thereat, yet they had heard it in such wise that, as they said, they believed it to be true), and that thing was such as itself alone must needs make them sure that he had revoked his heresies.

The thing was this. He labored and made great instance<sup>299</sup> certain days after his judgment<sup>300</sup> that he might be suffered<sup>301</sup> to receive the blessed Body of Christ in form of bread. Wherein the Chancellor made a while great sticking and difficulty, to the intent that he would the better and more clearly perceive what devotion the man had thereto. And finally perceiving him to be of a true perfect faith, and his desire to proceed of a fervent mind, it was agreed and granted. And thereupon was he houseled<sup>302</sup> in so true perfect faith, and so great devotion, that every good Christian man hath great cause to rejoice therein. And when his confessor in the end of the Mass, which Bilney full devoutly heard upon his knees, brought unto him the Body of Christ upon the paten of the chalice, with very good and godly exhortation used unto him, that except he were in heart as he was in word and outward semblance, he should else forbear to receive that blessed Body, since he should then undoubtedly receive it on<sup>303</sup> his own damnation—it would have gladdened any good Christian heart to have heard his faithful Christian answer as they report and testify that were at that time by.<sup>304</sup>

Moreover, where, in the presence of that holy

Sacrament held yet upon the paten in the priest's hands, Bilney before he received it said the collect<sup>305</sup> Domine Iesu Christe—when he came at these words, ecclesiae tuae pacem et concordiam,<sup>306</sup> he diverse times repeated those words, with tunsions<sup>307</sup> and knockings upon his breast, and there unto God confessed, and asked his mercy, that he had so grievously erred in that point, and so sore offended him in contemning his Church. And no marvel was it though<sup>308</sup> he had a special remorse of that article. For the contemning of Christ's Catholic known Church, and the framing<sup>309</sup> of a secret unknown church, that he learned of Luther and Tyndale, was the very point that brought him unto all his mischief, as the very foundation whereupon all other heresies are built. And therefore, as the goodness of God gave him grace to cast unto the devil all his other errors, so gave he him his special grace to have of that heresy that was and is the ground of all the remnant, most especial repentance and remorse; whereby we may very well hope and trust that our Lord, whose high goodness gave him such grace so fully to repent and revoke his heresies that he with glad heart was content to suffer the fire for the punishment of his offense, hath of his infinite mercy taken and accepted that pain for so far as he will exact of the poor man's purgatory, and setting the merits of his own painful Passion thereunto, hath forthwith from the fire taken his blessed soul to heaven, where he now prayeth incessantly for the repentance and amendment of all such as have been by his means while he lived, into any such errors induced or confirmed. And I firmly trust that God's grace to that effect with that holy man's prayer will work, and so I pray God it may.

But thus ye see that Tyndale hath no great cause to glory of his martyrs when that their living is openly naught,<sup>310</sup> their opinions such as himself will abhor, they ready to abjure again if it might save their life, their sects so desperate that either they dare not at the fire set forth their opinions, for shame, or else of malice do dissemble them to bring the people in a false opinion of their judges, to ween that they judged wrong. And Bilney, that had learning, and had been accustomed in moral virtues, was by God revoked from Tyndale's heresy ere he

293 immediately 294 conviction
295 Thomas Pelles, chancellor of Richard Nix, Bishop of Norwich 296 besought him of: begged of him 297 knew

298 absolved 299 great instance:
earnest entreaty 300 conviction 301 allowed 302 given Holy Communion 303 to 304 nearby 305 Mass

prayer 306 ecclesiae... concordiam: (grant unto) "thy Church peace and concord" 307 strikings 308 that 309 devising 310 evil

died—and that, of likelihood, the rather<sup>311</sup> because God would not have all his good works lost.

And yet glorieth Tyndale ungraciously in their destruction, reckoning that their painful death doth 5 great worship<sup>312</sup> to his books—which are of such sort that never were there worse nor more abominable written.

And yet his books being such, some folk there are that with such foolish favor and such blind affection read them that, their taste infected with the fever of heresies, they not only cannot discern the thing that they read (which if they could, they were in good way toward amendment), but also are discontent and angry with any man that would help 10 them to perceive it, and fain<sup>313</sup> would they have them rather believed than answered.

Of which sort, some have asked what have I to do to meddle with the matter, saying that being a layman, I should leave it to the clergy to write in, and 20 not having professed the study of Holy Scripture, I should leave the matter wholly unto divines. Surely, first, as touching learning, if that these matters were very doubtful and things of great question—or had been so cunningly handled by Tyndale and his fellows as they might seem thereby matters of 25 great doubt and question—then would I peradventure<sup>314</sup> let them alone myself, to be debated by men of more erudition and learning. But now the matters being so plain, evident, and clear—and by 30 the whole Church of Christ so clearly put out of question that it is plain and open heresy earnestly to bring them in question—I never purpose, being in my right mind and a true Christian man, to give a heretic so much authority as to reckon myself unable in so plain points of the Christian faith to answer him; namely since I have gone somewhat 35 to school myself, and bestowed as many years in study, and under as cunning masters, as some of them have, and that I see not hitherto<sup>315</sup> these matters handled in such wise by Tyndale, or the best of them besides that ever have written therein,<sup>316</sup> but that a right mean-learned man,<sup>317</sup> or almost an unlearned woman having natural wit and being sure and fast in the true Catholic faith, were well able 40 to answer them.

For so help me God as I nothing find effectual among them all, but a shameless boldness and unreasonable railing—with Scriptures wrested awry, and made to minister them matter unto their jesting, scoffing, and outrageous ribaldry—not only 50 against every estate<sup>318</sup> here in earth, and that against them most that be most religious in living, but also against all the saints in heaven, and against the blessed Body of Christ in the holy Sacrament of the altar. In which things they fare as folk that trust 55 in nothing else but to weary all writers at last with endless and importunate babbling, and to overwhelm the whole world with words.

Now as for me, the cause is, of my writing, not so much to debate and dispute these things with them—which (though I trust therein to give them 60 no great place) many men may do much better yet than I—as to give men warning what mischief<sup>319</sup> is in their books, because many good simple folk, believing that these men neither say nor mean so evil
65 as they be borne in hand,<sup>320</sup> and longing therefore to read their books and see the thing themselves, be first infected with some heresies that seem not at the first intolerable, ere ever they come at the greatest; and then, being before infected with the less,
70 they fall at last to bear the greater, to which in the beginning they could never have abided.

