Now he that will, therefore, read any one chapter — either at adventure,<sup>111</sup> or else some chosen piece in which himself had went<sup>112</sup> that his evangelical father Tyndale had said wonderfully well, or 5 else Friar Barnes either — when he shall in that one chapter, as I am sure he shall, find his holy prophet plainly proved a fool, he may be soon eased of any further labor. For then hath he good cause to cast 10 him quite off and never meddle<sup>113</sup> more with him, and then shall he never need to read more of my book neither, and so shall he make it short enough.

Howbeit,<sup>114</sup> if he list,<sup>115</sup> for all that, to pardon his prophet in that one place, and think that he wrote that piece peradventure while the Spirit was not 15 upon him, and that he saith much better in some other place, and so will read on further to find it, then shall himself make my work long. For he shall, I trust, read it over, and yet shall he never come to it. And thus as for the tedious length of my writing, 20 I have, I trust, without great length given the good brotherhood a sufficient answer.

THE FOURTH CHAPTER

But now will the brethren peradventure<sup>116</sup> say that I may be bold to say very largely of mine 25 own because men may not be bold in these matters to defend Tyndale's part.

It were indeed somewhat better than it is, if they said true. But neither are such things so diligently controlled,<sup>117</sup> nor such folk so feard of such heretical 30 favor,<sup>118</sup> as they should be if every man did his part; nor they lack no wily drifts<sup>119</sup> in such wise also to defend those things, as they may save for themselves some color<sup>120</sup> to say that they meant none harm.

And to prove that they be neither so sore<sup>121</sup> afear'd in such things nor lack such inventions<sup>122</sup> of uttering their forbidden ware, besides the bold erroneous talking that is now almost in every lewd<sup>123</sup> lad's 35 mouth, the brethren boast that they hear diverse parts of my book well and plainly in sundry<sup>124</sup> of their sermons confuted, and then they cannot say, 40 ye see well, that they leave me unanswered for fear.

Howbeit,<sup>125</sup> though they be bold upon some parts even now, some parts haply<sup>126</sup> there are whereupon they dare not be so bold yet, but little and little will 45 peradventure hereafter.

Howbeit, some parts that they be already bold upon be meetly<sup>127</sup> well for a beginning, whereof for example I shall remember you one or twain.<sup>128</sup>

Tyndale's false translation of the New Testament was (as ye wot<sup>129</sup> well and as himself confesseth) translated with such changes as he hath made 50 therein purposely, to the intent that by those words changed, the people should be nuzzled<sup>130</sup> in those opinions which himself calleth true Catholic faith, and which things all true Catholic people call very 55 false pestilent heresies.

This translation therefore being by the clergy condemned, and at Paul's Cross<sup>131</sup> openly burned, and by the King's gracious proclamation openly forbidden, I wrote in a place<sup>132</sup> of my Dialogue, in the 60 100th leaf, among other things these words:

The faults be so many in Tyndale's translation of the New Testament, and so spread through the whole book, that likewise as it were as soon 65 done to weave a new web of cloth as to sew up every hole in a net, so were it almost as little labor and less to translate the whole book all new as to make in his translation so many changes as need must be ere it were made good, besides this:
 70 that there would no wise man, I trow,<sup>133</sup> take the bread which he well wist<sup>134</sup> was of his enemy's hand once poisoned, though he saw his friend after scrape it never so clean.<sup>135</sup>

These words of mind were rehearsed<sup>136</sup> in a sermon, and answered in this wise: that though there 75 were bread that were poisoned indeed, yet were poisoned bread better than no bread at all.

Now was this word taken up, and walked about abroad among the brethren and sistren, so highly well liked among them that some of them said that 80 all my reasons were avoided clean<sup>137</sup> with that one word.

Howbeit, indeed one of their own wives yet told her own husband at home, when she heard him boast it, how jollily it was preached: “Better poisoned bread than no bread.” “By our Lakin,<sup>138</sup> Brother Husband,” quoth she, “but as properly as 5 that was preached, yet would I rather abide the peril of breeding worms in my belly by eating of flesh without bread than to eat with my meat the bread that I wist well were poisoned.”

And of truth, good reader, this word of his was 10 one of the most proud and presumptuous, and therewith the most unwise too, that ever I heard pass the mouth of any man reputed and taken for wise.

For when the thing had been examined, considered, and condemned by such as the judgment and 15 the ordering of the thing did appertain unto, that false poisoned translation was forbidden the people; it was a heinous presumption of one man, upon the trust of his own wit, to give the people courage and boldness to resist their prince and disobey 20 their prelates, and give them no better staff to stand by than such a bald poisoned reason: that poisoned bread is better than no bread.

For first, I pray you, how proveth he that poisoned bread were better than no bread? I would 25 ween<sup>139</sup> it were as good to forbear meat and starve for hunger as to eat ratsbane<sup>140</sup> and die by poison but if<sup>141</sup> the preacher prove me that it were better for a man to kill himself than die.

But now falleth he in double folly; for first, his 30 proper wise word can have no wit therein but if he prove that the people must needs perish for lack of spiritual food except<sup>142</sup> the Scripture be translated into their own tongue.

Now, if he say and affirm that, then every fool 35 almost may feel the man’s folly.

For the people may have every necessary truth of Scripture, and everything necessary for them to know concerning the salvation of their souls, truly taught and preached unto them though the 40 corps and body of the Scripture be not translated unto them in their mother tongue. For else had it been wrong with English people from the faith first brought into this realm unto our own days, in all which time before, I am sure that every English man 45 and woman that could read it had not a book by them of the Scripture in English. And yet is there, I doubt not, of those folk many a good saved soul.

And secondly also, if the having of the Scripture in English be a thing so requisite of precise necessity that the people’s souls should needs perish but if<sup>143</sup>
50 they have it translated into their own tongue, then must there the most part perish for all that, except the preacher make farther provision besides that all the people shall be able to read it when they have it; of which people, far more than four parts of all the
55 whole divided into ten, could never read English yet, and many now too old to begin to go to school, and shall, with God’s grace, though they never read word of Scripture, come as well to heaven, and as soon too as himself peradventure that preached that wise word. Many have thought it a thing very 60 good and profitable that the Scripture well and truly translated should be in the English tongue. And albeit that many right wise and well-learned both, and very virtuous folk also, both have been 65 and yet be in a far other mind, yet for mine own part, I both have been and yet am also of the same opinion still, as I have in my Dialogue declared, if the men were amended and the time meet<sup>144</sup> therefor. But that it were a thing of such precise neces-
70 sity that the people’s souls must needs perish but if that be had, and that therefore we should suffer<sup>145</sup> rather such a poisoned translation than none, and willfully kill ourselves with poison rather than we would take wholesome meat in at our mouth but 75 if we may first have it in our own hands: this heard I never any wise man say, no, nor fool neither till Tyndale came forth with his new-translated Scripture, translating the truth of Christ into false Luther’s heresies.

And yet when the brethren have heard such a wise word in a sermon, that word use they to<sup>146</sup> take solemnly for a sure authority, and say that all the long reasons of Sir Thomas More is here answered 85 shortly with one word.

But now have I, with more words than one, made you plain and open the folly of that wise word.

And whensoever he that preached it can hereafter again, with many more words than I have here written, prove his word wisely spoken, let him keep one 90 copy thereof with himself for losing,<sup>147</sup> and send another to me; and then that copy that I receive, I will be bounden to eat it though the book be bounden in boards.

THE FIFTH CHAPTER

Another example of such kind of answering have I seen made unto the first chapter of my third book of Tyndale's Confutation, of which answer the brethren boast greatly and say that I am answered even<sup>148</sup> to the point.

For this word was said unto a friend of mine in great boast by a special sure secret brother of this new-broached<sup>149</sup> brotherhood; whereupon, when I had heard it, I longed sore<sup>150</sup> to see that answer. For in good faith, I had myself thought that I had so fully answered that chapter of Tyndale's, which is "Whether the Church Were before the Word or the Word before the Church," that he should never without his shame be able to reply while he lived. And therefore, longing sore to see how I was answered now therein, I required<sup>151</sup> my friend to find the means, if he might, that I might see the book, weening that some new work of Tyndale's had been of late come over. But afterward he brought me word that it was answered, not beyond the sea, but here within the realm—not by any book specially made against it, but in a sermon once or twice openly preached. Howbeit,<sup>152</sup> not of a sudden brayed,<sup>153</sup> but forestudied and penned; whereof the book, as a spirit in close,<sup>154</sup> goeth about secretly velut negotium perambulans in tenebris<sup>155</sup> among this blessed brotherhood; but I trust to turn it into daemonium meridianum,<sup>156</sup> that every man may see him somewhat more plainly appear, and show himself in his own likeness.

Now is it so, indeed, that in that chapter of Tyndale's there be certain lines left out in mine answer. Howbeit, they were of truth left out by oversight in the printing, which may well appear by this: For in mine answer I so touch those words that the leaving out of them maketh mine own more dark and less perceived. And therefore are they content to find no fault at the leaving out of them, but make as though all were in, and also because that<sup>157</sup> mine answer is, as they boast, by that sermon so well and substantially confuted.

But now, because I would be loath to be judged by the only<sup>158</sup> brethren and sisters of the false fraternity—and to the intent they shall all well see that I fear not the judgment of indifferent<sup>159</sup> folk—I shall put abroad, that all folk may see, those words of that solemn sermon by which they boast that mine answer unto that chapter of Tyndale's chapter is so goodly confuted.

The very formal<sup>160</sup> words, lo, good readers, of that sermon, for as far as pertain to this matter, after<sup>161</sup> the copy that was delivered me (which copy I reserve and keep for my declaration),<sup>162</sup> therein be these words that hereafter follow:

Now it followeth in the epistle, Voluntarie enim genuit nos verbo veritatis.<sup>163</sup>

This text may be expounded after this manner: "He made us by the truth of his word"; he made us first (ye know) of nothing; and he made us as the chief and principal of all his creatures. For he gave unto us wit<sup>164</sup> and reason, the which he gave unto no creature living in the earth but only to us. But to come more near the matter, we may say that God willingly begot us by the word of his truth, and hath put us here into this world, and here to be as the lord and ruler of all his creatures, the which he made for our comfort and succor.<sup>165</sup> But yet we may go more near you, and say how that he hath begotten us by the word of his truth. Mark, I pray you here, how that Saint James saith that God "hath begotten us through his word of truth." Here it appeareth that we be not true of ourselves, for we are made true by God through his word. And whereas of ourselves we were none other but liars, God of his infinite goodness hath made us by his word the children of truth and of salvation, whereas before we were but liars, and such as worketh none other thing but even the very displeasure of God.

Now God of his merciful goodness by his holy word of truth hath made us his children—that is to say, the children of his truth—"even as it pleased him," saith Saint James, "He hath begotten us by the word of his truth." Mark how that he saith "even as it pleased him" he begot us. If we were begotten and made as it pleased him, then was it not done as it pleased us. And again, and if

150 greatly 151 asked 152 However 153 cried out (as by an ass, but also a pun on braid, "an extemporaneous attack")

we were begotten by him, then could not we give him none occasion to love us, for why<sup>166</sup> we came of him, and not we of us. Here may you perceive also that this text maketh against them that will say the Church was before the Gospel.

It is plain enough that the Church was not before the Word; for Saint James saith that God begot us through the Word of his truth. If we were begotten by the Word, then needs must the Word be before we were gotten—or else how should we be begotten by the Word?—and “by the Word,” he saith, we were begotten. If God begot us through the Word, we must needs grant that he that begot us was before that we were begotten; and he that begot us begot us by the Word; then needs must the Word be before that we were begotten. Now then, if this Word were before we were begotten, how can we say that the Church was before this Word? If we mean by “the Church” the church of lime and stone, then it is plain enough that the Word was before any such church was made. For we find that it was many a day after man was made ere<sup>167</sup> ever there were any such churches made.

If ye mean by “the Church” the Universal Church of God, the which is the congregation of all Christian people, if you mean this Church, and say how this Church was before the Word, then Saint James maketh you an answer to that, saying how that by the Word this Church was begotten. Then needs must we grant that the Word of God was before any Church was.

Yea, but some will not be content with this answer, but they will say that the Church was before that this Word was written of any man, and it was admitted and allowed by the Church, and so was the Church before his Word. Yea, but yet I will say to you again<sup>168</sup> how that this Word was written before the Church was; yea, and it was not written by men, but it was written by God our Savior afore the beginning of the world, as witness Saint Paul, where he saith to the Hebrews, Dabo leges meas,<sup>169</sup> etc. “I will give my laws, saith God, into their hearts, and in their minds shall I write it.” Behold how God gave it them at the beginning in their hearts, and writ it in their minds,

Thus may ye see that at the beginning God wrote his laws in their hearts, and therefore must we needs grant that the Word of God was taught to them long ere ever the Congregation taught it. For you see that by the Word we were begotten; therefore the Word must needs be before we were begotten; or else how could the Word beget us?

Some peradventure<sup>170</sup> will say that the Church was before this Word was written in books of paper and parchment and such other things, and that the Church did admit them to be read of them which<sup>171</sup> they thought necessary to look on them. They will say that the Church was before this was done. Yea, but what thing is this to the purpose, or what shall we need to stand arguing of this matter?

It is plain enough to all men that hath eyes to see and ears to hear how the Word of God was before any Church was, and how the Word of God was written afore it was written in any books or tables; and therefore what shall we need to dispute this matter? But good Lord, if it had not been written by the evangelists in those days, how should we do in these days, the which bring forth the Scripture for them indeed?—and yet they will bear them in hand<sup>172</sup> that it is no Scripture and if<sup>173</sup> it had not been written in books then. Notwithstanding, ye may perceive how the Word was ere ever the Church was, and the Word begot us, and not we the Word; and also it was written ere ever the Church allowed it to be written.

Now, good readers, to the intent ye may the better perceive for what purpose the brotherhood boasteth these words, ye shall understand that whereas Luther first, and Tyndale after him, tell us for a foundation of all their abominable heresies that there is nothing that ought to be taken for a sure<sup>174</sup> and undoubted truth of the Christian belief but if<sup>175</sup> it may be proved by plain and evident Scripture, the King’s Highness, in his most famous book of Assertion of the Sacraments, laid<sup>176</sup> against Luther—and I, out of the same book of my said sovereign lord, took and laid against Tyndale and all

166 the reason that 167 before 168 in reply 169 Dabo . . . meas: “I will give my laws” (Heb 10:16). 170 perhaps

171 whom 172 bear them in hand: lead them to believe 173 and if: if

174 secure; certain 175 but if: unless 176 argued

such — that the Word of God is part written in the Scripture, and part unwritten that appeareth not proved therein, as, for example, the perpetual virginity of our Lady and other diverse points which were only taught by Christ to his apostles, and by them forth to the Church, and so, by tradition of the Church, beside the Scripture and without writing, taught and delivered unto Christian people from age to age, and so the faith and belief of those things kept and continued from the apostles' days unto our own time, and that if the Church were nothing bounden to believe but only the things plainly written in Scripture, then had all folk before Moses's days been left at liberty to leave all God's words unbelieved. And then had Christ's Church in the beginning been at liberty to leave a great part of Christ's own words unbelieved. For the Church was gathered, and the faith believed, before any part of the New Testament was put in writing. And which writing was or is the true Scripture, neither Luther nor Tyndale knoweth but by the credence that they give to the Church.

And therefore, since the Word of God is as strong unwritten as written, and which is his Word written Tyndale cannot tell but by the Church, which hath, by the assistance of the Spirit of God therein, the gift of discretion to know it, and since that that gift is given (as Saint Augustine saith and Luther himself confesseth) to this common-known Catholic Church, why should not Luther and Tyndale as well believe the Church in that it telleth them this thing did Christ and his apostles say as they must believe the Church (or else believe nothing) in that it telleth them this thing did Christ's evangelists and apostles write?

Now, good readers, Tyndale, seeing how sore<sup>177</sup> this reason of the King's Highness doth touch and turn up the very foundation and great part of his heresies, he doth in his book against me, of which book he maketh the title Which Is the Church, and Whether It May Err or Not, put this chapter: "Whether the Church were before the Gospel, or the Gospel before the Church." Which chapter, to the end ye may the more clearly perceive the matter, I shall rehearse<sup>178</sup> you whole, and after that, some part of mine answer thereto. And then if ye read again the words of this sermon that I have here inserted before, every child almost shall be well able to judge whether this preacher have in his sermon avoided<sup>179</sup> well mine answer or no. These are Tyndale's words:

Another doubt there is: whether the Church, or Congregation, be before the Gospel, or the Gospel before the Church. Which question is as hard to solve as whether the father be elder than the son or the son elder than his father. For the whole Scripture and all believing hearts testify that we are begotten through the Word. Wherefore,<sup>180</sup> if the Word beget the Congregation, and he that begetteth is before him that is begotten, then is the Gospel before the Church. Paul also, Romans 9,<sup>181</sup> saith, "How shall they call on whom they believe not? And how shall they believe without a preacher?"

That is, Christ must first be preached ere men can believe in him. And then it followeth that the word of the preacher must be before the faith of the believer.

And therefore, inasmuch as the Word is before the faith, and faith maketh the Congregation, therefore is the Word or Gospel before the Congregation.

And again, as the air is dark of itself, and receiveth all her light of the sun, even so are all men's hearts of themselves dark with lies and receive all their truth of God's Word, in that they consent thereto.

And moreover, as the dark air giveth the sun no light, but contrariwise, the light of the sun in respect of<sup>182</sup> the air is of itself and lighteneth the air and purgeth it from darkness, even so the lying heart of man can give the Word of God no truth; but contrariwise, the truth of God's Word is of herself and lighteneth the hearts of the believers, and maketh them true, and cleanseth them from lies, as thou readest, John 1[:3], "Ye be clean by reason of the Word." Which is to be understood in that the Word had purged their hearts from lies, from false opinions, and from thinking evil good, and therefore from consenting to sin. And, John 17[:17], "Sanctify them, O Father, through thy truth. And thy Word is truth." And thus thou seest that God's truth dependeth not of man. It is not true because man so saith or admitteth it for true. But man is true because he believeth it, testifieth, and giveth witness in his heart that it is true. And Christ also saith himself, John 5[:34], “I receive no witness of man.” For if the multitude of man’s witness might make aught<sup>183</sup> true, then were the doctrine of Muhammad truer than Christ’s.

Lo, good readers, here have ye heard Tyndale’s chapter, the matter whereof the brethren boast that the words of that sermon do so well and substantially maintain against mine answer made unto this chapter.

But now, to the intent ye may yourself judge whether that sermon may bear out their boast or not, I shall rehearse you some part of mine answer. Lo, thus beginneth mine answer unto Tyndale’s chapter:

Lo, he that readeth this and heareth not the answer — except himself be well-ripened<sup>184</sup> in the matter — may ween<sup>185</sup> that Tyndale in these words had quit<sup>186</sup> himself like a man, and borne me over quite:<sup>187</sup> he solveth the objection so plainly, and playeth therewith so pleasantly. But now, when ye shall understand that never man was so mad to make this objection to Tyndale but himself, then shall ye laugh to see that he wrestleth all alone and giveth himself a fall, and in his merry solution mocketh also no man but himself.

I said in my Dialogue that the Church was before the Gospel was written, and that the faith was taught, and men were baptized, and Masses said and the other sacraments ministered among Christian people before any part of the New Testament was put in writing, and that this was done by the Word of God unwritten. And I said also there — and yet say here again — that the right faith which Adam had, and such as in the same faith succeeded him long ere writing began, was taught by the Word of God unwritten, and so went from man to man, from the father to the son, by mouth. And I said that this Word of God unwritten is of as great authority as is the Word of God written.

I showed also that the Church of Christ hath been, is, and ever shall be taught and instructed by God and his Holy Spirit with his holy word of either kind — that is to wit,<sup>188</sup> both with his Word written and his Word unwritten — and that they which will not believe God’s Word but if<sup>189</sup> he put it in writing be as plain infidels as they that will not believe it written, since God’s Word taketh his<sup>190</sup> authority of God that speaketh it, and not of man that writeth it.

And there is like surety and like certain knowledge of the Word of God unwritten as there is of the Word of God written, since ye know neither the one nor the other to be the Word of God but by the tradition of the Church.

Which Church — as all Christian men believe, and the Scripture showeth, and Saint Augustine declareth, and Luther himself confesseth, and the devil himself saith not nay — the blessed Spirit of God hath inwardly taught, teacheth, and ever shall teach to know, judge, and discern the Word of God from the word of man, and shall keep the Church from error, “leading it into every truth,”<sup>191</sup> as Christ saith himself in the sixteenth chapter of Saint John’s Gospel. Which he did not if he suffered<sup>192</sup> the Church to be damnably deceived in taking the word of man for the Word of God; whereby it should, instead of service to be done to God, fall in unfaithfulness and with idolatry do service to the devil.

And therefore I showed in my said Dialogue<sup>193</sup> — and yet the King’s Highness much more plainly showed in his most erudite famous book against Luther, out of which I took it — that the Word of God unwritten is of as great authority, as certain, and as sure as is his Word written in the Scripture. Which point is so fast and sure pitched upon the Rock — Our Savior Christ himself — that neither Luther, Tyndale, nor Hussgen,<sup>194</sup> nor all the hellhounds that the devil hath in his kennel never hitherto could, nor while God liveth in heaven and the devil lieth in hell never hereafter shall (bark they, bawl they, never so fast) be able to wrest it out.

And that they be all, as I tell you, so feeble in this point whereupon the effect of all their whole heresies hangeth (for but if<sup>195</sup> they vanquish this one point, all their heresies fully be burned up and fall as flat to ashen as it were alms<sup>196</sup> all obstinate heretics did), ye may see a clear proof

by these words of Tyndale which he hath set so gloriously forth in the forefront of his battle, as though they were able to win the whole field. For whereas I said that the Gospel and the Word of God unwritten was before the Church, and by it was the Church begun, gathered, and taught, and that the Church was before that the Gospel that now is written was written — that is to wit, before any part of the Gospel was written; for as for all the whole Gospel (that is to wit, all the words of God that he would have known, believed, and kept) was yet never written — this being the thing that I said, Tyndale, with all the help he hath had of all the heretics in Almain<sup>197</sup> this two or three years together, is yet in such despair to be able to match therewith that he is, with shame enough, fain<sup>198</sup> to forget that I said the Church was before the Gospel written. Which thing himself cannot deny, and is fain to frame the doubt and make the objection as though I had said that the Church had been before the Gospel and the Word of God unwritten; whereof himself knoweth well that I said clean the contrary. And therefore, good readers, having this thing in your remembrance, take now the pain to read Tyndale’s words again, and ye shall have a pleasure to see how fondly<sup>199</sup> he juggleth afore you. For now, his craft opened and declared unto you, ye shall perceive that he playeth nothing clean, but fareth<sup>200</sup> like a juggler that conveyeth his galls<sup>201</sup> so craftily that all the table spieth them.

Lo, good readers, here have I now rehearsed you but a piece of mine answer unto that chapter of Tyndale; and yet by this one piece alone may ye clearly perceive that all those words of that sermon go so far wide from the point that they not only do nothing help Tyndale (for all the labor that they take about it), but also the preacher of them taketh a fouler fall than Tyndale, in that the preacher stumbleth at the same stock,<sup>202</sup> and falleth into the same puddle, that Tyndale did — and that after that he was warned by mine answer made to Tyndale afore.

For this here ye see: that this preacher in the first part of his words toucheth not the matter; but little and little he descendeth thereto by the expounding of these words of Saint James: Voluntarie enim

genuit nos verbo veritatis — that is in English, “He hath willingly begotten us by the Word of truth.”<sup>203</sup>

Howbeit,<sup>204</sup> the preacher Englisheth it thus: “He made us,” or “begot us,” “by the truth of his Word.” Which words, after that he hath expounded after diverse manners, he cometh at last to that exposition by which he expoundeth those words in this wise:<sup>205</sup> that “God hath willingly by his Word made us the children of truth and of salvation.” And after a thing or two noted and marked therein (which I shall haply<sup>206</sup> make you to mark well and see somewhat more therein hereafter than the preacher showeth you there), he cometh to the point with which we be now in hand;<sup>207</sup> and therein thus he beginneth:

Here may you perceive also that this text maketh against them that will say the Church was before the Gospel.

But now do you, good readers, clearly perceive and see that this preacher saith wrong. For while they against whom he preacheth — that is to wit, they that say the Church was before the Gospel written — do both mean and plainly write that the Church was not before that the Gospel was in God’s mind, nor before it was preached and taught by mouth, but only before it was written in books, and that the cause why they so say and write and put men in mind of that point is because that the heretics would make men ween<sup>208</sup> that God’s Word were of none authority nor worthy to be believed but if<sup>209</sup> it were written in the books, now I say that since ye know, good readers, that they against whom this preacher thus preacheth do mean and say and write as ye now see they do, ye cannot but clearly perceive and see that this preacher doth in this point but labor to blind his audience, and meeteth nothing with the matter.

For now, this thing had in mind and considered, all his reason after, which he taketh out of Tyndale’s chapter, waxeth even<sup>210</sup> dead for cold.

For what heat or what one spark of life, after this thing considered, have all his words that follow, wherein he saith:

It is plain enough that the Church was not before the Word; for Saint James saith that God begot

197 Germany 198 forced 199 foolishly 203 Jas 1:18 204 However 205 way, 200 acts 201 little balls 202 tree stump 206 perhaps 207 in hand:

dealing 208 think 209 but if: unless 210 waxen even: becomes completely us through the Word of his truth. If we were begotten by the Word, then needs must the Word be before we were gotten — or else how should we be begotten by the Word? — and by the Word, he 5 saith, we were begotten. If God begot us through the Word, we must needs grant that he that begot us was before that we were begotten; and he that begot us begot us by the Word; then needs must the Word be before that we were begotten.

10 Now then, if this Word were before we were begotten, how can we say that the Church was before this Word?

If we mean by “the Church” the church of lime and stone, then it is plain enough that the Word 15 was before any such church was made. For we find that it was many a day after man was made ere ever there were any such churches made. If ye mean by “the Church” the Universal Church of God — the which is the congregation of all 20 Christian people — if you mean this Church, and say how this Church was before the Word, then Saint James maketh you an answer to that, saying how that by the Word this Church was begotten.
Then needs must we grant that the Word of God 25 was before any Church was.

All this childish reason, ye wot<sup>211</sup> well, which Tyndale hath begotten him, and which he bringeth out of Tyndale’s chapter and fathereth it upon Saint James, be it never so quick<sup>212</sup> in another mat-30 ter, is yet in this, as touching them against whom he preacheth it, clean quailed in the travail<sup>213</sup> and utterly born dead while<sup>214</sup> they against whom he preacheth say not precisely that the Church was before the Gospel, nor before God’s Word, but only 35 say that the Church was before the Gospel and God’s Word was put in writing.

And that his reason is dead, as I say it is, himself that preached it perceiveth; and therefore he goeth farther and draweth nearer to the matter, and saith:

40 Yea, but some will not be content with this answer, but they will say that the Church was before that this Word was written of any man, and it was admitted and allowed by the Church, and so was the Church before his Word. Yea, but yet I will say to you again how that this Word was written 45 before the Church was; yea, and it was not written by men, but it was written by God our Savior afore the beginning of the world, as witness Saint Paul, where he saith to the Hebrews, Dabo leges meas,<sup>215</sup> etc. “I will give my laws, saith God, into 50 their hearts, and in their minds shall I write it.” Behold how God gave it them at the beginning in their hearts, and writ it in their minds, and they exercise his law written in their hearts indeed and in effect. 55

Thus may ye see that at the beginning God wrote his laws in their hearts, and therefore must we needs grant that the Word of God was taught to them long ere ever the Congregation taught it.
For you see that by the Word we were begotten; 60 therefore the Word must needs be before we were begotten; or else how could the Word beget us?

By these words, good readers, ye see that himself perceiveth that all his other words were not worth a rush,<sup>216</sup> because they came not near the purpose,<sup>217</sup> 65 nor anything toucheth<sup>218</sup> them against whom he preacheth them. And therefore, seeing that Tyndale is by mine answer therein proved a fool, he goeth, as ye see, farther than Tyndale went. But therein, the nearer he cometh to the point, the more he proveth 70 himself to go the farther from reason. For what reason hath he that, in arguing against others, saith but the same that they say?

Now all that ever he saith in these words say we,
against whom he preacheth them. 75

And we not only say the things that he saith now — that is to wit, that God’s Word was ere ever it was written, and that it was written in hearts ere ever it was written in books — but these be also the things that we specially lay<sup>219</sup> against him whose said chap- 80 ter this preacher would with these words defend.
For since the Gospel of Christ and the words of God that are now written in books were all written in hearts before they were written in books, and yet were at that time of the same strength and authority 85 that they be now, we say to Luther and Tyndale and all such other heretics that they say false in that<sup>220</sup> they preach and teach — that men are bounden to believe nothing but if it be written in books — since

211 know 212 viable 213 clean quailed end during labor 214 when 215 “I will 220 what

God is at his liberty to give his Word into his Church even yet at this day by his own mouth, through the inspiration of his Holy Spirit sent thereunto, and by himself abiding ever therein, and, at the preaching
5 of the Church, write it in the hearts of the hearers, as well and as surely as ever he gave his Word to his Church by his apostles, and wrote it in the people's hearts at their preaching, at such time as it was yet unwritten in any of the apostles' books.

10 And over<sup>221</sup> this, we tell them that the same Church — by only which Church they now know which books be those that have the Word of God in them that the apostles and evangelists have written — the same Church, I say, doth tell them that 15 the words of God which God will have us believe be not all written in those books, but some part still remain only written in hearts, as before the books written they did altogether. And we tell them that Tyndale must as well believe the Church in telling 20 him which be those words of God that yet remain unwritten as he doth and must believe it in telling him which be those books in which the words of God are written.

25 And therefore, good readers, what things in this world could this preacher have devised worse to bring forth against me for Tyndale's defense than those with which, as ye see, Tyndale is most clearly confounded?

30 But now shall ye see that this preacher perceiveth it well enough himself. And therefore, after that he hath set forth Tyndale's reason, and dissimuled<sup>222</sup> mine answer that I have made to it, and so, before his audience, wrestled a while in the dark, where, for lack of sight of the matter, they might not see 35 how he fell, he waxed<sup>223</sup> yet half weary thereof at last, and somewhat ashamed too, lest he were peradventure spied, and fain<sup>224</sup> would he therefore have shaken off the matter and rid himself out honestly; and therefore in conclusion he cometh down to 40 this:

Some peradventure will say that the Church was before this word was written in books of paper and parchment and such other things, and that the Church did admit them to be read of them 45 which they thought necessary to look on them. They will say that the Church was before this was done. Yea, but what thing is this to the purpose, or what shall we need to stand arguing of this matter?

It is plain enough to all men that hath eyes to 50 see and ears to hear how the Word of God was before any church was, and how the Word of God was written afore it was written in any books or tables, and therefore what shall we need to dispute this matter? But good Lord, if it had not 55 been written by the evangelists in those days, how should we do in these days, the which bring forth the Scripture for them indeed? And yet they will bear them in hand<sup>225</sup> that it is no Scripture and 60 if<sup>226</sup> it had not been written in books then. Notwithstanding, ye may perceive how the Word was ere<sup>227</sup> ever the Church was, and the Word begot us, and not we the Word; and also it was written ere ever the Church allowed it to be written.

65 Here have ye seen, good readers, after long wrestling with me, what shift this preacher maketh to shake the matter off. For seeing that he can in no wise defend Tyndale's reason, he would at last fain<sup>228</sup> shake off the question. And indeed the question, as Tyndale frameth it of his own fashion for his own
70 advantage, is very frivolous and foolish. And therefore this preacher goeth, as I say, somewhat farther and cometh nearer to the point in which the matter of the question lieth. But then, because he cannot defend Tyndale and avoid<sup>229</sup> mine answer, after the 75 time driven forth<sup>230</sup> in furnishing of Tyndale's reason, when he cometh to the point he leaveth mine answer untouched, and would shake off the question for nought.<sup>231</sup>

80 But that thing now, good readers, will not well be for him. For the necessity of this question you see now yourself. For since Luther and Tyndale and other such heretics do teach that no Word of God is now to be believed, nor to be taken for God's Word by the teaching of the Catholic Church, but if<sup>232</sup> it
85 be written in Scripture, they drive us of necessity to tell them again<sup>233</sup> that the Church was before the Scripture, and before that any of God's words were written therein; and that all his words that he will have believed were never written, and that he is not 90 so tongue-tied but that he is at liberty to speak yet more words when he will, and may bind us as well

hand: lead them to believe 226 and if: if 227 before 228 gladly 229 refute

to believe them as ever he bound us to believe any word that ever he spoke before, be it unwritten or written; and that in all such things Luther and Tyndale both, and Friar Barnes too, and all the heretics of them, must, as I said, of reason believe the Church as well when it telleth them “these things Christ hath by his own Spirit or by the mouth of his apostles taught us” as when it telleth them “these things hath Christ by the pen of his apostles written us.” Now is this knot so sure that it can never be loosed but if these heretics, or this preacher for them, can by plain Scripture prove us that God hath caused all such things to be written in Scripture already — and, over that, made a promise, either that he will never speak any such word more, or that if he do, he will at the leastwise take no displeasure with us though we tell him plainly that since it is not in Scripture already, he shall write it in if he will, or else will we not believe him.

THE SIXTH CHAPTER

And this preacher himself so well perceiveth that this point is true that I tell you that he would fain, if he could prove it, say that all such things are written already in Scripture. And therefore, though because he seeth that I have, in the last chapter of my first part of Tyndale’s Confutation, overthrown Tyndale therein, he forbore to affirm it forth out in plain and open words, yet he giveth his audience a proper insinuation thereof, and maketh a pretty glance thereat, in those words where he saith in the last end:

But good Lord, if it had not been written by the evangelists in those days, how should we do in these days, the which bring forth the Scripture for them indeed? And yet they will bear them in hand that it is no Scripture and if it had not been written in books then. Notwithstanding, ye may perceive how the Word was ere ever the Church was, and the Word begot us, and not we the Word; and also it was written ere ever the Church allowed it to be written.

By these words would he, lo — though he say it not plain out — that folk should ween<sup>235</sup> that, of anything which we be bounden to believe, the evangelists and apostles left in their days nought<sup>236</sup> unwritten. Which point, if it could be proved, would help some heresies well forth, but yet not so many as heretics would make men ween. For many things that they say be not in Scripture are yet in Scripture indeed, as is for the sacrament of confirmation, and aneling,<sup>237</sup> and holy orders, and matrimony, and the very<sup>238</sup> blessed Body and Blood of Christ in the holy Sacrament of the altar, and for good works against<sup>239</sup> faith alone, and for holy vows of chastity against the abominable bitchery<sup>240</sup> of friars that wed nuns, and many such other things. And in all such matters, the question is not of the Word written or unwritten, but upon the interpretation and the right understanding of God’s Word already written.

And therein is, in effect, the question also no more but whether that in the construction and exposition of Holy Scripture we should of reason better believe holy Saint Augustine, holy Saint Ambrose, holy Saint Jerome, holy Saint Cyprian, holy Saint Chrysostom, holy Saint Basil, holy Saint Cyril, and the three Gregorys of Greece,<sup>241</sup> holy saints all three, and holy Saint Gregory the pope,<sup>242</sup> with all the other old holy doctors and fathers of the faithful doctrine, on the one side, or else, on the other side, lewd Luther, and Lambert,<sup>243</sup> Barnes, Hussgen, and Zwingli, Schwarzerdt,<sup>244</sup> Tyndale, George Joye,<sup>245</sup> and Denck,<sup>246</sup> Bainham,<sup>247</sup> Bayfield,<sup>248</sup> Hitton,<sup>249</sup> and Tewkesbury,<sup>250</sup> with Brother Burt,<sup>251</sup> and young Father Frith.<sup>252</sup>

There would be now between these two sorts no great doubt in the choice (as methinketh) if he that should choose have wit.

And in such matters this is the great question

indeed—which thing, if any of their favorers dare deny, and will affirm that in the construction of the Scripture they have the old holy doctors on their side, let all these heretics and all that bear them favor find out among them all so much as one of all the old holy saints that so did construe the Scripture as now these new heretics do, for wedding of monks, friars, and nuns, which the whole Catholic Church, all this fifteen hundred years before these late lewd heresies began, have evermore abhorred and holden for abominable—let these new brethren, I say, now find out, among them all, any one of the old holy saints that said the breach of their vows was no sin; and then am I content they say that all the remnant be whole upon their part in all the remnant of all their poisoned heresies.

But on the other side, if they cannot among them all find out so much as one old holy man for their part in this point in which we can bring many against them, then must they needs confess that in the construction of the Scripture (forasmuch, at the leastwise, as appertaineth to this point), saving for the undoubted faith of the whole Catholic Church full fifteen hundred years together against these vow-breaking brethren (which thing alone sufficeth for their full condemnation), else standeth all the question but in this: whether of the twain<sup>253</sup> should, in the exposition of Holy Scripture, be by reason among the unlearned people better believed—the old holy, gracious<sup>254</sup> doctors and saints, or these new-wedded monks and friars, graceless<sup>255</sup> apostates and heretics.

And then, since no good Christian man can doubt whether part is the better of these twain, no good man can there doubt, ye see well, but that these new doctors—Luther, Lambert, Tyndale, Hussgen, and Zwingli, with all their adherents—be plain abominable heretics in this one point at the least. Which point, while<sup>256</sup> it is so shameful and full of filthy beastliness, I dare be bold to say that neither hath that man nor that woman any respect or regard of any cleanness or honesty that can with favor vouchsafe<sup>257</sup> to read their books or hear them till they first forswear and abjure the defense and maintenance of that incestuous<sup>258</sup> sacrilege and very beastly bitchery.<sup>259</sup>

THE SEVENTH CHAPTER

But now to return to the point which this preacher would covertly color<sup>260</sup> in his said words, and would make it seem that the apostles and evangelists had written all things that God bindeth us to believe, where he saith:

But good Lord, if it had not been written by the evangelists in those days, how should we do in these days, the which bring forth the Scripture for them indeed? And yet they will bear them in hand<sup>261</sup> that it is no Scripture and if it had not been written in books then.

These words seem to be miswritten, either in the principal book or in the copy. For I think it would be, “if it had not been written by the evangelists in those days, how should we do in these days, in which we bring forth the Scripture for us indeed? And yet they bear us in hand that it is no Scripture.” Howbeit,<sup>262</sup> howsoever his words were indeed, he meaneth by them, as ye see, to show that there was a necessity wherefore God caused all necessary things to be put in writing. But unto that point, as I have already made answer unto Tyndale in the Confutation, all the things that the Church teacheth for necessary, and saith they were God’s words—all those, I mean, which these heretics say be not specified in Scripture and that therefore they be not God’s words nor any necessary truths, but false inventions of Satan (as Tyndale saith) and damnable dreams of men (as Barnes saith)—this preacher yet cannot deny but kept have such things been in remembrance and observed this thousand years, yea, twelve or thirteen hundred, among Christian people, yea, and as long as the Gospels of Christ hath been written, and haply<sup>263</sup> somewhat before too, as may be gathered of old ancient writings.

Howbeit, though<sup>264</sup> it were somewhat less shall little force<sup>265</sup> for the matter. For if they may abide by any means in remembrance a thousand years, by the selfsame means may they abide in remembrance another thousand too. Then since these folks say that these things, being so long preserved and kept in remembrance, be out of the Scripture, now would I

wit<sup>266</sup> of this preacher whether they have been so long kept and preserved by God, or by man, or by the devil. If he say by God, then be they of likelihood good things, and not falsehoods but truths.

5 And if he say that they be false, and that yet God hath kept them, then followeth it at the least that he could have kept them as well all this long while though they had been true, and that without<sup>267</sup> the Scripture, as he hath kept them hitherto.

10 And thereof followeth it also that he had no necessity to cause every necessary truth that he would have kept in remembrance to be put in the Scripture, as this preacher would have it seem.

15 But now if this preacher will say on the other side that these things have not been preserved by God among Christian people, but be false things, and have all this long while been kept either by man or devil, yet since God is as strong and as mighty as man and devil both, it followeth, ye see well, that 20 the thing which they have done in keeping of false things God could as well do in the keeping of true things, and needed to<sup>268</sup> the keeping no more Scripture than they.

25 And thus, good readers, every way ye see that this reason of this preacher which Tyndale laid against me before him—that God did cause all necessary things to be written in Scripture, because that else they could not have continued in remembrance—this reason, I say, ye see cannot hold. For those 30 things have continued as long in remembrance, which things themselves say be not in the Scripture.

For where this preacher protesteth the necessity of the putting of all things in Scripture with a figure of apostrophe, and turning his tale to God, crying out,

O good Lord, if it had not been written by the evangelists in those days, how should we do in these days, the which bring forth the Scripture for them indeed? And yet they will bear them in 40 hand that it is no Scripture.

These words, lo, prove plainly for my part: that there is as great surety<sup>269</sup> in the Word of God unwritten and taught unto the Church by the Spirit without the Scripture as in his word written in 45 the Scripture. For whoso believe the Church will grant both, and whoso believe not the Church will deny both, as this preacher here saith himself. For he knoweth not which is the Scripture but by the Church. And therefore where he saith that men 50 nowadays, if we lay them forth the Scripture indeed, “they will bear them in hand that it is no Scripture,” verily,<sup>270</sup> if it hap (as it happeth often) that the preachers of these new sects do lay forth for them<sup>271</sup> very Scripture indeed, which Scripture maketh not for them indeed, but some false 55 glosses<sup>272</sup> that they give the Scripture indeed, there will the true Catholic preachers say that they abuse the Scripture indeed. But they will never say that the Scripture which they brought forth is no Scripture indeed. For that way doth none use but these 60 heretics only; nor they cannot all say that there is any leaf or line that ever themselves have taken for Scripture hitherto but the Catholic Church, of whom they learned it, doth affirm the same. But on the other side, there are some parts of Scripture 65 which the whole Catholic Church affirmeth for Scripture, which parts yet these heretics affirm for none. As, for example, the selfsame epistle of Saint James which this preacher made that sermon upon; which epistle Friar Luther and Friar Barnes both 70 let<sup>273</sup> not boldly to deny for Scripture, because in many places it destroyeth their heresies. And yet is there never a heretic of them, for all that, but where it may serve to seem to prove his purpose, there will he bring it forth for Saint James’ own, and find no 75 fault therewith.

And thus, good Christian readers, here have I somewhat showed you how little cause the brethren have to boast that piece of that sermon, and say that it hath well defended Tyndale’s said chapter and clearly confounded me in that part of my Confutation. And this have I showed you somewhat the 80 more at length because it toucheth a point that is, either for the maintaining or confounding of many great heresies, a very special key. 85

THE EIGHTH CHAPTER

For as for the preacher’s other pieces in the beginning of those words, I have let pass untouched, where he saith, 266 know 267 outside, apart from 268 for 269 security; certainty

270 truly 271 lay forth for them: cite as being on their side 272 interpretations

“He hath begotten us by the word of his truth, even as it pleased him.” Mark that Saint James saith “even as it pleased him.” If we were begotten and made even as it pleased him, then was it not done as it pleased us. And again, and if we were begotten by him, then could not we give him none occasion to love us. For why we came of him, and not we of us.

These words, good readers, have no great harm in them at the first face.<sup>274</sup> But they allude unto certain words of Tyndale with which he argueth against me because I say in my Dialogue that man may, with his free will, by good endeavor of himself, be a worker with God toward the attaining of faith. Against which saying of mine, Tyndale (as I have showed in my second part of Tyndale’s Confutation), in mockage of man’s endeavor toward the belief, and in scorning that man should captive his understanding and subdue his reason into the service of faith, answereth me with a hideous exclamation, and crying out upon my fleshliness and folly, foameth out his high spiritual sentence<sup>275</sup> after this fashion:

O how beetle-blind<sup>276</sup> is fleshly reason! The will hath none operation at all in the working of faith in my soul, no more than the child hath in the begetting of his own father. For, saith Paul, it is the gift of God, and not of us. My wit must show me a true cause or an apparent cause why, ere my will have any working at all.

To this piece of Tyndale’s tale, it seemeth that this preacher doth allude. And he covertly layeth,<sup>277</sup> as ye see, the reason that Tyndale layeth for it: of the begetter and him that is begotten. But he layeth not the authority of Saint Paul, as Tyndale doth; but he layeth the words of Saint James which he hath here in hand — “God hath willingly begotten us with the word of his truth” — and sticketh for this purpose upon this word “willingly,” and argueth thus: “God begot us ‘willingly,’ saith here Saint James — that is to wit,<sup>278</sup> after his own will, and as it pleased him — ergo he did not beget us after our own will, nor as it pleased us.”

“willingly,” for that is the word of Saint James. Which word the preacher strengtheneth here with “after his own will, and as it pleased himself.” And yet neither that word “willingly” of itself nor strengthened with all these others can make but a bare form of arguing if it were in another matter. For if I desired a man to give me a thing, and labored much to him therefor, and much endeavored myself in many things to please him, to the intent that he should give it me, and that he thereupon so did, this were then but a poor argument, to say thus: “This man willingly gave me this thing, and after his own will, and as it pleased him; ergo, he gave it me not after mine own will and as it pleased me.” For as ye see, it both pleased him to give it me and also it pleased me that he so should, or else I would never have desired it, nor never have labored therefor.

And thus ye see that the authority of Saint James nothing helpeth this preacher in his purpose against all occasion and all endeavor of man toward the getting of faith, by which we be begotten.

But Tyndale layeth that text of Saint James against the sacrament of baptism, to prove that “the word of the promise” doth all the work in the regendering<sup>280</sup> of the soul by faith, and that the water, toward the infusion of grace or washing of the soul, is none instrument of God, nor nothing else but a bare graceless token, because Saint James saith that God hath cleansed us “by the word of truth,” which Tyndale there expoundeth “by the word of his promise,” as though never a word of God were true but only his promise. Now of truth, the Word of God that a preacher preacheth, by which the points of the faith be learned, be signs and tokens that signify the things in the mind which are by those words brought unto the hearer’s ear and from the ear to the heart, as the water signifieth and betokeneth the inward washing of the soul in that sacrament. And as God useth the one token of the Word to the washing and cleansing of the soul through the means of obedience of the will, in captiving of his reason and understanding into the service of faith, by credence and assent given unto the word of faith — in which, whatsoever Tyndale say, and this preacher too, man having age and use of reason may be a willing worker with God; or else whereto should any man advise and bid another come unto the true faith?—so may God use the other token, of the water, as an instrument also to the same purpose, by the like means of obedience on the man’s part, in submitting himself to that ablution for the fulfilling of God’s commandment and ordinance.

Howbeit,<sup>281</sup> what I further answer Tyndale to these words of Saint James, whoso list<sup>282</sup> to see, let him read in my first part of Tyndale’s Confutation, in the answer unto Tyndale’s preface, the number 53, and then set this to it; and he shall see that neither Tyndale there, nor this preacher here, hath by their manner of expounding these words of Saint James won themselves much worship. Howbeit, of truth the thing that goeth nearer to their purpose against all the work of free will, and all endeavor of man toward the attaining of faith, is the authority of Saint Paul that Tyndale bringeth forth; which yet proveth it not. And the reason that he layeth by example of the father and the son— which reason this preacher, though somewhat faintly, since he seeth it will not serve, yet somewhat repeateth here by these words, where he saith,

And again, if we were begotten by him, then could not we give him none occasion to love us, for why we came of him and not we of us

—by these words he meaneth the thing that Tyndale allegeth where he saith,

The will hath none operation at all in the working of faith in my soul, no more than the child hath in the begetting of his father.

And of truth, Tyndale and this preacher said somewhat, if in the spiritual generation the man that is regendered were evermore as far from all work of will at such time as God goeth about to beget him by faith as is the child at such time as his grandfather goeth about by nature to beget his father.

But now on the other side, if in the generation at the begetting of his father, the son be not yet so much as a child, nor hath no will at all, and at the time of the spiritual regeneration of himself, he that is regendered hap to be more than a child, and have the freedom of his own will, and hath the choice thereby put in his own hand whether he will, at God’s calling to faith—by reading, preaching, miracle, and such other occasions, with good inward motions added also thereto—follow the Spirit, and walk and work with God by captiving of his own understanding and subduing of his own reason into the assent and belief of the things that he shall be moved unto, and by calling upon the continuance of God’s gracious help thereunto, and thereby come into the service of faith, or whether he will else reject God’s good and gracious motion and resist it, and so flee from the getting of the gift of faith—if the man, I say, be at the time of his spiritual begetting in this case, as every man that hath, at the time, age and use of reason is, then is this example that Tyndale doth there put, and that this preacher doth here repeat, of the child at the carnal birth of his father, much less like the man at the spiritual birth of himself than is an apple like unto an oyster.

Howbeit, good readers, because the brethren blame my books for the length, I will make no longer argument of this matter here, for in these few words it appeareth meetly<sup>283</sup> well.

But if any man think himself with this not yet fully satisfied, then hath he need for his contentation<sup>284</sup> to see the matter handled somewhat more at length. And whoso therefore listeth<sup>285</sup> so to do, let him read in my fourth book of Tyndale’s Confutation (which is in the first book of the second part), in the chapter of “The Manner and Order of Our Election,” beginning, if he list, in the leaf that is marked with the number of 112, and then will his own reason serve him to see how far the matter goeth; which if he read out, I dare boldly promise that he shall there find such things as, against Tyndale and this preacher both, shall as for this point in all reason be sufficient to satisfy him.

But now if this preacher will peradventure<sup>286</sup> say that of his words in both these matters I have misrehearsed<sup>287</sup> him, I am ready to bring forth my copy and the man of whom I had it too. Or else I shall make him a much fairer offer: because he may peradventure say that he never wrote that sermon himself, but that some of his audience, which of devotion wrote as much as they bore away upon the hearing, did write it diminute<sup>288</sup> and mangled for lack of good remembrance, let him upon this answer of mine seen (if it happen to come into his hands) write his own words himself, not only as well as he then suddenly spoke them, but as well also as he can with long leisure make them. And when he hath done in them the best that ever he can, and take whose help he will too, if he make it so as he may therewith avoid and refel<sup>290</sup> my confuting of Tyndale in those two points that those words of his sermon touch, then dare I be bounden to forswear<sup>291</sup> this land and live in Antwerp and be Tyndale's man.

Howbeit, if in the matter of man's endeavor toward the attaining of faith by walking on with God willingly after that God hath prevented<sup>292</sup> him with his grace by calling on him and giving him occasion to come forward, if any brother think to escape and avoid my proof in the place aforeremembered,<sup>293</sup> by the distinction that Tyndale hath learned of Philip Schwarzerdt<sup>294</sup> and bringeth forth against me, of historical faith and feeling faith (which distinction diverse of the brethren and sistren have in their mouths now, and therewith suddenly cast a mist before unlearned men's eyes, and make them a-dazed, for the time, that<sup>295</sup> never heard of it before), he that would wind<sup>296</sup> away with this distinction shall nothing avoid my confuting of Tyndale in that place. For if his distinction be true, yet upon God's gracious prevention<sup>297</sup> and first calling upon, I say, and there prove, that the willing endeavor of man in following helpeth to the attaining of every manner kind of faith, and procureth the progress and increase of grace to the perfecting of that virtue in man and with man, which God first began in man by God's own prevention without man—but in them that have age and discretion,<sup>298</sup> useth not to<sup>299</sup> finish and fulfill it without man, but when man refuseth, except<sup>300</sup> he mend and turn; else<sup>301</sup> God leaveth finally his own good-begun work unfinished. And therefore saith Saint Augustine to every man that hath use of reason: "He that hath created thee without thee, doth not justify thee without thee."

And yet for further conclusion, because I hear say that the same distinction of historical faith and feeling faith glittereth now so gaily in the brethren's eyes, let them read my Confutation through. Or because they call that too long, let them read but the seventh book, which is entitled "The Defense of the Second Reason against Tyndale." Or if they think that book alone too long, let them leave a great part of the book, and begin in that leaf and that side of the leaf that is marked with the number of 340. And then if they can for heart-burning abide and endure to read it up to the end, I dare be bold to warrant that they shall find the same gay golden distinction of historical faith and feeling faith founden first by Philipp Schwarzerdt—which, like as Friar Hussgen hath named himself Oecolampadius, hath made his name now Melanchthon. This distinction, I say, so made by Melanchthon, shall they see so brought in there by Tyndale, and so set forth and furnished by the learning and labor of them both, that it cometh to such pass in conclusion that no part of all Tyndale's tale is brought to more shameful confusion.

But now the brethren will (when any good Catholic man provoketh them to read the place in my book) answer as diverse of them have done ere this to such good Catholic folk as provoked them thereto and offered to read it with them, and thereupon to try between them whether Tyndale or I had better reason on our part: the brethren have upon this offer shrunken at last therefrom, after great crakes<sup>302</sup> made of Tyndale's part, with great contempt of mine answer before, and have answered that they will not misspend their time in reading of mine answer, they see Tyndale's tale so sure.

Now of truth this had been a good answer and a reasonable if when they were fast<sup>303</sup> in the true Catholic faith they would thus have answered any such as would have advised them to read in Tyndale, and search whether the faith of all the holy saints and of all the whole corps of Christendom this fifteen hundred years together were true or false. For that were a thing whereof it were a very frenzy to doubt.

But now they that are fled from the faith of all them of whose faith there was no cause to doubt, and are fallen to the faith of a few faithless folk—false apostates, wild wedded monks and friars, and their fond<sup>304</sup> disciples—if they make themselves so sure of their devilish doctrine that they refuse to read the things that are written for the confutation of their errors, every good Catholic man that so seeth them do may with good reason tell them that they do not cleave to these foolish heretics for anything that they think them to say truth, but because they would fain<sup>305</sup> it were truth whether it be or no, and that they show their frowardness<sup>306</sup> therein very plainly while their hearts abhor and cannot abide to read any book by which their own conscience giveth them that they shall find their opinions plainly proved false, and their arch-heretics plainly proved fools. For if they hoped the contrary, they would, I warrant you, be themselves the first that would call others thereto.

And thus much for this time sufficeth for this point.

THE NINTH CHAPTER

Now come I to them that say I handle Tyndale and Frith and Barnes ungoodly and with uncomely<sup>307</sup> words, calling them by the name of heretics and fools, and so use<sup>308</sup> them in words as though the men had neither wit nor learning, whereas it cannot be denied, they say, that they be such as every man knoweth well have both.

As for wit and learning, I nowhere say that any of them have none, nor I mean no further but for the matters of their heresies. And in the treating of those, they show so little wit, or learning either, that the more they have, the more appeareth the feebleness of their part and the falsehood of their heresies, if they have any great wit or any great learning indeed, and then, for all that, in the defending of those matters with such foolish handling so shamefully confound themselves.

Howbeit, of very truth, God, upon such folk as, having wit and learning, fall willfully from faith to false heresy, showeth his wrath and indignation with a more vengeance in some part than, as some doctors<sup>309</sup> say, he doth upon the devil himself.

For, as diverse doctors hold opinion, the fiends be fallen from grace, and therefore have lost their glory, yet God hath suffered<sup>310</sup> them to keep their gifts of nature still, as wit, beauty, strength, agility, and such other like.

that the devils be no such deformed evil-favored creatures as men imagine them, but they be in mind proud, envious, and cruel. And he bade<sup>311</sup> me that if I would see a very right<sup>312</sup> image of a fiend, I should no more but even<sup>313</sup> look upon a very fair woman that hath a very shrewd fell<sup>314</sup> cursed mind. And when I showed him that I never saw none such, nor wist<sup>315</sup> not where I might any such find, he said he could find four or five, but I cannot believe him. Nor verily,<sup>316</sup> no more can I believe that the fiends be like fair shrewd women if there were any such. Nor as the world is, it were not good that young men should ween<sup>317</sup> so. For they be so full of courage that, were the fiends never so cursed, if they thought them like fair women, they would never fear to adventure<sup>318</sup> upon them once. Nor, to say the truth, no more can I believe, neither, that the damned spirits have all their natural gifts as whole and as perfect as they had before their fall.

But surely, if they have, then, as I said before, God hath on Tyndale, Barnes, and Frith, and those other heretics, more showed his vengeance, in some part, than he did upon the devil. For in good faith, God hath, as it seemeth, from these folk taken away the best part of their wits.

For likewise as they that would have builded up the Tower of Babylon<sup>319</sup> for themselves against God had such a stop thrown upon them that suddenly none understood what another said, surely so God upon these heretics of our time, that go busily about to heap up to the sky their foul filthy dung-hill of all old and new false stinking heresies, gathered up together against the true Catholic faith of Christ that himself hath ever hitherto taught his true Catholic Church — God, I say, which,<sup>320</sup> when the apostles went about to preach the true faith, sent down his own Holy Spirit of unity, concord, and truth unto them, with the gift of speech and understanding, so that they understood every man and every man understood them,<sup>321</sup> hath reared up and sent among these heretics the spirit of error and lying, of discord and of division, the damned devil of hell, which so entangleth their tongues and so distempereth their brains that they neither understand well one of them another, nor any of them well himself.

And this that I here say, whoso list<sup>322</sup> to read my books shall find it so true and so plainly proved in many places that he shall well see and say that this is the thing which in my writing grieveth this blessed brotherhood a little more than the length.

And therefore, where they find the fault that I handle these folk so foul, how could I other do? For while I declare and show their writing to be such (as I needs must, or leave the most necessary points of all the matter untouched), it were very hard for me to handle it in such wise as when I plainly prove them abominable heretics, and against God and his sacraments and saints very blasphemous fools, they should ween that I speak them fair.

But then they say that the Pacifier, which writeth of the division<sup>323</sup> between the spirituality<sup>324</sup> and the temporalty,<sup>325</sup> calleth no man by no such names, but speak he never so evil of any, he can yet use his words in fair manner, and speak to each man genteelly.

I cannot say nay but<sup>326</sup> it is very truth. Howbeit, every man hath not like wit<sup>327</sup> nor like invention in writing. For he findeth many proper<sup>328</sup> ways of uttering evil matter in good words, which I never thought upon, but am a simple plain body much like the Macedonians for whom Plutarch writeth that King Philip, their master, made a reasonable excuse. For when they were in the war, some of their enemies fled from their own king and came into King Philip's service against their own country; with whom, when the Macedonians fell sometimes at words (as it often happeth among soldiers), the Macedonians in spite would call them traitors. Whereupon they complained to King Philip, and made the matter sore and grievous that whereas they had not only left their own native country, but did also fight against it and help to destroy it, for the love and service that they bore toward him, his own people letted<sup>329</sup> not in anger and in despite<sup>330</sup> to call them false traitors. Whereupon King Philip answered them, "Good fellows, I pray you be not angry with my people, but have patience. I am sorry that their manner is no better. But iwis,<sup>331</sup> ye know them well enough: their nature is so plain, and their utterance so rude, that they cannot call a horse but a horse, they."<sup>332</sup> And in good faith, like those good folk am I. For though Tyndale and Frith in their writing call me a poet, it is but of their own courtesy, undeserved on my part. For I can neither so much poetry, nor so much rhetoric neither, as to find good names for evil things; but even as the Macedonians could not call a traitor but a traitor, so can I not call a fool but a fool, nor a heretic but a heretic. Some of the brethren said that I should at the leastwise call Friar Barnes by the name of "Doctor," because he was authorized and made a doctor of divinity by the university. But one answered for me to that, and said that name was given to serve for the time in which he was meet<sup>333</sup> to teach, and not now, when he is not meet to teach, but is by the Church for false teaching forbidden to teach. But then, unto that, one of them answered again and asked, "Why should I then call him 'Friar' still while he is now no longer a friar no more than a doctor?"

But unto this I could between them tell some reason of difference. Howbeit, rather than to make this book overlong by holding a problem upon every trifle, I shall be content, like<sup>334</sup> as instead of "Doctor" men call him heretic, so instead of "Friar" to call him the other name that every man calleth all those that be run out of religion. Lo, there have I fallen on a fair figure unware<sup>335</sup> (that is, I trow,<sup>336</sup> called periphrasis), to avoid the foul name of apostate.

But now these good brethren that find the fault with me that I speak no fairer unto these holy prophets of theirs be so equal and indifferent<sup>337</sup> that in them they find no fault at all for their abominable railing against so many other honest, honorable, good, and virtuous folk, nor for condemning for damned heretics the whole Catholic Church of all Christian people except heretics, both spiritual and temporal,<sup>338</sup> secular and religious too.

But then the good brethren excuse them and say that they write against none but only them that are naught,<sup>339</sup> and write but against their vices.

But this will evil<sup>340</sup> defend them, when Barnes writeth against the whole clergy, and Tyndale saith expressly that of them all there is never one good.

And also they write not so much against pomp and pride and gluttony as against watching<sup>341</sup> and praying, fasting and willful<sup>342</sup> poverty; and all these things in good religious people<sup>343</sup> the heretics abhor, and call it but hypocrisy.

Then rail<sup>344</sup> they not so sore<sup>345</sup> in words against the lay people, but as fair as they flatter them to make them enemies to the clergy, yet they damn them all to the devil—both themselves and their 5 fathers, and their grandfathers, and their grandfathers' great-grandfathers too. For they say that this eight hundred years all the corps of Christendom hath been led out of the right way from God, and have lived all in idolatry, and died in service of 10 the devil because they have done honor to Christ's cross, and prayed unto saints and revered their relics and honored their images, and been baptized in Latin, and taken matrimony for a sacrament, and used confession, and done penance for sins, and 15 prayed for all Christian souls, and been anealed<sup>346</sup> in their deathbed, and have taken their housel<sup>347</sup> after the rite and usage of the Church, and have set more by<sup>348</sup> the Mass than they should do, and believed that it was a sacrifice, a Host,<sup>349</sup> and an oblation, and that it should do them good, and have 20 believed that there was neither bread nor wine in the Blessed Sacrament of the altar, but instead of bread and wine, the very Body and Blood of Christ. All these things, say Tyndale and Barnes, both be 25 very false belief and great, damnable sin in the doing; and so damn they to the devil the whole Catholic Church both temporal and spiritual, and (except heretics) leave not one man for God's party this eight hundred years past, by their own limitation;
 30 and of truth, if their false heresies were true, not in the other seven hundred before that neither.

Now when that against all the whole Catholic Church (both that now is and that ever before hath been from the apostles' days hitherto, both temporal and spiritual, laymen and religious), and against 35 all that good is (saints, ceremonies, service of God, the very sacraments and all), and most against the best (that is to wit,<sup>350</sup> the precious Body and Blood of our Savior himself in the Holy Sacrament of the altar), these blasphemous heretics in their ungracious<sup>351</sup> books so villainously jest and rail, were not

If any of them use their words at their pleasure,

as evil and as villainous as they list<sup>355</sup> against myself, I am content to forbear any requiting thereof, and give them no worse words again<sup>356</sup> than if they 50 speak me fair; nor, using<sup>357</sup> themselves toward all other folk as they do, fairer words will I not give them than if they spoke me foul. For all shall be one to me; or rather, the worse, the better. For the pleasant oil of heretics cast upon my head can do my mind no pleasure; but contrariwise, the worse
 55 that such folk write of me for hatred that they bear to the Catholic Church and faith, the greater pleasure (as for mine own part) they do me. But surely their railing against all others I purpose not to bear so patiently as to forbear to let them hear some 60 part of like language as they speak. Howbeit,<sup>358</sup> utterly to match them therein I neither can though I would, nor will neither though I could, but am content (as I needs must) to give them therein the mastery, wherein to match them were more rebuke 65 than honesty.

Now, if they excuse themselves and say they speak evil but of evil things (for so call they good works of penance, and so call they the ceremonies and sacraments of Christ's Church), I answer them plainly 70 that they lie; wherein every true Christian man will testify that I say truth, for those things be good and holy which they rebuke and call naught.<sup>359</sup> And I say further, also, that by that excuse of theirs they make mine excuse too, in the thing wherewith they 75 be worst content: that is to wit, where I somewhat sharply rebuke wedding of friars and nuns; which thing is, as all the world wotteth,<sup>360</sup> beastly and abominable indeed.

And also if they will excuse themselves and say 80 that, as touching men, they rail against none but such as be lewd<sup>361</sup> and naught, to this I answer, first, that in this thing they lie. For they rail against all. And some they call naught by name whose special goodness shall have record and witness of all good 85 folk that know them. Secondly, I say further that by this excuse of theirs they must needs excuse me too, when I rebuke themselves. For they be well and openly known and convicted for heretics, which is, ye wot well, the worst crime that can be—and that, 90 for heretics of such a manner sort as is the worst kind of that crime that ever came out of Christendom.

 360 knows 361 wicked

Howbeit, I am yet content, for all this, to fall at<sup>362</sup> some reasonable composition<sup>363</sup> with them. Let us take this way between us from hence forth, if they list: Like<sup>364</sup> as I do not allow,<sup>365</sup> but abhor, incontinence in sacred professed persons that have vowed chastity, so let them confess that themselves abhor also the beastly bitcherly<sup>366</sup> marriages of monks, friars, and nuns, and of all such as have unto God promised and vowed the contrary. And then since all our matter is only of the faith, let them forbear, instead of reasoning, to fall to railing upon other men's living. For thereby fleeing from the matter of faith, they furnish out their process<sup>367</sup> with lying, while the faults of some they lewdly lay<sup>368</sup> to all.

If they will not (which were the best) revoke their false heresies, nor will not (which were the next) be heretics alone themselves, and hold their tongues and be still, but will needs be babbling and corrupt whom they can, let them yet at the leastwise be reasonable heretics and honest, and write reason and leave railing; and then let the brethren find the fault with me if I use<sup>369</sup> them not after that in words as fair and as mild as the matter may suffer<sup>370</sup> and bear.

But this way will they never take, I ween. For then they see well that their disciples will never have half the lust to look upon their books, wherein they should then find but a poor feast and an evil-dressed<sup>371</sup> dinner. For in their only railing standeth all their revel;<sup>372</sup> with only railing is all their roast meat basted, and all their pot seasoned, and all their pie meat spiced, and all their manchets,<sup>373</sup> and all their wafers, and all their hippocras<sup>374</sup> made.

THE TENTH CHAPTER

Now, passing over this point, I come to this that these good brethren say: that they list<sup>375</sup> not to read my books, for I am suspect in these matters, and partial toward the spirituality.

As for suspect, if I be now suspect, the world waxeth<sup>376</sup> all of a new kind. For men were wont to call those folk suspect that were suspect of heresy. And this is now a new kind of suspects, if men be now “suspected” of the Catholic faith. Howbeit, in that suspicion am I glad to be fallen, and purpose never to purge it.

Now as touching partiality upon my part toward the spirituality, I marvel whereof they gather it. Myself am, pardie,<sup>377</sup> a temporal man, and by twice wedding am come in the case<sup>378</sup> that I can never be priest. And as for all the lands and fees<sup>379</sup> that I have in all England, besides such lands and fees as I have of the gift of the King's most noble Grace, is not at this day, nor shall be while my mother-in-law<sup>380</sup> liveth (whose life and good health I pray God long keep and continue), worth yearly to my living the sum of full fifty pounds. And thereof have I some by my wife, and some by my father (whose soul our Lord assoil<sup>381</sup>), and some have I also purchased myself; and some fees have I of some temporal men. And then may every man well guess that I have no very great part of my living by the clergy, to make me very partial to them.

And over<sup>382</sup> that, this shall I truly say: that of all the yearly living that I have of the King's gracious gift, I have not one groat<sup>383</sup> by the means of any spiritual man, to my knowledge, but, far above my deserving, have had it only by his own singular bounty and goodness and special favor toward me.

And verily,<sup>384</sup> of any such yearly fees as I have to my living at this day of any other,<sup>385</sup> I have not had one groat granted me since I first wrote, or went about to write, my Dialogue; and that was, ye wot<sup>386</sup> well, the first work that I wrote in these matters.

But then say the brethren (as their holy father writeth, and telleth also diverse whom he talketh with) that I have taken great rewards in ready money of diverse of the clergy for making of my books.

In good faith, I will not say nay but that<sup>387</sup> some good and honorable men of them would, in reward of my good will and my labor against these heretics, have given me much more than ever I did, or could, deserve. But I dare take God and them also to record<sup>388</sup> that all they could never feoff me with<sup>389</sup> one penny thereof, but (as I plainly told them) I would rather have cast their money into the Thames than take it. both good men and honorable, yet look I for my thanks of God, that is their better, and for whose sake I take the labor, and not for theirs.

And if any of the brethren, believing their holy fathers, think, as some of them say, that I have more advantage of these matters than I make for,<sup>390</sup> and that I set not so little by money as to refuse it when it were offered, I will not much dispute with them longer upon the matter. But let them believe as they list,<sup>391</sup> yet this will I be bold to say for myself, although they should call me Pharisee for the boast and Pelagian<sup>392</sup> for my labor too: that how bad soever they reckon me, I am not yet fully so virtuous but that of mine own natural disposition, without any special peculiar<sup>393</sup> help of grace thereto, I am both overproud and over-slothful also, to be hired for money to take half the labor and business<sup>394</sup> in writing that I have taken in this gear<sup>395</sup> since I began.

And therefore, cause of partial favor to the priests' persons have I none more than hath every good Christian man and woman which<sup>396</sup> is of duty bounden to give honor and reverence unto that holy sacrament of Order with which the clergy is specially consecrated and dedicated unto God.

But whereas the brethren say that I am not indifferent<sup>397</sup> in the matter, therein do they the thing that they seldom do: that is to wit,<sup>398</sup> say the truth. For if they call the matter either the vice or virtue of the persons — which I take not for the matter — yet therein am I not indifferent indeed between a temporal man and a spiritual. For as for vice, I hold it much more damnable in a spiritual person than in a temporal man. And as for virtue, equal virtue, I hold it yet much more if it happen in the temporal man than in the spiritual, because, though the thing be equal, they be not both equally bound thereto. And therefore if they take this for the matter, in this wise<sup>399</sup> I am not indifferent.

Now if they take for the matter the thing that I take for the matter — that is to wit, the true faith and false heresies — then am I much less indifferent. For God keep me from being indifferent between those two sorts. For every good man is bounden between truth and falsehood, the Catholic Church and heretics, between God and the devil, to be partial, and plainly to declare himself to be full and whole upon the one side and clear against the other.

But else as for any partial favor that I bear to the clergy, whereby do these brethren prove it? I never said that they were all faultless, nor I never excused their faults. And if ever I did, let them rehearse of<sup>400</sup> my writing some one place at the least; let them tell where I commend pomp and pride, where I praise avarice, where lechery, or such other thing.

Those that be spiritual persons by profession, and are therewith carnal and wretched in their condition, have never been favored by me.

When I was first of the King's Council, and after, his Undertreasurer, and in that time while I was Chancellor of his Duchy of Lancaster, and when I was his Chancellor of this realm, it was meetly<sup>401</sup> well known what manner of favor I bore toward the clergy, and that as I loved and honored the good, so was not remiss nor slack in providing for the correction of those that were naughty, noyous<sup>402</sup> to good people, and slanderous to their own order. Which sort of priests and religious, running out of religion<sup>403</sup> and falling to theft and murder, had at my hand so little favor that there was no man that any meddling had with them into whose hands they were more loath to come.

And in this point found I their ordinaries<sup>404</sup> so well minded to their amendment and correction that they gave me great thanks therefor.

And I found those priests rather content to remain in the King's prisons a month than in the Bishop's a week, saving for hope of deliverance by the common course of their purgation.

And yet as far as my poor wit could give me, saying that the danger of escapes is to the ordinary so chargeable that the fear thereof maketh them fain<sup>405</sup> of their deliverance, else were they likely to be waxen<sup>406</sup> better ere they got thence,<sup>407</sup> or else to tarry there as long as ever they lived.

But I perceive well that these good brethren look that I should rebuke the clergy, and seek out their faults, and lay them to their faces, and write some work to their shame, or else they cannot call me but partial to the priests. Howbeit, by this reason they may call me partial to the laymen too. For I never used that way neither toward the one nor the other. I find not yet such plenty and store of virtue in myself as to think it a meetly<sup>408</sup> part and convenient<sup>409</sup>

5 for me to play, to rebuke as abominable vicious folk, any one honest company either spiritual or temporal, and much less meet to rebuke and reproach either the whole spirituality or temporality because of such as are very stark naught<sup>410</sup> in both.

10 I dare be bold to say that proud folk be naught, that covetous folk be naught, that lecherous folk be naught, and to speak against open-known thieves, open-known murderers, open-known perjured persons, open-known apostates, open-known professed or convicted heretics. But surely my guise<sup>411</sup>

And of all degrees, specially for my part I have ever accounted my duty to forbear all such manner of unmannerly behavior toward those two most eminent orders that God hath here ordained in 30 earth: the two great orders, I mean, of special consecrated persons—the sacred princes and priests. Against any of which two reverent orders, whoso be so lewd<sup>417</sup> unreverently to speak, and malapertly<sup>418</sup> to jest and rail, shall play that part alone for me.<sup>419</sup>

35 And rather will I that these brethren call me partial than for such ill fashion indifferent.

And over<sup>420</sup> this, I cannot see what need there were that I should rail upon the clergy and reckon up all their faults. For that part hath Tyndale played 40 and Friar Barnes both already, and left nothing for me to say therein, not though my mind were sore<sup>421</sup> set thereon.

They have with truth and lies together laid<sup>422</sup> the living<sup>423</sup> of bad to bad and good both, in such a vile villainous fashion that it would make a good stomach 45 to vomit to hear their ribaldous railing. And yet not against the sacred persons only, but against the blessed sacraments also.

And herein fare<sup>427</sup> they much like as if there were a sort of villain<sup>428</sup> wretched heretics that—meeting the priests and clerics (religious<sup>429</sup> and other) going 55 with banners, copes, crosses, and censers,<sup>430</sup> and the Sacrament<sup>431</sup> borne about with them upon a Corpus Christi<sup>432</sup> Day—would pick quarrels to them, and first call them all that could come in their villain mouths, and haply say true by<sup>433</sup> some, and then 60 catch them all by the heads and throw them in the mire, surplices, copes, censers, crosses, relics, Sacrament, and all. And then if any man rebuked their villainous dealing, and would step unto the priests, and pull them up, and help to wipe the copes, and 65 reverently take up the crosses, the relics, and the Blessed Sacrament, were it not now well and wisely spoken if one would reprove him that thus did, and say he should not meddle himself in the matter, hot nor cold, but if<sup>434</sup> he would be indifferent and do 70 somewhat<sup>435</sup> on the both sides, and therefore he should, to show himself indifferent, either revile and rebuke the priests (or at the leastwise some of them), and souse them somewhat in the mire for the pleasure of them that so served them, or else go 75 by about his other business and let the matter alone, and neither take up good man out of the mire, nor surplice, cope, nor censer, nor relic, but let them lay the Sacrament in the dirt again: were not this a goodly way? Surely, for my part, I am not so ambi- 80 tious of such folk's praise as to be called indifferent, nor will, in writing against their heresies, help them forth in their railing.

THE ELEVENTH CHAPTER

But now, whereas the brethren lay a blame in me that I had not used such a goodly mild manner, and such an indifferent fashion, as they find used by him that made the book of The Division between the Spirituality and the Temporalty, I am not greatly blameworthy therein. For his book was put out since; and therefore could I, when I wrote, take none example thereof; and every man is not like<sup>436</sup> inventive of his own wit. For surely he hath founden some certain proper invented figures<sup>437</sup> in that book in which I am so far from finding the like of myself that, being, as they now be, founden to mine hand already, hard were it for me in the like matter to follow them.

And yet though my books be very far under his, they may be, for all that, ye wot well, meetly<sup>438</sup> good, if his be so far excellent as the brethren boast it. In which book yet, as much as they boast it, he declar-eth and expressly testifieth, like a true Christian man (howsoever the matters go between the temporalty and the spirituality), that yet their opinions are heresies.

But they take, as it seemeth, all those words of his well in worth, because they reckon themselves recompensed in another part, in that they falsely persuade unto themselves either that he dissimuleth<sup>439</sup> for the while and believeth as they do, or else that, believe he never so well himself, yet, either of pity or some other affection, he could be content to help that they should themselves with their evil belief be let alone and live in rest, and be suffered<sup>440</sup> to believe as they list.<sup>441</sup>

But I trust in God that in that point they lean too much to the letter of his words and, of their own favor to themselves, misconstrue the good man's mind. For God forbid that any Christian man should mean so.

Howbeit, as touching the matter wherewith we be now in hand<sup>442</sup> — that is to wit, the manner of mild and indifferent writing by me or by him concerning the spirituality and the temporalty — therein am I very sure that his mild indifferent book of the Division neither is more mild nor more indifferent than any book of mine.

For first, as for mine own part, look my Dialogue, my Supplication of Souls, and both the parts of the Confutation, and ye shall clearly see that I neither have used toward the clergy nor toward the temporalty any warm<sup>443</sup> displeasent word, but have forborne to touch in special<sup>444</sup> either the faults of the one or of the other. But yet have I confessed the thing that truth is: neither party to be faultless. But then which is the thing that offendeth these blessed brethren, I have not letted<sup>445</sup> furthermore to say the thing which I take also for very true: that as this realm of England hath had hitherto, God be thanked, as good and as laudable a temporalty, number for number, as hath had any other Christian region of the quantity,<sup>446</sup> so hath it had also, number for number, compared with any realm christened<sup>447</sup> of no greater quantity, as good and as commendable a clergy, though there have never lacked, in any of both the parties, plenty of such as have always been naught, whose faults have ever been their own, and not to be imputed to the whole body neither of spirituality nor temporalty, saving that there have been peradventure<sup>448</sup> on either part, in some such as by their offices ought to look thereto, some lack of the labor and diligence that in the reforming of it should have belonged unto them; which I declare always that I would wish amended, and every man specially labor to mend himself, and rather accustom himself to look upon his own faults than upon other men's, and against such as are in either sort founden open<sup>449</sup> evil, and naught, and noyous<sup>450</sup> unto the commonweal — as thieves, murderers, and heretics, and such other wretches — the whole corps of the spirituality and temporalty both, each with other lovingly to accord and agree and, according to the good ancient laws and commendable usages<sup>451</sup> long continued in this noble realm, either party endeavor themselves diligently to repress and keep under those evil and ungracious folk that, like sores, scabs, and cankers, trouble and vex the body, and of all them to cure such as may be cured and, for health of the whole body, cut and cast off the incurable cankered parts therefrom, observed in the doing evermore such order and fashion as may stand and agree with reason and justice, the King's laws of the realm, the Scripture of God, and the laws of Christ's Church, ever keeping love and concord between the two principal parties, the spirituality and temporalty, lest the dregs of both sorts conspiring together and increasing, may little and little grow too strong for both; whereto they might have a fair<sup>452</sup> gap and a broad gate to enter if they might find the means by craft to sever and set asunder the temporalty against the clergy to strive, and so let, as it were, the soul and the body brabble<sup>453</sup> and strive together, and while they study nothing else but the one to grieve<sup>454</sup> the other, the naughty then conspire and agree together, and set upon the good people of both.

This hath been hitherto the whole sum of my writing, without any displeasent word used either toward temporalty or spirituality. And more mild manner than this toward all good folk hath not this other book, of Division, nor yet a more indifferent, as far as I can see, but if<sup>455</sup> he be reckoned more mild because he setteth his words much more mild and cold when he speaketh aught<sup>456</sup> of heretics and showeth himself therein more temperate and thereby more discreet than I, and but if he be reckoned for more indifferent because his words in rehearsing the faults of the spirituality be not in the worst things partially<sup>457</sup> pointed toward such as be naughty, but indifferently directed and pointed toward the whole body.

THE TWELFTH CHAPTER

Howbeit, as touching the manner of his handling, to tell you the very truth, it seemeth to me somewhat strange for one that would go about the purpose that he pretendeth:<sup>458</sup> that is to wit, to pacify and appease two parties being at so sore<sup>459</sup> a dissension and "division," as he saith, that the temporalty is in grudge against the spirituality, not here and there but everywhere noted—as he saith, "in a manner universally"<sup>460</sup>—through this whole realm. Howbeit, I trust in God very far from so. And yet not fully so far but that it may by misfortune, for abundance of sin and lack of grace, in time grow and come to it.

For truth it is that murmur and dissension (God knoweth how it began) against the clergy is a great way gone onward in his<sup>461</sup> unhappy journey, and may by such manner and means of pacifying within short process<sup>462</sup> be conveyed round about the realm, and leave no place in peace. Not that I would think the man that made that book to be of such malicious mind as willingly to sow dissension, but that, as meseemeth, he taketh at the leastwise unware a wrong way toward the contrary, and that the manner of his handling is far from such indifference as he should use that would make a loveday<sup>463</sup> and appease any murmur and grudge of the lay people against the priests.

For he showeth, in the progress of all his process,<sup>464</sup> that the grudge is borne by the temporalty, and the causes and occasions thereof grown and given, in effect, all by the spirituality. Which handling is not, as methinketh, very much indifferent.

I let pass that he which verily<sup>465</sup> would intend to pacify, assuage, and appease a grudge would (as much as he conveniently<sup>466</sup> might) extenuate the causes and occasions of the grudge. But and if<sup>467</sup> he would needs walk plainly forth and take no such byways, he would not yet, at the leastwise, not accumulate and exaggerate the griefs, and, by all the means he might, make the griefs appear many, great, and most odious. Or finally if, for hatred of their faults, no favor of their persons could cause him to forbear that, yet would he forbear at the leastwise to seek up and rehearse causes of grudge before unknown unto the party whose displeasure he would assuage and pacify. But now this appeaser, contrariwise, not only doth in all these things the contrary, but bringeth forth also, besides all this, some such faults more as, if they were true, were of the greatest weight, and telleth them as though they were true, where they be very plain false indeed.

But now the good brethren, that boast it, lay forth for a great token of temperance and good mind toward the spirituality that he forbeareth to speak anything of the great open faults that many priests be openly taken in, as theft, robbery, sacrilege, and murder, whereof in sundry shires of the realm there are at every sessions openly founden some.

And yet the most part of such faults as he speaketh of, he saith them not as of himself, nor affirmeth them not for true, nor as things neither spoken by the mouths of very many, but to mitigate the matter with, he saith no more but that “thus by<sup>468</sup> the clergy some say,” and some find this fault with them, and some find that, and though that many small sums make a great, what can he do thereto?<sup>469</sup> Can he let<sup>470</sup> men to speak? Or is he bound to stop his ears and hear them not? Or may he not tell what he heareth some others say?

And yet say they further that he telleth indifferently<sup>471</sup> the faults as well of the temporalty as of the spirituality, and would there should<sup>472</sup> not be between the temporalty and the spirituality<sup>473</sup> so much as any one angry word. And therefore they say that it cannot be possible that he wrote of any evil intent, since no man can use himself neither more mildly, nor with more indifference, nor finally with more tender charity.

But now to these excuses, some other men answer again<sup>474</sup> that the leaving out of felony, sacrilege, and murder is rather a token of wiliness than any forbearing or favor. For since he saw well that every wise man would answer in himself that those great, horrible, open evils of such desperate naughty wretches were not to be laid<sup>475</sup> against the clergy (as the like in temporal wretches are not to be laid against the temporalty), he would therefore rather seek out and heap up a sort of those things that might, by his manner of handling, sound in the readers’ ears to be such as the temporalty might ascribe and impute unto (and therefore bear a grudge unto) the main multitude of the whole clergy, and extend in substance unto every part.