Now if they will ask, is there nobody to give them warning but I?—yes, there be that be meet<sup>321</sup> thereto, and there be that in deed do so; and yet, 75 among others, that part appertaineth to me. For I well know that the King's Highness—which,<sup>322</sup> as he, for his most faithful mind to God, nothing more effectually desireth than the maintenance of the true Catholic faith (whereof he is, by his no 80 more honorable than well deserved title, Defensor), so nothing more detesteth than these pestilent books that Tyndale and such others send into the realm, to set forth here their abominable heresies with—doth, of his blessed disposition, of all earthly 85 things abhor the necessity to do punishment; and for that cause hath not only by his most erudite famous books, both in English and in Latin, declared his most Catholic purpose and intent, but also by his open<sup>323</sup> proclamations (diverse times iterated 90 and renewed) and finally in his own most royal person, in the Star Chamber, most eloquently, by his own mouth, in great presence of his lords spiritual and temporal, gave monition<sup>324</sup> and warning to all

311 sooner 312 honor 313 gladly 314 perhaps 315 thus far; as yet 316 on them 317 right mean-learned: very little educated 318 state or part of the body politic 319 harm 320 be borne in hand: are being accused of 321 that be meet: some who are suitable 322 who 323 public 324 admonition; instruction

the justices of peace, of every quarter of his realm, then assembled before his Highness, to be by them in their counties to all his people declared, and did prohibit and forbid, upon great pain, the bringing 5 in, reading, and keeping of any of those pernicious poisoned books, to the intent that every subject of his, by the means of such manifold effectual warning, with his gracious remission of their former offense in his commandment before broken, should 10 from thenceforth avoid and eschew the peril and danger of punishment, and not drive his Highness of necessity to the thing from which the mildness of his benign nature abhorreth.

Now — seeing the King's gracious purpose in this 15 point — I reckon that, being his unworthy chancellor, it appertaineth, as I said, unto my part and duty to follow the example of his noble Grace, and, after my poor wit and learning, with opening to his 20 people the malice and poison of those pernicious books, to help, as much as in me is, that his people, abandoning the contagion of all such pestilent
 25 writing, may be far from infection, and thereby from all such punishment as, following thereupon, doth oftentimes rather serve to make others be-
 30 ware that are yet clear, than to cure and heal well those that are already infected; so hard is that carbuncle,<sup>325</sup> catching once a core,<sup>326</sup> to be by any means well and surely cured. Howbeit, God so worketh that sometimes it is. Toward the help whereof — or 35 if it haply<sup>327</sup> be incurable, then to the clean cutting out the part for infection of the remnant — am I by mine office in virtue of mine oath, and every officer of justice through the realm for his rate, right especially bound, not in reason only and good congruence, but also by plain ordinance and statute.

Wherefore I reckon myself of duty deeply bound to show you, good readers, the peril of these books, whereof the makers have such mischievous<sup>328</sup> mind that they boast and glory when their ungracious 40 writing bringeth any man to death. And yet make they semblance as though they were sorry for it. And then Tyndale crieth out upon the prelates and upon the temporal princes, and calleth them murderers and martyr quellers<sup>329</sup> — dissembling that the 45 cruel wretch with his wretched books murdereth the man himself, while he giveth him the poison of his heresies and thereby compelleth princes by occasion of their incurable and contagious pestilence to punish them according to justice by sore<sup>330</sup> painful death, both for example and for infection 50 of others.

Which thing as sore as these heretics reprove, affirming that it is against the Gospel of Christ that any heretic should be persecuted and punished, and especially by bodily pain or death — and some 55 of them say the same of every manner crime (theft, murder, treason, and all) — yet in Almaine<sup>331</sup> now, contrary to their own evangelical doctrine, those evangelicals themselves cease not to pursue and punish by all the means they may, by purse,<sup>332</sup> by prison, 60 by bodily pain, and death, diverse their evangelical brethren that vary from their sect; as there are of those counterfeit evangelicals more sundry sorts of diabolical sects than a man may well rehearse.

And to this, at the last, be they driven themselves,
 65 contrary to their own former doctrine, because they find and prove well by experience that, though their sects be but false<sup>333</sup> heresies all, yet cannot the one sort long dwell with the other, but that if they begin once to be matches, they shall not fail at length 70 to contend and strive together, and by seditions the one drive the other to ruin. For never shall the country long abide without debate and ruffle, where schisms and factious heresies are suffered<sup>334</sup> a while to grow.

Believe me not if any man can reckon a place where ever he found it otherwise. In Africa the Donatists; in Greece the Arians; in Bohemia the Hussites; in England the Wycliffists; and now in 80 Almaine the Lutherans, and after that, the Zwinglians: what business they have made, what destruction and manslaughter they have caused, partly the stories witness,<sup>335</sup> partly men have presently seen. And yet hath God always maintained and continued his true Catholic faith, with the great fall and 85 ruin at length of many schismatical sects, whose fall undoubtedly the remnant will in conclusion follow, with the plain and open wrath of God showed upon their false prophets — as it fell upon the prophets both of Bel and Baal, and now this year
 90 upon Zwingli himself, that first brought into Switzerland the abominable heresy against the Blessed Sacrament of the altar, and was, as I say, by the hand of God this year slain in plain battle against the

325 skin lesion 326 a hard mass of dead tissue in the center of a boil 327 perhaps

328 harmful 329 killers 330 grievous 331 Germany 332 imposition of fines

333 detestable; deceitful 334 allowed 335 attest

Catholics, with many a thousand of his wretched sect, being in number to the Catholics three against one, and as proudly and with as malicious purpose invading them as ever did the Egyptians pursue the children of Israel.

But now saith Tyndale and Friar Barnes both, that I do them wrong in that I call their books seditious. For they counsel, they say, the people, in their books, to be obedient unto their sovereigns and rulers although they should suffer wrong, “and how can our books then,” say they, “be seditious?”

Surely, to make men heretics and then bid them be meek (when heresy springeth, as Saint Augustine saith, of pride) standeth as well with reason, as to make a man drunk, and bid him be sober; make him stark mad, and bid him be well advised; make him a stark thief, and bid him see he steal not.

Howbeit — besides the sedition that every schism and division must needs move and provoke among any people that are of diverse sects, although they were all obedient unto one prince, and cause them thereby, though they rebelled not against his person, yet to break the peace and quiet of his country, and run into the danger and peril of his laws — let us yet further look and consider in what manner and fashion they counsel the people to obey their princes.

They bid the people for a countenance<sup>336</sup> to be obedient. But they say therewith that the laws and precepts of their sovereigns do nothing bind the subjects in their consciences but if<sup>337</sup> the things by them commanded or forbidden were before commanded or forbidden in Scripture. And all the words of Scripture whereby they be commanded to obey their governors would they restrain<sup>338</sup> unto those things only that are expressed already within the corps<sup>339</sup> of Scripture. So that if they can beguile the laws and precepts of their sovereigns unawares to other men, and thereby flee from the peril of outward bodily punishment, their evangelical liberty should serve them sufficiently for discharge of their conscience, and inwardly make them in their souls clear angelical hypocrites.