And as touching that he saith not the things as of himself, but bringeth them in with a figure of “some say,” to that point some others say that for that courtesy no man hath any cause to can<sup>476</sup> him any thanks. For under his fair figure of “some say,” he may, ye wot well—and some say that he so doth—devise to bring in all the mischief that any man can say. And yet over this, without his masker of “some say,” he saith open-faced some of the worst himself, and that in some things that are, as some true men say, not true.

Then as touching his indifferency in telling the faults of the temporalty too, of truth, among a great heap of shrewd<sup>477</sup> faults rehearsed against the clergy, for which the temporalty might, if the things were all true, seem to have great cause of grudge, he rehearseth also some faults of the temporalty too, as that they be to blame because they use the priests over-familiarly, and give them overly gay gowns or light-colored liveries,<sup>478</sup> and one or two such things more as, though they might be mended, yet were of no such kind as the priests that so be dealt withal have been wont to find any cause of great grudge.<sup>479</sup>

Howbeit, yet in one place, to show his farther indifference, he layeth against them both that the priests against lay people, and lay people against priests, have used to have evil language, and either against other to speak unsitting<sup>480</sup> words. And thereupon he showeth his tender charity, and saith, “If all these words were prohibited on both sides upon great pains, I think it would do great good in this behalf.”

THE THIRTEENTH CHAPTER

But now, good readers, if that it so were that one found two men standing together, and would come step in between them, and bear them in hand<sup>481</sup> they were about to fight, and would, with that word, put the one prettily<sup>482</sup> back with his hand, and all-to<sup>483</sup> buffet the other about the face, and then go forth and say that he had parted a fray<sup>484</sup> and pacified the parties, some men would say again<sup>485</sup> (as I suppose) that he had as lief<sup>486</sup> his enemy were let alone with him, and thereof abide the adventure,<sup>487</sup> as have such a friend step in between to part them.

Howbeit, if this Pacifier of this Division will say that this is nothing like the present matter because he striketh neither party, but only telleth the one the other’s faults, or else (as he will say) telleth them their faults both, if it so happeth, good readers, he found a man that were angry with his wife (and haply<sup>488</sup> not all without cause), if this maker of the book of Division would take upon him to go and reconcile them again together, and help to make them at one, and therein would use this way—that when he had them both before him, and before all their neighbors too, then saving for some change to make it meet<sup>489</sup> for their persons, else he would begin holily with the same words, in effect, with which he beginneth his indifferent<sup>490</sup> mild book of Division, and for an entry into his matter first would say thus unto them —

Who may remember the state that ye stand in without great heaviness<sup>491</sup> and sorrow of heart? For whereas in times past hath reigned between you charity, meekness, concord, and peace, there reigneth now anger and malice, debate, division, and strife. Which thing, to see so misfortune between any two Christian folk, is a thing much to be lamented, and then much more to be lamented when it mishappeth to fall between a man and his wife. And many good neighbors greatly marvel, iwis,<sup>492</sup> upon what causes this great grudge<sup>493</sup> is grown. And therefore, to the intent that ye may remove the causes and amend these matters, and thereby then by the grace of God agree,<sup>494</sup> I will tell you what I hear men say that the causes be.<sup>495</sup>

And now, after this holy prologue made, go forth and tell them that some folk say the wife hath this evil condition, and some others say that she hath that evil condition, and yet others some say that she hath another evil condition, and so, with twenty diverse “some says” of other men, say there himself by<sup>496</sup> the poor woman all the mischief that any man could devise to say, and among those, some things, peradventure true, which yet her husband had never heard of before. And some things false also, whereof because the Pacifier would be put unto no proof, he would not say them as of himself but bring them forth under the fair figure of “some say.” And when he had all said, then yet at the last say thus much of himself:

As for these things here and there I have heard some others say, whether they say true or no, the charge<sup>497</sup> be theirs for me.<sup>498</sup> But yet in good faith, good sister, since ye know that the displeasure and grudge that your husband hath to you is grown upon these causes, I marvel much myself that you do use the same conditions still. Iwis,<sup>499</sup> till you meek<sup>500</sup> yourself and amend them, this anger of your husband will never be well appeased. 45

Lo, with such words he voideth the color<sup>501</sup> of his fair figure of “some say,” either by forgetfulness or else by the plain figure of folly. For when he saith of himself that she keepeth those evil conditions still and amendeth them not, he showeth that all his “some says” be of his own saying, though he might haply in some of them hear some others say so too besides. 50

But then if among all these faults so mildly rehearsed<sup>502</sup> against her, he would, to show somewhat<sup>503</sup> of his indifference, tell her husband his parse-verse<sup>504</sup> too, and say, “But yet, forsooth,<sup>505</sup> your wife hath not given you so many causes of displeasure for nought.<sup>506</sup> For I will be plain with you and indifferent between you both: You have in some things toward her not dealt very well nor like a good husband yourself. For this I know myself: that ye have used to make her too homely<sup>507</sup> with you, and have suffered<sup>508</sup> her to be too much idle, and suffered her to be too much conversant among her gossips, and you have given her overly gay gear and too much money in her purse; and surely, till you amend all this gear for your part, I cannot much marvel though she do you displeasure. And sometimes evil words between you causeth debate on both sides. For you call her (as I hear say) cursed quean<sup>509</sup> and shrew;<sup>510</sup> and some say that she behind your back calleth you knave and cuckold. And iwis,<sup>511</sup> such words were well done to be left<sup>512</sup> on both sides, for surely they do no good. And therefore “if all these words were prohibited on both sides upon great pains, I think it would do great good in this behalf.” 75

would she, think you, for all that believe him? I suppose verily nay, nor her husband neither if he were wise, although he saw some part of his tale true, as none is so foolish to say all false that would win him credence. But believe the husband as he list,<sup>515</sup> I durst be bold to swear for the wife that he should never make her such a fool as to believe that he meant to mend the matter, with rehearsing her faults more than ever her husband had heard of, and some of them false too, and then color all his tale with his proper invention<sup>516</sup> of “some say.” But she would for his “some say” shortly say to him, “I pray you, Goodman ‘Some Say,’ get you shortly hence. For my husband and I shall agree much the sooner if no such Brother ‘Some Say’ come within our door.”

Now of very truth this Pacifier, as some say, goeth yet worse to work in his book of Division than this “Some Say” that we put for an example between the man and his wife. For he gathereth first all the causes of displeasures that he can find out or devise, and diverse of them such as few lay people unlearned—yea, and few of the learned too—had anything heard of before, as are diverse of those which he gathereth out of Jean Gerson.<sup>517</sup>

If he say that he meant as Gerson did—that he maketh mention of them because he would have the clergy mend them—surely whoso, for such good will telleth a man his faults, useth<sup>518</sup> to tell it him secretly; and so did Jean Gerson himself when he wrote them in Latin, and not in the vulgar tongue.<sup>519</sup>

But this Pacifier, contrariwise, because he would have the lay people, both men and women, look on them, doth translate them into English, whereas Jean Gerson would<sup>520</sup> not that a man should reproach and rebuke the prelates before the people.

Also, this Pacifier aggrieveth<sup>521</sup>—as much as in him lieth—the clergy of England for use of the laws not made by themselves, but be the common laws of all Christendom.

If he will say that he blameth but their abuses thereof,<sup>522</sup> the truth appeareth in some place otherwise in his book. And yet since he proveth that point but by a “some say,” he might with the same figure lay<sup>523</sup> like faults in the temporalty concerning the laws of this realm, and prove it in like wise with a great “some say” too. And therein he showeth himself not indifferent when he bringeth in the one and leaveth the other out. And on the other side, if he bring in the other too, then shall he make two faults for one. For if he handle them as truly as he handleth these, then shall he make two lies for one.

And yet besides all the faults that he bringeth in under “some say” and “they say,” some that himself saith without any “some say” be such as some say that he can never prove, and some, they say, be plain and open false.

By all which manner of handling, it appeareth that if the man mean well himself (as by God’s grace he doth), then hath some other subtle shrew<sup>524</sup> that is of his counsel<sup>525</sup> deceived him, not only in the misframing of his matter more toward division than unity, but also by causing him to plant in here and there some such word as might make his best friends to fear that he greatly forced not<sup>526</sup> for the furtherance of the Catholic faith.

THE FOURTEENTH CHAPTER

But forasmuch as<sup>527</sup> the touching<sup>528</sup> of the book is here not my principal purpose, I will therefore not peruse it over and touch every point thereof. Which if I would, I could (I think), well make men see that very few parts thereof had either such charity or such indifference therein as not only the new naughty brotherhood boasteth, but some good folk also take it at a superficial reading.

And yet because the brethren’s boast hath made it an incident unto my matter, and that some things therein are such as it is more than necessary that men be well advised of them, and well foresee what they do in them, and lest a better opinion of the book than the matter may bear, if it be pondered right, may be occasion to move men in some great things to do no little wrong, and to the intent also that ye may see that in all that I have said, I belie<sup>529</sup> him not, I shall, for an example of handling, touch by the way one or two places<sup>530</sup> of his.

And lest folk should think that I pick out here and there two or three lines of the worst, I will take his first chapter whole. In which, though all be not naught,<sup>531</sup> nor all false (for a very fool were he that would put forth a book and make all naught and all false, even in the very forefront that shall come first to hand), yet if it be considered and advised<sup>532</sup> well, there will, I ween, even in the very first chapter appear less good, and less truth too, than men at a sudden shift,<sup>533</sup> in the first reading over, do thoroughly perceive. Lo, thus it beginneth:

Who may remember the state of this realm now in these days without great heaviness and sorrow of heart? For thereas<sup>534</sup> in times past hath reigned charity, meekness, concord, and peace, reigneth now envy, pride, division, and strife—and that not only between laymen and laymen, but also between religious and religious, and also between priests and religious, and, that is yet more to be lamented, also between priests and priests.<sup>535</sup>

Some say that a man might here a little lament this man's wit,<sup>536</sup> that weeneth it less to be lamented that debate and strife should be between priests and religious persons, or between those that are, both the parties, religious folk, than between those that are, both the parties, priests. For some say that many religious folk be priests. And they that so say do say also that as many priests be religious folk. And some say, therefore, that except<sup>537</sup> this man mean here by religious folk either women or children, with whose variance<sup>538</sup> the temporalty is not very greatly cumbered,<sup>539</sup> or else the lay brethren that are in some places of religion, which<sup>540</sup> are neither so many nor so much esteemed that ever the temporalty was much troubled with their strife, else besides these, there falleth no variance lightly between religious and religious wherewith the temporalty have been offended but it falleth of necessity between priests and priests; and then the variance, namely<sup>541</sup> such a variance as this book speaketh of—that is so notable that the temporalty so much marketh it, and hath so great cause to lament it when it falleth between religious and religious—is a thing no less lamentable than if it fell between as many priests when themselves be both priests.

are secular priests,<sup>542</sup> as by his other words he seemeth to do, and so taketh it for a thing more to be lamented if variance fall between secular priests than between those priests that are in religion, then say some men that he saith somewhat worse. And then they that so say seem to me to say true. For albeit<sup>543</sup> great pity it is to see strife and variance fall between any secular priests, yet is it more pity to see it fall between those priests that have also vowed and professed further somewhat a more strait<sup>544</sup> renouncing of all such manner<sup>545</sup> things as matter of debate and strife do commonly spring upon. And therefore this manner of increase and growing of this man's oration is but a counterfeited figure of rhetoric, as some men say.

And in good faith as for myself, I see not the reason that moved him. For it were a very cold<sup>546</sup> excuse to a man learned that will weigh the whole periodus<sup>547</sup> together, if he would hereafter say that he meant by these words “between priests and priests” the priests that are in religion. For besides that a man may by diverse things well perceive the contrary, he had, if he so had meant, left then no lamentation for any strife that happeth between secular priests among themselves. I cannot therefore, in good faith, divine what he should by that increase<sup>548</sup> ending in “priests” after all the religious, but if<sup>549</sup> he meant to signify that the state of priests professing religion were a state of less perfection, by reason of the profession, than is the state of those secular priests that have temporal lands of their own purchase or inheritance, or that else serve some chantry<sup>550</sup> or live upon trentals<sup>551</sup> abroad.

And surely if the man thus meant indeed, besides that he should have set out his sentence more plainly, his meaning will, but if he declare<sup>552</sup> it the better, mislike better men and better learned too, than I and he be both. And saving for that point—which is no small matter—else, as for his rules of rhetoric or grammatical congruity either, or oversight in reasoning, as things of no great weight, I would not much vouchsafe<sup>553</sup> to touch. For they be such offenses as a man may fall in and yet be a saved soul, as well as though he never wrote any work at all.

THE FIFTEENTH CHAPTER

Which division hath been so universal that it hath been a great unquietness and a great breach of charity through all the realm; and part of it hath risen by reason of a great singularity that religious persons and priests have had to<sup>554</sup> their state of living, whereby many of them have thought their state most perfect before all others. And some of them have thereby exalted themselves in their own sight so high that they have risen into such a ghostly<sup>555</sup> pride that they have in manner disdained and despised others that have not lived in such perfection as they think they do. And of this hath followed that some of them have had unsit-ting<sup>556</sup> words of the others, calling them flatterers, dissimulators,<sup>557</sup> and hypocrites; and they have called the others again<sup>558</sup> proud persons, covetous, vainglorious, and lovers of worldly delights, and such other.<sup>559</sup>

Of some particular variance among diverse persons of the clergy have I diverse times heard, as sometimes one parson against another for his tithes, or a parson against a religious place for meddling within his parish, or one place of religion with another upon some suchlike occasion, or sometimes some one religion have had some question and disputed, as it were, a problem upon the antiquity or seniority of their institution, as by which the Carmelites claim to fetch their original from Elijah and Elisha. And some question hath arisen in the order of Saint Francis between the Observants and the Conventuals. For as for the third company—that is to wit, the Coletans<sup>560</sup>—there are in this realm none. But yet of all these matters was there never, as far as I read or remember, in this realm either so very great or so many such things all in hand at once that ever it was at the time noted through the realm and spoken of for a great notable fault of the whole clergy. And as for the faults of some particular parties, either persons or places, is nothing that ought of reason be reckoned for the cause of this division and of this displeasure and grudge of the tempo-ralty against the clergy—no more than many more variances growing daily, in diverse times and places, with unlawful assemblies and great riots also, cause the clergy to grudge against the temporality. And as it is not reason that it so were, so that it is not indeed may well be perceived by this: For if it were, then must this grudge of ours against them have been a very old thing; whereas it is indeed neither so great as this man maketh it, and grown to so great as it is, but even of late,<sup>561</sup> since Tyndale's books and Frith's and Friar Barnes's began to go abroad. And yet—although that it appeareth well in his words afterward that those variances can be no part or cause of this division whereof he maketh his book—yet hath it delighted either himself or some subtle shrews<sup>562</sup> that so have set him awork to bring them in too, of a good mind and a favorable, to lay these faults to the clergy's face, besides the matter of this division that he taketh in hand to treat of.

Now, the remnant (whereby somewhat appeareth also that by the increase of his oration, with putting in the end—“and, that is yet more to be lamented, also between priests and priests”—he meant to put for the more lamentable strife that variance which falleth between secular priests than that that falleth between those that, besides their order of priesthood, have by their holy vows entered into religion) he handleth here in such wise that he first reproacheth both the parties of “great singularity which both religious persons and also priests have had to their states of living,” by which words he showeth that each of them contend with other upon the perfection of their two states whether<sup>563</sup> should have preeminence—these priests that are secular or those that are religious—and which of the both himself taketh for the chief appeareth by the piteous increase and growing of his lamentable oration.

Then rebuketh he, of the religious, some that have appearance to be the most perfect and best,
 and saith that through the great singularity that they have to their state of living, they have exalted themselves in their own sight so high that they have risen into such a ghostly pride that they have in manner disdained and despised others that have not lived in such perfection as they think they do.

This is a great thing spoken by guess, because among many good virtuous folk, there may fall some by the devil's means into some great ghostly pride, as Lucifer did in the good company of angels. But this chance of such change is so old that these words will nothing serve his lamentable beginning, which standeth, ye wot well, in lamenting the change from the old virtues of times passed into the new vices of this time present. And this vice is very old, and reigned most when religious folk lived best. And verily the clergy is not all-thing<sup>564</sup> so evil as he maketh it, if the religious folk live now so holily as the temporalty may note that through perfectness of living the devil bring so many to such a high spice<sup>565</sup> of pride.

But then goeth he forth and setteth them to chide together. Howbeit, his words be so confounded with "they" and "them" and "other," and in the two verses of their chiding his words be so unsuitly<sup>566</sup> sorted, that I cannot perceive which of the two parties calleth which, nor who calleth whom, by those names that he saith the one sort calleth the other, nor himself I suppose neither, as the thing that he never knew for true, but thinketh he may boldly tell everything for true that any man perceiveth possible.

THE SIXTEENTH CHAPTER

And another part of this division hath risen by diversities of opinions that have been upon the authorities, powers, and jurisdiction of spiritual men among themselves. And upon these divisions some laymen have in time past favored the one party, and some the other; whereby the people have greatly been inquieted.<sup>567</sup>

Diverse opinions upon powers, authorities, and jurisdictions of spiritual men among themselves, there happeneth I think now and then to rise, while in such cases either party hath his opinion upon his own side. But of any great inquietation that the people hath had by any such division risen within this realm, or of any laymen bearing their favor some to the one party and some to the other, I ween the people of this realm that felt it have forgotten it, if any such were, it is so long ago. And surely myself remember none, nor I trow<sup>568</sup> no man else for the time of this twenty years; within which time, or ten fewer, all this gear<sup>569</sup> is begun whereof he maketh his division. And therefore this piece of his is, to my feeling, very cold.<sup>570</sup>

THE SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER

But I wot not fully by what occasion it is that now of late the great multitude of all the lay people have found default<sup>571</sup> as well at<sup>572</sup> priests as religious, so far-forth that it is now in manner noted through all the realm that there is a great division between the spirituality and the temporalty. And verily it is great pity that such a noise should spring and go abroad.<sup>573</sup>

In the beginning he said that division reigneth now between spiritual men and spiritual men. And then saith he here, "But it reigneth now between spiritual men and temporal men."

I am content to let his but<sup>574</sup> alone, and will not shoot thereat for this once. Howbeit, surely his but, being a preposition adversative, standeth more properly to shoot at between his two nows than it would if it were turned into some conjunction copulative.

But whereas he cannot fully tell by what occasion "the great multitude have found default as well at priests as religious," a man needeth never to study for occasions thereof; but if he be so curious as to seek for faults, he may soon find enough, not only in priests and in religious, but in every sort and kind of temporal people too, and ever might yet, in every age since Christendom began, and may peradventure, if he search well, find some in himself too. So that if there be no other cause of variance than that, they may, both spirituality and temporalty, take each other by the hand like good fellows, and agree together well enough.

But yet happeth it well that this good Pacifier hath so great pity that the noise of this division should spring and go abroad. For he, to remedy that matter withal, and to pull back the noise thereof, and to stop up clearly the spring, because all should be hushed and never more words made thereof, hath, as ye see, put it out abroad in print.

THE EIGHTEENTH CHAPTER

5 And some allege diverse causes why it should be so noised.<sup>575</sup>

10 A very few folk may soon begin a noise<sup>576</sup> of evil will and malice. And a noise may soon be borne abroad, whatsoever the matter be, with some of simplicity, some of light-giving credence, and some of a lust unto<sup>577</sup> talking.

15 First they say that neither priests nor religious keep the perfection of their order to the honor of God and good example of the people, as they should do.<sup>578</sup>

20 Verily they that so say peradventure say not much untrue. For I think that every man's duty toward God is so great that very few folk serve him as they should do. And therefore whoso pry upon every man's deed so narrowly as to spy that fault and fall at variance of great zeal with every man that doth not to the very point and perfection, even all that he should do, shall wax<sup>579</sup> within a while at variance with every man and every man with him. But I suppose they keep it now at this day muchwhat<sup>580</sup> after such a good meetly mean<sup>581</sup> manner as they did many of those years before in which this division was never dreamed on. And therefore they that say this is the cause have need to go seek some other.

30 But that some of them procure their own honor, and call it the honor of God, and rather covet to have rule over the people than to profit the people.<sup>582</sup>

35 Were there never none of these till now so late<sup>583</sup> as about the beginning of this division? Or be they all such now? Among Christ's own apostles was some desire of prelacy,<sup>584</sup> and that with some contention too. There are of our prelates some such at this day now, as I pray God that when there shall any new come, they may prove no worse. For of these, when they die (if they wax not worse before), whoso shall live after them may, in my mind, be bold to say that England had not their better any day this forty years; and I durst go a good way above too. But this is more by twenty years and ten set thereto, than this division hath anything been spoken of. 45

This is a very cold<sup>587</sup> cause of this new division, to say that there be not now "commonly" so bad men in the temporalty as there be "some" in the spirituality. For when was it otherwise? Not even in Christ's own days. For Judas, that was one of his own apostles, was not only worse than the common sort of all those that loved their bellies and their ease among Christ's disciples, were they men or women, but worse also than the very worst in all the world beside. But what cause were this that the temporalty should (nor, though this man say thus, I think them not so unreasonable that they would) be at debate and division with the whole body of the clergy: because that some of them were worse than those are that are in a mean<sup>588</sup> common sort of naughtiness<sup>589</sup> among themselves? 60 65

And that some serve God for a worldly laud<sup>590</sup> and to be magnified therefor, more than for the pure love of God.<sup>591</sup>

That same some that so do be some of the most foolish apes that the devil hath to tumble afore him and to make him laugh, when he seeth them take so much labor and pain for the reward of the blast of a few men's mouths. 70

Howbeit, there may be some such for all that, and yet nothing to the purpose of this matter. For as for the speech of fools is not to be counted for a proof of division. And among wise men the guess and conjecture that in the clergy there be secretly some very naught before God, whom yet in the sight of the world men take for very good, can by no reason 75 80

be the cause of any grudge toward the spirituality, wherein may be, besides them that are such (and so there are indeed), many very virtuous holy men indeed, whose holiness and prayer hath been, I verily think, one great special cause that God hath so long holden his hand from giving of some sorer<sup>592</sup> stroke upon the necks of them that are naught and care not, in the spirituality and the temporality both.

And yet this fault that this Pacifier assigneth — of serving God for laud — is, I suppose, somewhat amended of late, and will within a while, if some gear<sup>593</sup> go forward, wear away quite<sup>594</sup> by the help and means of another fault.

For if these heresies that rail upon religions,<sup>595</sup> and call all their prayer pattering, and all their fasting folly, and all their holy vows of chastity worse than Friar Luther's lechery — if these heresies, I say, may grow and go forward, as they begin to grow now and prosper full prettily in some places, and then if those that be of the same sect and of policy dissimule<sup>596</sup> it for a season may in the meantime spread abroad an opinion in the minds of men, that of themselves mean none harm, that the religious people do fast and pray but for laud, they shall well perceive within a while that they shall have so little laud thereof that if there would remain none other cause of this division but because they serve God for laud, ye shall have it soon changed of likelihood, and then shall we shortly agree together very well.

But now good readers, consider, I beseech you, that if these causes which this Pacifier allegeth under the color<sup>597</sup> of "some say" be causes that might move the temporality to be in division and grudge against the clergy — that is to wit, because they serve not God as they should do, but some of them love authority and some love their ease, and some serve God of vainglory, for laud and praise of men — then should this division not have so late begun, but must have been ever before, and can never be remedied hereafter, but as long as the world lasteth must this division ever continue still.

For how could this Pacifier find the means that in the whole clergy, so many as are therein, none should be naught when of Christ's apostles there was yet one naught in the small number of twelve? And verily, in this declination<sup>598</sup> of the world and by this great fall of faith, the old fervor of charity

so beginning to cool, it is to be feared at length that, if it thus go forth and continue, both the spirituality from the apostles and the temporality from the other disciples may fall so far down, down, down, down, that as there was then one naught among twelve, so may there in time coming, if these heresies go forward, among twelve spiritual, or peradventure twenty temporal either, be founden at last in some whole country scant any one good. But that world is not, I thank God, in England yet, nor never shall, I trust, come.

Howbeit, that all may be good, that will be hard for this Pacifier to devise the means. So that if the being of some naught may be a good cause of division, division may be, by sometimes fewer naught, made sometimes somewhat less, but end can it never have while the world standeth.

But if this Pacifier, to cease and quench this division, could find the means to make all the whole clergy good, yet for all that — since he layeth for causes of this division that some men say this by<sup>599</sup> the clergy, and some men say by them that — were all the clergy never so good indeed, and served God never so well, this division, by his own tale, yet could not for all that cease except he could provide farther that no piteous Pacifier should, in lamenting of division, put forth a book and say that some laymen say that some of the clergy be naught, and love their ease and their wealth, and that some say that those that seem best and take most labor and pain be but hypocrites for all that, and serve God but for vainglory to get themselves laud and praise among the people.

THE NINETEENTH CHAPTER

And some laymen say further that though religious men have varied<sup>600</sup> with religious, and that some priests have varied also with religious in some points concerning the preeminence of their perfection, as is said before, that yet in such things as pertain to the maintenance of the worldly honor of the Church and of spiritual men, which they call the honor of God, and in such things as pertain to the increase of the riches of spiritual men, religious or secular, they say they agree all in one.<sup>601</sup>

597 guise 598 decline 599 about

As for calling the worldly honor of the Church, and of spiritual men, the honor of God, I wot nere<sup>602</sup> whether I perceive well what this man meaneth thereby. But by the first of those two things—
 5 that is to wit, by the worldly honor done to the Church and taken as honor done to God—he seemeth to mean the honor that Christian people here in the world use to<sup>603</sup> do to the Church, as in building of the churches fair and goodly, and in appar-
 10 elling<sup>604</sup> the churches for the use of God’s service honorably.

And then in the second point—that is to wit, the honor of spiritual persons—he meaneth, I suppose, such honor as good Christian people do and are 15 bounden to do to their prelates and their curates, and to priests and religious persons, for the respect and regard that they bear both of devotion and very bounden duty to the holy sacrament of their sacred orders, and holy profession of their godly state of 20 living.

Then, as for the third point—that is, the things that he saith pertain to the increase of riches in spiritual men—himself declareth soon after that he meaneth trentals,<sup>605</sup> chantries,<sup>606</sup> obits,<sup>607</sup> pardons,<sup>608</sup> and pilgrimages.

Now saith he that some laymen lay<sup>609</sup> this for a further thing: that all the clergy do use to agree together in all these things, howsoever they happen to vary among themselves for some other things.
 30 And verily therein I think he saith true, for so must they do or displease God, and so doth every good layman agree with them therein too. And I have seen it proved by experience that in some of these things, when the laymen have moved<sup>610</sup> some things
 35 sometimes whereby should be restrained some such things as the clergy might win by—yea, and also no little somewhat taken from them, to that that lawfully was their own before—the clergy have not striven with the temporalty therefor, but rather 40 than to stick in contention have suffered and let it pass, albeit the cantles<sup>611</sup> that have been cut off have been somewhat broader than a bridecake,<sup>612</sup> and greater than a Christmas loaf in a right good husband’s<sup>613</sup> house.

45 And yet where this Pacifier saith that some laymen say that in all such things all the clergy, both secular and religious, agree and hold together, himself can, if he will, tell the same “some laymen” that so told him so that some other laymen say nay. For 50 they say that they see very well, that in all those things there are now some such of the clergy, such as it is pity that ever they were thereof, either secular priests or religious persons. And yet are there some such of both which now cast off their favor 55 from both twain, and from the Christian faith also, and therefore agree not to these things (as those “some men” told this man that the whole clergy doth), but do both speak and write against all these things every whit:<sup>614</sup> both honor to prelates, building of churches, buying of bells and ornaments, and 60 against pilgrimages, trentals, chantries, obits, and pardons, and finally purgatory too.

THE TWENTIETH CHAPTER

And therefore they say that all spiritual men, as to the multitude,<sup>615</sup> be more diligent to induce 65 the people to such things as shall bring riches to the Church (as to give money to trentals, and to found chantries and obits, and to obtain pardons, and to go upon pilgrimages, and such other) than they be to induce them to the payment of their 70 debts, to make restitutions for such wrongs as they have done, or to do the works of mercy to their neighbors that be poor and needy, and that sometimes be also in right extreme necessity.<sup>616</sup>

Now in good faith for aught<sup>617</sup> that I see, such 75 as so murmur against chantries, trentals, obits, pardons, and pilgrimages, as would have them all fordone,<sup>618</sup> have an inward hatred unto the profit of men’s souls, besides the envy that they bear to priests. For some of these things be such that they 80 make not the priests so very rich that all the clergy should, for the great lucre, so sore<sup>619</sup> bend unto the setting forth thereof.

For as for chantries, though there be many, no one man can have any great living thereby; and that 85 a priest should have some living of such a mean<sup>620</sup> thing as commonly the chantries be, there will, I ween, no good man find great fault that all the clergy would have it so; for so would, I suppose, every good layman too.

And as for pilgrimages, though the shrines be well garnished, and the chapel well hung with wax,<sup>621</sup> few men, I fear me, need much at this day to grudge and complain of very chargeable<sup>622</sup> offerings, but those men make most ado that offer nothing at all.

And pardons<sup>623</sup> have been purchased not only by the spirituality, but in diverse places by the good faithful devotion of virtuous temporal princes, as was to Westminster,<sup>624</sup> and unto the Savoy,<sup>625</sup> great pardon purchased by the most noble prince of famous memory King Henry the Seventh, father to our most dear sovereign lord the King that now is. And in good faith, I never yet perceived the people make so great offerings at a pardon that we should either pity greatly their cost or envy the priests that profit.

But then the trentals, lo, they be the things, ye wot well, whereby the multitude of the clergy, and specially the prelates get, every man among them, an infinite treasure in a year, so that it is no marvel though the whole clergy, secular and religious, what variance soever they have among themselves beside<sup>626</sup> (concerning the preeminence of their perfection, as this Pacifier saith), agree together, for all that, in this point: to keep and hold fast the trentals, because of the great increase of the riches that they bring in by heaps unto every man among them. I, that nothing can get by them, beseech God to keep in men's devotions toward trentals and toward obits too. For as much as he saith that secular and religious both stick to these profits, yet if religious Lutherans may proceed and prosper—that cast off their habits and walk out and wed nuns and preach against purgatory, and make mocks of the Mass—many men shall care little for obits within a while and set no more by a trental than a ruffian<sup>627</sup> at Rome setteth by a trentune.<sup>628</sup>

Howbeit, where this Pacifier saith that some say that “all spiritual men as to the multitude” do rather induce the people to pilgrimages, pardons, chantries, obits, and trentals than to the payment of their debts, or to restitution of their wrongs, or to the deeds of alms and mercy to their neighbors that are poor and needy, and sometimes too in right extreme necessity, for my part, I thank God, I never heard yet of any one that ever would give that counsel; nor no more hath, I see well, this Pacifier himself, for he saith it but under his common figure of “some say.” But therefore this would I say: that either he believed those some that so said unto him, or else he believed them not. If he believed them not, it had been well done to have left their tale untold till he had believed them better. And on the other side, if he believed them well, he might as well with conscience have been less light of belief,<sup>629</sup> or boldly might have believed that they lied, rather than lightly believe the lewd<sup>630</sup> words of some, and upon the malicious mouths of some, blow abroad in books so false a tale himself against not a small sum, but, as himself saith, “as to the multitude,” against all spiritual men.

THE TWENTY-FIRST CHAPTER

And forasmuch as it is most commonly seen that among a great multitude there be many that work rather upon will than upon reason, and that though they have good zeal, yet many times they lack good order and discretion, which is the mother of all virtue, therefore some persons, thinking that worldly honor and riches letteth<sup>631</sup> greatly devotion—so much that, as they think, they cannot stand together—have holden opinion that it is not lawful to the Church to have any possessions. And some, taking a more mean<sup>632</sup> way therein, have said that (as they think) it is lawful and also expedient that the Church have possessions; but they think that the great abundance that is in the Church doth great hurt, and induceth in many of them a love to worldly things, and letteth and in manner strangleth the love of God. And therefore they think that it were good to take away that is too much, and to leave that is sufficient. And some also, as of a policy to pull riches from the Church, have inveighed against all such things as bring riches to the Church. And because great riches have come to the Church for praying for souls in purgatory, have by words affirmed that there is no purgatory, and that granting of pardons riseth of covetise of the Church, and profiteth not the people, and that pilgrimages be of no effect, and that the Church may make no laws and such other things as founding of chantries, making of brotherhoods, and many more. Wherein they show outwardly to rise against all the things before rehearsed, and to despise them, and yet they know and believe in their hearts that all these things be of themselves right good and profitable, as they be indeed if they were ordered as they should be. And some persons there be that through grace find default only at the abusion and disorder of such things, and speak nothing against the things themselves, neither of purgatory, pilgrimages, setting up of images, or such other. For they know well they be ordained of God, and that the disorder riseth only of man for covetise, singularity, or some other suchlike default, through persuasion and deceit of the ghostly enemy.<sup>633</sup>

Here is, good readers, a special fruitful piece of three manner of “some says,” or three manner of thinkings. The first is of those that think and say that it is not lawful that the Church should have any possessions, but that all their livelihood, and all such things as any riches cometh into the Church by, should be taken away, every whit.

And these men, in the judgment of this piteous Pacifier, be not “discreet,” but yet they have, he saith, a “good zeal” though. And this good zeal had, ye wot well, Simon Fish when he made the supplication of beggars.<sup>634</sup> But God gave him such grace afterward that he was sorry for that good zeal, and repented himself and came into the Church again, and forsook and forswore all the whole hill of those heresies out of which the fountain of that same good zeal sprang.

And of truth, some such are there yet that have the same good zeal still that Simon Fish had when he was at the worst. And God sendeth some of them such good speed<sup>635</sup> as they have good zeal. For some such have I known that have engrossed<sup>636</sup> into their hands much other men’s goods, and for a while flowered, and were accounted thrifty,<sup>637</sup> and held their own and other men’s too, but in conclusion wasted away both twain, and fain<sup>638</sup> to find a place to hide their heads, or to keep them from prison find some other shift.<sup>639</sup>

Of these sort was there one, not very long ago, which<sup>640</sup> went about to make a good bargain, and was not then known but for his own man,<sup>641</sup> and yet is now, God be thanked, his own man again, for any other man that he hath to wait upon him. But so happed it then that as he sat in a tavern in Lombard Street with an honest merchant with whom he should<sup>642</sup> have bargained, the other had heard an inkling, which yet he believed not, that this man was not much aforehand.<sup>643</sup> And as they fell in talking of the world, they talked at last of the clergy, wherein, when he was fallen, he waxed so warm with the wine, and so full of good zeal, that he swore by the Mass he trusted shortly to see them lose all, and that “the King should put them all forever out of his protection!” And with that word, he clapped his fist upon the board<sup>644</sup> with such a fervent zeal that his own protection<sup>645</sup> fell out of his sleeve. Which, when the other perceived, “Brother,” quoth he, “you be not a thief, I think, and therefore I trust it is no pardon<sup>646</sup> that ye have purchased there. You trust, you say, to see the clergy put out of the King’s protection; and I purpose to see you out of the King’s protection ere<sup>647</sup> you and I bargain anymore together.”

And such bankrupts be these men of that good zeal, that gape after the spoil of the spirituality, which, when they have wasted and misspent their own, would then very fain,<sup>648</sup> save for hanging, rob spiritual and temporal too.

THE TWENTY-SECOND CHAPTER 80

The second sort that this Pacifier speaketh of be they that think and say that it were good to take away from the clergy all that is too much, and leave that is sufficient, because that great abundance letteth,<sup>649</sup> they say, and in manner strangeth the love of God. And these that thus say, this Pacifier alloweth<sup>650</sup> for folk wise and discreet. But by what right men may take away from any man, spiritual or temporal, against his will, the land that is already lawfully his own, that thing this Pacifier telleth us not yet. But he will peradventure at another time tell us of some men that lay<sup>651</sup> this reason and that reason for it. But I have heard some good and wise and well-learned men say that all the world can never bring the reason that ever can prove it right. And as for mine own part, like<sup>652</sup> as I have somewhat more largely said in my book of the Supplication of the Souls, if any man would give the counsel to take any man's land or goods from him, pretending<sup>653</sup> that he hath too much, or that he useth it not well, or that it might be better used if some other had it, he giveth such a counsel as he may, when he list<sup>654</sup> — and will peradventure after — stretch a great deal farther than the goods or possessions of only spiritual men.

And where he saith that some say that great abundance doth let and in manner strangle the love of God, that is many times very true: that many men in plenty forget God which<sup>655</sup> in penury run unto him. But this reason runneth out<sup>656</sup> against every kind of men, spiritual and temporal too; and yet are there in both twain some in whom the love of God is neither letted nor strangled therewith, but it is made, by the good use thereof, the matter and occasion of merit. Which, if it might not be, but must needs let and strangle the love of God, then were the reason so strong against all men that no man might without deadly<sup>657</sup> sin keep any abundance in his hands. And then if, to withdraw that inevitable necessity of damnable deadly sin, it were lawful to take as much away from any one man as the remnant that were left him should be but even sufficient, the same reason would, as I say, serve with one little wench<sup>658</sup> farther, to take in like wise away from every other man were he spiritual or temporal, in whom there might be laid appearance of so much abundance that it letted<sup>659</sup> him to love God. For that is, ye wot well, every man bound to do, spiritual and temporal both.

And on the other side, if there be taken from no man anything but from him that hath so much as

no man that hath so much may so love God as he may come to heaven, then shall there be from no man taken anything. For I doubt not but that there are at this day holy saints in heaven, of such as were spiritual and of such as were temporal too, that had while they lived here as great possessions as hath either spiritual or temporal within the realm of England now.

Moreover since this Pacifier accounteth them for “discreet” that, leaving the clergy sufficient, would that all the remnant were taken away from them, because the great abundance letteth them, they say, to love God, it had been well done that he had somewhat declared his mind how little he calleth sufficient, lest that some of his discreet folk would indiscreetly misconstrue that word, and for lack of such favor and pity as himself, ye see well, beareth to the clergy, would leave them too little and call it enough. For if this Pacifier would moderate and measure his sufficiency by the words of Saint Paul, where he saith, “Having meat and drink and wherewith to be covered, let us be content,”<sup>660</sup> except<sup>661</sup> himself that loveth them go farther therein and appoint them their fare<sup>662</sup> and their apparel too, some others haply<sup>663</sup> that love them not so well will devise them a diet as thin as Galen deviseth for him that hath an obstruction in his liver,<sup>664</sup> and because Saint Paul speaketh but of covering, will devise them clothes that shall only cover them and not keep them warm.

Besides this, it seemeth that yet his discreet folk should not, under the name of abundance, take all from the Church that they would take from every man to whom they would leave bare sufficient, but that they rather should, such as they would take from one that hath more than sufficient, divide it among such others of the Church that have less than sufficient. Now, if they should yet besides this (which I ween they should not) find yet a great sum remaining after all the spiritual folk sufficiently provided for, then had it been good that he had yet farther devised how it would please him that his discreets should order the remnant. For though they be, as he taketh them, discreet persons of themselves because they would take away but the great abundance and leave but the bare sufficient, yet their discretion shall do a great deal the better if it like him to give them his discreet counsel too. When it should come to this point, here might peradventure himself and his discreets make us many devices,<sup>665</sup> and ever the more the more indiscreet.

5 I have been within these four or five years—for before, I heard little talking of such manner of devices—but within this four or five years, I have been at such devices in diverse good merry companies, never earnestly talking thereof (for as yet 10 I thank God that of this matter I never heard any such), but for pastime, by way of familiar talking, have I heard diverse, both in hand<sup>666</sup> with prelates and secular priests and religious persons, and talked of their living, and of their learning, and of their 15 livelihood too, and whether themselves were such as it were better to have them or lack them, and then, touching their livelihood, whether it might be lawfully taken from them or not, and if it might, whether it were expedient so to be, and if it so 20 were, then to what use. And in many such merry talkings I have always remembered—and because our communication came sometimes to a much like point, sometimes have I told and rehearsed—the story that Titus Livy<sup>667</sup> telleth of one Pacuvius 25 Calavius the Capuan, in the third book of his third decade<sup>668</sup> that treateth of the Romans' war with Hannibal and the city of Carthage. This Capua was of all Italy the chief city, and of the greatest power save only the city of Rome. In which city, 30 so happed it that the commonalty<sup>669</sup> were fallen in grudge and murmur and at division with the Senate, as this Pacifier saith that the temporalty is here at these days against the clergy. Whereupon this Calavius, being a senator, and nonetheless leaning 35 all unto the people (because he saw them, by sufferance<sup>670</sup> and oversight of the Senate, grown into an unbridled liberty, and, as they must be when they conspire whole together, waxen<sup>671</sup> the more mighty part), studied and bethought himself what means 40 he might invent first to bring the Senate in his danger,<sup>672</sup> and then by some benefit win all their good wills, and yet therewith increase his favor with the people besides. Upon this—being, as it happed, the chief governor of the city for the time—he broke<sup>673</sup> 45 upon a day suddenly to the Senate, and told them that themselves wist<sup>674</sup> well enough what grudge

the people had to them, but the peril and danger that they then presently stood in, that, he said, wist they not. But he knew well that the people intended now after the great overthrow which the Romans had late had at Cannae, to kill up all the senators, and break their league with the Romans, and fall into the party of Hannibal. “Howbeit,” quoth he, “if ye dare put yourselves in my hands, I have devised a way whereby ye shall see me shortly 55 not only save all your lives, but also preserve your state.”<sup>675</sup> And when the senators in that sudden fear agreed to put him whole in trust to order all the matter as he would, he commanded them all suddenly to be locked fast in their council chamber; 60 and, setting armed men at the gate to see that neither any other man should enter in unto them nor any of them come out, he called suddenly to an assembly the whole people of the city, and there said in this wise<sup>676</sup> unto them: 65

The thing that ye have, dear friends, these many days much desired—that ye might once be revenged upon this unhappy Senate, and remove them from the room<sup>677</sup> that by their covetous and cruel dealing have well showed themselves full 70 unmeet<sup>678</sup> to bear the name of fathers unto the people—this thing have I now, by policy,<sup>679</sup> for your sakes peaceably brought into your hands—and that in such wise as ye shall not need to fight therefor, or assault particularly their houses. In 75 expugnation<sup>680</sup> whereof, being, as they would be, fenced with<sup>681</sup> their servants and their friends, yourselves might stand in peril. But I have shut them up yonder together alone by themselves, clean out of armor without aid or any manner<sup>682</sup> 80 defense, where you shall have them all without any man's death or stroke.<sup>683</sup>

At this word, glad was all the people, and, giving him high thanks, would forthwith fain<sup>684</sup> have been upon them. “Sirs, there needeth in this point none 85 haste,” quoth he,

but one thing is there that, if ye thought thereon, ye would, I dare say, do first. For they be the while safe enough, thereas<sup>685</sup> they escape not from you.

But I have ever known you so wise that ye will not, I wot well, set your short present pleasure before your perpetual wealth,<sup>686</sup> which, ye see well, ye should do if ye should live lawless and without a rule; nor no law can serve except there be some governors.<sup>687</sup> And therefore two things must ye do at once: that is to wit, both remove these and also set of yourselves some better men in their places. Wherefore I have brought here their names in a pot. Let them be drawn out, and as they come unto hand, determine your pleasure of<sup>688</sup> their persons, and substitute therewith their successors.

This motion of Calavius was such that either of reason they could not dislike it, or else for shame they would not refuse it. And thereupon out was there drawn a name, at the hearing whereof they cried out, all the company, “An evil and a naughty man!” and bade away with him. “Very well,” quoth Calavius, “whom will you now name to put in his place?” At that they paused a little and began to bethink them.<sup>689</sup> But shortly some named one, and some named another. But with perusing,<sup>690</sup> after this fashion, of a few, there was none that one man named and advanced for good but five for that one rejected him, as either very naughty<sup>691</sup> or at the least more unmeet to take in than he whom they would put out. So that long ere they had perused half, as much as they disliked many of their old, yet found they it so hard a thing to find out the better new that they waxed<sup>692</sup> weary of the seeking. So that Calavius, perceiving them begin in the matter somewhat to stacker and stay,<sup>693</sup> persuaded them easily to concord with those that they had before; and thereupon they left off their election, and let the new-chosen pass, and kept their old senate still.

And surely somewhat like,<sup>694</sup> but not all after this fashion, hath it fared in such good company as it hath happened me to be at communication upon these matters of the clergy. For in conclusion, after many faults laid against the spirituality that is now, and many new devices<sup>695</sup> for their lands, when we came at last unto Calavius’s pageant,<sup>696</sup> and those that found the faults in the body at large in such a large fashion laid forth by them as though there were not one good man among them, when they had the names of this prelate and that prelate recited and rehearsed unto them by row,<sup>697</sup> and were asked, “What say you by<sup>698</sup> him?” and “What by him?” albeit that they did by some of them say they were naught, and that if, like<sup>699</sup> as the Capuans should have changed a senator for a commoner, so if they should for every one of the spirituality take into his place by choice and election some good temporal man, they might for this prelate or that, concerning some of them, shortly make a good change. For some of them thought they such as, for one point or other, they could not lightly find a worse. Yet on the other side again, at some of them they stayed and stackered, and with much work brought forth some at last with whom they might, as they thought, match them, and yet by their own confession no more than match them, and in my mind not so much neither; but like as in some they and I somewhat varied, so in diverse others we were agreed both, that for to make the change, neither could they find their better nor their match neither.

Now whereas we went thus no farther than the prelates, if we should have perused over the whole clergy both religious and seculars, though we might have found out some that both might and gladly would have been changed for the prelates (for I have heard many laymen that would be bishops with a good will), and though we might have also founden enough of those that would match them that are evil and naughty secular priests, and them that are run out of religion too, and that would and were able to match them in their own ways were they never so bad, yet of those that would match the good, as few as some folk would have them seem, it would not, I ween, as the world goeth now, be very easy to find out so many. But as wealthy, and as easy, and as glorious as some say to this Pacifier that religion<sup>700</sup> is, yet if some others should say to them, “Lo, sirs, these folk that are in religion shall out; come you into religion in their steads, and live there better than they do, and you shall have heaven,” they would answer, I fear me, that they be not yet weary of this world.

Then if they were invited into religion on the other fashion, and it were said unto them thus— “Sirs, we will not bid you live so strait<sup>701</sup> in religion as these men should have done; come on and enter, and do but even as they did, and then shall you there have a good easy life and a wealthy, and much worldly praise therewith” — I ween a man should not yet, for all that, get them to go to it. But as easy as we call it, and as wealthy too, and now peradventure when our wives are angry, wish ourselves therein, yet if it were thus offered, we would play as Aesop telleth a fable of a poor old man, which, bearing up a hill a burden of bushes in his neck, for help of his necessity, panting for weariness, in the midway laid down his burden and sat him down and sighed, and waxed so weary of his life that he wished and called for death. Whereupon Death came anon<sup>702</sup> readily toward him, and asked him, “What wilt thou with me?” But when the poor fellow saw him, the lean whoreson, there so ready, “I called you, sir,” quoth he, “to pray you do so much for me as help me up again with this bitched<sup>703</sup> burden, and lay it in my neck.” So ween I that for all our words, if that easy life and wealthy that is in religion were offered us, as weary as we be of wedding, we would rather abide all our old pain abroad than in a cloister take a religious man’s life for ease. So that in conclusion we should be fain<sup>704</sup> either to put worse in their stead or keep our old still, till, as they little and little die and depart, God in like wise little and little, as he hath ever hitherto provided, shall inspire his grace into the breasts of others, and make them fall in devotion and enter into religion, and so succeed in their places.

Now as it fared in our communication by<sup>705</sup> the spiritual persons, so fared it in a manner by the spiritual men’s possessions. Not for that<sup>706</sup> we might not always find others enough content to enter into their possessions, though we could not always find other men enough content to enter in their religions,<sup>707</sup> but for that in devising what way they should be better bestowed, such ways as at the first face seemed very good, and for the comfort and help of poor folk very charitable, appeared after, upon reasoning, more likely within a while to make many beggars more than to relieve them that are already. And some way that appeared at the first to more stand the realm in great stead, and be an increase of the King’s honor, with a great strength for the land and a great surety<sup>708</sup> for the Prince, and a great sparing of the

And to say the truth, much marvel have I to see some folk now so much and so boldly speak of taking away any possessions of the clergy. For albeit that once in the time of the famous prince King Henry the Fourth, about the time of a great rumble that the heretics made, when they would have destroyed not the clergy only, but the King also and his nobility too, there was a foolish bill and a false put into a Parliament or twain,<sup>710</sup> and sped<sup>711</sup> as they were worthy, yet had I never founden in all my time while I was conversant<sup>712</sup> in the Court, of all the nobility of this land, above the number of seven (of which seven there are now three dead) that ever I perceived to be of the mind that it were either right or reasonable, or could be to the realm profitable, without lawful cause to take any possessions away from the clergy which good and holy princes and other devout virtuous people, of whom there be now many blessed saints in heaven, have of devotion toward God given to the clergy to serve God and pray for all Christian souls. And therefore, as for such folk as this Pacifier calleth “discreet” for their discreet invention of taking from the clergy the abundance of their possessions, I never look to see them so discreet as were those men both discreet and devout that gave them.

THE TWENTY-THIRD CHAPTER

Yet putteth this Pacifier a third kind of thinkers, such a kind as I never to my remembrance have heard of before: that is to wit, of such as purposely say evil and openly speak heresy, and for all that think well. And those, he saith, are “politic”<sup>713</sup> which, to pull away riches from the Church, speak against all things that anything bring into it, as against praying for souls in purgatory, granting of pardons,<sup>714</sup> pilgrimages, making of laws, founding of chantries,<sup>715</sup> making of brotherhoods, and many more.

And though they speak against all these things, yet, he saith, they know well enough that all these things be good and may be well used. But because they bring riches into the Church, therefore, he

703 accused 704 forced 705 with regard to 706 for that: because

707 religious orders 708 safety; security 709 monetary burden 710 two 711 fared 712 occupied 713 prudent;

shrewd; crafty 714 indulgences
715 chapels for saying Masses for the dead

saith, though they know them for good and think them good, yet they speak against them all, of policy — not against the abuses only, but also against the very things themselves. For of those that speak 5 against the abuses only, he putteth another sort beside these men whom he calleth, for this point, so politic. And he saith that those that only speak against the abuses do better and have more grace, but yet that excludeth not, ye wot well, but that the 10 others may be good enough, and have grace enough too, though not so much.

Thus hath this Pacifier put three kinds of folk that would have the goods taken from the Church:

The first, of those that would take all and leave 15 nothing. And those men, he saith, have a good “zeal.”

The second, of those that would leave sufficient and take away the remnant. And those men have, he saith, good “discretion.”

The third kind he calleth those which, rather 20 than the Church should have anything, let<sup>716</sup> not to speak against good things. And those men, though they speak openly plat<sup>717</sup> and plain heresy, yet he denieth not to be wise men and use a good “policy.”

But now, whereas they deny purgatory, this is, as 25 methinketh, an evil policy: for withdrawing of offerings from the clergy, to withdraw therewith our alms from the poor lay people too, and yet, that worst is of all, from the seely<sup>718</sup> souls themselves that lie there and piteously cry in pain.

By this policy, we wot well that these politic folk 30 might impugn in general the affection of giving anything in alms. For that affection, ye wot well, bringeth in the year somewhat into some part of the clergy. And well ye wot that since the belief of purgatory and others of those things against which 35 these politic men so speak be plain and open truths revealed by God, and the contrary belief is by the whole Catholic Church plainly determined for heresy; and since men cannot know that a man believeth the truth in his heart if he hold against it
 40 openly with his mouth, and those therefore that speak heresies, every good man that heareth them is bounden to denounce or accuse them, and the bishops are bounden upon their words proved to put them to penance and reform them, which if they 45 refuse or fall in relapse, the bishop is bound to deliver them, and all good temporal governors are then bounden to punish them, if every other man did on all sides the part of a good Christian man, it appeareth that the policy of those whom this Pacifier calleth so politic would within a while prove a 50 poor policy.

Howbeit, what mind this Pacifier hath himself concerning these points, himself declareth that he believeth the right way and the true. Which I am 55 very glad to hear, and for my part, as help me God, I verily<sup>719</sup> trust he feigneth not therein, but as a true Christian man verily saith as he thinketh. And yet is not every man therein of my mind. And therefore it would be wrong if every “some say” and every “some think” should serve to bring a man in hatred or obloquy. For surely some say that they think that, if some men may, as he saith, of policy feign themselves heretics and yet believe full truly, for all that, in their hearts, some one man may much better feign himself, for policy, full Catholic, and yet in 65 his heart believe the while full falsely. But whatsoever some men say or some men think, in that matter I never will think that a man believeth otherwise than he saith he doth but if<sup>720</sup> himself should, by some other words or deeds of his own, declare of his mind the contrary. And as I will not, against a man’s words spoken according to the right faith, think that he believeth wrong, surely so can I not think that he which in his words openly inveigheth 75 against good and faithful things, and despiseth true points of the common-known Catholic faith, doth in his heart secretly think and believe right, but if he were among paynims<sup>721</sup> that would for fear of pain compel him to renay<sup>722</sup> his faith — which were yet in that case damnable to his soul — and therefore is here among Christian men, where no such force compelleth him, but upon his peril forbiddeth him, of very good reason damnable to his body.

THE TWENTY-FOURTH CHAPTER 85

Howbeit, what this good Pacifier, though he believe right himself and plainly protesteth the truth of his belief, yet what he would should be done either with those that against their own wrong words he believeth to believe right in their 90 minds, or with those, either, whom he believeth to believe wrong indeed, I cannot very well gather of his words here. For here he saith of them thus:

And though some men have mistaken themselves in the said articles, yet diverse others have said that if they had been well and charitably handled, they might have been reformed, and peradventure
5 saved in body and in soul.<sup>723</sup>

In these words I find again, good readers, a plain open declaration as, in my mind, that this man believeth in these articles like a true Catholic man. For he confesseth 10 in these words that all those that have died in the contrary belief been perished in body and soul. For he saith that some men say that with good handling “they might have been reformed, and peradventure saved in body and soul.” So that it appeareth by these words that neither himself 15 thinketh, nor hath heard so much as any other men say, but that they be now plainly lost and perished for those heresies. Which is yet another good token that he not only believeth well himself, but also talketh not much, nor hath no such conversation with heretics that they dare well and 20 plainly put him in full trust. For if he were, he should hear them undoubtedly say that those folk be saved souls and holy saints, as Bainham, that was late burned, said by<sup>724</sup> Bayfield, both a heretic and an apostate, that was burned 25 about a year before him.

Howbeit, though they call them saved souls and saints, yet will they say that they be not in heaven.
For there is no soul, they say, but in some place of rest they lie still and sleep full soundly, and sleep 30 shall, they say, till Gabriel’s trump awake them and call them up early to rise and record their appearance before our Savior at the general Day of Doom.<sup>725</sup>

But in good faith this one thing am I sorry to see: that since himself seemeth to me so faithful, 35 and that therefore I cannot persuade unto myself but that in his own heart he loveth and favoreth the clergy — which no man can, as I think, heartily hate but he that hateth also the faith — some of these wily heretics, like the angels of Satan transfiguring 40 themselves into the likeness of angels of light,<sup>726</sup> should so deceive this good man, and so abuse his good gentle nature and simplicity, as to make him with their wily invented figure of “some say,” under a pity pretended<sup>727</sup> toward those heretics that are in 45 their obstinacy perished, set his words in such wise as though his mind were to aggrieve<sup>728</sup> and bring in hatred among the people the name and body of the clergy, by making the people ween that their ordinaries had, with evil and uncharitable handling, been the occasion 50 that those heretics are both in soul and body destroyed, since they might, as is here said under the figure of “some say,” by good and charitable handling of the clergy, have been better reformed, and peradventure in soul and body saved.

Would God these same “some folk” that so have 55 said unto this Pacifier had named him at the leastwise some one that was so evil and so uncharitably handled that the lack of better and more charitable handling hath been the loss of his body and soul. For then might the clergy declare their demeanor toward that man, and then 60 should they perceive by this Pacifier in which part of their dealing good charitable manner lacked. But verily, whomsoever they should have named, I doubt not but those that were the ordinaries in the cause could easily prove that they had used no rigor to him against the law, nor omitted no 65 charitable means unto him that came to their minds while the man lived and the matter in their hands, nor in providing for good exhortation toward his conversion again and his salvation, even till the life left his body.

But now forasmuch as some so say by<sup>729</sup> them concerning some of them that are gone, the clergy would, I ween, be yet glad to hear in what wise manner of charitable fashion 75 this piteous Pacifier would have them handle other heretics hereafter, such as shall be denounced and ex officio brought before them. For albeit that this Pacifier in another place somewhat seemeth to dislike that order, yet I fear me there would, as I shall after show you, many a place in 80 the realm swarm very full ere ever they were brought before the ordinary<sup>730</sup> by the means of accusation.

Howbeit, let us put the example by<sup>731</sup> someone that is likely to be brought and delivered unto the ordinary 85 by the means of the King’s Grace and his Council. I mean John Frith. For he is in prison in the Tower already, taken by the Bishop’s servants, by the aid of the King’s officers at commandment of his Grace and his Council, and so by the King’s officers brought into the Tower, where he remaineth 90 yet; and therefore he shall, I doubt not, be brought, as I said, and delivered unto the ordinary.<sup>732</sup>

728 discredit 729 about

730 ecclesiastical judge 731 concerning 732 John . . . ordinary: Frith was arrested

Now then, if the ordinary knew this good piteous Pacifier, and would, because he seeth his good and charitable mind, desire<sup>733</sup> him of his good advice and counsel, in what wise he might best and most charitably handle him for the saving of his soul and body, the laws of Christ's Church observed, that the saving of him, if he would stick stiff in his obstinacy, should not be the occasion of corrupting and destroying the souls of other men, what counsel would this man give him?

First, if no man would profess himself for his accuser, and yet there would twenty be ready, when they were by commandment of the Court compelled, not to let but depose<sup>734</sup> the truth — that he hath, since he came in the Tower, written afresh against purgatory, and a book that he calleth The Mirror,<sup>735</sup> against religious, advising every man to give none of them nothing, though they be of that religion<sup>736</sup> that nothing have of their own; and twice hath he there in like wise written against the Catholic faith of Christ concerning the Blessed Sacrament of the altar — whether<sup>737</sup> would now this Pacifier: that the ordinary, having good proofs and yet none accuser, should proceed against him ex officio, or else for lack of an accuser let him fair go? If he would he should<sup>738</sup> proceed ex officio — as I think he would think it reason — what should he then do, since all cannot be done in a day? Whether should he let him walk abroad upon his promise to appear again, which Frith were likely to break and get him overseas, or else take sureties bounden for his appearance, as John Purser and some such others were bounden for John Burt, and force<sup>739</sup> not to forfeit their bond for brotherhood, but let him slip aside and never bring him forth, and keep him close<sup>740</sup> among the brethren as the other was kept, till the apostle may make some bishops among the new brethren, and after his new Titus and Timothy established, each in his own see, then the new Paul, this apostle Frith, take shipping<sup>741</sup> at Sandwich and sail into Friesland. Would this Pacifier advise the ordinary thus, or else to keep him in prison, where he should do no hurt, and let the walls and the locks be his sureties for his forthcoming?

Thus far yet, as I suppose, this Pacifier would advise the ordinary to keep Frith fast. But now, when his heresies were laid unto his charge, as for to give counsel to the ordinary to exhort Frith to leave them, this Pacifier, I dare say, shall not need, nor to take him to grace neither, nor to show him great favor upon good tokens of his repentance and amendment. But now if he were one of this Pacifier's politiques, and would say that he believed ever the right way in his own heart contrary to the words that his own hand wrote, but, after the manner that this Pacifier speaketh, he wrote all these heresies of policy, because that by the belief of purgatory, and of the Sacrament of the altar, and of miracles in so many places so plainly showed thereon, he saw that offering and riches came into the clergy, and therefore would say that he must not be taken for a heretic, but for a man wise and politic, what advice would here this Pacifier give his ordinary?

What counsel would he give the ordinary if Frith would make none excuse by policy, but say that he wrote against purgatory, and all religious orders, and the Sacrament of the altar too, for love that he beareth to the truth, and that those heresies be very<sup>742</sup> faith, by which he will abide unto the death? What advice will this Pacifier give the Bishop then? What good and charitable handling will he devise to save his body and soul — specially when he shall see certain letters which some of the brethren let fall of late, and lost them, of likelihood, as some good Kit<sup>743</sup> loseth her keys, by which letters both Tyndale and George Joye write unto Frith and counsel him to stick fast, and Tyndale showeth him that all the brethren look what shall become of him, and that upon his speed<sup>744</sup> hangeth all their hope? I cannot tell what good and charitable handling this Pacifier can devise, but I dare say that there is neither ordinary nor other honest man, spiritual nor temporal, but that he is as sorry as this Pacifier himself to see that young man, or any other, so stubbornly set in such heresies that no man can show him the favor that every man fain<sup>745</sup> would without the displeasure of God and peril of their own souls and many other men's too.

in October 1532. More published the Apology just before Easter in 1533. Frith was indeed subsequently tried and convicted of heresy, and burned at the stake on July 4, 1533. 733 ask 734 let but depose:

THE TWENTY-FIFTH CHAPTER

And upon all these matters there is risen a great opinion in the people, in manner universally, that in punishing and corrections all these persons before rehearsed should have like punishment if 5 spiritual men might have free liberty in that behalf, and that spiritual men would, if they could, as well put them to silence that speak against the abusion or disorder of such things as be before
 10 rehearsed as them that speak against the thing itself.<sup>746</sup>

Those words be not very well spoken of this Pacifier by the people. For if he have spoken with many more than the one-half, and felt their opinions himself, else is it not only against the spirituality spoken very shamefully, but also to the false contrived rebuke of the whole people in manner universally. For since that neither this Pacifier nor any man else can bring forth any one of these heretics that have been by their ordinaries delivered for their obstinacy in the secular hands<sup>747</sup> and burned that have had any wrong done them, or been therein otherwise handled than charity with justice, according to the common laws of all Christ's Catholic 20 Church, and the laws of this realm have required, there is no good man nor reasonable that hath any cause thereby to conceive by<sup>748</sup> the clergy such a malicious foolish suspicion as this Pacifier here untruly layeth unto the whole people of this realm in 30 manner universally when he maketh as though the whole people in manner universally were so malicious and so foolish as—because the clergy, which hath toward many heretics been overmuch favorable, have of necessity been driven to deliver them
 35 to the secular hands and therein have done them right—he maketh as the whole people were in manner universally so mad and malicious as thereupon to take an opinion that to those which are none heretics the clergy would do wrong.

40 Surely in this one point is this book of his the most indifferent that it is in any part that I see therein. For there is no point in all the book wherein it more defameth the spirituality than in this one it defameth in manner all the whole people 45 universally.

But now if he say the people in manner universally think that those which are, as he saith, for lack of good and charitable handling lost and perished in body and soul, had wrong and ought not have been by the clergy delivered to the secular hands, and that therefore the whole people in manner
 50 universally do, and well may, think in their minds that the clergy would in like wise do wrong to others, and bring to like punishment all those persons that anything speak against only the abusions of 55 such things as bring riches into the Church, now cannot this Pacifier thus excuse his words. For he confesseth in his own words that they which thus have been lost and perished, that might, as he saith, with good and charitable handling have been saved, 60 be of those that have mistaken themselves in those articles of purgatory, trentals,<sup>749</sup> obits,<sup>750</sup> and pilgrimages, and have, as himself saith before, spoken against them and despised them; and then had they no wrong. For I am sure there was none of them
 65 but that he was either relapsed or else did of obstinacy stand still in them. And then appeareth it yet again that, in going about to defame the clergy, he doth indeed greatly defame the people, when he saith that because the clergy hath punished them
 70 that have so far mistaken themselves in those articles that they have spoken against those holy things and despised the things themselves, the people would be so far unreasonable as therefore to think that they would punish in like wise all those that
 75 would only speak against the abuses and not against the things. For all the people see, pardie,<sup>751</sup> that the clergy punisheth those that speak against the sacrament of matrimony, and yet they punish not those that speak against the abuses thereof, as adultery, or 80 against those that under the name of matrimony live in sacrilege and incestuous lechery, as Friar Luther doth, and Friar Lambert, and Friar Hussgen, and Otho the Monk, and such others.

And yet if he will go from his own words again, and say now that some of them, that be for lack of 85 good and charitable handling in body and soul so perished, did not mistake themselves at all, nor did not speak against any of the things, but did only speak against the abuses, and that therefore he may, 90 without reproach of the people, well say that the people have an opinion that the clergy would, if

746 CW 9: 179 747 in the secular hands: to the civil authorities 748 about

749 sets of requiem Masses 750 annual memorial Masses for the souls of the dead

751 certainly; "by God" (from French)

they might, have free liberty in like manner to punish all others that would in like manner speak — that is to wit, not against the good and holy things, but against the abuses of them — to this I say yet once
 5 again that he still defameth the people of a great intolerable fault (that is to wit, an unjust and unreasonable judgment) while<sup>752</sup> he saith that they think and believe that the clergy hath done to those men in so great a matter so great wrong, and hitherto not 10 one such wrong proved.

But I shall in this point go yet a little nearer him. Since he speaketh of those that might with charitable handling have been in body and soul saved, it appeareth well, as I have said, that in this piece of his 15 tale he speaketh of those that have not been saved, but in earth here condemned and burned, and in hell damned and there burning still. Now as for any time so late<sup>753</sup> before this brabbling<sup>754</sup> or speech of any division between the spirituality and the temporality that this Pacifier might seem to mean of, I remember none delivered to the secular hands but Sir Thomas Hitton at Maidstone, and Sir Thomas Bilney at Norwich, and one of late at Exeter, and one of late in Lincoln Diocese; and in London here,
 25 Bayfield the Monk, and Tewkesbury the Pouchmaker, and Bainham. Now this will I say: let this Pacifier come forth or, if he be any religious recluse that cannot come abroad, let him appear by attorney. Howbeit,<sup>755</sup> it appeareth that he can be none
 30 such, but must needs be of likelihood some such as goeth much abroad, for else he could not surely tell us of so many “some says,” nor what opinion the whole people of the realm hath in manner universally; and therefore let him come forth and appear
 35 in his own proper person before the King’s Grace and his Council, or in what place he list,<sup>756</sup> and there prove, calling me thereto, that any one of all these had wrong, but if<sup>757</sup> it were for that<sup>758</sup> they were burned no sooner; and because he shall not say that 40 I bid him trot about for nought,<sup>759</sup> this shall I proffer him: that I will bind myself for surety and find him other twain<sup>760</sup> besides, of better substance<sup>761</sup> than myself, that for every one of these whom he proveth wronged, his ordinary, or his other officer by whom the wrong was done, shall give this 45 Pacifier all his costs done about the proof, and a reasonable reward besides. And yet now though no man would give him nothing, it were his part pardie to prove it for his own honesty, since he hath 50 said so far. And this dare I be bold to offer, to see the truth openly proved. After which well proved once to be as he saith, men may be bold to say the thing that they see proved true; and thereupon if they list to cast and suspect some further fear of the like — yea, or of worse, if they will — I will not 55 let<sup>762</sup> them. But without any such thing proved before, there will no reason nor good conscience bear it that we should suspect that our prelates and ordinaries in their judgments against heretics use<sup>763</sup> to do them wrong, since all the laws, both spiritual of the whole Church and temporal of this realm, have ordained full faith and credence to be given to them therein. Which laws, to contrary now there appeareth little cause, considering that the King our sovereign lord that now is, and long mote<sup>764</sup> be,

 60 hath in his time as prudently and as virtuously provided for this realm that it should have such prelates and ordinaries as should, in learning, wisdom, justice, and living, be meet and convenient<sup>765</sup> therefor, as any prince hath (number for number) that hath reigned over this realm, I dare boldly say this 65 hundred years, and should in my mind keep myself a great way within my bounds although I would set another hundred to it. But now letting this piece pass, wherein I might say many things more than I do — and would, save that the brethren would then call me long, and will yet peradventure say that I am 70 scant<sup>766</sup> short enough — let us go farther and speed up this one chapter of his.

THE TWENTY-SIXTH CHAPTER

80 And many other murmurs and grudges besides these that be before rehearsed be among the people, more than I can rehearse now, but yet above all others methinketh that it is most to be lamented and sorrowed that spiritual 85 men, knowing these grudges and murmurations among the people, and knowing also that many laymen have opinion that a great occasion thereof riseth by spiritual men, and that they do

752 when 753 recently 754 quarreling 755 However 756 chooses 757 but if: unless 758 for that: because 759 nothing 760 two 761 wealth

 762 prevent 763 are accustomed

764 may (he) 765 meet and convenient: fit and suitable 766 scarcely no more to appease them, ne<sup>767</sup> to order themselves in no other manner for the appeasing of them, than they do. For all that they do therein, most commonly, is this: they take it that they 5 that find default at<sup>768</sup> such abusions and disorder love no priests; and therefore they esteem that they do of malice all that they do, to destroy the Church, and to have their goods and possessions themselves; and therefore they think it

 10 a good deed to see them punished, so that they shall not be able to bring their malice to effect. And therefore have they punished many persons, which much people have judged them to do upon will,<sup>769</sup> and of no love unto the people. And 15 though spiritual men are bound in this case—for appeasing of these opinions in the people which be so dangerous, as well to spiritual men as to temporal men, that many souls stand in great peril thereby—not only to reform themselves,
 20 and to leave and avoid all things that give occasion to the people so to offend that may by charity be omitted and left, but also to fast, pray, wear the hair,<sup>770</sup> give alms, and to do other good deeds for themselves and for the people, crying continually to our Lord that these divisions may cease,
 25 and that peace and concord may come again into the world, yet it appeareth not that they do so, but that they rather continue still after the old course, pretending<sup>771</sup> by confederacies and worldly policies and strait corrections<sup>772</sup> to rule
 30 the people; and that is greatly to be lamented, and it will be hard for them to bring it so about. But if they would a little meeken themselves, and withdraw such things as have brought the people 35 into this murmur and grudge, they should anon<sup>773</sup> bring a new light of grace into the world, and bring the people to perfect love and obedience to their superiors.

And here methinketh I might say farther in 40 one thing, and that is this: that as long as spiritual rulers will either pretend that their authority is so high and so immediately derived of God that the people are bound to obey them, and to accept all that they do and teach without arguments, 45 resistance, or grudging<sup>774</sup> against them, or that they will pretend that no default<sup>775</sup> is in them, but in the people—and will yet continue still in the same manner, and after the same worldly countenance,<sup>776</sup> as they do now, and have done late time past<sup>777</sup>—the light of grace that is 50 spoken of before will not appear, but that both parties shall walk in this darkness of malice and division, as they have done in time past.<sup>778</sup>

His other murmurs and grudges that he saith
 55 He cannot now rehearse, he rehearseth after<sup>779</sup> many of them in his other chapters, which I will pass over untouched, both for that<sup>780</sup> the more part of them be such as every wise man will, I suppose, answer them himself in the reading, and satisfy his own mind without any need of mine help
 60 therein, and for that some things are there also therein that are very well said, and some also that, be they good or bad, I purpose not to meddle much withal, as<sup>781</sup> are the things that touch any laws or statutes already made, be they of the Church or
 65 of the realm; defend them I am content to do, if I think them good. But on the other side, if I think them naught,<sup>782</sup> albeit that in place and time convenient<sup>783</sup> I would give mine advice and counsel to the change, yet to put out books in writing abroad
 70 among the people against them, that would I neither do myself nor in the so doing commend any man that doth. For if the law were such as were so far against the law of God that it were not possible
 75 to stand with man's salvation, then in that case the secret advice and counsel may become every man, but the open reproof and redargution<sup>784</sup> thereof may not, in my mind, well become those that are no more spiritual than I. And surely if the laws
 80 may be kept and observed without peril of soul, though the change might be to the better, yet, out of time and place convenient to put the defaults of the laws abroad among the people in writing and without any surety of the change, give the people
 85 occasion to have the laws in derision under which they live—namely<sup>785</sup> since he that so shall use<sup>786</sup> to do may sometimes mistake the matter and think the thing not good whereof the change would be worse—that way will I not, as thus advised, neither use myself nor advise no friend of mine to do. And therefore I will, as I say, leave some things of his book untouched, whether he say well or evil. And finally for that<sup>787</sup> the touching of this matter is no

 5 part of my principal intent, but happeneth as an incident to fall in my way — wherein it sufficeth by the consideration of one piece or twain to give men an occasion to look well to the remnant, and let it not overlightly sink deep down into the breast till
 10 it be well chammed<sup>788</sup> and chewed in the mouth, and not only see what he saith, but also, by the wisdom of the reader, consider what may be said against it — and whoso hath wit and readeth it in that wise,<sup>789</sup> shall, I warrant you, soon perceive that 15 mild indifferent<sup>790</sup> book to bear more shrewd<sup>791</sup> store of evil stuff therein than the brethren that boast it would that such good folk should see, as of a good mind meaning none harm ween every-20 thing were well meant that they see fair set out to the show, and soft and smoothly spoken.

THE TWENTY-SEVENTH CHAPTER

Ill will not also stick<sup>792</sup> much upon his high solemn divination wherein he prophesieth that

25 as long as the spiritual rulers will either pretend that their authority is so high and so immediately derived from God that the people are bound to obey them, and accept all that they do and teach, without argument, resistance, or grudge, and that 30 they will pretend that no default is in them, but will yet continue still in the same manner, and the same worldly countenance as they do now and have done in late time past, the light of grace that is spoken of before,<sup>793</sup>

35 The end of this holy sermon is to little purpose. For first as for worldly countenance is among the clergy within these few years not a little abated. Which thing, whoso list<sup>794</sup> with an even eye to look upon it and indifferently consider it shall not fail to 40 perceive. And so there is good hope, if that may help the matter, that then the light of the grace that this gracious Pacifier spoke of before is not now very far behind. And verily for aught<sup>795</sup> that I can see, a great part of the proud and pompous apparel that many 45 priests in years not long past were, by the pride and oversight<sup>796</sup> of some few, forced in a manner against their own wills to wear, was, before his goodly counsel so by this pretty printed book privily given them in their ear, much more, I trow,<sup>797</sup> than the one-half

 50 spent, and in manner well worn out. And I wot well it is worn out with many which intend hereafter to buy no more such again. And for the residue of the countenance, I dare be bold to warrant that I can find of those that most may spend, which,<sup>798</sup> were they sure that it should in this matter do any good,
 55 would be well content to withdraw from all their other countenance the chief part of their movables, and of their yearly livelihood too, and out of hand bestow the one, and with their own hand yearly bestow the other openly among the poor. And I durst
 60 again be bold to warrant that if they so did, even the selfsame folk that now grudge and call them proud for their countenance would then find as great a grudge and call them hypocrites for their 65 alms, and say that they spend upon naughty beggars the good that was wont to keep good yeomen, and that thereby they both enfeeble and also dishonor the realm.

Now as for the other part of his prophecy, concerning that the light of grace that he spoke of be-70 fore will not appear “as long as spiritual rulers will pretend that their authority is so high, and so immediately derived of God that the people are bounden to obey them and to accept all that they do and 75 teach, without arguments, resistance, or grudging against them” — in this part he must first declare whether he mean in these words “their authority” all their whole authority, or their authority in some part. If he mean that they say thus of all their 80 whole authority in everything that they may now at this time lawfully do or say, I answer that they neither pretend, nor never did, all that authority to be given them immediately by God, but have authority now to do diverse things by the grant of kings 85 and princes, as have also many temporal men, and by those grants have such right in those as temporal men have by the like grants in theirs. And therefore in that part the Pacifier is answered.

And then if he mean that the light of his grace that he spoke of before will not appear as long as the prelates pretend that any part of their authority is so high that it is immediately given them of God, then hath this Pacifier lost the light of truth. For the 5 greatest, and highest, and most excellent authority that they have, either God hath given them himself, or else they be very presumptuous and usurp many things far above all good reason. For I have never

 10 read, or at the leastwise I remember not that I have read, that ever any king granted them the authority that now not only prelates but other poor plain priests also daily do take upon them, in ministering the sacraments and consecrating the Blessed Body of Christ, with diverse other authorities besides.

15 But it seemeth to him peradventure that in one point at the leastwise the spirituality is too proud. For he saith they pretend<sup>799</sup> to be obeyed, and have their ordinances and their teachings observed, without resistance, grudge, or arguments to the 20 contrary. Surely in such things as the whole clergy of Christendom teacheth and ordereth in spiritual things—as be diverse of those laws which this Pacifier in some places of this book toucheth, being made against heretics, and albeit that they be 25 and long have been through the whole corps of Christendom, both temporalty and spirituality, by long usage and custom ratified, agreed, and confirmed, yet he layeth<sup>800</sup> some lack in them, calling them very sore<sup>801</sup>—in those things I say that, since
 30 I nothing doubt in my mind but in that congregation to God’s honor graciously gathered together, the good assistance of the Spirit of God is according to Christ’s promise as verily present and assistant as it was with his blessed apostles, men ought,
 35 with reverence, and without resistance, grudge, or arguments, to receive them.<sup>802</sup> And if a provincial council err, there are in Christ’s Church ordinary ways to reform it. But in such things as any spiritual governors, after<sup>803</sup> a lawful order and form, devise for the spiritual weal<sup>804</sup> of their souls that are in their charge, and which things are such as good folk may soon perceive them for good, in these things at the leastwise should the good not give ear to the bad folk and froward,<sup>805</sup> that against the best thing 40 that can be devised can never lack a fond<sup>806</sup> froward argument. And therefore not only the apostles, being diverse assembled together with the Church in their Council holden at Jerusalem, did in those laws that they there devised and promulgated among the 50 gentiles that were in diverse countries far off converted unto Christ, did with authority write unto them, “These things have seemed both to us and to the Spirit of God necessary for you to keep,”<sup>807</sup> lest some stubborn fools would peradventure be bold with froward arguments and reasoning to resist it,

 55 but Saint Paul also by himself when he devised unto the Corinthians certain good laws and orders concerning their order that he would have them keep in the church in time of God’s service<sup>808</sup>—lest such as would fain<sup>809</sup> with disputing against good order be taken and reputed for wise should, with some problem pulled out of a penny pitcher, inveigle<sup>810</sup> and corrupt the company, whom far the feebler reason may draw to the worse part for affection unto lewd liberty—he finally, besides the reasons that he laid
 60 for his law, did put them to silence with his authority and, forbidding them to reason or dispute there-against but obey it, said, against all such arguments and such chop-logics<sup>811</sup> against good rules, “If any man will be contentious in this matter, let him well
 70 know that we have no such guise<sup>812</sup> or custom, nor the churches of God.”<sup>813</sup>

But now will this Pacifier peradventure say that he neither speaketh nor meaneth of such things as the spirituality doth or saith that is good, but that 75 the light of grace will not appear as long as the prelates pretend that their authority is so high and so immediate of God, that the people are bound to obey them and to accept all that they do and teach, without arguments, resistance, 80 or grudging,

so that he hath circumspectly for the nonce<sup>814</sup> qualified and moderated his tale with this word “all”: that the prelates should not pretend to be obeyed in things as well bad as good. Who heard ever the prelates of this realm pretend this, that they should be 85 obeyed in all things were the things bad or good? I am very sure that ever hitherto they have professed the contrary, and not letted<sup>815</sup> to say that if ever any prelate of this realm—yea or the most part of them, 90 yea, or all the whole many—were so far fallen from God as to preach the contrary of our old known

Catholic faith—as, for example, that there were no purgatory after this world; or that it were not lawful to pray to our blessed Lady or other holy saints; or to preach that there is yet never a saint in heaven; but that all souls lie still and sleep; or to preach against penance, as Tyndale doth, that is as loath, good tender pernel,<sup>816</sup> to take a little penance of the priest as the lady was to come anymore to disciplining<sup>817</sup> that wept, even for tender heart two days after when she talked of it, that the priest had on Good Friday with the disciplining rod beaten her hard upon her lily-white hands—whoso would, I say, preach any of these heresies, or that in the Blessed Sacrament of the altar were not the very Body and very Blood of Christ, but as Frith teacheth nothing but wine and bread, or else as Tyndale jesteth, starch instead of bread, though there would hereafter (which shall, I trust, never happen) all the prelates in this realm fall thereto and preach the same, yet all the prelates hitherto plainly do preach and teach that no layman should then believe them.

And therefore like<sup>818</sup> as if the prelates did pretend<sup>819</sup> the thing that this Pacifier speaketh of, then were his aforesaid words well and wisely tempered and circumspectly spoken, so while they neither pretend that thing now, nor never herebefore did, there is little wit in those words. For now doth all his tale amount unto no more but that the light of grace will never appear as long as the prelates do the thing that they neither do nor never did. Is not this therefore, good readers, by this good Pacifier brought unto a wise conclusion?

THE TWENTY-EIGHTH CHAPTER

Now where he most lamenteth that the clergy doth no more to appease these grudges of the temporalty toward them, and after, he preacheth to them holily what things they should do that they do not—that is to wit, forbear such things as he spoke of before, whereby he specially meaneth, as both before and in diverse places after appeareth, the evil and uncharitable handling of heretics, whereof the man hath nothing proved—but also that they should do things which, he saith, men see them not do (that is to say, give alms, and wear hair,<sup>820</sup> and fast, and pray, that this division may cease), now that all the spiritual men do not so, that is very true. And it is as true, I trow,<sup>821</sup> that this thousand years was never the time that all so did. And therefore if that thing cause and keep in<sup>822</sup> this division, it must have been a thing of a thousand years old. But I think that many of them do all these things which this Pacifier preacheth to have done. For I am sure that though some do not their part therein, yet among the spirituality there is both giving of great alms, and wearing of hair, and fasting, and praying for peace. But whether they take this division to be so great and so universal as this Pacifier speaketh of, that can I not tell; and peradventure they do not. And whether they do or no, surely I do not. Nor whether they pray for the pacification of this division in all such manner wise<sup>823</sup> as the thing requireth, that I cannot tell, but there may be peradventure therein some oversight upon their part. For if they leave nothing unprayed-for that may pertain to the pacification of this division, then must they peradventure put into their service (both Matins,<sup>824</sup> Mass, and Evensong)<sup>825</sup> some special collect,<sup>826</sup> and therein pray God that it may please him that the people may perceive the subtle sleights of the devil, and some others of his limes,<sup>827</sup> in many parts of this book of this pacification; which things peradventure the compiler perceived not himself, but was therein of simplicity by some subtle shrew<sup>828</sup> deceived.

THE TWENTY-NINTH CHAPTER

But this Pacifier, perceiving that what one man doth in secretness, another cannot see, is therefore bold to say they do not all those things which he would have them do: that is to wit, fast, and pray, wear hair, and give alms. For, he saith, “that they do all these things it appeareth not.”

As for praying, it appeareth pardie<sup>829</sup> they do. And that so much they daily pray as some of us laymen think it a pain once in a week to rise so soon from sleep, and some to tarry so long fasting as on the Sunday to come and hear out their Matins. And yet is not the Matins in every parish, neither, all-thing<sup>830</sup> so early begun nor fully so long in doing as it is in the Charterhouse,<sup>831</sup> ye wot well. And yet at our sloth and gluttony that are lay people, this Pacifier can wink and feign himself asleep. But that 5 the clergy prayeth not, that can he shortly spy, as soon as their lips leave stirring.

Howbeit, because he is peradventure of the clergy himself, therefore lest he should seem partial to his own party, he rather speaketh of their defaults than 10 ours, wherein I will not much strive with him. But surely as he may be bold to preach, being a priest, so if I were a priest too, I would be bold to preach thus much again to him: that for any winning of the gloss<sup>832</sup> and fame of indifferency,<sup>833</sup> though he leave 15 the faults of us lay people untouched, yet of his own party, the clergy, for no laymen's pleasure he never should say more than truth.

For now as touching of alms, is there none given, troweth he, by the spirituality? If he say, as he saith 20 here, that it appeareth not that they do give alms, I might answer again that they follow therein the counsel of Christ, which saith, "Let not thy left hand see what thy right hand doth,"<sup>834</sup> as I might in praying have laid<sup>835</sup> those other words of Christ:
 25 "Thou, when thou wilt pray, enter into thy chamber and shut the door, and pray to thy Father privily."<sup>836</sup> But likewise as God, for all that counsel, was content that men should both pray and give to the 30 needy, and do other works, both of penance and of charity, openly abroad in company where there be no desire of vainglory, but that the people, by the sight thereof, may have occasion to give therefor laud and glory to God,<sup>837</sup> so dare I boldly say that, as they both secretly and openly too, do use 35 and accustom to<sup>838</sup> pray so do they both secretly and openly too, give no little alms in the year, whatsoever this Pacifier say. And I somewhat marvel that since this Pacifier goeth so busily abroad that there is no "some say" anywhere almost in all the whole 40 realm but that he heareth it and can rehearse it—I marvel, I say, not a little that he neither seeth nor heareth any "some say" that there is in the spirituality given anything in alms. I use not much myself to go very far abroad, and yet I hear some say that 45 there is; and I see sometimes myself so many poor folk at Westminster at the doles, of whom, as far as ever I heard, the monks use not to send away many unserved, that myself for the press of them have been fain<sup>839</sup> to ride another way.

But one answered me to this once, and said that 50 it was no thanks to them, for it was lands that good princes have given them. But as I then told him again,<sup>840</sup> it were then much less thanks to them that would now give good princes evil counsel for to take it from them.

And also if we call it no giving of alms by them because the lands whereof they give it other good men have given them, whereof will you have them give alms? For they have none other.

 Another thing also which this Pacifier seemeth to dispraise under the name of proud worldly countenance,<sup>841</sup> if men were as ready in a deed of his<sup>842</sup> own nature indifferent to construe the mind
 65 and intent of the doer to the better part as they be of their own inward goodness to construe and report it to the worse, then might I say that the same thing which they call the proud worldly countenance, they might and would call a full charitable 70 alms: that is to wit, the right honest finding<sup>843</sup> and good bringing up of so many temporal men in their service, which,<sup>844</sup> though they be no beggars, yet might peradventure the great part of them go beg
 if they found<sup>845</sup> them not, but sent them abroad to seek themselves a service.<sup>846</sup>

And like as if you would give a poor man some money because he needeth and yet would make him work therefor in your garden lest he should by your alms live idle and wax<sup>847</sup> a loiterer, the labor that he 80 doth taketh not away the nature and merit of your alms, no more it maketh the finding<sup>848</sup> of servants none alms though they wait on the finder and do him service in his house. And of all alms, the chief is to see them well brought up, and well and honestly guided. In which point, though neither party 85 do fully their duty, yet I suppose in good faith that the spirituality goeth in that point, which is no small alms, rather somewhat afore us than anything drag behind us.

THE THIRTY-FIRST CHAPTER

Then followeth their fasting, which thing the spirituality doth, as I suppose — all such as keep still the old Christian faith, and fall not unto these new heresies.

But this Pacifier findeth a fault, and rehearseth out of Jean Gerson, that the clergy keepeth not now the law by which it was ordained that the clergy should keep a longer Lent than they now do. And would God, as Saint Paul saith,<sup>849</sup> that both they and we could and would every day. But this Pacifier, that is so well seen in the laws of the Church, seeth well enough that the universal custom to the contrary dischargeth the bond<sup>850</sup> of that law, though peradventure it discharged not them that first began the breach whereby the custom grew. For as for fasting, the custom of the country may — either to the bond or to the discharge and interpretation of the laws made therefor — the custom, I say, may do much, as Saint Augustine showeth in more places than one. For if it were otherwise, then fasted almost no man any fast at all at this day while we dine at noon. For the very<sup>851</sup> fast was of old, as both by the Scripture<sup>852</sup> and holy writers appeareth, to forbear their meal till night, which is, as ye see, all changed. And the Church, to condescend unto our infirmity, hath been fain<sup>853</sup> therefore to say in Lent their Evensong before noon, and besides the natural days, to devise us new days ex fictione juris,<sup>854</sup> that we should at the least have Evensong in the Lenten fast before we fall to meat.<sup>855</sup> And yet we keep not that neither. But as an Almain<sup>856</sup> of mine acquaintance, when I blamed<sup>857</sup> him lately for not fasting upon a certain day, answered me, “Fareto<sup>858</sup> sould te laymen fasten? Let te priester fasten,”<sup>859</sup> so we begin, God wot, to fast full little for our own part, but bid the priester go fasten. And where<sup>860</sup> ourselves would for our own part be fain<sup>861</sup> that the Lent were two weeks less, yet would we that for the clergy the Lent were one week longer. But some of them toss it from themselves as fast, and send it to the friars. And verily religious<sup>862</sup> folk use, I trow,<sup>863</sup> both long

Lents and Advent too, and some of them diverse other fasts besides, and they be pardie<sup>864</sup> a great part of the spirituality.

THE THIRTY-SECOND CHAPTER

Then preacheth this Pacifier yet farther, that the clergy should wear hair. He is surely somewhat sore<sup>865</sup> if he bind them all thereto, but among them I think that many do already — and some whole religion<sup>866</sup> doth. But yet saith this Pacifier that it doth not appear that they do so. Ah, well said. But now if all the lack stand in that point, that such holiness is hid, so that men may not see it, it shall be from henceforth well done for them, and so they will do, if they be wise, upon this advertisement<sup>867</sup> and preaching of this good Pacifier, come out of their cloisters, every man into the marketplace, and there kneel down in the cannell<sup>868</sup> and make their prayers in the open streets, and wear their shirts of hair in sight upon their cowls;<sup>869</sup> and then shall it appear, and men shall see it. And surely for their shirts of hair in this way were there none hypocrisy, and yet were there also good policy, for then should it not prick them.

THE THIRTY-THIRD CHAPTER

But as for all this Pacifier’s preaching, the spirituality may be content to take in good worth.<sup>870</sup> For peradventure if he were known, he were such one as to preach to all the spirituality might well become his personage; and yet<sup>871</sup> if he be but a simple parson indeed, yet the spirituality may meeken themselves according to his good counsel, and admit his wholesome admonitions. But surely this one thing, though the spirituality bear it and take it well in worth, methinketh yet that every good temporal man may very much mislike: that this Pacifier, in the beginning of this his holy preaching, preacheth upon them to their sore<sup>872</sup> slander, first with an untrue surmise grounded upon imagination, and after with a very plain open lie, neither an idle lie nor of any good purpose (of which two kinds of lying Saint Augustine admitteth neither nother<sup>873</sup> in folk

5 of the perfection that this Pacifier, by his preaching used with such authority toward all the spirituality, should seem to be), but a lie very pernicious, which is one of the things that least can become any good Christian man.

10 For first he saith that all that the spirituality doth to the appeasing of the people is most commonly this: that they take it that they that find default at abusions and disorder of the spirituality love no priests, and therefore they esteem that they do it of malice, all that

15 they do, to destroy the Church.<sup>874</sup>

This is a goodly false surmise, grounded, as I said, upon a charitable imagination. But for all this, though good temporal men be evil-content with such as are in the spirituality naught,<sup>875</sup> with whom the good folk of the spirituality be as evil-content<sup>876</sup> as they, yet I verily trust for all this, as I say, that not the temporality nor any one good temporal man, is, for them that are naught among the spirituality, so displeased and angry against the spirituality—

25 that is to wit, against the corps and body thereof—that they should greatly need to be appeased, nor do not lay the faults of naughty spiritual persons to the rebuke of the whole spirituality, no more than they would think it reason that the strangers of other realms so should lay the faults of evil temporal folk here to the rebuke of the whole temporality, that they should grudge and say shrewdly by us for them.<sup>877</sup>

35 Now if this Pacifier will say that it is not like, and will say that we be not suitly<sup>878</sup> the temporality and spirituality of this realm, but that we be much better for our part than the spirituality be for theirs: the temporality shall not be dispraised for<sup>879</sup> me. For I trust that, though in respect of<sup>880</sup> the goodness that God's benefits unto man requireth of men again,<sup>881</sup> and in respect of the constancy and perseverance in virtue that men should hold fast and keep, there are few or none good in neither nother party, yet in such kind of goodness as the frailty of our nature suffereth<sup>882</sup> in this world—now up, now down, now falling by sin and now rising again by grace—the temporality is good, I trust, and the spirituality both, for all that there lacketh not a sort of some such as are very desperate devilish wretches in both, as no man doubteth but there was a very good Church of Christ in his blessed apostles' days, and yet were there even then many full very naught and stark heretics too therein.

And as for the difference in goodness between them and us, God knoweth the better and the worse both. But strangers of other countries that come hither and see both—saving some that have come both out of France and Flanders, and have here been put in trouble by the spirituality for bringing in of Luther's Gospel—other strangers else, I say, when they have considered the spirituality of this realm, and compared them in their minds not only with the temporality of the same, but also with the spirituality of their own countries, have said that our spirituality may without any special reproach show their faces among other folk. And therefore, that the whole body of the spirituality of this realm is so far fallen in the grudge and indignation of the whole temporality, as this Pacifier speaketh, I neither see cause why it should<sup>883</sup> so nor yet believe that it is so, nor think it either good or honorable for this realm that other realms should ween it were so.

But whereas this Pacifier speaketh of appeasing, I pray God that some of the spirituality have not in some things gone about overmuch to appease that sort of people by whose means they have thought that all their disease<sup>884</sup> hath come—those folk, I say, of whom by good information they have had detected<sup>885</sup> unto them for very stark<sup>886</sup> heretics indeed; whom, if, for any fear of such other folk's false suspicion springing upon such slanderous lies as this Pacifier speaketh of and groundeth his conclusions upon, the clergy begin to spare, and for any such causes begin to slack, and be the more remiss in the calling, attaching,<sup>887</sup> and examining, and of the further ordering<sup>888</sup> of heretics, God will not fail to make fall in<sup>889</sup> their necks the double slander of that from which they flee. For when they wax<sup>890</sup> so fainthearted in his great cause of repressing of God will then make them fall into the more slan-

 5 the less. For instead of the false slander of evil men and heretics that they fear in the pursuing, God will send them a true slander, and make them be de-famed among good men and Catholics, for their slack and remiss handling. And further, if they 10 fall into the folly that the prophet reproveth, and cease to call upon God for strength, and then tremble for dread where there is no peril,<sup>891</sup> and for any dread of men (which, if they not only would slander them, but beat them and kill them too, can yet 15 kill but the body and then have spit all their poison) would forget the fear, God (which, when he hath slain the body, may send the soul into everlasting fire), if (which our Lord forbid) any bishop fall in this fear and cowardice of faint heart that, for any 20 worldly fear, they suffer<sup>892</sup> to be blown out the light of his lantern of faith, he will not fail to make fall upon them the terrible communication and threat that the Spirit speaketh of in the Apocalypse unto the Bishop of Ephesus: “I will come and remove thy 25 candlestick out of his place.”<sup>893</sup>

THE THIRTY-FOURTH CHAPTER

Now where this Pacifier here surmiseth that the spirituality doth most commonly nothing else but maliciously misconstrue the minds, and there-30 fore maliciously persecute and pursue the bodies of all them that find default at their disorder and abu-sions, the untruth of this surmise well and plainly appeareth by this that every man daily heareth: that there is not in all the clergy any man that useth<sup>894</sup> to 35 preach the Word of God but that, as he toucheth the faults of the temporalty, such as he seeth in that audience meetly<sup>895</sup> to be spoken of, so toucheth he in like wise the faults of the spirituality, and is for his so doing not hated of<sup>896</sup> the spirituality no more 40 than of the temporalty, but well commended of<sup>897</sup> both. But of truth, he that would either upon the spirituality alone or upon the temporalty alone, or upon any one part of either the one or the other— as of only kings, or only dukes, or only lords, or only gentlemen, or only men of law, or only merchants— 45 make his whole sermon when that one part only were not his whole audience, and would by<sup>898</sup> that part among all folk say many shrewd<sup>899</sup> things by manner of exhortation to the amending, though evil folk and malicious would have a pleasure to 50 hear it, yet would no good folk and indifferent<sup>900</sup> think that he did well, and specially if he would use that manner where himself pretended<sup>901</sup> that all the remnant of his audience were in grudge and division already against that one part whose faults and 55 vices all his whole sermon holily putteth in all the people’s ears to mitigate their hatred with, and with such preaching so to make the peace in like manner wise<sup>902</sup> as if he found a corner of his neighbor’s house burning, he would of great love and policy 60 lay on faggots<sup>903</sup> and gunpowder to put out the fire.

THE THIRTY-FIFTH CHAPTER

Now where this Pacifier, upon that misimagined surmise, goeth on farther and saith that because the clergy so misconstrueth the minds of all 65
 those that find fault at their disorder and abusions, therefore they think it a good deed to see them punished, and they have therefore punished many persons, which much people have judged them to do upon will<sup>904</sup> and not of no love to the 70 people<sup>905</sup>

— in these words how charitably this Pacifier meant,
 I cannot tell; but either by malice or oversight, either by default<sup>906</sup> of himself or craft of some sub-75 tle shrew, these words are as evil and as maliciously written as anyone that would fain<sup>907</sup> falsely defame the clergy could imagine or devise.

For here he saith that because they have (as himself beareth them in hand)<sup>908</sup> conceived a false sus-80 picion against all those that find fault at their mis-order and abusions, therefore they not only have persecuted and punished many persons, but also think their wrongful persecution and unrighteous punishment well done. What can be worse done

than this? And therefore, as this doing were the worst that could be, if it were true, so is this saying the very worst that can be since it is very false.

And in these words the figure of “some say” will not well serve him; and yet in it cometh here also, much augmented and increased, in that he saith not that “some men” so “say,” but that “much people” so “judgeth.” Howbeit, as I said, this figure will not serve him here. But he playeth like a wily thief that, because he would not be known, would wear a visor, and yet, forgetting himself, would first come forth barefaced, and when every man had seen him and marked him well, would then put on his visor apace,<sup>909</sup> and cover his visage to walk away unknown. Even thus wisely, lo, playeth this Pacifier here. For first he saith as of himself that the clergy hath punished many persons “therefor”: that is to wit, for the evil and false suspicion that they have conceived against all those that find fault in their disorder and abusions. And when he hath thus said as of himself, and thereby well showed himself, then, to cover and color<sup>910</sup> it with, he saith that “much people” “judgeth” so. And therefore his whole tale amounteth unto no more but that himself first affirmeth it, and after confirmeth his affirmation by the pretense<sup>911</sup> that much people judgeth the same; of which “much people” he nameth yet never one, nor proveth that much people so doth, nor showeth cause wherefore either much people or little people, or any one person, so should, but bringeth forth a bare surmise in such wise imagined against the clergy as every man that list<sup>912</sup> to lie may soon imagine in some other matter against any temporal men.

But as for his “much people,” I set not much by.<sup>913</sup> For much people may sometimes believe some one man’s lie. And against his much people—if there were much of them that so judge before the proof, and fish before the net, and set the cart before the horse, as I ween<sup>914</sup> there is not—yet is there against them much other people more wise in that point, and more circumspect, which,<sup>915</sup> till they see such an evil tale proved true, will either of indifferency keep themselves in a stay and suspend their sentence<sup>916</sup> for the season, or else, of a good mind, rather for the while think and believe the contrary.

pass, I would now demand of him how he proveth this abominable fault that he layeth here to<sup>917</sup> the spirituality himself, where he saith plainly that they have punished many persons “therefor”—that is to wit, for the thing that he there hath rehearsed—which is, ye wot well, because they have, he saith, conceived a false suspicion against them for finding default at their disorder and abusions, and take it as though they loved not the clergy, but of malice would destroy the Church and have their goods and possessions themselves. Now if the clergy have therefor punished many persons—because the same persons have only spoken against their disorder and abusions, and that the clergy have therefore misconstrued their minds and imagined that they would destroy the clergy for their possessions (which those other folk that spoke against their disorder went about with those words to get from the clergy to themselves)—if the clergy did, I say, for this cause of their own false imagined suspicion, punish those many persons that this Pacifier speaketh of, what thing in this world could they do that were worse? And therefore since that saying against the clergy is an intolerable defamation but if<sup>918</sup> that be true, I ask this Pacifier by what means he proveth it true.

And first to show that in some part at the least his words appear false, every man knoweth that some of those that have been punished have been such as neither, if the clergy lost their lands, should have any part thereof themselves, and were of such well-known naughtiness and lewd living besides that no good man could think it likely that such folk as they were should do it for any devotion—as was Sir Thomas Hitton, that was waxen a joiner,<sup>919</sup> and in many a day neither said Matins nor Mass, but raged and railed against the Blessed Sacrament; and Blomfield,<sup>920</sup> the apostate that was abjured<sup>921</sup> in London, and after railed against all religions<sup>922</sup> at Ipswich, and thereupon taken and imprisoned at Norwich; and Bayfield, the monk and apostate that was, as an abjured, and after perjured and relapsed heretic, well and worthily<sup>923</sup> burned in Smithfield. These, with diverse such others as have been punished for heresy, have been none such as the clergy needed to punish them for fear that they should get from them any part of their lands to themselves, nor

912 wants 913 set not much by: value alleges here against 918 but if: unless 919 that . . . joiner: who had become a cabinet maker 920 William Blomfield, a Benedictine monk 921 caused to recant 922 religious orders 923 deservedly were of such wisdom, learning, nor virtue neither that the clergy could fear that any men of wit or of authority would anything regard their words, but only that<sup>924</sup> the clergy feared: that by their means 5 might grow the loss and destruction of many light persons' souls.

For if this Pacifier will say that the clergy feared lest those folk, and many such other like, should conspire and gather together, and pull all away from 10 them by force, I cannot say nay but<sup>925</sup> such a thing might indeed by long sufferance<sup>926</sup> come about as well in this land as it hath in others. But then if the clergy feared that thing, they feared for more than themselves. For surely if such thing should fortune, 15 as I trust it never shall, those folk would not take only from the clergy, but, among others from some of their own lay brethren too, such as have aught<sup>927</sup> to lose.

But this Pacifier will peradventure say that though 20 such manner folk as evil priests and apostates that the clergy have punished be none of those that they punished for that cause, but because they were heretics indeed, yet many others have they punished for that cause: that is to wit, because they misconstrued
25 their minds and reckoned them for enemies to the clergy, for only finding of faults at the disorder and abusions of the clergy. And he will say, as he saith, that not only himself saith that the clergy have punished many persons therefor, but that also much
30 people (though they say not so far as he saith — that is to wit, that they punished them “therefor”) will yet say that they punished them rather of will<sup>928</sup> than of love to the people. Well, yet the same much people, if this Pacifier have heard them so say, though 35 their so saying be grounded but upon imagination and guessing at the secrets of other men's minds (as his own imagination is), yet judge they not so evil<sup>929</sup> as himself doth. For if they judge in that punishment no more but less love to the people than desire 40 to punishment, they judge not yet that the punishers did the parties wrong, as this Pacifier doth himself, that saith the clergy misconstrued their minds and, upon such mistaking of their minds for only speaking against their disorder and abusions, did there-45 fore punish them.

And therefore letting, as I said before, his much people pass by about their other business, I ask this Pacifier himself, since he saith that the clergy hath for that cause “punished many,” what number is the 50 least that he calleth many? For though very few be overmany to be so wrongfully mishandled and punished for only speaking against disorder and abusions, yet evermore this word “many” must needs import and signify some greater number pardie<sup>930</sup> 55 than one or two or three.

And over<sup>931</sup> this, because the matter whereupon this Pacifier bringeth it in is for a cause of a great and “in manner universal” grudge and division
60 now of late (as he saith) sprung up and grown between the spirituality and the temporalty, these “many” persons that he speaketh of, which<sup>932</sup> have been so late,<sup>933</sup> for only speaking against disorder and abusions, punished, must needs be so many as that there have been some such so punished almost 65 in every diocese. For else he plain reproveth his own process,<sup>934</sup> and excuseth the clergy himself unaware, and layeth no little fault in the temporalty, if for the wrongful demeanor of one bishop or twain in one person or twain, they would bear a universal grudge 70 against all the remnant.

Now to prove to what pass<sup>935</sup> this Pacifier could bring his process of his many persons so sore<sup>936</sup> mishandled and punished for only speaking against disorder and abusions of the clergy, let this Pacifier peruse and rehearse<sup>937</sup> by name all the dioceses
75 of England and Wales therewith, and I ween verily<sup>938</sup> that, except London and Lincoln, he shall scant<sup>939</sup> in any one of all the remnant find punished for heresy four persons in five years, and in the more part of them, not five in fifteen years, nor delivered into the 80 secular hands, in the most part of them, any one in twenty years. And then if this be thus, although<sup>940</sup> (which I trow<sup>941</sup> no man thinketh) of all those that in all the other dioceses have been punished were wronged, every one, yet were not so few likely to 85 have made so great a universal grudge as this Pacifier speaketh of. For I suppose no man doubteth but that, by one occasion and other, more men than so many have mishapped to be in less space<sup>942</sup> mispunished in so much space of the land by temporal men;
90 and yet hath there not grown any universal grudge or division against any part of the people thereby.

924 what 925 say nay but: deny that 926 allowance 927 anything 928 of verily: believe truly 939 hardly 940 even if 941 trust 942 length of

Let us now then come to those two dioceses of London and Lincoln, and of those twain, first to speak of Lincoln. As great a diocese as it is, and as many shires as it hath within it, yet have I not heard 5 of late many punished for heresy among them all. But about a ten-year ago, to my remembrance, there were in that diocese about twelve or fourteen abjured in one town, and at that time every man that I heard speak thereof, either in the Court or else-
 10 where, appeared very glad that such a bed of snakes was so found out and broken. For then were there at that time no pacifiers to put forth books and lament such divisions, with laying for a cause of the grudge that many persons were mishandled and punished
 15 for only speaking against the disorder and abusions of the clergy. But now every one that is punished anywhere is enough for a matter of a lamentable book of Division, that may, to pacify the grudge ere it begin, use a figure of “some say,” and “they say,”
 20 and “many say,” and “much people saith,” and “many men think,” and such other, and therewith inveigle<sup>943</sup> the reader, and make some good folk ween that right were wrong and every one man a hundred.

But now come I to the Diocese of London, in which, though there have been somewhat more ado 25 in these matters, there is no great marvel, since unto this diocese there is so great resort and confluence, not only from other parts of this realm, but also from other lands. And yet even here, of all that hath 30 been punished in this diocese, either in the County of Essex (for as for in Middlesex, I remember none) or in the City itself, either of residents therein or of resorters<sup>944</sup> thereto, Englishmen or strangers,<sup>945</sup> since this Pacifier affirmeth that “many persons” be 35 punished by the clergy for the only speaking against their abusions and disorder, and of those that have been punished, either right or wrong, far the most part have been here (double and treble, I trow, to all the remnant of the whole realm), and this is here
 40 next at hand, whereby the proofs<sup>946</sup> of all such mishandling may here with least labor and charge<sup>947</sup> be brought forth, and the truth most easily tried, let this Pacifier, of those many mishandled and wrong-45 punished persons that he speaketh of, come forth and here prove us some. Let him prove twenty, let him prove twelve, let him prove ten, let him prove six, let him prove twain; or, for very shame, after such a great word of “so many,” let him prove some one at the least. But surely I suppose he shall never 50 be able to do that.

THE THIRTY-SIXTH CHAPTER

But I suppose in good faith that this Pacifier hath, of some facility<sup>948</sup> of his own good nature, been easy to believe some such as have told 55 him lies, and hath been thereby persuaded to think that many other folk said and knew the thing that some few told him for very truth. And surely they that are of this new brotherhood be so bold and so shameless in lying that whoso shall hear them speak 60 and knoweth not what sect they be of shall be very sore abused<sup>949</sup> by them.

Myself have good experience of them. For the lies are neither few nor small that many of the blessed brethren have made, and daily yet make, by<sup>950</sup> me.

Diverse of them have said that of such as were in 65 my house while I was Chancellor, I used to examine them with torments, causing them to be bounden to a tree in my garden, and there piteously beaten.

And this tale had some of those good brethren so caused to be blown about that a right worshipful<sup>951</sup> 70 friend of mine did of late, within less than this fortnight, tell unto another near friend of mine that he had of late heard much speaking thereof.

What cannot these brethren say, that can be so shameless to say thus? For of very truth, albeit that 75 for a great robbery, or an heinous murder, or sacrilege in a church (with carrying away the pyx with the Blessed Sacrament, or villainously casting it out), I caused sometimes such things to be done
 80 by some officers of the Marshalsea,<sup>952</sup> or of some other prisons, with which ordering<sup>953</sup> of them by their well-deserved pain, and without any great hurt that afterward should stick by them, I found
 85 out and repressed many such desperate wretches as else had not failed to have gone farther abroad, and to have done to many good folk a great deal 90 much more harm; yet though I so did in thieves, murderers, and robbers of churches—and notwithstanding also that heretics be yet much worse than all they—yet, saving only their sure keeping, I never did else<sup>954</sup> cause any such thing to be done to 943 deceive 944 visitors 945 foreigners 946 witnesses 947 expense

948 pliancy 949 misled; deceived

952 a prison near London 953 correcting

any of them all in all my life, except only twain; of which the one was a child and a servant of mine in mine own house, whom his father had, ere ever he came with me, nuzzled up<sup>955</sup> in such matters, and had set him to attend upon George Joye or Gee, otherwise called Clerk, which is a priest and is now, for all that, wedded in Antwerp; into whose house there, the two nuns were brought which John Burt, otherwise called Adrian, stole out of their cloister to make them harlots. This George Joye did teach this child his ungracious heresy against the Blessed Sacrament of the altar, which heresy this child afterward, being in service with me, began to teach another child in my house, which uttered his counsel. And upon that point perceived and known, I caused a servant of mine to stripe<sup>956</sup> him like a child before mine household, for amendment of himself and example of such others.

Another was one which, after that he had fallen into the frantic<sup>957</sup> heresies, fell soon after into plain open frenzy besides. And albeit that he had therefore been put up in Bedlam, and afterward by beating and correction, gathered his remembrance to him and began to come again to himself, being thereupon set at liberty and walking about abroad, his old fancies began to fall again in his head. And I was from diverse good holy places advertised<sup>958</sup> that he used, in his wandering about, to come into the church and there make many mad toys and trifles,<sup>959</sup> to the trouble of good people, in the divine service; and specially would he be most busy in the time of most silence, while the priest was at the secrets<sup>960</sup> of the Mass, about the elevation.<sup>961</sup> And if he spied any woman kneeling at a form,<sup>962</sup> if her head hung anything<sup>963</sup> low in her meditations, then would he steal behind her and, if he were not letted,<sup>964</sup> would labor to lift up all her clothes and cast them quite over her head. Whereupon I, being advertised of these pageants,<sup>965</sup> and being sent unto and required<sup>966</sup> by very devout religious folk to take some other order with him, caused him, as he came wandering by my door, to be taken by the constables and bounden to a tree in the street, before the whole town, and there they striped him with rods therefor till he waxed<sup>967</sup>

wear, and somewhat longer. And it appeared well that his remembrance was good enough, save that it went about in grazing till it was beaten home. For he could then very well rehearse his faults himself and speak and treat<sup>968</sup> very well, and promise to do afterward as well. And verily, God be thanked, I hear none harm of him now.

And of all that ever came in my hand for heresy, as help me God, saving, as I said, the sure keeping of them — and yet not so sure, neither, but that George Constantine could steal away<sup>969</sup> — else had never any of them any stripe or stroke given them, so much as a fillip<sup>970</sup> on the forehead.

And some have said that when Constantine was gotten away, I was fallen for<sup>971</sup> anger in a wonderful rage. But surely though I would not have suffered<sup>972</sup> him go if it would have pleased him to have tarried still in the stocks, yet when he was neither so feeble for lack of meat but that he was strong enough to break the stocks, nor waxen so lame of his legs with lying but that he was light enough to leap the walls, nor by any mishandling of his head so dulled or dazed in his brain but that he had wit enough, when he was once out, wisely to walk his way; neither was I then so heavy<sup>973</sup> for the loss but that I had youth enough left me to wear it out,<sup>974</sup> nor so angry with any man of mine that I spoke them any evil word for the matter, more than to my porter that he should see the stocks mended and locked fast, that the prisoner steal not in again. And as for Constantine himself, I could<sup>975</sup> him in good faith good thanks. For never will I for my part be so unreasonable as to be angry with any man that riseth if he can, when he findeth himself that he sitteth not at his ease.

But now tell the brethren many marvelous lies of much cruel tormenting that heretics had in my house — so far-forth that one Sygar,<sup>976</sup> a bookseller of Cambridge which was in mine house about four or five days, and never had either bodily harm done him or foul word spoken him while he was in mine house, hath reported since, as I hear say, to diverse that he was bounden to a tree in my garden, and thereto too<sup>977</sup> piteously beaten, and yet besides that,

955 nuzzled up: nurtured 956 lash, whip 957 insane 958 informed 959 toys and trifles: tricks and pranks 960 silent prayers 961 lifting up of the Host for the adoration of the people 962 bench 963 at all 964 prevented

965 scenes 966 asked 967 became 968 handle, discuss 969 Constantine (ca. 1500–1560), a priest who became a follower of Tyndale, fled to Antwerp in the 1520s, but then returned to England, where he was arrested by More. He escaped from

More's custody in November 1531. 970 a small tap with the finger 971 because of 972 let 973 sad 974 wear it out: endure it 975 gave 976 Sygar Nicholson 977 also bounden about the head with a cord and wrungen, that he fell down dead in a swoon.

And this tale of his beating did Tyndale tell to an old acquaintance of his own, and to a good lover of mine, with one piece farther yet: that while the man was in beating, I spied a little purse of his hanging at his doublet, wherein the poor man had (as he said) five marks; and that caught I quickly to me and pulled it from his doublet, and put it in my bosom, and that Sygar never saw it after; and therein, I trow, he said true; for no more did I neither nor before neither nor, I trow, no more did Sygar himself neither in good faith.

But now when I can come to goods by such goodly ways, it is no great marvel though I be so suddenly grown to so great substance of riches, as Tyndale told his acquaintance and my friend; to whom he said that he wist<sup>978</sup> well that I was no less worth, in money and plate<sup>979</sup> and other movables, than twenty thousand marks. And as much as that have diverse of the good brethren affirmed here nearer home.

And surely this will I confess: that if I have heaped up so much goods together, then have I not gotten the one half by right. And yet by all the thieves, murderers, and heretics that ever came in my hands am I not, I thank God, the richer of one groat,<sup>980</sup> and yet have they spent me twain.<sup>981</sup> Howbeit, if either any of them, or of any kind of people else, that any cause<sup>982</sup> have had before me, or otherwise any meddling with me, find himself so sore grieved with anything that I have taken of his, he had some time to speak thereof. And now since no man cometh forth to ask any restitution yet, but hold their peace and slack<sup>983</sup> their time so long, I give them all plain peremptory warning now, that<sup>984</sup> they drive it off no longer. For if they tarry till yesterday, and then come and ask so great sums among them as shall amount to twenty thousand marks, I purpose to purchase such a protection<sup>985</sup> for them that I will leave myself less than the fourth part, even of shrewdness, rather than ever I will pay them.

And now dare I say that if this Pacifier had by experience known the troth<sup>986</sup> of that kind of people, he would not have given so much credence to their lamentable complaining as it seemeth me by some of his “some says” he doth.

Howbeit, what faith my words will have with him in these mine own causes, I cannot very surely say, nor yet very greatly care. And yet stand I not in so much doubt of myself but that I trust well that among many good and honest men, among which sort of folk I trust I may reckon him, mine own word would alone, even in mine own cause, be somewhat better believed than would the oaths of some twain of this new brotherhood in a matter of another man.

THE THIRTY-SEVENTH CHAPTER

But now to come to some spiritual men’s causes against whom there are laid like lies, one Simonds, a long well-known heretic walking about the realm, was taken not long ago by the officers of the right reverend father my lord Bishop of Winchester, and, being put in a chamber to keep and breaking out at a window, hath told many of his brethren since that he was marvelously tormented by the Bishop’s officers in prison, and should have been murdered therein too, and that else he would never have run his way. But he would never since complain of his harms to the King or his Council, but will rather of perfection suffer them all patiently than to pursue and prove them with his forthcoming again.

Would God this Pacifier might have the examination of that matter. It would peradventure do him great good hereafter to find out the truth of such a false heretic’s tale.

And now notwithstanding that the brethren boast much of his happy escape, yet if he happed to die or be hanged somewhere, thereas<sup>987</sup> no man wist where but they, they would not let<sup>988</sup> for a need to say that he escaped not at all, but was privily killed in prison, and privily cast away. For so said some of them by<sup>989</sup> George Constantine, not only upon his first flight out of my keeping, but also even now of late, notwithstanding that they well know that many merchants of our own had seen him since laugh and make merry at Antwerp.

Such lust have these blessed brethren, that ever talk of faith and Spirit and troth and verity, continually to devise and imagine lies of malice and hatred against all those that labor to make them good.

5 And such a pleasure hath either Frith himself or else some other false foolish brethren of his sect. For he told one or twain, and caused the brethren to blow it farther about, that word was sent him into the Tower that the Chancellor of London said it<sup>990</sup>
10 should cost him the best blood in his body.

Now whether Frith lied or his fellows, let them draw cut<sup>991</sup> between them. For surely where they tell it under such manner—as though Master Chancellor should rejoice and have a cruel desire of the 15 man’s death—I know him so well that I dare well say they falsely belie him therein.

Howbeit, some truth they might hap to hear whereupon they might build their lie. For so was it that on a time one came and showed me that Frith 20 labored so sore that he sweat again, in studying and writing against the Blessed Sacrament. And I was of truth very heavy<sup>992</sup> to hear that the young foolish fellow should bestow such labor about such a devilish work, and, wishing that the man had some 25 good Christian friend to whom he would give ear, that might withdraw him from giving and inclining all his heart to the following of that frantic<sup>993</sup> heresy, wherewith he were in peril to perish both body and soul, said in the communication<sup>994</sup> these words, 30 or others of like effect: “For if that Frith,” quoth I, “sweat in laboring to quench the faith that all true Christian people have in Christ’s Blessed Body and Blood, which all Christian folk verily, and all good folk fruitfully, receive in the form of bread, he shall 35 labor more than in vain. For I am sure that Frith and all his fellows, with all the friends that are of their affinity, shall neither be able to quench and put out that faith. And over that, if Frith labor about the quenching thereof till he sweat, I would some good 40 friend of his should show him that I fear me sore<sup>995</sup> that Christ will kindle a fire of faggots<sup>996</sup> for him, and make him therein sweat the blood out of his body here, and straight from hence send his soul forever into the fire of hell.”

45 Now in these words I neither meant nor mean that I would it were so. For so help me God and none otherwise, but as I would be glad to take more labor, loss, and bodily pain also than peradventure many a man would ween to win that young man to Christ and his true faith again, and thereby to pre-50 serve and keep him from the loss and peril of soul and body both.

Now might it peradventure be that I told Master Chancellor this tale; and so, I ween, I did; and he might thereupon happen to report it again, or 55 say some suchlike words of like purpose<sup>997</sup> to some other man, and that thereupon these brethren build up their tower of lies. Or else, which were not impossible, Frith, if he heard the tale told by<sup>998</sup> me, might, withdrawing the best, and making it seem 60 such as himself list,<sup>999</sup> tell it out by Master Chancellor to bring him among the people in opinion of malice and cruelty. But his mild mind and very tender dealing in such matters is among all the people by good experience so plainly proved and so clearly 65 known that it will be hard to bring any such sinister opinion of him in any good honest man’s head, for the words of a great many such manner folk as Frith is, which not only speaketh lies against honest men, but also writeth false lies and heresies against 70 the Blessed Sacrament of the altar.

Some man will yet peradventure say that this is a thing far unlikely: that either Frith or any man else would wittingly<sup>1</sup> take a burden from one man and lay it in another man’s neck, and namely to lay it 75 to the Chancellor from me, since that all such folk reckon in themselves that they have more cause of grief against me than him.

Surely if they were wise and intended to be good, they should neither think themselves to have cause 80 of grief or grudge against me nor him neither. For of myself I wot well, and of him I believe the same: that we nothing intend unto them but their own wealth,<sup>2</sup> which, without their amendment by change of their heresies into the true faith again, is 85 impossible to be gotten.

But for the point that I spoke of—that it were not so far unlikely as it would haply<sup>3</sup> seem that Frith would turn that tale from me to Master Chancellor—ye shall perceive partly by his own 90 deed, and partly by the dealing of some other such in suchlike manner of matter. For ye shall understand that after that Frith had written a false foolish treatise against the Blessed Sacrament of the altar,<sup>4</sup> I, having a copy thereof sent unto me, made shortly an answer thereto.<sup>5</sup> And for because that his book was not put abroad in print, I would not therefore let mine run abroad in men's hands. For,

 5 as I have often said, I would wish that the common people should of such heresies never hear so much as the name. But forasmuch as that thing is impossible to provide but that heretics will be doing, therefore are other folk sometimes driven of neces-
 10 sity to speak of those matters also, and to make answer unto them.

And therefore when heretics abjure and do their penance, the preacher is fain to rehearse<sup>6</sup> their opinions in the pulpit, and there answer those devilish 15 arguments openly with which those heretics first deceive men and women in corners secretly and after spread them abroad in audience by defense of those heresies in their examination openly.

And also if their books be once put abroad in 20 print, it is a thing very hard to get them well in again. But as for me, I used therein this provision for the remedy on both parts: that though I would not put mine answer abroad into every man's hands at adventure<sup>7</sup> (because Frith's book was not put 25 out abroad in print), yet I caused mine answer to be printed under mine own name, to the intent I might, as indeed I have, give out some to such as I perceived had seen his book before.

Now happed it that, upon a time, the right rever-
 30 end father my lord Bishop of Winchester sent for Frith unto his own place, of very<sup>8</sup> fatherly favor toward the young man's amendment, which he sore desired, both for other causes and, among other causes, partly also for this: because he was, not many years
 35 ago, a young boy waiting upon him and a scholar of his. In that communication, what words were between them were now too long to rehearse. But such they were as I would wish that all such as be wise, and ween that Frith were wise (which be peradventure 40 some that hear the brethren speak of him, and weigh not themselves his words), had there stood by and heard. For they should, I am sure, have taken Frith ever after for such as he plainly, before good 45 record,<sup>9</sup> proved himself then — which was not a heretic only, but besides that a proud unlearned fool.

But as I was about to tell you, in that communication my said lord of Winchester among other things communed<sup>10</sup> with Frith against his afore-remembered<sup>11</sup> heresy that he so sweateth in to im-50 pugn the true Christian faith concerning the Sacrament of the altar. And when Frith there stood in his heresy as stiffly as he defended it foolishly secretly between them twain, my lord, longing that the fel-

 55 low's folly might appear, called good and worshipful<sup>12</sup> witnesses unto them. And then, because his Lordship perceived Frith loath to have it known abroad, out<sup>13</sup> of the brotherhood, as yet at that time that he went about to poison the realm with that pestilent heresy against the Sacrament, my lord, I
 60 say, said unto him that it was now too late for him to think that he could keep close:<sup>14</sup> “Revoke it, Frith,” quoth his Lordship, “ye may, and repent it, and so were it well done ye did; but keep it from knowl-
 65 edge you cannot, ye be gone now so far. For your books of this matter have been seen abroad in many men's hands, and that so long that, lo, here is an 70 answer already made unto it” — and showed him my book in print; but of troth, he delivered it not unto him. Howbeit, soon after, he got mine answer — I cannot tell of whom — and since have I heard of late that he sweateth about that matter afresh, and hath,
 75 I hear say, the devilish books of Wycliffe, Zwingli, and Friar Hussgen secretly conveyed unto him into the Tower, and hath begun and gone on a great way in a new book against the Sacrament.

But the thing that I tell you this tale for is this: I am well informed that he knoweth very well that I made that answer; and it is not very likely but that, by one or another, he hath the book in print; and 80 of likelihood he never had it otherwise. For that was as easy a way, ye wot well, as one to write it out that had it in print already; and before it was printed, I know very well he could never get it. And at the leastwise I know it well that he knoweth well
 85 enough that the answer was made by me; and yet he dissimuleth that, and, feigning himself not to know who made it, but to think it rather that my said lord of Winchester made it than any man else, maketh his new book, as I am very certainly informed, not 90 against me by name, but all against my said lord, of a solemn pride that he would have his book seem a disputation between the boy and the Bishop.

But there shall not greatly need such a bishop so learned as my said lord is to dispute with any such as Frith is, for five such books as that is, if it be no wiser than was his other, or than this his new is either, if it be no wiser than one telleth me that both can<sup>15</sup> good skill and hath heard a great part read; nor, howsoever he have handled it, wise will it never be while the matter thereof is so false. And therefore when the book shall hereafter be finished and happeth to come to mine hands, I trust to make almost every boy able to perceive the false folly thereof, though he cover his rotten fruit as close<sup>16</sup> and as comely<sup>17</sup> as ever any costermonger<sup>18</sup> covered his basket.

But this, as I said, ye may, good readers, see: that as Frith taketh mine answer from me, which himself and every man else knoweth well for mine, and imputeth it to the Bishop of Winchester, it were not much unlikely that he would, when he had heard of a thing that I had said, and when himself had made it worse, then change it from me and impute it unto Master Chancellor of London.

THE THIRTY-EIGHTH CHAPTER

Which if he do, he doth it not alone. For this point played also Thomas Philips of London, leather-seller, now prisoner in the Tower. Whom, when I was Chancellor, upon certain things that I found out by<sup>19</sup> him, by the examination of diverse heretics whom I had spoken with, upon the occasion of the heretics' forbidden books, I sent for; and when I had spoken with him, and honestly entreated him one day or twain in mine house, and labored about his amendment in as hearty loving manner as I could, when I perceived finally the person such that I could find no troth<sup>20</sup> neither in his word nor his oath, and saw the likelihood that he was, in the setting forth of such heresies closely, a man meet<sup>21</sup> and likely to do many folk much harm, I by indenture<sup>22</sup> delivered him to his ordinary.<sup>23</sup> And yet, for because I perceived in him a great vainglorious liking of himself, and a great spice<sup>24</sup> of the same spirit of pride that I perceived before in Richard Hunne<sup>25</sup> when I talked with him, and feared that if he were in the Bishop's prison, his ghostly<sup>26</sup> enemy the devil might make him there destroy himself, and then might such a new business arise against Master Chancellor that now is as at that time arose upon the Chancellor that was then — which thing I feared in Thomas Philips somewhat also the more because a cousin of his, a barber in Paternoster Row called Holy John, after that he was suspected of heresy and spoken to thereof, fearing the shame of the world, drowned himself in a well — I for these causes advised, and by my means helped, that Thomas Philips (which, albeit that he said that the clergy loved him not, seemed not yet very loath to go to the Bishop's prison) was received prisoner into the Tower of London. And yet after that he complained thereupon, not against me, but against the ordinary. Whereupon the King's Highness commanded certain of the greatest lords of his Council to know how the matter stood. Which, known and reported to the King's Grace, his Highness, as a most virtuous Catholic prince, gave unto Thomas Philips such answer as, if he had been either half so good as I would he were, or half so wise as himself weeneth he were, he would forthwith<sup>27</sup> have followed, and not stand still in his obstinacy so long as he hath now put himself thereby in another deeper peril.

Others have besides this complained that they have been untruly and unjustly handled; and this have they not letted<sup>28</sup> to do after that they have been convicted and abjured, and their just condemnations, after their open examinations and plain and clear proofs, so well and openly known that they have, by their shameless clamor, nothing gotten but rebuke and shame. And yet were some of them, if their ordinaries had been so sore<sup>29</sup> and so cruel as this book of this Pacifier maketh them, fallen again in the danger and peril of relapse.

And some hath been heard upon importunate clamor, and the cause and handling examined by the greatest lords temporal of the King's most honorable Council — and that since that I left the office — and the complainer founden in his complaining so very shamelessly false that he hath been answered that he was too easily dealt with, and had wrong that he was no worse served.

And such have these folk ever been founden and ever shall. For when they fall to a false faith in heart, their words cannot be true. And therefore if this Pacifier well and thoroughly knew them, I dare say he would less believe their lamentable tales than I fear me that he hath believed some in complaining upon their ordinaries, against whom he seemeth, upon such folk's false complaining, to have conceived this opinion that his book of Division showeth: that is to wit, that the clergy think that every man that speaketh against their misorder and abusions loveth no priests, and that therefore they have punished many men — which God forbid were true. For if it were, surely they that so punished any one man for that cause — that is to wit, because themselves conceive a false suspicion against him — it were pity that they lived. But I think in good faith that the prelates will never desire to live longer than till this Pacifier prove that same false tale true.

THE THIRTY-NINTH CHAPTER

I said before that I would touch of this book, and so have I touched his first chapter whole, because it hath, for the first setting forth, the chief countenance<sup>30</sup> of mildness and charity. And yet what charity there is therein, when it is considered, I suppose you see. For no part is there of the clergy that can please him — neither prelates nor mean<sup>31</sup> secular priests, nor religious<sup>32</sup> persons, not so much as any one man — as you may plainly perceive by other words of his in other places of his loving book. And yet among all these faults, I see him find none with them that run out in apostasy, but all the faults be assigned in<sup>33</sup> them that abide in their profession still. Nor I find not in his book any cause of his division to be founden in the sowing and setting forth of these new-sprung heresies. And yet do they make, and needs must make, wheresoever they come, the greatest division that can be: first in opinions and contrarious minds, and afterward in fervor of language and contentious words, and finally, if it go forth long, in plain sedition, manslaughter, and open war.

And this fault of these heresies he might as well have laid unto the clergy as some of the others that he sore<sup>34</sup> speaketh of, if he take heresies for any. For like as naughty priests and naughty religious persons have always been they that do those other faults which, under the figure of “some say,” this book layeth to the charge of the spirituality, so have naughty priests and naughty religious folk (being among the clergy as Judas was among Christ's apostles) betrayed the faith of Christ and begun and set forth these ungracious heresies as fast<sup>35</sup> and as fervently for their part as naughty lay folk for theirs; and both twain first corrupt some of their company at home, and after run out in apostasy and put abroad their heresies in writing. And some men say that some prelates have not done all their parts in the repressing and due punishment of them. And yet as great faults as these be, and such as all the temporalty should be most grieved with and grudge at, and therefore should be most cause of this division, if there be such a division, and that every default that is in any naughty persons of the spirituality be a cause of almost a universal division and grudge of the whole corps of the temporalty against the whole body of the spirituality, yet, I say, for all this, the book of this Pacifier layeth no piece of this fault unto the spirituality, but rather findeth fault and cause of grudge and division in the spirituality for oversore handling of them that are heretics indeed, and laboreth to abash the ordinaries with obloquy, and put them in dread with fear of infamy, and falsely beareth them in hand<sup>36</sup> that they have punished many persons for a wrong suspicion falsely conceived in their own minds against those whom they punished.

And thus far hath he gone in his first chapter. In which manner, albeit I trust in God the man meant himself but well, yet I fear me some wily shrew hath somewhat set him awry in the tempering of his words.

THE FORTIETH CHAPTER

And verily albeit, as I said before, I purpose not to meddle with every part of his book that I think were well done for him to amend, yet in his seventh chapter and his eighth — which twain treat all of these matters of heresies — for the great weight of the matter, I shall not forbear to show you some difference and diversity between his mind and mine.

of religious orders 33 assigned in:

attributed to 34 strongly 35 steadfastly 36 beareth . . . hand: leads us to believe

Another occasion of the said division hath been, by reason of diverse suits that have been taken in the spiritual courts of office (that is called in Latin, ex officio),<sup>37</sup> so that the parties have not known who hath accused them, and thereupon they have sometimes been caused to abjure in causes of heresies—sometimes to do penance, or to pay great sums of money for redeeming thereof—which vexation and charges the parties have thought have come to them by the judges and the officers of the spiritual court (for they have known none other accusers), and that hath caused much people in diverse parts of this realm to think great malice and partiality in the spiritual judges. And if a man be ex officio brought before the ordinary for heresy, if he be notably suspected of heresy, he must purge himself after the will of the ordinary or be accursed;<sup>38</sup> and that is by the law Extravagant de hereticis, cap. Ad abolendam.<sup>39</sup> And that is thought by many to be a very hard law, for a man may be suspected and not guilty, and so be driven to a purgation without proof or without offense in him, or be accursed.<sup>40</sup>

I will, in this point of conventing<sup>41</sup> ex officio, no farther speak at this time than concerning the crime of heresy. For I am in good faith loath to meddle with this book of his at all. For loath am I anything to meddle against any other man's writing that is a Catholic man, saving that it seemeth me verily<sup>42</sup> that, be this man never so good, yet if his mind were followed in this matter, it would work this realm great harm and no good.

For surely if the conventing of heretics ex officio were left, and changed into another order by which no man should be called, be he never so sore suspected nor by never so many men detected but if<sup>43</sup> some man make himself party against him as his accuser, the streets were likely to swarm full of heretics before that right few were accused, or peradventure any one, either.

For, whatsoever the cause be, it is not unknown, I am sure, that many a man will give unto a judge secret information of such things as, though they be true, yet gladly he will not, or peradventure dare not, be openly aknowen that the matter came out by him. And yet shall he sometimes give the names of diverse others, which, being called by the judge, and examined as witnesses against their wills, both know and will also depose<sup>44</sup> the truth—and he that first gave information also; and yet will never one of them willingly make himself an open accuser of the party, nor dare peradventure for his ears.<sup>45</sup>

And this find we not only in heresy, but in many temporal matters among ourselves, whereof I have had experience many a time and oft, both in the disclosing of felonies, and sometimes of much other oppression used by some one man or twain in a shire, whereby all their neighbors sore smarted, and yet not one durst openly complain.

Howbeit, it cometh in heresies sometimes to much worse point. For I have wist<sup>46</sup> where those that have been in the company at the time, being folk of good substance<sup>47</sup> and such as were taken for worshipful,<sup>48</sup> being called in for witnesses, have first made many delays, and afterward, being examined on their oaths, have sworn that they heard it not, or remembered it not, and took no heed to the matter at the time, whereas it well appeared, by the depositions of diverse others being with them at the time, that in every man's conscience they lied. When would these folk become a heretic's accuser, against whom they would rather be forsworn<sup>49</sup> than of the truth to bear witness?

And this thing maketh that it may be sometimes (albeit very seldom it happeth) that in heresy, upon other vehement suspicions without witnesses, a man may be put to his purgation<sup>50</sup> and to penance also if he fail thereof. Which thing, why so many should now think so hard a law as this Pacifier saith they do, I cannot see, nor those wise men neither that made the law. And yet were they many wise men, and not only as wise, but peradventure many more also in number, than those that this Pacifier calleth “many” now, that, as he saith, find now the fault. For though it be alleged in the Extravagant de hereticis cap. Ad abolendam,<sup>51</sup> yet was that law made in a General Council.

And verily methinketh that he which cannot be proved guilty in heresy, and yet useth such manner

37 “by (virtue of) his office” 38 excommunicated 39 Decretals of Gregory IX, Book 5, title 7 (“On Heretics”), chapter 9 40 CW 9: 188/36–189/13 41 summoning of ways that all his honest neighbors ween<sup>52</sup> he were one, and therefore dare not swear that in their conscience they think him any other, is well worthy, methinketh, to do some penance for that manner 5 of behavior whereby he giveth all other folk occasion to take him for so naughty.

And by the common law of this realm, many times upon suspicion the judges award a writ to inquire of what fame and behavior the man is in his county; and himself lieth sometimes still in prison
10 till the return; and if he be returned good—that is to wit, if he be in a manner purged—then is he delivered; and yet he payeth his fees ere he go. And if he be returned naughty,<sup>53</sup> then use<sup>54</sup> the judges to 15 bind him for his good abearing,<sup>55</sup> and sometimes sureties<sup>56</sup> with him too, such as their discretion will allow. And then to lie still till he find them is sometimes as much penance to the one as the spiritual judge enjoineeth to the other. For the one cometh
20 to the bar as openly as the other to the consistory;<sup>57</sup> and sometimes his fetters weigh a good piece of a faggot, besides that they lie longer on the one man's legs than the faggot on the other's shoulder. And yet is there no remedy but both these must be done,
25 both in the one court and in the other; or else instead of one harm (which to him that deserveth it not happeth seldom, and as seldom, I am sure, in heresy as in theft, and much more seldom too), ye shall have ten times more harm happen daily to folk 30 as innocent as they—and of innocents many made nocents,<sup>58</sup> to the destruction of themselves and others too, both in goods, body, and soul.

And because this Pacifier taketh it for so sore a thing in the spiritual law that a man shall be called 35 ex officio<sup>59</sup> for heresy, where he shall not know his accuser, if we should change the spiritual law for that cause, then had we need to change the temporal too, in some such points as, change it when ye will, and ye shall change it into the worse for aught<sup>60</sup> that 40 I can see, but if<sup>61</sup> it be better to have more thieves than fewer.

For now if a man be indicted at a sessions, and none evidence given openly at the bar (as many be, and many may well be; for the indicters may have 45 evidence given them apart, or have heard of the matter ere they came there, and of whom be they not bounden to tell, but be, rather, bounden to keep it close,<sup>62</sup> for they be sworn to keep the King's counsel and their own), shall then the party that is indicted be put unto no business<sup>63</sup> about his acquittal? And who shall tell him there the names of his 50 accusers, to entitle him to his writ of conspiracy?<sup>64</sup> This Pacifier will peradventure say that the same twelve men that are his indicters are his accusers, and therefore he may know them. But what helpeth

55 that his undeserved vexation if he were faultless? For amends the law giveth him none against any of them, nor it were not well done he should, but may, when he is after by other twelve acquitted, go get him home and be merry that he hath had so fair a 60 day, as a man getteth him to the fire and shaketh his hat after a shower of rain. And now as it often happeth that a man cometh into a shower by his own oversight, though sometimes of chance and of ad-
65 venture,<sup>65</sup> so surely though sometimes it hap that a man be accused or indicted of<sup>66</sup> malice, or of some likelihood which happed him of chance and not his fault therein, yet happeth it in comparison very seldom but that the party by some demeanor of himself giveth occasion that folk have him so suspected.

Now if this Pacifier say that yet here is at the leastwise in a temporal judge an open cause<sup>67</sup> appearing, whereupon men may see that the judge calleth him not but upon a matter brought unto him, whereas 75 the spiritual judge may call a man upon his own pleasure if he bear the party displeasure, this is very well said as for the temporal judge. But what saith he now for the temporal twelve men? For ye wot well they may do the same if they were so disposed, and then had I as lief<sup>68</sup> the judge might do it as they.
80 For in good faith I never saw the day yet but that I durst as well trust the troth<sup>69</sup> of one judge as of two juries. But the judges be so wise men that for the avoiding of obloquy<sup>70</sup> they will not be put in the trust.<sup>71</sup>

And I dare say the ordinaries be not so foolish neither, but that they would as fain<sup>72</sup> avoid it too if they might, saving that very necessity, lest all should fall to nought,<sup>73</sup> compelleth them to take this way, which necessity sometimes causeth also both the temporal judges and the King's Council to put some folk to business,<sup>74</sup> or dishonesty<sup>75</sup> sometimes, without either jury or bringing of the accuser to the proof of the matter in the party's presence.

5 For if the judge know by sure information that some one man is of such evil demeanor among his neighbors that they may not bear it, and yet that the man is, besides, so violent and so jeopardous that none of them dare be aknownto to speak of it, will
10 there no judges, upon many secret complaints made unto them, without making the party privy who told him the tale, bind that busy troublous man to good abearing?<sup>76</sup> I suppose yes, and have seen it so too; and wrong would it be sometimes with good
15 poor peaceable folk in the county but if<sup>77</sup> it were so done among.<sup>78</sup> And myself when I was Chancellor, upon such secret information have put some out of commission and office of justice of the peace which else for much money I would not have done; and 20 yet if I were in the one room<sup>79</sup> still and they in the other again, but if they be amended (whereof I neither then saw nor yet hear any likelihood), I would put them out again, and never tell them who told me the tales that made me so to do.

25 But yet will peradventure this Pacifier say that sometimes, in some very special case, he could be content that the spiritual judge should upon his discretion call one<sup>80</sup> for suspicion of heresy ex officio; but he would not have men commonly called but 30 either by accusation or presentment in their senes<sup>81</sup> or indictments at the common law. I had as lief,<sup>82</sup> for anything that I see, that this Pacifier should say thus: "By this way that they be called, I would not have them called; but I would have them called after 35 such an order as they might be sure that then should they never be called." For as for accuse folk openly for heresy, every man hath experience enough that ye shall seldom find any man that will but if<sup>83</sup> the judge should set an officer of the Court 40 thereto, without any peril of expenses; and then were this way and that way all of one effect. And as for presentments and indictments, what effect would come of them concerning heresy, ye see the proof, I trow,<sup>84</sup> meetly<sup>85</sup> well already.

45 For this is a thing well known unto every man: that in every sene, every session of peace, every session of jail delivery,<sup>86</sup> every leet<sup>87</sup> through the realm, the first thing that the jury have given them in charge is heresy. And for all this, through the whole realm how many presentments be there 50 made in the whole year? I ween in some seven years not one. And I suppose no man doubteth but that in the meantime some there be. I will not be curious about the searching out of the cause, why it is either never or so very seldom presented, not five 55 in fifteen years. But this I say: that since some will not, some cannot, and none doth, if he should put away the process ex officio, the thing should be left undone; and then should soon after, with here-

60 tics increased and multiplied, the faith be undone; and after that, through the stroke of God revenging their malice and our negligence, should by sedition, and trouble, and dearth,<sup>88</sup> and death, in this realm many men both good and bad be undone.
65 And therefore for conclusion of this piece, my poor advice and counsel shall be that for heresy — and specially now, this time — men shall suffer the processes ex officio stand, and for as many other sins also as are only reformable by the spiritual law, except there be any such sins of them as ye think were 70 good to grow.

THE FORTY-FIRST CHAPTER

And it appeareth (De hereticis li.vi., in the chapter "In fidei favorem") that they that be accused and also parties to the same offense may be witnesses
75 in heresy; and in the chapter "Accusatus," parag. Licit, it appeareth that if a man be sworn to say the truth concerning heresy, as well of himself as of others, and he first confesseth nothing, and after, contrary to his first saying, he appealeth<sup>89</sup>
80 both himself and others — if it appear by manifest tokens that he doth it not of lightness of mind, ne<sup>90</sup> of hatred, nor for corruption of money — that then his witness in favor of the faith shall stand as well against himself as against others; and 85 yet it appeareth evidently in the same court, and in the same matter, that he is a perjured person. This is a dangerous law, and more like<sup>91</sup> to cause untrue and unlawful men to condemn innocents

And it helpeth little that if there be tokens that it is not done of hatred, nor for corruption of money, that it should be taken; for sometimes a wolf may show himself in the apparel of a lamb. And if the judge be partial, such tokens may be sooner accepted than truly showed.<sup>92</sup>

This piece, concerning the testimony of known evil persons to be received and taken in heresy, I have somewhat touched in the third chapter of the third book of my Dialogue,<sup>93</sup> where, since they may read it that will, I will make here no long tale again thereof. But well he wotteth<sup>94</sup> that heresy, whereby a Christian man becometh a false traitor to God, is in all laws, spiritual and temporal both, accounted as great a crime as is the treason committed against any worldly man. And then why should we find so great a fault that such witnesses should be received in a cause of heresy as are received not only in a cause of treason, but of murder also, and of other more single<sup>95</sup> felony, not only in favor of the Prince, and detestation of such odious crimes, but also for the necessity which the nature of the matter worketh<sup>96</sup> in the proof. For since evil folk use not to<sup>97</sup> make good folk of their counsel in doing of their evil deeds, those that are done should pass unpunished, and more like be committed afresh, but if<sup>98</sup> they were received for records<sup>99</sup> to their condemning that were of their counsel and partners to the doing. Which kind of folk will not let<sup>100</sup> to swear twice nay before they confess once yea; and yet their one “yea” more true upon their bare<sup>101</sup> word than their twice “nay” upon a solemn oath; and yet confess they not so simply but that it is commonly helped with some such circumstances as make the matter more clear.

Now see you well that, as himself showeth, the law provideth well against all light receiving of such confession. And yet this Pacifier saith that all that helpeth little, because the judge may be partial, and the witness may be a wolf, showing himself apparelled in the apparel of a lamb; which appearing in apparel, poor men that cannot apparel their speech with apparel of rhetoric, use commonly to call a wolf in a lamb’s skin.

But what order<sup>102</sup> may serve against such objections? What place is there in this world, spiritual or temporal, of which the judge may not have some say that he is, or at the leastwise (as he saith here) may be, partial? And therefore not only such witnesses should be, by this reason of his, rejected in heresy, treason, murder, or felony, but also, by his other reason of a wolf in a lamb’s skin, all manner of witnesses in every matter. For in every matter may it happen that he that seemeth a lamb may be indeed a wolf, and be naught<sup>103</sup> where he seemeth good, and swear false where he seemeth to say true. And therefore this patch<sup>104</sup> of this Pacifier concerning witnesses, every wise man may bear witness that there is little wit<sup>105</sup> therein; and less good would grow thereof if folk would follow his invention and make of the laws a change.

THE FORTY-SECOND CHAPTER

And in that chapter there, that beginneth Statuta quaedam, it is decreed that if the bishop or other inquirers of heresy see that any great danger might come to the accusers or witnesses of heresy by the great power of them that be accused, that then they may command that the names of the accusers or witnesses shall not be showed but to the bishop or inquirers, or such other learned men as be called to them, and that shall suffice, though they be not showed to the party. And for the more indemnity of the said accusers and witnesses it is there decreed that the bishop or inquirers may enjoin such as they have showed the names of such witnesses unto to keep them close,<sup>106</sup> upon pain of excommunication, for disclosing that secret without their license. And surely this is a sore<sup>107</sup> law: that a man shall be condemned, and not know the names of them that be causers thereof.

And though the said law seem to be made upon a good consideration for the indemnity of the accusers and witnesses, yet it seemeth that that consideration cannot suffice to prove the law reasonable. For it seemeth that the accusers and witnesses might be saved from danger by another way, and that is by this way: if the bishop or inquirers dread that the accusers and witnesses might take hurt, as is said before, then might they show it to the King and to his Council, beseeching his Grace of help in that behalf, to save and defend the accusers and witnesses from the extort<sup>108</sup> power of them that be accused. And if they would do so, it is not to suppose but that the King would sufficiently provide for their safeguard. But forasmuch as it should seem that spiritual men somewhat pretend<sup>109</sup> to punish heresies only of their own power, without calling for any assistance of the temporal power, therefore they make such laws as may help forth their purpose, as they think. But surely that is not the charitable way—to put the knowledge of the names of the accusers and witnesses from him that is accused—for if he knew them, he might percase<sup>110</sup> allege and prove so great and so vehement cause of rancor and malice in them that accuse him that their sayings by no law ought not to stand against him. And that spiritual men pretend that they only should have the whole inquiry and punishment of heresy, it appeareth Extravagant de hereticis li. vi. cap. Ut inquisitionis, parag. Prohibemus, where all powers, and all lords temporal and rulers, be prohibited that they shall not in any manner take knowledge<sup>111</sup> or judge upon heresy, since it is mere<sup>112</sup> spiritual; and he that inquireth of heresy taketh knowledge of heresy. And so the summa<sup>113</sup> called Summa rosella taketh it, titulo<sup>114</sup> “Ex communicatione,” parag. iiii. And if that be true, it seemeth, then, that all justices of peace in this realm be excommunicated: for they, by authority of the King’s commissions and also by statute, inquire of heresies. And I think it is not in the Church to prohibit that: for though it were so that the temporal men may not judge what is heresy and what not, yet they may, as it seemeth, by their own authority inquire of it, and inform the ordinary what they have found. And also if a metropolitan<sup>115</sup> with all his clergy and people of his diocese fell into heresy, it would be hard to redress it without temporal power. And therefore temporal men be ready and are bound to be ready to oppress heresies when they rise, as spiritual men be. And therefore spiritual men may not take all the thanks to themselves when heresies be punished, as though their charity and power only did it; for they have the favor and help of temporal men to do it, or else many times it would not be brought about.<sup>116</sup>

The provision of the law that he speaketh of was made, as appeareth, upon a great cause, in the avoiding of the great danger that might in some special case happen to those by whose means heresies were detected and convicted. But this law this Pacifier accounteth sore and uncharitable, and deviseth, as he thinketh, a better. But his device peradventure,<sup>117</sup> though it would serve in some one land, would yet not serve in some other; and they that made that law made it as it might serve most generally through Christendom; whereas this device, though it might serve in England, might not have served well in many places of Almain<sup>118</sup> that are perverted since, not even while the matter was in a hammering<sup>119</sup> before the change was made.

But surely that law and others of old made against heresies, if they had been in Almain duly followed in the beginning, the matter had not there gone out at length to such an ungracious ending. And undoubtedly, if the Prince, and prelates, and the noblemen of this realm, and the good people of the same, had not been diligent in the time of the Prince of famous memory King Henry the IV both to have against heresies those laws of the Church kept with which this Pacifier findeth now these faults, and also to make great provisions against it besides, it was then very likely and coming to the point as utterly to have subverted the faith in this realm here as it hath done since in any part of Switzerland or Saxony.

And also the doubt that this Pacifier putteth in exceptions<sup>120</sup> to be laid by the party against the accusers or witnesses, since the knowledge of the party lacketh, must be supplied the more effectually by the judges, to inquire and ensearch by their wisdoms whether any suspicion of evil will or other corruption might lead the witnesses or accusers anything to depose or do in the matter. Wherein if diligence be by the judges used, it will be very hard that any such thing should be of any weight but they shall hear thereof, and may consider the matter according.

And on the other side, the remedy that he deviseth for the surety<sup>121</sup> of the witnesses should not peradventure make the men so bold as in a cause of heresy to meddle in the matter against some manner of man, but that they rather would, for their own surety, keep their own tongues still than, with all the surety that could be founden<sup>122</sup> them besides, have their persons disclosed unto the party.

And as touching the conjecture of this Pacifier that the spirituality pretend that no layman should have the inquiry and punishment of heresies, the laws of this realm and the laws of the whole Church may well stand together, for aught<sup>123</sup> that I see in them both; and so have they in these matters of heresy, God be thanked, hitherto full well. And therefore this Pacifier seemeth me to bring in this matter to no great purpose now but if<sup>124</sup> it be either to set<sup>125</sup> some division, or else to fill up the leaf.<sup>126</sup> And therefore since, as I said before, I purpose not in any open<sup>127</sup> English book to ransack<sup>128</sup> and rebuke either the one law or the other, I shall let him with that matter alone.

THE FORTY-THIRD CHAPTER

Nevertheless mine intent is not to prove the said laws all wholly to be cruel and unreasonable; for I know well that it is right expedient that strait<sup>129</sup> laws be made for punishment of heresies that be heresies indeed — more rather than any other offense — and that the discretion of the judges spiritual may right well assuage the rigor of the said laws, and use them more favorably against them that be innocents than against them that be willful offenders, if they will charitably search for the truth. But surely if the said laws should be put into the handling of cruel judges, it might happen that they should many times punish innocents as well as offenders, but I trust in God it is not so. Nevertheless whether it be so or not, certain it is that there is a great rumor among the people that it is so, and that spiritual men punish not heresy only for zeal of the faith, and of a love and a zeal to the people, with a fatherly pity to them that so offend (as they ought to do, how great offenders soever they be), but that they do it rather to oppress them that speak anything against the worldly power or riches of spiritual men, or against the great confederacy that (as many men say) is in them to maintain it.<sup>130</sup>

Now his intent is not, he saith, to prove the said laws of the Church against heresies wholly cruel and unreasonable, but so much of them as it standeth not with his pleasure to approve. And now he is content that strait laws be made for punishment of heresies such as be heresies indeed; wherein, in this book of his, he meaneth two things: one, that he is content they be sore<sup>131</sup> punished if they be condemned. But first he would have them called<sup>132</sup> by such means as he seeth well they never should be sent for. And then he would exclude all such witnesses as were likely to bewray them.<sup>133</sup> And when that no man shall accuse them, nor no man be received that can prove it against them, then when the judge can lawfully convict them, he would, I trow,<sup>134</sup> be content that they were burned twice; and so would, I ween, themselves be content too; for they shall be safe enough, I warrant you, then.

Yet another mystery he meaneth, whatsoever it be, in those words “the punishment of heresies that be heresies indeed.” Here would he peradventure have every heresy, when these new brethren were taken therein, be brought in question again, and stand in controversy whether it were heresy or not; and that were another good help for them — as though the Church used to lay to their charges the speaking against some false faith, or at the leastwise would prove them heretics in speaking against some such things as they had never heard of before.

But now he showeth why he doth not wholly condemn these laws of the Church. But then the cause he showeth to be such as he by and by<sup>135</sup> taketh it away. For he layeth<sup>136</sup> the cause to be for that<sup>137</sup> the judges (if they be good and charitable) may by their wisdom and goodness moderate and temper the rigor of the laws; but on the other side, the evil judges may do by those laws, he saith, much harm. But now what laws are there or may there be, by the abuse of which none evil judge may do harm?

5 But then to show that by these laws of the Church much harm and little good or none could come, he handleth it so that he would make men ween there were not a good indifferent judge in all the whole clergy. For when he hath showed what hurt an evil judge and a cruel should do by those laws, he saith
10 that himself trusteth the spiritual judges be not such. Howbeit, lest we should take him at that word and believe him, he showeth us yet that the common people with a great rumor say the contrary. And the thing that he saith here under the name of 15 “the people” and “great rumor,” that saith he in his first chapter under the name of “many men.” And yet immediately before that, he saith much worse as of himself, affirming that “many persons” have been punished by the spirituality for an evil suspi-
20 cion and a false of their own imagination, because those many persons so punished had before spoken only against spiritual men’s disorder and abusions; which point, honesty would he should<sup>138</sup> have proved first, and then write it after.

25 And now cometh he and covertly goeth about to make men ween that no spiritual judges be indifferent. For thus he saith:

30 And though many spiritual men may be found that have right many great virtues and great gifts of God, as chastity, liberality, patience, soberness, temperance, cunning, and such others, yet it will be hard to find any one spiritual man that is not infected with the said desire and affection to have the worldly honor of priests exalted and preferred; and therefore if any layman report any 35 evil of a priest, though it be openly known that it is as he saith, yet they will be more diligent to cause the layman to cease of that saying than to do that in them is to reform that<sup>139</sup> is amiss in the priest that it is spoken of, taking, as it were, an occasion to do the less in such reformations because laymen speak so much against them. But surely that will be none excuse to spiritual rulers afore
40 God, when he shall ask account of his people that were committed unto their keeping.<sup>140</sup>

If the best spiritual men be such as this Pacifier here saith they be, then be they a very shrewd<sup>141</sup> sort indeed, if they be all so bad that it be hard to find any one but that, though any priest be so naughty that his lewdness<sup>142</sup> is openly known, yet if any lay-
50 man report it, the best spiritual men will, he saith, be more diligent to cause the layman cease of his saying than to do their devoir<sup>143</sup> to reform the priest; yea, and yet more than this, he saith they will do the less toward the amendment of the priest because laymen
55 speak so much of it. And this saith this Pacifier himself, showing forth boldly therein his own open face without any visor of “some say.” And therefore since he saith this even by<sup>144</sup> the best, till he prove it somewhat better, this shameful tale is somewhat shame-
60 less, dare I say; and somewhat is it foolish too, since he saith therewith that those which thus will do have yet, among many other great gifts of God, patience, soberness, temperance, and cunning too. For I am sure if they have that condition — that they be so af-65 fectionate unto every priest that they can so evil bear the dispraise of his open-known unthriftiness<sup>145</sup> that they will do the less toward his amendment because laymen much abhor his lewdness — this Pacifier may be patient, I will not say nay, and may peradventure 70 have much cunning too; but surely either is this Pacifier not very sober, or hath his brain otherwise somewhat out of temper, if he take them (as he calleth them) for patient folk or for temperate either.

THE FORTY-FOURTH CHAPTER

80
And yet to bring the spirituality in the more hatred, and to make the name of the spirituality the more odious among the people, this piteous Pacifier in diverse places of his book, to appease this division withal, allegeth against them that they 80 make great confederacies among them to make and maintain a party against the temporality, and by such confederacies, and worldly policies, and strait corrections, to rule the people and punish them, and keep them under. And this point he bringeth 85 in here and there in diverse places, sometimes with a “some say,” and sometimes with a “they say,” and sometimes he saith it himself. And I wot not well if

138 would he should: would require him to 139 what 140 CW 9: 191/15-27

141 wicked; bad 142 evil behavior 143 utmost 144 about 145 wickedness

he hated the spirituality indeed (as some say he doth, and yet I trust he doth not) what more odious thing he might say.

What any one kind or sort of people is there in this realm — husbandmen,<sup>146</sup> artificers, merchants, men of law, judges, knights, lords, or other — but that evil-disposed people might begin against them a seditious murmur, casting abroad a suspicious babbling of gathering, and assembling, and rounding,<sup>147</sup> and talking, and finally confederating<sup>148</sup> together? And yet all such suspicious babbling not worth a feather altogether, when it were well considered.

But in sundry places much he harpeth upon the laws of the Church, as though the spiritual laws which the spirituality here have made were a great cause of this division. And then diverse of the laws that he speaketh of be laws not provincial, made by the clergy here, but the laws usual through the whole Church of Christ, whereof the making may not be laid<sup>149</sup> to them; nor men are not therefore so unreasonable (though<sup>150</sup> those laws were less good than the great wisdom of this Pacifier could devise) as to be angry for them with our clergy that made them not, but have been bound to keep them.

And as for defaming them with the abuse of those laws toward<sup>151</sup> cruelty, as he doth in his book, there is no great cunning in the making of that lie. For every fool that list<sup>152</sup> may devise and lay the like to some other folk when he will.

Now as for their assemblies and coming together to the making of their laws and constitutions provincial, this Pacifier to lay those for any confederacies that should be now a cause of this so sudden a late<sup>153</sup> grudge and division were a very far-fetched invention. For, setting aside the disputation whether those constitutions be so unreasonable as this Pacifier would have them seem, this thing sufficeth against him: that there is not, I think verily, any one provincial constitution that he speaketh of that was made, or to any man's grief or grudge put in execution, in the time of any of all the prelates that are now living. And how could then any of them be any such confederacy or cause of this late-sprung division?

But I suppose he calleth those assemblings at their convocations by the name of confederacies. For but if<sup>154</sup> he so do, I wot nere<sup>155</sup> what he meaneth by that word. And on the other side, if he so do, for aught<sup>156</sup> that I see, he giveth a good thing and a wholesome an odious heinous name. For if they did assemble oft, and there did the things for which such assemblies of the clergy in every province through all Christendom from the beginning were instituted and devised, much more good might have grown thereof than the long disuse can suffer<sup>157</sup> us now to perceive.

But as for my days, as far as I have heard, nor, as I suppose, a good part of my father's neither, they came never together to convocation but at the request of the King, and at their such assemblies, concerning spiritual things, have very little done. Wherefore — that they have been in that great necessary point of their duty so negligent — whether God suffer to grow to a secret unperceived cause of division and grudge against them, God, whom their such negligence hath, I fear me, sore offended, knoweth. But surely this hath in my mind been somewhat a greater fault in the spirituality than diverse of those faults which under his figure of “some say” this Pacifier hath made very great in his book.

But surely if this Pacifier call those assemblies confederacies, I would not greatly wish to be confederated with them and their associates in any such confederacies. For I could never wit them yet<sup>158</sup> assemble for any great winning, but come up to their travail, labor, cost, and pain, and tarry and talk, etc., and so get them home again. And therefore men need not greatly to grudge or envy them for any such confederacies.

THE FORTY-FIFTH CHAPTER

But what faults soever this Pacifier find in the spirituality, yet of his tender pity he hath ever a special eye to see that they should not rigorously mishandle such good men as are suspected or detected of heresy. And therefore, whereas in other places he hath showed before that they have punished many men of<sup>159</sup> malice, for only speaking against their disorder and abusions, now he cometh in the eighth chapter and, lest besides their malice they might happen to punish them also for their own ignorance, therefore he teacheth the spiritual judges one great point concerning heresy, and saith:

146 farmers 147 whispering 148 conspiring 149 ascribed 150 even if

156 anything 157 allow 158 I...yet: I never yet have known them to 159 out of

It is a common opinion among doctors that none is a heretic for that only<sup>160</sup> he erreth, but for that he defendeth opinatively<sup>161</sup> his error. And therefore he that erreth of simplicity may in no wise
 5 be said a heretic. And Summa rosella, in the title “Hereticus in principio,” saith that a man may err and merit thereby; and he putteth this example: if a simple unlearned man hear the preaching of his bishop that preacheth haply<sup>162</sup> against the faith, 10 and he believeth it with a ready mind to obey, this man meriteth, and yet he erreth, but that is to be understood where ignorance excuseth. Then it seemeth that it is not enough to prove that a man is a heretic for that he hath holden opinions 15 against that the Church teacheth — ne<sup>163</sup> that he ought not to make any purgation nor abjuration for it — for that that<sup>164</sup> he held in such case was not his faith, but the faith of the Church was his faith, though haply he were not then fully ad-20 vised of it. And therefore Saint Aidan,<sup>165</sup> when he held the wrong part of keeping of Easter, was no heretic, and some say that Saint Chad<sup>166</sup> was of the same opinion as Saint Aidan was, which in like wise was no heretic; for their desire was 25 to know the truth, and therefore it is not read that they made either purgation or abjuration.
 Nor yet the Abbot Joachim,<sup>167</sup> which nevertheless erred, for he was ready to submit himself to the determination of the Church, and therefore 30 he was neither holden as a heretic ne compelled to abjure. Then if this be sooth,<sup>168</sup> it were great pity if it should be true, as is reported, that there should be so great a desire in some spiritual men to have men abjured or have the extreme punish-35 ment for heresy, as it is said there is. For as some have reported, if any will witness that a man hath spoken anything that is heresy — though he speak it only of an ignorance, or of a passion — or if he can by interrogatories and questions be 40 driven to confess anything that is prohibited by the Church, anon<sup>169</sup> they will drive him to abjure, or hold him attained<sup>170</sup> without examining the intent or cause of his saying or whether he had a mind to be reformed or not. And that is a very 45 sore way; our Lord be more merciful to our souls than so grievously to punish us for every light default.<sup>171</sup>

This process<sup>172</sup> were a pretty piece, and somewhat also to the purpose, if this Pacifier’s doctoring<sup>173</sup> were a good proof that the spiritual judges knew not this 50 tale before, nor wist<sup>174</sup> what appertained unto their part in this matter until this Pacifier taught them this great secret mystery sought out in Summa rosella: so strange a book to find and so hard to understand that very few men had meddled with it before. 55

But the tale is not so much told of<sup>175</sup> any pride to teach them, as of charity to teach us to take and believe for true every false feigned tale with which any man list to belie<sup>176</sup> them. For upon this lesson he bringeth in, as you see, his charitable infamation<sup>177</sup> 60 of the clergy’s cruelty, making men ween it were so, under his fair figure of lamentation “and great pity that it were, if it should be so, but yet it is,” he saith, “reported so, and some say that it is so.”

But surely some say again<sup>178</sup> that like as there is 65 nothing so evil but that some may hap to do it, so is there nothing so false but some may hap to say it.
 And some others say also that like as there is nothing so false but some man may hap to say it, so can no man say anything so false but some man under 70 pretext of pacifying may hap to repeat and report it.

For as for all that gay reported tale — that some laymen say that some spiritual men have so great desire to have men abjured, or to have ex-75 treme punishment for heresy that if any will witness that a man have spoken anything that is heresy, though he speak it but of ignorance or of a passion, or if he can be driven by interrogatories and questions to confess anything that is prohib-80 ited by the Church, anon they will drive him to abjure, or hold him attained, without any farther consideration of his intent or cause or whether he would be reformed or not<sup>179</sup>

— all this tale, though he tell it but, as it were, by<sup>180</sup> “some” spiritual men, yet is it told to make all lay-85 men ween that those “some” spiritual men were so great a sum that it were some great cause of all this great grudge and division which he saith that the temporalty now hath in this realm against the spirituality “in manner universally.” Wherein he maketh yet, as I trust, in manner a universal lie, since I can yet see no such universal cause, and least cause of all in this point specially which most specially, as the sorest and the most cruel heinous point, in sundry places of his book this Pacifier preacheth and presseth upon — that is to wit,<sup>181</sup> the mishandling of men in the cause of heresy — making men ween, with his heinous handling, that the spiritual judges in this realm handled that thing so cruelly that all the world had cause to wonder and grudge thereat.

But when all his wholesome holy babbling is done, every man may see these three things true: First, that since in punishing of heresies there is, and a good while hath been, so little business in all the shires of England and Wales, both about examination and puniti<sup>182</sup> of heretics, except only London and Essex, and those are both in one diocese, his “some spiritual men” that he would have seem so great a sum are yet of truth so few that he seemeth in manner to point them with his finger, and might as well in manner rehearse<sup>183</sup> them even by name.

Secondly, of those same “some,” so few, yet is there some so learned to whom the matter most specially pertaineth that if this Pacifier keep no more cunning in his breast than he putteth out in his book (as cunning as he weeneth it were), he is no more able to teach some one of those the lessons that belong to the matter than he that learned to spell is able and meet<sup>184</sup> to teach a good master in grammar to read.

Thirdly, that all his whole tale of their great desire of men’s shame or harm, and of their mishandling of men, and of uncharitable dealing, is a very false feigned tale, and so hath been already proved and founden in those that have had their surmise<sup>185</sup> brought forth unto the trial, and so shall be proved again, I doubt it not, whensoever this Pacifier will fall from that babbling of a generality (wherein he may point and spice a false tale with suspicious words) and come to the naming of any one person special, and before any folk indifferent<sup>186</sup> offer himself to the proof.

For let him come forth and name any one whom he will, and I warrant you the deed shall show itself that the spiritual judges which had the matter in hand were neither such as needed of this Pacifier to be taught what belonged unto right, nor were so malicious and cruel but that they would be as loath as himself to do them rigor or wrong.

And he shall find, whomsoever he will name that hath been either punished or abjured, that the matters which have been laid<sup>187</sup> unto them they have not been by any subtle questions induced to confess them; but they have been both well proved against them, and neither have been slight, nor light, nor so strange articles and unknown as they might therein of ignorance or simplicity so sore overshoot themselves.

But where this Pacifier speaketh of passions and of willing to be reformed, surely if he will so lightly pardon all passions that he will have no man punished for anything done or said in a passion, then shall his piteous affection many times do much harm, by the taking away of the punishment whereof the fear is ordained to refrain the passion and to make others also forbear the like for any such manner<sup>188</sup> passion.