Now when they falsely tell them that they be not bound to obey their governors’ lawful commandments, and then holily counsel them to obey their unlawful tyranny (for by that name call they the laws), what effect ween<sup>340</sup> ye they would that their advice should have? They know themselves well enough, and the manner of the people too, and be not so mad, I warrant<sup>341</sup> you, but that they perceive full well that if they can persuade the people to believe that they be not in their conscience bound to obey the laws and precepts of their governors, themselves be no such precious apostles that folk would forbear their own ease or pleasure for the faint feigned counsel of a few false apostates. And thus is it sure that by their false doctrine they must, if they be believed, bring the people into the secret contempt, and spiritual disobedience, and inward hatred of the law; whereof must after follow the outward breach, and thereupon outward punishment and peril of rebellion — whereby the princes should be driven to sore<sup>342</sup> effusion of their subjects’ blood, as hath already mishappened in Almaine<sup>343</sup> and, of old time, in England.

Let us yet consider further a point of their good holy counsel concerning the people’s obedience.

Friar Barnes, in his frantic book, biddeth the people that they should not rebel, in no wise.<sup>344</sup> But he biddeth them therewith that, for all the King’s commandment, they should not suffer Tyndale’s false translation of the Scripture go out of their hand, but rather die than leave it. Now knoweth he well that the false malicious manner that Tyndale hath used in the translating thereof — as I have proved both in my Dialogue and since again in this book, and as Tyndale doth himself in his own Answer openly confess in the titles of “Penance” and “Priest” — was done to set forth his false heresies with. And therefore it appeareth well that Barnes would have the people rather die than obey their princes in putting away that book that is falsely translated for the maintenance of many pestilent heresies. And thus ye see how fain<sup>345</sup> he would glory in the people’s blood. For he wotteth<sup>346</sup> very well that the King’s Highness will in no wise — nor in no wise may, if he will save his own soul — suffer<sup>347</sup> that false translation in the hands of unlearned people which is by an open heretic purposely translated false, to the destruction of so many souls.

Now no man doubteth, I think, but that Tyndale himself would no less were done for the maintenance of his false translation of the evangelists than

336 appearance sake 337 but if: unless 341 guarantee 342 great 343 Ger-
338 limit 339 collective body 340 think many 344 way, manner 345 gladly

346 knows 347 allow

would his evangelical brother Barnes, but that folk should against the King's proclamations keep still his books, and rather than leave them, die in the quarrel for the defense of his glory.

5 Whereas I before in my Dialogue did say that Luther's books be seditious, as I now say that Tyndale's be too, and moving people to their own undoing to be disobedient and rebellious to their sovereigns, in affirming that they be not, nor cannot be, bound by 10 any law made by men. Tyndale answereth me for<sup>348</sup> Luther that I say untruly. And then saith he further in this wise: "A Christian man is bound to obey tyranny — if it be not against his faith nor the law of God — till God deliver him thereof."

15 Now let I pass much railing<sup>349</sup> that he consequently maketh upon princes, and shall for this time only counsel you to consider these few words of his which he layeth forth for a rule of people's obedience to their prince. For his rule is that they shall 20 obey their tyranny till God deliver them thereof. And in this point will I not be Tyndale's interpreter; he may mean diverse ways, but which way he meaneth indeed, he shall himself declare at his further leisure, for methinketh he meaneth not very well —
25 saving that I will not take him to the worst.

But in the other point, I may be bold to say that no good man may take him well where he saith that a Christian man is bound to obey their prince's tyranny if it "be not against his faith nor the law of 30 God." And yet will I well agree that if these words were spoken of a good faithful man's mouth, and where any need required it, they were very well said; as they were when the apostles said, "We must rather please God than man."<sup>350</sup> But when Tyndale, that is 35 a heretic, putteth for a rule of the people's obedience to a good Christian prince that they be bound to obey his tyranny if it "be not against his faith" — I say that this, his rule of obedience, is a plain exhortation to disobedience and rebellion. For every man
40 well seeth that Tyndale among many other abominable heresies teacheth for the right faith that friars may lawfully wed nuns, and that no man is bound to the keeping of any fasting day or holy day made by the Church, and that no man should pray to any 45 saint, nor pray for all Christian souls, and that it is great sin to do any worship<sup>351</sup> to Christ's precious Body in the blessed Sacrament of the altar — and would the people should keep his false translation of Scripture for maintenance of these heresies. And therefore if any prince make a law against Tyndale's heresies, in any of these points or such other 50 like, Tyndale here teacheth that the people are not bound to obey it, but may and must withstand such tyranny. Or, at the leastwise, though they be bound peradventure<sup>352</sup> openly to obey their prince's tyr-

55 anny in forbearing flesh<sup>353</sup> on Good Friday or coming to God's service on Whitsun<sup>354</sup> Sunday, or friars in forbearing open<sup>355</sup> wedding with nuns (in all which things they be yet, by Tyndale's godly Gospel, at their evangelical liberty secretly to do what 60 they list<sup>356</sup> themselves, where no peace is broken nor any weak conscience offended); yet, for any law or commandment either of prince or pope, or general council of all Christian nations, or of any angel that
65 would come out of heaven to command in God's name the contrary, every man must keep still Tyndale's false translation of Scripture, and abide by his other false<sup>357</sup> books made for the maintenance of his manifold false heresies. And no man must for no 70 law nor commandment pray to any saint, nor for any soul in purgatory, nor kiss any relic, nor creep to Christ's cross,<sup>358</sup> nor do any worship to Christ's blessed Body and Blood in the holy Sacrament of the altar.

But if any prince would by any law or commandment compel his people to any of those things — 75 then Tyndale here plainly teacheth them that they may and must stiffly withstand his tyranny. So that finally concerning obedience, Tyndale's holy doctrine is that the people should in the defense of his 80 false heresies not let<sup>359</sup> to disobey, but stubbornly too, withstand their prince. Which if any man were so mad to do, and then were therefor in their obstinacy burned, or otherwise in their rebellion slain —
85 there were the triumph, the great feast and glory of Tyndale's devilish proud despiteous heart, to delight and rejoice in the effusion of such people's blood as his poisoned books had miserably bewitched, and from true Christian folk turned into false wicked 90 wretches.

Now to the intent that ye may the more clearly perceive the malicious mind of these men, and that their pestilent books be both odious to God and deadly contagious to men, and so much the more

348 with regard to 349 ranting 350 who 351 reverence 352 perhaps 353 forbearing flesh: abstaining from meat

354 Pentecost 355 public 356 please 357 deceitful 358 creep to Christ's cross:

The reference is to the Good Friday veneration of the cross. 359 hesitate perilous in that their false heresies wilyly walk forth under the counterfeit visage of the true Christian faith — this is the cause and purpose of my present labor whereby, God willing, I shall so pull off their 5 gay painted visors<sup>360</sup> that every man listing<sup>361</sup> to look thereon shall plainly perceive and behold the bare ugly gargoyl faces of their abominable heresy.

And for because the matter is long, and my leisure seldom and short, I cannot, as I fain<sup>362</sup> would, 10 send out all at once, but if<sup>363</sup> I should keep still altogether by me longer than methinketh convenient.

I send out now, therefore, of this present work, these three books first. In the first of which I answer Tyndale's preface made before his Answer to my Dialogue; which preface of his is, in a manner, 15 an introduction into all his heresies. The second book is against his defense of his translation of the New Testament. The third, against two chapters of Tyndale's Answer — the one, "Whether the Word 20 Were before the Church, or the Church before the Word," the other, "Whether the Apostles Left Anything Unwritten Necessary to Salvation" — whereupon great part of all his heresies hang.

Now shall I (God willing) at my next leisure go further in his book, and come to the very breast of all this battle, that is to wit,<sup>364</sup> the question: Which is the Church? For that is the point that all these heretics, by all the means they may, labor to make so dark that by their wills no man should wit<sup>365</sup> what 30 they mean. But I trust to draw the serpent out of his dark den, and as the poets feign that Hercules drew up Cerberus, the mastiff of hell, into the light, where his eyes dazed — so shall I, with the grace of that light "which illumineth every man that cometh 35 into this world,"<sup>366</sup> make you that matter so light-some, and so clear to every man, that I shall leave Tyndale never a dark corner to creep into, able to hide his head.

Then after that I have so clearly confuted Tyndale
 40 concerning that point, and shall have plainly proved you the sure and steadfast authority of Christ's Catholic known Church against all Tyndale's trifling sophistications, which he would should seem so solemn subtle insolubles, which ye shall see 45 proved very frantic follies; after this done, I say, before I go further with Tyndale, I purpose to answer good young Father Frith, which<sup>367</sup> now suddenly

cometh forth so sagely that three old men — my brother Rastell,<sup>368</sup> the bishop of Rochester,<sup>369</sup> and I — matched with Father Frith alone, be now but 50 very babes and, as he calleth us, insipient.<sup>370</sup> But thus goeth the world forth between Frith and us. He increaseth, I see well, as fast as we decay. For once, I ween, the youngest of us three, three days ere Father Frith was born, had learned within a little 55 as much as Father Frith hath now. Howbeit, I shall leave young Father Frith in his pride and glory for the while. But when Tyndale is once in that article touching the Church confuted, then hath Frith already concerning purgatory clearly lost the field, 60 and all his well-beloved book is not worth a button, though<sup>371</sup> it were all as true as it is false. For then is the faith of the Church in that point infallible, or at the least inculpable, were there Scripture therefor or not. And no Scripture can there prove<sup>372</sup> the 65 very true Church to hold an article as true faith that were in deed damnably false.

And yet shall I, for all that, go further with young Father Frith, and touch, if God will, every part of his fresh painted book; and so shall I pluck off, I 70 trust, the most glorious feathers from his gay peacock's tail that I shall leave him (if he have wit and grace) a little less delight and liking in himself than he seemeth now to have, which thing hath hitherto made him for to stand not a little in his own light.
 75

I pray God heartily send that young man the grace to bestow<sup>373</sup> his wit and learning, such as it is, about some better business than Tyndale misbestoweth it now. For now is Frith's wit and learning nothing but Tyndale's instrument whereby he 80 bloweth out his heresy.

Finally after that I shall have answered Frith, I purpose to return again unto Tyndale's book, and answer him in every chapter that he hath impugned in the four books of my Dialogue. Wherein I trust 85 to make every child perceive his wily follies and false crafts, with his open shameless lies put in and mingled among them, wherewith he fain<sup>374</sup> would, and weeneth to, blind in such wise the world that folk should not espy the falsehood and folly of his 90 execrable heresies.

I think that no man doubteth but that this work both hath been and will be some pain and labor to me, and of truth, so I find it. But as help me God,

360 masks 361 wishing 362 gladly 363 but if: unless 364 say 365 know
 366 Jn 1:9 367 who 368 brother

Rastell: brother-in-law John Rastell
 (1475–1536) 369 John Fisher 370 fools

371 even if 372 be that proves 373 employ 374 gladly

I find all my labor in the writing not half so grievous and painful to me as the tedious reading of their blasphemous heresies; that would God, after all my labor done, so that the remembrance of their pestilent errors were erased out of Englishmen's hearts, and their abominable books burned up, mine own were walked<sup>375</sup> with them — and the name of these matters utterly put in oblivion. Howbeit, since I see the devil in these days so strong, and these devilish heresies so sore set abroach<sup>376</sup> in some unhappy hearts, that they never cease in all that ever they may to spread these books abroad to such as keep them in hugger-mugger,<sup>377</sup> and secretly poison themselves, weening the books were very good while<sup>378</sup> they read but them alone — and then of those evil books so many daily made by so many idle heretics, and by and by<sup>379</sup> sent hither — it were need, as meseemeth, that diverse wise and well-learned men should set their pens to the book, which though they shall not satisfy them that will needs be naught,<sup>380</sup> yet shall they do good to such as fall to these folk of oversight, weening that their new ways were well.

Our Savior saith that the children of darkness be more politic in their kind than are the children of light in their kind.<sup>381</sup> And surely so seemeth it now. For these false<sup>382</sup> faithless heretics, whose hearts are in the deep dark dungeon of the devil, are more wily, and more busy therewith, in setting forth of their heresies, than are the faithful learned folk in the defense of the truth.

And as the true disciples of Christ were in slumber and fell in sleep in Christ's company, while Judas the traitor was waking and watching about his detestable treason,<sup>383</sup> so while these Judases watch and study about the making of their ungracious books, good and true-believing men that were meet<sup>384</sup> to answer them, and that were able in writing to much more than overmatch them, if they would wake and pray and take the pen in hand, be now so forwearied, with the sorrow and heaviness<sup>385</sup> to see the world wax<sup>386</sup> so wretched, that they fall even in a slumber therewith and let these wretches alone, saving that yet sometimes some good Peter in a good zeal so smiteth off Malchus's ear<sup>387</sup> that God setteth it on better again and giveth it grace to draw back from the hearkening<sup>388</sup> of false heresies, and to give itself to the hearing of Christ's true Catholic faith. And sometimes again some good holy Paul shaketh the poisoned adder into a fair fire,<sup>389</sup> that lying and lurking among the dry fruitless faggots<sup>390</sup> catcheth good folk by the fingers and so hangeth on their hands with the poison sting of false "only faith," that they would withhold them from setting their hands to any good, virtuous works.