For well ye wot, men fall in adultery through such damnable passions. And by the passion of ire and anger men fall into manslaughter. And by a passion of pride many a man falleth to treason. And by the same passion also, men fall into heresy, and sometimes, ye wot well, fall in a plain frenzy too. And in their passions of heresy, they speak ungraciously, and contend against the sacraments, and blaspheme our blessed Lady, and our Savior himself also, and horribly despise the holy housel,<sup>189</sup> and make mocks and mows<sup>190</sup> of the Mass, and rail on Christ’s own Blessed Body and Blood in the Blessed Sacrament. Will this Pacifier<sup>191</sup> that all these blasphemous damnable heretics shall be spared, for such desperate damnable passions? If that way were allowed, then were that heretic most sure<sup>192</sup> that against all the faith most could rail and rage. For then might it be said that the man was in a great passion.

Now as for willing to be reformed, I dare say that the spiritual judges would gladly see every man, and therein would gladly show them all the favor they could; but sometimes they cannot show all the favor that they fain<sup>193</sup> would. For though they may receive him and save his life at the first time, yet are they straited<sup>194</sup> by the plain law that they may not so do at the second, when the man is relapsed.

And the laws have determined who shall be taken and reputed for a heretic, and who not, as well as 5 this Pacifier can teach us, and a little better too. And they have both had a respect and a sure eye to provide that neither innocents or plain simple folk should be for any slight offense sore handled or un-
10 truly circumvented<sup>195</sup> and punished, nor that wily false wretched heretics should by craft and sophisms be suffered<sup>196</sup> to seem wise among unlearned people, and feign simplicity and say they repent, and so be sent away lightly to go teach their heresies and sow their poison into men's souls again.

15 For if that way were taken which it seemeth that this Pacifier would have — that every man might be held excused that would say he spoke heresy of ignorance, or of oversight, or of simplicity, or of a passion, or which<sup>197</sup> as often as he would not defend 20 his heresy and stubbornly stick thereto, or though he did for the while would afterward yet offer to be reformed and promise that he would amend — if all these, I say, should always pass unpunished, the Church of Christ at the making of the laws foresaw, 25 and all Christendom should shortly find, how little fruit would grow thereof.

And when this Pacifier hath told thus much mishandling and cruelty of the clergy, wherein if he said true it touched yet very few, and hath proved it by a 30 “some say” of as few, and findeth some such things for faults as, if they were changed after the fashion of his book, would of heretics in many places for a very few make a very great many, and the lies that heretics of malice blow about against their judges,
35 laboreth to make men believe them for true, by his repeating and reporting under a pretext of charity, then endeth he that painted process<sup>198</sup> with his devout prayer full holily and saith:

40 This is a very sore<sup>199</sup> way; our Lord be more merciful to our souls than so grievously to punish us for every light default.

When he hath proved those evil devices good, and those false lies true, then let this good Sir John “Some Say” take his portuous<sup>200</sup> and his beads and 45 pray. But in the meanwhile those good men, whom

by such figures and such holy pretexts he goeth about ungodly to defame, do earnestly pray God for him, to give him the grace to change this evil fashion and this very sore way. And they pray God
50 heartily to be more merciful to this Pacifier's poor soul than this Pacifier is to other men's, whose souls (believe himself never so well, and mean he never so well therewith) yet his book goeth about, by sowing of dissension and embolding of heretics, to infect and envenom with a grudge and hatred against 55 the spirituality, and with the canker of pestilent poisoned heresies, and all against their own salvation.

THE FORTY-SIXTH CHAPTER

60 For here shall ye see to the further encouraging of heretics what another goodly “some say” this good Sir John “Some Say” findeth. Lo, thus he saith:

And here some say that because there is so great a desire in spiritual men to have men abjure, and to be noted with heresy — and that some, as it were of a policy, do noise it that the realm is full of 65 heretics, more than it is indeed — that it is very perilous that spiritual men should have authority to arrest a man for every light suspicion or complaint of heresy till that desire of punishment in spiritual men be ceased and gone; but that they
70 should make process against them to bring them in upon pain of cursing;<sup>201</sup> and then, if they tarry forty days, the King's laws to bring them in by a writ De excommunicato capiendo,<sup>202</sup> and so to be brought forth out of the King's jail to answer.
75 But surely, as it is somewhat touched before in the seventh chapter, it seemeth that the Church in time past hath done what they could to bring about that they might punish heresy of themselves, without calling for any help therein of the 80 secular power.

And therefore they have made laws that heretics might be arrested and put in prison, and stocks if need were, as appeareth Clementinis de hereticis (Capi. Multorum querela). And after, at 85 the special calling on of the spirituality, it was enacted by Parliament that ordinaries<sup>203</sup> might arrest men for heresy, for some men think that the said Clementine was not of effect in the King's law to arrest any man for heresy. But if a man were openly and notably suspected of heresy, and that there were sufficient record and witness against him, and there were also a doubt<sup>204</sup> that he would flee and not appear, whereby he might infect others, it seemeth convenient<sup>205</sup> that he be arrested by the body,<sup>206</sup> but not upon every light complaint that full lightly may be untrue. And it will be right expedient that the King's Highness and his Council look specially upon this matter, and not to cease till it be brought to more quietness than it is yet, and to see with great diligence that pride, covetise, nor worldly love be no judges, nor innocents be punished, ne<sup>207</sup> yet that willful offenders go not without due correction.<sup>208</sup>

In this process,<sup>209</sup> lo, good readers, this Pacifier declareth that he would have the King's Highness and his Council so specially look upon this matter that neither innocents should be punished nor yet willful offenders go without due correction. Who could end and conclude all his matter more fruitfully?

But now the special ways whereby he deviseth that the King's Highness and his Council should bring this thing about be twain:

The one is if they provide that neither men that be proud, nor covetous, nor have any love to the world, be suffered<sup>210</sup> to be judges in any cause of heresy.

The other is that the bishops shall arrest no man for heresy till the desire that spiritual men have to cause men [to] abjure heresies, and to punish them for heresies, be ceased and gone.

And surely I think that his two devices will serve sufficiently for the one part: that is to wit, that none innocents shall be punished. But I fear me very sore that they will not serve half so sufficiently for the other part: that is to wit, that willful offenders go not without correction.

For now to begin with his first device (that none be suffered to be judges in cause of heresy that are proud, or covetous, or have love to the world), if he mean of such as have none of these affections with notable enormity, then till he prove them that are already<sup>211</sup> worse than he proveth them yet—that is to say, till he prove it otherwise by some of their outrageous deeds in the dealing and mishandling of men for heresy that he here defameth them of, than he hath yet proved, and that he prove their cruel wrongful dealing otherwise than by “some says,” or by his own saying—the King's Highness and his Council can see, for all his wholesome counsel, no cause to change those judges that are already, but to leave them still, and then serveth that device of nought.<sup>212</sup>

And on the other side, if he mean that the King's Highness shall suffer none to be judges in cause of heresy that hath any spice<sup>213</sup> at all either of pride, or of covetise, or any love at all unto this world, heretics may sit still and make merry for a little season, while men walk about and seek for such judges. For it will not be less than one whole week's work, I ween, both to find such, and to be sure that they be such.

And it will be somewhat the more hard because that whereas<sup>214</sup> men would have weened soonest to have found them, there this Pacifier hath put us out of doubt that there shall it be marvelous hard to find any one of them: that is to wit, in any part of the spirituality—prelates, secular priests, or religious persons—any one or other. For he saith plainly that have they never so many virtues beside, yet it will be hard to find any one spiritual man but that he is so infected with desire and affection to have the worldly honor of priests exalted that he is through such pride far from such indifference and equity as ought and must be in those judges that this Pacifier assigneth, which must have no spice of pride, covetise, nor love toward the world. And then since in all the spirituality it will be, as he saith, hard to find any one, it will be, ye wot well, twice as hard to find twain; and yet be they too few for all the realm, though they were made justices of eyre.<sup>215</sup>

Now if it will be so hard to find any one such in the spirituality, I can scant believe but that it would be somewhat ado<sup>216</sup> to find many such in the temporalty either, and specially not only such but those also that the King might be sure to be such, besides that there must be then many changes and many new devices of laws for the matter, because few temporal men be sufficiently learned in those laws of the Church by which that matter hath been

204 fear 205 appropriate 206 by the body: bodily 207 nor 208 CW 9: 192/32–193/20 209 argument

210 allowed 211 them that are already: the current judges 212 of nought: for nothing 213 bit 214 where 215 justices of eyre: circuit judges—those traveling around the country 216 somewhat ado: some amount of trouble accustomed to be ordered before. And haply<sup>217</sup> if any such men be so sufficiently learned, yet is it possible that those men which are so learned are not those that are so pure and clean from every spice of pride, covetise, and worldly love. And therefore were the heretics likely thus to make merry a good while before there should be founden good judges for them.

Now as for the other point — that bishops should not arrest them — this would also help to the surety<sup>218</sup> of innocents as from any trouble of suit; and so will it also further, if neither bishop nor king arrest them. And in like wise will it save innocents from the trouble of all false indictments if no man should be neither for no felony arrested nor indicted neither.

But then this way would not well serve for the other side, that willful offenders should not pass unpunished. And thereby since it would help willful offenders to pass without punishment, it might hap to punish innocents more sore than should the trouble of suit and wrongful arresting do.

But yet is this Pacifier not so favorable toward folk suspected of heresy as to take away the power of the bishop forever of arresting them, and to drive the ordinaries forever to sue citations against heretics and process of excommunication, but will have, he saith, the bishop's power of arresting no longer suspended than as long as spiritual men have that great desire to cause men abjure or to have them punished for heresy — as though he had well proved that they have so, because he saith that some men say so.

But now if “some say” be no sufficient proof, then is his tale lost. For then he showeth no cause why that power of theirs should in any cause be more suspended now than in any time herebefore. And on the other side, if “some say” be a good proof, then the suspending will be as long as a depriving forever, since there shall never be any time in which there shall lack one or other “some say” to say more than truth.

Yet is he content at the last, lest every man might spy the peril of his device,<sup>219</sup> to temper his device in such wise that till the spirituality have left their cruel desire of abjuring and punishing folk for heresy, they should not be suffered<sup>220</sup> to arrest folk for every light suspicion or every complaint of heresy.

Howbeit, he granteth that where one is openly and notably suspected of heresy, and sufficient record and witness against him, and besides all that, a doubt<sup>221</sup> that he would flee, whereby he might infect others, then he granteth it convenient<sup>222</sup> that he should be arrested by the body.<sup>223</sup> And therein he bringeth in the Clementine and the statute by which the ordinaries have power to arrest folk for suspicion of heresy; and would, as far as I perceive, have the King reform them after his device.<sup>224</sup> But yet, since which is a light suspicion and which is a heavy, and which is a light complaint and which is a heavy, and which is an open<sup>225</sup> suspicion and which but a privy,<sup>226</sup> and which suspicion is notable and which is not notable, and which witnesses be sufficient and which be not sufficient, be things that must be weighed by the spiritual judges, and upon their weighing of the matter for light or heavy must follow the arresting of the party or the leaving of the arrest, we be come again, as in a maze, to the point where we began: that, be the matter great or small, lest all the while they be cruel they should judge light heavy and small great, their arresting of any at all must be suspended from them, and send them to sue by citation till men see that same mind of theirs of desiring men's abjuration and punishment utterly changed and cease — that is to say, till there be no man left that will so much as say that some men say that they have not left that mind yet, and make a lie again of them then as those some have done that have so said already to Sir John “Some Say” now. And long will it be, I warrant you, ere ever all such folk fail.

And therefore — since in the mean season,<sup>227</sup> by this Pacifier's good device, heretics may go unarrested — I cannot believe that if his way were followed, it would be any good means to make that willful offenders in heresy should not pass unpunished as fast<sup>228</sup> as, both in the end of this chapter and the other before also, he calleth upon the King's Highness, and his Council, and his Parliament, to look upon this matter after his good advertisement,<sup>229</sup> and never cease till they bring it to effect.

I little doubt but that if the King's Highness do as I doubt not but his Highness will do — maintain and assist the spirituality in executing of the laws, even those that are already made against heresies,

THE FORTY-SEVENTH CHAPTER

Now whereas this Pacifier saith that some of the spirituality as of policy do noise it that the realm is full of heretics more than it is indeed, I think there is no politic man of the spirituality that will make that noise, whereby the heretics might be the more bold, and the Catholics more inclinable to the worse party, and the more faint and feeble in the faith.

But I know this very well: that heretics have made that noise, both for the cause aforesaid and also to fear the ordinaries therewith, and to put their officers in dread from doing of their office. And peradventure upon such noise some officers have been afeard. And at the leastwise, I wot well, some heretics have been so bold that they have not feared to flock together — not all at the first for heresy, but some fall in among them for good company, to do some shrewd turn they cared not greatly what, but afterward with a little more acquaintance and communication, have fallen into their heresies also. And such noises be sometimes for the advantage and furtherance of them that intend unhappiness, to make folk ween they were very many, be they never so few.

I remember many times that even here in London, after the great business that was there on a May Day in the morning, by a rising made against strangers — for which diverse of the apprentices and journeymen suffered execution of treason by an old statute made long before, against all such as would violate the King's safe-conduct — I was appointed among others to search out and inquire by diligent examination in what wise and by what persons that privy confederacy began. And in good faith after great time taken, and much diligence used therein, we perfectly tried out at last that all that business of any rising to be made for the matter began only by the conspiracy of two young lads that were apprentices in Cheap. Which, after the thing devised first and compassed between them twain, perused privily the journeymen first, and after the apprentices, of many of the mean crafts in the city, bearing the first that they spoke with in hand that they had secretly spoken with many other occupations already, and that they were all agreed thereunto, and that besides them there were two or three hundred of serving men of diverse lords' houses, and some of the King's too, which would not be named nor known, that would yet in the night be at hand, and when they were once up, would not fail to fall in with them and take their part.

Now this ungracious invention and these words of those two lewd lads (which yet in the business fled away themselves, and never came again after) did put some others, by their oversight and lightness, in such a courage and boldness that they weened themselves able to avenge their displeasure in the night, and after either never to be known, or to be strong enough to bear it out and go farther.

And the like ungracious policy devise now these heretics that call themselves evangelical brethren: some pot-headed apostles they have, that wander about the realm into sundry shires, of whom every one hath in every shire a diverse name; and some peradventure in corners here and there, they bring into the brotherhood. But whether they get any or none, they let not to lie when they come home, and say that more than half of every shire is of their own sect. And the same boast Bayfield, the apostate which was after burned in Smithfield, made unto mine own self. But blessed be God, when he came to the fire, he found none very ready to pull him from it.

Howbeit, there was in one place of the Diocese of London, but late, a company that by such means, each encouraging other, took such heart and boldness, and openly by day they ensembled themselves together to the number of a hundred or above, to rescue a well-known open heretic out of the ordinary's hands. Howbeit, as many as they were, they sped not, and some of them punished after.

And in that same diocese also, when there was a priest taken for heresy, and in the commissary's hands,<sup>248</sup> word was brought him that except he delivered the priest and let him go, he should within 5 two hours have two or three hundred come fetch him that would pluck down his house or burn it over his head. Whereupon the commissary, worse afraid than hurt, delivered out the priest; whom, if he had kept still, there would peradventure for all 10 the crakes,<sup>249</sup> not one heretic of them all have been so bold to come fetch him. But yet that could I not well have warranted him.

And in some place of the same diocese also, they have made a great face<sup>250</sup> and said that though the 15 King sent his commission under his great seal therefor, they would not suffer<sup>251</sup> a sore-suspected priest of theirs for heresy to be taken thence. Howbeit, when that after I sealed a commission and sent it upon the assay,<sup>252</sup> it made their hearts (God be 20 thanked) faint and were so well come down that they laid all the wite<sup>253</sup> to a few lewd fellows and women in the town.

And therefore boast and brag these blessed brethren never so fast,<sup>254</sup> they feel full well themselves 25 that they be too feeble in what county soever they be strongest. For if they thought themselves able to mete<sup>255</sup> and match the Catholics, they would not, I ween, lie still in rest three days.

For in all places where heresies have sprung 30 hitherto, so hath it ever proved yet. And surely so negligently might it be handled, and the matter so long forsothed,<sup>256</sup> that at length, in time, so might it hap here too. And verily that they look once therefor<sup>257</sup> (as far as they be yet from the power), some 35 of them have not let<sup>258</sup> to say, nor some to write it neither. For I read the letter myself which was cast into the palace of the right reverend father in God Cuthbert, now Bishop of Durham and at that time Bishop of London,<sup>259</sup> in which, among many other 40 bragging words, meet whatsoever<sup>260</sup> they were for those heretic brethren that made it, were these words contained: "There will once come a day."

And out of question<sup>261</sup> that day they not only long for, but also daily look for, and would, if they were not too weak, not fail to find it, and in some 45 morning early, like good thriving husbands,<sup>262</sup> arise by themselves uncalled, as they suddenly did in Basel.

And the greater hope have they because in places where they fall in company, men use them not now-
50 adays as the time was when they did. For they see that it beginneth almost to grow in custom<sup>263</sup> that among good Catholic folk, yet be they suffered boldly to talk unchecked. Which thing, albeit far from commendable, yet with many folk it happeth 55 upon a good surety<sup>264</sup> that good men in their own mind conceive of the strength and fastness of the Catholic faith, which they verily think so strong that heretics, for all their babbling, shall never be able to vanquish. And therein undoubtedly their 60 mind is not only good, but also very true. But they think not far enough. For as the sea shall never surround and overwhelm all the land, and yet hath it eaten many places in, and swallowed whole coun-
65 tries up, and made many places now sea that sometime were well-inhabited lands, and hath lost part of his<sup>265</sup> own possession in other parts again, so though the faith of Christ shall never be overflown with heresies, nor the gates of hell prevail against Christ's Church, yet as in some places it winneth in 70 new people, so may there in some places by negligence be lost the old.

For if that we, because we know our cause so good, bear ourselves thereupon so bold that we make light
75 and slight of our adversaries, it may happen to fare between the Catholics and heretics at length<sup>266</sup> as it fareth sometimes in a suit at the law by some good man against whom a subtle wily shrew beginneth a 80 false action,<sup>267</sup> and asketh from him all the land he hath. This good man sometimes that knoweth his matter<sup>268</sup> so true, persuadeth to himself that it were not possible for him to lose it by the law. And when his counsel talketh with him, and asketh him how he can prove this point or that for himself, answereth 85 again, "Fear ye not for that, sir, I warrant you; all the whole county knoweth it, the matter is so true, and my part so plain, that I care not what judges, what arbiters, what twelve men go thereon. I will challenge no man, for any labor that mine adversary can make therein.” And with such good hope, the good man

 5 goeth him home, and there sitteth still and putteth no doubt in the matter. But in the meanwhile his adversary (which for lack of truth of his cause must needs put all his trust in craft) goeth about his matter busily and, by all the false means he may, maketh
 10 him friends, some with good fellowship, some with rewards, findeth a fellow to forge him false evidence, maketh means to<sup>269</sup> the sheriff, getteth a partial<sup>270</sup> panel, laboreth the jury, and when they come to the bar, he hath all his trinkets ready, whereas good Tom 15 Truth cometh forth upon the other side, and because he weeneth all the world knoweth how true his matter is, bringeth never a witness with him, and all his evidence unsorted. And one wist<sup>271</sup> I once that brought unto the bar (when the jury was sworn),
 20 and openly delivered his counsel, his tinder box with his flint and his matches, instead of his box of evidence, for that had he left at home. So negligent are good folk sometimes, when the known truth of their matter maketh them overbold.

25 And surely muchwhat after this fashion in many places play these heretics and we. For like as a few birds always chirking<sup>272</sup> and flying from bush to bush many times seem a great many, so these heretics be so busily walking that in every alehouse, in 30 every tavern, in every barge, and almost every boat, as few as they be, a man shall always find some; and there be they so busy with their talking, and in better places also where they may be heard, so fervent and importune in putting forth of anything which 35 may serve for the furtherance of their purpose that, between their importune pressing and the diligence or rather the negligence of good Catholic men, appeareth oftentimes as great a difference as between frost and fire.

40 And surely between the true Catholic folk and the false heretics, it fareth also much like as it fared between false Judas and Christ’s faithful apostles. For while they, for all Christ’s calling upon them to wake and pray, fell first in a slumber and after in a
 45 dead sleep, the traitor neither slept nor slumbered, but went about full busily to betray his Master, and bring himself to mischief.<sup>273</sup>

But yet when he came with his company, they escaped not all scot-free; nor Peter, well-awaked out of his sleep, was not so slothful but that he could cut
 50 off one knave’s ear,<sup>274</sup> nor all the wretches of them, with all their weapons, able to stand against Christ’s bare word, when he said, “I am he whom ye seek,” but to ground they fell forthwith,<sup>275</sup> upright upon their backs.<sup>276</sup> Whereby we be sure that neither heretics nor devils can anything do but by God’s special
 55 sufferance,<sup>277</sup> and that they shall, between them both, never be able to destroy the Catholic faith, nor to prevail against the Catholic Church; and all the mischief shall be their own at length, though God 60 for our sin suffer them for a scourge to prevail in some places here and there for a while; whom, upon men’s amendment he will not fail to serve at the last as doth the tender mother which, when she hath beaten her child for his wantonness,<sup>278</sup> wipeth his 65 eyes and kisseth him, and casteth the rod in the fire.

Howbeit, if ever it should (as God forbid it should, and I trust it never shall), by such cold<sup>279</sup> sloth and negligence on the Catholic part, and such hot fervent labor of the heretics, that the heretics’
 70 party should hap to grow so strong as they should conspire to give the adventure<sup>280</sup> by feat of hands,<sup>281</sup> I nothing doubt of good men’s good hearts, nor of the present aid and help of God, but that the presence of peril raising men out of this dull sleep would 75 cause them then so to wax warm and diligent in the matter that the heretics should have such speed<sup>282</sup> as they have before this time had in this realm when they have attempted the like.

But yet though the heretics’ party should (as I 80 verily trust they should) have evermore the worst, yet very sure it is that neither party should have the better; but that it would then well appear that it had been much more wisdom for all good Catholic men to have waxen warmer before, and to have repressed 85 those heretics in time, before they grew to so many.

And this thing was perceived very well both before the making of that statute of King Henry the IV, which statute this Pacifier would have now reformed, and also at the time of the making, and yet 90 much better soon after, in the reign of the Prince of famous memory, King Henry the V. For before this statute made, the Parliament, in the fifth year of King Richard the II, complained of heretics, and found great harm grow that they were not arrested, but without arrest, in contempt of the censures of Holy Church, spread their heresies about from shire to shire and from diocese to diocese. Whereof the realm feared, as the statute expresseth, that thereof would at length grow some great commotion and peril. And therefore it was then provided that at the request of the ordinary, the Chancellor should from time to time award out commissions to attach<sup>283</sup> such heretics and keep them in strong prison till they were justified and ordered<sup>284</sup> according to the laws of the Church. And yet was it afterward well perceived that this provision could not suffice. For the heretics would commonly be gone before the commission could come, and do as much hurt in another place. And therefore the Parliament, in the second year of King Henry the IV, both being informed by the clergy and also by themselves perceiving that those heretics increased still, and would at length do some great mischief but if<sup>285</sup> they were better repressed, did, among other good things, provide that the ordinaries might arrest the heretics and imprison them themselves. And yet was all that too little too. For in some places the heretics waxed too strong, and would not be arrested for<sup>286</sup> them. And therefore at last it came to that point that men long had looked for. For those heresies begun by Wycliffe in the time of the noble prince King Richard the II, and being then by some folk maintained, and by many men winked at, and almost by all folk forslothed, the peril was so long neglected that the heretics were grown unto such number, courage, and boldness that afterward, in the time of the said famous prince King Henry the Fifth, they conspired among them not only the abolition of the faith and spoiling<sup>287</sup> of the spirituality, but also the destruction of the King and all his nobility, with a plain subversion and overturning of the state of his whole realm. Upon which their false conspiracy disclosed, when they were by the policy of the noble Prince and his Council disappointed and secretly prevented,<sup>288</sup> and the field taken up before in which they had intended to gather together by night and from thence to have made their invasion, then, after due punishment done upon many of them, it was well perceived what great need it was ever after to repress and subdue such seditious heresies forthwith, at the first springing. And therefore was there by and by<sup>289</sup> thereupon, by the full Parliament, not only that law confirmed, which law this Pacifier here speaketh of in this chapter, but also more made thereunto: as that they that were delivered to the secular hands should forfeit both goods and lands, and that the great officers of the realm should be solemnly sworn to repress heretics and assist the ordinaries. And therefore undoubtedly the good Christian zeal of the Prince, the nobles, and the commons toward the maintenance of the faith, and their high wisdom in providing for the conservation of the peace, rest, and surety<sup>290</sup> of the realm, were the authors and very doers in the making and passing of that very virtuous and very prudent act. Which act, that ever this Pacifier, or a great many such, shall be able to induce this prudent Parliament to change, that will I see ere I believe. Which I trust I never shall in this time, namely<sup>291</sup> in which, though there be not the fifteenth part of so many<sup>292</sup> heretics as these that be would very fain<sup>293</sup> there were, and while there be not, yet would have them seem to be, yet are there of troth<sup>294</sup> many more than there were within these few years past; and thereby the cause for which the statute was made not only standeth still, but is, over<sup>295</sup> that, of late very greatly increased, and so more need to let those laws stand, and make more such to them besides, than by the assuaging and mitigation of any part of them to bring these heretics into such courage and surety as the goodly devices of this Pacifier could not fail, if they were followed, to bring them.

THE FORTY-EIGHTH CHAPTER

Which,<sup>296</sup> whereas he useth to the setting forth of his purpose a surmised suspicion against the spirituality, making men believe under his figure of “some say” that the spiritual judges mishandle those matters and use<sup>297</sup> themselves therein cruelly, I dare be bound to warrant that right good witnesses and worshipful<sup>298</sup> shall record and testify that they have been present and seen the judges handle

fain: very much wish 294 in truth 295 beyond 296 Who, i.e., “These heretics” 297 conduct 298 respectable

Whereof, for the meanwhile, methink I may take to record, for all his “some says,” this Pacifier himself and his own words which in this piteous book of Division himself saith. For in his first chapter he saith (as I showed you) that some men, to pull riches from the Church, have not only spoken and by plain words affirmed heresy, but have also despised pilgrimages and purgatory, and plain inveighed<sup>299</sup> against them of<sup>300</sup> policy.

Now seeth every man that any eyes hath that if the ordinaries and the spiritual judges were so fierce and so cruel as this Pacifier speaketh of, then would not those other men think that openly to speak and affirm false heresies were, for any manner purpose, any proper policy. And therefore as for such cruelty and mishandling of innocents, that this Pacifier’s tale is untrue, both other good folk can testify, and his own words also bear witness.

And therefore need we no such change of the laws for that purpose. But on the other side, what harm would come of his mitigations, and what increase of heretics, the whole sum and sequel of his devices do more than manifestly show.

For suppose me, now, that a tinker<sup>301</sup> or a tiler<sup>302</sup> which could (as some there can) read English, and being instructed and taught by some old cunning weaver in Wycliffe’s Wicket and Tyndale’s books, and Frith’s, and Friar Barnes’s, were now become himself an usher<sup>303</sup> or, after his master’s decease, a doctor,<sup>304</sup> and that were such a one as Frith writeth resorted to him, which, though he was but Frith’s disciple and scholar, was yet (he saith) more meetly<sup>305</sup> to be bishop than many that wear the mitre; now if this tinker or tiler lurking about and teaching his Gospel in corners were secretly detected<sup>306</sup> to his ordinary, and thereupon sent for, and came, he should—by the device of this Pacifier—for the first shift<sup>307</sup> say, “Bring me forth mine accuser,” and then, since the calling ex officio<sup>308</sup> were gone, home goeth the tinker again merrily for that time, and taketh forth his scholars a new lesson.

Then if the Court will appoint an officer of their own for an accuser, as an officer of a temporal court may give information for the King, the tinker yet, when he were called again, would cry out upon that. And whoso holdeth against the process ex officio would take the tinker’s part therein too, and call those twain but both one, and so home goeth the tinker again.

Then if some man (which would be long erst,<sup>309</sup> I ween) could yet at the last be founden that would offer himself as an accuser against this tinker when he were called again and his heresies were laid unto his charge, yet if the witnesses were peradventure some scholars of his own, and, lacking the wily shifts that himself had, first had denied their heresies upon their oaths, and after yet confessed them again—both upon themselves and their master tinker too—then, were there never so many of them, yet by the device of this Pacifier all their witness were nought worth,<sup>310</sup> because they were naughty men, heretics themselves, and first forsworn<sup>311</sup> also, so that yet home goeth the tinker again.

Now if there were, after other good honest proofs,<sup>312</sup> one that would come in and prove plainly the heresies that he held, when the tinker were thereto called, he would say he said it all of ignorance. Then if the matter were such as he must needs have heard of and known the true faith before, as pilgrimage, purgatory, or the Sacrament of the altar, he will not yet stick<sup>313</sup> much to say, “Bring in somebody here that will swear that ever he did teach it me.” And yet when that answer in such an open matter<sup>314</sup> will not serve, he will say that he said it of simplicity, and that he believeth as the Church believeth, he. And when he is asked how the Church believeth, he will say he wotteth nere.<sup>315</sup> And if his words be rehearsed unto him clean contrary to the common-known Catholic faith of the Church, he will say he was not aware that the Church believed so, and will say that they should not speak of such high matters, that serve for doctors, to such a poor tinker that meddleth with brass and not with Latin. And there shall he then have some of his other faculty<sup>316</sup> gather and stand about, and say it is pity indeed that such a poor simple soul should have any such questions asked him. But they will put it for no pity at all that such an unlearned fool shall, among such others as are less learned than himself, teach boldly the false part, and there brag and boast that

299 spoke vehemently 300 out of; for the sake of 301 a repairer of pots and kettles 302 a layer or maker of tiles 303 assistant teacher 304 theologian proofs: respectable witnesses 313 hesitate 314 open matter: matter of common knowledge 315 wotteth nere: has never known 316 trade; profession he better understandeth the matter than all the doctors in the town.

Yet if it appear that by sore<sup>317</sup> words he despised and inveighed against pilgrimages, and purgatory, and such other things so that he did it not of simplicity when he spoke therein so shrewdly, then hath this Pacifier taught him to say that he did it of policy to pull away riches from the Church, and therefore can that be no heresy.

Now if the judges be so sore and so cruel that they will not allow that policy, yet hath this Pacifier taught him farther to say that he did but speak it affirmatively, and will not hold it opinionatively; and then, ye wot well, it is by this Pacifier no heresy.

And therefore must his judges, when they have all done, send this tinker yet once home again, and not keep him too long away, lest his scholars should play the truants and lack their learning the while.

And yet if he said as much after again, and thereupon were called again, he might say again that he were overseen<sup>318</sup> in that saying, of a lightness of wit and slipperiness of tongue. But he will not hold it opinionatively, and therefore yet again it may be no heresy, so that home must the tinker again.

And now if it should happen him to say and do so far as he were afraid to bide any further reckoning—namely where spiritual men so fierce and so cruel should be his judges—the bishop might not arrest him yet, till proofs be brought in first that the spirituality have left their great desire to abjure and punish heretics; but must all the meanwhile cite him, suspend him, and accurse<sup>319</sup> him, and fetch him in by the King's writ when he is run out far off into another country, and there hath changed his name and set up a new school, whereas men can neither find him nor yet<sup>320</sup> wot where to seek him.

When should there by these means willful offenders be punished? Which, though this Pacifier pretend<sup>321</sup> that he would have done, yet consider these three chapters of his which I have rehearsed you—the first, the seventh, and the eighth—and ye shall find his devices come to little better effect than after this fashion that I have here described you.

And then if such good provisions may be made for them that they may never be brought in to answer, and that they may have so many shifts<sup>322</sup> whensoever they come, it will little fear them what pain ye set after conviction. Burn them twice, if ye will, after judgment; they will with good will agree, providing first such good acts for them as they shall never come so far.

And therefore, good Christian readers, would God the world were such as every man were so good—spiritual, temporal, and all—that neither party could find any fault in other, and all these heretics so clean gone and forgotten, and all those that are infected were so clean turned and changed that no man needed either abjuration or punishment. But since that this is more easy to wish than likely to look for, therefore is it wisdom that spiritual and temporal both, albeit men be not all saints, yet if their conditions be tolerable, either party labor to make himself better, and charitably somewhat either party bear with other. And those extreme vices which neither the one nor the other ought in any wise to suffer—as theft, adultery, sacrilege, murder, incest, and perjury, sedition, insurrection, treason, and heresy—both parties in one agreeing, to the honor of God and peace of Christ's Church, with rest, wealth, and surety<sup>323</sup> of the Prince and the realm, diligently reform and amend in such as are mendable, and those whose corrupt canker no cure can heal, cut off in season for corrupting farther.

THE FORTY-NINTH CHAPTER

And thus, good Christian readers, I make an end of this matter—the book, I mean, of this division; wherein I have nothing touched nor intended but only that I would not the temporalty bear the spirituality the worse mind or affection for any such subtle invented ways that lay the faults of the bad to the whole body (wherein be many good) and under a figure of “some say” say some things false themselves, nor that men should causeless, upon such surmised and unproved cruelty, change the good laws before made against heretics, whereby, to the displeasure of God and provoking of his indignation, we were likely to have the faith decay, and more harm grow thereon than any man yet can tell.

The whole sum and effect therefore of my mind in this matter is that, as touching the spirituality, I bear a tender mind of truth toward, I say, the body,

319 excommunicate

321 claim

tranquility, well-being, and safety

not toward those that are naught<sup>324</sup> therein. And this mind is every man bound to bear; and I trust so doth this Pacifier too, and will of himself, I ween, do well enough, if he use to the contrary none evil counsel.

As touching heretics, I hate that vice of theirs and not their persons, and very fain<sup>325</sup> would I that the one were destroyed and the other saved. And that I have toward no man any other mind than this (how loudly soever these blessed new brethren, the professors and preachers of verity, belie me), if all the favor and pity that I have used among them to their amendment were known, it would, I warrant you, well and plain appear; whereof, if it were requisite, I could bring forth witnesses more than men would ween.

And sure this one thing will I be bold to say: that I never found any yet but had he been never so bad, nor done never so much harm before, yet after that I found him once changed and in good mind to mend, I have been so glad thereof that I have used him from thenceforth not as an evil man or an abject,<sup>326</sup> nor as a stranger neither, but as a good man and my very friend.

Howbeit, because it were neither right nor honesty that any man should look for more thanks than he deserveth, I will that all the world wit<sup>327</sup> it, on the other side, that whoso be so deeply grounded in malice, to the harm of his own soul and other men's too, and so set upon the sowing of seditious heresies that no good means that men may use unto him can pull that malicious folly out of his poisoned proud obstinate heart, I would rather be content that he were gone in time than overlong to tarry to the destruction of others.

Finally as for the author of the book of Division, because he professeth these heretics' opinions for heresies, as they be, I trust in all his other things himself meaneth but well, but partly may be by some pitiful affection<sup>328</sup> led. And some things he saith but upon report, and some things affirmeth peradventure as of himself because of the firm credence that he therein hath given to some that were not so credible as he took them for. But in conclusion, whatsoever he be, for anything that I perceive in his book, he shall, I trust, in conclusion be founden no such manner of man as folk should of reason reckon to bear unto the weal<sup>329</sup> of the Prince and the realm any better mind than I. Howbeit, if his wit<sup>330</sup> and his learning find a better way than not only I (which am but a plain soul and can invent no novelties, but am content to stand to the old order and laws), but also than all they which for this realm in special, and for the whole Church of Christ in general, have made those provisions of old, I neither can nor will forbid any man to follow him.

But this will I be bold to counsel every man to whose part soever any such change shall pertain: first, that they have, as I doubt not but they will, a good Christian mind to the maintenance of Christ's Catholic faith, and that they therein stand by the old, without the contrary change of any point of our old belief for anything brought up for new, not only by Luther, Tyndale, Frith, or Friar Barnes, but also if there would (as there never will) an angel, as Saint Paul saith, come out of heaven and preach a contrary new.<sup>331</sup>

Secondly, forasmuch as these new fathers of these new brethren, like<sup>332</sup> as they make falsehood truth and truth falsehood, and faith heresies and heresies faith, so do call also the new old and the old new — not letting<sup>333</sup> to call in their books that faith but new which themselves confess in the same books to be more old than the age of eight hundred years — I will advise you therefore, good readers, for the true taking of the old faith, and for the discerning thereof from all new, to stand to the common well-known belief of the common-known Catholic Church of all Christian people: such faith as by yourselves, and your fathers, and your grandfathers, you have known to be believed, and have, over that, heard by them that the contrary was in the times of their fathers, and their grandfathers also, taken evermore for heresy. And also ye that read but even in English books shall in many things perceive the same by stories five times as far afore that.

We must also, for the perceiving of the old faith from new, stand to<sup>334</sup> the writings of the old holy doctors and saints, by whose expositions we see what points are expressed in the Scripture, and what points the Catholic Church of Christ hath, beside the Scripture, received and kept by the Spirit of God and tradition of his apostles.

And specially must we also stand, in this matter

324 bad 325 gladly 326 outcast
327 knows 328 disposition; inclination;

emotion 329 well-being 330 intellect 331 See Gal 1:8. 332 just 333 hesitating

334 stand to: abide by

of faith, to the determinations of Christ's Catholic Church.

Now if any man will bear other in hand<sup>335</sup> that this point or that point is not determined, or that the holy doctors of the Church write not in such wise but the contrary, then whosoever is not of such learning as to perceive by himself whether of those two say true that hold therein contrary parts, then, except the article be a plain open-known thing of itself not doubted before, let him not be light of credence in the believing either the one disputer or the other, though they would both preach high praises of their own cunning, and say that besides all their much worldly business they had spent many years about the study of Scripture, and boast that their books of divinity were worth never so much money, or that by the Spirit they were inspired and with the celestial dew suddenly sprung up divines, as lusty, fresh, and green as after any shower of rain ever sprung any bed of leeks. Let no man, I say, be light in believing them for all that, but let him by my poor counsel pray God inspire himself to believe and follow the thing that may be his high pleasure, and let him thereupon appoint with himself<sup>336</sup> to live well and, forthwith<sup>337</sup> to begin well, get himself a good ghostly<sup>338</sup> father, and shrive<sup>339</sup> him of his sins, and then, concerning the question, ask advice and counsel of those whom himself thinketh, between God and his new-cleansed conscience, for learning and virtue most likely, without any partial leaning, indifferently to tell him truth.

And thus far I say for the faith itself, because I hear some men much speak and boast that they will labor for declarations<sup>340</sup> of heresy, which, as meseemeth, is a thing that little needeth. For I never wist<sup>341</sup> any man in my life put in trouble for any point of heresy but such points as were for heresy well and openly known among the common people. And Saint Paul saith that heresies be manifest and open, so that he thought, as it seemeth, that there needed none other declaration than the common-received faith of the Christian people to the contrary.

But now as touching any new order<sup>342</sup> concerning heresies, with the change of laws before devised for the repression of them, I have no more to say therein, but advise every good man endeavor himself to keep well the laws already made of old, except he see the cause of the making changed, or some other great necessity, and that he see that point by more ordinary means proved than either by "some say" or "they say," or "many say," or else that he perceive well, at the least, that those folk which would labor to change them be better and wiser both than ever were those that made them. And thus finish I this matter concerning heresies, beseeching our Lord and Savior for his bitter Passion that, as his holy sacraments thereof took their strength, so by the prayer of all those holy saints that have both by their holy doctrine and example of living, some of them planted the faith and some of them in sundry times well watered the plants,<sup>343</sup> so himself will of his goodness specially now vouchsafe as the warm sun (the very eternal only-begotten Son of his eternal Father) to spread his beams upon us, and aspire<sup>344</sup> his breath into us, and in our hearts, as Saint Paul saith, give his faith strength and increase.

THE FIFTIETH CHAPTER

Now come I to the last fault that the brethren find in my books. For as for one more that was showed me within this seven-night, I not so much esteem as to vouchsafe to answer: that is to wit, where they reprove that I bring in, among the most earnest matters, fancies and sports and merry tales. For as Horace saith, a man may sometimes say full sooth in game.<sup>345</sup> And one that is but a layman, as I am, it may better haply<sup>346</sup> become him merrily to tell his mind than seriously and solemnly to preach. And over this, I can scant<sup>347</sup> believe that the brethren find any mirth in my books. For I have not much heard that they very merrily read them.

But as to the last fault that they find, which I was about now to speak of, whereas they say that as concerning the Church, I have not fulfilled my promise, I shall here first put you in remembrance what my promise was.

In the end of my preface before Tyndale's Confutation, these are my very words:

335 bear . . . hand: lead others to believe 336 appoint with himself: resolve 337 immediately 338 spiritual

339 absolve 340 explanations; clarifications 341 knew 342 procedure 343 See 1 Cor 3:6. 344 breathe

345 sooth in game: truth in jest. See Satires, 1.1.24–25. 346 perhaps 347 scarcely

Now shall I (God willing) at my next leisure go farther in his book, and come to the very breast<sup>348</sup> of all this battle: that is to wit, the question, Which is the Church? For that is the point that 5 all these heretics, by all the means they may, labor to make so dark that by their wills no man should wit<sup>349</sup> what they mean. But I trust to draw the serpent out of his dark den, and as the poets feign that Hercules drew up Cerberus, the mas-
 10 tiff of hell, into the light where his eyes dazed,<sup>350</sup> so shall I, with the grace of that light which illumineth every man that cometh into this world,<sup>351</sup> make you that matter so lightsome and so clear to every man that I shall leave Tyndale never a dark corner to creep into, able to hide his head. Then
 15 after that I have so clearly confuted Tyndale concerning that point, and shall have plainly proved you the sure and steadfast authority of Christ's Catholic known Church, against all Tyndale's trifling sophistications — which he would should<sup>352</sup>
 20 seem so solemn subtle insolubles,<sup>353</sup> which ye shall see proved very frantic follies — after this done, I say, before I go farther with Tyndale, I purpose to answer good young Father Frith.<sup>354</sup>

25 Now good readers, whoso list<sup>355</sup> to say that I have not fulfilled this promise, if he read not my book, I cannot make him see the thing that he list not to look on.

30 If he have read it, and think himself not satisfied, I cannot make him perceive more than his wit will serve him.

If he understand it well, and yet will say my promise is not fulfilled, I cannot let him for his pleasure to lie. But let him, whatsoever he be, put 35 in writing what moveth him so to say, and I shall then, I doubt not, make other folk perceive that all my promise in that point I have fully performed and more: that is to wit, by as much more at the least as all mine eight books amounteth. For like as in the others I have fully confuted Tyndale's church, so have I in that book confuted, as for this world, 40 the church that Friar Barnes had falsely framed here also, whereof I promised nothing. So that, as touching the certainty of the Church and of the infallible doctrine thereof, whoso read and advise<sup>356</sup> well 45 this work of mine made for the confutation of Tyndale, and therewith read and consider the seven first chapters and the last of my second book of my Dialogue, whereupon Tyndale made all his work, I doubt not but he that thus will do shall find himself 50 fully satisfied.

And therefore, good Christian readers, as for such further things as I have in my said preface promised, I purpose to pursue at some other, further leisure. But first I think it better to bestow some time upon 55 another thing, and leaving for a while both defense of mine own faults and finding of other men's in writing, think better to bestow some time about the mending of mine own in living, which is a thing 60 now for many men more necessary than is writing. For of new bookmakers there are now more than enough.

Wherefore, that all such as will write may have the grace to write well or, at the leastwise, none 65 other purpose than to mean well, and as well writers as others to amend our own faults and live well, I beseech Almighty God to grant us; and that all folk spiritual and temporal in this world living, and all good Christian souls departed hence and yet 70 not out of pain, may for grace every party pray for other; and all the blessed holy saints in heaven, both here for grace and there for glory, pray to God for us all. Amen.

The Debellation of Salem and Bizance

The intensity and importance of More's final contest with Christopher St. German (and therefore with Henry VIII and Cromwell) are indicated by the rapid-fire publications between these two legal scholars. In December 1532 St. German published anonymously, with the King's printer, his thirty-five-page Treatise Concerning the Division Between the Spirituality and the Temporality. In April 1533, More's 172-page response was already in print, somewhat disguised, as his Apology. More's reply, laced with satire and humor, prompted St. German to publish his seventy-page response in September, Salem and Bizance: A Dialogue Between Two English Men—again anonymously and again with the King's printer. By November, More's detailed reply of 230 pages was published—having been written, More says, “in a few days.” Within three months, Henry VIII was insisting upon More's imprisonment. What would follow was legislation, not debate.

At stake, More argues in his Debellation, are “the very good, old, and long-approved laws both of this realm and of the whole corps of Christendom, which laws this Pacifier in his book of Division” attacks with “warm words and cold reasons.” The “Pacifier” claims that he writes to achieve peace but, as More argued in The Apology, the Division's effect was quite the contrary.

As in his Apology, More again challenges the Pacifier to give even one example of his accusations that English bishops used unjust procedures in their ecclesiastical courts. Nowhere either in Division or in Salem and Bizance did St. German give such an example. Instead, he offered what “some say,” thus giving rise to More's second satirical name for this opponent: “Sir John Some Say.” Despite More's sharp satire, St. German would give no examples in his mid-1534 New Additions of Salem and Bizance. As legal scholar H. A. Kelly observes, More explains in both The Apology and with even greater detail in The Debellation that the legal procedures of the English ecclesiastical courts were “very workable and reasonable” and “already contained the procedures and safeguards that [St. German] required”—while

St. German's own proposals were “unworkable because there were too many disadvantages and dangers” involved (“Thomas More on Inquisitorial Due Process,” English Historical Review, vol. 123 [2008]: 893–94). In Tudor historian John Guy's summary: “Throughout the five closing chapters of the Debellation, More emphasized what he had said before, that the King's Council had investigated the critics' complaints and had vindicated the spiritual judges” (CW 10: lxxx–ix). The Pacifier went still further, however, accusing the clergy of acting as a “confederacy . . . against the King's laws and the old customs of the realm,” even when, More argued, their procedures were recently and long approved by Parliament and custom and the international Church.

St. German's importance in Cromwell's and Henry's political program is particularly clear, John Guy explains, “because St. German was at work in 1531 on a program of parliamentary reform and propaganda designed to purchase peace between church and state at the expense of the clergy's traditional privileges and jurisdictional independence” (CW 10: xxxix). In More's mind, “St. German was a dangerous man because his general theory of English law and institutions denied the independent legislative and jurisdictional powers of the church” (xxix). Guy further notes that St. German “was the first Englishman to articulate the theory of the sovereignty of the king in parliament—the theory that grounded the English Reformation and finally prevailed” (xxxix–xl).

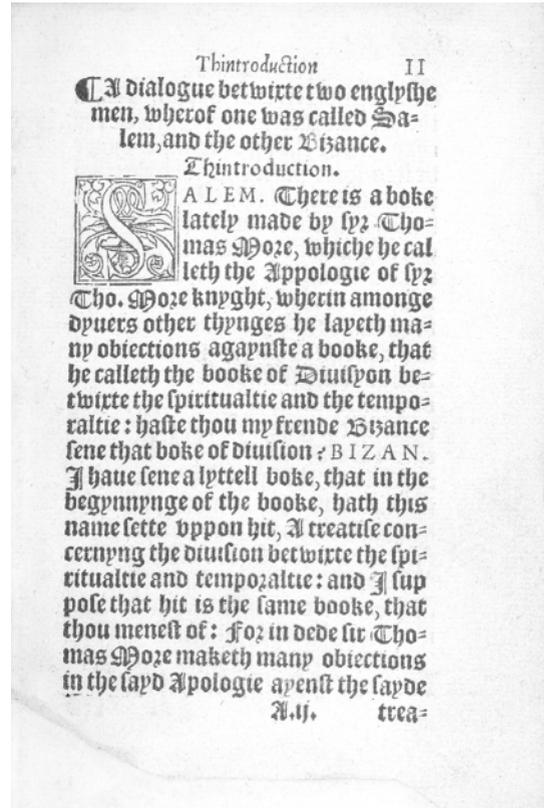

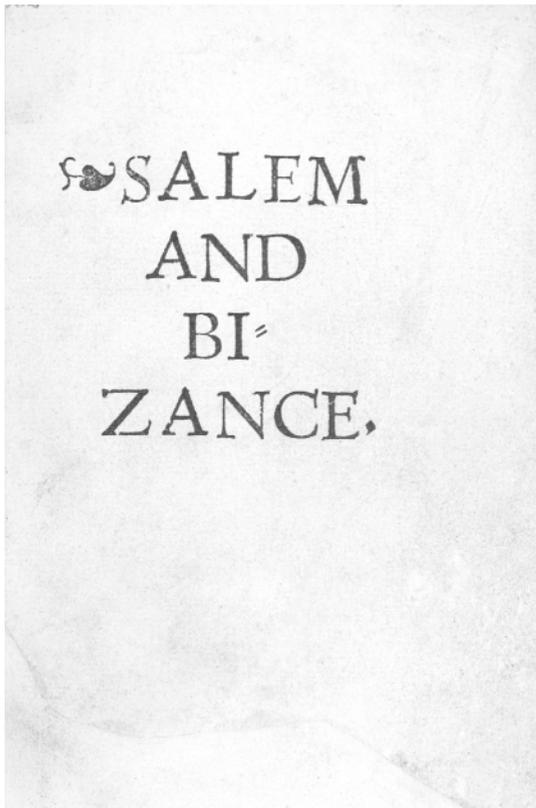

The danger More personally faced in this legal contest was great, and in the Preface of the Debellation, More draws attention to the anger caused by his Apology. More reports: “heard I shortly that thick and threefold the pens went to work, and answers were a-making, diverse, by diverse very great cunning men.” More responds with Debellation, however, because he is sure that the “shrewd, malicious intent that was purposed in [the] first book, of Division,” is still at work, the same strategy More had already pointed out in his Supplication of Souls—the intent of “deadly defamation of the whole spirituality.” In Debellation, More calls Sir John Some Say’s writings “seditious slanderous books” designed to increase division “under color of reformation” (CW 10: 15/5–9).

Only the beginning and end of More’s Debellation are given here because, as More explains, his basic argument is the same as in his Apology, and More quotes long sections of that work again in Debellation. So why write another book about the same topic? More asks that question himself, and the most pressing reason he gives in his Preface is that Sir John Some Say, in responding, “for the most part used a pretty craft: to misrehearse my matter and leave my words out. Yea, and besides this, the man hath in some places left out some of his own, and misrehearsed them to make the reader ween that, in the reprovng them, I had written wrong.” As a result, More decides it is necessary to respond to Salem and Bizance in a detailed and orderly way, replying, as he explains in his conclusion, “to every chapter of his book by row [in order].” The result is More’s side of the argument, expressed with urgency and vigor, about the nature of law and England’s legal future.

This response by Christopher St. German to Thomas More’s Apology was published anonymously in September 1533 by the King’s printer, Thomas Berthelet. The book’s full title (given above on page ii), is A dialogue between two Englishmen, whereof one was called Salem, and the other Bizance. After More’s 270-page reply published in November, The Debellation of Salem and Bizance, St. German responded again anonymously in mid-1534 with New Additions of Salem and Bizance.

The Debellation of Salem and Bizance

by Sir Thomas More

5 The Debellation<sup>2</sup> of Salem and Bizance<sup>3</sup> — sometime<sup>4</sup> two great towns, which, being under the great Turk, were between Easter and Michaelmas<sup>5</sup> last past (this present year of our Lord, 1533) with a marvelous metamorphosis enchanted and turned into two Englishmen by the wonderful inventive wit and witchcraft of Sir John Some Say, the Pacifier and so by him conveyed hither in a dialogue,<sup>6</sup> to defend his Division<sup>7</sup> against The Apology<sup>8</sup> of Sir Thomas More, Knight. But now — being thus, between the said Michaelmas and Halloweentide next ensuing, in this debellation vanquished — they be fled hence and vanished, and are become two towns again, with those old names changed, “Salem” into “Jerusalem” and “Bizance” into “Constantinople,” the one in Greece, the other in Syria, where they may see them that will,<sup>9</sup> and win them that can.
And if the Pacifier convey them hither again, and ten such other towns with them, embattled in such dialogues, Sir Thomas More hath undertaken to put himself in the adventure alone against them all. But and if<sup>10</sup> he let them tarry still there, he will not utterly forswear<sup>11</sup> it, but he is not much minded as yet, age now so coming on and waxing all unwieldy,<sup>12</sup> to go thither and give the assault to such well-walled towns, without some such lusty<sup>13</sup> company as shall be somewhat likely to leap up a little more lightly.<sup>14</sup>

THE PREFACE

Sir Thomas More to the Christian Readers

If any man marvel (as I ween some wise men will) that ever I would vouchsafe to bestow any time about making answer to the Pacifier’s Dialogue, considering his faint and his feeble reasoning: I cannot, in good faith, well excuse myself therein.<sup>15</sup> For as I suddenly went in hand therewith<sup>16</sup> and made it in a breyde:<sup>17</sup> so when I since considered how little need it was, I marveled mine own self, and repented too, that I had not regarded the book as it was worthy, and without any one word let it even<sup>18</sup> alone. Howbeit,<sup>19</sup> good readers, what one thing or twain<sup>20</sup> specially moved me to make answer to it, and how it happened me to fall in hand therewith and to spend and lose a little time about it, to make the matter

the more plain unto you, that thing shall I show you.

As soon as mine Apology was once come out abroad, anon<sup>21</sup> heard I word that some were very wroth<sup>22</sup> therewith. And yet in my mind had there no man cause, neither preacher nor pacifier, no, nor no heretic neither. For I had but spoken for myself, and for good folk, and for the Catholic faith — without reproach or reproof to any man’s person, or willing any man any harm that were willing to amend. And whoso<sup>23</sup> were willing to be naught<sup>24</sup> still, had cause to be wroth with himself, you wot<sup>25</sup> well, and not with me.

But all this would not serve me, for very wroth were they with me. Howbeit, their causeless anger did not greatly grieve me. For I was not so far unreasonable as to look for reasonable minds in unreasonable men.

But then heard I shortly that thick and threefold the pens went to work, and answers were a-making, diverse, by diverse very great cunning<sup>26</sup> men. And of this travail of such great mountainous hills, I heard much speech made almost every week — so far forth that at last it was told me for truth that unto one little piece one great cunning man had made a long answer of twelve whole sheets of paper, written near together and with a small hand.<sup>27</sup>

But in good faith, I could but laugh at that. For as for that piece, I was very sure that the cunningest man that could come thereto, neither in twelve sheets nor in twelve quires<sup>28</sup> neither, write as near as he could, should never answer it well.

For that piece was the answer that in mine Apology I make, as you see there, unto certain sermons wherein my Dialogue<sup>29</sup> was touched<sup>30</sup> for writing against Tyndale's false translation; and wherein was also defended, against my Confutation,<sup>31</sup> Tyndale's wise<sup>32</sup> chapter in which, against my Dialogue, he laboreth to prove that the Word was before the Church — and in all his chapter never toucheth the point; and the sermon that defended him walketh as wide as he.

It was told me, as I say, that answer was made to that place, and what shift<sup>33</sup> there was found to the remnant, that could I not hear. But to the first point
I heard say that there was devised that whereas I rehearse that the preacher spoke of “poisoned bread,”
I rehearsed him wrong, for he spoke but of “moldy bread.” And this piece, it was told me that in that new answer it was reasoned at length, and set forth very lustily.

But come the book abroad once, I shall soon abate that courage.<sup>34</sup> For first, since he taketh record that he said but “moldy bread,” if I bring witness also that he said “poisoned bread,” then can his witness stand him in none other stead but for to prove for him that he said both.

Secondly shall I prove that he said “poisoned bread” by such means that men shall see by reason that though the other were possible — yet was it far unlikely.

Finally shall I further prove that though the man had said not “poisoned bread” but only “moldy bread” — yet shall I prove, I say, that as the case stood, that same not “poisoned bread” but “moldy bread” was yet, for all that, a very poisoned word.

Hearing, therefore, that this gay book was made of the twelve sheets of paper, and lacked but overlooking,<sup>35</sup> and that many more were in hand that shortly should come out, like as a husband whose wife were in her travail hearkeneth every
so since I so much heard of so sore<sup>38</sup> travail of so many, so cunning, about diverse answers, I longed of their long labor to see some good speed,<sup>39</sup> and some of those fair babes born that they travailed on.

And when these great hills had thus travailed long, from the week after Easter till as much before Michaelmas, the good hour came on as God would, that one was brought abed, with sore labor at last delivered of a dead mouse. The mother is yet but green, good soul, and hath need of good keeping; women wot what caudle<sup>40</sup> serveth against her afterthroes.<sup>41</sup>

Now after that the book was out and came into my hands and that I saw the manner and the fashion thereof two things only moved me to write and meddle with it. One, that I saw therein followed and pursued the selfsame shrewd<sup>42</sup> malicious intent that was purposed in his first book, of Division: that is to wit, to make the ordinaries,<sup>43</sup> with fear of slander and obloquy,<sup>44</sup> leave their duties undone and let heretics alone, and over<sup>45</sup> that, with an evil new change of good old laws, labor to put heretics in courage, and thereby decay the faith.

This was indeed the very special point that made me write yet again. And yet found I so little reason in his reasoning that methought it should not need.<sup>46</sup> For this wist<sup>47</sup> I very well: that whosoever had wit, and would confer<sup>48</sup> and compare together the words of his answer with the words of mine Apology, should soon perceive that his answers were even<sup>49</sup> very dull and dead.

But then was there another thing that I considered in it — which point, unprovided for, might soon deceive the reader. For albeit the Pacifier hath in some places put in mine own words where it pleased him, yet hath he for the most part used a pretty craft:
to misrehearse my matter and leave my words out.
Yea, and besides this, the man hath in some places left out some of his own, and misrehearsed them to make the reader ween<sup>50</sup> that, in the reproving<sup>51</sup> them, I had written wrong.

Now had I supposed to remedy those things, and make him an answer, in three or four leaves, with only pointing the reader to the places,<sup>52</sup> with writing in what leaf he should find the matter. For the words once read — the trouble should show itself.

28 sets of four sheets, each sheet yielding twelve leaves 29 Dialogue of Sir Thomas More, Knight 30 mentioned; criticized 31 Confutation of Tyndale's Answer 32 clever 33 tactic 34 abate... courage:

put an end to that confidence 35 proof-reading 36 hearkeneth every handwhile: is on the alert at every moment 37 gladly 38 great 39 success 40 medicinal drink 41 pain following childbirth 42 wicked

43 bishops; Church authorities 44 ill repute 45 beyond 46 be necessary 47 knew 48 put side by side 49 fully 50 think 51 refuting 52 the passages in the Apology

But while I was thus minded and went there-about—his answer in his Dialogue had found such a way, with walking to and fro, keeping no manner order, and therewith making me seek so long for 5 some one place, that I saw well I should sooner answer him all anew than find out for many things the place that I should seek for. I made, therefore, in few days, this answer that you see. And some such places yet as I had happed to find, I have remitted<sup>53</sup> 10 the reader unto in mine Apology, where for his ready finding, I have numbered him the leaf. And yet have I for some folk done somewhat more too. For I see well, surely many men are nowadays so delicate<sup>54</sup> in reading, and so loath to labor, that they fare in other 15 books as women fare with their primer,<sup>55</sup> which though they be content to say sometimes the Fifteen Psalms,<sup>56</sup> and over that, the Psalms of the Passion<sup>57</sup> too, if they find them all fair set out in order at length—yet will they rather leave them all unsaid 20 than turn back to seek them out in other parts of their primer.

And therefore, lest some readers might hap in this book to do the same, some places of the Apology much necessary and not long, that with much 25 seeking I fortun'd to find out, to ease the reader's labor and make all open unto him, I have put in also into mine answer here. Yea and yet over this, in the things of most weight, I have put into this book his own words too. And so shall you, good 30 readers, without any pain of seeking, have all the matter plain and open before your eyes, that ye shall well see that I love the light no less than this Pacifier would fain walk in the dark. For, as the dark is in this matter all his advantage, even so is verily 35 the light in like wise mine. And whereas there are some that commend his answer for the compendi-ous brevity thereof and shortness, I nothing therein envy the man's praise. For like as no man can make a shorter course than he that lacketh both his legs, 40 so can no man make a shorter book than he that lacketh as well words as matter. And yet when, by the places conferred so well together, the feebleness of his answer shall appear, then shall he lose the praise of shortness too. For when it shall well 45 be seen that he saith nothing to the purpose, then shall every wise man think his book too long by all together. And that you may well perceive that so it is in deed, let us now leave of the preface and fall into the matter.

THE TWENTY-FIRST CHAPTER [Conclusion]

50

In his twenty-first chapter (beginning in the 84th leaf), because I said in mine Apology<sup>58</sup> that there be few parts in his book of Division that shall, if they be well considered, appear so good at length as they 55 seem to some men at the first sight and at superficial reading, he provoketh<sup>59</sup> me to show what other faults I find therein. And then, to prick me forward, he bringeth forth two or three things which he saith it seemeth most likely that I should mean. But 60 wherefore<sup>60</sup> it should be most likely that I should mean those things—thereof showeth he nothing—but leaveth folk occasion to think that his own mind misgiveth him in those things. For me hath he never heard make any business of them.

And afterward, in the leaf 91, again he provoketh 65 me to the same. And there he reciteth how many chapters of his I meddle<sup>61</sup> not with; wherein he might have made a shorter work if he would have let them stand that I touched<sup>62</sup> not and have spoken of them only that I touched—for they were very 70 few—as he that was very unwilling to have touched any one at all, save for the much evil that covertly was cloaked in them. And for the withdrawing of that cloak, that men might the better see what it meant, I touched the first chapter for a show,<sup>63</sup> and 75 the seventh and the eighth for that<sup>64</sup> they labored, to the great decay of the Catholic faith, to put away or change into worse the most especially good laws, both of the whole Church and of this realm, that have been made and observed long for the preser-80 vation thereof.<sup>65</sup> And the first chapter was in effect nothing else but by false slanderous surmises against the ordinaries (as though they mishandled men for heresy) a shrewd<sup>66</sup> preparative to it. And therefore, 85 leaving his other trifles alone—I answered in effect

<sup>53</sup> referred <sup>54</sup> fastidious, particular the Gradual Psalms, or Songs of Ascents;

only these, of which so much harm might grow. Which things if they had been out of his book, all the remnant, good and bad together, should have gone forth for me, and therefore yet so shall they.

5 For I purpose not to embusy myself with confuting of every fault that I find in every man's book. I should have then overmuch ado.

Nor I will not dispraise or deprave<sup>67</sup> anything that I think good either in his book or in any man's 10 else. And therefore I have in mine Apology said expressly that he saith some things well. But forasmuch as there be many things naught<sup>68</sup> too, I give therefore the reader warning not to walk away with them over-hastily, but read them with judgment 15 and advise them well—and not believe every spirit, but prove whether it be of God or not—and that that is good, take; and that that is evil, let it go to the devil.

20 great good mind of Salem toward the vanquishing of the great Turk and conquering of the Holy Land, wherein he spendeth the other three chapters of his book. But I mislike much, again, that as he would dilate the faith by force of sword in far countries
25 hence—so he laboreth to change and take away the good and wholesome laws whereby the faith is preserved here at home. I like also marvelously well that such points of the Catholic faith as heretics now labor to destroy, as praying to saints, pilgrimage, and purgatory, and the sacraments, and especially the Blessed Sacrament of the altar, whereof 30 in the 86th leaf he speaketh so well that, as help me God, it did me good to read it—this, I say, liketh me marvelously well: that the right faith of<sup>70</sup> these points, he confesseth so well and so fully for his own person. But the better opinion that I have of his own person therein, the more sorry am I to see that his books are, by some shrewd counsel, handled in such wise as, if they were followed, would make 35 the faith decay and perish in many other folk. This is the great thing that in his books grieveth me.

For as for the point that he speaketh of in the leaf 91, of that the priests should eat no flesh from Quinquagesima<sup>71</sup> to Easter, I take it for a matter 45 as small as he doth. But then he asketh me wherefore in the thirty-first chapter of mine Apology, beginning in the 175th leaf,<sup>72</sup> I make so great a matter of it. Whoso list<sup>73</sup> to read the chapter shall see that I wrote it not all in vain, nor show myself unwilling that the priests should do it neither, though 50 they be not bound to it. But the less that the weight of the matter was, the more cause this man gave me to speak thereof. For the more was he to blame to put that, and other such small matters as that is, for causes of so great a division as he surmiseth<sup>74</sup> that 55 this is. This was, lo, the cause that made me to speak thereof. Which cause this man gave himself and therefore needeth not to marvel as he doth, wherefore I spoke thereof.

And therefore thus have I, good readers, now
60 replied to every chapter of his book by row,<sup>75</sup> save only the last three, which go about a good voyage into the Holy Land, a great way far off from me. And I have not leaped to and fro, now forward, now backward, in such manner as he playeth in his answer made unto me, without either order kept or 65 cause appearing wherefore, save only the cause that every man may spy: that he would not have it seen what places<sup>76</sup> he left untouched.<sup>77</sup> Which is, in a manner,<sup>78</sup> the most part of altogether<sup>79</sup> that in my 70 book is touched of the three chapters of his. And I have, on the other side,<sup>80</sup> not left any one piece unproved<sup>81</sup> that myself spoke of before, or that anything pertained unto me.

And therefore whereas, in the beginning of the 75 twenty-second chapter, Simkin<sup>82</sup> Salem giveth his sentence<sup>83</sup> upon the said answer to the said Apology, and alloweth<sup>84</sup> the said answer well, methinketh that if he considered, not only how much he hath left unanswered, and how much of his own 80 words undefended which he nothing hath touched at all, but over that, how feebly he hath defended those things that he hath touched here—Salem being indifferent<sup>85</sup> had been like to have allowed it but a little.
85

For, setting aside for the while all the remnant, if he go but to the very principal point alone—wherein he laboreth to change and put away those good laws, the change whereof (such as he deviseth) the decay of the Catholic faith and the increase of 90 heresies would follow—in that point alone, I say we lay against him the common consent of this realm. And he layeth his own reason against it. We lay against him the consent of the general council. And against this he layeth his own reason. We lay against him the general approbation of all Christian realms. And against this he layeth his own reason. And what is his own irrefragable<sup>86</sup> reason that he layeth against all this? Surely no more, as you see, but that by those laws an innocent may sometime take wrong.<sup>87</sup> Against this reason we lay him that if this reason should stand, then against malefactors there could no law stand. We lay against it also that by his devices, if they were followed, by the increase of heresies many innocents must needs take much more wrong.

To this answereth he that he will not answer that. And now, when Salem seeth that he cannot answer that, and seeth that all the weight of the matter hangeth upon that, then Sim Salem giveth sentence that he hath answered very well. But surely if such answering be well, I wot<sup>88</sup> not which way a man might answer ill.

And therefore whereas Simkin Salem saith that if this good man will, he will cause a friend of his answer all the remnant — he may do this good man a much more friendly turn if he make his friend answer this better first, that this good man hath answered already. Howbeit,<sup>89</sup> if they list<sup>90</sup> thus to give over this, and assay<sup>91</sup> what they can say better to any other piece — let them in God’s name hardily go to, for me. And if they say anything meetly<sup>92</sup> to the matter, I will put no friend to pain to make them answer, but at leisure convenient shall answer them myself. And where they say well, I will not let<sup>93</sup> to say so. And where they say wrong, I will not let to tell them. But on the other side, if they go no better to work, nor no nearer to the matter, than this man hath done — I shall peradventure<sup>94</sup> let them even alone, and let them like their writing themselves, and no man else. But now letting pass all the special points — I shall answer the generalities that this good man speaketh of. For in the leaf 90 these are his words:

And now shall I say somewhat further in a generality, as Master More hath done, and that is this: that all that I speak in the said treatise was to appease<sup>95</sup> this division, and not to begin any, nor to continue it. And therefore how they can salve their conscience that say I did rather intend a division than agreement, I cannot tell; their own conscience shall be judge. And I intended also somewhat to move<sup>96</sup> that might be occasion to put away abusions,<sup>97</sup> evil examples, and heresies — and not to increase them or maintain them, I dare boldly say.

To this I answer that it neither was nor is my mind that men should think that he meant evil himself, as I have in many places of mine Apology testified. But verily I thought, and yet think, that by some wily shrews<sup>98</sup> his book was so mishandled that it meant naught<sup>99</sup> though he meant well. For whereas he saith that with his book of Division all his purpose was to appease division — I will not contend with him upon his own mind. But surely this will I say: that if I had been of the mind to sow and set forth division, I would have used even the selfsame ways to kindle it that he used (as he saith) to quench it.

Then goeth he further and saith:

And further, as Master More knoweth better than I, Mentire est contra mentem ire; that is to say, “To lie is when a man saith against his own mind.” And in good faith, in all that treatise, I speak nothing but that I thought was true.

To this I answer that indeed such a thing I have read, and, as I remember, in Aulus Gellius. Which thing though I have now no leisure to look for, yet two points I remember thereof. One, that it is there mentiri, and not mentire — which infinitive mode in what book of grammar this good man hath found, I cannot tell. I was afeard it had been overseen<sup>100</sup> in the printing. But I have looked<sup>101</sup> the corrections, and there find I no fault found therein.

The other point I remember: that there is a difference put between mentiri and mendacium dicere; that is, as we might say, between him that wittingly<sup>102</sup> lieth and him that telleth a lie weening<sup>103</sup> that it were true. And there it is said, “Wittingly not to tell a lie pertaineth to a good man. And not to tell

suffer injustice 88 know 89 know 90 choose 91 try 92 appropriately

93 refrain 94 perhaps 95 settle 96 propose 97 abuses 98 scoundrels

99 badly 100 overlooked 101 examined 102 knowingly 103 thinking

a lie unawares is the part of a wise man.” And surely, since the Scripture saith that he that shortly<sup>104</sup> believeth is over light,<sup>105</sup> this good man to believe so many lies so soon and with so many “some says” to set them forth in print, to the rebuke and slander of the spiritual<sup>106</sup> judges and make men ween they mishandled men for heresies, though the man’s innocent mind made the sin the less, yet was the thing at the least no less than a very great lightness; yea, and also a great proof toward the reproof<sup>107</sup> of his words that follow next, where he goeth further thus:

And further, I will ascertain<sup>108</sup> Master More, as far as in me is, that I neither had any “subtle shrews’ counsel” nor any evil counsel at the making of the said treatise which he calleth the “book of Division” (as is said before).

To this I answer that albeit this good man and I be at much variance<sup>109</sup> here in diverse things—yet for the good and plain profession of the Catholic faith that I find in him, in good faith I much better love him than in that point to believe him. For if he said therein true, then were all the faults only his own, in which, as I have often said, I much rather think that some subtle shrews have deceived him.

And besides sundry other things that lead me so to think, one very strong thing is this, that every man may well see by his book: that all such as have resorted<sup>110</sup> to him to tell him any such things as under “some says” he put out again, have always told him evil, and never told him good. And of mishandling for heresies have ever told him lies, and never told him true. For whereas the punishment for heresies hath been very little anywhere, save even here at hand<sup>111</sup>—and here but right done to them, and that with much favor too—they have made him, good seely<sup>112</sup> soul, believe that ordinaries mishandle men for heresy in manner<sup>113</sup> throughout the realm.

Also, whereas such slanderous clamor hath been sundry times of late, in all that ever complained, plainly proved false before the King’s most honorable Council, not one man came to tell him nothing thereof, nor not one “some say” thereof written in all his book; and over<sup>114</sup> this, whereas mine own self have plainly told him the same things in mine Apology by writing—yet (which most marvel were of all, save for such wily shrews) every man may well see that he never read it. For he saith not one word thereto. And therefore it is easy to perceive, whatsoever himself say, which is loath of his goodness to put other folk in fault, that there be some wily shrews so much about him that they neither suffer<sup>115</sup> him anything to hear but that themselves list<sup>116</sup> to tell him, nor yet<sup>117</sup> anything to read but where themselves list to turn him.

And now, since I have here answered these generalities of his—I will not long encumber you with any generalities of mine own, but generally I would that all were well. And so help me, my Savior, and none otherwise, but as I would wish no heretic one halpworth<sup>118</sup> harm, that had clearly<sup>119</sup> left his heresy and were well turned to God. But on the other side, whoso stick still therein, rather would I wish him sorrow to<sup>120</sup> his sin, whereby there are many folk many times amended, than prosperously to proceed in his mischief<sup>121</sup> to the loss of his own soul and other men’s too. And toward that point, against all malefactors in the spirituality<sup>122</sup> and the temporality<sup>123</sup> too, would I wish all good folk of both parties to agree, and each love other well, and stick fast to the faith, which were likely sore to decay by the change of these good laws that this good man goeth about to destroy. For whose unreasonableness therein the better to be perceived, with the danger and peril that would ensue thereon, I will desire<sup>124</sup> you, good readers, to resort<sup>125</sup> to mine Apology, and beginning at the leaf 270, read unto the leaf 287,<sup>126</sup> wherein you shall, I trust, be well and fully satisfied. And unto all that ever is in all that spoken—this man hath nothing said.

And whereas in confuting the faults that this man findeth in the suit ex officio<sup>127</sup> and the laws made against heretics, I have used some examples of the common law, which this man hath labored to prove unlike, and I have therein clearly confuted him afresh; it may peradventure happen that he will now take another way therein, and say that in such points those spiritual<sup>128</sup> laws may be reformed, and those temporal<sup>129</sup> too.

Howbeit,<sup>130</sup> if he so say, but if<sup>131</sup> men forget what hath been said before, else shall they see that his saying will not serve him.

For first, as I have said ofter than once already,
5 the same things in the common law be not to be changed. For if they be, there shall come thereof more harm than good. And if it happen one innocent to take harm by the law, there shall five for one take more harm by the change.

10 Moreover, if we should for that cause change those temporal laws—that is to wit, because some innocent may sometime take harm by them—we must change, by the same reason, all that old-used law that a man may be arrested, and remain
15 in prison till he find sureties<sup>132</sup> for the peace, upon the bare<sup>133</sup> oath of his enemy that saith he is afeard of him. For by that law may sometime an innocent take harm too. And yet must that law stand if we do well. For else shall there, by the change, more inno-20 cents take more harm.

What trouble have there many men in Wales by that they be compelled to be bound<sup>134</sup> to the peace, both for themselves and for their servants and other friends too? And yet is the order<sup>135</sup> there so necessary 25 that in many lordships it may not be forborne.<sup>136</sup>

And surely if we fall to changing laws upon that simple ground—we must then change so many that it would not be well.

Besides this, if men should reform and change
30 a law because that an innocent may sometime take<sup>137</sup> harm thereby, then must they when they have changed it, change it yet again, and after that change, yet change it again, and so forth, change after change, and never cease changing till the world
35 be all changed at the Day of Doom.<sup>138</sup> For never can all the wits that are in it make any one penal law such that none innocent may take harm thereby.

Howbeit, if a new law were drawn and put forth to be made against any such mischief as would else
40 do much harm, good reason it were to take an exception to the bill, and show that innocents might be much harmed by this point or that, and therewith provide the remedy and put it in the law, and stop as many such gaps as then could be spied. Yea 45 and if, after the law made,<sup>139</sup> men found notable harm that good folk were much wronged by it and the law such that it either might be forborne or else the means found to be changed to the better, good reason would it to make provision for it.

But surely to come forth as this man cometh
50 here, against so good laws, so well made, and by so great authority, so long approved through the whole corps of Christendom, in this realm ratified specially by Parliament (and that upon a proof not without great ground and cause), ever since found
55 so profitable for preservation of the faith and proved so necessary, upon this man's own devices, that without great increase of heresies they cannot be forborne nor never can be changed but either to the straiter<sup>140</sup> or else to the worse—to come
60 now forth and, for appeasing<sup>141</sup> of division, sow first a slander that may make division; and then labor to change those laws, upon none other ground but only that an innocent may hap to take harm by means of false judges; and then prove not any
65 wrong done, but by false “some says” only, against which false “some says” the truth is proved contrary, both by just examination before the King's Council and, over that, plainly by this one point also, which no man can deny, that there is no law provided
70 against so great a crime,<sup>142</sup> by which lawless people have in this realm been punished—therefore to come now thus, as this good man doth, and procure the change of these laws so old, so good, and so 75 necessary, and to make them more easy, wherewith heretics would wax<sup>143</sup> bold, which thing himself (as you see) denieth not in the end, what is this, good Christian readers, but to procure that the Catholic Christian faith might fade and fall away?

And yet as for this man himself, to tell you for 80 conclusion what I think, albeit there are, as you see, right evil and perilous things in his books with devices that would make heresies increase, yet since he professeth so plainly the Catholic Christian faith and by his exhortation also toward the conquest
85 of the Holy Land declareth his mind zealous and fervent toward it, I rather believe, though himself thereto say nay, that in those things which he writeth so perilous and so naught, some wily shrews beguile the good innocent man, than that himself 90 in his own mind mean all that harm.

But yet, forasmuch as in this point, without sight goeth by guess may be deceived (for, as himself saith, a wolf may look simply, lapped<sup>144</sup> in a sheep's skin), I shall therefore trust the best, and leave the 5 truth to God. And concerning such evil writings, since it must needs be that he wrote them either deceived by some shrews or else but of himself, I can no more do for him but heartily pray for him thus. If shrews deceive him, God send them shortly 10 from him. If he wrote them of his own mind, then since the things be naught, he wrote them either of evil will or of oversight. If he wrote them of malice, God give the evil man more grace. If he wrote them of folly, God give the good man more wit.

15 And thus I beseech our Lord send us every one, both the spiritual and the temporal too, both wit and grace to agree together in goodness, and each to love other, and each for other to pray, and for those that of both parties are passed into purgatory, and there pray for us as we pray here for them, that 20 they and we both, through the merits of Christ's bitter Passion, may both with our own prayers and the intercession of all holy saints in heaven, avoiding the eternal fire of hell, have pity poured upon us in the very fire of purgatory, which in those two 25 places verily burneth souls. And finally, for our faith and good works, which his grace (working with the wills of those that wit have) giveth each good man here, God give us in heaven, together, everlasting glory. 30

The Answer to a Poisoned Book

Written in the summer of 1533, this defense of the Eucharist would be the last book More published in his lifetime. More's five-part treatise responds to the first part of The Supper of the Lord, an exposition of John 6 regarding the Eucharist, written by George Joye (ca. 1495–1553) but published anonymously. At the beginning of The Answer, More announces his intent to leave for later The Supper's second part dealing with the institution narrative and the definition of the sacrament. According to scholars such as Germain Marc'hadeur, More's Treatise on the Passion answers that second part, with its extended yet "unpolemical" theological discussion of the Eucharist (CW 11: lix–lx). In any case, More writes in the Preface to The Answer that this book "might suffice for the whole matter" because it provides readers with what is needed for "perceiving of the truth" in the contested matter of the Eucharist, which More had also addressed in the "Letter to Frith" and elsewhere. The central question at issue is whether the Eucharist is the real presence of Christ, or "only bare bread and wine."

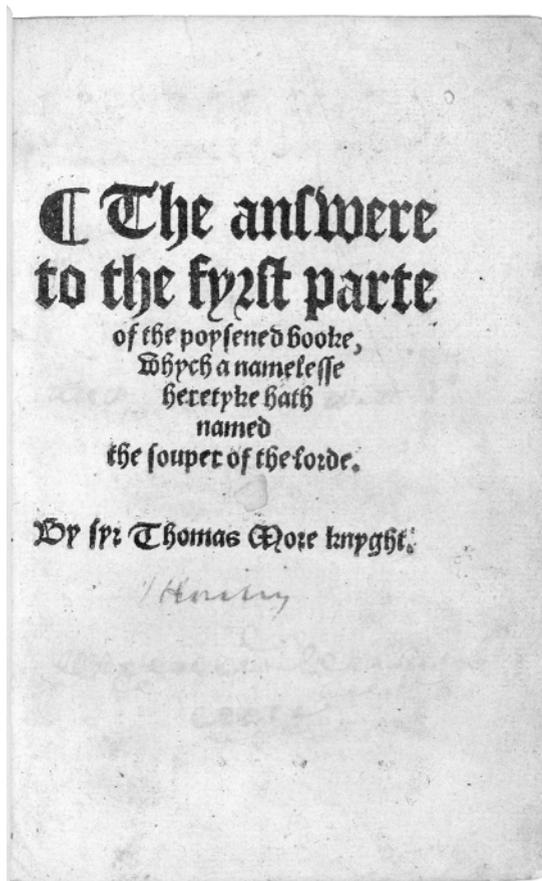

As Clarence Miller explains, More "returned ad fontes" in making his Answer, by selecting and translating passages from the Church fathers, as his opponents had also done (CW 11: lix). In doing so, More was part of a larger polemical exchange that, while tremendously detailed and often bitterly intense, nevertheless "helped to recover and restore the great and varied treasure of patristic thought and eloquence" (lxi). More's three major sources in The Answer are Cyril of Alexandria, John Chrysostom, and Theophylactus.

The "problem of language and interpretation" is of central importance as More develops his argument (CW 11: lxxix). Throughout the Answer, More levels his fundamental charge that the then-anonymous author of The Supper dissembles and deliberately misinterprets matters; More argues that this author hides himself "behind the false mask of flamboyant and impudent anonymity," and deploys lies that amount to serving poisonous dishes at an unsavory supper (lxxx). More calls this anonymous author the "Masker" throughout, as he had called Christopher St. German the "Pacifier" in the Apolo-gy, and King Richard "the Protector" in History of Richard the Third. More's rhetorical approach throughout the work—including such leveling jests as terming his opponent a "foolosopher"—is deliberately tuned to a lay audience, to "the everyday Londoner" in the streets, and appeals to common sense with effect and humor, as Stephen Foley argues (lxxxiv–lxxxvi). More's rhetoric aims to persuade the everyday Londoner that Christ's "body and blood are as real to them as the streets they walk on when they leave their churches and stroll past the wrestlers at Clerkenwell or pause to give a penny to a lame beggar by Savygate" (lxxxvi).

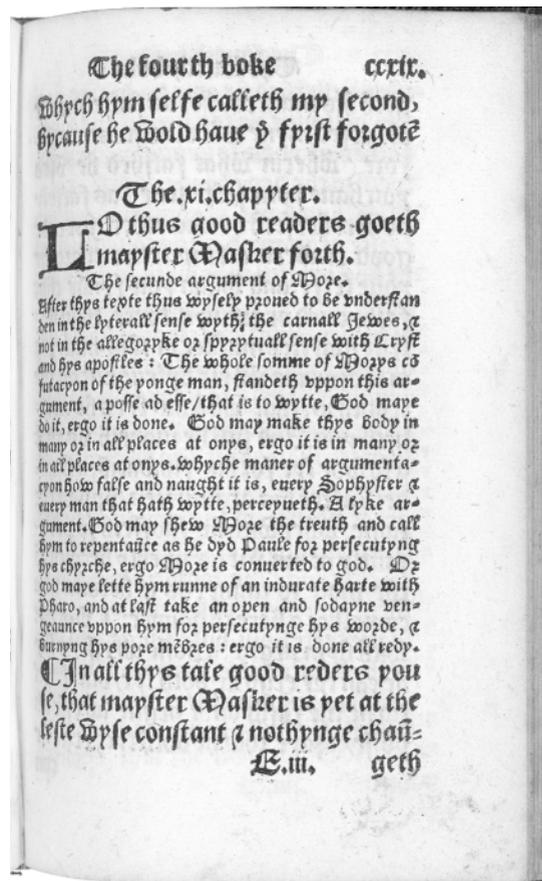

In the pivotal year of 1533, part of the urgency that compels More to write is certainly an appeal to King Henry VIII's well-known veneration of the Eucharist. Throughout the Answer, More appeals to the "known Catholic Church," the unity of "all the corps of Christendom of this 1500 year," right up to the book's concluding prayer for "one Church." More would be imprisoned in the spring of the following year, 1534, and his Tower works would follow.