But now leaving other men to do as God shall like to put in their minds, I shall for my part perform that I have promised, if God give me life and grace thereto. For as for leisure, shall not, I trust, one time or other lack to suffice, for so much and for much more too. Which when I have, as I before said, altogether performed — I would in good faith wish that never man should need to read any word.

For surely the very best way were neither to read this nor theirs, but rather the people unlearned to occupy themselves, besides their other business, in prayer, good meditation, and reading of such English books as most may nourish and increase devotion — of which kind is Bonaventure of<sup>391</sup> The Life of Christ, Gerson of The Following<sup>392</sup> of Christ, and the devout contemplative book of Scala Perfectionis, with such others like — than in the learning what may well be answered unto heretics.

The very treacle<sup>393</sup> were well lost, so that all venom and poison were utterly lost therewith. And better were it not to be sick at all than of a great sickness to be very well healed.

And if it might be provided that every man should be so well tempered that no man should by distemperance fall into disease, then were it better that the physician bestowed all his time about that part of physic that teacheth to preserve our health than to write any word of that part that restoreth it. But since it can never be brought to pass that poison will be forgotten, nor that every man shall use himself so circumspectly but that either of oversight or adventure<sup>394</sup> some shall have need of cure, therefore it is necessary that treacle for the one, and other medicines for the other, be provided and had. And therefore, as I would wish that their books were all gone and mine own therewith — so, since I see well that that thing will not be, better it is, I

375 gone 376 sore set abroach: set greatly astir 377 in hugger-mugger: clandestinely 378 when 379 by and by: immediately 380 bad 381 Lk 16:8 382 detestable;

deceitful 383 Mt 26:36–50 384 suitable 385 grief 386 become 387 Jn
18:10–11; Lk 22:49–51 388 listening 389 Acts 28:1–6 390 bundles of sticks 391 Bonaventure of: Bonaventure's 392 Imitation (This book was at that time commonly believed to have been written by Jean Gerson.) 393 antidote 394 chance reckon, that there be treacle ready than the poison to tarry and no treacle for it.

Howbeit, though every shop were full of treacle — yet were he not wise, I ween, that would willfully
 5 drink poison first to drink treacle after, but rather, cast the poison to the devil and let the treacle stand for some that should hap to need it. And likewise would I counsel every good Christian man, and especially such as are not groundly learned,<sup>395</sup> to cast
 10 out the poisoned draught<sup>396</sup> of these heretics' books which when they be drunk down infect the reader and corrupt the soul unto the everlasting death; and therefore neither vouchsafe<sup>397</sup> to read their books nor anything made against them neither, but abhor
 15 to hear their heresies so much as named, according to the gracious<sup>398</sup> counsel of the blessed apostle Paul against fornication, where he writeth unto the Ephesians, "Let not fornication be so much as named or spoken of among you."<sup>399</sup> And yet — since 20 that would not be brought to pass that he counseled, and would fain<sup>400</sup> have had observed — he was fain himself to speak thereof and write thereof, to arm the people against it, in more places<sup>401</sup> than one, as both he and other apostles, and all holy doc-
 25 tors since, have been driven to write against heresies, and yet would fain that folk would so clear have cast all heresies out of remembrance that neither themselves should have needed to write thereof nor other folk to read that part of their books.

30 And therefore, as I would advise any man neither to read these heretics' books nor mine, but occupy their minds better and, standing firmly by the Catholic faith of this fifteen hundred years, never once muse upon these newfangled heresies, so, on 35 the other side, if it mishap any man to fall in such a fond<sup>402</sup> affection and vain curious mind that neither peril temporal in breach of his prince's proclamation and the laws of the realm, nor the peril spiritual in hurting of his own soul, nor they both together
 40 by putting himself in danger to burn both here and in hell, can hold his itching fingers from their poisoned books, then would I counsel him in any wise to read therewith such things as are written against them, and weigh them both at the leastwise indifferently, and not to fall suddenly so drunk in the 45

new must<sup>403</sup> of their newfangled novelties that the old wholesome wine with which good folk have lived now this fifteen hundred years offend their drunken taste because it is not so wallow-sweet<sup>404</sup> but drinketh<sup>405</sup> more of the verdure.<sup>406</sup> 50

Furthermore forasmuch as, according to the words of Christ,<sup>407</sup> it will none otherwise be but that some stumbling blocks will always be by malicious folk laid in good people's way, though best were to stop your ears utterly and give none hearing to any false enchanters that would bewitch you wilyly to make you delight in those books, yet since some that be plain and simple may fortune to be secretly misled by false wily shrews<sup>408</sup> except they be well armed before, I doubt not by God's grace 55 but if they read first the things that are written against them, they shall themselves be able to reject and confound<sup>409</sup> any devil that would draw them to them. And therefore — as I am sure that evil and ungracious folk shall ever find the means that such 60 books shall never in some corners lack, whereby good people may be deceived and corrupted — it is more than necessary that men have again at hand such books as may well arm them to resist and confute them. Of which kind of good books, albeit I
 65 know well there may, and doubt not but there shall, be many better made than mine — and that some such I see already — yet have I not so slightly seen unto mine own, nor shuffled it up so hastily, nor let it so pass unlooked over by better men and better
 70 learned also than myself, but that I trust in God it may among the better stand yet in some good stead. And that it so may to God's honor and the profit of some good folk, I heartily beseech our Lord — without the adspiration<sup>410</sup> and help of whose 75 special grace no labor of man can profit, and to whom therefore be all thank referred — which<sup>411</sup> liveth and reigneth in eternal glory. To which as he hath already brought many a blessed saint, so mote<sup>412</sup> his mercy bring with speed the souls that 80 are in purgatory — and give us that here live, in this wretched world, aid and help of grace by true faith and good works to follow them, the rather<sup>413</sup> by the intercession and prayers of all his holy saints that are already with him. Amen. 90

395 solidly educated 396 drink
 397 agree 398 grace-filled; righteous
 399 Eph 5:3 400 gladly 401 passages

(scriptural) 402 foolish 403 wine
 404 cloyingly sweet 405 savors 406 the fruit's agreeable freshness and sharpness 407 Lk 17:1 408 scoundrels 409 utterly defeat 410 favor 411 who 412 may 413 more readily

Christopher St. German published anonymously the Treatise concernynge the Division in 1532. It was published five times before 1535; the first and at least two others were by Berthelet, the King's printer (CW 9: xxxvii; CW 10: xxi ff.).

The Apology of Sir Thomas More, Knight

Thomas More resigned as Lord Chancellor on May 16, 1532, the day after Archbishop Warham and other leaders of the Convocation agreed to the “Submission of the Clergy,” which gave the King authority over Church laws in England. Through the Submission, the clergy “promised to make no new canon without royal license, and to submit existing canons to a committee of 32, half lay and half clerical and all to be chosen by the King, for revision” (ODCC 1319). The Submission was officially signed before a group of commissioners, including Thomas Cromwell, on the day of More’s resignation; in effect, the Church surrendered its independence and liberties to the King’s power through the Submission (Lehmberg 152). King Henry’s formal Act of Supremacy would follow in 1534.

Although More resigned from political office, he retained and continued to use his 1528 commission to defend the Church from attack — a commission he had received from London bishop Cuthbert Tunstall, with King Henry’s approval. On the whole, More wrote over 1,500 pages in defense of the Church from 1529 to 1533. In June 1529, he published A Dialogue of Sir Thomas More, Knight, and in September, The Supplication of Souls. In March 1532, he published Books 1–3 of The Confutation of Tyndale’s Answer, and in December, A Letter Against Frith. In early 1533, he finished The Confutation of Tyndale’s Answer, Books 4–8.

In late 1532, lawyer and legal scholar Christopher St. German (ca. 1460–1540/41) published, with the King’s printer, his anonymous A Treatise Concerning the Division Between the Spirituality and Temporality (facing). In this work, St. German accuses the clergy of greed, cruelty, pride, and unjust treatment of heretics; of not treating the laity equally under law; and of being the ones responsible for a dangerous and growing division within the country. St. German’s anonymous Treatise was printed five times by the end of 1537, at least several by the King’s printer.

By spring 1533, More responded to this legal and political attack, staying within his 1528 commission but using a thirty-six chapter “digression” to respond to St. German’s most serious charges against the clergy and the Church. Because St. German’s book was published anonymously, More gave the author an ironic name, “the Pacifier,” used over 160 times, suggesting that St. German’s work was ordered to increasing division, not peace, between the spiritual and the temporal orders.

Although More structures his book as an “apology” or defense against seven charges that had been made about him (for example, his alleged mistreatment of heretics), most of the book is a detailed refutation of St. German’s Division and its arguments. St. German’s response to More, the anonymous Salem and Bizance, prompted More’s Debellation of Salem and Bizance, around November 1, 1533.

CONTENTS

1. Gives the seven charges against More and his writings . . . . .	819
2. Begins by addressing the sixth charge: that More does not quote his opponents accurately or use the good, mild, and gentle manner of The Division . . . . .	820
3. Addresses the first charge: his writing is too long and tedious . . . . .	821
4. Addresses an argument raised about Tyndale’s New Testament translation: that although it is flawed, it would be better to have “poisoned bread than no bread at all”. . . . .	823
5–8. Addresses the second charge: that More’s arguments have been easily answered in books and sermons. . . . .	825
9. Addresses the third charge: that More does not treat heretics courteously . . . . .	838
10. Addresses the fourth charge: that More is partial toward the clergy . . . . .	841
11–13. Addresses the fifth charge: that More’s work would be more credible if he publicly revealed the clergy’s faults . . . . .	844
14–39. Addresses the attacks in chapter 1 of Division on traditional teachings and practices . . . . .	848
40–49. Addresses attacks in chapters 7–8 of Division on civil and ecclesiastical laws and trial procedures in England . . . . .	882
50. Addresses More’s use of sport and jest, and then the seventh charge: that More has not fulfilled the promise he made in Confutation to answer the question, “What is the Church?” . . . . .	903

This facsimile from the first edition of the Apology (reduced) shows More’s lawyerly habit of quoting his opponent at length and then refuting in detail.

The Apology of Sir Thomas More, Knight

Sir Thomas More, Knight
to the Christian Readers

THE FIRST CHAPTER

5 So well stand I not (I thank God), good reader, in mine own conceit,<sup>1</sup> and thereby so much in mine own light, but that I can<sup>2</sup> somewhat with equal<sup>3</sup> judgment and an even eye behold and consider both myself and mine own. Nor I use not<sup>4</sup> to 10 follow the condition of Aesop's ape,<sup>5</sup> that thought her own babes so beauteous and so far passing in all goodly feature and favor, nor the crow that accounted her own birds the fairest of all the fowls 15 that flew.<sup>6</sup> But like<sup>7</sup> as some (I see well) there are that can somewhat less than I, that yet for all that put out their works in writing, so am I not so blind, upon the other side, but that I very well perceive very many so far in wit<sup>8</sup> and erudition above me 20 that in such matters as I have anything written, if other men as many would have taken it in hand as could have done it better, it might much better have become me to let the matter alone than by writing to presume anything to meddle therewith.

25 And therefore, good reader—since I so well know so many men so far excel and pass me in all such things as are required in him that might adventure<sup>9</sup> to put his works abroad, to stand and abide the judgment of all other men—I was never 30 so far overseen<sup>10</sup> as either to look<sup>11</sup> or hope that such faults as in my writing should by mine oversight escape me could by the eyes of all other men pass forth unspied, but shortly should be both by good and well-learned perceived, and among so many 35 bad brethren as I wist<sup>12</sup> well would be wroth<sup>13</sup> with them, should be both sought out and sifted to the uttermost flake of bran, and largely thereupon controlled<sup>14</sup> and reproved.

But yet against all this fear this one thing recomforted<sup>15</sup> me: that since I was of one point very fast<sup>16</sup> 40 and sure—that such things as I write are consonant unto the common Catholic faith and determinations of Christ's Catholic Church, and are clear confutations of false blasphemous heresies by Tyndale<sup>17</sup> and Barnes<sup>18</sup> put forth unto the contrary— 45 any great fault and intolerable should they none find of such manner, sort, and kind as the readers should in their souls perish and be destroyed by, of which poisoned faults mine adversaries' books be full. 50

Now then, as for other faults of less weight and tolerable, I nothing doubted nor do, but that every good Christian reader will be so reasonable and indifferent<sup>19</sup> as to pardon in me the thing that happeth in all other men, and that no such man will over me 55 be so sore an auditor,<sup>20</sup> and over my books such a sore controller,<sup>21</sup> as to charge me with any great loss by gathering together of many such things as are with very few men aught<sup>22</sup> regarded, and to look for such exact circumspection and sure sight to be 60 by me used in my writing as, except the prophets of God, and Christ and his apostles, hath never, I ween,<sup>23</sup> been founden in any man's else before—that is to wit,<sup>24</sup> to be perfect in every point clean from all manner of faults—but hath always been holden<sup>25</sup> 65 for a thing excusable, though<sup>26</sup> the reader in a long work perceive that the writer have, as Horace saith of Homer,<sup>27</sup> here and there sometimes fallen in a little slumber, in which places, as the reader seeth that