The page on the right shows clearly More's preferred polemical style of quoting at length and then refuting in detail. More explained the rationale for this method in his Apology: "But surely loath would I be to misrehearse any man's reason against whom I write, or rehearse him slenderly" (820 above). Then, responding to the objection that his writing was too long and tedious, More went on to write:

But I find some men, again, to whom the reading is so far from tedious that they have to read the whole book over thrice — and some that make table thereof for their own remembrance — and that, such men as have as much wit and learning both, as the best of all this blessed brotherhood that ever I heard of.

Howbeit, glad would I have been if it might have been much more short, for then should my labor have been so much the less.

But they will, if they be reasonable men, consider in themselves that it is a shorter thing and sooner done to write heresies than to answer them. For the most foolish heretic in a town may write more false heresies in one leaf than the wisest man in the whole world can well and conveniently by reason and authority soil and confute in forty. (821–22 above)

W<sup>o</sup>uld God, good Christian readers, as I have often said, that every good Christian man, yea man and woman both, which are of that inward good and gracious mind that they would not for all this world forsake the true faith themselves, had as much burning zeal and fervor in their hearts to see it outwardly kept and preserved among all others, as these that are fallen in false heresies and have forsaken the faith have a hot fire of hell in their hearts, that never can suffer<sup>1</sup> them to rest or cease, but maketh them both day and night busily labor and work to subvert and destroy the Catholic Christian faith, with all the means that ever they can devise.

For surely if all such as believe well themselves were as loath to hear any word spoken wrong against the faith as they would be to speak it themselves, there should neither fellowship of their matches,<sup>2</sup> nor fear of any such as are after<sup>3</sup> the worldly count accounted for their betters, anything let<sup>4</sup> or withstand them both by word and countenance to show themselves plainly to hate and detest and abhor utterly the pestilent contagion of all such smoky communication.

The time hath been ere<sup>5</sup> this when honest Christian people would walk so far off from all lecherous living that they would not come so much toward it as to abide the talking, but followed the Apostle's precept that saith, "Let not fornication or any uncleanness be so much as named among you."<sup>6</sup>

In that while<sup>7</sup> was there much honest cleanness, and by shamefastness<sup>8</sup> much was chastity conserved. But after time that in words folk fell unto more liberty, and such as would forbear the doing would yet be well content to fall in the fellowship of foul and filthy talking, then began cleanness greatly to decay. For as the Apostle also rehearseth,<sup>9</sup> "Evil communication marreth and corrupteth good manners."<sup>10</sup>

But this decay from chastity, by declination<sup>11</sup> into foul and filthy talking, hath begun a great while ago and is very far grown on. But the time hath been even until now very late<sup>12</sup> that, albeit of<sup>13</sup> fleshly wantonness men have not letted to use<sup>14</sup> themselves in words both lewd and very large,<sup>15</sup> yet of one thing ever would every good man be well aware: that heresy would he no man suffer to talk at his table, but would both rebuke it and detect it too, although<sup>16</sup> the thing touched his own born brother. Such hath been till of late the common Christian zeal toward the Catholic faith.

And albeit that I doubt not but that (God be thanked) the faith is itself as fast<sup>17</sup> rooted in this realm still as ever it was before (except some very few places, and yet even in those few, the very faithful folk many more than are the faithless too), yet since good men have of late not letted to hear the evil talk, and uncontrolled to speak blasphemous words in their company, the courage thereof hath out of all question much given occasion that heretics have spread their errors much the more abroad. For it is not only lechery that the Apostle's words are verified of where he saith that evil company corrupteth good manners, albeit thereof be they verified too, but specially be they verified of heresy. And against the communication of heretics did Saint Paul specially speak them in his First Epistle to the Corinthians, among whom some began homely<sup>18</sup> then to talk against the general resurrection,<sup>19</sup> as some begin among us now to talk against the blessed sacraments.

And such communication it is therefore that the Apostle speaketh against, of which he saith also that the contagion creepeth forth and corrupteth further, after the manner of a corrupt canker.<sup>20</sup>

And therefore he biddeth us that we should have none other communication with heretics, but only of reproving their heresy and giving them warning to leave. And yet not every man be bold to talk too long with them, not even thereof neither, nor over-often to meddle with them, lest as the pestilence catcheth sometimes the leech<sup>21</sup> that, fasting, cometh very near and long sitteth by the sick man, busy about to cure him, so some folk faint and feeble in the faith, matched with a fellow stubborn and strong in heresy, may sooner himself take hurt than do the other good.

Saint Paul therefore, inspired with the Spirit of God, compendiously toucheth, in very few words, both these two points at once, where he writeth unto Titus, "That man that is a heretic, after once or twice warning" (lo, hear the communication that he would we should<sup>22</sup> have with him), "void and eschew him."<sup>23</sup> So here ye see, lo, that after once or twice warning of them, the bishop should as folk incorrigible expel them, and we should, if we well did, keep no more company nor no more communication with them — no, saith Saint John, not so much as bid them good speed or good morrow when we meet them.<sup>24</sup>

These biddings of these blessed apostles, if all Catholic folk would follow — which either of<sup>25</sup> negligence or fear or for sinful civility, while we follow not, we never discharge well our conscience toward God — there would, without any great suit<sup>26</sup> or trouble, be shortly far fewer heretics than there be. And they that are should shortly perceive in every place where they ween<sup>27</sup> themselves many how very few they be, which as few as they be, would God yet<sup>28</sup> they were yet<sup>29</sup> far fewer than they be. For albeit<sup>30</sup> there are of heretics far fewer than those that are would have it seem there were, yet are there undoubtedly, by such dissimulating sufferance,<sup>31</sup> many more than else<sup>32</sup> there should have been.

And this is also the cause that of these heretics' books there be so many now brought in as there be. For while men may so boldly speak out their heresies, even among them whom they know none heretics, this maketh many folk, that else durst<sup>33</sup> not meddle with such books, to buy them and look on them and long to see what they say.

But some there are, that first begin but of such a vain<sup>34</sup> curious mind, whom the devil driveth after forward, and first maketh them doubt of the truth, and after bringeth them out of doubt to a full belief of heresy.

And thus of such books, as sore<sup>35</sup> as they be forbidden, yet are there many bought. Nor the peril refraineth<sup>36</sup> not much people from the buying, since there is none house lightly<sup>37</sup> that hath so little room that lacketh the room to hide a book therein.

But when they had the books, if men would abhor their talking, gone were all the pleasure that they take therein. But now while men control them not, but laugh and let them babble, pride maketh them proceed, and they procure more, and spread the books more abroad, and draw more brethren to them.

There is no small number of such erroneous English books printed, of which if few were bought, there would not of likelihood so many be put in print, saving<sup>38</sup> that some brethren there are in this realm that of their zeal to their sects, being of such substance<sup>39</sup> that they may forbear it,<sup>40</sup> give some money thereto beforehand, content to abide the adventure<sup>41</sup> of the sale, or give the books about for nought<sup>42</sup> to bring men to the devil.

And in this wise<sup>43</sup> is there sent over to be printed the book that Frith made last against the Blessed Sacrament, answering to my letter, wherewith I confuted the pestilent treatise that he had made against it before.<sup>44</sup> And the brethren looked for it

44 John Frith (1503–33) was a Cambridge scholar, English priest, and follower of now at this Bartholomew-tide<sup>45</sup> last passed and yet look every day, except<sup>46</sup> it be come already and secretly run among them.

But in the meanwhile, there is come over another book against the Blessed Sacrament, a book of that sort,<sup>47</sup> that Frith's book the brethren may now forbear.<sup>48</sup> For more blasphemous, and more bedlam-ripe<sup>49</sup> than this book is, were that book hard to be, which is yet mad enough, as men say that have seen it.

This book is entitled The Supper of Our Lord.<sup>50</sup> But I beshrew<sup>51</sup> such a sewer,<sup>52</sup> as so serveth in the supper that he conveyeth away the best dish, and bringeth it not to the board,<sup>53</sup> as this man would if he could convey from the Blessed Sacrament Christ's own blessed flesh and blood, and leave us nothing therein but, for a memorial only, bare bread and wine.

But his hands are too lumpish and this mess also too great for him to convey clean,<sup>54</sup> especially since the dish is so dear and so dainty that every Christian man hath his heart bent thereto and therefore his eye set thereon to see where it becometh.<sup>55</sup>

The man hath not set his name unto his book, nor whose it is I cannot surely say. But some reckon it to be made by William Tyndale, for that<sup>56</sup> in an epistle of his unto Frith, he writeth that, in anything that he can do, he would not fail to help him forth.

Howbeit,<sup>57</sup> some of the brethren report that the book was made by George Jay.<sup>58</sup> And of truth, Tyndale wrote unto Frith that George Jay had made a book against the Sacrament, which was as yet, partly by his means, partly for lack of money, retained and kept from the print. Howbeit, what George Joye would do therein afterward when his money were come — that could he not, he saith, assure him.

Now of truth, George Joye hath long had in hand, and ready lying by him, his book against the Sacrament. And now if this be it, he hath somewhat lengthened it of late by a piece that he hath patched in against me, wherein he would seem to soil<sup>59</sup> mine arguments, which in my letter I made in that matter against the devilish treatise of Frith.

And in very deed, diverse that are learned and have read the book reckon it verily<sup>60</sup> to be the book of George Jay, whereof Tyndale wrote unto Frith, especially by certain words that were in that letter. For therein writeth Tyndale that if George Jaye did put forth his book, there should be founden in it many reasons and very few to the purpose.

Howbeit, methinketh, by that mark, that this book should not be that. For in this book be there very few reasons, and of them all never one to the purpose.

The maker of the book, in the end of his book, for one cause why he putteth not his name thereto, writeth in this wise: "Master Mock, whom the verity most offendeth and doth but mock it out when he cannot soil it, he knoweth me well enough."<sup>61</sup>

This sad<sup>62</sup> and sage earnest man that, mocking at mine name, calleth me Master Mock, doth in these wise words nothing but mock the readers of his book, save<sup>63</sup> that his reason is so rude and foolish that the mock returneth to himself.

For since he writeth not his book to me, nor sendeth me none of them, but the brethren keep them from me as closely as they can, what if I wist<sup>64</sup> never so well who he were that wrote it, what were this to the brethren that read it? Know they thereby who it is to?

Now for myself also, though I know Tyndale by name, and George Jay or George Joye by name also, and twenty such other fond<sup>65</sup> fellows of the same sect more, yet if ten of those would make ten such foolish treatises and set their names to none, could I know thereby which of those mad fools made which foolish book?

Diverse there are indeed of those that are learned and have read the book that think, for the lack of learning and of wit<sup>66</sup> also that they find everywhere therein, the book should neither be made by Tyndale nor by George Jay neither, but rather by some young unlearned fool.

Howbeit, as for me, I think the book might be for all that made by Tyndale or by George Jay either. For the matter being devised against the Blessed Sacrament, the wisest or the most fool, the most learned or the least, is all in manner one, and in that

William Tyndale. The treatise is Frith's A Christen Sentence (CW 7: 427–33), which More answered in Letter 190: Against John Frith, 7 December <1532> (see pp. 358–70). 45 festival on August 24 46 unless 47 of that sort: such 48 do without 49 ready for the insane asylum.

matter maketh little difference. For I never found yet any man so well-learned and so naturally well-witted withal,<sup>67</sup> but after that he fell once to the defense of heresies, and especially of this abominable 5 heresy against the Blessed Sacrament, neither learning nor wit never well served him after.

For as for Tyndale, the captain of our English heretics, who before he fell to these frenzies, men had weened<sup>68</sup> had had some wit and was taken for 10 full prettily learned too, ye see, good Christian readers, plainly tried by his books, that an unlettered man might be ashamed to write so unlearnedly, and a mad man would almost wax<sup>69</sup> red for shame to write in some things so frantically.<sup>70</sup>

15 As touching Friar Barnes<sup>71</sup> and George Jay, the brethren and sistren themselves see their wits so wasted, and their learning waxen so slender, that the brotherhood hath little list<sup>72</sup> to read them.

And some of the brethren that say this new work was made by George Jay think that the cause why he set not his name thereto was because he wist<sup>73</sup> well the brethren did not regard him. And Tyndale had in his letter also declared him for a fool, by reason whereof he thought that if it came under his name, 20 the estimation thereof were but lost.

Frith was, lo, a proper young man and a toward,<sup>74</sup> till he fell unto these fools, after which to what decay both his wit and his learning came every wise man much marveled, that in his open<sup>75</sup> examination 30 heard and considered his answers.

For albeit that<sup>76</sup> in the book that the brethren that are here have sent over to print, Tyndale and his fellows, to beguile the world withal,<sup>77</sup> purpose to make many changes and amend and advance his part, underpropping it with their own proper lies, 35 yet shall the means be meetly<sup>78</sup> well founden to control their falsehood, I trust, and to take away their cloaks and leave his folly bare. And then shall men plainly see that of one whom the brethren boast for 40 so wise, there never died in England before any false heretic so foolish.

But now as touching this new<sup>79</sup> come-over book, which the maker hath entitled The Supper of the Lord, though the man hath named it The Supper 45 of Our Savior Christ, yet hath the man made it the supper of the devil.

The special effect of all his whole purpose is to feed us with the most poisoned heresy that laboreth to kill the Catholic Christian faith, concerning the Blessed Sacrament of the altar, albeit by the way he 50 putteth forth diverse other heresies besides.

This unsavory supper of his, without any corn<sup>80</sup> of salt and spiced all with poison, he divideth, as it were, into two courses—that is to wit,<sup>81</sup> into the treating and declaring of two special things specified in the Gospel of Christ, whereby Christian 55 people plainly perceive that in the Blessed Sacrament of the altar is the very blessed body of Christ, his very flesh and his blood.

In the first part, which I call here his first course, occupying the one half of his book, he treateth the words of Christ spoken in the sixth chapter of Saint John, which words our Savior speaketh of the eating of his flesh and drinking of his blood.

In his second part, which I call his second course, he treateth the Maundy of Christ with his apostles upon Sheer Thursday, wherein our Savior actually did institute the Blessed Sacrament and therein verily<sup>82</sup> gave his own very flesh and blood to his twelve apostles himself.

I shall therefore divide this work of mine into two parts in like wise, of which twain<sup>83</sup> this shall be the first, wherein I shall detect and make every man perceive this man's evil cookery in his first course, concerning the treating of Christ's words in the 70 sixth chapter of Saint John.

And albeit that I shall afterward send you forth my second part also, against his second course, yet shall I so handle this man's mischievous heresy in this first part that though<sup>84</sup> I never wrote word 80 more hereafter of the matter, yet to the perceiving of the truth and detection of his falsehood this first part might suffice for all the whole matter.

In his first part, he first expoundeth the latter part of the sixth chapter of Saint John, and by his declaration laboreth to draw men from the perceiving of the truth, and setteth forth also both his principle heresy, and over<sup>85</sup> that diverse others.

Also in the same part he argueth against all men in general that expound any of those words of Christ there spoken to be meant by Christ of the very eating of his flesh, as the Catholic Church believeth, in the Blessed Sacrament.

In that first part also he argueth against me by name in special,<sup>86</sup> and pretendeth to soil<sup>87</sup> such arguments as I made in my letter against the poisoned treatise, that John Frith had before made in that matter against the Blessed Sacrament.

5 In that part also the man bringeth in two places all in great,<sup>88</sup> which he hath picked out by long leisure among all my books, in either of which two places, he showeth that I have notably contraried mine own writing that I have written myself in other places before, and showeth also the places where.

10 I shall therefore, good readers, in this first part of mine give you five books, and some of them very short.

15 In the first will I give you the exposition of the selfsame words of Christ, mentioned in the sixth chapter of Saint John, by which, whoso confer them and consider them together shall, I trust, perceive well the falsehood of his exposition, and not be deceived thereby. And for mine exposition ye shall not 20 give me the thanks. For I have but picked it out here and there out of the writings of diverse old holy men.

25 The second shall show you, for an example, some of the faults both in follies and errors that the man hath made us in his exposition.

30 The third shall answer and soil his wise reasons, with which he would make all men fools that have expounded that place before, contrary to his heresy now — that is to wit, all the old holy doctors<sup>89</sup> and saints from the apostles' days unto our own time.

In the fourth shall ye see what wit<sup>90</sup> and what learning he showeth in soiling of mine arguments made before in that matter against his fellow John Frith.

35 The fifth shall declare you the diligence that the man hath done in seeking out my negligence, leaving some places in my writing repugnant<sup>91</sup> and contrary the one place to the other. And of such places ye shall (as I said) see him with diligent search of 40 three years at last bring you forth twain.<sup>92</sup> And there shall you see, good Christian readers, that in those twain my negligence shall, for all his diligence, prove him twice a fool.

45 But in the treating of this matter with him, I shall lack somewhat of the commodity<sup>93</sup> that the man hath in disputing with me. For he hath a great pleasure oftentimes, now in one manner, now in another, now to talk of me, and now to speak to me by name, with “thus saith More,” and “lo, Master More,” and sometimes “Master Mock,” and “let 50 More mock on and lie too,” and many such goodly garnishings more. But he will be for his own part sure that I shall not dispute with him by name, and therefore he keepeth it away.

And therefore what folly and what falsehood
55 be founden in his book he forceth<sup>94</sup> very little. For shame he thinketh he can none take thereby, while folk know not his name.

Wherein he fareth much like to some beastly
60 body, that would not care to sit down with his face to the wallward and ease himself in the open street, and though all the town at once toot in<sup>95</sup> his tail, take it for no shame at all, because they see not his face.

And verily, as we see sometimes that such as walk
65 in visors have much the less fear and shame, both what<sup>96</sup> they do and what they say, because they think themselves unknown, so do these folk oftentimes little force what they write, that use<sup>97</sup> to put out their books, and set not their names unto them.
70 They think themselves unseen while their name is unknown, and therefore they fear not the shame of their folly, as some have I seen ere<sup>98</sup> this full boldly come dance in a masque, whose dancing became them so well that if their visors had been off their 75 faces, shame would not have suffered<sup>99</sup> them to set forth a foot.

And Master Mummer under his masker's face forceth not much to shift a false cast among,<sup>100</sup> with a pair of false dice.

And therefore since this man, by withdrawing 80 his name from his book, hath donned on a visor of dissimulation, dissimuling<sup>101</sup> his person to avoid the shame of his falsehood, and speaketh too much to be called Master Mummer, which name he were 85 else<sup>102</sup> well worthy for his false dice, I shall in this dispicion<sup>103</sup> between him and me be content for this once (since by some name must I call him) for lack of his other name to call him Master Masker. And thus finishing this preface, we shall begin the matter. 90

THE FIRST BOOK

THE FIRST CHAPTER

Master Masker hath in this his poisoned treatise against Christ's wholesome supper thirty-two leaves,<sup>1</sup> in the first fourteen whereof he expoundeth us the latter part of the sixth chapter of Saint John. And incidentally by the way, the man maketh as though he answered the reasons<sup>2</sup> which I made in my letter against the pestilent treatise that Frith made first against the Blessed Sacrament. And in the same fourteen leaves also, he bringeth forth two things for special notable, wherein he saith I have openly contraried mine own writing.

I will, good reader, peruse the remnant of his book after this first part answered, in which, containing these three things that I have rehearsed<sup>3</sup> you, the first hath he so handled that all were there<sup>4</sup> not (as there are indeed) diverse false heresies interlaced therein, yet it were for the matter of very slight effect. For in his exposition he nothing toucheth nor cometh near to the thing wherein the point of all the matter standeth.

The second point hath he so well treated in his argumentation that, the reasons which I lay against Frith, Master Masker first falsely rehearseth and after so foolishly soileth<sup>5</sup> that he leaveth them more stronger against him when he hath done than he found them when he began.

And as for the third point concerning his notable notice of such things as he layeth to mine oversight, them he so garnisheth and setteth out so seemly to the show that I would no man should<sup>6</sup> ever after this day trust any word that I shall write but if<sup>7</sup> ye see Master Masker plainly proved therein either so foolish as no man should trust his wit, or so false that no man should trust his troth.<sup>8</sup> Let us therefore now come to the first point—that is to wit,<sup>9</sup> his exposition.

THE SECOND CHAPTER

The whole sum of his exposition is that our Savior in all those words, taking occasion of the miracle that he so late<sup>10</sup> before had wrought among them, in feeding five thousand of them with five barley loaves and two fishes,<sup>11</sup> did in those words, upon their new resort unto him when they followed him to Capernaum, first rebuke and blame them because they sought him not for the miracles that they had seen him work, but because they had been fed by him and filled their bellies, and that therefore our Savior exhorted them to labor rather to get that meat<sup>12</sup> that never should perish.<sup>13</sup> Upon which exhortation, when the Jews asked him what they should do whereby they should work the works of God, Christ said unto them that the work of God was to believe and trust in him whom the Father had sent.<sup>14</sup>

Then goeth he further and showeth that upon the words of the Jews asking our Lord what token he showed for which they should believe in him, since their forefathers had given them the bread of manna in desert,<sup>15</sup> of which it was written, "He gave them bread from above,"<sup>16</sup> our Lord showed them that Moses gave them not that bread from heaven, but his own Father had given them the very<sup>17</sup> bread that was descended from heaven,<sup>18</sup> and that our Lord there, by all the remnant of those words in the said sixth chapter of Saint John, declareth that himself is that very bread, and is to be eaten by the faith and the belief that Christ's flesh and body was broken and his blood shed for our sins. And so expoundeth he forth all these words of Christ, applying them only to the declaration of his Passion to be suffered for our redemption, and that our Savior would have them believe that point, and that the belief of that point was meant by the eating, and that that faith and belief is the meat of our souls.

The whole sum of his exposition is this in all his said fourteen leaves. I mean not that this is all that ever he saith therein, for I leave out his circumstances, his garnishings, his notes, his argumentations, his contentions with me, his mocks, his taunts against all Catholic folk, and his manifold heresies also, withal<sup>19</sup> which here and there he furnisheth all the progress of his painted process,<sup>20</sup> all which things I shall after touch by themselves. But 5 the sum, the substance, and the end whereto all the whole process of his exposition cometh is this that I have rehearsed you.

THE THIRD CHAPTER

But now, good Christian readers, all this exposition, were it never so true, never so comely,<sup>21</sup> nor never so cunningly handled, yet were it (as I told you before) very far from the purpose. For this exposition might be good enough, and yet might 15 Christ in those words teach the thing that we speak of besides: that is to wit, besides the teaching them that himself was the very bread that was descended from heaven to give life to the world,<sup>22</sup> and that he should suffer death for the sins of the world, and that they should believe these things, and so eat him
 20 here by faith; he might, I say, teach in those words also that he would give unto men his very body and his very flesh to eat and his very blood to drink, and that he would that they should<sup>23</sup> believe that lesson also, and with the spiritual eating thereof, by faith
 25 receive and eat also his very Blessed Body, flesh and blood, by the mouth, not in his own fleshly form as the fleshly Jews mistook it,<sup>24</sup> but — as himself then meant it and part there expounded it, and by his institution did after more clearly declare it — in form
 30 of bread and wine in the Blessed Sacrament of the altar.

It is, I trow,<sup>25</sup> good readers, to no man almost unknown that the Holy Scripture of God is in such marvelous manner, by the profound wisdom of his 35 Holy Spirit, for the more plenteous profit of his Church, devised, indited,<sup>26</sup> and written that it hath not only that one sense true which we call the literal sense (that is to wit, that sense which, for the first lesson thereof, God would we should perceive 40 and learn), but also diverse other senses spiritual, pertaining to the profit of our manners, and instructions in sundry virtues, by means of allegories, opening of mysteries, and lifting up of the soul into the lively light and inward high sight of God. And all those manifold senses (diverse in the way and all tending to one end) may be convenient<sup>27</sup> and true, and all by one Spirit provided, and into diverse spirits by the same one Spirit inspired, for spiritual profit to be by many means multiplied and increased in his Church.

But never hath any good man been accustomed to play the pageant<sup>28</sup> that Master Masker playeth us here, with a spiritual exposition of allegories or parables, to take away the very first sense that God would we should learn of the letter and, because of 55 some allegories, turn all the plain words from the first right understanding into a secondary sense of allegories.

Of this manner<sup>29</sup> handling of Scripture I make mention in my letter against Frith's false handling of 60 this same place of Saint John.<sup>30</sup> And there I showed in what wise<sup>31</sup> the false heretics, the Arians, used by the same means to take the Godhead from Christ's person, as Frith and these fellows, by the selfsame
 65 manner of expounding the Scripture, do take away Christ's manhood from Christ's Blessed Sacrament.

In that epistle I showed also that I would in allegorical expositions find no fault, but be well content with them, so that men misuse them not, to the taking away of the true literal sense besides.

This thing I there showed, good readers, in the selfsame epistle, that Master Masker maketh here as though he could and would answer. And yet as though he had never heard my words but slept while he read them, he playeth here the selfsame 75 pageant himself, while with his allegorical exposition of spiritual eating of Christ's Godhead and of his body by belief of his Passion, he goeth about to take away from us the very literal truth of the very eating and bodily receiving of Christ's own very 80 flesh and blood.

Now will I not lay any manner blame at all to any man that will expound all the whole process of Genesis by allegories, and teach us certain convenient<sup>32</sup> virtues understood by the four floods<sup>33</sup> of Paradise, and tell us that Paradise is grace, out of which all the floods of all virtues flow and water the earth, calling the earth mankind, that was made thereof, being barren and fruitless but if<sup>34</sup> it be watered with the floods of virtue, and so forth in some such manner expound us all the remnant. He, lo, that thus doth, doth in my mind right well. But, marry,<sup>35</sup> if he would do it in the manner and with the mind that Master Masker expoundeth us Christ's words all in allegories here, and would teach us such a spiritual sense to make us believe that those words were to be none otherwise understood besides, but that there were no such floods flowing forth of paradise, nor no such Paradise at all, I would ween verily<sup>36</sup> that he were a very heretic.

I find no fault also with them that expound the story of Sampson tying the foxes together by the tails, and setting a fire in them, and sending them so into the field of the Philistines to burn up the corn;<sup>37</sup> in those, I say, that expound that story by<sup>38</sup> the devil sending his heretics into the cornfield of God, the Catholic Church of Christ, with the fire of false words to destroy the corn both of true faith and good works, tied together by the tails in token that all their heresies, be their heads never so far asunder, yet are their tails tied together in that it all tend toward one end—that is to wit, to the destruction of all manner grace and goodness—and that the tying of the fire and their tails together signifieth also that for their foxly falsehood, finally in the end, the hot fire of hell shall be so fast<sup>39</sup> tied in all their tails, wrabbling<sup>40</sup> there together, that never shall they get the fire from their tails, nor from the bands of hell be severed or break asunder—with this allegory of those good men that thus expound that story, I find no fault at all. But on the other side, if any man would expound it so by that spiritual allegory against these heretics, that he would therewith enforce himself to take away the literal sense, and say the text signified nothing else, and that there was no such thing done indeed, him would I reckon for a heretic too.

And in like wise, good readers, if Master Masker here did only expound all those words of Christ as things spoken of spiritual eating by way of allegory, that way would I well allow, for so doth not only such as he is, but also good faithful folk too. But now when he draweth all Christ's words to those allegories, of<sup>41</sup> a false wily purpose, to make men ween (and so saith himself, for his part) that they signify none other thing, this is the point that proveth Master Masker a heretic.

And therefore, as I said, all his exposition is far off from the purpose and approacheth not to the point. For the question is not whether those words may be well verified and expounded of spiritual eating by way of an allegory, but whether it may, besides all that, be truly expounded of the very bodily eating of Christ's Blessed Body indeed. For if it so may, then is there no man of so slender wit, but he may well see that all Master Masker's allegorical exposition of his only spiritual eating flitteth<sup>42</sup> from the purpose quite, and dare not come near the point.

Wherefore, to the intent that ye may clearly see that in this exposition of his (as holy as he would have it seem) he doth but clearly mock, saving<sup>43</sup> that it is much worse than mocking to make men fall from the faith, I shall give you of the same words of Christ, written in the sixth chapter of Saint John, another exposition myself, in which I shall, besides all such spiritual expositions, as this man useth therein by way of allegories or parables, declare you the very literal sense of those words, "My flesh is verily meat<sup>44</sup> and my blood verily drink,"<sup>45</sup> so that ye may see thereby that our Savior verily spoke and meant, not only such a spiritual eating as Master Masker saith he only meant, but also the very bodily eating and drinking of his very flesh and blood indeed, which exposition of mine, if it be in that point true, then must it needs follow (ye see well) that his exposition is far from the purpose. For although<sup>46</sup> there were not one false word therein, yet were it in dissembling of the truth very lewd<sup>47</sup> and falsely handled.

And now that mine exposition shall be true indeed, that shall you, ere<sup>48</sup> I leave you, so clearly perceive and see that I trust there shall never any such heretic, as this is, be able to blind any man after that<sup>49</sup> readeth it, except some such as willingly list<sup>50</sup> to wink, or while he put out their eyes, will hold their heads to him themselves.

Now to the intent ye may the better perceive and mark whether mine exposition agrees with the text, and whether I leave anything untouched, I shall first give you the words of the text itself in English altogether, and then expound it you<sup>51</sup> piece by piece after. And yet had it not been evil to begin somewhat before, at Christ's disciples going into the ship in the evening, and Christ's own walking after upon the sea, and after that on the morrow the people coming after to seek him in other ships,<sup>52</sup> which piece Master Masker left out and would not meddle with, because it hath a hard allegory declared by holy doctors, which show that the ship in which the disciples went betokened the Church, which was but one, and the other diverse ships that came after betokened the diverse churches of heretics.<sup>53</sup> And yet in that one ship that signified the Church, there were, as appeared after, both good and bad together. But let this piece pass for this once; I will begin the text but there as Master Masker beginneth himself. Lo, good Christian readers, these be the words.

THE FOURTH CHAPTER

“Verily, verily, I say to you, you seek me, not because ye have seen miracles, but because ye have eaten of the loaves and are filled. Work you not<sup>54</sup> the meat that perisheth, but that abideth into everlasting life, which the Son of Man shall give you, for him hath God the Father sealed.” They said therefore unto him, “What shall we do that we may work the works of God?” Jesus answered and said unto them, “This is the work of God: that ye believe in him whom he hath sent.” Then they said unto him, “What token showest thou, therefore, that we may see and believe thee? What workest thou? Our fathers have eaten manna in the desert, as it is written, ‘He gave them bread from heaven to eat.’” Then said Jesus to them, “Verily, verily, I say to you, Moses hath not given you the bread from the heaven, but my Father giveth you the very<sup>55</sup> bread from the heaven. For the very bread is that that is descended from heaven and giveth life to the world.” Then said they to him, “Lord, give us always this bread.” Then said Jesus to them, “I am the bread of life; he that cometh to me shall not hunger, and he that believeth in me shall never thirst. But I have said unto you that ye have both seen me and have not believed. All that my Father giveth me shall come to me, and he that cometh to me, I shall not cast him out. For I am descended from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that hath sent me. This is verily the will of him that hath sent me—that is to wit,<sup>56</sup> the Father—that all that he hath given me I should not lose anything thereof, but should raise it again in the last day. This is verily the will of my Father that hath sent me: that every man that seeth the Son and believeth in him should have everlasting life, and shall raise him again in the last day.” The Jews murmured<sup>57</sup> therefore of that that he had said: “I am the lively<sup>58</sup> bread that am descended from heaven.” And they said, “Is not this man the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we have known? How saith he therefore, ‘I am descended from heaven?’” Jesus therefore answered and said unto them, “Murmur not among yourselves. There can no man come to me but if<sup>59</sup> the Father that sent me draw him, and I shall raise him again in the last day. It is written in the prophets, ‘And they shall be all taught of God.’ Every man that hath heard of the Father and hath learned cometh to me, not because any man hath seen the Father, but he that is of God hath seen the Father. Verily, verily, I tell you, he that believeth in me hath life everlasting. I am the bread of the life. Your fathers have eaten manna in the desert and be dead. This is the bread descending from the heaven, that if any man eat thereof, he should not die. I am the living bread that am descended from the heaven. If a man eat of this bread, he shall live forever, and the bread which I shall give is my flesh, which I shall give for the life of the world.” The Jews therefore strove among themselves, saying, “How can this man give us his flesh to eat?” Then said Jesus to them, “Verily, verily, I say to you, but if ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye shall not have life in you. He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath life everlasting, and I shall raise him in the last day. My flesh is verily meat and my blood is verily drink. He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood dwelleth in me and I in him. As the living Father sent me, I also live for the Father. And he that eateth me, he shall also live for me. This is the bread that hath descended from heaven, not as your fathers have eaten manna and are dead. He that eateth this bread shall live forever.” These things said he in the synagogue, teaching in Capernaum. Many therefore of his disciples, hearing said, “This is a hard saying, and who may hear him?" Jesus therefore, knowing in himself that his disciples murmured at this, said unto them, "Doth this offend you: if ye shall then see the Son of Man ascending up where he was before? The spirit it is that giveth life; the flesh availeth nothing. The words which I have spoken to you be spirit and life. But there be some of you that believe not." For Jesus knew from the beginning who should be the believers and who should betray him, and he said, "Therefore I have said unto you that no man can come to me but if<sup>60</sup> it be given him of my Father." From that time, many of his disciples went back, and now walked no more with him. Then said Jesus to the twelve, "Will you go your ways too?" Then answered unto him Simon Peter, "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of everlasting life, and we believe and have known that thou art Christ, the Son of God." Jesus answered unto him, "Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil?" He said that by<sup>61</sup> Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon. For he it was that should betray him, being one of the twelve.<sup>62</sup>

Whoso read and consider well, good Christian readers, the doctrine and the doings of our Savior Christ shall by sundry places of Holy Scripture perceive that of his heavenly wisdom his wholesome usage<sup>63</sup> was in many great things that he purposed to do, before the doing of the same (besides the figures of the Old Testament fore-figuring the same, and besides the prophecies of the old prophets fore-prophecying the same), for men's more readiness toward the things when he would execute them by his deed, to give them some warning and information thereof before by his words.

Thus before he made Saint Peter his chief shepherd over his flock, three times at once, specially bidding him to feed his sheep,<sup>64</sup> he first said unto him, "Thou shalt be called stone," and after said also to him, when he confessed him to be Christ, "Thou art stone and upon the same stone shall I build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."<sup>65</sup>

Thus, before he made him his general vicar, he gave him the name of stone, which stone he said after he would build his Church upon.

Thus he gave his apostles and disciples warning of his betraying, of his taking, of his death, of his resurrection, of his ascension, by his word, before the things were done in deed. And of his coming again to the Doom<sup>66</sup> also at the general resurrection,<sup>67</sup> which things surely shall be and are not yet done indeed. And always the more strange the things were, the more he opened them with words. And yet had he, for all that, some of those things for that while<sup>68</sup> not very well believed, not even of<sup>69</sup> some of his own disciples.<sup>70</sup> But yet neither were his words fully fruitless at the time, but that they took some hold in some folk, and wrought in some souls, though not a full faith, yet an inclination and a disposition toward it, and now serve, and ever since have served, and ever while the world lasteth shall serve to the planting, rooting, and watering of the faith, in all Christian nations all the world about.

Now as our Lord did in many things, so did he specially in the two great sacraments: the sacrament of baptism, and in this high Blessed Sacrament of the altar.

Of the one he talked with Nicodemus that came to him by night and durst<sup>71</sup> not be seen with him by day for dread of the Jews.<sup>72</sup>

And of the other — that is to wit,<sup>73</sup> of the Sacrament of the altar — he talked here, and taught the very thing but not the very form thereof unto the Jews and his disciples among them.

And as he found Nicodemus far off from the perceiving of the spiritual fruit that riseth in the sensible<sup>74</sup> ablution and faithful washing of baptism, so found he the substance<sup>75</sup> of these folk very far from the perceiving of the spiritual fruit that groweth of the bodily receiving of Christ's own Blessed Body to them that faithfully receive it in the Blessed Sacrament under the sensible form of bread.

Our Savior also, good reader, because the thing that he now went about to tell them was a marvelous high thing and a strange, used in the proponing<sup>76</sup> thereof unto them, diverse ways devised of<sup>77</sup> his divine wisdom.

First, to make them the more meet<sup>78</sup> to receive the doctrine of that point and to perceive it, he did two miracles, before he began to speak thereof: one (which though they were not at it, yet they perceived well as the Gospel showeth, in going over the water without a vessel;<sup>79</sup> and another that he did not only in their presence, but also made them all partners of the profit, that is to wit, when he fed them all, being five thousand in number, of two fishes and five loaves, and yet when all their bellies were full, gathered and filled twelve baskets of the fragments.<sup>80</sup>

Upon the occasion of this miracle, good reader, of these five loaves by such a miracle so multiplied as a thing very convenient,<sup>81</sup> he took his beginning to induce<sup>82</sup> thereupon the feast that he would in this world leave perpetually with his Church, by feeding of innumerable thousands with that one loaf that is his Blessed Body in the form of bread. Not for that<sup>83</sup> the miracle of that feeding of the Jews and this feeding of Christ's Church is in everything like,<sup>84</sup> between which twain<sup>85</sup> there are incomparable differences, but because the less<sup>86</sup> miracle and in some part like, is a convenient thing for an entry and a beginning wherewith to draw them further. And unto his apostles at that time, so was it, and yet unto this time unto all good Christian people, so is it.

Our Savior also to induce them the better to the belief of his great kindness, in that he would vouchsafe<sup>87</sup> to give them his own body to be received and eaten into theirs, he did tell them two other things: the one that he was very<sup>88</sup> God, the other that he would die for their sakes. Of these two points, the one might make them sure that he would do it, and the other that he could do it. For what could he not do that was God Almighty? Or what would he disdain to do for us, that would not disdain to die for us?

Now, good readers, remembering well these things, mark what our Savior hath said in this Gospel, and consider well what he meant.

THE SIXTH CHAPTER

When that after the miracle of the feeding so many people with so few loaves, our Lord had, as it followeth in the Gospel,<sup>89</sup> withdrawn himself aside into the hill, because he saw the people were minded to make him their king, the disciples had entered in the evening after into a ship, and Christ appearing to them, walking upon the sea, and calming the tempest, when they would have taken him into their ship, the ship was suddenly comen to the land. The people on the morrow, longing to find our Lord again, took other little ships that came thither after, and followed his disciples, from whom they thought he would not long be, although they knew that Christ went not in the ship with them. And when they came on the other side of the sea to Capernaum, and found not only them there, but him too, then marveling much thereof, they said unto him, "Master, when camest thou hither?" Our Lord answered again and said unto them, "Sirs, I tell you very truth, the cause that you seek me now is not the miracles that you have seen, but it is because that of the loaves that I gave you; you have well eaten and well filled your bellies."<sup>90</sup>

In these words, our Savior well declared his Godhead, in that he told them their minds and thoughts, which is a property belonging only to God, for as the Scripture saith, "Our Lord beholdeth the heart,"<sup>91</sup> and specially since he told them, their minds being such as reason would have weened<sup>92</sup> their minds had been the contrary. For since that after that God had so fed and filled them of that bread, and that they had seen so much left yet besides, they did upon the sight of that miracle say, "This is the very prophet that shall come into the world," and by those words declared clearly that they thought he was Christ—that is to wit, Messiah—whom they looked for by the prophecy of Moses<sup>93</sup> and other prophets, that should come to save the world, and that thereupon they would have made him king, who could have weened that they could have had so soon upon the morrow so cold a mind toward him as to go assail and seek him for none other devotion but for the feeding of their bellies? But our Savior, whose deep sight entered into their hearts and labored not upon any fallible conjectures, both saw the sickness of their unperfect minds, and as a perfect physician against their disease, devised them a good and perfect medicine, saying unto them thus: “Work, sirs, and labor for the meat,<sup>94</sup> not the meat that perisheth, but for the meat that abideth into everlasting life, which meat the Son of Man shall give you, for him hath God the Father sealed.” As though he would say, “Ye labor hither and seek me for such meat as I fed you with the other day, but that meat is soon gone and perisheth. Labor and work, and make you meet<sup>95</sup> that you may eat the meat that shall never be gone nor never perish, but shall last with you forever in everlasting life.”

By these words of the meat everlasting our Savior did, as the old holy doctors declare, insinuate and secretly signify to them the meat of his own blessed person, both the spiritual eating of his Godhead by fruition in heaven and the bodily eating of his very body here in earth, of which both meats he more declareth after.

For the better perceiving whereof, ye shall understand that the material meat that men eat here hath two manner of perishings, one by which through the natural operation of the body that receiveth it, it is altered and changed and loseth its own form, shape, nature, and substance, and is turned into the nature and substance of the body which it nourisheth. And in this manner of perishing, perisheth all the meat that every man eateth, or else it nothing nourisheth.

The other manner of perishing, by which the meat perisheth, is that perishing by which the meat that is taken through gluttony is, for the inordinate appetite and use thereof, destroyed and punished by God, and the gluttonous belly too, of which manner of perishing Saint Paul saith, “The meat for the belly, and the belly for the meat, and God shall destroy both the one and the other.”<sup>96</sup> This is spoken against those that eat not for the conservation of their life and their health to preserve themselves to the service of God, but eat and drink only for the voluptuous pleasure of their body.

Now taught our Lord the Jews in these few words a doctrine short and compendious, that they should neither be gluttons in laboring for the meat that perisheth of that second fashion, nor so very highly esteem the meat that perisheth of the first fashion — that is to wit,<sup>97</sup> any manner of meat that only nourisheth the body — but that they should labor and work and endeavor themselves, that they might be meet to receive and eat that meat that shall abide and endure with them in everlasting life, that is to say, that as themselves were both bodies and souls, so spiritually to receive and eat of his own Godhead, with the fruition whereof they should after this life be everlastingly fed among his angels in heaven, and for the meanwhile in this world bodily to receive and eat his own Blessed Body into theirs, as an earnest penny<sup>98</sup> of their perpetual conjunction and incorporation with him afterward in the kingdom of his eternal glory, where our bodies shall also be fed forever with the far passing<sup>99</sup> pleasure of the bodily beholding of his glorious body there in his own beautiful form, which we now verily<sup>100</sup> receive here, hid in the Blessed Sacrament in likeness and form of bread.

This is the meat that Christ in those words meant, and would they should<sup>101</sup> labor to make themselves meet for. For this meat will in no wise<sup>102</sup> perish. But whereas the bodily meat that the man eateth of the sheep in the nourishing of the man perisheth and loseth his own nature, not turning the flesh of the man into the flesh of the sheep, but being turned from the own proper nature of sheep’s flesh into the natural flesh of the man, this meat is of such vigor and strength that in the nourishing of the man it abideth whole and unchanged, not being turned into the flesh of the man, but altering, turning, and transforming, as holy Saint Augustine saith,<sup>103</sup> the fleshly man from his gross fleshliness into a certain manner of the pure nature of itself, by participation of that holy blessed flesh and immortal, that is with his lively spirit immediately joined and unseparably knit unto the eternal flowing fountain of all life, the Godhead. This meat therefore Christ biddeth them labor and work for in those words: “Work you not the meat that perisheth but that abideth into everlasting life.”

But yet, though Christ commanded them that they should not be idle sluggards and slothful of themselves, but that they should work and labor for their own part to get this meat and make themselves meet therefor,<sup>104</sup> yet he let them know that no man could by his own only power attain it. And therefore he added these words, “which meat the Son of Man shall give you,” telling them thereby that himself, which had fed them before with that other meat which was perishable, would also, if themselves would work and labor for it, give them the other meat, that is permanent into life everlasting too.

And therefore, as diverse holy doctors say, when the priest ministereth<sup>105</sup> us this meat, let us not think that it is he that giveth it us—not the priest, I say, whom we see—but the Son of Man, Christ himself, whose own flesh not the priest there giveth us, but as Christ’s minister delivereth us. But the very giver thereof is our blessed Savior himself, as himself in these words witnesseth where he saith, quem filius hominis dabit vobis (“which meat the Son of Man shall give you”).

Now lest the Jews might have cause to mistrust that he that were the Son of Man could not give them that meat that were free from all perishing and permanent into everlasting life, he taketh away that objection, and showeth them that he is not only the Son of Man but also the Son of God, and no more verily man, by that that he is the Son of Man (that is to wit, not of Joseph but of our forefather Adam, the first man) than he is verily God, in that he is the Son of God, as verily and as naturally begotten of God the Father by generation, as he was verily and naturally descended of our forefather Adam by lineal descent and propagation, which thing our Savior showed them in these words: Hunc enim pater signavit Deus (“For him hath God the Father sealed”). This is to say, that him hath God the Father specially sequestered and severed and set aside out of the number of all creatures, and hath sent him into the world, anointed, signed, and marked with the very print of his own seal. For (as the old holy doctors declare, and among others, Saint Cyril and Saint Hilary)<sup>106</sup> the seal of the Father with which he sealed his Son is nothing else but himself, his own very nature and substance. And therefore hath God caused these words to be written in Holy Scripture: that God the Father hath sealed his Son, as our Savior said here to the Jews, and that Christ is the image, print, and character of the Father,<sup>107</sup> as saith Saint Paul, because we thereby should learn and understand that as a true seal truly printed leaveth in the other the very whole express thing that it is itself, not as it is iron, steel, or copper, silver, brass, or gold, but as it is a seal—that is to wit, this fashioned figure or that—and yet keepeth it whole still never the less itself, so did God the Father in the sealing of God the Son—that is to wit, in his eternal begetting—give him all that ever was in himself, all his whole will, all his whole wisdom, all his whole might and power, and finally all his whole nature, substance, and Godhead, and yet keep never the less all the same still himself.

And thus the Son of God so sealed by his Father, and not only expressly representing, but also verily being one equal God, in nature, substance, wisdom, will, might, and power, with Almighty God his Father, being sent into the world by his Father and himself and their both Holy Spirit, equal God with them both, took upon him the manhood, the very flesh, and the very soul of our Savior Christ, anointed above all other creatures<sup>108</sup> with fullness of all graces, by the conjunction of his manhood in wonderful unity with his omnipotent Godhead, marvelously making one perfect person and one far passing<sup>109</sup> perfect person of God and man together.

Thus hath our Savior not only showed them the great gift of everlasting lively<sup>110</sup> meat that, if they would work for it, he would give them, but hath also showed them that himself is equal God with his almighty Father, and thereby well able to give it them, and also sent into the world for the nonce,<sup>111</sup> because he should, to such folk as would be well willing to labor and work therefor,<sup>112</sup> work with their good will and willingly give it them.

THE SEVENTH CHAPTER

When that the Jews had heard our Savior speak of such a meat that would not perish but should abide and endure with them into everlasting life, glad men were they. For yet they hoped to have some meat that so should fill their bellies and so satisfy them that they should never need to labor for any more.

Now were those Jews yet somewhat less gluttons than are many Christian people nowadays. For they could have been content, so that they should never have felt hunger more, to have forborne<sup>113</sup> eating forever, as the woman of Samaria, so that she might have had of our Savior one draught of such water as might have quenched her thirst forever, was well

 5 contented in her own mind to have forborne drink forever.<sup>114</sup> But many Christian men there are that would not, I ween,<sup>115</sup> be content to take either such meat or such drink, though<sup>116</sup> God would offer it them. For many men have such a pleasure in eat-10 ing and drinking that they would not gladly live but even to eat and drink. And for the pleasure thereof, they love better hunger and thirst than the harmless lack of them both, though God would give it them. For we see that they seek means to make their 15 appetite greedy. And some will eat salt meat purposely to give them a courage to the cup. These folk do not long to eat and drink to live the longer, but long to live to eat and drink the longer. These be those therefore of whom the Apostle saith, Esca
 20 ventri et venter escis, Deus et hunc et illam destruet. (“The meat for the belly and the belly for the meat; God shall destroy both the one and the other”).<sup>117</sup>

And surely besides the punishment of God in another world, and besides all the pains that even 25 in this world through sickness and sores arise and spring of such gluttony, they that gladly would endure a grief perpetually to have the pleasure of the continual ‘swaging’<sup>118</sup> have in their best wealth<sup>119</sup> but a displeas-30 ant pleasure, except<sup>120</sup> men be so mad as to think that he were well at ease that might be ever ahung-ered and ever eating, ever athirst and ever drinking, ever lousy and ever clawing, ever scurvy<sup>121</sup> and ever scratching.

These Jews, I say therefore, and the woman of Samaria, were not of this mind, but so that they might 35 have lacked the grief of hunger and thirst they would have been content, as it seemeth, to have forborne meat and drink.

Howbeit,<sup>122</sup> to say the truth, their words well weighed, it seemeth that their affections were worse 40 than they seem at the first sight. For as methinketh, they were not so glad to put away their fault as to make a change of one fault for another, not so glad to lose the pleasure of the meat that is the main-
 45 tenance of gluttony as to get them to rest and idleness that is the maintenance of sloth. And our Lord touched<sup>123</sup> the appetite of sloth in these Jews when he bade them, Operamini non cibum qui perit, etc. (“Work you for the meat, not that that perisheth 50 but that that abideth into everlasting life”), noting therein, as saith Saint Chrysostom, the slothful appetite by which they would fain<sup>124</sup> have had him feed them still by miracle, without any labor of their own.<sup>125</sup> And the woman of Samaria said unto him, “Lord, give me of that water that I need no 55 more to labor hither, and draw up water here at this deep well.”<sup>126</sup>

But surely, whoso put not away his vice but make a change may soon hap<sup>127</sup> to take as evil as he leaveth, and not a worse lightly<sup>128</sup> than sloth, which vice God 60 saw so noyous<sup>129</sup> unto mankind that even when he set him in paradise, he bade him be occupied in the keeping of that pleasant garden. And afterward, when he should be driven thence into the earth, he 65 gave him a necessity to labor, making the earth to be such as without man’s labor should not bring him forth his living.<sup>130</sup>

And therefore an evil and a perilous life live they that will in this world not labor and work, but live 70 either in idleness or in idle business, driving forth all their days in gaming for their pastime, as though that else<sup>131</sup> their time could never pass, but the sun would ever stand even still over their heads and never draw to night, but if<sup>132</sup> they drove away the day with danc-75 ing or some such other goodly gaming.

God sent men hither to wake and work, and as for sleep and gaming (if any gaming be good in this vale of misery in this time of tears), it must serve 80 but for a refreshing of the weary and forwatched<sup>133</sup> body, to renew it unto watch and labor again — not all men in bodily labor, but as the circumstances of the persons be — so to be busied in one good business or other. For rest and recreation should be but as a sauce. And sauce should, ye wot<sup>134</sup> well, serve for a faint and weak stomach to get it the more appet-85 ite to the meat, and not for increase of voluptuous pleasure in every greedy glutton that hath in himself sauce malapert<sup>135</sup> already enough. And therefore, likewise as<sup>136</sup> it were a fond<sup>137</sup> feast that had all that the guests should go thence as empty as they came thither, so is it surely a very mad-ordered life that hath but little time bestowed in any fruitful business, and all the substance idly spent in play.

5 And therefore, to the end that the Jews should know that he would not nourish them in their sloth and idleness, he bade them work. And yet lest they might ween that he would have all their work about worldly business, he bade them work, not for the 10 meat that perisheth, but for the meat that abideth into everlasting life, whereby he meant not to forbid them to labor for the one, but to teach them to labor much more for the other.

THE EIGHTH CHAPTER

15 But they, as I told you, their mind set upon their belly-joy, and therefore not understanding his words, hoped by that word to have their bellies so well filled once that they should never need more to labor for their living after. And therefore they 20 said again unto him, "What shall we do that we may work the works of God?" For they thought, as it seemeth, that some things there were that Christ would have them do, after which once done, then should they have that merry feast of that meat that 25 he spoke of, and therefore would they fain wit<sup>138</sup> what work that were, that they might shortly rid it out of hand<sup>139</sup> that they were<sup>140</sup> at dinner, for they waxed<sup>141</sup> ahungred. Our Savior then, upon that question of theirs, showed them what work
30 it was that he would have them do for that meat, and said unto them, "This is the work of God, that you should believe in him whom he hath sent."<sup>142</sup> As though he would say, "This is the work that God will ye shall work, before he will I shall give you this 35 lively meat that I told you of; he will ye shall first believe in me whom he hath sent unto you."

Christ here, for the getting of that spiritual meat, setteth them about a spiritual work, bidding them labor to believe. Why is it any labor to believe? Yea, 40 verily,<sup>143</sup> good readers, to believe well is no little work, and so great a work that no man can do it of his own strength without the special help of God.

But here shall you see clearly that Christ truly told them their thought, when he said unto them that they sought him not for his miracles but for their 45 bellies. For when our Savior here had showed them that if they would have that lively meat, they must first believe in him, their minds were so set upon their bellies that they thought they would make him

50 by craft come off and give them some meat apace<sup>144</sup> for their dinner. And therefore they said unto him, "What miracle then showest thou that we may see it and thereby believe thee? What thing workest thou? Our fathers did eat manna in desert, as it is writ, 'He gave them bread from heaven to eat.'<sup>145</sup>

Here you may see that whereas Christ told them they must believe in him before they should have that lively meat that he told them of, they thought they would by craft, before they would work toward the belief, cause him to give them some other meat
60 in the meanwhile; and therefore they not only said that it were reason<sup>146</sup> he should work some miracle before them ere he should look<sup>147</sup> that they should believe him, but also they assigned him, in manner,<sup>148</sup> what manner a miracle they would have him
65 do: that is to wit, give them some meat by miracle by and by<sup>149</sup> one or other without any work or labor of theirs. And therefore they put him in mind of the meat of manna that their forefathers had from heaven while they were in wilderness and worked 70 nothing therefor.<sup>150</sup>

But against this our Lord told them again that the bread that they did eat in desert was not given them by Moses, nor given them verily from heaven neither. For though that Moses was their prophet and 75 their guide, yet was that bread of manna given them by God. And it came not also verily down from heaven, but from a far lower place of the air. But he showed them that God his own Father, that gave them that bread then out of the air, giveth them
80 now verily down from heaven that bread that is for spiritual sustenance and lively nourishing, such manner of very bread that, in comparison and respect thereof, the other bread of manna might seem no bread at all. For "Verily, verily," said our Lord
85 unto them, "not Moses gave you that bread from heaven, but my Father giveth you the very bread from heaven. For the very bread is that that cometh down from heaven, and giveth life to the world."

Now when they heard this, weening yet<sup>151</sup> that Christ spoke of some such bread as manna was, that God would at his request give them down from heaven, as manna was given down in Moses's days, and that this bread should feed the body as manna did, and yet be far better too, they prayed him and said, "Lord give us this bread always," as though they would say, "Good Lord, give us this very bread that thou speakest of that thy Father sendeth down from heaven, that we need not to labor and toil for bread in tilling of the earth, and give it us, good Lord, always, not for a season, as our fathers had the other in desert, but give it us forever, and let us never lack it nor need no more to work and labor for it."

THE NINTH CHAPTER

Then was our Lord plain with them and said, "I am the bread of life; he that cometh to me shall not hunger, and he that believeth in me shall never thirst."

"Lo," saith our Lord, "the bread of life that I speak of is myself, whom my Father giveth down from heaven to give not only nourishing, but also life to the world.

"The common bread doth but help to keep and conserve the life that the man hath already. But my Father hath sent me down — me I say, the very bread whereof angels feed, not only to conserve and keep the life of the body (albeit that<sup>152</sup> do I too, and heal of your sick folks full many), but also to quicken them that are dead, many in body and all the whole world in soul, whereof none can have life but by me.

"And therefore he that cometh to me — that is to wit, whoso will work the work of God that I told you, that is to wit, come by faith unto me and believe in him whom the Father hath sent, that is to wit, in myself — his hunger and thirst shall I take away forever."

Good is it, good readers, to consider well these words, lest by these words wrong understood some men might ween — as these heretics teach, that nowadays renew that old heresy that both Saint James and Saint Paul by plain express words reprove<sup>153</sup> — that our Lord would ask no more of any Christian

man but only bare faith alone, which heresy, whereof they so much boasted a while, these heretics now feel so fully confuted that, though they live still like those that believe it, yet in their words and writing they be fain<sup>154</sup> to retreat for shame, and to seek such glosses to save their old writing, as might make unwise men ween that they never meant otherwise than the whole Catholic Church commonly teacheth and preacheth, which, if they had meant none other indeed (as indeed they meant and yet mean far other still), then had they, ye wot<sup>155</sup> well, made much business about nought.<sup>156</sup>

But letting these heretics pass, ye shall, good Christian readers, understand that like as if<sup>157</sup> a man would teach a child to read, he must first begin at his ABCs (for without the knowledge of his letters he can never go forward), so forasmuch<sup>158</sup> as no man can come unto Christ without faith, but faith must needs be the first entry toward all Christian virtues, since no man can either hope in him or love him whom he knoweth not, and Christ can no man Christianly know but by faith (for, as Saint Paul saith, he that cometh unto God, he must needs believe),<sup>159</sup> so did our Savior therefore, as a good and a wise master of his Christian school, begin there with the Jews that there offered themselves as his scholars; he began, I say, with faith. But yet he meant not that to salvation they should need nothing else but only bare faith, so that if they would believe all things that he should tell them, they should thereby be surely saved, though<sup>160</sup> they would do nothing that he would bid them.

But then what say we to these words of our Savior, "He that believeth in me shall never thirst"?<sup>161</sup> By this word of never thirsting, he meaneth everlasting salvation, which he promiseth here to all those that believe in him, wherefore it may seem that whosoever believe, though he do nothing else, shall by this promise of our Savior be saved.

Saint John the Baptist, at such time as people came to him, and asked what they should do whereby they might avoid damnation, he bade them give alms. And when the publicans asked him what they should do to avoid damnation, he bade them forbear<sup>162</sup> bribes, and take no more than the due customs and toll. And to the soldiers asking him the same question for their part, he answered

151 weening yet: thinking still 152 albeit that: although 153 See Js 2:14–26; Gal 5:6. 154 obliged, forced 155 know

156 nothing 157 like as if: just as when 158 inasmuch 159 See Heb 11:6.

160 even if 161 Jn 6:35 162 avoid; abstain from that they should pick no quarrels, nor do no man no violence, nor take nothing by force, but hold themselves content with their wages.<sup>163</sup> Yet did he not mean that any of all these lessons was enough 5 to save them without any more, but he told them, for the while, each of them the thing that should be most meetly<sup>164</sup> for them, and most properly pertain to their persons, and therefore most meetly for them to learn first, and the remnant should each of 10 them after learn, little and<sup>165</sup> little at length, so that at last they should each of them do that one thing with all other things necessary also, and without which that one thing could not save them.

Thus did our Savior also because the Jews were 15 full of infidelity and full of incredulity, which unbelief enduring, they could not enter into the way of salvation. He therefore first taught them the lesson of belief and faith, which once had, they should be meet to learn on the remnant, and increase both 20 in hope and in well-working charity, so that faith once had, he told them they should not perish.
For if they once believed his word, it was a means to make them hope in him and love him both, and those three things would make them obey him and 25 work in such other virtues as he would for their own weal<sup>166</sup> command them.

There are also, good readers, diverse holy doctors that say that in these words by which our Savior said unto the Jews, "He that believeth in me 30 shall never thirst," he meant not him that had a bare faith alone, which is, as Saint James saith, but a dead faith,<sup>167</sup> but him that had faith well-formed with hope and charity.

And therefore saith holy Saint Augustine thus:

35 Christ saith not "believe him," but "believe in him." For it followeth not by and by<sup>168</sup> that whoso believe him, believeth in him. For the devils believed him, but they believed not in him. And we believe Saint Paul, but we believe not in Saint 40 Paul. To believe therefore in him is with believing to go into him, and to be incorporated in his members. This is the faith that God requireth and exacteth of us: that is to wit, the faith that by love will work well. Yet is faith discerned and 45 severed from works; as the Apostle saith, a man is justified by faith without the works of the law.<sup>169</sup>

And there are works that seem good without the faith of Christ, but they be not, for they be not referred<sup>170</sup> unto that end of which all good things 50 come. For the end of the law is Christ unto justice unto all that believe.<sup>171</sup> And therefore our Savior would not discern and divide faith from the work but saith that the faith itself was the work of God: that is to wit, the faith that by love worketh.<sup>172</sup> 55

Here ye perceive, good readers, that to believe meritoriously, so as it shall be rewarded with salvation, may not be faith alone, but faith with a working love. Nor it may not be a bare believing of Christ, but it must be a believing in Christ, that is, 60 as Saint Augustine saith, not an idle dead-standing belief, but a belief lively, quick,<sup>173</sup> and stirring, and by charity and good works ever walking and going into Christ. And then they that so believe in him, not with the bare only faith that these here- 65 tics preach, but with the well-working faith that the Catholic Church teacheth, they shall be saved, saith our Savior, from eternal hunger and thirst.

THE TENTH CHAPTER

70 But then goeth Christ further and showeth them that they lack this meat,<sup>174</sup> though it stand before them, and showeth them also by what means they may get it. Lo, thus he said unto them, "But I have told you that both you have seen me, and you have not believed," as though he would say, "You 75 have seen me do miracles, and yet it hath not made you believe."

He bade them before that they should work to get the lively meat, and he told them after that the work which they should work to get it with was faith and 80 belief. And he wrought miracles, which they saw, to make them believe. And now he showeth them that for all this they have not the belief yet, but yet must work and labor to have it.

Then might they have asked him, "Which way 85 may we come to it?" But because they asked him not, he of his high goodness told them the means

unasked and said, "All that my Father giveth me shall come to me," as though he would say, "Though my Father has sent me down to call you to me, and though I preach to you and tell you the truth at your ear, and work miracles before you that you may see them at your eyes, yea, and feed you by miracles, and put them even in your belly, yet can you never come to me by faith but if<sup>175</sup> my Father bring you. Never can you be mine by faith, but if my Father give you me. Now if ye know of any good guide that could bring you to the place whither ye would fain<sup>176</sup> go, where you should find the thing that ye would fain have, what would you do? Would you not labor to him? Would you not pray and entreat him to go with you and guide you thither? Now have I told you who can bring you to me by faith: that is to wit, God my Father; and therefore labor to him to guide you to me, pray him to give you to me, without whose help ye can never come to me. It is, I tell you, no small thing to believe in me. For but if the grace of my Father first prevent<sup>177</sup> you, ye can never begin to think thereon. But he hath now prevented you by sending me to call upon you. Howbeit,<sup>178</sup> yet for all that, but if he go forth with you and help to lead you forward, you may faint and fall and lie still by the way, and come no further forth toward me. But now he helpeth you forward by mine outward miracles, which himself worketh with me. But yet except<sup>179</sup> he work with you inwardly, with his inward help to draw you, you can for all this never come at me. Call well upon him therefore, and pray him to draw you and bring you and give you to me, which if you do and endeavor yourself for your own part, as I bade you before to work and walk with him toward me, he shall surely bring you into faith, and by faith into hope and into charity both, and so give you graciously to me. And then shall I give you the lively meat that I spoke of if ye will abide with me. 'For him that cometh to me will I not cast out.' Let him look that he cast not himself out; for surely I will not if himself will abide. For it is my Father's will that I should not, 'and I am descended from heaven not to do my will, but to do the will of him that hath sent me. And this is verily<sup>180</sup> the will of the Father that sent me: that all that he hath given me I should lose nothing thereof, but that I should raise up that again in the last day.'"

THE ELEVENTH CHAPTER

These words might, good readers, seem to an unchristian man, or to a false-christened Arian,<sup>181</sup> to signify that our Savior were not equal God with his Father, in that he speaketh so often (as in many more places of Scripture he speaketh more often) that he is obedient to his Father, and that his Father sent him, and that he is less than his Father, and many such other places, by which the old Arian heretics defended their heresy against the Godhead of Christ in his person, as these Lutheran heretics and these Hussgenians,<sup>182</sup> Zwinglians, and Tyndaleans draw now diverse other texts to the maintenance of their false heresies, against the precious body and blood of Christ in his Blessed Sacrament.

But as good Christian men well know that these new heretics are falsely now deceived in the one, so know they too that those old heretics were falsely then deceived in the other.

For all the minority and the obedience that the Scripture speaketh of in Christ is all meant of his manhood (which was less indeed) and not of his Godhead, for they were both equal.

For how could they be in Godhead unequal, when that in Godhead they were both one, though in persons diverse? And therefore our Savior by his Godhead hath the selfsame will that his Father hath, and none other, as he hath the same wit,<sup>183</sup> and the same might, the same nature, the same substance, and finally, the same Godhead and none other. And therefore whatsoever the one doth, the other doth, and as the Son was sent by the Father, so was he also sent both by himself and by the Holy Ghost too. And when the Holy Ghost was sent, he was sent both by the Father and the Son and by himself also. But incarnate was there no more but the Son alone, who, as he had by his Godhead none other will but the very selfsame that his Father had and the Holy Ghost, so had he by his manhood another several will and proper unto the person of his manhood itself, as every man hath his own. And of that will is it that he saith, "I am descended from heaven, not to do my will but the will of him that sent me,"<sup>184</sup> for in the will of his manhood he obeyed the Godhead.

But now if this obedience be understood of his manhood, how can it stand with these words of

his: "I am descended from heaven not to do my will but the will of him that sent me"? With that point, good reader, shall no man need to be moved. For since both the Godhead and manhood were joined and uned<sup>185</sup> together both in the one person of Christ, that whole person might say of itself such things as were verified and true in any of the both natures. For like<sup>186</sup> as a man may say of himself, "I shall die and return into the earth," and yet that shall not his soul do but his body only, and "I shall after my death go forthwith<sup>187</sup> to joy or to pain," and yet that shall not his body do by and by<sup>188</sup> but his soul, so might Christ say of himself, "I am descended from heaven," because his Godhead descended from thence, though his body did not, and he might say, "I shall suffer and die," because his manhood so should, and yet was his Godhead neither mortal nor passible.<sup>189</sup> And, for all that, might it be said of Christ, "God died for us," because he died that then was God. And of Christ might it well be said, "This man made heaven and earth," and yet his manhood made it not, but was made by his Godhead as other creatures were. But those words are well verified by the reason that he, which of the person of Christ saith, "this man," signifieth and meaneth not his only manhood but his whole person, which is not only man but very<sup>190</sup> God also.

This thing and this manner of speaking expressed our Savior very plain himself, when he said unto Nicodemus in talking with him of the sacrament of baptism, "No man hath ascended into heaven but he that descended from heaven, the Son of Man that is in heaven."<sup>191</sup> In these words he showeth unto Nicodemus that there was more credence to be given unto himself alone than unto all the prophets that ever were before. For himself more perfectly knew all things than all they did. For never man had there been in heaven but he. "For never man," said our Lord, "hath ascended into heaven but he that descended from heaven, the Son of Man, that is to wit, I myself that am in heaven."

Here he said that the Son of Man had been in heaven, and had descended from heaven, and was yet in heaven still. Now was not his Godhead the Son of Man but the Son of God, nor his manhood the Son of God but the Son of Man. But now, though the Godhead and the manhood were not both one but two distinct natures still, yet since the Son of God and the Son of Man were both one—that is to wit, both twain<sup>192</sup> one person, Christ—Christ therefore might well say then of himself, "I the Son of God am the Son of Man, and I the Son of Man am the Son of God, and I the Son of God am walking among men on earth, and I the Son of Man am sitting with my Father in heaven."

Now that ye may, good readers, the better conceive this matter and more easily perceive the sentence<sup>193</sup> of these words of Christ, "All that my Father giveth me, etc." I shall expound you these words of his in order, as<sup>194</sup> it were in his own person, speaking the words of this exposition himself.

"No man can come to me by his own labor alone. But all that my Father giveth me shall come to me. Labor therefore to my Father and pray him to give you to me, giving you occasion and helping you and, with your own will working with him, making you believe me; and so shall you, working with him by your own good will in subduing of your reason to the obedience of faith, by belief come to me, and with good will of well-working also with the belief, shall not only believe me, but also believe in me, and go into me by being a member of mine and incorporating yourself in me; and I shall, by the gift of mine own body to be eaten and received of yours, incorporate myself in you, and I will not cast you out from me but be still incorporated with you, but if<sup>195</sup> you cast me out from you, and so by sin cast yourself away from me; else<sup>196</sup> of all that cometh to me by my Father's bringing, I will cast none out. For if ye came to me by my Father through faith, and that I would not then suffer death for your salvation, then did I cast you out. For none can come into my bliss of heaven but by his ransom paid by my death and Passion. But I will not refuse that, but I will suffer and die for the world to give the dead world life by my death. For I am descended from heaven, sent by my Father not to do mine own will, but the will of him that hath sent me. But I mean not by these words that I will die against mine own will, but that albeit<sup>197</sup> the sensual part of my manhood would of the nature of man abhor, shrink, and withdraw from the grievous pain of such an intolerable Passion, yet shall my will both of my Godhead be all one with the will of my Father, and thereby in such manner obedient unto his Father, as we say a man is obedient unto his own reason, and yet is not his own reason another power superior above himself. And my will of my manhood shall also be so conformable to the will of my Father, the will of the Holy Ghost, and the will of mine own Godhead— all which three wills are indeed one will, as all our three persons are in Godhead one God— that I will willingly die for them all that so come to me by my Father's bringing, through the well-working faith, and will abide and persevere. And likewise as I will by mine own body, given unto them by eating into their own, give them an earnest penny<sup>198</sup> of our incorporation together, and a memorial of that death and Passion, by which I will willingly give myself for them by being slain and sacrificed for their sin, and made the ransom of their redemption, when God shall for this obedience of my manhood unto the death, the vile death of the cross, lift me up and exalt me, and give me the name that is above all names,<sup>199</sup> then shall I by my resurrection again to life give them an example and make them sure that I shall in like wise at the last day leave none of them to be lost, no more in body than in soul, but shall so resuscitate and raise again their bodies that like as I shall myself ascend into heaven again from whence I came, so shall they as members of my body ascend thither with me, and there be fed of this everlasting lively bread that I tell you of: that is to wit, of the fruition of my Godhead and beholding also of my glorious manhood forever, each of you that have use of reason after the analogy and proportion of the well-formed faith, with hope and well-working charity that you shall have had in this life herebefore. For this is, as I before told you, the will of my Father that sent me: that every man that seeth his Son as you do, and not only seeth him as you do, but also believeth in him as you do not, shall have, if he persevere in that well-working belief, the meat that I speak of that shall not perish but abide into everlasting life. For though ye see every man die here for the while, yet I shall, as I told you, being of equal power with my Father, raise them all up again myself at the last day, and then shall my faithful folk be fed with this everlasting lively bread of mine own person, both God and man, forever. And lo, now have I plainly told you what bread I mean.”

Whereas I have, good reader, in the exposition of these words of our Savior, inserted the incorporation of him and us together, by the receiving and eating of his own Body into ours, I have not done it to make any man ween<sup>200</sup> that that point appeared and were proved by any part of those words, but because it is a very truth indeed, and not only touched and signified in other words of his before, but also plainly expressed and declared by other words of his own after, as you shall hereafter see. Therefore so plain a truth, and so necessary, and so necessarily pertaining to that place of the matter, methought it not meetly<sup>201</sup> for to be left out.

THE TWELFTH CHAPTER

But now shall you hear how Christ's audience that came to seek him were affectionate to this everlasting lively bread when they had heard him declare it.

All the while that he spoke those other words before, they were yet in good hope that whatsoever he meant besides, he would give them some meat for their bellies. And as they were gross,<sup>202</sup> so had they at the first weened. And so had they liefer<sup>203</sup> that he would have given them some such gross bread made of earthly corn<sup>204</sup> for their earthly bellies, such as he gave them and multiplied for them before, than any manna that came down from the air. But afterward, when they heard him tell them of far better bread that should come from heaven than manna was, which their fathers did eat in desert, then were they better apaid,<sup>205</sup> and prayed him that they might have of that. But then when they perceived in conclusion that he meant all of such bread as should feed their souls, and gave them no good comfort after their gross minds of any gross feeding for their gross bodies, then like as some of their forefathers murmured<sup>206</sup> in desert against Moses for manna, and said that their stomach wambled<sup>207</sup> against that light meat, and wished their old bondage again,<sup>208</sup> of which they were before so weary while they were in Egypt, yet thought they now that they were well then, because they might then sit over the pots that had the sodden<sup>209</sup> flesh in them, of such flesh yet some of such bond slaves had haply<sup>210</sup> then but the savor. When these had heard him now speak all of such spiritual food, their hearts so sore<sup>211</sup> arose against him that their affections were clean<sup>212</sup> fallen from him suddenly. For a day before they had him

 5 in high estimation, and called him the prophet that should come and redeem the world, and would have made him king,<sup>213</sup> because they thought he would feed them by miracle without their labor, where their other kings used to pill them and poll<sup>214</sup> them
 10 and keep them under tribute so bare that with great labor they could scant<sup>215</sup> find themselves meat. And therefore would they, as I say, after that feeding that he fed them so by miracle, so fain<sup>216</sup> have made him king that he was fain<sup>217</sup> to withdraw himself aside
 15 and flee from them, till that mind of theirs were gone. And that was not long, as ye see. For now that after their great hope of such another feast for their bodies, they heard him turn all to the feeding of their souls, and that for the feeding of their bellies
 20 he went not about to give them so much as one loaf among them all to their breakfast, they murmured against that that<sup>218</sup> he had said of himself, “I am the quick<sup>219</sup> bread that am descended from heaven.” And then they said: “Is not this Joseph’s son? Know 25 not we his father and his mother both? How saith he then of himself, ‘I am descended from heaven?’”

Lo, here they called him a carpenter’s son, and therein they belied<sup>220</sup> him unaware, but far were they now fallen from the making him a king.

30 Then said our Savior to them, “Murmur not among yourselves; no man cometh to me, but if<sup>221</sup> my Father draw him,” as though he would say, “Leave your murmuring and fall to prayer, and work and walk with my Father in coming to me by faith.
 35 Men are so weak of themselves in the walking of this way that there can no man come to me but if my Father not only come to him and take him by the hand and lead him, but also draw him too. And therefore, since he must do so much for you or else
 40 you cannot come, so much have you the more need to leave your murmuring, and apply yourself to pray him (if he draw you not) to draw you, and, as the Prophet saith, to pray him strain your jaws with a bit and a bridle<sup>222</sup> and draw you by the cheeks, maugre your teeth,<sup>223</sup> and make you turn your wills from 45 your belly-joy to come to the soul food with me. For

whereas your belly meat shall perish, belly and all, he that thus shall come to my feast, he shall not perish. For I shall raise him up again in the last day 50 unto everlasting life. And if ye marvel at this that I say, that my Father must bring you and draw you — that is, that he must, besides all outward teaching, teach you within by leading and drawing you into the truth of faith, by his inward operation joined with the towardness<sup>224</sup> of your wills, prevented,
 55 moved, and set awork with occasions of his former grace — if ye marvel of this manner of drawing and of my Father’s inward teaching, remember that your own prophets say that ‘all folk shall be taught of God.’<sup>225</sup> And now God teacheth you, for I teach
 60 you, which am, as I told you, the bread of life that am descended from heaven. And surely there shall no man be taught the faith but if<sup>226</sup> God teach him. Nor every man is not full taught that heareth it but he that heareth it and learneth it, which no man
 65 can do by any outward voice without God working within. And he will not work, nor his wisdom will not enter into an evil-willed heart.<sup>227</sup> And therefore leave your murmuring, and pray my Father to teach you, not only outwardly as he teacheth you now by 70 me, but inwardly also, that you may be learned by his working to faith with you and within you. But why do I tell you so often that you cannot come to his gift of faith (without which you cannot come at 75 me) but if my Father give it you? Verily, because I would you should<sup>228</sup> pray him for it. For though he prevent you and give you occasions toward the getting of that gift, yet setteth he not so little by this great gift of learning and faith that he list<sup>229</sup> to cast it away upon them that, when it is showed them, 80 set not so much thereby as to desire it and pray therefor.<sup>230</sup>

And therefore I would have you desire it of him that may give it you, and yet is not that my Father only but myself also. Howbeit,<sup>231</sup> if I should bid you 85 ask it of me, and pray me give you this grace, you be so far from the belief in me that ye would not do it.

And therefore, not speaking of mine own power, I tell you all of the power of the Father, that without him ye cannot come to me, because I would 90 have you pray to him that he would give you the grace that, as ye know by faith and knowledge

him already for God, so ye may know by faith and knowledge him for my Father too, and then shall you, by the same faith, know and acknowledge me also for his Son. And then shall you not murmur at my words, but humbly come to me as to the Son, not of Joseph but of God, and acknowledge me for the quick bread that is descended from heaven: ‘For every man that hath heard this lesson of my Father, and hath not only heard it but also learned it, he cometh (as I have told you) to me. But yet this will I tell you, that never man saw my Father yet. But he that is of God — that is to wit,<sup>232</sup> myself that am his own Son — he hath seen the Father, and so hath no man else.’<sup>233</sup> And therefore the lesson that any man heareth and learneth of my Father, he must hear of him by me and learn it by the inward work of my Father, with whose work I work also. And so shall he come to me through perfect well-working faith in me. And I tell you very truth, he that so believeth in me and persevereth at his death in that perfect belief is sure of eternal life. For I am (as I diverse times now have told you) the very bread of life. ‘Your fathers that murmured as you do now did eat the bread of manna in desert, and they be dead and perished.’ Leave therefore that wrong way of your forefathers, leave your grudge and your murmur, and labor to my Father that he may bring you to me by such faith as ye may eat this bread that is myself. For this bread is bread descending from heaven, for the nonce<sup>234</sup> that whoso may eat and be fed of that shall not perish by everlasting death. For I tell you yet again that ‘I am the quick bread that am descended from heaven.’ Whosoever come to me by my Father’s bringing, so that by perfect perseverance and well-working faith he may eat and be fed of this bread — that is to wit, attain the fruition of my glorious Godhead, with the glorious sight whereof the angels are fed in heaven — he shall be sure of everlasting life.”

40 THE THIRTEENTH CHAPTER

Whereas our Savior, good readers, in the beginning, upon occasion of his miracle wrought upon the multiplication of the bread, touched both the bread of his Godhead and also of the giving them of his own body to be eaten in form of bread, and that he somewhat did insinuate and set forth the same in those words, “Work you not the bread that perisheth, but the bread that abideth into everlasting life, which the Son of Man shall give you,” as I somewhat told you before, not of mine own mind, but of the mind of diverse holy doctors, Alcuin, Saint Thomas, Theophylactus, and Saint Cyril,<sup>235</sup> ye see that our Savior in many words, which I have now declared you, hath opened and showed unto them the bread of his Godhead.

And now, good readers, take heed how in those words that now follow, he declareth unto them the bread of his own very body, which he giveth us verily to eat in the Blessed Sacrament, wherein that exposition that I shall give you shall be none invention of mine, but the clear faith and sentence<sup>236</sup> of all the holy doctors of Christ’s Church, old and new both, from Christ’s death to this day, of whom I shall for an example give you, ere<sup>237</sup> I make an end, the names and the sentences of some such as yourselves shall well see and perceive for other manner<sup>238</sup> men than I am or Master Masker either, and that if they were good men and true, ye shall then yourself say that Master Masker is naught<sup>239</sup> and false, and that his exposition, though<sup>240</sup> it were true as it is both foolish and false, yet since it cometh not near the purpose, is (as I told you before) very falsely handled.

Let us hear now therefore of the giving of Christ’s own blessed body verily to us, to eat in the Blessed Sacrament, what Christ himself saith.

After his declaration of the bread of his glorious Godhead, these are his words: “And the bread that I shall give you is my flesh which I shall give for the life of the world.”

Whereas before they murmured at the light<sup>241</sup> spiritual bread of his Godhead, he telleth them now that he will not only give them that bread to feed upon, by fruition of the beholding face to face when the time shall come, as he hath also given it them in one manner already by his incarnation, to feed them spiritually in the meanwhile by spiritual doctrine, but that the bread that he will give them to feed upon shall besides that be his own flesh, even the very same that he will give for the life of the world,<sup>242</sup> meaning that he would verily give men the same very flesh to eat and feed upon, both bodily and spiritually in remembrance of his death, that he would for man's redemption verily give to death, and verily for a sacrifice offer up to God by death.

5 But now saith Master Masker, the adversary of the Blessed Sacrament, that our Savior meant no more in those words, "And the bread that I shall give you is my flesh, which I shall give for the life of the world,"<sup>243</sup> but that he would give it for the 10 life of the world by his death, and meant nothing at all of the giving of his flesh before his death, or after his death, nor nothing in these words or any that in the same chapter follow intended to speak of any such manner of giving his body to eat, as he 15 is received and eaten in the Blessed Sacrament, nor nothing meant in this chapter anything to speak of that matter.

Thus would Master Masker that all men should ween,<sup>244</sup> as it appeareth plainly by his exposition.
20 And thus also saith Luther,<sup>245</sup> and thus saith Frith also, and affirmeth this saying so boldly that he saith it twice in his one book wherein he answereth me. Therein saith he twice that all learned men are full and whole agreed in that point.

25 And therefore will these adversaries of the Sacrament say that in this exposition of mine, all that ever I say, whereby it may appear that our Savior in these words written in this sixth chapter of Saint John anything spoke or meant of the giving of his 30 body to be eaten in the Blessed Sacrament, is an imagination of mine own head, as Master Masker argueth and speaketh always of "Master More his faith," as though it were no man's else but mine.

35 But to the intent, good readers, that ye may clearly perceive Master Masker's malicious falsehood therein, I shall in diverse places of this exposition, concerning specially this point of Christ's speaking and meaning of the giving of his own very body in the Blessed Sacrament, rehearse<sup>246</sup> you the 40 names of some of those whom I follow therein, and some of their words too, by which ye shall see that I deceive you not as Master Masker doth, that through all his exposition flitteth all from the point and dissimuleth<sup>247</sup> all the words of those old holy 45 men that expounded it in such wise<sup>248</sup> as he would we should ween that no good man ever did.

Upon these words therefore of our Savior, "And the bread that I shall give you is my flesh that I shall give for the life of the world," thus saith Theophylactus:

Consider that that bread that we eat in the Sacrament is not only a figure of the flesh of our Lord, but it is also the flesh of our Lord itself. For he said not, 'The bread that I shall give is a figure of my flesh,' but he said, 'It is my flesh.' For the same 55 bread by secret words, through the mystical benediction, and by the coming also of the Holy Spirit thereunto, is transformed and changed into the flesh of our Lord. And lest that any man should be troubled in his mind, weening that it were not 60 to be believed that bread should be flesh, this is well known that while our Lord walked in his flesh, and of bread received his nourishing, that bread which he then ate was then changed into his body, and was made such as his holy flesh was,
65 and did sustain and increase his flesh after the common manner of men. And therefore now also is the bread changed into the flesh of our Lord. And how is it then (will some man say) that it appeareth not to us flesh but bread? That hath 70 Christ provided, to the intent we should not abhor<sup>249</sup> from the eating of it. For if it were given us in likeness of flesh, we should be displeasantly disposed toward the receiving of our Housel.<sup>250</sup> But now, by the goodness of God condescending
75 to our infirmity, this sacramental meat appeareth unto us such as we have at other times been accustomed with.<sup>251</sup>

These are not my words, lo, good Christian reader, but the words of that old holy cunning<sup>252</sup> doctor 80 Theophylactus, which was also no Latin man but a Greek, because Master Masker speaketh so much of papists, as though the Catholic faith, whereby the Catholic Church believeth that in the Blessed Sacrament is the very blessed body of Christ, were 85 a thing but made and imagined by some pope of Rome.

Now if Master Masker will say that mine exposition is in this point false, here you see, good readers, that mine exposition is not mine but the exposition 90 of Theophylactus. And therefore let him leave dancing with me, and dance another while with him.

243 Jn 6:51 244 would... ween: Master Masker wants all men to believe 245 See WA 23: 205, 33: 209–10. 246 tell

247 pretends not to see 248 a way 249 recoil; shrink 250 the consecrated

But mark well two things now, good reader, in these words: One, that this good holy doctor calleth the Blessed Sacrament bread as Saint Paul doth,<sup>253</sup> and our Savior himself also, in these words of his in this sixth chapter of Saint John, and so doth also every doctor of the Church almost, upon which calling of it bread, Friar Luther, and Melanchthon, and their fellows take their hold to say and affirm that it is very bread still, as well after the consecration as afore. And Friar Hussgen, with Zwingli, George Joye, John Frith, and Tyndale, turn forth further to the devil and not only say that it is very bread still, but also that it is nothing else.

But now consider therefore, as I say, that Theophylactus here calleth it bread as well as they, saying the bread that we receive in the mysteries or Sacrament is not only a certain figure of the flesh of our Lord, but it is also the flesh of our Lord itself. But then expresseth he plainly that though he calleth it bread, he meaneth not that it is very material bread still as it was, but that the bread is transformed, gone, and changed into the very flesh of Christ. And he setteth it out also with an example of the bread that is eaten and turned into the flesh of the man whom it nourisheth, which every man well wotteth<sup>254</sup> that any wit hath that it is no longer bread then.

And therefore Theophylactus calleth it bread, because it was bread, as in the Scripture the serpent into which Aaron's rod was turned is called a rod still, while it was no rod but a serpent. For there is it thus written: "The rod of Aaron did devour the rods of the magicians."<sup>255</sup> And as the Scripture calleth the serpent there a rod, so calleth it the Sacrament bread. And as Theophylactus calleth here the Blessed Sacrament by the name of bread, and yet declareth that it is no bread, even so do all holy doctors that call it by that name of bread both mean indeed, and also do clearly declare, that though they call it bread, they know well it is no bread but in likeness and form of bread under the sacramental sign the very Blessed Body of Christ, flesh, blood, bones and all, and neither without the soul nor the Godhead neither.

Mark also, good reader, that Theophylactus saith, "The bread which we eat in the mysteries or Sacrament is not only a figure of the flesh of our Lord, but it is also the flesh of our Lord itself."

In these words, good readers, mark well that he saith it is a figure and yet for all that the very flesh of Christ.

This thing I specially desire you to note, because that by the marking of this one point, ye may avoid almost all the craft with which Master Masker, Frith, and Tyndale, and all these heretics labor to deceive you in the writings of all the old holy doctors.

For wheresoever any of them call the Blessed Sacrament a figure, there would these fellows make us ween that he meant it were nothing else. But here you see that Theophylactus saith it is a figure, as it is indeed, but he telleth us that it is also (as indeed it is) the very flesh of our Lord.

And therefore mark well these two points in this one place, that<sup>256</sup> when these heretics prove that the Blessed Sacrament is called bread, they prove nothing against us. For they that call it bread declare yet that indeed it is not bread but the body of Christ. And when they prove that it is called a figure, they prove nothing against us. For they that say it is a figure say it is not only a figure, but also the flesh of Christ. But when we prove that the Blessed Sacrament is not only called the Body and Blood of Christ, but also that the old holy doctors and the expositions of Holy Scripture do plainly declare that it is so, then prove we plain against them. For we deny none of the other two points, but this point do they deny.

THE FOURTEENTH CHAPTER

Yet to the intent that ye may see that Master Masker in his exposition doth but plainly mock you, consider yet again these words well, Et panis quem ego dabo caro mea est, quam ego dabo pro mundi vita, which text, albeit that<sup>257</sup> in the Latin it be somewhat otherwise — that is to wit, Et panis quem ego dabo caro mea est pro mundi vita, without these words, quam ego dabo in the second place, which Latin text were yet more for my purpose — yet since not only the Greek text is as I rehearsed you first, which was the language wherein the Evangelist wrote, but that also both the Greek expositors, and many of the Latin expositors too, do so expound it, and that though those words were out, yet they be such as the sentence<sup>258</sup> would well require to repeat and understand, and finally because I find that Master Masker himself doth in his exposition take that text in the first fashion, only changing one word in the second place, that is to wit, this word “give”

 5 into this word “pay,” which change he maketh as for an exposition, I am content to take the text as himself doth — that is to wit, after the first manner thus: “And the bread that I shall give you is my flesh, which I shall give for the life of the world.”

10 Consider now, good reader, that in these words, our Savior here speaketh of giving his flesh twice, by which he meaneth that in the one giving, he would give it to them, and in the other giving, he would give it for them. The one giving was in the Blessed 15 Sacrament; the other was on the cross.

And look now whether the very words of Christ agree with this exposition or not; the words, ye wot well, be these: “And the bread that I shall give you is my flesh.” Here is, lo, the one giving, by which 20 he shall, saith he, give his flesh to them. Then saith he further, “which I shall give for the life of the world.” Lo, here he telleth them of the other giving, by which he should give it for them. And because his giving to them should be a memorial of his giving for them, therefore he spoke of them
 25 both together. But yet because his principle purpose was to speak in that place, not of his giving of his flesh for them, but of his giving it unto them, therefore of his giving it to them he maketh after
 30 a very plain and express declaration in many plain open words, but of his giving it for them, he spoke but a little, and as<sup>259</sup> it were but for a declaration of the other giving. For when he had said, “And the bread which I shall give you shall be my flesh,”
 35 then to declare that he meant to give them his very flesh, he added thereto these words, “which I shall give for the life of the world,” as though he would say, “Will you wit<sup>260</sup> what flesh this bread is that I will give to you? Verily the selfsame that I will give 40 for you, and not only for you but for the life of the whole world too — that is to wit, for as many of the world as when they hear it preached, will not refuse to take it. And therefore when ye know hereafter which flesh of mine I shall have given for you 45 upon the cross, then shall you not need to doubt which flesh of mine I shall give you in the bread of the Sacrament, except you list<sup>261</sup> not to believe me.

For now I tell you as plain as I can that it shall be the same flesh.”

This exposition, good readers, ye see is evident, 50 open, and plain. But now see, good readers, for God’s sake, the falsehood of Master Masker in his exposition upon the same words. Whereas our Savior, as you see, speaketh in these few words of these two givings — the giving to eat and the giving 55 to die, the giving in the Sacrament and the giving on the cross — cometh me now Master Masker, and expoundeth Christ’s words altogether of the one giving — that is to wit, the giving by death on the cross — and letteth the other giving go by, as though 60 he saw it not, albeit that Christ speaketh of that giving both first and most.

Now if Master Masker will say that I do but feign these two givings and say, as he saith often, that Christ meant there but one giving — that is to wit, by 65 his death — and will say that Christ speaketh there no word of the Sacrament,<sup>262</sup> I shall tell him again that so might Master Masker mar all his own exposition utterly. For Christ when he saith, “Which I shall give for the life of the world,” speaketh no 70 word in the world neither of his cross nor of his death. If he say that they be understood, then must he give me leave to say the like for my part, that as death and the cross are understood in the one giving, so eating and the Sacrament is understood in
 75 the other giving. Howbeit,<sup>263</sup> for my part yet touching the first giving, I may say that Christ speaketh of the Sacrament, and signifieth his meaning in this word “bread,” when he saith, “The bread that I shall give you is my flesh.” And of the eating thereof he 80 speaketh expressly after. And therefore shall Master Masker never wade out thereof, but that I have the words of the Scripture much more clear for the first giving than he for the second. And ye may see that 85 of the two givings Master Masker, to mock us with, hath in his exposition of a foolish wiliness winked and dissembled the one.

But yet if Master Masker strive with me still upon this point — whether our Savior speak of two givings of his flesh, or but of one — albeit that I have proved 90 my part therein meetly<sup>264</sup> plain myself, yet am I content that a better than we both shall break the strife between us. I shall therefore name you that holy cunning<sup>265</sup> doctor Saint Bede, whose words I trust

every wise man will believe a little better than either Master Masker's or mine. Lo, thus saith Saint Bede upon these words of Christ, "And the bread which I shall give is my body, which I shall give for the life of the world." "This bread," saith Saint Bede, "did our Lord give when he gave the Sacrament of his body and his blood unto his disciples and when he offered up himself to God his Father upon the altar of the cross."<sup>266</sup>

Here you see, good readers, that Saint Bede telleth you plain the same tale that I tell you: that is to wit, that our Savior in those words speaketh of two givings of himself, the one to his disciples in the Sacrament, the other to death for his disciples on the cross. And therefore, while Master Masker with his heresy doth utterly deny the one, and by his exposition affirmeth that Christ in this place did speak but of the other, Saint Bede beareth me record that Master Masker lieth, and hath made his exposition false. And the further ye go in the words of this Gospel, the more shall Master Masker's false dice appear.

THE FIFTEENTH CHAPTER

When the Jews heard our Lord say that, besides the spiritual meat of the bread of his Godhead, the bread that he would give them should be his own flesh, then began they to contend and dispute among them upon that word, as one of the most marvelous and strange words that ever they had heard before. And therefore they said, "How can this man give us his flesh to eat?"<sup>267</sup>

Saint Bede saith here, and so saith Saint Augustine both, that they had conceived a false opinion that our Lord would cut out his own body in gobbets, and make them eat it so, in such manner of dead pieces, as men buy beef or mutton out of the butchers' shops.<sup>268</sup> This thing they thought that he neither could do, and also that though<sup>269</sup> he could, yet would they not eat it as a thing foul and loathsome.

We find, good readers, of one or two more, besides these Jews here, that at the word of God asked how. For both our Lady asked how, and Nicodemus also asked how.<sup>270</sup>

Our blessed Lady, when the angel told her that she should conceive and bring forth a child, asked this question, "How shall that be? For man I know none,"<sup>271</sup> not for that<sup>272</sup> she anything doubted of the truth of God's word sent her by God's messenger, but because she would know the means, forasmuch as she had determined herself upon perpetual virginity, and thereof a promise had passed and a vow was made, and Joseph well agreed therewith, as it may well be gathered upon the Gospel.

For the angel said not, "Thou hast conceived," but, "Thou shalt conceive."<sup>273</sup> And therefore when she answered, "How shall that be, since I know no man?" this answer had not been to the purpose if she had meant no more but that she knew none yet, for he said not that she was conceived yet but should conceive after, which she might after do by the knowledge of her husband after, though she knew no man yet. And therefore we may well gather of his words and hers together, as I have showed in my Dialogue,<sup>274</sup> that when she said, "How shall this be, for I know no man?" she meant therein not only that she knew none already, but also that she had promised and vowed that she never would know man afterward, using therein such a manner of speaking as a maid might say by<sup>275</sup> one whom she would never have, "We may well talk together, but we wed not together."

Now that her determination was not with herself only, but confirmed also with the consent of her spouse, it may well appear. For without his agreement she could not reckon herself to be sure to keep it.

And that her determination of perpetual virginity was a promise and a vow to God, it may well appear by this: that else<sup>276</sup> when she had word from God by the angel that she should conceive and bear a child, she had had no cause to ask the question how. For if she were at liberty to lie with a man, then had that revelation been a commandment unto her to labor for the conception, while there were upon her part no let<sup>277</sup> or impediment, neither of nature nor conscience.

And very like<sup>278</sup> it is that if she had been in that point at her liberty, then though she had minded perpetual virginity, yet since she had intended it

neither for avoiding of the bodily pain of the birth, nor for any abomination of God's natural ordinance for procreation<sup>279</sup> (for such respects be both unnatural and sinful), but only for God's pleasure and of<sup>280</sup> devotion, it is well likely that, hearing by the messenger of God what manner of child that was that God would she should<sup>281</sup> have, she would have made no question of the matter, but gladly gone about the getting.

10 But here may some man haply<sup>282</sup> say that this reason by which I prove her vow will serve well enough to soil<sup>283</sup> itself, and prove that it appeareth not that she had made any vow at all, but had only some mind and desire of perpetual virginity, but yet still 15 at her liberty, without any promise or bond. For since she had now by revelation from God that his pleasure was she should have a child, a bare purpose of virginity and a vow of virginity were all of one weight. For God was able as well to dispense with 20 her vow as to bid her leave off her un vowed purpose.

Of truth, if our Lady had weighed her vow as light as haply some light vowess would, this mind she might have had. Yea, and some vowesses peradventure<sup>284</sup> there are, which as yet never intend to 25 break their vow but think they would not with the breaking of their vow fall in the displeasure of God, though they wist<sup>285</sup> to win therewith all this whole wretched world, which yet would be peradventure well content that God would send them word and 30 bid them go wed and get children.

And those vowesses, lo, that happen to have any such mind,<sup>286</sup> let them at the first thought make a cross on their breast and bless it away. For though it be no breaking of their vow, yet is it a way well 35 toward it, and driveth (if it be not sin) very near the piteous brink of sin when they would be glad that God would send them their pleasure without any sin.

40 And surely, if upon the delight in such a naughty<sup>287</sup> mind God would suffer<sup>288</sup> the devil to illude<sup>289</sup> such a vowess, and transfigure himself into the likeness of an angel of light, and call himself Gabriel, and tell her that God greeteth her well and sendeth her word that she shall have a child, though he there-
45 with went his way and never told her more whether it should be good or bad, her secret inward affection toward her fleshly lust—lurking in her heart unknown unto herself, covered and hid under the cloak of that mind that she would not for all the world take her own pleasure without God's will—50 would make her understand this message for a dispensation of her vow, and for a commandment to break it, and so go forth and follow it without any further question, and go get a child, and make the devil a prophet.

But this blessed Virgin Mary was so surely set upon the keeping of her vowed virginity that she never neither longed nor looked for any messenger from God that should bid her break it. And therefore was she so discreet and circumspect that she 60 would not only consider who spoke to her to discern whether it were man or spirit, and also whether it were a good spirit or an evil, but she would also weigh well the words (were the spirit never so good) lest her own mistaking by negligence might mar the 65 revelation. And therefore at Gabriel's first appearance, because he was goodly, and his words were fair and pleasantly set and spoken somewhat like a wooer, she was somewhat abashed and troubled in her mind at the manner of his salutation. But after,
70 upon his further words when she advised<sup>290</sup> him and his message well, then perceiving him to be, not a man but an angel, not an evil angel but a good, and specially sent from God, and his matter no worldly wooing but a heavenly message, she was
75 not a little joyful in her heart. And as I said, had she not vowed virginity, but had been at her liberty, she had, as meseemeth, had no cause to doubt what God would have her do, namely having a husband already. Nor never would she have thought that it
80 had been better for her to live still in virginity than to go about that generation whereof God had sent her word. But now forasmuch as she was by her vow bound to virginity, whereof she wist well she might not dispense with herself, and the angel bade
85 not her go about to conceive, but only told her, as by way of prophecy, that she should conceive, and well she wist God, from whom the message came, could make her conceive without man if he would, therefore she neither would tempt God in desiring
90 him to do that miracle, nor by mistaking of his message for haste and oversight offend his master by the breaking of her vow, but discreetly did ask the messenger how and in what wise<sup>291</sup> she should conceive,

279 See Gn 1:28. 280 out of 281 would 283 refute 284 perhaps 285 though they 287 bad, wicked 288 allow 289 trick, she should: wanted her to 282 perhaps 286 intention 290 considered 291 way whereupon he showed her that she should be conceived<sup>292</sup> by the Holy Ghost.

Here you see, good readers, that the cause of her question in her asking how rose of no diffidence,<sup>293</sup> but of very sure faith, because she surely believed that he could make her conceive and her virginity saved. For else had she not had firmly that faith, she had had no cause to ask the question, but might have reckoned clearly that he would have her conceived by her husband.

And therefore was her question far from the question of Zechariah, the father of Saint John, which asked not the angel how, but what token he should have that he said true,<sup>294</sup> for else it seemed that, for all his word, because of their both ages, he was minded no more to meddle with his wife, since he thought possibility of generation passed. And for that diffidence was he punished by loss of his speech till the birth of the child.

And her question was also very far from this question of the Jews here, and from their asking how, while the cause of her question was faith, and the cause of their question diffidence.

Nicodemus also when our Lord began to tell him of the sacrament of baptism and said unto him, “Verily, verily, I tell thee, but if<sup>295</sup> a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God,” answered our Savior and said, “How may a man be born again when he is old? May he enter again into his mother’s belly and be born again?”<sup>296</sup>

Lo, here the man was deceived in that he thought upon a bodily birth, whereas our Savior meant of a spiritual birth by faith and by the sacrament of baptism. And therefore our Lord told him forthwith<sup>297</sup> that he meant not that a man should be bodily born again of his mother, but meant of a spiritual regeneration in soul by the water and the Holy Ghost.

Howbeit,<sup>298</sup> he told him not for all that all the form and manner of that sacrament, but what the substance should be, and by whose power, and whereof it should take effect.

Now these Jews here, to whom Christ preached of the giving of his body to them for meat, were not fully in the case of Nicodemus, but in some point they were nearer the truth than he was at the beginning. For they took our Savior’s words right in that they understood that he spoke of his own very flesh, and that he would give it them to eat, whereas Nicodemus understood no part of the generation and birth that Christ spoke of. But they mistook the manner how he would give it them, and ran forth in the device<sup>299</sup> and imagination of their own fantasy. But in diffidence and distrust they were like Nicodemus, which said, “How may a man be born again when he is old?” and peradventure the further off from endeavor toward believing. For in Nicodemus, though I find no consent of faith in conclusion, yet the Gospel speaketh not of any final contradiction<sup>300</sup> in him, nor of any desperate<sup>301</sup> departing, as these Jews and these disciples did. And Nicodemus spoke in his cause after, but these disciples never walked after with him.<sup>302</sup>

Now Christ there unto Nicodemus, because he was clean<sup>303</sup> from the matter, told him that it should be no bodily birth but a spiritual, and bade him marvel not thereof no more than of the spiring<sup>304</sup> or moving of the Spirit or of the wind (for that word diverse doctors take diversely), whose voice though he heard, he neither wist from whence it came nor whither he would go. But now when that Nicodemus, perceiving what the thing was, did yet wonder on still and said, “How may these things be?” then our Lord did no more but leave him with the same tale still, and bid him believe, and tell him why he so should, since himself that so told him came from heaven, and therefore could tell it, and gave him a signification of his death, whereby that sacrament should take the strength.<sup>305</sup> But as for his question, “How this might be?” otherwise than that it was by the power of God, that question Christ left unsoiled.<sup>306</sup>

Now did he likewise with these Jews here. Since it was so that they perceived already that he spoke of his very flesh, and yet for all that would not believe he could give it them, but thought the thing so strange and wonderful that they thought he could not do it, and therefore asked how he could do it, he did no more but still tell them that he would do it, and that he verily would give them his flesh to eat and his very blood to drink, and told them the profit that they should have if they believed him and did it, and what loss they should have if for lack of belief they would leave it undone, and that he was come from heaven, and therefore they ought neither to mistrust his word nor his power to perform his word. And as for otherwise how and in what manner he could or would do it, he left their question and their how unsoiled.

5 But now, lest Master Masker might make men ween<sup>307</sup> that I make all this matter of<sup>308</sup> mine own head, ye shall hear, good readers, upon this question of the Jews what Saint Cyril saith:

10 The Jews (saith he) with great wickedness cry out and say against God, “How may he give us his flesh?” And they forget that there is nothing impossible to God. For while they were fleshly, they could not, as Saint Paul saith, understand spiri-
15 tual things,<sup>309</sup> but this great Sacrament and mystery seemed unto them but folly. But let us, I beseech you, take profit of their sins, and let us give firm faith unto the sacraments, and let us never in such high things either speak or think that same how. For it is a Jew’s word that same, and 20 a cause of extreme punishment. And Nicodemus therefore, when he said, “How may these things be?” was answered as he well was worthy: “Art thou the master in Israel and knowest not these things?”<sup>310</sup> Let us therefore, as I said, be taught
25 by other folks’ faults, in God’s work not to ask how, but leave unto himself the science and the way of his own work. For likewise as though no man knoweth what thing God is in his own nature and substance, yet a man is justified by faith
30 when he believeth that they that seek him shall be royally rewarded by him, so though a man know not the reason of God’s works, yet when through faith he doubteth not but that God is able to do all things, he shall have for this good mind great 35 reward. And that we should be of this mind, our Lord himself exhorteth us by the prophet Isaiah, where he saith thus unto men:

40 My devices<sup>311</sup> be not as your devices be nor my ways such as your ways be, saith our Lord, but as the heaven is exalted from the earth, so be my ways exalted above yours and my devices above your devices.<sup>312</sup>

Christ therefore, which excelleth in wisdom and power by his Godhead, how can it be but that he

45 shall work so wonderfully that the reason and cause of his works shall so far pass and excel the capacity of man’s wit that our mind shall never be possible to perceive it? Dost thou not see of-
50 tentimes what things men of handicraft do? They tell us sometimes that they can do some things wherein their words seem of themselves incredible. But yet because we have seen them some-
55 times done such other things like,<sup>313</sup> we thereby believe them that they can do those things too. How can it be therefore but that they be worthy
60 extreme torment that so contemn almighty God, the worker of all things, that they dare be so bold as in his works to speak of how, while he is he, whom they know to be the giver of all wisdom, and which (as the Scripture teacheth us) is able 65 to do all things? But now, thou Jew, if thou wilt yet cry out and ask how, then will I be content to play the fool as thou dost, and ask how too. Then will I gladly ask thee how thou camest out of
80 overthrown with the bare noise and clamor of the trumpets?<sup>322</sup> Innumerable things there are in which if thou ask how, thou must needs subvert and set at nought<sup>323</sup> all the whole Scripture, the doctrine of the prophets, and Moses’s own writing too, whereupon you Jews, ye should have be-
85 lieved Christ, and if there seemed you then any hard thing in his words, humbly then have asked him. Thus should ye rather have done, than like drunken folk to cry out, “How can he give us his flesh?” Do ye not perceive that when ye say such things, there appeareth anon<sup>324</sup> a great arrogance in your words?<sup>325</sup>

Here you see, good readers, that Saint Cyril in these words plainly showed that Christ here in these words, “The bread that I shall give you is my flesh which I shall give for the life of the world,” meant of the giving of his flesh in the Sacrament, and that the Jews wondered that he said he would give them his flesh, and asked how he could do it, because they thought it impossible. And in reproof of their incredulity and that foolish mind of theirs, by which they could not believe that God could give them his own flesh to eat, Saint Cyril both showeth that many handicrafted men do things, such as those that never saw the like would ween impossible, and also that in any work of God, it is a madness to put any doubt and ask how he can do it, since he is almighty and able to do all things. And to the intent that no Christian man should doubt of the change and conversion of the bread into Christ’s blessed body in the Sacrament, Saint Cyril here, by way of objection against the Jews, putteth us in remembrance – for us he teacheth, though he spoke to them – among other miracles, he putteth us, I say, in remembrance of diverse conversions and changes out of one nature into another that God wrought in the Old Law, as how the hand was turned from whole to sore, and from sore to whole again suddenly, how the waters were suddenly turned from bitter into sweet, and how the waters were turned from water to blood, and how the dead rod of Moses was turned into a quick<sup>326</sup> serpent.

THE SIXTEENTH CHAPTER

But yet shall ye see that upon the words of Christ following, Saint Cyril always more and more declareth that Christ spoke there of his very body that he would give men to eat in the Blessed Sacrament. For it followeth in the text of the Gospel:

“Then said Jesus unto the Jews, ‘Verily, verily, I say unto you, but if<sup>327</sup> ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, ye shall not have life in you. He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath everlasting life.’”

Upon those words thus saith Saint Cyril:

Christ is very merciful and mild, as the thing itself showeth. For he answereth not here sharply to their hot words, nor falleth at no contention with them, but goeth about to imprint in their minds the lively<sup>328</sup> knowledge of this Sacrament or mystery. And as for how (that is to wit,<sup>329</sup> in what manner) he shall give them his flesh to eat, he teacheth them not. For they could not understand it. But how great good they should get by the eating if they eat it with faith, that thing again and again he declareth them to drive them to faith by the desire of eternal life, and faith first once had, they should be then the more easy to be taught. For the prophet Isaiah saith, “But if<sup>330</sup> ye believe, ye shall not understand.”<sup>331</sup> Therefore it was of necessity requisite that they should first fasten the roots of faith in their mind, and then ask such things as were meetly<sup>332</sup> for a man to ask. But they, before they would believe, would out of season ask their importune questions first. And for this cause our Savior declared not unto them how it might be done, but exhorteth them to seek the thing by faith. So on the other side, to his disciples that believed he gave the pieces of the bread, saying, “Take you and eat; this is my body.” And in like wise he gave them the cup about, saying, “Drink you of this all; this is the cup of my blood, which shall be shed for many, for remission of sins.”<sup>333</sup> Here thou seest that to them that asked without faith he opened not the manner of this mystery or Sacrament. But to them that believed, he expounded it though they asked not. Therefore let them hear this, those folk, I say, that of arrogance and pride will not believe the faith of Christ.<sup>334</sup>

Here ye see, good readers, that Saint Cyril plainly declareth you that our Savior would not teach them at that time the manner of the eating, because of their infidelity for all their asking, but afterward he told and taught it his faithful disciples at his Last Supper and Maundy when he took them the bread and bade them eat it, and told them that the same was his body, and the cup and bade them drink thereof, and showed them that that was his blood. And thus you see well by Saint Cyril that Master Masker here, which by his exposition would make us ween that our Savior in all his words here to the Jews meant only to tell them of the giving of his flesh to the death, and that he meant nothing of the giving of his flesh to eat in the Blessed Sacrament, doth in all his exposition but play with false dice to deceive you.

Now as for that<sup>335</sup> Saint Cyril here calleth it by the name of bread, that is, I trow,<sup>336</sup> the thing that can 5 nothing trouble you. For I have showed you before, by the words of that great holy doctor Theophylactus that it is called bread because it was bread, and because of the form of bread that remaineth, and yet is no bread indeed, but is the very Blessed Body
 10 of Christ, his very flesh and his blood. As you see also by Saint Cyril here, which of this Blessed Sacrament so often rehearseth<sup>337</sup> and inculcatheth the miracle, exhorting all folk that no man be moved to mistrust it, though the thing be marvelous, nor ask
 15 as the Jews did how such a wonderful work can be wrought, but meekly believe it, since he is God that saith it, and therefore as he saith it, so doubt not but he can do it, as he doth other like things and did
 20 ere<sup>338</sup> he were born into this world, of which things Saint Cyril hath here rehearsed some, as<sup>339</sup> the turning of the water into blood,<sup>340</sup> as he turneth in the Sacrament the wine into blood, and the turning of Aaron's rod into a serpent, and that into such a serpent as devoured up all the serpents of the Egyptian
 25 witches,<sup>341</sup> like as our Savior in the Blessed Sacrament turneth the bread into his own body, that holy wholesome serpent that devoureth all the poisoned serpents of hell, and was therefore figured by the brazen serpent that Moses did set up in the manner
 30 of a cross in the desert, the beholding whereof devoured and destroyed the venom of all the poison serpents that had stung any man there.<sup>342</sup>

THE SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER

35 And albeit that<sup>343</sup> I show you, good Christian readers, Saint Cyril's words and his exposition upon the place, because Master Masker shall not make men ween<sup>344</sup> that I make all the matter of mine own head, yet seemeth me that our Savior declareth this matter with plain words himself. For 40 what can be plainer words than are his own, when that upon their wondering and their murmuring question, "How can he give us his flesh to eat?" he said unto them, "Verily, verily, I say to you, but if you eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye shall not have life in you. He that eateth 45 my flesh and drinketh my blood hath life everlasting, and I shall raise him up again in the last day. For my flesh is verily meat, and my blood is verily drink. He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood dwelleth in me and I in him."

In these words ye see, good readers, how plainly that our Lord showeth them both the profit of the receiving and the peril of the refusing, and also both that he not only speaketh of his very body and blood, which thing Master Masker agreeth, but 55 over<sup>345</sup> that, also that he more plainly and more precisely saith, that they should verily eat it and drink it, which thing Master Masker denieth, and yet is that the thing that our Savior in these words most specially laboreth to make them believe. For that he 60 spoke of his very flesh they perceived well enough. But that he would have them verily eat it — that they thought such a manner<sup>346</sup> thing that they neither would do nor could believe, because they mistook the manner thereof, weening that they should eat it
 65 in dead pieces, cut out as the butchers cut the beasts in the shambles.<sup>347</sup>

And Christ therefore would at this time for their arrogant infidelity, as Saint Cyril hath told you, nothing declare them of the manner of his giving 70 it to be verily eaten, not in the proper form of flesh, as they fleshly imagined, but in the form of bread in the Blessed Sacrament because, as Theophylactus declared you, men should not abhor to eat it. But leaving that untaught till the time of his Maundy
 75 supper (whereas Saint Cyril hath also showed you he taught it his faithful disciples at the institution of that Blessed Sacrament), he laboreth, as I say, in these words here most special,<sup>348</sup> with as plain words 80 as can be devised, to tell them and make them believe that they shall verily eat his flesh, which thing, for anything that he could say to them, they were so hard-hearted that they would not believe him.

And yet is Master Masker here much more obdurate now, and much more faithless too, than all they 85 were then. For he, both having heard what Christ said to those infidels then, and also what he taught his faithful disciples at his Maundy after, and what all holy doctors and saints have said thereon and believed ever since, yet will he, with a few fond<sup>349</sup>
 90 heretics, take a foolish froward<sup>350</sup> way and believe

335 as for that: the fact that 336 trust

the contrary, or at the leastwise, say that he believeth the contrary. But, in good faith, that they verily believe as they say—that can I not believe, except<sup>351</sup> that of the Scripture and the Christian faith these folk believe nothing at all. And so, upon my faith, I fear me that you shall see it proved at last, as appeareth by some of them that so begin already, and have in some places put forth such poison in writing.

10 But surely though<sup>352</sup> neither any man had ever written upon these words of Christ, nor our Savior himself never spoken word thereof after, that ever had in writing comen into men's hands, yet are these words here spoken so plain and so full that they must needs make any man that were willing to believe him clearly perceive and know that in one manner or other he would give us his own very flesh verily to be received and eaten. For when the Jews said, "How can he give us his flesh to eat?" he answered them with no sophisms, but with a very plain open tale told them they should neither distrust that he could on his part give them his flesh to eat, nor yet refuse upon their part to eat it, if ever they would be saved—as though he would say, "Marvel you and mistrust you my word? And ask how I can give you mine own flesh to eat? I will not tell you how I can give it, nor in what form or fashion ye shall eat it, but this I will tell you, neither in tropes, allegories, nor parables, but even for a very plain truth, that eat ye shall my very flesh indeed if ever ye purpose to be saved, yea, and drink my very blood too. For but if<sup>353</sup> you be content to eat and with a true faith to eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye shall not have life in you. But whoso with a true well-working faith eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, he hath everlasting life," not only because he is as sure to have it when the time shall come as though he had it already, by reason of the promise that Christ here maketh, where he saith, "And I shall resuscitate and raise him up at the last day," but also for that<sup>354</sup> the very Body of Christ that he receiveth is very life everlasting of itself, and such a life as to them that well will receive it in true faith, and purpose of good living, it is the thing that is able to give life and quickness<sup>355</sup> everlasting. For as the Godhead is of his own nature everlasting life, so is the flesh joined in unity of person to the Godhead, by that immediate conjunction and unity, made both everlasting and lively in itself, and also everlasting life to the giving of life everlastingly to all others that well and worthily receive him, and will persevere and abide with him. For though every man here naturally die for the while, yet shall Christ, as he promiseth here, raise and resuscitate him again to everlasting life in the last day.

THE EIGHTEENTH CHAPTER

And to show more and more that he meaneth plainly of very eating and very drinking, he saith, "My flesh is verily meat and my blood is verily drink." Upon these words saith Saint Cyril thus:

Christ here declareth the difference again between the mystical benediction—that is to wit, the Blessed Sacrament and manna—and between the water flowing out of the stone and the Communion of the holy blood. And this he repeateth again, to the intent they should no more marvel of the miracle of manna, but that they should rather receive him which is the heavenly bread and the giver of eternal life. "Your fathers," said our Savior, "did eat manna in the desert, and they be dead. But this bread is descended from heaven that a man should eat thereof and not die." For the meat of manna brought not eternal life, but a short remedy against hunger. And therefore manna was not the very meat—that is to wit, manna was not the bread from heaven, but the holy body of Christ that is the meat that nourisheth to immortality and eternal life. "Yea," saith some man, "but they drank water out of the stone." But what won they by that, for dead they be, and therefore that was not the very drink, but the very drink is the blood of Christ, by which death is utterly turned up and destroyed. For it is not the blood of him that is only man, but the blood of that man, which being joined to the natural life (that is to wit, the Godhead), is made also life himself. Therefore we be the body and the members of Christ. For by this Blessed Sacrament we receive the very Son of God himself.<sup>356</sup>

Here you see, good readers, that Saint Cyril plainly declareth here that these words of Christ, “My flesh is verily meat, etc.” are spoken and meant of his holy flesh in the Blessed Sacrament, of which 5 Master Masker, in all his exposition and in all his whole wise work, telleth us plainly the contrary. But Saint Cyril is here open and plain, both for that point and for the whole matter. For who can more plainly declare anything than that holy doctor declareth in these words that in the Blessed Sacrament
 10 is verily eaten and drunken the very blessed body and holy blood of Christ? And yet doth not Saint Cyril say it more openly than doth our Savior in his own words himself.

15 And now further to show that it must needs be so, that he which eateth his flesh and drinketh his blood must needs be resuscitated and raised again in body to everlasting life, our Savior addeth thereunto and saith, “He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood dwelleth in me and I in him.” Upon
 20 which words also, thus saith holy Saint Cyril: “Like as if a man unto molten wax put other wax, it cannot be but that he shall throughout mingle the one with the other, so if a man receive the flesh and the 25 blood of our Lord worthily and as he should, it cannot be but that he shall be so joined with Christ, as Christ shall be with him and he with Christ.”<sup>357</sup>

Thus may you, good readers, see how verily a man eateth in the Sacrament the Blessed Body of Christ, 30 and by that eating how each of them is in other. And then if he so persevere, how can it be that that body shall have everlasting death in which there is dwelling everlasting life? For as ye have heard, the body of Christ is by the conjunction with his Godhead made everlasting life.

But this is meant, as I say (and all the holy doctors do declare the same), of them that receive the Sacrament, not only sacramentally, but also effectually: that is to wit, of them that not only receive 40 the body of our Savior by the Sacrament into their bodies, but also by true faith and true repentance and purpose of good living receive his Holy Spirit therewith into their souls, and be made thereby very lively<sup>358</sup> members of that thing that the Blessed Sacrament signifieth and betokeneth — that is to wit, of 45 the mystical body of Christ, the Church, and congregation of saints.

For as you have heard by Theophylactus before, this Blessed Sacrament is not only the very flesh of Christ, but is also a figure. And that is it in diverse 50 wise,<sup>359</sup> as I shall further declare you in my book against Frith’s answer to my epistle, with which book (were his once come in print, which is already sent over to be printed) I shall, God willing, well make all his English brethren see and perceive his 55 folly, that list<sup>360</sup> not willingly to continue fools and wink.

But as I was about to say, they that receive our Lord by the Sacrament only, and not by faith and purpose of amendment, though they receive him, 60 yet they receive him not, and though they eat him, they eat him not. For though his Blessed Body be received into their bodies, yet his Holy Spirit is not received into their souls, and therefore he dwelleth not in them nor they in him, but they eat and drink
 65 their judgment, and receive him to their damnation, for that<sup>361</sup> they receive him without faith and due reverence, and therefore do not, as saith Saint Paul, discern the body of our Lord.<sup>362</sup>

And therefore saith Saint Augustine, as Prosper rehearseth<sup>363</sup> in Liber sententiarum Prosperi, “He receiveth the meat of life, he drinketh the draught of eternity that dwelleth in Christ and in whom Christ dwelleth. For he that discordeth from Christ 70 neither eateth the flesh of Christ nor drinketh his blood, though he receive every day indifferently the Sacrament of that great thing to the judgment and damnation of his presumption.”<sup>364</sup>

This text of Saint Augustine alleged<sup>365</sup> Frith for his purpose in a certain communication, willing to 80 prove thereby that the very body of Christ was not always verily received and eaten in the Sacrament, as the Church saith. For here, said Frith, Saint Augustine saith plain that evil men, though they receive the Sacrament, eat not the body of Christ.
 85

But here Frith either had not learned or else had forgotten that Saint Augustine meant of the effectual receiving, by which a man not only receiveth Christ’s Blessed Body into his own sacramentally, 90 but also virtually<sup>366</sup> and effectually so receiveth therewith the Spirit of God into his soul that he is incorporated thereby with our Savior, in such wise that he is made a lively member of his mystical body, that is, the congregation of saints, by receiving it

For that Saint Augustine meant not to deny that the Blessed Body of Christ is verily received and eaten in the Blessed Sacrament, both of evil folk and good, it appeareth plain by that that,<sup>367</sup> in more places than one, he speaketh of the traitor Judas. For albeit that in some places he putteth it in doubt and question whether Judas received the Sacrament among the apostles at Christ's Maundy, or else that the morsel that he received were not it, yet in diverse places he affirmeth that he did.<sup>368</sup> And in those places, he affirmeth plainly that in the Sacrament he received Christ's Blessed Body, as evil and as false as the traitor was, as in his fifth book De baptismo he clearly declareth in these words:

Like as Judas to whom our Lord gave the morsel, not by receiving any evil thing but by evil receiving of a good thing, gave the devil a place to enter into himself, so every man that unworthily receiveth the Sacrament of Christ maketh not the Sacrament evil because he is evil, nor maketh not thereby that he receiveth nothing because he receiveth it not to his salvation. For it was nevertheless the body of our Lord and the blood of our Lord, even unto them of whom the Apostle said, "He that eateth it and drinketh it unworthily, he eateth and drinketh damnation to himself."<sup>369</sup>

Here Saint Augustine, good readers, expressly declareth that not only good folk, but evil folk also, receive and eat in the Sacrament the very body and blood of Christ, though the one to salvation, the other to damnation. And therefore you see that Saint Augustine here plainly reproveth Frith.

And that ye may plainly see also that Saint Augustine, in calling the Blessed Sacrament the body of Christ, meaneth not to call it only a figure or a memorial (besides his other plain words in many sundry places), he writeth in an epistle unto Eleusius, Glorius, and Felix, declaring the great excellent goodness that Christ showed to the false traitor Judas, he writeth, I say, that Christ gave unto Judas at his Last Supper the price of our redemption. And what was the price of our redemption, but his own very blessed body?<sup>370</sup>

Howbeit, Frith was on every side deceived in the perceiving of Saint Augustine's mind, which mis-happened him, as I suppose, for lack of reading any further in Saint Augustine's works than those places that he found falsely drawn out into Friar Hussgen's book.<sup>371</sup>

For Saint Augustine in very many places plainly declareth that every man, good and bad both, receiveth and eateth in the Sacrament the very body and blood of Christ. And also those words in which he saith that evil folk eat it not, he meaneth that they eat it not so as they receive the effect thereof—that is to wit, to be by the receiving and eating thereof incorporate spiritually with him, as a lively member of his mystical body, the society of saints, so that he may dwell in Christ and Christ in him—but lacketh that spiritual effect of his eating because he is evil and eateth not Christ's flesh in such manner as he should do: that is to wit, worthily in true faith and purpose of clean and innocent life, as Saint Augustine, in his book De blasphemia Spiritus Sancti, declareth well in these words:

This also that Christ saith, "He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me and I in him"—how shall we understand it? May we understand those folk therein too, of whom the Apostle saith that they eat and drink their judgment when they eat the same flesh and drink the same blood?<sup>372</sup> Did Judas the traitor and wicked seller of his master? Though he first with the other apostles, as Saint Luke the Evangelist very clearly declareth, did eat and drink the same Sacrament of his Flesh and his Blood made with his own hands,<sup>373</sup> did he abide yet in Christ and Christ in him? Finally, many men which with a feigned heart eat that flesh and drink that blood, or else when they have eaten and drunken it, become apostates after, do they dwell in Christ and Christ in them? But there is undoubtedly a certain manner of eating that flesh and drinking that blood, in which manner he that eateth it and drinketh it dwelleth in Christ and Christ in him. And therefore not whosoever eat the flesh of Christ and drink his blood dwelleth in Christ and Christ in him, but he that eateth it and drinketh it after a certain manner, which manner Christ saw when he spoke the words.<sup>374</sup>

5 Here you see, good readers, that Saint Augustine showeth that Judas in the Sacrament received and did eat the body of Christ, and declareth also the very whole thing that he meaneth concerning the understanding of this word of Christ, “He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood dwelleth in me and I in him”—that is to wit, they that eat it in a certain manner, by which he meaneth they that eat it well and in the state of grace, as he plainly declar-
10 eth both in his exposition upon Saint John’s Gospel, and many sundry places besides.<sup>375</sup>

15 And those that receive him otherwise, with a feigned heart and in purpose of deadly sin, they follow Judas and shortly show themselves. For such as they were wont<sup>376</sup> to be, such will they be still, or yet rather much worse if they were before very 20 naught.<sup>377</sup> And therefore saith Saint Augustine that a man to eat the flesh of Christ is to dwell in Christ, and to have Christ dwelling in him. For he that dwelleth not in Christ well declareth that though 25 he have received and eaten his flesh into his body by the Sacrament, yet hath he not received and eaten his Spirit, as I said, into his soul, and therefore hath not received and eaten his flesh effectually, but without the effect of the Spirit and life, which is the 30 thing whereby the flesh giveth the life, and without which, as our Savior saith, his flesh availeth us nothing. And so for lack of the spiritual eating, the fleshly eater of his flesh, though he receive the Sacrament, receiveth not the effect of the Sacrament, 35 the thing that the Sacrament signifieth, that is the participation of the mystical body of Christ: that is to wit, the Church and congregation of all saints, which Church and congregation is gathered together as many members into one body Christ, as 40 the bread which our Lord in the Sacrament changeth into his blessed body is one loaf made of many grains of wheat, and the wine which he changeth into his blood is one cup of wine made of many grapes, as the Apostle declareth.

45 And verily to be a quick<sup>378</sup> lively member of that body doth no man attain that receiveth the Sacrament without faith and purpose of good life, but waxeth<sup>379</sup> a more weak member and a more lame, more astonied,<sup>380</sup> and more loosely hanging thereon than he did before, and by such often receiving so 50 rotteth more and more that finally it falleth quite off, and is cast out into the dunghill of hell, and shall never be resuscitated and raised again to be made a member of that body in glory.

55 But as Saint Augustine saith, if a man after the receiving of the Sacrament do dwell still in God—that is to wit, abide and persevere in true faith and good works—then is it a good sign and token that he hath effectually eaten the flesh of Christ in the Blessed Sacrament. And thereupon must it needs, 60 good Christian reader, follow that he that receiveth the Blessed Sacrament well, and eateth therein the flesh of Christ not only verily, which every man doth good and bad, but also—which only the good folk do—effectually, and so dwelleth in Christ and 65 Christ in him perseverantly, that man or woman without doubt, it must needs be that they can never everlastingly die, but Christ dwelling in them shall conserve their souls and resuscitate again their bodies that so dwell in him, into everlasting life.

THE NINETEENTH CHAPTER

For the surety and infallible proof whereof, our Savior said forthwith<sup>381</sup> upon his words afore-remembered<sup>382</sup> further unto the Jews, “As the living Father sent me, so also do I live for my Father. And 75 he that eateth me shall live also for me.”

The Father of heaven, being the original substance of life, before all beginning begot his coeternal Son, and gave unto him his own whole substance, and therefore his own whole life, as to him 80 whom he begot one equal God with himself, in nothing different but in only person.

The Father, I say, gave all his own whole life to his Son, and yet none thereof from himself. And therefore saith our Savior Christ that himself liveth 85 for or by his Father. And so that man, saith he, that eateth me shall live through me. For since that by the very eating of his very Blessed Body the eater (but if<sup>383</sup> himself be the let<sup>384</sup>) is joined with the flesh of Christ, as holy Saint Cyril hath declared,<sup>385</sup> and thereby with that Holy Spirit of his also, which from that holy flesh is unseparable, and so joined unto the very substance of life, that is life and giveth life too, he cannot but live through Christ.

5 Upon this our Savior finally for conclusion telleth them that this bread also is come from heaven, saying, "This is the bread that is descended from heaven," not meaning that his flesh was first in heaven, and so sent down from thence, as some heretics have ere<sup>386</sup> this held an opinion, but that his body was in the Blessed Virgin his mother by the heavenly obumbration<sup>387</sup> of the Holy Ghost. And also since his Godhead and his manhood were joined and knit together in very unity of person, our Savior used that manner of speaking by the one that he used by the other. And therefore, as he said unto Nicodemus, "The Son of Man descended from heaven," so saith he here of his flesh, "This is the bread that is descended from heaven."

20 And because that the Jews had in the beginning of this communication boasted unto him the bread of manna, bringing forth for the praise thereof the words of the Prophet, "Thou hast given them bread from heaven,"<sup>388</sup> our Lord here showed them that this bread that he would give them to eat—that is to wit, his own very flesh, as himself very plainly declared them, is of another manner descended down from heaven than the manna whose descending from heaven they in the beginning boasted so. And therefore he said, "This is the bread that is descended from heaven, not as your fathers did eat manna and are dead. He that eateth this bread shall live forever," as though he would say, "This is another manner of bread, otherwise come from heaven, than manna was that ye boast of so. For that bread was given you but for the sustenance of the life in this world, but this bread that is mine own body, conceived by the Holy Ghost, and in unity of person joined with my Godhead as verily as it is joined with mine own soul, is another manner of heavenly bread, and shall be given you to eat for another manner of purpose. For manna that was given your fathers to eat for the only sustenance of their temporal life was but a figure of this bread thus given you to eat, as I shall begin to give it at my Maundy supper, the manner whereof I will not tell you now. And therefore, as the figure or the shadow of a thing is far from the property of the thing itself, so was the bread of manna far from the property of this bread that is my flesh. For likewise<sup>389</sup> as because it was a figure of this bread that is very life, it served for the sustenance of life, so because it was but a figure and not the very life itself, it served therefore not to give life, but to sustain life, not forever but for a while. But this bread that is my flesh, which I shall give you as verily to eat as ever your fathers did eat manna, because it is not the figure only of the thing that is life, but is also, by conjunction with the Godhead, the very life itself that was figured, I shall give it you to eat in such a manner that it shall not only maintain, feed, and sustain the body of the eater in this present life, but it shall also give life, yea, and that everlasting life in glory, not only to the soul, but also to the body too, in time meet and convenient,<sup>390</sup> raising it up again from death, and setting it with the soul in eternal life of everlasting bliss."

THE TWENTIETH CHAPTER

This communication with the Jews had our Lord, teaching in the synagogue at Capernaum. "And many therefore of his disciples, hearing these things said, 'This word is hard, and who can hear him?'" The more and more that our Savior plainly told them that he would give them his very flesh to eat, the more and more marvelous hard they thought his saying, and reckoned that it was impossible for any man to believe it. And therefore for lack of belief they lost the profit. And these that thus thought this matter so marvelous hard and strange that they would not believe, but for lack of belief lost the profit, were not only such Jews as were his enemies, but many of those also that were his own disciples.

But our Savior, knowing in himself (as he that was God and needed no man to tell him) that his disciples murmured at his words, because he told them so often and so plainly that men should have no life but if<sup>391</sup> they would be content verily to eat his own flesh, he said unto them, "Doth this offend you? Do you stumble at this? What then if you shall see the Son of Man ascend up whereas<sup>392</sup> he was before? The Spirit is that that quickeneth;<sup>393</sup> the flesh availeth nothing. The words that I have spoken to you be spirit and life.”

In these words our Lord shortly toucheth all their objections growing upon their infidelity, and also confuteth<sup>394</sup> their infidelity, and in his words after following, putteth them yet again in mind of the medicine that might remove their unfaithfulness and give them the very fast<sup>395</sup> faith.

The Jews had before murmured against that that<sup>396</sup> he had said — that he was descended from heaven — against which they said, “Is not he the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? And how saith he then that he is descended from heaven?”<sup>397</sup> And a great piece of their murmur therein arose, as ye see, upon that point that they had misconceived, weening<sup>398</sup> that Joseph had been his father. For had they believed that his manhood had been conceived by the Holy Ghost, they would have murmured the less. And had they believed that his Godhead had descended into it from heaven, they would not have murmured at all.

In like wise they murmured at the second point, in that he showed them so plainly that he would give them his very flesh to be their very meat, and said, “How can he give us his flesh to eat?” And many of his disciples said also, “This is a hard word, and who may hear him?” And a great part of their murmur was because they thought that they should have eaten his flesh in the self<sup>399</sup> fleshly form, and because (as Saint Augustine saith in sundry treatises)<sup>400</sup> that they thought they should have eaten his flesh in dead gobbets, cut out piecemeal as the meat is cut out in the shambles,<sup>401</sup> and also because they knew him not to be God. For had they known that the manner in which he would give them his very flesh to eat should not be in the selfsame fleshly form, but in the pleasant form of bread, though they would yet have marveled, because they would have thought it wonderful, yet would they have murmured the less, because they would not have thought it loathly. But then had they further known that he had been God, then would they not, I suppose, have murmured at the matter at all. For I ween verily that there were neither of those disciples, nor of those Jews neither, anyone so evil as now be Master Masker, and Frith, and his fellows, that seeing the receiving nothing loathsome, and believing that Christ was God (if they believe it), will not yet believe he can do it, but murmur and grudge<sup>402</sup> against it still.

For though Master Masker say that if Christ said he would do it, then himself would believe he could do it,<sup>403</sup> yet it shall appear ere we part, both that Christ saith it, and he will not believe that Christ, though he say it, meaneth it, and also that the cause why he will not believe that Christ meaneth it is because he believeth that God cannot do it.

But now said our Savior unto them in answering all this gear,<sup>404</sup> “Do you stumble at this? What if ye see the Son of Man ascend up where he was before? What will you then say?” For then could they have no cause to distrust that he descended down, when they should see him ascend up. For that thing seemeth in men’s mad eyes, such as they were that would not take him but for a man, far the greater mastery of the both.

Also when they should see him ascend up to heaven whole, then should they well perceive that they mistook him by a false imagination of their own device,<sup>405</sup> when they construed the giving of his flesh to eat as though he meant to give it them in such wise as himself should lose all that they should eat.

And when he said they should see the Son of Man ascend up there as he was before, he gave them again a signification that himself, the Son of Man, was the Son of God also, and thereby himself God also, and into the world come and descended from heaven.

In these words, our Savior showeth that his ascension should be a sufficient cause to make them know his power and leave their murmuring. And therefore they that leave not murmuring at his Blessed Sacrament yet<sup>406</sup> show a great token that they believe not his wonderful ascension neither. For if they believed well that he had power of himself to ascend up in body and sit in heaven, one equal God with his Father and the Holy Ghost, then would they never ween, as they do, that God lacked power to make his own body to be in diverse places at once, and be both in heaven and earth.

THE TWENTY-FIRST CHAPTER

But now forasmuch as a great part of these folks' diffidence<sup>407</sup> and distrust rose of that — that the respect of the loathsomeness made them the less willing to believe, in that they thought that he meant to give them his flesh to eat in gobbets, cut out dead without life or spirit — our Savior answered them to that point. And though he would not at that time tell them the manner how he would give it them to eat, yet he told them that he would not give it them so. And therefore he said unto them, “The spirit is it that quickeneth or giveth life, the flesh availeth nothing. The words which I have spoken to you be spirit and life.”

As though he would say unto them, “I told you before that whoso would eat my flesh should have everlasting life. And therefore why be you so mad as to ween that I mean my flesh cut out in gobbets dead without life or spirit? It is the spirit that giveth life. And therefore without the spirit, the flesh should avail you nought.<sup>408</sup> But being knit with the spirit of my Godhead, which is the substance and very fountain of life, so it shall (to them that worthily eat it) give everlasting life. And therefore the words that I speak be not only flesh, for that will no more give life alone than will faith alone give life that is dead without the will of good works. But my words therefore that I have spoken to you of my flesh to be eaten be not flesh alone, but spirit also and life. Therefore you must understand them not so fleshly as you do, that I would give you my flesh in gobbets dead, but you must understand them spiritually, that you shall eat it in another manner, animated with my soul, and joined with the spirit of my Godhead, by which my flesh is itself made not only lively but also giving life.”

Thus meant our Lord in those words, wherein lest Master Masker might make men ween that I run all at riot upon mine own invention, holy Saint Augustine showeth that in these words,

“The spirit it is that quickeneth, the flesh availeth nothing,” our Savior meaneth that his flesh dead and without the spirit availeth nothing, as cunning<sup>409</sup> nothing availeth without charity, without which, as Saint Paul saith, it doth but puff up a man in pride.<sup>410</sup> But on the other side, like<sup>411</sup> as cunning much edifieth and profiteth joined with charity, so the flesh of our Savior much availeth joined with his Holy Spirit.<sup>412</sup>

Saint Cyril also upon the same words, declaring them by a long process to the purpose that I have showed you, saith among many other things in this manner, as<sup>413</sup> it were in the person of Christ speaking to those Jews, and to those disciples of his that said his words were so hard that no man could abide to hear him, which they said, as saith Saint Chrysostom, for their own excuse, because themselves were about to walk their way.<sup>414</sup> To them therefore saith our Savior thus in Saint Cyril's exposition:

Ween you when I said that whoso eat my flesh shall have everlasting life, that I meant therein that this earthly body of mine doth give life of its own proper nature? Nay, verily. But I did speak to you of the Spirit and of eternal life. But it is not the nature of the flesh that maketh the Spirit give life, but the power of the Spirit maketh the flesh give life. The words therefore that I have spoken to you be spirit and life: that is to wit,<sup>415</sup> they be spiritual and spoken of the spirit and life: that is to wit, of that spirit that is the natural life that giveth life. But yet the thing that we have already said, it shall do no harm though we repeat it again. The thing that I have said is this. The nature of the flesh cannot of itself give life. For what had then the nature of the Godhead more? But then, on the other side, there is not in Christ only flesh, but he hath the Son of God joined with it which<sup>416</sup> is the equal substance of life with his Father. And therefore, when Christ calleth his flesh a giver of life, that power of giving life he doth not attribute unto his flesh and unto his Holy Spirit both of one fashion. For the Spirit giveth life by itself and of his own nature. But the flesh ascendeth unto that power of giving life by reason of the conjunction and unity that it hath with that Holy Spirit. Howbeit,<sup>417</sup> how and by what means that thing is done, we neither are able with tongue to tell, nor with mind to imagine, but with silence and firm faith we receive it.<sup>418</sup>

Thus have you heard, good readers, that the thing that I say, do not only I say, but Saint Augustine also and Saint Cyril both, which is enough to you to perceive that I devise not mine exposition all of mine own head,<sup>419</sup> and may be enough to any good Christian man also to perceive clearly that our Savior in these words did speak, not only of a spiritual eating of his flesh by belief and remembrance of his death and Passion, as Master Masker and Frith and these fond<sup>420</sup> fellows stiffly bear us in hand,<sup>421</sup> but spoke also and meant it of the remembering of his death and Passion, by the very eating of his very blessed body as it is eaten in the Blessed Sacrament.

THE TWENTY-SECOND CHAPTER

But these heretics are so set upon mischief and willfulness that they will not in any wise<sup>422</sup> understand the truth. And how could they understand the truth, when they will not believe? For as the prophet Isaiah saith, but if<sup>423</sup> you believe you shall not understand.<sup>424</sup> And therefore these heretics cannot understand. For they be in the case now that those disciples and those Jews were, with whom our Savior found that fault then, in his words next ensuing, and said, “But there be some of you that believe not,” as though he would say, “As plainly as I have told it you and as often, yet are there some of you that believe it not.” But he knew from the beginning who should believe, and who also should betray him.

And so knoweth he likewise now too who be good and who be naught,<sup>425</sup> and who shall amend and who shall never amend—not that his foreknowledge forceth them to be naught, but for it is impossible for them to be naught but that his infinite foresight must needs from the beginning foresee it. And yet when he foreseeth that it so shall be, it shall so be in deed, and cannot otherwise be but that it shall so be if he foresee that it shall so be. For he should not foresee that it shall so be, if it so were that in deed it should otherwise be. But likewise as if I see one sit, it must needs be that he sitteth, for else<sup>426</sup> should I not see him sit; and that therefore it well followeth I see him sit, ergo it must needs be that he sitteth. And yet my sight forceth him not to sit, nor of that argument the consequent proposition of his nature necessary but contingent, though of the one proposition inferred upon the other, the consequence or consecution<sup>427</sup> be necessary. So being presupposed that God foreseeth such a thing which he should not foresee but if<sup>428</sup> the thing should be, yet his foresight no more forceth the person that doth it in the thing that is yet to come than my sight forceth him to sit whom I see sit, of whom no man can say but that he must needs sit in the while in which he will presuppose that I see him sit.

And therefore because his prescience and his providence forced them not to continue in their willfulness to their damnation, he putteth them once again in remembrance of the means whereby they may avoid that willful ignorance and infidelity, and thus he saith unto them, “Therefore I have told you already that no man can come to me but if it be given of my Father.”

“Think not,” saith Saint Chrysostom upon these words, “that every man to whom the Father giveth it hath it as by way of a special privilege, so that they that have not given them lack it only, therefore, because God will not give it them. God, saith Saint Chrysostom, will gladly give it them, if they would not by their own dealing make themselves unworthy to receive it.”<sup>429</sup> And therefore saith Saint Cyril upon the same words that “those that among the Jews lived well and were of good conditions had the faith given them and came to Christ. But they that were stubborn, arrogant, malicious, and willful, as were the scribes and the Pharisees and the stiff-necked bishops, they letted<sup>430</sup> themselves from the gift of faith.”<sup>431</sup>

This gift of faith without the help of God cannot be had, nor no man can come to the Son but if<sup>432</sup> the Father draw him. And whom he draweth, and whom he draweth not, and why him, and why not him, let us not seek nor search, as Saint Augustine saith, if we will not err.<sup>433</sup>

But yet that he rejecteth no man that will seek for his soul health, but rather calleth upon to be sought upon, that doth the Scripture well witness, where God said himself, “Lo, I stand at the door knocking; if any man hear my voice and open me the door, I will go in to him and sup with him and he with me.”<sup>434</sup> And the prophet Isaiah saith, “Seek you our Lord while he may be founden. Call you upon him while he is near. Let the wicked man leave his way, and the unrighteous man leave his devices, and let him turn to our Lord, and he will have pity upon him. For he is great in forgiveness.”<sup>435</sup> Our Savior saith himself also, “Ask and you shall have. Seek and you shall find. Knock and you shall be let in.”<sup>436</sup> And finally that no man should take these words of our Savior—that no man can come to him but if it be given him of the Father, and these words of his also, “No man can come to me but if my Father draw him”<sup>437</sup>—that no man, I say, should so take these words in such a presumptuous way of election<sup>438</sup> that weening he were drawn into such a feeling faith that could never fail and so should, as Tyndale teacheth, make himself so sure of his own salvation by his sure and infallible election that he should stand out of all fear and wax<sup>439</sup> slothful, the Scripture crieth, “Let him that thinketh he standeth beware lest he fall.”<sup>440</sup> And, on the other side, that no man should upon these words take that imagination that these heretics also teach of desperate inevitable destiny of damnation, and sit still and do no good himself, weening that his own devoir<sup>441</sup> were in vain, because he feeleth not God anything<sup>442</sup> draw him, holy Saint Augustine, whose words these heretics for election and destiny against the devoir of man’s free will most lay for them,<sup>443</sup> biddeth every man for all their babbling, “If thou be not drawn, pray God to draw thee.”<sup>444</sup>

And therefore, to that intent did our Savior Christ put them again in mind of that<sup>445</sup> he had said before, that they could not come to him but if<sup>446</sup> it were given them by his Father, because he would that they should<sup>447</sup> for their part labor to remove the lets<sup>448</sup> that, on their own part, letted<sup>449</sup> his Father to give them that gift. And that is that they should have less cure<sup>450</sup> and care of their bellies, the desire of whose fleshly filling with perishable meat made them angry to hear of the spiritual food of his own holy flesh, by the well-eating whereof they might have everlasting life.

He taught them also by those words to perceive (if they would) that Joseph was not his father. For when he said that they could not have that great gift but of his Father, nor could not come to him but if his Father drew them, they might well wit<sup>451</sup> he meant not Joseph, but his Father of heaven. And therefore would he by those words give them warning that they should leave their murmuring, and pray his Father give them the grace to believe him.

THE TWENTY-THIRD CHAPTER

But whereas they should have taken this way and walked forward with him, they took the contrary way, not only the other Jews but many also of his own disciples, and went away backward from him, and as the Gospel saith, walked no more with him.

But though that many of his disciples went away from him, because his Father brought them not unto him, yet as himself said before, “All that my Father giveth me shall come to me,”<sup>452</sup> all went not away. His apostles tarried. And yet among those twelve tarried one false shrew.<sup>453</sup> And in the stead<sup>454</sup> of those disciples that went away, which were, as Saint Augustine saith, about three score<sup>455</sup> and ten, he chose soon after other three score and ten, whom he sent to preach about as he had sent his twelve apostles before.<sup>456</sup>

But then seeing there were at that time so few left and so many gone, he said unto his twelve apostles, “Will you be gone too?”<sup>457</sup> He neither bade them go as though he would be glad of their going, nor yet bade them abide as though he had need of their abiding, but only asked them whether they would go or not, signifying that for all their election they were, in the liberty of their own free will, either to go after the others or to abide still with him. Then answered Simon Peter and said, “Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of everlasting life. And we believe and know that thou art Christ, the Son of God”<sup>458</sup>—as though he would say, “If we love life, to whom should we go from thee? For only thou hast the words not of life only but also of life everlasting, for all thy words and thy doctrine draw men thereto. And we believe, and by belief we know, that thou art Christ, the very Son of God. And thereby we know that thou art not only very man, but also very God. And we perceive well therefore that thou art the bread that is descended from 5 heaven, and that thou shalt ascend thither again, and that therefore thou art able and of power to give us that marvelous meat of thine own holy flesh to eat. And that thou so wilt do we believe and wot<sup>459</sup> well, because thou so dost promise. And we

 10 perceive well that thou wilt not give it us in dead gobbets that could not avail us, but alive and with thine Holy Spirit, the fountain of life, whereby thy flesh shall give us, if we will eat it, everlasting life, when thou shalt resuscitate our bodies in the last 15 day. But in what marvelous manner thou wilt give it us to eat — that hast thou not yet declared us, nor we will not be too boldly curious or inquisitive of thy marvelous mystery, but therein abide<sup>460</sup> the time of thine own determination, as to whose high 20 heavenly wisdom the season meet and convenient<sup>461</sup> is open and known, and unknown to mortal men. And we will therefore obediently receive it and eat it, at what time and in what wise<sup>462</sup> that thy gracious pleasure shall be to command us.”

25 When Saint Peter, as head under Christ of that company, had made this answer, not only for himself but also for them all, not saying “I” but “we,” our Lord to let him see that he was somewhat deceived, and had said more than he could make 30 good — for one false shrew was there yet still remaining among the twelve, whereof eleven were not aware — our Savior therefore said, “Have not I chosen you twelve, and of you twelve yet is there one a devil?” This he spoke by<sup>463</sup> Judas Iscariot, the son of 35 Simon, for he it was that should betray him, being one of the twelve.

Our Lord here, good readers, showed himself not deceived. For though Judas’s falsehood was unknown to his fellows, yet was it not unknown to his 40 master, which though he showed himself not ignorant of his servant’s evil mind, and traitorous purpose toward his own person (toward which purpose, as it seemeth, Judas’s heart had at this time conceived some inclination), yet had he patience with 45 him, and continually did use the ways to reform and amend him, never casting him out till he clearly cast out himself, according to the saying of our Savior, “He that cometh to me I will not cast him out.”

THE TWENTY-FOURTH CHAPTER

50 But here do many men marvel not only that our Savior would keep him so long, knowing him so false, but also that he would take him to him for his apostle in the beginning, foreknowing by his Godhead from the beginning that he would after 55 be false. And diverse holy doctors hold also that he was never true nor good, but naught<sup>464</sup> and false from the beginning. And in this matter whereof God hath not so fully revealed unto men the certainty that we be precisely bounden to the belief of 60 either other part, every man is at liberty to believe whether<sup>465</sup> part that himself thinketh most likely by natural reason and Scripture.

And therefore, though some good holy men and saints have thought that Judas was never good, but that our Savior took him to<sup>466</sup> his apostle and so 65 kept him in all his malice still, for the accomplishment of the great mystery of his Passion, well using thereby the evil of man, as man evil useth the goodness of God, yet thinketh me that, as Theophylactus saith, and Saint Cyril, and Saint Chrysostom
 70 too, Judas was once very good when our Lord did chose him for his apostle, and was at that time given unto Christ by his Father.<sup>467</sup> For proof whereof that godly cunning<sup>468</sup> doctor Master Lyra<sup>469</sup> well bringeth
 75 in the words of our Savior himself, saying to his Father a little after his Maundy finished, “Them that thou hast given unto me I have kept, and none of them hath perished but the son of perdition,”<sup>470</sup> which he meant by Judas, being then yet alive in 80 body by nature, but dead in soul by deadly sin. Him our Lord took unto him for his apostle while he was good, and not of the common sort of good men but also very special good, as these holy doctors do divine and guess.

And though Christ foresaw the wretchedness 85 that he would after fall to, yet would he not forbear the right order of justice, but take him in such degree for the time as his present goodness of good congruence<sup>471</sup> deserved. For being at that time more meet for the office of an apostle than another man, if Christ should have rejected him as unworthy and unmeet for the fault that himself knew he would after do, toward which fault he was at that time nothing minded,<sup>472</sup> then should he have reproached him at such time as he was not worthy to be reproached. And then were it somewhat like as if a man, because he maketh himself very sure that his wife and his children will one time or other not fail to displease him afterward at some one time or other, be angry therefore with them all and chide them and beat them before. Our Savior therefore, when Judas was very good, after such rate<sup>473</sup> of goodness as is in mortal men, took him and promoted him to the office and dignity of his own apostle after that order of justice by which he rewardeth one man above another after the rate of their merits, and yet every man of them all far above all his merits.

Now when he was afterward through covetise waxed naught,<sup>474</sup> yet our Lord kept him still, and would not by taking his office from him disclose his secret falsehood, and put him to shame, but used many other means to mend him, and keep therewith the honesty of his name, not letting<sup>475</sup> to procure his amendment on his part, though he well knew the wretch would never amend upon his part.

But likewise as though a man have an incurable sickness, it yet becometh<sup>476</sup> the physician all the time that he liveth therewith to do his part still toward the curing thereof, so became it our Savior to do it as he did, and not to leave off or slake<sup>477</sup> his goodness toward the cure and amendment of the man's incurable malice.

For though Judas was, with all that goodness of Christ used unto him, not only nothing the better, but also very far the worse, and fell far the deeper into death and damnation, yet since there came of his traitorous dealing none harm but unto Christ, whose goodness was for our weal<sup>478</sup> very glad to suffer it, and unto the traitor himself and such others as willfully would deserve it, it had been neither right nor reason<sup>479</sup> that for to save them from hell that needs would walk into it, he should have left any of his goodness and sufferance undone, whereby he procured the salvation of so many thousands as should be saved by his bitter Passion.

And much more reason it was that our Savior should have respect and regard to procure the bliss of those that should be saved than to care for the pain of those that should be damned. For it had been, as it seemeth, not consonant unto right, if our Lord should for avoiding of their pain, that<sup>480</sup> for all his calling back to the contrary would yet willingly run forth into damnation, have kept away the reward of bliss from them that would with his help deserve it.

And therefore our Lord, as I say, took Judas and made him his apostle, being very good, and after had long patience with him while he was very naught, till that through his immedicable<sup>481</sup> malice he fell of<sup>482</sup> himself, and so was cast out and perished. But by his perishing our Savior lost not but won. For of his evil came there much more good, and his own place of apostleship was afterward fulfilled with Saint Matthias.<sup>483</sup>

And in like wise, the other disciples that departed now — which were (as Saint Chrysostom saith and as the Gospel seemeth also to say)<sup>484</sup> all that then were present, save<sup>485</sup> only his twelve apostles, and were, as Saint Augustine saith, in number above three score and ten — all they lost themselves when they willingly lost their Savior. And he found better to succeed in their places. For soon after, in the stead of those three score and ten, he chose other three score and ten disciples, as I before showed you, whom he sent about to preach as he had sent his twelve apostles before.

And unto Judas yet at this present time he gave a secret warning<sup>486</sup> that he might well wit<sup>487</sup> that his naughtiness was known, which thing might make him the less bold to sin; and yet he disclosed him not openly, because he would not shame him, and thereby make him haply<sup>488</sup> shameless, as many such wretches wax, and after that, sin the more boldly.

THE TWENTY-FIFTH CHAPTER 85

This word also so spoken to all twelve was (as Saint Chrysostom saith and Saint Cyril both) a marvelous goodly warning for them all. These are, lo, the words of Saint Cyril:

Our Lord here with sharp words confirmeth his apostles and maketh them the more diligent, by putting before their eyes the peril of their ruin. For this he seemeth to say unto them: “O my disciples, much need have you to use much watch and great study<sup>489</sup> about your salvation. The way of perdition is very slipper, and not only withdraweth a feeble mind from thinking of their fall by making them to forget themselves, but also sometimes deceiveth them by vain delectation and pleasure that are of mind very firm and strong. And that this tale is true that I now tell you, you may see well proved, not by the example only of them that are gone aback, but among yourselves also that tarry and dwell still with me. For I have, you wot<sup>490</sup> well, chosen you twelve as good, well knowing that indeed you were so. For I was not ignorant, but being God (as I am) very well knew your hearts. Howbeit,<sup>491</sup> the devil hath deceived one of you with avarice, and so pulled him away. For a man is a free creature, and may choose his way as he will, either on the right hand or else on the left if he will.”

Our Lord therefore maketh them all the more vigilant, because that<sup>492</sup> who should betray him he doth not express by name. But telling them all in a generality<sup>493</sup> that one of them should work such wickedness, he made them all stand in fear. And by that horror and dread, lifted them up to more vigilant diligence.<sup>494</sup>

Here have you heard, good readers, the words of Saint Cyril. Now shall ye somewhat hear what saith Saint Chrysostom:

When Saint Peter said, “We believe,” our Savior, not causeless, out of the number of them excepted Judas and said, “Have not I chosen you twelve and one of you is a devil.” This thing he said to remove the traitor far from his malice. And where he saw that nothing did avail him, yet he went about still to do well for him, and see the wisdom of Christ, for neither would he bewray<sup>495</sup> him, nor let him lurk untouched—the one, lest he should have waxed<sup>496</sup> shameless and swear nay;

the other, lest weening<sup>497</sup> that none were aware, he should be the bolder in mischief.

And afterward, this in effect he saith:

It is not the custom of God by force to make men good whether they will or no, nor in his election he chooseth not folks by violence, but by good advice and motion.<sup>498</sup> And that ye may well perceive that his calling is no constraint of necessity, many whom he calleth do willingly for all his calling perish. And therefore it is evident that in our own will is the power set to choose whether we will be saved or lost. By these admonitions, therefore, let us labor to be sober and vigilant. For if Judas, which was one of the number of that holy company of the apostles, he that had obtained so great a gift, he that had done miracles (for Judas himself was sent, among others, to cure the lepers, and raise up dead men to life), after that he was once fallen into the grievous disease of avarice, neither the benefits, nor the gifts, nor the company of Christ, nor the service, nor the washing of the feet, nor the fellowship of his own board,<sup>499</sup> nor the trust in keeping of the purse anything<sup>500</sup> availed him, but all these things were with him a passage and a way to his punishment.<sup>501</sup>

Lo, good readers, here have ye heard both by Saint Cyril and Saint Chrysostom that our Savior gave that secret warning of Judas’s falsehood, and said that one of the twelve was a devil, to the intent that all folk, of what holiness so ever they were, should stand ever in dread and fear, and not do as these heretics teach—upon boldness of any feeling faith or final election, presume themselves so sure of salvation—but that while Judas fell after to naught<sup>502</sup> that was once a holy apostle, there shall no feeling faith nor proud hope upon final election set any man in his own heart so sure, but that with his good hope he shall always couple some fear as a bridle and a bit to refrain and pull him back, lest he fall to mischief, and follow Judas in falsehood, and wax a devil, as Christ called him, which name our Savior gave him not without good cause. For that devil's servant, saith Saint Cyril, is a devil too. For likewise as he that is by godly virtues joined unto God is one spirit with God, so he that is with devilish vices joined with the devil is one spirit with him.<sup>503</sup>

And therefore, good readers, he that in such plight receiveth the Blessed Sacrament without purpose of amendment, or without the faith and belief that the very flesh and blood of Christ is in it, he receiveth, as Saint Augustine saith, notwithstanding his naughtiness, the very flesh and blood of Christ, the very price of our redemption. But he receiveth them to his harm, as Judas did, and eateth and drinketh his own judgment and damnation, as saith Saint Paul,<sup>504</sup> because he discerneth not our Lord's body. But whoso doth on the other side (which, I beseech God, we may all do) cast out the devil and his works by the sacrament of penance, and then in the memorial and remembrance of Christ's Passion receive that Blessed Sacrament with true faith and devotion, with all honor and worship, as to the reverence of Christ's blessed person present in it appertaineth — they that so receive the Blessed Sacrament, verily receive and eat the blessed body of Christ, and that not only sacramentally, but also effectually, not only the figure, but the thing also, not only his blessed flesh into their bodies, but also his Holy Spirit into their souls, by participation whereof he is incorporate in them and they in him and be made lively members of his mystical body, the congregation of all saints, of which their souls shall, if they persevere, attain the fruit and fruition clean and pure once purged after this transitory life, and their flesh also shall Christ resuscitate unto the same glory, as himself hath promised, of which his gracious promise, his high grace and goodness vouchsafe to make us all partners through the merits of his bitter Passion. Amen.

And thus end I, good readers, my first book, containing the exposition of those words in the sixth chapter of Saint John, whereby you may both perceive by the minds of holy saints, whose words I bring forth, the truth of our faith concerning the blessed body and blood of Christ verily eaten in the Blessed Sacrament, and may also perceive and control<sup>505</sup> the wily false foolish exposition of Master Masker to the contrary, such as have his book, and they be not a few. And yet that all men may see that I neither blame him for nought<sup>506</sup> nor believe him, I shall in my second book show you, as I promised, some part of his faults both in falsehood and in folly, and his own words therewith.

THE SECOND BOOK

THE FIRST CHAPTER

I have, good readers, in my first book herebefore 5 perused you<sup>1</sup> the exposition of all that part of the sixth chapter of Saint John, which Master Masker hath expounded you before. And in the beginning of this exposition, I have not brought you forth the words of any of the old expositors because that (as I suppose) mine adversaries will not much contend 10 with me for so far. But afterward, concerning those words in which our Savior expressly speaketh of the giving of his very<sup>2</sup> flesh and blood to be verily eaten and drunken, there have I brought you forth such authorities of old holy doctors<sup>3</sup> and saints that ye 15 may well see both that I feign you not the matter but expound it you right, and also ye see thereby clearly that Master Masker expoundeth it wrong.
 For though a man may diversely expound one text and both well, yet when one expoundeth it in one 20 true manner of<sup>4</sup> a false purpose to exclude another truth that is in that writing by the Spirit of God first and immediately meant, his exposition is false although<sup>5</sup> every word were true, as Master Masker's is not.

25 And therefore, since you see mine exposition proved you by excellent holy men, and by their plain words ye perceive that the words of our Savior himself do prove against all these heretics the Catholic faith of Christ's Catholic Church very faithful 30 and true, concerning the very flesh of Christ verily eaten in the Blessed Sacrament, of which eating Master Masker would with his exposition make men so mad as to ween<sup>6</sup> that Christ spoke nothing at all, now I say by this exposition of mine ye see his 35 exposition avoided<sup>7</sup> clearly for nought,<sup>8</sup> and all the matter clear upon our part, though no man wrote one word more.

And yet will I for all that, for the further declaration of Master Masker's handling, show you 40 some pieces of his exposition in special,<sup>9</sup> by which ye may clearly see what credence may be given to the man, either for honesty, or learning, virtue, wit, or troth.<sup>10</sup>

THE SECOND CHAPTER

In the beginning of the second leaf<sup>11</sup> of his book, 45
 these are Master Masker's words:

Consider what this meat<sup>12</sup> is which he bade them here prepare and seek for, saying, "Work, take pains, and seek for that meat," etc. and thou shalt see it no other meat than the belief in Christ. 50 Wherefore he concludeth that this meat so often mentioned is faith, of the which meat, saith the prophet, the just liveth.<sup>13</sup> Faith in him is therefore the meat which Christ prepareth and dresseth, so purely powdering and spicing it with spiritual 55 allegories in all this chapter following, to give us everlasting life through it.<sup>14</sup>

I will not lay these words to his charge as heresy, but I will be bold by his license to note in them 60 a little lack of wit,<sup>15</sup> and some good store of folly.
 For though a man may well and with good reason call faith a meat of man's soul, yet is it great folly to say that the meat that Christ speaketh of here is, as Master Masker saith it is, none other meat but faith.

For Master Masker may plainly see, and is not, 65
 I suppose, so purblind,<sup>16</sup> but that he seeth well indeed that the meat which Christ speaketh of here is our Savior Christ himself, which thing he so plainly speaketh that no man can miss to perceive it when he saith, "I am myself the bread of life;" and when he 70 saith, "I am the lively bread that am descended from heaven; he that eateth of this bread shall live forever;" and when he saith also, that the meat should be his own flesh, which promise he performed after at his Maundy, which thing he told them plain in 75 these words, "And the bread which I shall give you is my flesh. And he that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath everlasting life, and I shall resuscitate him in the last day;" and when he said, "My flesh is verily<sup>17</sup> meat." 80

Thus you see, good readers, how oft and how plainly that he declareth that the meat which he speaketh of here is himself. And now saith Master

Masker very solemnly, and with authority biddeth every man mark it well and consider it, that the meat that Christ speaketh of here is nothing else but belief.

5 And upon what color<sup>18</sup> saith Master Masker so? Because (saith he) that our Lord bade them labor and work for the meat that would not perish, but abide into everlasting life, and afterward told them that the work of God, by which they should work 10 and labor for that meat, was nothing else but faith and belief in him.

First, in this construction Master Masker lieth very large. For though Christ said that to believe in him was the work of God, he said not, as Master 15 Masker maketh it, that nothing else was the work of God but only belief.

But now suppose that Christ had said as Master Masker would make it seem: that is to wit,<sup>19</sup> that the work of God were nothing else but the belief; yet ye 20 see well, good readers, that Christ, in saying that the belief in him is the work by which they shall work to get the meat, saith that the belief is the means to get the meat, and not that the belief is the meat.

But Master Masker, because the belief is the way
25 to this meat, therefore he calleth the belief the meat, as wisely as though he would call the King's Street Westminster Church, because it is the way thitherward if he come from Charing Cross. And because men must spiritually eat this meat with faith, there-30 fore he calleth the faith the meat as wisely as if he would, because he eateth his meat with his mouth, therefore call his mouth his meat. What wit hath this man?

But now will Master Masker wax<sup>20</sup> angry with my words, and call me Master Mock as he doth once or 35 twice in his book.<sup>21</sup>

But now, good readers, I will not adjure you by God's holy names to judge justly, but even only desire you that, in way of good company, that you will 40 say but even indifferently.<sup>22</sup> Were it not, ween<sup>23</sup> you, great pity that a man should mock Master Masker, when every fool may perceive him in so great a matter write so wisely?

And yet you may see that I deal with him very 45 gently. For in this point wherein by contrarying of Christ's own words he writeth plain heresy, I diminish his burden of that odious crime, and because the matter in this place so serveth me, do cover the botch<sup>24</sup> of his cankered<sup>25</sup> heresy, with this pretty plaster of his pleasant frenzy.

And yet I ween the man hath so little honesty that he will never can me thank<sup>26</sup> for my courtesy, specially because that (as far as I can see) the man had liefer<sup>27</sup> confess himself a heretic than be proved a fool. And that appeareth well in this. For this little 50 scab of his folly he laboreth somewhat to hide and cover, so that a man must pull off the clout ere<sup>28</sup> he can spy the botch. But as for the botch of his cankered heresies, without any clout or plaster he layeth out abroad to show, to beg withal,<sup>29</sup> among the 55 blessed brethren, as beggars lay their sore legs out in sight that lie a-begging a Fridays about Saint Savior and at the Savegate.<sup>30</sup>

But as for railing against images, purgatory, and praying to saints, and against the holy Canon of the Mass, all this he taketh for trifles, and would we 60 should<sup>31</sup> reckon all these heresies of his for points well and sufficiently proved by that that<sup>32</sup> he goeth so boldly forth on beyond them, and denieth the blessed body of Christ itself in the Blessed Sacrament too. And whereas he not only mocketh and 65 jesteth against the old holy doctors and saints of Christ's Catholic Church, but against our Savior himself in his Holy Sacrament too, yet the sage sad<sup>33</sup> earnest holy man, all made of gravity, sadness, and severity, must himself be reverently reasoned 70 with, and may have no mock of his matched with no merry word of mine in no manner wise.<sup>34</sup>

But yet like as if a right great man would wantonly walk a-mumming,<sup>35</sup> and disguise himself, and
85 that I may see him such an honorable personage as it may become him to say to me what he list, and me to requite his mocks with no merry word in this world, but stand still demurely and make him

low courtesy again, I will not let<sup>39</sup> in the meantime, while I wot nere<sup>40</sup> what he is, and while his witless writing maketh men ween he were a wild goose, to be so bold and homely<sup>41</sup> with his mastership (as 5 sorry as I am for him when he playeth the blasphemous beast) to laugh yet and make merry with him where I see him play the fool.

Yet will I now let pass his repugnance,<sup>42</sup> another folly of his. For if ever he defend his folly that I have 10 showed you, then shall he be fain<sup>43</sup> to declare his repugnance himself. And therefore I leave that point for himself, that in defending his folly he may show his repugnance, and so for defense of a single folly prove himself thrice a fool: first in writing folly, secondly in writing repugnance, thirdly to be so foolish 15 as, in defense of that one folly, to bring in the other two.

Making therefore for this time no longer tale of his follies, which would make mine answer over-20 long to bring them in all, let us see some piece of his fruitful exposition.