1 idea, conception 2 but... can: that I cannot 3 impartial, unbiased 4 I use not: do I make it a practice 5 See Aesop's "Jupiter and the Monkey." 6 See Aesop's "The Crow and Its Ugly Fledglings." 7 just 8 mind, intellect 9 risk 10 mistaken 11 expect 12 knew 13 angry 14 criticized 15 encouraged 16 certain 17 William Tyndale (ca. 1494–1536), also known as William Hitchens, was a prominent English reformer, known for translating the New Testament into English. He was ultimately executed for heresy near Brussels. 18 Robert Barnes (1495–1540) took vows as an Augustinian, but later left the order and became a Lutheran. He was imprisoned for heresy in 1526, and after his release went to the Continent. He won Henry VIII's favor by approving of his divorce, but after associating himself with Thomas Cromwell, Barnes was burned at the stake after Cromwell fell from favor. 19 impartial, unbiased 20 sore an auditor: severe a listener 21 critic 22 at all 23 suppose 24 say 25 held 26 even if 27 De arte poetica 358–59

the writer slept, so useth he<sup>28</sup> courtesy if he cannot sleep, yet for company at the leastwise to nap and wink with him, and leave his dream unchecked. Which kind of courtesy, if I should show how often 5 I have used with Tyndale and Barnes both, winking at their tolerable faults, and such as I rather thought negligently escaped them of oversight or folly than diligently devised of wily falsehood or malice—
 10 should I double in length all my books, in which the brethren find for the special fault that they be too long already.

But albeit that<sup>29</sup> when I wrote I was (as I have told you) bolded<sup>30</sup> and encouraged by the common custom of all indifferent readers—which<sup>31</sup> would, I wist<sup>32</sup> well, pardon and hold excused such tolerable oversight in my writing as men may find some in any man's, almost, that ever wrote before—yet am I now much more glad and bold when I see that 20 those folk which would faintest<sup>33</sup> find my faults cannot yet happen on them, but after long seeking and searching for them, for all their business<sup>34</sup> taken thereabout, are fain<sup>35</sup> to put for faults in my writing such things as well considered shall appear their 25 own faults for the finding.

For they find first for a great fault that my writing is overlong, and therefore too tedious to read. For which cause, they say, they will never once vouchsafe to look thereon.

30 But then say they further that such places of them as are looked on by those that are learned and can skill<sup>36</sup> be soon perceived for nought,<sup>37</sup> and my reasons of little force. For they boast much that they hear sometimes diverse parts of my books answered and confuted fully in sundry<sup>38</sup> of some men's sermons, though my name be forborne,<sup>39</sup> and then they wish me there, they say, for that<sup>40</sup> it would do their hearts good to see my cheeks red for shame.

40 And over<sup>41</sup> this, they find a great fault that I handle Tyndale and Barnes, their two new gospels, with no fairer words nor in no more courteous manner.

45 And over this, I write, they say, in such wise<sup>42</sup> that I show myself suspect in the matter and partial toward the clergy.

And then they say that my works were worthy much more credence if I had written more indifferently,<sup>43</sup> and had declared and made open to the people the faults of the clergy.

And in this point they lay for an example the 50 goodly and godly, mild and gentle fashion used by him, whosoever he was, that now lately wrote the book of The Division between the Temporality and the Spirituality; which charitable mild manner, they say that if I had used, my works would have been read 55 both of<sup>44</sup> many more and with much better will.

And yet they say, besides all this, that I do but pick out pieces at my pleasure, such as I may most easily seem to soil,<sup>45</sup> and leave out what me list,<sup>46</sup> and such as would plainly prove the matter against 60 me. And so they say that I use but craft and fraud against Tyndale. For as for Friar Barnes, I perceive by sundry ways that the brotherhood speak much less of him, either for that they find him in their own minds well and fully answered, or else that they 65 take him in respect of<sup>47</sup> Tyndale, but for a man of a second<sup>48</sup> sort. And that may peradventure<sup>49</sup> be, because he leaveth out somewhat<sup>50</sup> that Tyndale taketh in—that is to wit,<sup>51</sup> the making of mocks and mows<sup>52</sup> against the Mass, and the Blessed Sacrament 70 of the altar.

But finally, they say further yet that I have not fulfilled my promise. For I promised, they say, in my preface of my Confutation, that I would prove<sup>53</sup> the Church; and that, they say, I have not done. 75

THE SECOND CHAPTER

Now will I begin with that point that I most esteem. For of all the remnant make I little count.<sup>54</sup> But surely loath would I be to misrehearse<sup>55</sup> any man's reason against whom I write, or to rehearse him slenderly.<sup>56</sup> And in that point, undoubtedly they see full well themselves that they say not true. For there is no reason that I rehearse of Tyndale's, or of Friar Barnes's either, but that I use the contrary manner therein that Tyndale useth with 80 mine. For he rehearseth mine in every place faintly and falsely too, and leaveth out the pith<sup>57</sup> and the

28 useth he of: it is usual for him out of 29 albeit that: although 30 emboldened
 31 who 32 knew 33 most gladly 34 trouble; pains 35 constrained 36 can skill: have expertise 37 nothing

38 several 39 left unmentioned 40 for that: because 41 beyond 42 a way
 43 impartially 44 by 45 refute 46 me list: I please 47 respect of: comparison with 48 inferior 49 perhaps

50 something 51 say 52 deridings
 53 define and show the authority of; CW 8:
 34/29–35/8 54 account; consideration 55 relate inaccurately 56 inadequately; slackly 57 substance; import strength, and the proof that most maketh for the purpose. And he fareth<sup>58</sup> therein as if there were one that, having day of challenge appointed, in which he should wrestle with his adversary, would find the means by craft to get his adversary before the day 5 into his own hands, and there keep him and diet him with such a thin diet that at the day he bringeth him forth feeble, faint, and famished, and almost hunger-starven,<sup>59</sup> and so lean that he can scant<sup>60</sup> stand on his legs; and then is it easy, ye wot<sup>61</sup> well, to give the seely<sup>62</sup> soul a fall. And yet when Tyndale hath done all this, he taketh the fall himself.

But every man may well see that I never use that way with Tyndale nor with any of these folk, but 15 I rehearse their reason<sup>63</sup> to the best that they can make it themselves, and I rather enforce<sup>64</sup> it and strengthen it of mine own than take any part of theirs therefrom.

And this use I<sup>65</sup> not only in such places as I do not rehearse all their own words (for that is not requisite in every place), but I use it also in such places besides as of all their own words I leave not one syllable out. For such darkness<sup>66</sup> use they purposely, and Tyndale in especial, that except<sup>67</sup> I took some 20 pain to set out their arguments plainly, many that read them should little wit<sup>68</sup> what they mean.