THE THIRD CHAPTER

In the second leaf these are his words:

25 “I am the bread of life, and whoso come to me” (that is to say, whoso is grafted and joined to me by faith) “shall never hunger,” (that is, whoso believe in me is satisfied). It is faith therefore that stauncheth his hunger and thirst of the soul. Faith it is therefore in Christ that filleth our hungry hearts, so that we can desire none other if we
30 once thus eat and drink him by faith: that is to say, if we believe his flesh and body to have been broken and his blood shed for our sins, for then are our souls satisfied and we be justified.<sup>44</sup>

35 The word of Christ, good reader, with which he beginneth, is well and fully fulfilled, if it be understood as I have before declared: that is to wit, that whoso come once by well-working faith, and perseverance therein, unto the meat that is Christ, and 40 attain the possession and fruition of him in bliss, he shall never hunger nor thirst after. And besides this, diverse good holy doctors expound these words of the eating of our Savior in the Blessed Sacrament also.

But surely I believe that it will be very hard for 45 Master Masker to verify the words of his holy exposition, yea, scant<sup>45</sup> of some such piece thereof as seemeth at the first sight well said, as<sup>46</sup> where he saith that faith so filleth our hungry hearts, and so stauncheth<sup>47</sup> the hunger and thirst of our soul, that 50 we be satisfied.

For I suppose that men are not satisfied here, neither with faith alone, nor with faith and hope and charity too, but yet they hunger and thirst still. For as our Savior saith, “He that drinketh me shall yet 55 thirst still, and long sore<sup>48</sup> as he drinketh him in grace, so to drink him in glory.”<sup>49</sup>

But then tempereth Master Masker his words of never thirsting with that that<sup>50</sup> he saith: that if we eat and drink God by faith, we shall never hunger
60 nor thirst; but we be satisfied, for the faith so filleth our hungry hearts that we can desire none other thing if we once thus eat him and drink him by faith. And then what it is to eat him and drink him by faith he forthwith<sup>51</sup> declareth as for the whole
65 sum and exposition of faith, and saith: “That is to say, if we believe his flesh and his body to have been broken and his blood shed for our sins, for then are our souls satisfied, and we be justified.”

70 Lo, here you see, good readers, that he saith that whoso believeth this here is all that needeth. For he that thus believeth is justified, and eateth and drinketh Christ, and so his soul satisfied, because he that so eateth him once can never after hunger nor thirst. And why? For he can desire none other thing.

First I ween<sup>52</sup> that all men are not agreed that he that longeth for none other thing is not athirst if he long still for more of the same. For if a man drink a pint of ale, though he found himself so well content therewith that he do not desire neither beer, wine, 80 nor water, yet if his appetite be not so fully satisfied, but that he would fain<sup>53</sup> of the same ale drink a quart more, some man would say he were a dry soul and were athirst again.

85 But now if this man meant any good in this matter, and would say that whoso so eateth God, as he hath him well incorporated in him shall so have his hunger and his thirst slaked<sup>54</sup> that he shall not hunger and thirst after the pleasure of his body, nor after the goods and riches nor after the pomp and pride of this wretched world, I would have suffered<sup>55</sup> him go forth with his exposition, and not have interrupted it. And yet it could not (ye wot<sup>56</sup> well) have well and fully served for the text, since the text is “he shall never hunger nor thirst,” which signifieth a taking away of desire and longing. And by this exposition, though there be taken away the desire and longing for other things, yet remaineth there a desire and longing for more and more of the same.

But yet I would, as I say, have let it pass by and wink thereat, if he meant none harm therein. But now cometh he after and declareth by example what he meaneth by this his saying, that he that eateth and drinketh God by believing that he died for our sins shall thirst and hunger for none other. For he saith, “He shall desire none other; he shall not seek by night to love another before whom he would lay his grief; he shall not run wandering here and there to seek dead stocks and stones.”<sup>57</sup>

Lo, good readers, here is the end of all this holy man’s purpose, for which he draweth the words of Christ from the very<sup>58</sup> thing that Christ principally spoke of unto another spiritual understanding, in turning the meat that Christ spoke of—that is to wit, the meat of his own blessed person, his Godhead and his manhood both—into the meat of faith, to the intent that under the pretext of praising the true faith, he might bring in slyly his very false wretched heresies, by which he would have no prayer made unto saints, nor their pilgrimages sought, nor honor done them at their images.

It is evident and plain that our Savior meant in this place to speak unto the Jews neither against images nor saints, but rather against the sensual appetite that they had to the filling of their bellies with bodily meat, the inordinate desire whereof made them the less apt and meet<sup>59</sup> for spiritual food. And therefore he bade them that they should less care for that perishable meat, and labor and work to win faith by prayer, and by faith to come to him. And because they so much hated and feared hunger and thirst, he would give them himself for their meat his very flesh and blood, verily here to eat, not dead but quick,<sup>60</sup> with soul and Godhead therewith in this world, which if they would well eat here with a well-working faith, he would give them the same, so

And he meant not that they should never, when they had once received him, thirst nor hunger after in this present world, in which—besides that they must both hunger and thirst, or else be ever eating and drinking to prevent their hunger and thirst—besides this, I say, they shall hunger and thirst still after God, if they be good.

Now if men will say that the pain of that hunger and thirst is taken away with hope, which greatly gladdeth the heart, surely they that neither hunger nor thirst for heaven, nor care how long they be thence so that they may make merry here the while, and yet have a hope that they shall have heaven too when they go hence, they feel in their faint hope neither great pleasure nor pain. But he that hopeth well of heaven, and not only hopeth after it, but also sore thirsteth for it, as did Saint Paul when he said, “I long to be dissolved” (that is, to have my soul loosed and departed from my body) “and to be with Christ,”<sup>61</sup> such a man, lo, as he findeth pleasure in his hope, so findeth he pain in the delay of his hope. For as Solomon saith, “The hope that is deferred and delayed, paineth and afflicteth the soul.”<sup>62</sup> But when men shall, with well eating of this meat of Christ’s blessed person, make them meet to eat it, and shall eat it by very fruition in heaven, then although they shall never be fastidious or weary thereof, but as they shall ever have it so shall ever desire it (so that of that state may be said also, “He that drinketh me shall yet thirst”), yet because they shall not only always desire it, but also always have it, and so by the continual everlasting having thereof their everlasting desire everlastingly fulfilled, their desire shall ever be without any grief and pain and ever full of everlasting pleasure, so that of that state only the prophet David saith, “I shall be satiated, or satisfied, when thy glory shall appear.”<sup>63</sup>

And this meant here our Savior Christ, and not that a man shall by his faith be fully satisfied in this wretched world, and never hunger nor thirst after here, as Master Masker maketh here by his exposition, in turning the saturity<sup>64</sup> of heaven into a saturity in this life, and turning the very meat of Christ’s blessed person into the only<sup>65</sup> belief of Christ’s bitter Passion, and then bringeth all in conclusion to the advancing of his heresy against the blessed saints, as though Christ in those words had meant to speak against the honoring of his saints, where-

 5 with he was so well content that he promised Saint Mary Magdalene a perpetual honor in earth, for her devotion toward him in bestowing her costly glass of ointment upon him,<sup>66</sup> and promised his twelve apostles the honor of twelve seats, to sit with him in judgment upon the world, for the dishonor and 10 penury that they should sustain for him before in the world.<sup>67</sup>

THE FOURTH CHAPTER

And see now, good reader, also how much pes-15 tilent poison Master Masker hath in this piece of his exposition put here, by this one syllable, “once.”<sup>68</sup>

For it is not enough to him to say that whoso eat Christ by faith shall never hunger (which words he might expound by perseverance and abiding still 20 with him after his once coming to him, as Christ meaneth by his), but he saith, whoso come to him by faith once, he shall never hunger nor thirst. And yet this word “once” is not there in the text of Christ’s words, but added by Master Masker in 25 his gloss.

And yet if Master Masker were a good Catholic man, I would not much mark his word “once.” But since he showeth himself well that he is of Master Tyndale’s sect, or is peradventure<sup>69</sup> Master Tyndale 30 himself, one of whose false heresies is that whoso have once the faith can never after fall therefrom, nor never fall after into deadly sin, therefore I cannot let Master Masker’s “once” this once pass un-35 marked by me, by which he saith that whoso come once to Christ by faith—that is to say, saith he, whoso believe once that Christ suffered his Passion for our sins—he shall never hunger nor thirst, but that is, he saith, to be understood that he shall never 40 after desire none other.

But now would I wit<sup>70</sup> of Master Masker once again, what he meaneth by this word “none other.” If he mean that no man that once believeth that Christ suffered Passion for us shall after at any time desire any other savior, besides that he saith one false heresy in that word “once” (for that<sup>71</sup> faith 45 may be once had and afterward lost again, as testify not only all holy doctors and the Catholic faith, but the plain Scripture too),<sup>72</sup> he hath in those words, I say, besides that false heresy, a very false wily folly. For the Catholic Church of Christendom, which 50 he toucheth in<sup>73</sup> praying to saints and going in pilgrimages, do seek no saint as their savior, but only as them whom their Savior loveth, and whose intercession and prayer for them he will be content to hear, and whom for his sake he would they should<sup>74</sup>

 55 honor, and whom, while for his sake they do honor, the honor that is done them for his sake specially redoundeth<sup>75</sup> to himself; as himself saith, he that heareth them, heareth him, and he that despiseth
 60 them, despiseth him, and in like wise, he that worshipeth them for his sake, worshipeth him.<sup>76</sup>

Now if Master Masker will say that by these words, “Whoso once believeth that Christ died for us shall never after desire none other,” he meaneth that he shall so mind and desire ever after only 65 Christ that he shall not hunger nor thirst nor desire after that any other thing but God. Then since Master Masker in this book of his asketh me so many questions, and saith so often, “I ask Master More this,” Master Masker must of reason give Master
 70 More leave to ask Master Masker some questions again.<sup>77</sup>

Now might I ask him, ye see well, whether he that hath had once that belief should never after in such 75 wise<sup>78</sup> be ahungered that he should desire his dinner. But then would Master Masker call me Master Mock, and say that it were but a scoffing question. And yet out of all question, that same scoffing question would quite overthrow his earnest exposition. But now because I will not anger him, I will let that 80 scoffing question go, and I will ask him now another manner<sup>79</sup> thing, a thing of that weight and gravity that it weigheth some souls down unto the deep pit of hell. For if Master Masker be Master Tyndale, then will I ask him whether he, being a priest, de-85 sired none other thing but only God, when since that he said he had once that belief, he hath, being a priest, broken his promise made once to God and gone offer than once a-wooing.

And if Master Masker be Master George Joye, 90 then would I ask him whether that after that belief

once had, he desired nothing but God, when being a priest he broke his promise to God, and wedded a widow, and by such wedding never made her wife, but made her a priest's harlot.

5 If Master Masker be neither of these twain,<sup>80</sup> yet since whatsoever he be he is a disciple of Luther and Friar Hussgen both (as contrarious as they be both each of them to other), I shall ask him then whether both his masters, being both professed friars, and 10 having both vowed perpetual chastity to God, did after that faith once had, never after desire any other thing but only God, not then when they broke both their solemn vows made unto God, and ran out of religion and wedded, the one a single woman, the 15 other a nun, and made them friars' harlots both? Did not then Friar Luther and Friar Hussgen both, contrary to Master Masker's words, desire another, and each of them go seek by night to love another, before whom he would lay his grief? What answer
20 shall Master Masker make Master More to this? He must either confess, against his own exposition, that after that belief had once, his own masters, the arch-heretics themselves, thirsted in the desire of some other thing besides God, or else must he fall to blas-
25 phemy and call a friar's harlot God, or say that for God's sake they wedded, and then for his sake they wedded against his will, or else affirm finally that the masters of his faith had never the faith yet — not the selfsame faith that they teach. And why should 30 any man then be so mad to give ear to such heretics, and believe their faithless tales?

THE FIFTH CHAPTER

35 Now handling his exposition and his doctrine of faith not only thus falsely but also thus foolishly too, as ye do now perceive, yet as though he had wonderful wisely declared some high heavenly mysteries that never man had heard of before, in the fourth leaf he boasteth his great cunning<sup>81</sup> in comparison of mine and saith:

40 Had Master More have understood this short sentence, "Whoso believe in me hath life everlasting," and known what Paul with the other apostles preached — especially Paul, being a year and a half among the Corinthians,<sup>82</sup> determining not, neither presuming not, to have known any other 45 thing to be preached them (as himself saith) than Jesus Christ, and that he was crucified<sup>83</sup> — had Master More understood this point, he should never thus have blasphemed Christ and his suffi-

50 cient Scriptures, neither have so belied his evangelists and holy apostles as to say they wrote not all things necessary for our salvation, but left out things of necessity to be believed, making God's
55 holy Testament insufficient and imperfect, first revealed unto our fathers, written eftsoons<sup>84</sup> by Moses and then by his prophets, and at the last written both by his holy evangelists and apostles too. But turn we to John again, and let More mock still and lie too.<sup>85</sup>

60 Had Master Masker understood the selfsame short sentence of Christ that he speaketh of, and had Master Masker well understood also the other short sentence of Saint Paul that he now toucheth, and after those two texts well understood, had 65 looked upon his own book again, he would rather have eaten his own book, but if<sup>86</sup> he be shameless, than ever have let any man see his false folly for shame.

70 For first, as for the first text touching the bread and the belief, his false and foolish handling ye perceive more than plain, in that he saith it is nothing but faith, where Christ saith it is himself.

75 Now the place that he toucheth of Saint Paul in his First Epistle to the Corinthians, I marvel me much to see the madness of this Masker, that bringeth it forth for his purpose here. For as you see, he meaneth to make men ween<sup>87</sup> that by that place it were proved, against my Confutation, that the apostles left no necessary thing unwritten.<sup>88</sup>

80 Now of any other apostle, ye see well, he bringeth not one word for that purpose of his, nor of Saint Paul neither, but this one place, which place, since he bringeth forth for the proof of their heresy that there is nothing necessarily to be believed but if<sup>89</sup> it may be proved by plain and evident Scripture, it
85 appeareth plain that Master Masker there mistaketh Saint Paul, and weeneth that he preached nothing to them of Christ but only his Passion. For else he might, notwithstanding the words of that place, preach to them diverse things of Christ by mouth, and leave it with them by tradition, without writing too, which neither himself nor none of his fellows never wrote any time after. And of truth, so he did, as I have proved at length in my work of Tyndale's Confutation, of which things one is, among diverse others, the putting of the water with the wine in the chalice, which thing Christ did at his Maundy when he did institute the Blessed Sacrament, and after he taught the order thereof to Saint Paul himself by his own holy mouth, and Saint Paul so taught it again to the Corinthians by mouth, and left it them first by tradition without any writing at all. And when he wrote unto them afterward thereof, he wrote it rather, as it well appeareth, upon a certain occasion to put them in remembrance of their duty in doing due reverence to it, because it is the very blessed body of God, than in that place to teach them the matter and the form of consecrating the Sacrament. For he had taught them that much more fully before by mouth than he doth there by that writing. For as ye wot<sup>90</sup> well, though he tell them there what it is when they drink it — that is to wit, the blood of our Lord — yet he telleth them not there whereof they shall consecrate it. For he neither nameth wine nor water. And yet saith in the end that, at his coming to them again, he will set an order in all other things.<sup>91</sup> And where will Master Masker show me all those things written, and prove it to be all those?

80 two 81 learning 82 See Acts 18:11. 83 See 1 Cor 2:2. 84 soon after,

But here you see how madly Master Masker understandeth that place of Saint Paul, when he taketh it in that wise<sup>92</sup> that he would thereby prove us that we were bounden to believe no more but that Christ died for us.

And of truth you see that speaking of faith before, this is his very conclusion, in which when I read it and confuted it here now before, yet marked I not therein so much as I do now. For though he said there, "If we once eat him and drink him by faith — that is to say, if we believe his flesh and body to have been broken, and his blood shed for our sins — then are our souls satisfied and we be justified," I marked not, as I say, that he meant so madly as all men may now see he meaneth, that is to wit, that men be bounden to believe nothing else but that Christ was crucified and died for our sins. Master Masker maketh us a pretty short creed now.

But that he thus meaneth indeed he now declar-eth plainly, when he would prove against me that no necessary thing was left unwritten, by those words of Saint Paul by which he writeth to the Corinthians that he preached nothing among them but Jesus Christ and that he was crucified.

And as Master Masker misunderstand-eth those words of Saint Paul so I perceive that long before Master Masker was born, there were some such other fools that mistook those words after the same fond<sup>93</sup> fashion then, and therefore affirmed that adultery was no deadly sin, as these foolish folk affirm now that it is no deadly sin for a friar to wed a nun. And their argument was that if adultery had been deadly sin, Saint Paul would have preached that point unto the Corinthians. But he preached, as himself saith in his epistle, nothing unto them but Christ and him crucified, and thereupon they concluded that adultery was no deadly sin.

But Saint Augustine answereth those fools, and this fool too, that he preached not only Christ's crucifixion. For then had he left his resurrection unpreached, and his ascension too, which both we be bounden as well to believe as his crucifixion, and many other things more besides. And therefore, as Saint Augustine saith, to preach Christ is to preach both everything that we must be bound to believe, and also everything that we must be bounden to do to come to Christ — and not, as those fools and this fool teacheth, that we be justified if we believe no more but only that Christ was crucified and died for our sins.<sup>94</sup>

And when Master Masker saith that by affirming any necessary point to be left unwritten in the Scripture I make God's holy Testament insufficient and unperfect, for all that it was first revealed unto our fathers, and eft<sup>95</sup> written by Moses, and then by his prophets, and at last written both by his holy evangelists and apostles too, to this I say that God's Testament is not insufficient nor imperfect, though some necessary things be left out of the writing. For I say that his Testament is not the writing only, but all the whole thing revealed by God unto his Church, and resting and remaining therein, part in writing and part without writing still, as it was altogether first without writing given. And see now, good readers, the wit<sup>96</sup> of Master Masker in this word of his. For

if I make the Testament of God unperfect and insufficient, because I say that some necessary points thereof be not yet written, doth not he, good readers, say and affirm thereby that it was altogether
 5 unperfect and unsufficient all the while that God taught it himself by his own revelation of Spirit, and that our Savior taught it himself by his own blessed mouth, till Moses and the prophets and the apostles wrote it with the pen?

10 And whensoever that Master Masker is able to prove that all these things which we be bounden to believe more than that Christ died for our sins are so fully written by Christ's apostles that they left none of them all unwritten—when he shall 15 have proved this, let him then come hardly<sup>97</sup> and bid Master More mock on and lie on too. But now while he saith so, so far out of season, while my work of Tyndale's Confutation hath proved my part so plainly that neither himself nor all the heretics 20 of them all shall well avoid<sup>98</sup> it while they live, now may Master More be bold to bid Master Masker go mock on and lie on too.

And this may I now say to Master Masker the more boldly, since you see that he understandeth
 25 not, or else willingly misconstrueth the place of the Apostle that he bringeth forth himself, and Saint John's Gospel too, and would make us ween<sup>99</sup> that it were enough to salvation to believe no more but that Christ was crucified for our sins. And then 30 should we not need indeed to believe that we should do penance for our sins ourselves, nor to believe the presence of Christ in the Blessed Sacrament neither, which point they would have now taken for indif-35 ferent, and many necessary points more. Whereof Master Masker would take away the necessity, because Saint Paul saith he preached nothing to the Corinthians but Christ and him to be crucified, which argument of Master Masker were not even 40 very strong, although Saint Paul had at that time preached them nothing else, because he might then have begun with that, and preach them many more things after, or send it unto them by writing.

But now would I fain<sup>100</sup> that Master Masker had gone a little further in the same epistle. For even 45 within three lines after it followeth, "My preaching was not among you in persuasible words of man's wisdom."<sup>101</sup>

These words I lay not against Master Masker, for he keepeth himself sure enough for that point, and is aware well enough that he speak no persuasible
 50 words of man's wisdom. But then saith Saint Paul further, "But my preaching was among you in showing of spirit and of power, to the intent that your faith should not be in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God."<sup>102</sup>

Here may Master Masker see that Saint Paul, because he taught strange doctrine, proved his doctrine not by subtle philosophical reasoning, nor by rhetoric and goodly fresh eloquence, but by miracles and the mighty hand of God.

Now if Master Masker therefore will be believed, reason is<sup>103</sup> that he do as Saint Paul did, since he teacheth as hard things and as strange to Christian men, and as far against the Christian faith as Saint Paul and the other apostles taught either Jews or 65 paynims<sup>104</sup> things hard and strange and far from the fashion of their false persuasion.

For setting aside all the whole heap of his other heresies, this one that he setteth forth in this pestilent book of his against our Savior himself in the Blessed Sacrament is as strange and as execrable in 70 all good Christian ears, and ever hath been since Christ's days, as ever was the preaching of Christ's Godhead among the gentiles or the Jews either. And therefore, if he will look to be believed as Saint Paul was, reason is that he do miracles as Saint Paul did.

If he say that he needeth not, for he proveth his doctrine by Scripture, thereto first we say and say true that in his so saying he lieth. And besides that we say that though he proved his doctrine by Scrip-
 80 ture indeed, yet since it seemeth to the whole Christian nations that the Scripture proveth not his part but the contrary, and so have thought so long therefore as our Savior himself and his apostles after him, which by the Scripture proved their part very truly
 85 to the Jews, did yet for all that prove the truth of their such exposition by miracles, so must Master Masker prove his expositions by miracles to be true. For else<sup>105</sup> since our Savior, though he would not work miracles at every man's bidding, said yet of the Jews that if himself had not done among them
 90 such works as no man else had done, their infidelity should not have been imputed unto them,<sup>106</sup> we may well be bold to say to Master Masker that, except<sup>107</sup>

97 boldly 98 refute, disprove 99 think, believe 100 wish, desire 101 1 Cor 2:1

102 1 Cor 2:4–5 103 reason is: it would be reasonable 104 pagans

105 otherwise 106 Jn 15:24 107 unless he work miracles too, he can of reason blame no man that in the exposition of Holy Scripture believeth better all the old holy doctors and saints, and all the whole Catholic Church, than him.

5 And therefore while Master Masker would seem to play Saint Paul and be an apostle here to teach English men a new faith, as Saint Paul did the Corinthians, and then teaching things as strange and as incredible to Christian men as his were to the 10 paynims, and cannot do miracles for his doctrine as Saint Paul did for his, but hath against him for our part such a multitude of miracles that for the proof of any one thing there were never showed so many, and when Master Masker, instead of mir-15 cles, proveth his expositions of Scripture so foolish himself and so false that to such as mark him well, he may surely seem to mean nothing else but to mock, we may go forth in the matter, and let Master Masker yet again mock on still and lie on too.

20 THE SIXTH CHAPTER

In the third leaf thus he saith: “And the cause of this your blindness is (I will not say over-hardly<sup>108</sup> to you) that the Father hath not drawn you into the knowledge of me, or else ye had received me. For all 25 that the Father giveth me must come to me.”<sup>109</sup>

Master Masker’s exposition of these words (I will not say over-hardly to him) is, I promise you, good readers, very bare, and left off so shortly, and handled so slenderly, that his own friends could here 30 scant<sup>110</sup> think any other than that liefer<sup>111</sup> than he would lay hardly to the Jews’ charge the fault of their own infidelity, he had liefer lay it in the neck of the Father of heaven, and there leave it.

Those words and all the words of Christ, in 35 which is any hardness,<sup>112</sup> his exposition so smoothly walketh over them that he giveth no light unto the understanding of them no more than if he never touched them.

The brethren cannot bear that my writing is so 40 long. But surely it is no mastery for a man to be short, that can find in his heart to do as Master Masker doth: leave all the hard places undeclared.<sup>113</sup>

For he nowhere sticketh but upon the places in which he falsely laboreth, by the color<sup>114</sup> of his exposition of a spiritual eating by faith, to hide and withdraw the very literal truth and the very faith 45 indeed, by which our Savior teacheth us to believe that the thing which in the Blessed Sacrament we spiritually must eat and bodily both is his own very 50 flesh indeed.

THE SEVENTH CHAPTER

In the end of the fourth leaf, he expoundeth these words of Christ: “And this bread that I shall give you is mine own flesh, which I shall give for the life
55 of the world.”<sup>115</sup> And forasmuch as at those words specially beginneth between him and me the way to part in twain,<sup>116</sup> and he to go the one and I the other—he drawing it all to that point as though Christ there began to show them none other thing
60 of his flesh but the giving it upon the cross, and that he nothing in all those words meant to tell them of the giving of his flesh to eat that he giveth in the Blessed Sacrament, and I there expounding it that 65 he there telleth them of both, but specially of the giving of his flesh to be eaten which he giveth in the Blessed Sacrament—therefore at those words, good readers, begin to take special good heed to Master Masker’s fingers. For there he specially be-70 ginneth to play a mummer’s cast<sup>117</sup> with his false dice. And therefore, confer his exposition upon the same words with mine, and then shall ye bid him cast again, for that cast goeth for nought.<sup>118</sup>

THE EIGHTH CHAPTER

In the fifth leaf thus he saith:

No marvel was it though these fleshly Jews ab-
75 horred the bodily eating of Christ’s flesh, albeit<sup>119</sup> our fleshly papists, being of the Jews’ carnal opinion, yet abhor it not.<sup>120</sup>

What thing more false, more foolish, or more 80 blasphemous could any brute beast say than this? For the Jews had an opinion that he would have them eat his flesh in the very<sup>121</sup> form of flesh, and as Saint Augustine saith, they thought they should eat it dead, cut out in gobbets as sheep's flesh is in the shambles.<sup>122</sup> And now is not Master Masker ashamed to rail upon all good Christian people under the name of papists, and say that they be all of the Jews' carnal opinion. Doth any man that receiveth the Blessed Sacrament think, as the Jews thought, that the flesh of Christ that he receiveth is in form of flesh, cut out in gobbets as sheep's flesh is sold in the shambles, and not in form of bread? If Master Masker were now barefaced himself, he were wonderful shameless if he could endure to look any man in the face for shame.

108 over-boldly; over-harshly 109 CW 11: 306; Jn 6:37 110 barely 111 rather 112 difficulty 113 unexplained

Now as this was, good readers, written (as you see) most falsely — that he saith we be of the Jews' opinion — so where he saith that we abhor not to eat Christ's flesh in the Sacrament, that is yet written, ye see well, as foolishly.

For the wise goodness of God hath, as the old holy doctors declare, given us his flesh not in form of flesh, but in form of bread, because we should not abhor it. And therefore, what horrible sight seeth this fool in the Blessed Sacrament, for which he should abhor to receive it?

But where was there ever a more blasphemous beastly word spoken than this frantic fool speaketh here, that mocketh and raileth upon all good Christian people in this fifteen hundred year because they do not abhor to receive the Blessed Body of Christ, in such wise given us by Christ, that no creature can abhor it but either devils or devils' fellows, heretics.

THE NINTH CHAPTER

Then saith Master Masker further in the same place,

Neither cease they daily to crucify and offer up Christ again, which was once forever and all offered up, as Paul testifieth (Hebrews 9).<sup>123</sup>

Lo, what lewd<sup>124</sup> boldness it giveth when a man may walk about in a visor unknown. Master Masker careth not what he saith while his visor of dissimulation<sup>125</sup> is on, that men know him not. For who saith that Christ is daily new crucified? Truth it is that the Church saith that Christ is at the altar

every day offered, his own blessed body in the Sacrament. This of truth the Church saith, and that Christ is our daily sacrifice. But no man saith that he is daily crucified of new, and daily put to new pain. But as he was once crucified and killed and offered on the cross, so is that one death, oblation, and sacrifice daily represented by the selfsame body, the only quick<sup>126</sup> sacrifice and oblation that God hath left unto his new Christian Church, instead of all the manifold sacrifices and oblations of his old synagogue the Jews. And that ye may know that I feign you not fantasies, Saint Chrysostom declareth it very plainly, whose words are these:

What is that then that we do? Do not we offer daily? Yes, forsooth.<sup>127</sup> But we do it in remembrance of his death. And this Host is one Host and not many. How is it one Host and not many? For because that Host was once offered, and was offered into the holiest tabernacle, and this sacrifice is a copy or example of that. We offer always the selfsame. Nor we offer not now one lamb, and tomorrow another, but still the same. This sacrifice therefore is one. For else<sup>128</sup> because it is offered in many places at once, are there many Christs? Nay, verily. For it is but one Christ everywhere, being both here whole, and there whole one body. For in like manner as he that is offered everywhere is but one body and not many bodies, so it is also but one sacrifice. And he is our bishop that offered the Host that cleanseth us. We offer now also the same Host which was then offered, and cannot be consumed. And this that we do is done in remembrance of that that<sup>129</sup> was done. For, he saith, "Do ye this in remembrance of me."<sup>130</sup> It is none other sacrifice, as it is none other bishop, but always we do the same, or rather we make a remembrance of that same sacrifice.<sup>131</sup>

What words can there be clearer to prove Master Masker a very fond<sup>132</sup> blasphemous mocker than these? By which this holy doctor Saint Chrysostom, against Master Masker mocking here the Mass, declareth his false folly clearly, and not only showeth that it is a sacrifice and an oblation, but also showeth that it is the daily representation of the same offering and sacrificing, by which he was sacrificed and offered up on the cross. And yet to stop Master Masker's mouth in the whole matter, he showeth that this oblation, this blessed sacrifice, the Sacrament of the altar, is all one oblation, all one Host, though it be offered at once in never so many places. And he showeth also that it is the very selfsame body that was offered on the cross. And that in this sacrifice of offering up the selfsame body in the Mass, we follow the example, as a copy is written after a book, and do represent the selfsame sacrifice by which Christ, the very selfsame body, was sacrificed on the cross.

How can Master Masker be more plainly confuted and confounded than Saint Chrysostom here confoundeth him, upon the occasion of this foolish blasphemous jesting of his?—with which he railleth against the Church, and saith that it ceaseth not daily to crucify Christ, as though the Church at this day did put Christ to new pain because his death is represented in the Mass, and of his goodness his very blessed body offered up daily, a sweet sacrifice for our sins.

Gracian also reciteth in the decrees, for our purpose in every point, as effectual words of Saint Ambrose, De consecratione, Distinctione 2, Cap. In Christo semel.<sup>133</sup>

Saint Augustine also, in the sixteenth book De civitate Dei, saith of the holy Mass in this wise:<sup>134</sup>

That sacrifice is succeeded into the place of all those sacrifices of the Old Law, which sacrifices were offered for a shadow of the thing to come. And for that cause also we know that voice in the thirty-ninth psalm, the prophecy of our mediator Christ, where he saith, "Sacrifice and oblation thou wouldst not have, but the body thou hast perfected me."<sup>135</sup> For in the stead of all those sacrifices and oblations, his body is offered and ministered<sup>136</sup> unto them that will be partakers of it.<sup>137</sup>

What speak I of Saint Chrysostom and Saint Augustine all the old holy doctors and saints of Christ's Church, without any exception, were ever more clear in this point that Master Masker here now denieth and thus jesteth on, that the Blessed Sacrament in the Mass is a sacrifice and an oblation.

And this cannot Master Masker himself deny.

For his own first master, Martin Luther, the late<sup>138</sup> well-spring of all this flood of heresies, in his pestilent book of Babylonica, putting forth this heresy that Master Masker toucheth here—that the Blessed Sacrament in the Mass is no sacrifice, nor none oblation—objecteth against himself and saith thus:

Now must we take away another occasion of ruin: that is, that the Mass is everywhere believed to be a sacrifice that is offered unto God. And for that opinion seems to sound the Canon of the Mass, where it is said, "These gifts, these holy sacrifices, this oblation and offering." And therefore is Christ called the Host or Sacrifice of the altar. Then cometh there also on this part the sayings or sentences of the holy fathers and then so many examples.

Against all these things, because they be very fastly<sup>139</sup> received, we must very constantly object<sup>140</sup> the words and example of Christ at his Maundy.

And afterward he saith again,

What shall we say then to the Canon of the Mass and to the sayings of the old holy doctors and saints? I say that if we have nothing else to say, let us yet rather deny them all than grant that the Mass should be any good work or any sacrifice, lest we should deny the word of Christ, and cast down faith and Mass and all.<sup>141</sup>

Thus you see, good readers, that Luther himself confesseth that in this heresy against the sacrifice and oblation of the Mass, which Master Masker, with two other heresies too, bringeth here forth now, the old holy doctors and saints are against him, and then were we wise, if we would ween that Martin Luther and Master Masker, evil Christian heretics, understand Christ's words better than ever did all the holy doctors of Christ's Church before.

And thus you see, good readers, what a compendious writer Master Masker is, that hath in less than three lines compacted up together such three abominable blasphemous heresies, as the devil himself never devised worse.

In the sixth, the seventh, the eighth, the ninth, the tenth leaf,<sup>142</sup> he hath certain arguments against all men in general that expound those words of Christ in the sixth chapter of John to be spoken and meant of the very eating of his Blessed Body in the Sacrament, and not only of a spiritual eating by belief of his death. And some solutions hath he there, such as they be, against mine argument in special<sup>143</sup> made unto Frith, all which things I will sort into their places apart from his exposition, so that ye may see some of the faults of his exposition by themselves, and his arguments answered by themselves, and his solutions avoided<sup>144</sup> by themselves, and the notable notes that he maketh of my notable repugnances<sup>145</sup> last of all laid open to you by themselves, because I will lay all things in order plain before your eyes, so that when ye see the things in such wise before you without interlacing, ruffle, and confusion, ye shall the more easily judge whether Master Masker in his mummery<sup>146</sup> be an honest man, or else a false hazarder<sup>147</sup> and play with false dice.

THE TENTH CHAPTER

In the eleventh leaf,<sup>148</sup> after that in the other ten before he had spoken many times of faith alone, and that the only belief of far fewer things than we be bounden indeed to believe, when it were once had, should both satisfy the soul and also make us safe forever, it appeareth in that leaf that either his own mind began to misgive him, or else some other wily brother gave him warning, that this manner<sup>149</sup> writing of faith alone would make all the world to wonder on him. For Luther himself, writing first on the same fashion that faith alone was sufficient for salvation, though it pleased idle unthrifts<sup>150</sup> very well, that were glad to be by bare faith discharged of all good works, it was yet so sore<sup>151</sup> abhorred among all honest men that both himself and all his sect were fain<sup>152</sup> to seek some plasters of false glosses to heal the foul mormal<sup>153</sup> of their scabbed shins, that they had gotten by that text of their false faith alone.

And then they said that they meant that manner faith that had always both hope and charity with it. But then could not that gloss serve them. For that manner faith taught ever the common Catholic Church, which they reprov'd. And also that gloss marred their text, and was clean<sup>154</sup> contrary to all their tale. For all the text of their preaching had been of faith alone, and their gloss was of faith not alone, but encompassed with two good fellows, pardie,<sup>155</sup> the one called hope and the other charity.

Now therefore either upon this fear of his own mind, or upon this advertisement<sup>156</sup> of some other man, Master Masker, to mend his exposition with and to make all the matter safe, hath at the last, in the end of the eleventh leaf, plastered his mormal of his only faith on<sup>157</sup> this fashion:

“By love, we abide in God and he in us.”<sup>158</sup> Love followeth faith in the order of our understanding, and not in order of succession of time, if thou lookest upon the self<sup>159</sup> gifts and not of their fruits, so that principally by faith, whereby we cleave to God’s goodness and mercy, we abide in God and God in us, as declare his words following, saying, “As the living Father sent me, so live I by my Father. And even so he that eateth me shall live because of me or for my sake. My Father sent me, whose will in all things I obey, for I am his Son. And even so verily must they that eat me — that is, believe in me — form and fashion them after my example, mortifying their flesh and changing their living, or else they eat me in vain and dissemble their belief. For I am not come to redeem the world only, but also to change their life. They therefore that believe in me, shall transform their lives after<sup>160</sup> mine example and doctrine, and not after any man’s traditions.”<sup>161</sup>

This plaster, good readers, hath some good ingredients. But it is both too narrow by a great deal to cover his scald<sup>162</sup> shin, and hath also some dead apothecary drugs put in it that can do no good, and something also repugnant to his remedy.

But let us now consider his words. First where he saith that “by love we abide in God and God in us,” he saith truth, for so saith the Scripture, but that is to be understood as long as we love him, and dwell so still in him. But when we break his commandments, and thereby declare that we love him not, as the Scripture also saith, against which Scripture Master Tyndale saith that he that hath once a feeling faith can never fall therefrom,<sup>163</sup> and against the same Scripture Master Masker saith that faith once had sufficeth for salvation.

5 And Master Masker maketh yet his matter much worse than William Tyndale. For Tyndale did yet at the leastwise make some bumbling about a color<sup>164</sup> for the matter, with a long process of historical faith and feeling faith, whose false wily folly therein I have so confuted in my Confutation that, though<sup>165</sup>
10 he write again therein, as long as ever he liveth he shall never shake off the shame.

But Master Masker handleth the matter both more wilily than Tyndale doth, and yet much more foolishly too. For seeing that his saying cannot be 15 defended, he ruffleth up all the matter shortly in a few words, both for sparing of labor, and also because he would not have his words well understood, but that his words might stand for a short text, which he would leave for every other good 20 brother to make some good gloss thereto to maintain it with.

For in his next words following where he saith, “Love followeth faith in the order of our understanding, and not in the order of succession of time, 25 if thou lookest upon the self gifts and not upon their fruits,” in these few dark<sup>166</sup> words he would both show his clerkliness<sup>167</sup> before unlearned men, and leave them also undeclared, because he would have them ween that his high learning passeth<sup>168</sup> 30 their low capacities.

But yet in these words he juggleth with us, and may with his wiliness beguile them that will take none heed. But whoso look well to his hands shall perceive where his galls<sup>169</sup> go well enough.

35 For true it is that whosoever God infoundeth<sup>170</sup> either the habit of faith, or the full perfect quick<sup>171</sup> lively faith that is called fides formata, he infoundeth in like wise hope and charity both. But this is not the “faith alone.” For faith is never such faith, 40 but while he hath his two fellows with him. But faith may begin, and tarry too, before his two fellows come to him, as a man may believe well long ere he will do well. And faith may tarry also when both his fellows be gone from him, as he that hath 45 had all three may by deadly sin fall from the other twain,<sup>172</sup> and have faith alone remain. And faith may come and continue still, and neither of both of his fellows never come at him at all, as where a man believeth truly every article of the faith and yet hath never the will to work well, nor never will 50 be baptized, but after dieth in despair. And in all these cases is it faith alone. And because it neither worketh well, nor hath will to work well, neither in act nor in habit, therefore is it called fides informis, and a dead faith — not dead in the nature of faith 55 or belief, but dead as to the attaining of everlasting life.

Now would Master Masker juggle and make us believe that he meaneth the first manner of faith — that is, quick and lively — by the reason that it hath 60 good hope and charity therewith.

But I cannot suffer<sup>173</sup> you, good Christian readers, to be so beguiled by such a fond<sup>174</sup> false juggler. For if ye take heed unto him, ye shall soon perceive that he is even but a very bungler.

For when that he first telleth us what belief is sufficient, and saith that if we once eat and drink Christ by faith, and then expoundeth the whole sum of all that faith saying — that is to say, “if we believe his flesh and his body to have been broken, and 70 his blood shed for our sins, then are our souls satisfied, and we be justified” — and now addeth thereunto that love followeth faith in the order of our understanding and not in the order of succession of time, by which he meaneth that every man hath 75 charity ever more as soon as he hath faith, ye may clearly see that he saith that a man hath charity ever as soon as he hath that faith, so that by him whosoever believeth that Christ died for us, he hath both faith, hope, and charity, though he believe nothing 80 else.

But now is this a very false devilish doctrine. For this is no full faith. For a man may believe this, and yet leave many a thing unbelieved, which we be bounden to believe besides. And therefore you may 85 well see that though the theological virtue of full and perfect faith have always charity together in-founded with it, yet Master Masker’s faith, that is neither perfect nor full, may be not in the beginning only but also ever after without any charity at all.

Also where he saith that the faith that he describeth, once had, is sufficient, and speaketh of no perseverance, a man may well see that his saying is insufficient. For both that, faith standing, a man may well fall from charity, and then though he had once charity as soon as that faith (if that bare faith 5 without more were possible to have charity with it), yet might it lack charity after. And also that faith might itself fall quite away too. For he that once believeth every article of the faith, and then can fall from any, as Master Masker is fallen from many,

10 may little and little fall from them every one. For I dare well say that Master Masker believeth no point that he believeth most surely anything<sup>175</sup> more surely now than he hath believed ere this, diverse of those points which he now believeth least if he believe as 15 he writeth.

And thus, good readers, you see that whereas his moral<sup>176</sup> is more than a handful broad, this plaster of his passeth not the breadth of a penny. For I dare say the devil believeth<sup>177</sup> at this day as much 20 as Master Masker saith that is sufficient — that is to wit,<sup>178</sup> that Christ died for our sin — and yet hath he no charity. Nor no more hath no man that will believe no more but that, or though he do believe more than that, will yet think that he believeth all

THE ELEVENTH CHAPTER

Now where he saith further:

30 So that principally by faith, whereby we cleave to God's goodness and mercy, we abide in God and God in us, as declare his words following, saying, "As the living Father sent me, so live I by my Father. And even so, he that eateth me shall live because of me or for my sake."

35 This is a very false naughty<sup>181</sup> declaration of Christ's words. For whereas the holy doctors do declare<sup>182</sup> those words, as I before have showed you, that like<sup>183</sup> as our Savior had his eternal life of his Father before any beginning of time, in that his Father eternally before all time begot him, and his 40 flesh, not of his own nature but by the conjunction

that it had with the Godhead, had now the same life and so lived for the Father, so should he that eateth that flesh according to Christ's institution 45 with due circumstances of faith and good hope, and charity — well-willing<sup>184</sup> to work — attain everlasting life also, by reason of his conjunction and incorporation with his everlasting flesh; so I say always if the eater eat it with all due circumstances requisite, so that like as they receive not his holy flesh dead
50 as the Jews had weened,<sup>185</sup> but quick<sup>186</sup> with Holy Spirit joined thereto, so their souls may join with his spirit as their flesh joineth with his; whereas the holy doctors, I say, do expound these words thus, now cometh Master Masker and saith that in these 55 words Christ teacheth us that we abide in him and he in us, not principally by charity but principally by faith.

Now, good reader, what one word of those words of Christ anything soundeth to the maintenance of 60 Master Masker's exposition that God is in us and we in him principally by faith? The Scripture saith, "God is charity, and he that dwelleth in charity dwelleth in God, and God in him."<sup>187</sup>

Now if Master Masker would have said that by 65 faith a man might eat the flesh of Christ, and by faith might dwell in God, if Master Masker were a good Catholic man, I would for so far find no fault in his exposition. For it might have a meaning good enough, beside the literal sense of Christ's words.
70 But now when he contendeth that this is the literal sense, and therewith would shake off the very<sup>188</sup> eating that our Savior meant in the Blessed Sacrament, and bear us in hand<sup>189</sup> that our Savior meant not so, but meant an only eating of his flesh by a bare belief
75 of his death, and not the very bodily eating at all, and that in those words he meant that though we dwell in God by love, yet not principally by love, but principally by faith, as to which virtue the virtue of charity were but a follower and a perpetual hand-80 maid, where there is in those words of Christ not one syllable sounding toward it, what good Christian man can abide it? Namely while the Scripture by plain words condemneth it, and saith, Fides, spes, charitas, tria hec maior horum charitas ("Faith, hope, and charity, these three, but the principal of these is 85 charity").<sup>190</sup>

THE TWELFTH CHAPTER

Now where he goeth, good reader, further forth yet upon these words, and saith:

My Father sent me, whose will in all things I obey, for I am his Son. And even so verily<sup>191</sup> must they that eat me, that is, believe in me, form and fashion them after my example, mortifying their flesh and changing their living, or else they eat me in vain and dissemble their belief.<sup>192</sup>

Though these words here seem very good, yet while they be all written unto this one intent, that this gay flourish should so glitter in our eyes that we might thereby be blinded and not beware of the perilous pit into which he goeth about to cast us—that is, to make us ween that our Savior in saying that we should eat his flesh meant no very eating thereof in the Blessed Sacrament but only a spiritual eating by believing that he died for our sins, as here he declar-eth again, “They that eat me, that is, believe in me,” etc.—while all draweth, I say, to that end, his tale is naught altogether.

And yet it is a world<sup>193</sup> also to see the blindness that the devil hath driven into him, by which he cannot be suffered<sup>194</sup> to see that by these selfsame words with which he would advance his purpose, he very plainly destroyeth it.

For his purpose is, ye wot<sup>195</sup> well, to make us ween that faith were not only the principal, but also that faith hath ever love waiting upon her, and following her as her unseparable servant, as heat ever followeth the fire. And now you see that he saith here that whoso do not form and fashion them after Christ’s example do eat him in vain. And then to eat him, he saith, is but to believe in him. And so he saith, without good living—that is to wit,<sup>196</sup> without charity—the belief is but in vain. Now to believe in vain is, ye wot well, to believe, and yet have his belief fruitless for lack of that love that is the theological virtue called charity.

And thus ye see, good readers, how well and circumspectly Master Masker looketh to his matter, that when he hath told us that faith never lacketh charity, forgetting himself forthwith,<sup>197</sup> telleth us himself, within ten lines after, that faith may lack charity, and therefore be but in vain.

Now where he saith, “or else they dissemble their belief,” I will not dissemble with him, but tell him very plain that, as great a dissembler as he is, he wotteth not, as it seemeth, what this word “dissembling” meaneth, or else wot I nere<sup>198</sup> what he meaneth thereby. For a man dissembleth the thing that he hath and will not be acknown<sup>199</sup> thereof, as a man dissembleth his hatred when he hateth one and feigneth himself his friend to cover his hatred with. And so we say that a man dissembleth a thing when he seeth it and will not see it, but maketh as though he saw it not. But no man dissembleth the thing that he seeth not indeed, nor the thing that he hath not indeed, but maketh as though he saw it or had it. For he feigneth or lieth, and not dissembleth, as in the Latin tongue (whereof this English word cometh), ille simulat non dissimulat. And therefore, if Master Masker mean here by these words, “or else they dissemble their belief,” any other thing than they feign a belief, making as though they believed and do not, let him not dissemble with me, but tell me what other thing he meaneth. And if he mean by those words none other thing than that, then will I not dissemble with him, but tell him the plain truth: that he may peradventure<sup>200</sup> mean wisely enough, but he speaketh but like a fool. For by that word he saith the clear contrary, that is to wit, that they make as though they believed not, but yet they do.

THE THIRTEENTH CHAPTER

But now at last he concludeth all together thus:

For I am not comen to redeem the world only, but also to change their life. They therefore that believe in me, shall transform their life after mine example and doctrine, and not after any man’s traditions.

I will not here hold a long dispicion<sup>201</sup> with Master Masker upon man’s traditions, by which word he would have all the laws made by men utterly set at nought,<sup>202</sup> and would have man bound but either

I nere: know I not 199 recognized

200 perhaps 201 discussion 202 set at nought: valued as nothing

by the plain word of Scripture, or else by his own express agreement and consent. For Luther saith that neither man nor angel can make the bond of any one syllable upon any Christian man, without 5 his own express consent,<sup>203</sup> so that no law can be made by that wise reason, by the prince and the people, to hang up either thief or murderer, or to burn up a heretic, but if<sup>204</sup> the thieves, murderers, and heretics will consent and agree thereto themselves.
 10 Nor no law made this day can bind him that shall be born tomorrow, till he come to good age and agree thereto first himself, as our sovereign lord the King's Grace most prudently laid against Luther.

But I let this folly of Master Masker pass, and 15 this also: that the traditions which these heretics be worst content withal<sup>205</sup> be the traditions of the apostles, which they delivered to the Church, as Christ, not by writing but by tradition, delivered the things to them, for which Saint Paul saith, Ego enim accepi
 20 a domino quod et tradidi vobis ("For I have received the thing of our Lord by tradition, without writing the which I have also delivered unto you"),<sup>206</sup> as though he would say, "As I have received it by tradition or delivery of our Lord, so without writing I 25 have delivered it by tradition to you."

I will let pass all these advantages (which I might, as ye see, take against Master Masker here), and I will well allow these words of his for this once, so that himself will stick and stand by them stiffly, and 30 confess that they that transform not their life after Christ's example and doctrine have either their belief in vain, or else make as though they believed, and have no belief at all.

This once agreed between him and me, aye, if he 35 will rail upon the priests and prelates of the Catholic Church for doing of the contrary, let him name who they be and wherein they do it, and by my troth,<sup>207</sup> in such evil doing, they shall never be defended for<sup>208</sup> me.

40 But then of reason must Master Masker give me leave again to put him in remembrance of the priests and prelates of their heretics' sects, and I will speak of none but by name. Friar Luther, I will name him the chief and principal author of their heresies. I will name him Friar Lambert, Dane Othe the Carthusian, Zwingli the priest, and the priest Pomeranus, 45 and Friar Hussgen the friar Brigittine.<sup>209</sup> These be, lo, the very prelates and bishops, metropolitans<sup>210</sup> and apostles of their sects.

Now will I then ask Master Masker what example
 50 of Christ or what doctrine of Christ he can show, by which those holy prelates of these new sects, evil Christian caitiffs,<sup>211</sup> that have sowed all this sedition, have broken their holy vows and promises made unto God, and run out of their orders, and to 55 the shame of matrimony and holy orders both speak of the spirit, and fall to the flesh? Which while they have all done, against the doctrine and example as well of Christ as of all holy doctors and saints, and of all good Christian people since the death of 60 Christ unto this their own wretched time, and now teach it forth for a doctrine, reason it is<sup>212</sup> that Master Masker confess that all the prelates of his sundry sects either have but a vain faith, or else make as<sup>213</sup>
 65 they had faith and have no faith at all. And then are there no man's traditions so evil as are their own, being themselves so evil men as they be. And why should we then hear Master Masker preach either their faith or traditions either, while their faith is 70 either vain faith or else false and none at all, and their doctrine as devilish doctrine as themselves are devilish men, and more devilish, I ween, is scant<sup>214</sup> the devil himself.

Thus have I, good readers, noted you certain 75 pieces of Master Masker's exposition, by which as by a taste of a draught or twain,<sup>215</sup> ye may see what poisoned drink is in the whole vessel. And now shall I come to his arguments, which he maketh in general against all them that expound this place of 80 Christ's words in the sixth chapter of Saint John to be spoken or meant of that eating, by which we eat Christ's blessed body in the Blessed Sacrament.

THE THIRD BOOK

THE FIRST CHAPTER

In the fifth leaf<sup>1</sup> upon his exposition of these words, “and the bread which I shall give for the life of the world,” thus he argueth:

And even here since Christ came to teach to take away all doubt and to break strife, he might (his words otherwise declared than he hath declared and will hereafter expound them) have soluted<sup>2</sup> their question, saying, if he had so meant as More expoundeth, that he would have been conveyed and converted (as our jugglers sleightly<sup>3</sup> can convey him with a few words) into a singing loaf,<sup>4</sup> or else (as the Thomistical papists say) been invisible with all his dimensioned body under the form of bread transubstantiated<sup>5</sup> into it, and after a like Thomistical mystery, the wine transubstantiated too into his blood, so that they should eat his flesh and drink his blood after<sup>6</sup> their own carnal understanding (but yet in another form) to put away all grudge<sup>7</sup> of stomach. Or since Saint John, if he had thus understood his master’s mind, and took upon him to write his master’s words, would leave this sermon unto the world to be read, he might now have delivered us and them from this doubt. But Christ would not so satisfy their question, but answered, “Verily,<sup>8</sup> verily, I say unto you, except<sup>9</sup> ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye shall not have that life in yourselves. He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath life everlasting, and I shall stir him up in the last day. For my flesh is very meat and my blood the very drink.” He saith not here that bread shall be transubstantiated or converted into his body, nor yet the wine into his blood.<sup>10</sup>

Lo, good Christian readers, this man here in a foolish, jesting, and much blasphemous railing manner, against the conversion of the bread and wine into the blessed body and blood of Christ in the Blessed Sacrament, in conclusion as for a clear confutation of me and of Saint Thomas both, upon which holy doctor and saint he foolishly jesteth by name, he argueth, as you see, that if Christ had intended to have given them his flesh and his blood in the Sacrament, then might he have declared it more openly with more words and more plainly. And then Master Masker deviseth Christ the words that he would have had him say if he had so meant. And therein the blasphemous beast deviseth that he would have had our Savior say that he would play as jugglers do, and slyly convey himself into a singing loaf; and that our Savior so doth, he saith is mine opinion, wherein the man is shameless, and shamefully belieith<sup>11</sup> me. For I say, as the Catholic faith is, that he not conveyeth but converteth the bread into his own body, and changeth it therein too, and neither conveyeth, as he speaketh, his body into the bread (for then were the bread and his blessed body both together still, which false opinion is Luther’s heresy, and that knoweth this man well enough, and therefore showeth himself shameless in laying that opinion to me), nor also converteth not his blessed body into bread, for that were yet much worse. For then remaineth there nothing else but bread still, and that is, ye wot<sup>12</sup> well, Master Masker’s own heresy for which he writeth against me, and therefore is he double shameless, as you see, to say any such thing of me.

But in conclusion the effect of all his fond<sup>13</sup> argument is that even there in that place, to break strife and to assoil<sup>14</sup> all their doubt, our Lord might and would have done at the self<sup>15</sup> communication, or else at the leastwise, the Evangelist, at the time of his writing, might and would have told them plainly that they should eat it, not in form of flesh but in form of bread. But neither our Savior then told them so, nor the Evangelist hath told us so in the reporting of his words spoken to them; ergo it must needs be that Christ meant not so.

This is Master Masker’s argument, which he liketh so specially that afterward, in another place,<sup>16</sup> he harpeth upon the same string again. But surely if the man be in Scripture anything<sup>17</sup> exercised, then hath he a very poor remembrance. And whether

1 page 2 solved 3 craftily 4 singing loaf: the communion wafer 5 changed. According to the doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church, the whole substance of the bread and wine is converted into the body and blood of Christ, with only the appearances of bread and wine remaining. 6 according to 7 grumbling 8 Truly

he be Scriptured or not, he hath a very bare barren wit,<sup>18</sup> when he can ween<sup>19</sup> that this argument were aught.<sup>20</sup>

For first, as for the Scripture, can he find no more 5 places than one, in which our Savior would not tell out plainly all at once?

Could Christ of the sacrament of baptism have told no more to Nicodemus if he had would?<sup>21</sup> Could he to the Jews that asked him a token have 10 told them no more of his death, sepulture,<sup>22</sup> and resurrection but the figure of the prophet Jonah, three days swallowed into the whale's belly?<sup>23</sup>

When his disciples asked him of the restitution of the kingdom of Israel, and mistook his kingdom for a worldly kingdom, did he forthwith<sup>24</sup> declare them all that ever he could have told them? Or all that ever he told them thereof at any other time after? Nay, nor the Evangelist in the rehearsing<sup>25</sup> neither.<sup>26</sup>

Hath this man either never read or else forgotten that albeit<sup>27</sup> our Savior came to be known for Christ and sometimes declared him so himself, yet at some other times, he forbade his disciples to be 20 acknownd<sup>28</sup> thereof?<sup>29</sup> So that as for the Scriptures (except<sup>30</sup> he have either little read or little remembered of them) would have made Master Masker to forbear<sup>31</sup> this foolish argument for shame.

But now what wit hath this man that can argue thus, when he should, if he had wit, well perceive 30 his argument answered by the like made against himself upon the very selfsame place?

For Master Masker saith here that our Lord meant nothing else but to tell them of the giving of his flesh to the death for the life of the world, 35 and to make them believe that. Now ask I therefore, Master Masker, whether Christ could not have told them by more plain words than he did there (if it had so been his pleasure) that he should die for the sin of the world, and in what wise<sup>32</sup> also. If Master 40 Masker answer me no, I am sure every wise man will tell him yes. For he spoke there not half so plainly of the giving of his body to be slain as he did of giving it to be eaten. For as for his death, not so much as once named it, but only saith, "And the bread that 45 I shall give you is mine own flesh, which I shall give for the life of the world," in which words he not once nameth death. But of the eating, he speaketh so expressly by and by,<sup>33</sup> and so spoke before all of eating, and much more afterward too, that he gave 50 them little occasion to think that he meant of his death any word there at all but of the eating only.

And some great holy doctors also construe those whole words, "And the bread that I shall give is my flesh which I shall give for the life of the world," 55 to be spoken only of the giving of his blessed body in the Sacrament, and neither the first part nor the second to be spoken of his death, but that in the first part Christ showeth what he would give them to eat—that is to wit,<sup>34</sup> his own flesh—and in the 60 second part, he showed them why he would give the world his flesh to eat, and what commodity<sup>35</sup> they should have by the eating of it, saying that he would give it men to eat for the life that men should have by the eating of it. And therefore he
65 pursueth forth both upon the eating thereof, and upon the life that they shall lack that will not eat it, and of the life that they shall have that will eat it, so that, as I say, Christ spoke and meant, after<sup>36</sup> the mind of some holy cunning<sup>37</sup> men, but of the eating
70 only, but by<sup>38</sup> all good men of the eating specially, and without any manner<sup>39</sup> question of the eating most plainly, as of which he speaketh by name expressly. And of his death (if he there spoke of it, as diverse holy doctors think he did), yet he spoke it so
75 covertly that he rather meant it than said it, as the thing whereof he nothing named, but only the giving to eat. So that whereas Master Masker argueth that Christ nothing meant of giving of his flesh to be eaten in the Sacrament, but only of his flesh to be 80 crucified because that if he had meant of his flesh to be eaten in the Sacrament, he could and would have told them plainly so, ye see now, good readers, very plain proved by the selfsame place that, since Master Masker cannot say nay but that<sup>40</sup> of his body to be given by death Christ could have spoken much 85 more plainly than he did in that place, as well as he could have spoken more plainly of the giving of his body to be eaten in the Blessed Sacrament, Master Masker's own argument (if it were aught,<sup>41</sup> as it is nought)<sup>42</sup> utterly destroyeth all his own exposition 90

THE SECOND CHAPTER

In the eleventh leaf he hath another argument, toward which he maketh a blind induction<sup>44</sup> before. And because ye shall see that I will not go about to beguile you, I will rehearse<sup>45</sup> you his induction first, and then his argument after. These are his words:

When the Jews would not understand this spiritual saying of the eating of Christ's flesh and drinking of his blood, so oft and so plainly declared, he gave them a strong trip, and made them more blind, for they so deserved it (such are the secret judgments of God), adding unto all his sayings thus: "Whoso eat my flesh and drink my blood abideth in me and I in him." These words were spoken unto the unbelievers into their further obstination,<sup>46</sup> but unto the faithful for their better instruction. Now gather of this the contrary, and say, "Whoso eateth not my flesh and drinketh not my blood abideth not in me nor I in him," and join this to that aforesaid sentence, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." Let it never fall from thy mind, Christian reader, that faith is the life of the righteous, and that Christ is this living bread whom thou eatest, that is to say, in whom thou believest.<sup>47</sup>

Here is Master Masker fallen to juggling, lo, and as a juggler layeth forth his trinkets upon the table and biddeth men look on this and look on that and blow in his hand, and then with certain strange words to make men muse, whirleth his juggling stick about his fingers to make men look upon that, while he playeth a false cast<sup>48</sup> and conveyeth with the other hand something slyly into his purse or his sleeve or somewhere out of sight, so fareth Master Masker here, that maketh Christ's holy words serve him for his juggling boxes and layeth them forth upon the board<sup>49</sup> afore us, and biddeth us, "lo, look on this text," and then look, "lo, upon this," and when he hath shed forth thus two or three texts and bid us look upon them, he telleth us not wherefore,<sup>50</sup> nor what we shall find in them. But because they be so plain against him, he letteth them slink away, and then to blear our eyes, and call our mind from the matter, up he taketh his juggling stick, the commendation of faith, and whirleth that about his fingers, and saith:

Let it never fall from thy mind, Christian reader, that faith is the life of the righteous, and that Christ is this living bread whom thou eatest: that is to say, in whom thou believest.

What are these words, good Christian reader, to the purpose? All this will I pray<sup>51</sup> you remember too. But I will pray you remember therewithal whereabouts this juggler goeth that would, with bidding us look up here upon faith, juggle away one great point of faith from us, and make us take no heed of Christ's words plainly spoken here of the very<sup>52</sup> eating of his holy flesh. And therefore let us remember faith, as he biddeth. But let us remember well therewith specially this piece thereof that this juggler, with bidding us remember, would fain<sup>53</sup> have us forget.

For if our papists take eating and drinking here bodily as to eat the natural body of Christ under the form of bread, and to drink his blood under the form of wine, then must all young children that never came at God's board departed<sup>54</sup> and all laymen that never drank his blood be damned.<sup>55</sup>

If our Savior Christ, which is the way to truth, and the truth itself, and the very true life also,<sup>56</sup> could and would say false, and break his promise by which he promised his Church to be therewith himself unto the world's end,<sup>57</sup> and to send it also the Spirit of truth, that should teach it and lead it into all truth,<sup>58</sup> then would there of truth both of these words of Christ and these other words of his also, "But if<sup>59</sup> a man be born again of the water and the Holy Ghost, he cannot see the kingdom of God,"<sup>60</sup> and of many other words of his more, many great doubts arise, right hard and inexplicable. But now am I very sure, since truth cannot be but true, Christ's promise shall ever stand and be kept, and therefore shall his Church ever more, by the means of his Holy Spirit which maketh men of one manner and mind in the house of his Church,<sup>61</sup> so fall in a concord and agreement together upon the true sense, and so be led into every necessary truth, that by mistaking of any part of Scripture, it shall never be suffered<sup>62</sup> to fall into any damnable error, which thing, what prating soever Master Masker make, I have so often and so surely proved for the common-known Catholic Church of good and bad both, against William Tyndale,<sup>63</sup> that neither he nor all these heretics among them all shall never be able to void<sup>64</sup> it.

Now as for his argument concerning laymen of age, it were<sup>65</sup> a little more strong if the blessed body of our Lord were in the Blessed Sacrament under form of bread without his blood, which while it is not, nor their receiving is not the sacrifice nor oblation, which to the integrity thereof requireth both the forms — that the thing should agree with the figure, the figure, I say, of the bread and wine that was offered by Melchizedek<sup>66</sup> — Master Masker's argument is of a feeble force, of which thing, because I purpose once to touch, God willing, in answering to Doctor Barnes's treatise specially made of that matter,<sup>67</sup> I will hold here Master Masker for this time with no long tale thereof. But to the intent ye may shortly see how little wit<sup>68</sup> is in his wise argument, with which upon Christ's general words, "But if you eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood ye shall not have life in you," he argueth universally of all men and women and children that die and never eat his flesh or never drink his blood shall be damned by the selfsame form of arguing upon these general words, "But if a man be born of water and the Spirit, he shall never see the kingdom of God," Master Masker may argue generally that whoso die before he be baptized by water and the Spirit shall be damned, and thereupon conclude that many martyrs be damned for lack of baptizing in water, for all their baptizing in their own blood. And thus you see, good readers, how substantial his argument is.

THE THIRD CHAPTER

In the twelfth leaf, to prove that Christ meant nothing<sup>69</sup> to give his body to be eaten, Master Masker upon these words that the disciples which were offended with his words said, "This is a hard word; who may hear him?" bringeth in another wise argument under color<sup>70</sup> of expounding the text, in this wise: "These words did not only offend them that hated Christ, but also some of his disciples. They were offended, saith the text, and not marveled, as More triflith out of truth." These words, good reader, of "offending" and "marveling," I shall answer anon in a more convenient<sup>71</sup> place. "Which disciples said, 'This is a hard saying; who may hear him?' These disciples stuck no less in Christ's visible flesh, and in the bark<sup>72</sup> of his words, than doth now More, believing him to have spoken of his natural body to be eaten with their teeth."<sup>73</sup>

Here Master Masker maketh as though the Catholic faith in the Blessed Sacrament were but my faith. But likewise, as I do confess that his heresy is not only his, but that he hath fellows in the same falsehood — not only Frith and Tyndale, but Wycliffe<sup>74</sup> also and Zwingli and Friar Hussgen too, besides a lewd<sup>75</sup> sort of wretched heretics more — so must he confess, if he will say true, that my faith is not only my faith, but that I have fellows in the same faith, not only the common whole multitude of all good Christian countries this fifteen hundred year, but specially by name those holy saints whose words I have rehearsed you before upon this same matter, as Theophylactus, and Saint Bede, Saint Irenaeus, and Saint Hilary,<sup>76</sup> and Saint Augustine, Saint Cyril, and Saint Chrysostom, the plain words of every one of all, whom I have here already brought you forth against Master Masker, proving themselves fellows of mine in my faith already, now in this answer of this first part of his. And yet keep I for Master Masker matter enough besides of holy saints' authorities, as well the same saints as others, to fill up the messes<sup>77</sup> at the second course. And where he bringeth forth for him in his second part Augustine, Tertullian, and Saint Chrysostom (for in all this his first course, he bringeth forth never one), those three dishes, I warrant you, shall when I come to them but barely furnish his board.<sup>78</sup>

But where Master Masker saith that More sticketh in the visible flesh of Christ, to be eaten as those disciples and those Jews did, he is bold to say what him list<sup>79</sup> because he goeth invisible. For else<sup>80</sup> how could he for shame say that we that are of the Catholic Church think that Christ giveth us his visible flesh to eat, as those disciples and those Jews thought, when every man well wotteth<sup>81</sup> that those disciples and those Jews thought that they should receive his flesh visible cut out, as Saint Augustine declareth, in visible dead pieces, and every man as well knoweth, and Master Masker too, that we think that we do (and so indeed we do) receive and eat his flesh invisible, not in dead pieces, but his quick<sup>82</sup> blessed body whole, under the visible form of bread. And therefore you see, good readers, what truth is in this man.

But now goeth he forth and cometh to his wise worshipful<sup>83</sup> argument and saith:

Which offense Christ seeing, said, “Doth this offend you? What then will you say if you see the Son of Man ascend thither where he was before? If it offend you to eat my flesh while I am here, it shall much more offend you to eat it when it shall be gone out of your sight, ascended into heaven, there sitting on the right hand of my Father, until I come again as I went, that is, to judgment.”<sup>84</sup>

The exposition of these words of Christ I have, good readers, showed you before, according to the minds of holy doctors and saints: that by those words of his ascension he gave them warning before that he would by his ascending up to heaven make them a plain proof that they were deceived when they thought it could not be that he was descended down from heaven, and by his ascending up with his body whole and undiminished make them a plain proof that they were deceived, when they thought he would in pieces cut out, and so give his flesh to them as he should give it from himself, and thereby lose it himself. For his whole body ascending should well prove that though his apostles had every one eaten it, yet had he it still whole himself, that<sup>85</sup> they should thereby not doubt afterward, but that as each of them had it and did eat it, and yet himself had it still, and all at once in thirteen diverse places in earth, and himself ascended after whole therewith into heaven, so should ever after all good Christian folk receive it whole here in earth, and himself nevertheless have it whole still with him in heaven.

This being, good Christian readers, the mind<sup>86</sup> of our Savior in those words, as by the holy doctors and saints well doth appear of old, now cometh this new drunken doctor Master Masker, and with a wise exposition of his own brain, would make us ween that those words with which (as the old doctors testify) Christ confirmed the Sacrament, in declaring his power by which he worketh that wonderful miracle in the Sacrament, our Savior had himself spoken against his miracles in the Sacrament. For thus, lo, doth Master Masker make Christ expound his own words and say, “If it offend you to eat my flesh while I am here, it shall much more offend you to eat it when my body shall be gone out of your sight ascended into heaven, there sitting on the right hand of my Father until I come again as I went.”

There were, good readers, two causes for which those Jews and those disciples were offended at the hearing of Christ, when he said they should eat his flesh. One was the strangeness and the impossibility that they thought was therein; the other was the loathsomeness<sup>87</sup> that they had thereto. Now if Master Masker mean here for the impossibility by reason of the difference of his presence and his absence, I cannot see why they should be more offended after his ascension than before. For if it be possible for him to make his body to be in many diverse places at once in earth, then it is as possible for him to make it at once in those two diverse places, earth and heaven. For the marvel standeth not in the far distance of the two places asunder, but in the diversity of the two places having in them both one body, be they never so near together. And as for the difference of his presence here in earth and his absence hence by his ascension into heaven, Master Masker is more than mad to put that for a difference, as a cause after the ascension to make them more offended to hear of the eating of his body. For

if he make (as he can and doth) his body to be as well here in earth as in heaven, then is his body no more absent from hence than from thence as for the verity of his presence in the place, though it be more 5 absent in consideration to us that see not his body here, but in the form of bread. But the blessed angels see that one blessed body of his in heaven and here in the Blessed Sacrament both at once. And thus you see that Master Masker's argument hath 10 no pith or strength if he mean for impossibility.

Now if Master Masker here mean that after Christ's ascension into heaven, it should be a thing that should of reason more offend the Jews to eat his flesh than at the time while he was here, as a 15 thing that would be then a much more loathsome meat, what devil reason hath Master Masker to bear that mad mind<sup>88</sup> withal, and to think that his glorified flesh should be more loathsome to receive than if it were unglorified?

And yet either he meaneth thus, or else he lacketh the way to find the words with which he would express his mind. For these are the words that he maketh Christ to say: "If it offend you to eat my flesh while I am here, it shall much more offend you 25 to eat it when my body shall be gone out of your sight."<sup>89</sup> You see now that he saith it shall more offend you to eat it when it is gone out of your sight into heaven. Now if he had meant in the other manner for the impossibility, he would have said (except<sup>90</sup> he cannot speak) that it should more offend
30 them to hear it told them that they should then eat his flesh, when his flesh were so far absent from them, than to hear it told them that they should eat it while it were present with them, and not say it should then more offend them to eat it. For they
35 shall not be offended with the eating if they eat it not. And therefore, if he can tell how to speak and express his own mind, he meaneth here while he saith, "It shall more offend you to eat it," he meaneth, I say, that they should of reason think his flesh
40 then more loathly to eat after his glorious ascension than it was ere<sup>91</sup> he died. Thus it appeareth that Master Masker meant. And verily<sup>92</sup> if he so mean, he hath a mad meaning. And if he mean not so, then hath he a mad manner of speaking. And yet 45 besides that, his meaning is as mad that way as the other.

For as I have showed you, the thing is no more impossible to Christ to give them his body to eat after his ascension than before, and therefore is Master Masker a fool to say that it should more offend 50 them to hear that they should eat it after his ascension than before. For by their eating he should not lose it, but both men may have his body here in earth with them, and the angels may have it in 55 heaven with them, and himself may have it both in earth and in heaven with him, and all this at once.

Wherein, lest Master Masker might make some ween that I do as he saith I do, and as indeed Master Masker doth himself—that is to wit,<sup>93</sup> mock in this matter and lie—ye shall, good readers, hear what holy Saint Chrysostom saith:

Elijah left unto Elisha his mantle as a very great inheritance. And in very deed, a great inheritance it was, and more precious than any gold. And Elisha was a double Elijah, and there was then Elijah above and Elijah beneath. I know well that you think he was a just and a blessed man, and you would fain<sup>94</sup> each of you be in his case. What will you say then, if I show you a certain other
70 still with us, and yet in his ascension hath taken it with himself too. Let never therefore our hearts fall for fear, nor let us not lament and bewail, nor dread the difficulties of the troublous times. For he that neither hath refused to shed his blood for us all, and hath also, besides that, given unto us all his flesh to eat, and the same blood again to 75 drink, he will refuse nothing that may serve for our salvation.<sup>97</sup>

How say you now, good Christian readers? Doth not Saint Chrysostom with these words affirm you plainly the substance of that that<sup>98</sup> I say, and as plainly destroy all that Master Masker saith in his heretical exposition of these words of Christ, which he construeth so as he would thereby make a

For though Master Masker say they cannot stand together, but is utterly repugnant that his body should be here in earth before Doomsday,<sup>100</sup> because that until Doomsday it shall be still in heaven, yet saith Saint Chrysostom plainly that Master Masker in his exposition lieth. For he saith that Christ's blessed body is both in heaven and also in earth in the Blessed Sacrament indeed.

And therefore let Master Masker leave his jesting with me, and go jest and rail against Saint Chrysostom. For he confuteth you, Master Masker, you see well, a little more clearer than I. And then whether of them twain<sup>101</sup> ye shall believe and take for the more credible man, Master Masker or holy Saint Chrysostom, every man's own wit,<sup>102</sup> that any wit hath, will well serve him to see.

THE FOURTH CHAPTER

But Master Masker, to show you a further declaration of his wit, forthwith<sup>103</sup> upon his wise and worshipful<sup>104</sup> exposition of those words of Christ, he repeateth that fond<sup>105</sup> argument again that Christ meant not of eating his flesh in the Sacrament, because that if he had meant it, he could and would have declared his meaning more plainly. And in that matter thus Master Masker saith:

Here might Christ have instructed his disciples the truth of the eating of his flesh in form of bread, had this been his meaning. For he left them never in any perplexity or doubt, but sought all the ways by similitudes and familiar examples, to teach them plainly; he never spoke them so hard a parable, but where he perceived their feeble ignorance, anon<sup>106</sup> he helped them and declared it them. Yea, and sometimes he prevented<sup>107</sup> their asking with his own declaration. And think ye not that he did not so here? Yes, verily. For he came to teach us and not to leave us in any doubt and ignorance, especially the chief point of our salvation, which standeth in the belief in his death for our sins. Wherefore to put them out of all doubt as concerning this eating of his flesh and drinking of his blood that should give everlasting life, where they took it for his very body to be eaten with their teeth, he said, "It is the spirit that giveth this life. My flesh profiteth nothing at all to be eaten as ye mean so carnally; it is spiritual meat that I here speak of. It is my spirit that draweth the hearts of men to me by faith, and so refresheth them ghostly.<sup>108</sup> Ye be therefore carnal to think that I speak of my flesh to be eaten bodily. For so it profiteth you nothing at all. How long will you be without understanding? It is my spirit, I tell you, that giveth life. My flesh profiteth you nothing to eat it, but to believe that it shall be crucified and suffer for the redemption of the world, it profiteth. And when ye thus believe, then eat ye my flesh and drink my blood, that is, ye believe in me to suffer for your sins." The Verity hath spoken these words: "My flesh profiteth nothing at all"; it cannot therefore be false. For both the Jews and his disciples murmured and disputed of his flesh, how it should be eaten, and not of the offering thereof for our sins as Christ meant. This therefore is the sure anchor to hold us by, against all the objections of the papists, for the eating of Christ's body as they say in form of bread. Christ said, "My flesh profiteth nothing," meaning to eat it bodily. This is the key that solveth all their arguments and openeth the way to show us all their false and abominable blasphemous lies upon Christ's words, and uttereth their sleight<sup>109</sup> juggling over the bread to maintain Antichrist's kingdom therewith. And thus when Christ had declared it, and taught them that it was not the bodily eating of his material body, but the eating with the spirit of faith, he added, saying, "The words which I here speak unto you are spirit and life," that is to say, "This matter that I here have spoken of with so many words must be spiritually understood to give ye this life everlasting. Wherefore the cause why ye understand me not is that ye believe not." Here is, lo, the conclusion of all his sermon.<sup>110</sup>

Many a fond process<sup>111</sup> have I read, good Christian readers, but never read I neither a more foolish nor a more false than this is. For the effect and the

purpose of all this process is that Christ, in all his words spoken in this sixth chapter of Saint John, meant nothing of the eating of his blessed body in the Blessed Sacrament, but only of an allegorical eating of his body, by which he meant only that they should believe that he should be crucified and shed his blood and die for redemption of the world.

Now that our Savior, besides all such allegories and other spiritual understandings, plainly meant of the very eating of his blessed body in the Blessed Sacrament, you have, good readers, already seen, by so many holy doctors and saints, whose plain words I have rehearsed<sup>112</sup> you, that no man can doubt but that in the whole conclusion of his argument and his exposition Master Masker hath a shameful fall, except<sup>113</sup> any man doubt whether Master Masker be better to be believed alone, or those holy doctors among them all.

But now this false conclusion of his, how feebly and how foolishly he defendeth — that is even a very great pleasure to see.

In this process hath he two points. The first is that Christ could and would have made it open and plain in this place by clear and evident words, if he had meant of the eating of his flesh in the Sacrament. The second is that by these words, “It is the spirit that giveth life; my flesh profiteth nothing at all. The words that I have spoken to you be spirit and life,” Christ doth plain and clearly declare both that he meant not the eating of his flesh in the Sacrament, and also that he meant only the belief that he should die for the sin of the world.

Now touching his first foolish point, I have confuted it already, and showed you some examples where Christ could at some time have declared the matter much more openly than he did, and that in great matters of our faith.

For I think the sacrament of baptism is a principal point of our faith. And yet Christ taught not Nicodemus all that he could have told him therein, as I said before.

And longeth<sup>114</sup> it nothing to the faith to believe the remission of mortal sins? I suppose yes. And yet could Christ, if he had would,<sup>115</sup> have declared more clearly those words of his, “Whoso blasphemeth the Son of Man, it shall be forgiven him. But he that blasphemeth the Holy Ghost, it shall neither be forgiven him in this world nor in the world to come.”<sup>116</sup>

No good Christian man thinketh other but that it is a principal article of the Christian faith to believe that Christ is one equal God with his Father. And yet Christ (albeit that by all places set together, he hath declared it clear enough in conclusion to them that will not be willful and contentious) yet did he not in every place where he spoke thereof declare the matter so clearly as he could have done if he then had would, which appeareth by that that in some other places he declared it more clearly after. And yet in all the places of the Scripture set together, he hath not, nor would not, declare it in so plain words as he could have done. For then should there never have needed any of those comments that all the holy doctors have made upon it since. And surely so saith Luther and these other heretics that there needed none. For all the Scripture (they say) is open and plain enough. And therefore they put every man and woman unlearned in boldness and courage to be in the Scripture sufficiently their own masters themselves. But while they thus teach them, they forget that by their own teaching they should hold their peace themselves. And indeed so were it good they did, but if<sup>117</sup> they taught better.

And thus for his first point, you see, good readers, that Master Masker maketh men perceive him for a double fool when it was not enough for him to come forth with this folly once, but he must, a<sup>118</sup> God’s name, bring in this his one folly twice.

THE FIFTH CHAPTER

Now as touching his second point, in that it is a world<sup>119</sup> to see how strongly the man handleth it. For whereas Christ hath, by so many open plain words before, taught and declared that he would give his own flesh to be eaten, and his own blood to be drunken, and so often repeated it, and in such effectual wise<sup>120</sup> inculcated it, and, as who should say,<sup>121</sup> beat it into their heads, that (saving<sup>122</sup> for the form and manner of the eating, which he declared by his word and his deed at his Holy Maundy) else<sup>123</sup> as for to make men sure that verily eat it and drink it they should, there could never more clear words have been of any man desired, nor by Master Masker himself devised, now cometh Master Masker forth with certain words of Christ, by which he saith that Christ clearly declareth that he meant clear the 5 contrary—that is to wit, that his flesh should not be eaten—and also that by this word “eating” of his flesh, he meant nothing else but the belief of his death for men’s sins.

Now the words of our Savior that (as Master Masker saith) prove these two things are these: “It is the spirit that giveth life; my flesh profiteth nothing at all. The words that I have spoken to you be spirit and life.”

These words have, good readers, in themselves 15 neither anything in disproof of the very eating of his flesh, nor for the proof that he meant the belief of his death. For these words, as Saint Augustine declareth, speak not precisely against the eating of his flesh, as he meant to give it them with 20 the spirit and the life therein, but against the eating of his flesh alone, dead and cut out in gobbets, as they conceived a false opinion that he meant to make them eat it. And as I have showed you before, Saint Cyril expoundeth these words after the same
25 manner, and other holy doctors too. And now if ye read again Master Masker’s words here, ye shall find that all that seemeth to prove his purpose is only the words of himself, and nothing the words of Christ, but himself expounding Christ’s words in such wise 30 that (as I have showed you) Saint Augustine and Saint Cyril and other holy doctors, expound it clear against him.

If his own argument were aught<sup>124</sup> worth, that he layeth against the interpretation of all that expound 35 those words of Christ to be spoken of the very eating, by which we eat his blessed body in the Sacrament, it would make against<sup>125</sup> no man so sore<sup>126</sup> as against himself even here in this place.

For if it be true that he saith—that if Christ had 40 meant of the eating of his flesh in the Sacrament, he might and would have in this place told it them plainly, and because he told them not that point out plainly, therefore it is clear that he meant it not—then say I that since in these words, which Master 45 Masker saith is the very anchor-hold, Christ doth not so plainly declare that he meaneth by the eating of his flesh the belief that he should die for our sins, as he could if he had would,<sup>127</sup> and would, as Master Masker saith, if he had so meant. This is therefore 50 a plain proof by Master Masker’s argument against Master Masker’s mind<sup>128</sup> that our Savior meant not so, and then is all Master Masker’s matter gone.

Now that our Savior doth not here declare that point clearly, that he meant nothing but that they should believe that he should die for them, I will 55 have Master Masker’s own words to bear me record, which will, I ween, make Master Masker somewhat wroth<sup>129</sup> with himself, for writing them in himself so foolishly against himself.

For where he saith that both the Jews and the dis-60 ciples murmured and disputed of his flesh, how it should be eaten, and not of the offering thereof for our sins, this declareth and witnesseth well for our part against his own: that our Savior declared more plainly his mind for the eating of his flesh than 65 for the offering thereof to the death for our sins. And of very truth so he did indeed, though Master Masker say “nay” a hundred times. For of the eating of his flesh, as I have before said, he spoke very precisely, and plainly, and often, and of his offering 70 up upon the cross he never spoke plainly so much as one word.

For as for these words which Master Masker calleth the anchor-hold, “It is the spirit that giveth 75 this life; my flesh profiteth nothing at all,” hath not one plain word for his purpose at all. For all the uttermost that he could take of these words were no more but that Christ should tell them that the spirit is the thing that giveth his flesh the life, without 80 which of itself it could not profit them at all, and therefore the words that he spoke were spirit and life, and to be understood spiritually—that they should eat his flesh with his spirit), and not carnally (that they should eat his flesh alone without 85 his spirit, cut out in dead pieces of flesh, as they had conceived a fond opinion thereof—out of which he said all this to bring them, but yet not so much as he could have said and he had would,<sup>130</sup> nor would not because of their unworthiness to hear it, and yet that they should eat his flesh he told them clear 90 enough.

But as I say, what one word is there in all these words of his anchor-hold, whereby Master Masker may take one handful hold that Christ here showed

124 of any 125 make against: be unfavorable to 126 severely; harshly 127 wished 128 opinion 129 angry 130 and he had would: if he had wished them so clearly that he meant the offering of himself for our sins? He speaketh in all these words not one word of offering, nor of crucifying, nor of death. And by Master Masker's own argument, if he 5 had meant that way, as he well could, so he would also have told them plainly thus: "Sirs, I mean not that you shall eat my flesh, but that you shall believe that I shall die for your sins." And since he said not thus, Master Masker's own argument hath cut off

 10 his cable-rope, and lost his anchor, and run his ship himself against a rock. For he saith that if he had meant it, he would have told them plain the tale to put them out of all doubt.