And to the intent every man may see that these good brethren little care how loud they lie, let any man look, whoso will, and he shall find that of Friar Barnes I have left out little, except a leaf<sup>69</sup> or two concerning the General Councils,<sup>70</sup> and I show the cause why; and as for Tyndale, of diverse whole chapters of his I have not wittingly<sup>71</sup> left out one line—and very few, I am sure, of oversight either—35 but have put in all his chapters whole whereupon any weight of his matter hangeth, except only in the defense of such English words as he hath changed in his translation of the New Testament. And yet therein they can never say but that I have put in all 40 the strength and pith of his proof.

But all the remnant of his chapters, as far as I have gone, have I put in whole, leaving out nought<sup>72</sup> but railing and preaching without proof, and that but in one place or twain,<sup>73</sup> and where I do so, I give the reader warning.
 45

Now that his chapters be whole rehearsed in my book, I suppose it may meetly<sup>74</sup> well appear by the matter consequently pursuing,<sup>75</sup> if the reader leave my words out between, and read but Tyndale's alone. Or if any one word or some few left out of 50 chance put that proof in doubt, yet have the brethren among them, I warrant you, of Tyndale's books enough by which they may try<sup>76</sup> this true.

And well ye wot<sup>77</sup> if this were untrue that I say, some of them could assign<sup>78</sup> at the leastwise some 55 one such place for an example. But that thing neither do they, nor never can while they live.

THE THIRD CHAPTER

Now whereas these good blessed brethren say 60 that my writing is so long and so tedious that they will not once vouchsafe to look thereon, they show themselves that my writing is not so long as their wits be short, and the eyes of their souls very purblind,<sup>79</sup> while they cannot see so far as to perceive that in finding so many faults in that book, 65 which they confess themselves they neither read nor can find in their heart to look upon, they show themselves either of lightness<sup>80</sup> ready to give hasty credence to other folk, or of malice to make many lies themselves.
 70

It is little marvel that it seem long and tedious unto them to read it over within, whom it irketh to do so much as look it over without; and every way seemeth long to him that is weary ere<sup>81</sup> he begin.

But I find some men, again, to whom the reading is so far from tedious that they have read the whole book over thrice—and some that make tables thereof for their own remembrance—and that,<sup>82</sup> such men as have as much wit<sup>83</sup> and learning both, as the best of all this blessed brotherhood that ever 80 I heard of.

Howbeit,<sup>84</sup> glad would I have been if it might have been much more short, for then should my labor have been so much the less.

But they will, if they be reasonable men, consider 85 in themselves that it is a shorter thing and sooner done to write heresies than to answer them. For

58 acts 59 starved to death 60 hardly 61 know 62 poor; foolish 63 argument
 64 reinforce 65 use I: I usually do 66 obscurity 67 unless 68 know
 69 page 70 General Councils: Ecumenical

Councils, to which all the bishops of the world are summoned 71 knowingly 72 nothing 73 two 74 fairly 75 consequently pursuing: immediately following 76 test 77 know 78 point out 79 nearsighted; partially blind 80 of lightness: out of thoughtlessness

 81 before 82 those 83 intelligence 84 However the most foolish heretic in a town may write more false heresies in one leaf than the wisest man in the whole world can well and conveniently<sup>85</sup> by reason and authority soil and confute<sup>86</sup> in forty.

5 Now when that Tyndale not only teacheth false heresies, but furnisheth his errors also with pretense of reason and Scripture — and instead of reason, sometimes with blunt subtleties and rude riddles too — the making open and lightsome to the reader 10 the dark writing of him that would not by his will be well perceived, hath put me to more labor and length in answering than some man would peradventure<sup>87</sup> have been content to take.

And I sometimes take the pain to rehearse some 15 one thing in diverse fashions in more places than one, because I would that the reader should, in every place where he fortuneth to fall in reading, have at his hand, without remitting over<sup>88</sup> elsewhere, or labor of further seeking for it, as much as shall seem 20 requisite for that matter, that he there hath in hand. And therein the labor of all that length is mine own, for ease and shortening of the reader's pain.

Now on the other side, as for Tyndale and Barnes, 25 I wot nere<sup>89</sup> well whether I may call them long or short.

For sometimes they be short indeed, because they would be dark, and have their false follies pass and repass all unperceived.

Sometimes they can use such a compendious 30 kind of eloquence that they convey and couch up together, with a wonderful brevity, four follies and five lies in less than as many lines.

But yet for all this, I see not in effect any men 35 more long than they. For they preach sometimes a long process<sup>90</sup> to very little purpose. And since that of all their whole purpose they prove in conclusion never a piece at all, were their writing never so short, yet were their whole work at last too long by altogether. But greatly can I not marvel, though these 40 evangelical brethren think my works too long. For everything think they too long that aught is.<sup>91</sup> Our Lady's Psalter<sup>92</sup> think they too long by all the Ave Marias,<sup>93</sup> and some good piece of the Creed too.

Then the Mass think they too long by the secrets,<sup>94</sup> and the canon,<sup>95</sup> and all the collects<sup>96</sup> wherein mention is made either of saints or souls.<sup>97</sup> 45

Instead of a long portuous,<sup>98</sup> a short primer<sup>99</sup> shall serve them. And yet the primer they think too long by all our Lady Matins.<sup>100</sup>

And the Seven Psalms<sup>101</sup> think they long enough
50 without the litany.<sup>102</sup>

And as for Dirge<sup>103</sup> or commendation for their friends' souls,<sup>104</sup> all that service they think too long by altogether.

But now, good readers, I have, unto these delicate 55 dainty folk that can aweigh<sup>105</sup> with no long reading, provided with mine own pain and labor as much ease as my poor wit could devise.

First, when they were before fast<sup>106</sup> in the Catholic faith, they never needed to have read any of 60 these heretics' books that have brought them into these newfangled fantasies. But now, since they be, by their own folly, fallen first into doubting of the truth, and afterward into the leaning toward a false belief, they be very negligent and unreasonable if 65 they will not, at the leastwise for their own surety,<sup>107</sup> search and see somewhat<sup>108</sup> whereby they may perceive whether these new teachers of theirs be such as they take them for.

Now have I then considered that they would per-70 adventure wax<sup>109</sup> weary to read over a long book, and therefore have I taken the more pain upon every chapter, to the intent that they shall not need to read over any chapter but one, and that it shall not 75 force<sup>110</sup> greatly which one, throughout all the book.

For I dare be bold to say, and am ready to make it good with the best evangelist of all this evangelical brotherhood that will set his pen to the contrary, that there is not one chapter of Tyndale's, or