And here you see now, good readers, by more means than one, as well by the expositions of old holy doctors and saints, as by the wise argument of Master Masker himself, to what wise worshipful 15 end this rial<sup>131</sup> brag of his is come to pass, in which he triumpheth over the Catholic Church and the Blessed Sacrament, where he boasteth thus:

This therefore is the sure anchor to hold us by, against all the objections of the papists, for the eating of Christ's body, as they say, in form of bread. Christ said, "My flesh profiteth nothing," 25 meaning to eat it bodily. This is the key that solveth all their arguments and openeth the way to show us all their false and abominable, blasphemous lies upon Christ's words, and uttereth their sleight<sup>132</sup> juggling over the bread to maintain 30 Antichrist's kingdom therewith. And thus when Christ had declared it, and taught them that it was not the bodily eating of his material body but the eating with the spirit of faith, he added, saying, "The words which I here speak unto you are spirit and life," that is to say, "This matter that I here have spoken of with so many words must be spiritually understood to give ye this life everlasting. Wherefore the cause why ye understand me not is that ye believe me not." Here is, lo, the conclusion of all his sermon.<sup>133</sup>

Since yourselves have seen, good readers, that in this matter and in this whole exposition, there are against Master Masker not only the Catholic Church of our time, but also all the old holy doctors and saints, which with one voice expound these words of Christ to be spoken and meant of that eating of Christ's flesh, by which it is eaten in the Blessed Sacrament, against which point Master Masker here rageth in this his furious boast, railing upon them all that so teach or believe, under his spiteful name of papists, I would wit<sup>134</sup> of Master Masker whether Saint Bede, Saint Augustine, and Saint Ambrose, Saint Irenaeus, and Saint Hilary, Theophylactus, Saint Cyril, and Saint Chrysostom, were all papists or not? If he answer yea, and say they were, then shall he make no man (that wise is) ashamed of the name of papists (as odious as he would make it), if he grant us that such good godly men, and such holy doctors and saints were papists.

Now if he answer me "nay," and say that they were no papists, then he maketh it plain and open unto you, good readers, that he playeth but the part of a foolish railer and a jester, and doth but deceive and mock all his own fraternity, when by railing against papists, whom he would have taken for folk of a false faith, he dissembleth the truth that his heresy is not only damned by them that he calleth papists, but by them also whom he confesseth for no papists, and whom he cannot but confess for old holy doctors and saints, nor cannot so blind you, but that you plainly perceive by their own words, which I have rehearsed you, and yet shall hereafter more plainly perceive by more holy doctors and saints of the same sort, and by more plain words also of the same, that they do all with one voice expound these words of Christ mentioned in the sixth chapter of Saint John to be spoken and meant of that eating of his flesh, by which we eat it in the Blessed Sacrament.

And thus have I, good readers, answered you all Master Masker's arguments, by which he reproveth in general, under the name of papists, all those—that is to wit, all the old holy doctors and saints—that contrary to his heresy expound the said words of Christ to be meant of the very eating of his flesh, and not only of the believing of his death for our sin. And now will I come to his subtle disputations, that he maketh against me by name in special to soil<sup>135</sup> such things as I in my letter wrote against John Frith.

THE FOURTH BOOK

In the sixth leaf, thus he saith:

Here maketh Master More this argument against the young man. Because the Jews marveled at this saying, “My flesh is very meat<sup>1</sup> and my blood drink,” and not at this, “I am the door and the very vine,”<sup>2</sup> therefore this text, saith he, “my flesh,” etc. must be understood after<sup>3</sup> the literal sense—that is to wit, even as the carnal Jews understood it, murmuring at it, being offended, going their ways from Christ for their so carnal understanding thereof—and the other texts, “I am the door,” etc. must be understood in an allegory and a spiritual sense, because his hearers marveled nothing at the manner of speech.<sup>4</sup>

I have, good readers, before this argument that he speaketh of, another argument in that epistle of mine against Frith, which although it went before and was read before this, yet because it would not well be soiled,<sup>5</sup> Master Masker was content to dissemble it. But I shall afterward anon<sup>6</sup> lay it afore him again, and set him to it with a fescue,<sup>7</sup> that<sup>8</sup> he shall not say but he saw it.

But now as for this argument of mine, that he maketh the first, I misfortuned to make so feeble that he taketh even a pleasure to play with it, and therefore he soileth it and soileth it again, and that full wisely ye may be fast<sup>9</sup> and sure, and so shall you say yourself when you see all. But yet though he win himself worship<sup>10</sup> in the soiling, it was no great wisdom to lose his worship in the rehearsing, with false bearing in hand<sup>11</sup> that I say that those words of Christ must be understood after that literal sense that the carnal Jews took therein that murmured and went their way therefore. For they took that of his flesh to be eaten in the selfsame fleshly form and, as holy Saint Augustine saith, that they should have eaten his flesh dead, without life or spirit, as beef or mutton is cut out in butchers’ shops. And I am very sure that Master Masker hath no such word in my letter, whereof he may take hold to say that I say that Christ’s words should be taken so. But this is no new fashion of these folks, to rehearse<sup>12</sup> other men’s arguments in such manner as themselves list<sup>13</sup> to make them, and then they make them such as themselves may most easily soil them, which while Master Masker hath done with mine, yet hath he little advantage thereby. But to the intent that all things shall be the more open before your eyes, I shall rehearse you first the thing that he would be content you saw not: that is to wit, mine own words as I wrote them, which he rehearseth as<sup>14</sup> himself maketh them new.

These were, good reader, my words:

And over<sup>15</sup> this the very circumstances of the places in the Gospel, in which our Savior speaketh of that Sacrament, may well make open the difference of his speech in this matter and of all those others, and that as he spoke all those but in an allegory so spoke he this, plainly meaning that he spoke of his very body and his very blood, besides all allegories. For neither when our Lord said he was a very<sup>16</sup> vine, nor when he said he was the door, there was none that heard him that anything<sup>17</sup> marveled thereof. And why? For because they perceived well that he meant not that he was a material vine indeed, nor a material door neither. But when he said that his flesh was very meat, and his blood was very drink, and that they should not have life in them but if<sup>18</sup> they did eat his flesh and drink his blood, then were they almost all in such a wonder thereof that they could not abide. And wherefore?<sup>19</sup> But because they perceived well by his words and his manner of circumstances used in the speaking of them, that Christ spoke of his very flesh and his very blood indeed. For else<sup>20</sup> the strangeness of the words would have made them to have taken it as well for an allegory as either his words of the vine or of the door. And then would they have no more marveled at the one than they did at the other. But now whereas at the vine and the door they marveled nothing,<sup>21</sup> yet at the eating of his flesh and drinking of his blood, they so sore<sup>22</sup> marveled, and were so sore moved, and thought the matter so hard, and the wonder so great, that they asked how could that be, and went almost all their way, whereby we may well see that he spoke these words in such wise<sup>23</sup> as the hearers perceived that he meant it not in a parable nor an allegory, but spoke of his very flesh and his very blood indeed.<sup>24</sup>

Lo, good readers, here I speak of Christ's very flesh and his very blood, as the truth is indeed. But here I say not, as Master Masker saith I say, that Christ meant of his flesh and his blood, in such wise as the Jews thought that forsook him therefor,<sup>25</sup> which<sup>26</sup> thought, as you have heard, that they should eat his flesh in the self<sup>27</sup> fleshly form, and also piecemeal in loathly<sup>28</sup> dead gobbets, without either life or spirit.

And now that you have seen his truth in rehearsing, you shall see a show of his sharp subtle wit in the soiling, wherein first, after his juggling fashion, to carry the reader with wondering from marking well the matter, thus he beginneth with a great gravity, giving all the world warning to beware of me:

Lo, Christian reader, here hast thou not a taste but a great ton<sup>29</sup> full of More's mischief and pernicious perverting of God's Holy Word. And as thou seest him here falsely and pestilently destroy the pure sense of God's Word, so doth he in all other places of his books.<sup>30</sup>

Lo, good readers, now have you a great high tragical warning, with not a little taste but a great ton full at once, of my mischievous pernicious false pestilent perverting and destroying of the pure sense of God's holy words in this one place, which he will shall stand for a plain proof that I do the same in all other places.

Now good readers, albeit that<sup>31</sup> it might mishap me by oversight to mishandle this one place, and yet in some other to write well enough, yet am I content to take the condition at Master Masker's hand that if mine handling of this one place be such a heinous handling as maketh it such a pernicious pestilent, not only perversion, but also destruction of the pure sense of God's Holy Word, never make examination of any other word of mine further. For I then forthwith<sup>32</sup> confess even here that I have in all other places written wrong every whit.<sup>33</sup> But now on the other side, though you should hap to find that in this place, I have somewhat overseen myself<sup>34</sup> in mistaking of some one word for another, without the effect of the matter changed, then will I require<sup>35</sup> you to take my fault for no greater than it is indeed, nor mistrust all my writing for that one word in this one place mistaken, without the impairing of the matter. For such a manner<sup>36</sup> mistaking of a word is not the destroying of the pure sense of God's Holy Word. And therefore if you find my fault, good readers, no further than such, ye will, I doubt not of your equity, bid Master Masker leave his iniquity, and change his high tragical terms, and turn his great ton full of pernicious pestilent false perverting poison into a little taste of wholesome enough, though somewhat small and rough Rochelle<sup>37</sup> wine. And therefore let us now see wherein he layeth this great high heap of mischievous perverting. Lo, thus good readers, he saith:

First, where More saith they marveled at Christ's saying, "My flesh is very meat, etc.," that is not so. Neither is there any such word in the text, except<sup>38</sup> More will expound murmurabant id est mirabantur, "they murmured," that is to say, "they marveled," as he expoundeth oportet, id est expedit et convenit, "he must die," or "it behooveth<sup>39</sup> him to die," that is to say, "it was expedient and of good congruence<sup>40</sup> that he should die, etc." This poet may make a man to signify an ass, and black white, to blear the simple eyes.<sup>41</sup>

Now good readers, I wot<sup>42</sup> well that you consider that the cause wherefore I spoke of the marveling that they had, which heard Christ speak of the eating of his flesh, was because that none of those that heard him at other times call himself a vine or a door marveled anything thereat, so that by the great difference of the behavior of the hearers, it might well appear that there was great difference in the speaking, and that the other two were well perceived to be spoken only by way of allegory, and the third to be spoken of his very flesh indeed, whereas

Frith held opinion that this was none otherwise spoken, but only by way of an allegory as the other twain<sup>43</sup> were.

Now good readers, if you read my words again, and in every place of them where I write, “they marveled,” it would like<sup>44</sup> you to put out that word, “they marveled,” and set in this word, “they murmured,” in the stead thereof, ye shall find no change made in the matter by that change made in the words. But you shall see mine argument shall stand as strong with that word, “they murmured,” as with this word, “they marveled.” For when, at the hearing of Christ’s words speaking of the eating of his flesh, the Evangelist showeth that many of the hearers murmured, and neither at the calling of himself a vine, nor at the calling of himself a door, none of his hearers murmured for that manner of speaking, it appeareth as well the difference in Christ’s speaking, by the difference of diverse his hearers at the one word “murmuring,” and at the other two “not murmuring,” as at the one “marveling,” and at the other two “not marveling.”

Lo, thus you see, good readers, that in this matter in which Master Masker maketh his great outcry upon me for changing of this word “murmuring” into this word “marveling,” since there is no change in the matter by the change of the word, but mine argument as strong with the one word as with the other, I neither have done it of any fraud for advantage of mine own part in the matter, nor yet since the change is but in the word without change of the matter, I have not thereby perniciously and pestilently by the whole ton full of falsehood at once perverted and destroyed the pure sense of God’s Holy Word. But it appeareth well, on the other side, that Master Masker hath given us here, I will not be so sore<sup>45</sup> to say a ton full, but at the leastwise, a little pretty<sup>46</sup> taste of his little pretty falsehood, with which a little he prettily believeth me.

THE SECOND CHAPTER

But yet shall you now see his wit<sup>47</sup> and his truth both a little better tried, even upon this same place, in which with his huge exclamations he maketh his part so plain.

As for oportet of which he speaketh here, we shall talk of after in another place. But now, touching this word “they marveled,” Master Masker saith thus: “That is not so, nor there is no such word in the text.”<sup>48</sup> So you see, good readers, that he saith two things. One, that it is not so, and another that there is no such word there in the text. As for the word, good reader, I will not greatly strive with him. But where he saith it is not so, and therein affirmeth that they marveled not, I think the words of the text will well maintain my saying. For, good reader, when they said, “How can he give us his flesh to eat?” and when they said, “This word is hard and who can hear it?” do not these words prove that they marveled and thought it strange when they called it so hard that no man might abide to hear it and asked how he could do it, because they thought it impossible?

Now you see, good readers, that the Gospel saith the selfsame thing that I say, though it say not the selfsame word, and therefore lieth Master Masker in saying it is not so.

But by this wise way of Master Masker, if I had written that Absalom was angry with Ammon his brother for violating his sister Tamar,<sup>49</sup> Master Masker would say, “Lo, good reader, here thou hast not a taste but a ton<sup>50</sup> full of More’s pernicious perverting of God’s Holy Word, and as thou seest him here falsely and pestilently destroy the pure sense of God’s Word, so doth he in all other places of his works. For where he saith that Absalom was angry with Ammon, it is not so, neither is there any such word in the text, except<sup>51</sup> More will expound oderat eum, id est irascebatur ei, ‘he hated him,’ that is to say, ‘he was angry with him,’ as he expoundeth murmurabant id est mirabantur, ‘they murmured,’ that is to say, ‘they marveled.’ And thus may this poet make a man to signify an ass. For the Bible saith not as More saith, that Absalom was angry with Ammon. For the text saith no more, but that Absalom hated Ammon and caused him to be killed.”<sup>52</sup>

How like you now, good readers, this wise solution of Master Masker? This proveth not him a poet that can make a man signify an ass, but proveth him rather instead of a poet, and instead of a man, a very stark ass indeed.

THE THIRD CHAPTER

But of very truth, good reader, not without a good cause and a great, I did rather touch the thing that was the cause of the Jews' murmur and their dissension when they disputed upon the mat-5 ter than I did their murmur and their dissension.
 For of truth, where he said of himself that he was a door, there grew dissension among his hearers upon that word of his, and upon other words that he 10 spoke therewith at the same time, so that the Gospel saith, "And there was dissension among the Jews upon these words, some saying that the devil was in him and some saying nay, and that the devil was not wont<sup>53</sup> to make blind men see,"<sup>54</sup> as there was here 15 dissension and disputing upon these words of eating of his flesh. But in the tenth chapter, they nothing<sup>55</sup> marveled of his calling himself a door, for he expounded the parable at length so that they perceived well that he called himself a door, but only 20 by way of an allegory. And therefore of calling himself a door they marveled not of that word when he declared it, for they perceived it for a parable. But they disputed upon that word and upon his other words also, wherein he said that no man could kill 25 him against his will, and that he would die for his sheep, and that he had power to put away his soul and take it again.<sup>56</sup> Of these things they disputed and thought them strange and marvelous too, but not for the words or the manner of speaking, but 30 for the very matter. For all they understood the words meetly<sup>57</sup> well, but many of them believed them not. But not one of them did so take that word, "I am a door," as that they marveled how that could be. And therefore none of them for any such 35 marvel said there, "How can he be door?" as these Jews said here, "How can he give us his flesh to eat?"
 And therefore, as I say, therein appeareth well that our Savior in the one place called himself a door, by way of a parable, and in the other spoke of the eat-40 ing of his own very<sup>58</sup> flesh itself, besides all parables, which well appeared, I say, by his audience. For the one word they perceived for a parable, and therefore none of them marveled of the manner of the speaking of that word, though they marveled and 45 murmured and disputed at the thing that the parable meant. But in the other place, many marveled at the thing by the selfsame name that he gave thereto, saying, "How can he give us his flesh to eat?" whereby it well appeareth that they perceived that he spoke of very eating of his flesh indeed, and 50 in the other place appeareth not that they thought he meant that he was a very door indeed, but the contrary plain appeareth. For Christ by his plain and open exposition of that parable delivered them clean from all occasion of thinking that he meant 55 himself to be a very door indeed. But in these words of eating of his flesh, because he would give his very flesh to be eaten in very deed, therefore he more and more told them still the same, and also told them himself was God, and therefore able to do it, and 60 over<sup>59</sup> that gave them warning that they should not eat it in dead gobbets, but should eat it quick<sup>60</sup> with spirit and life. For his words were spirit and life.

 For his flesh should else<sup>61</sup> avail nothing. And that though his body should be eaten by many sundry 65 men in many sundry places, yet should it nevertheless be also still whole and sound, wheresoever he would<sup>62</sup> besides, which he declared by his ascension with his body perfect into heaven, notwithstanding that it should be before that eaten of many men in 70 earth.

And thus have I, good readers, as for this solution of Master Masker, made open and plain unto you his falsehood and his folly both, and made it clear, for all his high pernicious pestilent words, both that 75 I have handled this place of the Scripture right, and also taken rather the sentence<sup>63</sup> than the word. And I have also, by occasion of his wise solution, caused you to perceive that in mine argument was and is more pith and more strength than peradventure<sup>64</sup> 80 every man perceived before. And therefore thus much worship<sup>65</sup> hath he won by this his first solemn solution.

THE FOURTH CHAPTER

But in his second solution, he specially showeth 85 his deep insight and cunning,<sup>66</sup> and mine oversight too shamefully. For therein, lo, thus he saith:

But yet for his lordly pleasure, let us grant him that "they murmured" is as much to say as "they marveled,” because perchance the one may follow at the other. And then do I ask him whether Christ’s disciples and his apostles heard him not and understood him not, when he said, “I am the door and the vine,” and when he said, “My flesh,” etc. If he say no or nay, the Scripture is plain against him (John 6, 10, and 15).<sup>67</sup> If he say yea or yes, then yet do I ask him whether his disciples and apostles, thus hearing and understanding his words in all these three chapters, wondered and marveled as Master More saith, or murmured, as hath the text, at their master’s speech. What think ye More must answer here? Here may you see whether this old holy upholder of the pope’s Church is brought, even to be taken in his own trap. For the disciples and his apostles neither murmured nor marveled, nor yet were not offended with their master Christ’s words and manner of speech.<sup>68</sup>

And first, for a way to come thereto, he saith he will grant me, for my lordly pleasure, that “they murmured” is as much to say as “they marveled,” in which granting, he doth me no great lordly pleasure. For I have, as you have heard well, proved him already that I need not his granting therein. But verily in the cause that he addeth thereto, when he saith because perchance the one may follow at the other, therein he doth me a very great lordly pleasure. For it is even a pleasure for a lord and for a king too to see him play so far the fool as without necessity to write in that word himself, which helpeth mine argument against himself, and maketh all his wondering that he hath in his first solution upon me fall in his own neck. For if their murmuring followed upon their marveling, as himself here saith that peradventure it did, then playeth he first peradventure the fool, to make such an outcry upon me for saying that they marveled, where the text saith they murmured, as though I with that word utterly destroyed the pure sense of God’s Holy Word. For that word doth not so pestilently pervert the sense, if it may stand with the sentence, as it may indeed, if Master Masker say true that peradventure the one may follow upon the other — that is to wit,<sup>69</sup> the murmuring upon the marveling, for so he meaneth thereby. For as mad as he is, he is not, I think, so mad yet as to mean that the marveling followed upon the murmuring. For they marveled first and murmured after. And now since this one word of his therefore overthroweth all his wondering that he hath made on me, and proveth himself willingly and wittingly<sup>70</sup> in all his high tragical exclamation against his own conscience, and his own very knowledge to belie<sup>71</sup> me, he hath therein, as I say, done me a very special pleasure, to see him so far play the fool as to bring forth that word himself, specially where there was no need at all, but even for a garnish of his induction, with a show of his cunning, to make men know that he had not so little learning, but that he wist<sup>72</sup> well enough himself that he had shamefully belied me in all that ever he had cried out against me, concerning any misconstruing of that place of Holy Scripture.

THE FIFTH CHAPTER

Now after this his double folly well and wisely put forth at once, he bringeth me to mine opposition. And therein he handleth me so hardly that I cannot escape, which way so ever I take, whether I say that Christ’s disciples and apostles heard and understood their master’s words in all the three places, or that I say that in any one of those three places they understood him not. For here to be sure, to hold me in on both sides that I escape not, he showeth what danger I fall in, which way so ever I take. For he saith that, on the one side, I deny the Gospel if I answer no or nay, and on the other side, I am taken in mine own trap if I say yea or yes.

And surely here he playeth the wisest point, and the most for his own surety<sup>73</sup> that I saw him play yet. For ye shall understand that in the first part of my Confutation in the third book, the 180th side, forasmuch as<sup>74</sup> Tyndale hath been so long out of England that he could not tell how to use these English adverbs, nay and no, yea and yes, I gave him a rule and a certain examples of the rule, whereby he might learn where he should answer nay and where no, and where yea and where yes.<sup>75</sup>

Now Master Masker when he wrote his book, neither having my book by him, nor the rule by heart, thought he would be sure that I should find no such fault in him, and therefore on the one side for the answer, assigneth yea and yes both, and on the other side both nay and no, leaving the choice to myself, which he durst<sup>76</sup> not well take upon him, lest he might show therein such congruity<sup>77</sup> in the English tongue as he showeth in some other things wherein he speaketh English as congrue as a man might that had learned his English in another land.

But now must I answer him to his subtle questions. His first question is this.

He asketh me whether Christ's disciples and his apostles heard him not and understood him not, when he said, "I am the door," and when he said, "I am the vine," and when he said, "My flesh is verily meat,"<sup>78</sup> etc.

Master Masker is so wily that I must needs take better heed what I answer him than I should need if I were to answer a good plain man of the country. For Master Masker in the twenty-ninth leaf boasteth himself of his cunning<sup>79</sup> rially<sup>80</sup> and saith, "It is verily the thing that I desire even to be written against in this matter. For I have the solutions of all their objections ready."<sup>81</sup>

Now since therefore this man is so cunning, and hath his answers so ready for all objections that men may lay to him, he cannot be by likelihood but wonderful sure and ready, with subtle replications<sup>82</sup> against all answers that men may make to those oppositions that he deviseth against other men himself. I will therefore be as ware<sup>83</sup> of him as I can. And first I say that his question is captious.<sup>84</sup> For he asketh one answer to three things at once, and in each of the three he asketh me two questions at once. For he asketh of the door, and the vine, and of his flesh, all three at once. And yet of each of these not a double question, as I told you, but a quadruple question at once. For he asketh both of his apostles and the disciples, and not only whether all these heard Christ at all three times, but also whether all these understood him. And all twelve questions Master Masker wilily, to beguile such a simple soul as I am, asketh in one question at once. And therefore, lest he betrap me, I shall somewhat at the leastwise divide them.

And then I say to the first question—whether Christ's disciples and apostles heard him not and understood him not, when he said, "I am the door"—because the question is yet double and captious, I purpose to make sure work and answer that I cannot tell; I think that some did and some did not, for some of them I ween<sup>85</sup> were not there.

Now if he say that he meaneth only them that were there, so would I too have taken him, if he were a good plain soul, and not such a subtle sophister that longeth to be arguing, and hath all things so ready upon his fingers' ends.

But go to now,<sup>86</sup> though I could yet have other answers for him if I would, yet for his lordly pleasure, I shall be content to grant him that they both heard him and understood him, wherein I grant him more yet, I promise you, than he can precisely bind me to by the text. All this granting for this place giveth him no ground yet. For here I am well content, not only to say all that he saith, that is, that his apostles and his disciples understood that Christ calleth himself the door but by<sup>87</sup> a parable, and therefore marveled not at that manner of speaking. But I say more too, that so did also the Jews that reprov'd him and repugned<sup>88</sup> against him, and say also that they repugned so much the more against him, and so much the more murmured and disputed against the matter, in how much they more understood the manner of the speaking, and that it was but a parable. For they wist well that word of the door was spoken by a parable, for Christ plainly expounded it. But they murmured much at that, that no man might well come in but by him.

Let us now to the second then. And where he asketh me whether Christ's disciples and his apostles heard him not and understood him not, when he said, "I am the very vine," here I would for mine own surety ask him whether he mean by Christ's disciples and apostles some of both sorts, or else those disciples only that were both disciples and apostles. Howbeit,<sup>89</sup> if I should ask him thus, he would say I did but trifle, and that every man may well wit<sup>90</sup> by the putting of his question that he meaneth of either sort some. For else<sup>91</sup> he would have said no more but apostles, which had been enough if he had meant but them. And also it were against his purpose, if Christ's other disciples understood him not, though his apostles did. Well I am content then to take it so. And then unto the question whether his disciples and apostles heard not Christ and understood him not, when he said, "I am the very vine," to this question copulative,<sup>92</sup> I answer no.

But then Master Masker replieth that the Scripture is plain against me. But unto that replication I say nay. For I say that the Scripture there, with Saint Mark and Saint Luke set unto it,<sup>93</sup> proveth mine answer true. For it appeareth well among them three that, besides the apostles, none of his other disciples understood him, for none of his other disciples heard him, for none of his other disciples were there, nor yet all his twelve apostles neither, for Judas was gone before, so that in this part of his first question, Master Masker hath given himself a fall in the subtle proponing<sup>94</sup> of his question. As to the understanding, I agree that they that were there understood him, which maketh nothing against me.

Now to the third place when he asketh me whether Christ's disciples and his apostles heard him not and understood him not, when he said, "My flesh is very meat," etc. First as for his disciples, I say no, not all. Then saith Master Masker that if I say nay or no, the Scripture is plain against me (John 6). But to that say I again that when I say no, the Scripture is even there with me. For as the Gospel there plainly telleth, many of his disciples, though they heard him well, did understand him amiss. For though they understood him right, in that they perceived that he spoke of the very eating of his very flesh, yet they understood him wrong, in that they took him that they should eat it in the self<sup>95</sup> fleshly form and in dead pieces without life or spirit, and therefore they went their way from him and left him, and walked no more after with him. Here hath Master Masker another fall in this place too, touching his first question as for the disciples.

But what say we then for the apostles? Did not they understand him? What if I here would say nay? Then except<sup>96</sup> Master Masker could prove yes, else is not only his first question gone, which he maketh for a way to the second, but his second question is clearly gone too, wherewith he would make me be taken in mine own trap. And therefore first for argument sake, I deny that the apostles themselves understood Christ's word. How will now Master Masker prove me that they did? Marry,<sup>97</sup> saith he, for they were well acquainted with such phrases. And answered their master Christ when he asked them, "Will you go hence from me too?" "Lord," said they, "to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of everlasting life, and we believe that thou art Christ, the Son of the living God."<sup>98</sup>

Now good reader, I think there be some texts in Scripture that Master Masker understandeth not no more than other poor men. But yet if he will not agree that, but say that he understandeth them all, yet if we would put the case that there were some such one text, he would, I think, admit the case for possible. Let us then put him hardly none other, but even the same words of Christ that we be now in hand withal.<sup>99</sup> For no man understandeth any word worse than he understandeth those, even yet while he writeth on them. If himself had been then of that flock, and had seen all other things in Christ that his apostles saw, and had believed in him, and had not mistrusted Christ, but been ready to do what he would bid him do, and believe what he would bid him believe, but had yet as for those words of eating Christ's flesh thought them hard to perceive what Christ meant by them, but though he fully understood them not as he thought, yet he doubted not but that good they were that God spoke, and that Christ, if he tarried<sup>100</sup> his time, would tell him further of the matter at more leisure, if now when others went their way, Christ would have said unto him, "Wilt thou, Master Masker, go thy way from me too?" Whether would<sup>101</sup> then Master Masker have letted<sup>102</sup> to say even the selfsame words that the apostles said with others like, "Whither should I go from the good Lord? Thou hast the words of everlasting life, and I believe and know that thou art Christ, the Son of the living God, and art able to do what thou wilt, and thy words be holy and godly, whether I understand them or no, and thou mayst make me perceive them better at thy further pleasure." Would Master Masker have been contented to say thus, or else would he have said, "Nay, by my faith, good Lord, thou shalt tell me this tale a little more plainly that I may better perceive it by and by,<sup>103</sup> or else will

I go to the devil with yonder good fellows, and let them dwell with thee that will?”

Now if Master Masker would (as I ween<sup>104</sup> he would but if<sup>105</sup> he were stark mad) have said the same himself that Saint Peter said, or be content at the least that Saint Peter should say it for him, though himself had not well and clearly perceived what Christ meant by those words, how can he now prove by the same words of theirs that the apostles understood his words then?

Thus you see, good readers, that of his two questions, the first have I so answered that it is come to nothing (if I would stick with him still at his answer) till he have better proved me than he hath yet that the apostles in the sixth chapter of Saint John did understand Christ’s words. And now therefore till he have better handled his first question, he can against me never use his second, whereby he boasteth that I could make none answer, but such as should take myself in mine own trap, from which, since I am clean<sup>106</sup> escaped already by the answering of his first question, you may, good readers, see that Master Masker goeth as wily to work to take me as a man might send a child about with salt in his hand, and bid him go catch a bird, by laying a little salt on her tail, and when the bird is flown, comfort him then to go catch another, and tell him he had caught it and it had tarried a little.

THE SIXTH CHAPTER

But yet to see now how craftily he could betrap me if I would let him alone, let us grant him, for his lordly pleasure, that the disciples and apostles understood Christ’s words well in all three places, not only when he said he was the door, and when he said he was the vine, but also when he said, “My flesh is verily meat.”<sup>107</sup> What now? “Marry then,” saith Master Masker,

If More answer yea or yes, then do I ask him further, whether Christ’s disciples and apostles, thus hearing and understanding his words in all the three chapters, wondered and marveled (as More saith) or murmured (as hath the text) at their master’s speech. What think you More must answer here? Here may you see whether this old holy upholder of the pope’s Church is brought even to be taken in his own trap. For the disciples and his apostles neither murmured nor marveled, nor yet were not offended with this their master Christ’s words and manner of speaking.<sup>108</sup>

In what trap of mine own, or his either, hath Master Masker caught me here? Mine argument was, ye wot<sup>109</sup> well, that at the hearing Christ say, “I am the door,” and “I am the very vine,” no man marveled at the manner of speaking because that every man perceived his words for allegories and parables. But in the third place where he said, “My flesh is verily meat and the bread that I shall give you is my flesh. And except<sup>110</sup> you eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, you shall not have life in you,” so many marveled because they perceived well it was not a parable but that he spoke of very eating of his flesh indeed, that of all his hearers very few could abide it, but murmured and said, “How can he give us his flesh to eat?” And his own disciples said, “This word is hard; who may hear him?” and went almost all their way. Now when the effect of mine argument is that, in this point, many marveled at the thing, as a thing plainly spoken, and not a parable, but a plain tale that men should verily eat his flesh, and that no man marveled at the other two manner of speakings because they perceived them for parables, what maketh it against me that in the third place there were some that marveled not nor murmured not since that though some did not, yet many did, and both marveled and murmured and went their way, and that for the most part, and save<sup>111</sup> the apostles almost everyone? And verily the other disciples, as Saint Chrysostom<sup>112</sup> saith, those that then were present (against Master Masker’s saying) went their ways all the many.

Where is now, good readers, this trap of mine own making that I am fallen in? Hath Master Masker cast me down so deep with proving me that some marveled not, where I said many did? Be these two propositions so sore repugnant<sup>113</sup> and so plain contradictory — many marveled, and some marveled not — that because I said the first, and he proveth the second, therefore I am quite cast and caught in mine own trap? This man is a wily shrew<sup>114</sup> in argument, I promise you.

THE SEVENTH CHAPTER

5 But now that I have, good readers, so fair<sup>115</sup> escaped my trap, I trust, with the help of some holy saint, to catch Master Masker in his own trap, that his mastership hath made for me.

10 Ye wot well, good readers, that the trap which he made for me were these two wily captious<sup>116</sup> questions of his, with which he thought to catch me: that is to wit,<sup>117</sup> first whether the disciples and apostles heard and understood our Savior in all three places, and then upon mine answer yea or yes, his 15 other question further, whether they marveled or murmured, unto which, while I have answered no, now by the traps of his questions he reckoneth me driven to be caught in mine own, because I said that many marveled, as though many others might not 20 because the apostles did.

25 Now before I show you how himself is taken in his own trap ye shall hear his own glorious words with which he boasteth that he hath taken me, and would make men ween it were so. Lo, these are his words:

30 Here may you see whether this old holy upholder of the pope's Church is brought, even to be taken in his own trap. For the disciples and his apostles neither murmured nor marveled, nor yet were not offended with this their master Christ's words and manner of speech. For they were well-acquainted with such phrases, and answered their master Christ when he asked them, "Will ye go hence from me too?" "Lord," said they, "to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of everlasting life, 35 and we believe that thou art Christ, the Son of the living God." Lo, Master More, they neither marveled nor murmured. And why? For because, as ye say, they understood it in an allegory sense, and perceived well that he meant not of his material 40 body to be eaten with their teeth, but he meant it of himself to be believed to be very God and very man, having flesh and blood as they had, and yet was he the Son of the living God. This belief gathered they of all his spiritual sayings, as himself expoundeth his own words, saying, "My flesh profiteth nothing," meaning to be eaten, "but it is the spirit that giveth this life. And the words that I speak unto you are spirit and life, so that whoso believe my flesh to be crucified and broken, and 50 my blood to be shed for his sins, he eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, and hath life everlasting. And this is the life wherewith 'the righteous liveth even by faith'" (Habakkuk 2).<sup>118</sup>

55 Lo, good reader, here have I rehearsed<sup>119</sup> you his words whole to the end. And yet because you shall see that I will not hide from you any piece of his that may make for any strength of his matter, I shall rehearse you further his other words written in his thirteenth leaf, which I would have touched before, saving that I thought to reserve it for him, to strength withal<sup>120</sup> this place of his, where it might do him best service, where he would prove against me to trap me with, that the cause why the disciples and apostles marveled not, nor murmured
60 not, nor were not offended, was because they understood Christ's words to be spoken not of very<sup>121</sup> eating of his flesh, but only of the belief of his Passion by way of a parable or an allegory, as he spoke those other words when he said, "I am the door," 65 and when he said, "I am the vine."<sup>122</sup> The words, lo, of Master Masker with which he setteth forth the proof of this point in his thirteenth leaf be these, in the end of all his exposition upon the sixth chapter of Saint John:

Here is, lo, the conclusion of all this sermon. Christ, very God and man, had set his flesh before them to be received with faith, that it should be broken and suffer for their sin. But they could not eat it spiritually, because they believed not in him.
80 Wherefore many of his disciples fell from him and walked no more with him. And then he said to the twelve, "Will ye go away too?" And Simon Peter answered, "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of everlasting life, and we believe and are sure that thou art Christ, the Son of the living God." Here it is manifest what Peter and his fellows understood by this eating and drinking of Christ. For they were perfectly taught that it stood all in the belief in Christ, as their answer here testifieth. If this matter had stood upon so deep a miracle as our papists feign, without any word of God not comprehended under any of their common senses, that they should eat his body under form of bread as long, deep, thick, and as broad as it hangeth upon the cross, they being yet but feeble of faith, not confirmed with the Holy Ghost, must here needs have wondered, stonied and staggered,<sup>123</sup> and have been more inquisitive in and of so strange a matter than they were. But they neither doubted nor marveled nor murmured, nor nothing<sup>124</sup> offended with this manner of speech, as were the others that slipped away, but they answered firmly, “Thou hast the words of everlasting life, and we believe,” etc. Now to the exposition of the words of our Lord’s Supper.<sup>125</sup>

Lo, good readers, ye will, I trow,<sup>126</sup> now bear me record that I deal plainly with Master Masker here, and hide nothing of his aside that may do him any substantial service toward the proof of his purpose. And I warrant you it shall be long ere<sup>127</sup> you find him, or any of all that sect, deal in such plain manner with me.

But now, good Christian reader, read all these whole words of his in both the places as often as you list,<sup>128</sup> and consider them well, and then shall you perceive in conclusion that he proveth his purpose by none other thing in all this world than only by his own words expounding always the words of Christ, as Master Masker list himself. And upon that that<sup>129</sup> himself saith — that the cause wherefore<sup>130</sup> the disciples and apostles marveled not, nor murmured not at these words of Christ, “The bread that I shall give you is my flesh,” etc. was because they perceived that Christ spoke it in a parable (as I say of his other words, “I am the door,” and “I am the very vine”) — upon these words of Master Masker’s own, Master Masker concludeth for his purpose the selfsame thing that he first presupposeth, the thing that he should not presuppose but prove: that is to wit, that Christ spoke it but by way of a parable.

But against Master Masker and his presumptuous presupposing, the matter appeareth plain. For as I have before said, our Savior when he said, “I am the door,” and when he said, “I am the very vine,” did so prosecute<sup>131</sup> and declare in both the places his own words that there could no man have cause to marvel at the manner of speaking, for his own declaration in prosecuting his own words was such that it must needs make any man (but if<sup>132</sup> he were an idiot or an ass) perceive that Christ spoke in those two places that he was the vine and the door but by way of a parable. And this may every man soon see that list to look on the places. And therefore no man said, “How can he be a vine?” nor “How can he be a door?” as many said in the third place, “How can he give us his flesh to eat?” Which words, if they were so clearly spoken but by way of parable, as the other twain<sup>133</sup> were, it were far unlikely that so many wise men would have taken it so far otherwise ever since, that take the other twain for none other — and namely such holy doctors and saints as are well-acquainted with Christ’s phrases and parables, and in the study thereof have spent the great part of all their lives. And therefore Master Masker, against so many wise men and so good, going about now to prove this point but a parable, by none other substantial means than only by the authority of his own worshipful<sup>134</sup> word, proveth us his purpose very faint and slender, for all his “lo, Master More,” as though his purpose appeared very clear.

THE EIGHTH CHAPTER

Howbeit, for to furnish his matter with, and to set it the better forth, because he would not have it seem to stand all upon his own only exposition, that is to wit, upon his own only word, he setteth unto his own bare word, his own bare bald reason, and saith:

If this matter had stood upon so deep a miracle as our papists feign, without any word of God, not comprehended under any of their common senses, that they should eat his body being under the form of bread as long, deep, thick, and as broad as it hanged upon the cross, they being yet but feeble of faith, not confirmed with the Holy Ghost, must here needs have wondered, stonied and staggered,<sup>135</sup> and have been more inquisitive in and of so strange a matter than they were. But they neither marveled nor murmured, nor nothing offended with this manner of speech, as were the others that slipped away, but they answered firmly, “Thou hast the words of everlasting life, and we believe,” etc. Now to the exposition of the words of our Lord’s Supper.<sup>136</sup>

Here hath Master Masker given us a major<sup>137</sup> of an argument, and a minor too. His major is his first part unto these words, “But they” etc., and his minor is all the remnant. But we may now ask him ergo what? For conclusion he setteth none unto them. If he think the conclusion follow so clear that he needed not, but every man must needs see what followeth upon his two premises, in good faith for my part, if I should set ergo to it—that is, the common note of the consequent<sup>138</sup>—I see not what would follow any more than the common verse of the compute manual, Ergo ciphos adrifex,<sup>139</sup> he hath made his major so foolishly.

In which, that first it pleaseth his mastership to trifle and mock in this great matter, and make us poor people ween that everything that any doctor saith in dispicions,<sup>140</sup> or holdeth by way of problem, were delivered us to believe as a necessary point of our faith, he doth but play the false fool for his pleasure. For as for the manner how the blessed body of Christ is in the Blessed Sacrament, whether with his dimensions as long, thick, and broad as he hanged on the cross, or with his dimensions proportionable to the form of bread, as his blessed body was as verily his body in the first moment of his holy conception as it ever was at his Passion, and yet was it then neither so thick, so long, nor so broad, or whether his body be there in his natural substance, without any dimensions at all, or whether he be there in all his distinctions of the members of his holy body, or there have all his members without any distinction of place at all—these things and such others in which learned men may moderately and reverently dispute and exercise their wit<sup>141</sup> and learning, the Catholic Church in such wise<sup>142</sup> leaveth at large that it bindeth not the people to any such straits<sup>143</sup> in the matter, but only to the points that we be bounden by certain and sure revelation, to believe: that is to wit, that under what manner so ever it be there, verily there it is, his very flesh and his very blood. And in the form of bread, verily eat his very body there we do when we receive the very Blessed Sacrament. Thus far have we by certain and sure revelation, both by Holy Scripture and by the tradition also, by which Christ taught it to his apostles, and they to the Church, as Saint Paul did to the Corinthians,<sup>144</sup> and the Church to the people by succession from age to age ever since the apostles’ days unto our own time.

And therefore, with those mocks and jests, Master Masker mocketh no man but himself, save that under the name of papists, he mocketh all the Catholic Church of this fifteen hundred year, both clergy and temporality,<sup>145</sup> men and women, and all, and among the remnant, all the old holy doctors and saints that have, without doubt or question, both believed and taught that Christ meant not to speak those words, “My flesh is very meat,” by way of a parable, as Master Masker saith he only meant, but that he verily spoke and meant of the very eating of his flesh indeed.

But now shall you see that, as I said, his major is so foolishly made that all the world may wonder where his wit was when he made it. For he saith that if the matter stood indeed upon such a great miracle as the Catholic Church, which he calleth the papists, believe—that is to wit, that his very body should be eaten in form of bread, and that also, which he putteth for a necessary part of our faith, as long, as deep, as thick, and as broad as it was when it hanged on the cross—then the disciples and apostles, because they were yet but feeble in the faith, must needs have wondered, stunned and staggered,<sup>146</sup> and have been more inquisitive therein than they were. Now wotteth<sup>147</sup> well every child, good reader, that Christ did not in that place plainly tell them in what manner that they should eat it: that is to wit, that they should eat it in form of bread. For though he gave them an insinuation and signification thereof, in that he said, “And the bread that I shall give you is my flesh,”<sup>148</sup> which words, coupled with his deed when he did institute it indeed at his

Maundy,<sup>149</sup> might then make them clearly perceive that they should eat his flesh in form of bread, yet at the time when the word was first spoken, it was not so plain for that matter, but it might seem to them that he used that word “bread” but by manner of allegory to signify there his flesh, because they should verily eat it as men eat bread.

Now see then, good reader, the madness of Master Masker, that saith here that that thing must needs have made the apostles wonder, stunned, and stagger, at the time when Christ spoke those words in the sixth chapter of Saint John, at which time every child knoweth that they, though they well perceived that they should verily eat his flesh, yet they knew not that they should eat it in form of bread. And how could it then have made them wonder (that thing I say that he speaketh of and so sore<sup>150</sup> exaggerateth to increase the wonder), that is to wit, that his flesh should be eaten in form of bread, and that as long, as thick, as deep, and as broad as it was when it hanged on the cross. How could this thing, I say, have made them wonder at that time, at which time they thought not of the eating thereof in the form of bread? Heard ever any man such a mad argument as Master Masker hath made us here?

Now if Christ had there told them indeed all that Master Masker hath here put in so foolishly to make the matter the more wonderful, then would I deny his major. And so will I do if himself put all that out again, and leave no more in his major than Christ said indeed, that is, that they should verily eat his flesh and have life thereby, and that they should not only eat it bodily but also spiritually, nor in dead gobbets without life or spirit, but quick<sup>151</sup> and joined with the lively spirit, by which it should give life, and without which his flesh of his own proper nature to the giving of life could not avail. Now say I that if Master Masker had made his major of this, all this had been no cause for his apostles to wonder, nor to be stunned and stagger, nor to murmur and grudge<sup>152</sup> as they did that slipped away. For as feeble as Master Masker maketh the apostles in the faith of Christ, yet at that time, without any such manner of marvel as might make them stun and stagger and slip away from him, they believed such other things as were as hard to believe as this, and that without any further inquisition at all.

For else<sup>153</sup> why should they not at the same time have marveled of his ascension up to heaven, and been more inquisitive thereof. For that was no little marvel neither, and was one of the things that made the Jews and those disciples to stun and stagger that there slipped away from him.

Also they believed that he was God, and had no such wonder thereof as made them stun and stagger or be more inquisitive thereof, which was as strange a matter as was all the other, and which point once believed, it was easy to believe the other without any such manner of marveling as should make them either stun or stagger thereat.

Now as for being inquisitive thereof, holy Saint Chrysostom saith that as strange as the thing was of eating his flesh (for that men had been risen from death they had heard of in the Scripture before, but that one should eat another’s flesh, saith Saint Chrysostom, that had they never heard of), yet they believed Christ’s word and followed forth still, and confessed that he had the words of everlasting life, and would not be by and by<sup>154</sup> curious and inquisitive, as Master Masker saith they would, if they had believed him that he meant of eating of his flesh indeed. For Saint Chrysostom saith, “That is the part of a disciple: whatsoever his master affirmeth, not to be curious and inquisitive thereof, nor to make search therein, but to hear and believe, and if they would anything further be informed, abide a convenient<sup>155</sup> time.” For they that did otherwise and were inquisitive went away back, and that through their folly. For saith Saint Chrysostom,

Whensoever it cometh in the mind to ask the question how the thing may be done, then cometh there into the mind incredulity therewith. So was Nicodemus troubled and asked, “How may a man be born again when he is old? May a man enter again into his mother’s belly and be born again?”<sup>156</sup> And so the Jews said here too, “How can he give us his flesh to eat?” But thou Jew, if thou ask that, why didst thou not ask that in like wise in the miracle of the five loaves? Why didst thou not then ask, “How can he feed so many of us with so little meat?” Why didst thou not ask by what means he would and did increase it so much? The cause was because they cared but for the meat, and not for the miracle. But thou wilt peradventure<sup>157</sup> say the thing at that time declared and showed itself. But then I say again that of that manifest open miracle that they saw him there work, they should have believed that he could do these things too: that is to wit, these things that they now murmured at when they said, “How can he give us his flesh to eat?” For therefore (saith Saint Chrysostom) did our Savior work the other miracle of his five loaves before, because he would therewith induce them that they should not distrust those things that he would tell them after<sup>158</sup>

— that is to wit, good readers, of his Godhead, and of the giving of his flesh to eat.

THE NINTH CHAPTER

Now, good Christian readers, here you see by Saint Chrysostom that though the apostles understood well that Christ spoke of the very eating of his flesh, yet there was no cause why they should either doubtfully wonder, stun or stagger, or be by and by curious and inquisitive thereof, and so destroyeth he plain Master Masker’s reason, but if<sup>159</sup> it be to such as are disposed for their pleasure better to believe Master Masker than Saint Chrysostom.

For every man may here well see that Saint Chrysostom meaneth here that Christ in those words, besides all parables and allegories, spoke and meant of the very eating of his very flesh indeed, which thing, lest Master Masker might, as he is shameless, bring yet in question and controversy, I shall rehearse<sup>160</sup> you a few lines further of Saint Chrysostom in this selfsame place. Lo, thus there saith he further:

Those Jews at that time took no commodity,<sup>161</sup> but we have taken the profit of that benefit. And therefore is it necessary to declare how marvelous are these mysteries (that is to wit, of the Blessed Sacrament)<sup>162</sup> and why they be given us, and what is the profit thereof. We be one body and members of Christ’s flesh and his bones. And therefore they that are Christian are bound to obey his precepts. But yet that we should be not only by love, but also in very deed turned into that flesh of his, that thing is done by the meat that his liberality hath given us. For while he longed to declare and express his love that he bore toward us, he hath by his own body mingled himself with us, and hath made himself one with us that the body should be united with the head. For that is the greatest thing that lovers long for — that is to wit, to be, if it were possible, made both one. And that thing signified Job of his servants, of whom he was most heartily beloved, which to express the vehement love that they bore toward him said, “Who could give us the gift, that we might have our bodies even fulfilled with his flesh?”<sup>163</sup> — which thing Christ hath done for us indeed, both to the intent to bind us in the more fervent love toward him, and also to declare the fervent love and desire that himself bore toward us. And therefore hath he not only suffered<sup>164</sup> himself to be seen or looked upon by them that desire and long for him, but also to be touched and eaten, and the very teeth to be infixed into his flesh, and all folk to be fulfilled in the desire of him. From God’s board<sup>165</sup> therefore let us rise like lions that blew out fire at the mouth, such as the devil may be afeard to behold us, and let us consider Christ our head and what a love he hath showed us. The fathers and the mothers oftentimes put out their children to other folk to nurse. “But I,” may our Savior say, “nourish and feed my children with mine own flesh. I give them here mine own self, so favor I them all. And such great hope I give them all against the time that shall come.” For he that in such wise giveth us himself in this life here, much more will he give us himself in the life that is to come. “I longed,” said our Lord, “to be your brother. And for your sakes I have communicated and made common unto you my flesh and my blood. The things by which I was joined with you, those things have I exhibited again and given to you,” (that is to say, the very flesh and blood by which I was made natural man with you, that same have I in the Sacrament exhibited and given again unto you). This blood causeth the King’s image to flower in us. This blood will not suffer the beauty and the nobleness of the

if: unless 160 quote to 161 benefit 162 The parenthetical statements are

soul, which it ever watereth and nourisheth, to wither or fade and fall. The blood that is made in us of our other common meat is not by and by<sup>166</sup> blood, but before it be blood, it is somewhat else. But this blood of Christ out of hand<sup>167</sup> watereth the soul and with a certain marvelous might and strength seasoneth it by and by. This mystical or sacramental blood (that is to say, this blood of Christ in the Sacrament) driveth the devils far off and bringeth to us not angels only, but the Lord of all angels too. The devils, when they behold and see the blood of Christ within us, they flee far from us, and the angels run as fast toward us.<sup>168</sup>

And yet Saint Chrysostom ceaseth not with all this, but goeth forth with a longer process, declaring the great benefit of this blood, both by the shedding on the cross, and by the receiving in the Sacrament, which whole process I shall peradventure<sup>169</sup> hereafter in some other place rehearse.

But for this matter, good Christian readers, thus much doth more than suffice. For by less than this ye may more than plainly perceive that this old holy doctor Saint Chrysostom manifestly declar-eth and showeth that our Savior in those words that he spoke to the Jews, mentioned in the sixth chapter of Saint John, verily<sup>170</sup> spoke and meant of the very eating of his flesh, which thing he promised there, and which promise he performed after at his Maundy when he there instituted the Blessed Sacrament.

THE TENTH CHAPTER

And now, good readers, to finish at last this matter of Master Masker's against my second argument, which he calleth my first, because my first is such as he is loath to look upon, I return once again to Master Masker's two sore captious<sup>171</sup> questions, and likewise as he hath asked them of me, and I have, as you see, so well avoided his gins and his grins,<sup>172</sup> and all his trim-trams<sup>173</sup> that he hath not yet trained<sup>174</sup> me into no trap of mine own, as you see him solemnly boast, so will I now be bold to ask of him first, whether Saint Chrysostom here, yea, and

Saint Augustine too, and Saint Cyril, Saint Bede, Saint Irenaeus, and Saint Hilary, were of the mind that the apostle understood their master Christ's words when he said, "And the bread that I shall give you is my flesh," etc. "And my flesh is very meat," etc. "And I tell you very truth, except you eat the flesh of the Son of Man" etc.

If Master Masker answer me to this question nay or no, then shall he make me bold to answer the same to him. For then shall he not fear<sup>175</sup> me with his own saying, that the Gospel saith contrary in the sixth chapter of Saint John, if he grant and confess himself that all those holy doctors say therein against his own saying, which among them all understood that Gospel as well as himself alone, yea, and though<sup>176</sup> he take Frith and Friar Hussgen to him too. And therefore if he answer nay or no, then is he quite overthrown, as you see, and his second question quite gone too, for then can he never come to it.

Now on the other side, if he answer me yea or yes, then see, good readers, whereto Master Masker bringeth himself even to be taken in his own trap. For then he marreth all his matter. For since you see clearly, good readers, that all these holy doctors and saints openly do declare by their plain words, which yourselves have here already heard, that Christ in those words verily spoke and meant of the very eating of his very flesh indeed, it must needs follow against Master Masker's mind, in the ears and the hearts of all such as believe better all those holy doctors than him, that this is the right understanding of Christ's words, and that the apostles, if they understood his words, understood them after the same fashion: that is to wit, that he spoke and meant of the very eating of his very flesh indeed. And so serveth him his second question of nought.<sup>177</sup> For the cause why they marveled not in any murmuring manner was because they believed it well at their master's word, which Master Masker doth not, and the cause why they were not by and by curious and inquisitive was, as you have heard Saint Chrysostom declare, because they were meek and obedient, and not so presumptuous and malapert<sup>178</sup> as Master Masker would have been.

Lo, Master Masker, here may you see, lo, what worship<sup>179</sup> you have won with your questions, with which you have not only missed of training me into mine own trap, as you triumph and boast, but are also driven into your own trap yourself, out of which you can never climb up yourself nor all the brotherhood be able to draw you up as long as the devil, the very father of your lying brotherhood, lieth in the deep den of hell.

166 by and by: immediately 167 out of hand: immediately 168 Chrysostom, In Ioannem homiliae 45 (PG 59: 260–61)

175 frighten 176 even if 177 of nought: for nothing 178 impudent, saucy 179 honor, distinction

Thus have I, good readers, my first argument (as he calleth it) that he boasteth to have twice so substantially soiled<sup>180</sup> that he maketh me therein such a feeble babe that I were not able to stand in his strong hand; that argument have I so strongly now defended, and given him in his own turn so many great and foul falls, in every part of his process, that if this great clerk had so many so great falls given him at Clerkenwell<sup>181</sup> at a wrestling, he would have had, I ween, neither rib, nor arm, nor leg left him whole long ago, nor at this last lift,<sup>182</sup> his neck unbroken neither. And now therefore let us look how he soileth my third argument, which himself calleth my second, because he would have the first forgotten.

THE ELEVENTH CHAPTER

Lo, thus good readers, goeth Master Masker forth:

The second argument of More.

After this text thus wisely proved to be understood in the literal sense with the carnal Jews, and not in the allegoric or spiritual sense with Christ and his apostles, the whole sum of More's confutation of the young man standeth upon this argument, a posse ad esse: that is to wit, God may do it, ergo it is done. God may make his body in many or in all places at once, ergo it is in many or in all places at once, which manner of argumentation, how false and naught<sup>183</sup> it is, every sophister and every man that hath wit<sup>184</sup> perceiveth. A like argument: God may show More the truth and call him to repentance as he did Paul for persecuting his Church;<sup>185</sup> ergo More is converted to God. Or God may let him run, of an indurate<sup>186</sup> heart, with Pharoah, and at last take an open and sudden vengeance upon him for persecuting his Word, and burning his poor members; ergo it is done already.<sup>187</sup>

In all this tale, good readers, you see that Master Masker is yet at the leastwise constant and nothing changeth his manners. For as falsely as he rehearsed<sup>188</sup> mine other argument before (wherein what falsehood he used you have yourselves seen) as falsely now rehearseth he this other. For read, good readers, all my letter through yourselves, and when you find that fashioned argument there, then believe Master Masker in this matter, and in the meanwhile believe but as the truth is, that with his lies he mocketh you. And since he maketh us first a loud lie for his foundation and buildeth after his arguments upon the same, wherewith he scoffeth so pleasantly at me that it as properly becometh the man to taunt as it becometh a camel or a bear to dance, I will not with him argue a posse ad esse, and say he can lie, ergo he doth lie, but I will turn the fashion, and argue ab esse ad posse, and say that he doth lie, ergo he can lie, and so commend his wit. Lo, this form of arguing can he not deny. And the antecedent<sup>189</sup> shall you find as true, when you read over my letter, as himself cannot say nay but<sup>190</sup> that the consecution<sup>191</sup> is formal.

But then goeth Master Masker forth on and saith:

Master More must first prove it us by express words of Holy Scripture, and not by his own unwritten dreams, that Christ's body is in many places or in all places at once. And then though our reason cannot reach it, yet our faith, measured and directed with the word of faith, will both reach it, receive it, and hold it fast too, not because it is possible to God and impossible to reason, but because the written word of our faith saith it. But when we read God's words in more than twenty places contrary, that his body should be here, More must give us leave to believe his unwritten vanities — verities, I would say — at leisure.<sup>192</sup>

Here ye see, good readers, how many things Master Masker hath told us here, and how freshly he flourisheth them forth.

180 refuted 181 a traditional location in London for St. Bartholomew's Day wrestling matches 182 emergency 183 bad, evil 184 intellect 185 See Acts 9:4–7.

186 of an indurate: on account of an obstinate or hardened 187 CW 11: 311; see Ex 9:12, 10:1, 27; 11:10. 188 recounted 189 statement in logic upon which any consequent statement depends 190 say nay but: deny 191 sequence of reasoning 192 CW 11: 311

The first is that I must prove it him that the body of Christ is in many places at once, or in all places at once.

The second is that I must prove it by express words of Scripture.

The third is that I may not prove it by mine own unwritten dreams.

The fourth is that if I prove it so by express words of Scripture, then he will both reach it, and receive it, and hold it fast too.

The fifth is that he findeth twenty places of Scripture and more to the contrary, proving that his body is not here.

The sixth is that therefore I must give him leave to believe mine unwritten vanities—verities, he would say—at leisure.

Now for the first, good readers, where Master Masker saith that Master More must first prove it him that Christ's body is in many places at once or in all places at once, I say that as for all places at once, Master More must not prove at all. For, since the Sacrament is not in all places at once, whether his blessed body may be in all places at once is no point of our matter.

Now as touching the being of his blessed body in many places at once, where Master Masker saith that ere<sup>193</sup> he be bound to believe it, I must prove it, he is very far out of reason and out of the right way. For is Master Masker, nor Father Frith before him, bounden to believe no more than Master More were able to prove them? I say again to Father Frith and Master Masker both that if either of them both, or any such other fond<sup>194</sup> fellow as they be, begin to deny now any such plain article of the faith as all good Christian nations are, and long have been full agreed upon, so long and so full as they have been upon this, and so long reckoned the contrary believers for heretics,<sup>195</sup> either Master More or any man else might well with reason reprove them thereof, and rebuke them therefore, and only answer the foolish arguments that they make against the truth, and should not once need to go about the proof of the full received and undoubted truth, as though it were become doubtful upon every proud heretic's blasphemous foolish argument.

For if Master Masker would now bring up the Arians' heresy again against the Godhead of Christ, which he might as well as this frantic heresy of Friar Hussgen and Wycliffe against the Blessed Sacrament, or if he would now begin the other foolish heresy, whereof the Prophet speaketh in the psalter: Dixit insipiens in corde suo non est deus ("The fool said in his heart, 'There is no God'"),<sup>196</sup> which he might as well begin as any of the other twain,<sup>197</sup> if he would now, for the furnishing of this heresy, come forth with such unreasonable reasons, as some foolish foolosophers brought in therefore of old, were it not enough for me to confute those foolish arguments wherewith he would blind simple souls? Must I needs besides that go make much ado<sup>198</sup> and prove that there were a God, or else grant this goose that there were no God at all, because himself would say so still, when his fond reasons were soiled?<sup>199</sup>

Now to his second point, where it is not enough for him to say that I must prove it (wherein, as ye see, I have proved him a very fool), but he assigneth me also what manner of proof I must make, and none may serve him but such as himself list<sup>200</sup> assign, and that therefore I must prove it him by express words of Holy Scripture. I ask him then whether he will be content if I prove it him by express words of Christ written in all the four evangelists, Saint Matthew, Saint Mark, Saint Luke, and Saint John. If he say yea, as I suppose he will, then ask I him further wherefore<sup>201</sup> he will believe the writing of them four. Whereto what will he answer, but because that those Gospels of theirs are Holy Scripture? But then shall I further desire him to show me how he knoweth that those four books, or any one of all four, is the book of him whose name it beareth, or is the Holy Scripture of God at all. To this question, lo, but if<sup>202</sup> he can go further than holy Saint Augustine could, or the master captain of his own heresies, Martin Luther, either,<sup>203</sup> he must say that he knoweth those books for Holy Scripture, because the common-known Catholic Church hath so told him. Now when he shall have once answered me thus, every child may soon see what I shall ask him again.<sup>204</sup> For then shall I say, "Tell me then, Master Masker, I beseech you, since you believe this common-known Catholic Church in that one great verity, whereupon by your own saying all the other writers depend, why should you not as well believe it in this other article, which it as plainly telleth you, and yet you do deny it? Why should you not, I say, Master Masker, believe the Church as well, when it telleth you God hath taught his Church that this is his very body, as you believe the same Church when it telleth you God hath taught his Church that this is his very Scripture, namely since there are written in the same Scripture other things to man's reason as hard to conceive and as incredible to believe as that.”

Here you see, good readers, to what point I have brought Master Masker. I have set him here so fast<sup>205</sup> in the mire that therein shall he stick and never clean<sup>206</sup> wade out while he liveth.

Moreover, Master Masker cannot deny me this but that the right belief in the Sacrament, and diverse other things more, were once taught and believed, and Christian men bounden to believe them too, without express words of Holy Scripture laid forth for the proof, before any word of the New Testament was written and after peradventure<sup>207</sup> too, where the articles were preached and written Gospels not there. Now if such things were at one time not only believed, but men also bounden to the belief thereof without express words of Scripture for the proof, Master Masker must then, though there be come writing since, yet either prove us by express words of Scripture that of all that God will we shall<sup>208</sup> believe there is nothing left out, but every such thing there written in with express words, or else may he never make himself so sure, and face it out a<sup>209</sup> this fashion with express words that, saving<sup>210</sup> the very plain express words of Scripture, we be no man of us bounden to believe nothing else.

Now this am I sure enough, that such express words shall he never find in Scripture that tell him expressly that all is written in. And then since he cannot prove us this point by Scripture, but that at the leastwise we may be bounden to believe some such things as in Holy Scripture is not expressly written, which things those may be and which not, of whom will God we shall learn but of his known Catholic Church, by which he teacheth us which be the very Scripture?

Now as for the third point that Master Masker toucheth, in which he will allow for no sufficient proof mine own unwritten dreams, he giveth my dreams, I thank him of his courtesy, much more authority than ever I looked for. For while he rejecteth none of them but such as are unwritten, he showeth himself ready to believe them, if I would vouchsafe<sup>211</sup> to write them.

In the fourth point, he promiseth that if I do by express words of Scripture prove that it is so, then though it be above the reach of his reason, yet will he by belief both reach it, and receive it, and hold it fast too. Would God Master Masker would abide by this word. For now I ask him again, whether he will be content, if I prove it him by express words of some one of the four evangelists. And if he be content with express words of any one, then will I do more for him: prove it by all four.

For Saint John rehearseth<sup>212</sup> that our Savior said himself he would give them his flesh to eat. And that he meant of the Sacrament you see already proved herebefore.

And the other three rehearse that Christ said himself when he gave them the Sacrament, “This is my body that shall be broken for you.”<sup>213</sup> What words can there be more plain and express than these?

But here saith Master Masker that these be not express words. For he saith that these words be spoken but by way of allegory. And he proveth it, as Frith doth, by that our Savior said of himself, “I am the door,” and “I am the vine.”

Now remember, good readers, that Master Masker belied<sup>214</sup> me right now, and said that all my second argument was a posse ad esse (it may be so, ergo it is so). But now consider, good Christian readers, yourselves whether this argument of his be not a posse ad esse indeed. For by those places, “I am the door,” and “I am the vine,” and such other, he concludeth that these other places of eating his flesh and giving of his body was spoken by an allegory too. And how concludeth he that it is so? But because it may be so. And thus ye see, good readers, that the selfsame kind of arguing which Master Masker feigneth himself to find with me — and falsely belieth me therein, for I needed there none other thing to do but answer the things that Frith laid forth against the Catholic faith — the selfsame kind of arguing I say Master Masker useth himself, and so doth young Father Frith, his fellow in folly, too.

But then again when they argue thus, “These

205 firmly; quickly 206 completely 207 perhaps 208 will we shall: wants us to 209 face it out a: lie boldly in 210 except 211 be willing 212 recounts

places may be so understood by an allegory only, as those other places be; ergo they be to be so understood indeed,” I have proved already that his intent is false, and that they may not be understood in an allegory only as the other be, but the plain and open difference between the places appear upon the circumstances of the text. This have I proved against Frith already, and that in such wise, as yourselves hath seen here, that Master Masker cannot avoid it, but in going about to defend Frith’s folly hath, with his two solutions of mine one argument, offer than twice overthrown himself and made mine argument more than twice so strong.

But yet good readers, because I say that those words of Christ, “The bread that I shall give you is my flesh, which I shall give for the life of the world,” and “My flesh is verily meat, and my blood verily drink,” and “But if<sup>215</sup> you eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, you shall not have life in you,” and so forth, all such words as our Savior spoke himself, mentioned in the sixth chapter of Saint John, and those words of our Savior at his Maundy written with all the other three evangelists, “This is my body that shall be broken for you,” be plain and express words for the Catholic faith, and Master Masker saith that they be not words plain and express, but expoundeth them all another way, therefore to break the strife therein between him and me, I have brought you forth for my part in mine exposition the plain express words of diverse old holy saints, by which you may plain and expressly see that they all said as I say.

And Master Masker also cannot himself say nay but<sup>216</sup> that against other heretics before his days and mine, diverse whole general Councils of Christendom have plainly and expressly determined the same to be true that I say.<sup>217</sup>

And all the countries christened<sup>218</sup> can also testify that God hath himself by manifold open miracles plain and expressly declared for the Blessed Sacrament that this is the true faith, which Master Masker here oppugne<sup>219</sup>, and that God hath by those miracles expounded his own words himself to be plain and expressly spoken for our part.

And therefore now, good Christian readers, if Master Masker will make any more sticking<sup>220</sup> with us, and not grant Christ’s words for plain and express and, according to his promise, reach and receive the true faith and hold it fast too, ye may plain and expressly tell him there shall never true man trust his false promise after.

Now touching the fifth point, where he saith that he findeth twenty places in Scripture and more too, proving that Christ’s body is not here in earth, remember this well, good reader, against<sup>221</sup> he bring them forth. For in his second part when we come to the tale, ye shall find his more than twenty far fewer than fifteen, and of all that shall well serve him, ye shall find fewer than one.

Then where he concludeth in the last point upon these five points afore (which five, how well they prove, good Christian readers, you see) that I must give him leave to believe mine unwritten vanities (verities, he would say) at leisure, if the things that he calleth unwritten verities were indeed unwritten and invented also by me, then he might be the bolder to call them mine unwritten vanities, and (as he calleth them before) mine unwritten dreams too. But on the other side, since you see yourselves that I have showed you them written in holy saints’ books, and that a thousand years before that I was born, and yourselves seeth it written in the plain Scripture too, proved plain and express for our part against him by the old exposition of all the holy doctors and saints, and by the determinations of diverse general councils of Christ’s whole Catholic Church, and proved plain for our part also, by so many plain open miracles, Master Masker must needs be more than mad to call now such written verities mine unwritten vanities, or mine unwritten dreams either, except<sup>222</sup> he prove both all those things to be but an invention of mine, and over<sup>223</sup> that all those writings to be yet unwritten, and that holy doctrine both of holy saints and of Holy Scripture vanities, and also that all the while that all those holy folk were awork therewith, they neither wrote nor studied nor did nothing but dream.

Now while Master More must therefore, upon such considerations, give Master Masker leave to believe this unwritten vanity, which is in all the four evangelists an express written verity, while I must, I say, therefore upon such foolish false considerations, give him leave to believe the true faith at leisure, if he had put it in my choice, I would have been loath to give him any longer leisure therein, for he hath been too long out of right belief already. But since he saith I must, I may not choose, whereof I am, as help me God, very sorry. For except he take himself that leisure betimes,<sup>224</sup> leaving the business that he daily taketh in writing of pestilent books to the contrary, he shall else not fail to believe the true faith at a long leisure overlate: that is to wit, when he lieth wretchedly in hell, where he shall not write for lack of light and burning up of his paper, but shall have everlasting leisure from all other work to believe there that<sup>225</sup> he would not believe here, and lie still and ever burn there, in everlasting fire, for his former ungracious obstinate infidelity, out of which infidelity I beseech God give him the grace to creep and get out betimes.

And thus you see, good readers, what a goodly piece Master Masker hath made you, which pleased him, I warrant you, very well when he wrote it. But it will not, I ween, please him now very well when he shall after this mine answer read it.

THE TWELFTH CHAPTER

But now goeth he further against me with a special goodly piece wherein thus he saith:

Here mayst thou see, Christian reader, wherefore<sup>226</sup> More would so fain<sup>227</sup> make the belief that the apostles left aught<sup>228</sup> unwritten of necessity to be believed, even to establish the pope's kingdom, which standeth of More's unwritten vanities, as of the presence of Christ's body, and making thereof in the bread, of purgatory, of invocation of saints, worshipping of stones and stocks,<sup>229</sup> pilgrimages, hallowing of boughs<sup>230</sup> and bells,<sup>231</sup> and creeping to the cross,<sup>232</sup> etc. If ye will believe whatsoever More can feign without the Scripture, then can this poet feign ye another Church than Christ's, and that ye must believe it whatsoever it teach you, for he hath feigned too that it cannot err, though ye see it err and fight against itself a thousand times, yea, if it tell you black is white, and good is bad, and the devil is God, yet must ye believe it or else be burned as heretics.<sup>233</sup>

Still ye see the wisdom, good readers, and the truth of Master Masker, in every piece of his matter. For here you see that all these things that he speaketh of, as that the Church cannot err, and the creeping to the cross, with all other ceremonies of the Church, invocation of saints, going on pilgrimage, worshipping of images, believing of purgatory, believing the body of our Savior present in the Blessed Sacrament, all these things he calleth mine unwritten vanities, and maketh as though these things were all of my feigning. Is not this, ween you, wisely feigned of him, that the things commonly used this fourteen hundred year before I was born should now be feigned and imagined by me? But yet shall it be as long after my days, and his too, ere Master Masker and all the many of them shall among them all be able to confute the things that myself have in these matters written. And yet hang not the matters upon my writing, but upon the truth itself, revealed unto Christ's known Catholic Church, both by Christ himself and his apostles after him, by tradition and by writing both, and by many miracles confirmed, and with the secret instinct and inspiration of his Holy Spirit, wrought and brought into a full and whole Catholic agreement and consent, as necessary points of the true Christian faith.

This is also by Master Masker wonderful wisely feigned: that More hath feigned all these things, even to the intent to establish the pope's kingdom. But now what great cause should move me to bear that great affection to the pope as to feign all these things for establishment of his kingdom—that thing Master Masker telleth you not, as the thing that is so plain and evident that he needeth not. For he thinketh that every man knoweth already that the pope is my godfather and goeth about to make me a cardinal.

But now, good Christian readers, they that would, at the counsel of this evil Christian caitiff,<sup>234</sup> cast off all such manner things as all good Christian people have ever taken for good, and now neither creep to the cross, nor set by<sup>235</sup> any hallowed thing, despise pilgrimages, and set holy saints at nought,<sup>236</sup> no more reverence their images than a horse of wax, nor reckon their relics any better than sheep's bones, scrape clean the litany<sup>237</sup> out of every book, with our Lady Matins<sup>238</sup> and the dirge<sup>239</sup> too, and away with our Lady's Psalter,<sup>240</sup> and cast the beads<sup>241</sup> in the fire, and beware also that we worship not the 5 Sacrament, nor take it for no better thing than un-blessed bread, and believe that the Church erreth in every thing that it teacheth, and all that holy saints have taught therein this fourteen hundred year (for all they have taught all these things that this man 10 now despiseth), then would there wax<sup>242</sup> a merry world, the very kingdom of the devil himself.

And verily it seemeth that they would set the people upon mirth. For penance they shake off as a thing not necessary. Satisfaction they call great 15 sin, and confession they call the devil's drift.<sup>243</sup> And of purgatory, by two means they put men out of dread: some by sleeping till Doomsday,<sup>244</sup> and some by sending all straight to heaven, every soul that dieth and is not damned forever. And yet some 20 good comfort give they to the damned too. For till they see some time to deny hell all utterly, they go about in the mean season<sup>245</sup> to put out the fire. And some yet boldly forthwith<sup>246</sup> too say there is none there, that they dread a little, and therefore for the
25 season they bring the matter in question, and dispute it abroad and say they will not utterly affirm and say the contrary, but the thing is, they say, but as problema neutrum,<sup>247</sup> wherein they would not force whether<sup>248</sup> part they should take, and yet if 30 they should choose, they would rather hold nay than yea, or though there be fire in either place, that yet it neither burneth soul in hell, nor paineth soul in purgatory. But Christ, I wot<sup>249</sup> well, in many places saith there is fire there,<sup>250</sup> and his holy saints 35 after him affirm and say the same, and with that fire he frayed<sup>251</sup> his own disciples, bidding them fear that fire, that they fell not therein.

Now though that<sup>252</sup> clerks may in schools hold problems upon everything, yet can I not perceive 40 what profit there can come to call it but a problem among unlearned folk, and dispute it out abroad, and bring the people in doubt, and make them rather think that there is none than any, and that this word "fire" is spoken but by parable, as these 45 men make the eating of Christ's blessed body. Thus shall they make men take both paradise, and heaven, and God, and all together, but for parables at last.

Though fear of hell alone be but a servile dread, yet are there already too many that fear hell too little, even of them that believe the truth and think 50 that in hell there is very fire indeed. How many will there then be that will fear it less, if such words once may make them ween that there were in hell no very fire at all, but that the pain that they shall feel in hell were but after<sup>253</sup> the manner of some heavy mind or 55 of a troublous dream?

If a man believe Christ's word that in hell is fire indeed, and make the fear of that fire one means to keep him thence, then though there were no fire there, yet hath he nothing lost, since good he can 60 get none there, though the fire were thence. But if he believe such words on the other side, and catch thereby such boldness that he set hell at light, and by the means thereof fall boldly to sin, and there-
65 upon finally fall down unto the devil, if he then find fire there as I am sure he shall, then shall he lie there and curse them that told him those false tales, as long as God with his good folk sitteth in the joy of heaven.

And therefore, good Christian readers, wisdom 70 will we believe Christ's own words, and let such unwise words and devilish devices<sup>254</sup> pass.

THE THIRTEENTH CHAPTER

But now after this pleasant discourse of his into 75 the rehearsal<sup>255</sup> of this heap of heresies that you have heard, for which, as for little trifles his heart fretteth sore<sup>256</sup> that any heretic should be burned, he goeth on against me and saith:

But let us return to our propose.<sup>257</sup> To dispute of 80 God's almighty absolute power, what God may do with his body, it is great folly and no less presumption to More, since the pope, which is no whole God but half a God, by their own decrees hath decreed no man to dispute of his power. But 85 Christian reader, be thou content to know that God's will, his word, and his power be all one, and

repugn<sup>258</sup> not. And neither willeth he, nor may not do anything, including repugnance, imperfection, or that should derogate,<sup>259</sup> diminish, or hurt his glory and his name. The glory of his Godhead is to be present and to fill all places at once essentially, presently with his almighty power, which glory is denied to any other creature, himself saying by his prophet, “I will not give my glory to any other creature.”<sup>260</sup> Now therefore, since his manhood is a creature, it cannot have this glory which only is appropriated<sup>261</sup> to the Godhead. To attribute to his manhood that property, which only is appropriated to his Godhead, is to confound both the natures in Christ. What thing so ever is everywhere after the said manner, that must needs be infinite, without beginning and end; it must be one alone, and almighty, which properties only are appropriated unto the glorious majesty of the Godhead. Wherefore Christ’s body may not be in all or in many places at once, Christ himself saying as concerning his manhood he is less than the Father, but as touching his Godhead, “The Father and I be both one thing.”<sup>262</sup> And Paul, reciting the psalm, affirmeth Christ as concerning his manhood to be less than God, or less than angels, as some text hath it.<sup>263</sup> Here is it plain that all things that More imagineth and feigneth are not possible to God, for it is not possible for God to make a creature equal unto himself, for it includeth repugnance and derogateth his glory.<sup>264</sup>

Now have you, lo, good Christian readers, heard a very special piece, wherein Master Masker, as you see, solemnly first rebuketh the folly and the presumption of me, for that<sup>265</sup> I was so bold in my letter against his fellow Father Frith, to dispute of God’s almighty absolute power. But now, good readers, when you shall see by the matter that it was Frith which argued against God’s almighty power, denying that Christ could make his own body in many places at once, and that I did in effect nothing else but answer him, and said and affirmed that God was able to do it, and that Frith was but a fool so to strait<sup>266</sup> and to limit the power of Almighty God, but if<sup>267</sup> he could prove repugnance<sup>268</sup> (which against God’s own word plain spoken in his holy Gospel Father Frith could never do), when you see this, good readers, I doubt not but ye will say that it is neither folly nor presumption for the simplest man or woman in a town to maintain that God may do this thing or that, namely the thing that God hath said himself he doth, against him that is so foolish as to presume, against the plain Word of God, to determine by his own blind reason the contrary, and specially since the thing is such indeed as though<sup>269</sup> God had not spoken thereof, yet had he none hold<sup>270</sup> to say that God could not do it, forasmuch as<sup>271</sup> it implieth no such repugnance as should make the thing impossible unto God.

But now see further, good readers, the wisdom and the meekness of Master Masker here, which as soon as he hath scant<sup>272</sup> finished his high solemn rebuking of me for such disputing of God’s almighty power, that I said he was indeed so mighty that he could do the thing that we disputed upon against him that said nay, falleth himself forthwith<sup>273</sup> in the same fault that he findeth, and yet not in the same fault (for the fault that he found was none) but in the fault that he would seem to find. For he disputeth and taketh the part against God’s almighty power indeed, and argueth, as you see, that God indeed cannot do it.

And this point he argueth in such manner<sup>274</sup> fashion that in my life I never saw so foolish an argument so solemnly set up<sup>275</sup> high. First he maketh his reason thus. It is the glory of the Godhead and appropriated<sup>276</sup> only thereunto to be present and to fill all places at once, essentially, presently, with his almighty power, and is denied to any creature. But Christ’s manhood is a creature. Ergo it cannot have this glory that is appropriated to the Godhead.

Here is a wise argument. God hath many glories. And his chief glory standeth not in being present at once essentially in every place. And though he will not give his glory from him, yet of his glory he maketh many creatures in many great parts of it to be partners with him. It is one part of his glory to live and endure in eternal bliss, and though no creature be without beginning, yet maketh he many a thousand possessors of joy without ending.

How proveth Master Masker that to be present at once in all places is such a kind of glory so appropriated unto God that God cannot give that gift to any creature? The Scripture seemeth to appropriate

THE FOURTEENTH CHAPTER

Then maketh Master Masker another argument, wherewith he would, as it seemeth, somewhat strengthen the first, as it hath of truth no little need, being as it is so feeble of itself.

His other argument therefore is, as you have heard, this: What thing so ever is everywhere after<sup>279</sup> the said manner, that must needs be infinite without beginning and end. It must be one, and alone, and almighty, which properties are appropriated unto the glorious majesty of the Godhead. But Christ's manhood is not such, as himself witnesseth in Holy Scripture; ergo his manhood cannot be in all or in many places at once.

First, (that we labor not about nought)<sup>280</sup> we must consider what Master Masker meaneth by these words, "after the said manner." He said, you wot well, in the other argument before, that the glory of God is to be present, and to fill all places at once, essentially, presently, with his almighty power. And therefore when he saith now, "Whatsoever thing is everywhere at once after the said manner," he meaneth (you see well) present, and filling all places at once, essentially, presently, with his almighty power.

I let pass here his word "presently," whose presence needeth<sup>281</sup> not in that place for aught<sup>282</sup> that I can see. For when he said before, "present and filling all places at once essentially," his other word "presently" may take his leave and be absent well enough. For how can he be present and essentially fill the place, and not presently? But now when he saith, "by his almighty power," what is this to the matter?<sup>283</sup> For it is enough against him if any creature may be present in every place at once, and essentially fill the place, not by his own almighty power, but by the almighty power of God, and yet not so fill the place neither, but that it may have another with it in the same place. For I trow<sup>284</sup> he will not deny but that there be many creatures in those places, which God with his own presence essentially filleth full. 45

Therefore, as for these words, "after the said manner," which he putteth in to make us amazed, Master Masker must put out again. Now that being put out, rehearse<sup>285</sup> and consider well Master Masker's argument. What thing so ever is in every place at once, that thing must needs be infinite without beginning and end, it must be one, and alone, and almighty, which properties are appropriated to the glorious majesty of the Godhead. But the manhood of Christ is a creature and not God; ergo Christ's manhood cannot be in all places or in many places at once. And yet consider here that though<sup>286</sup> he leave out that odious word, yet must his conclusion be indeed that God cannot make it so, as you see plain by his beginning, where he showeth that it implieth repugnance, and that therefore God cannot do it. 50 55 60

Now good readers, consider well his first proposition, which we call the major: that is to wit, that God cannot make anything created to be everywhere at once. Let us pray<sup>287</sup> him to prove it, and give him one year's leisure to it. But here he taketh upon him to prove it, and layeth for the reason that God cannot make any creature to be in all places at once because it should then be infinite, and thereby God Almighty's mate and high fellow. Let him, as I say, prove us this in two years that it should then be infinite, without beginning, and without end, and almighty. In good faith, either am I very dull, or else doth Master Masker tell us herein a very mad tale. 65 70 75

I think he will not deny but that God which could make all this world, heaven, and earth, and all the creatures that he created therein, could, if it so had pleased him, have created only one man, and let all the remnant alone uncreated, and have kept him still, and never have made heaven nor earth nor none other thing, but only that one man alone. The soul now that then had been created in that man, had it not then been in all places at once? I suppose yes. For there had been no more places than that man's body, and therein had there been many places in many diverse parts of the man, in all which that soul should have been present at once, and the whole soul in every part of all those places at once. For so is every soul in every man's body now. And 80 85 90

277 See Ps 7:10. 278 remain 279 in 282 anything 283 purpose 284 trust accord with 280 nothing 281 is needed 285 remember 286 even if 287 ask yet had that soul not been infinite, no more than every soul is now.

If God would now, as if he would he could, create a new spirit that should fulfill<sup>288</sup> all the whole world, heaven and earth and all, as much as ever is created, that in such wise should be whole present at once in every part of the world, as the soul is in every part of a man, and yet should not be the soul of the world, I will here ask Master Masker, were that new created spirit infinite? If he answer me nay, then hath he soiled<sup>289</sup> his own wise reason himself. For then no more were<sup>290</sup> the manhood of Christ, though it were present in all those places of the whole world at once. If he answer me yea, then since that spirit were no more infinite than the world is, within the limits and bounds whereof it were contained, it would follow thereof that the world were infinite already, which is false. And also, if it were true, then would it follow by Master Masker's reason that God Almighty had a match already, that is to wit, another thing infinite besides himself, which is the inconvenience that maketh Master Masker affirm it for impossible that God could make Christ's manhood to be in all places at once.

Thus you see, good readers, upon what wise ground Master Masker hath here concluded that God cannot make Christ's body to be in all places at once.

But yet is it a world<sup>291</sup> to consider how madly the man concludeth. His conclusion is this, ye wot well, wherefore<sup>292</sup> Christ's body cannot be in all places, or in many places at once. All his reason, ye wot well, goeth upon being in all places at once, because that thereupon would it, by his wise reason, follow that it should be infinite. And now is that point of truth no part of our matter. For we say not that Christ's body is in all places at once, but in heaven, and in such places in earth as the Blessed Sacrament is. And therefore, whereas his reason goeth nothing against being in many places at once, but only against being at once in all places, he concludeth suddenly against being in many places, toward which conclusion no piece of his premises had any manner of motion. And so in all this his high solemn argument, and his far-fetched reason, neither is his major true, nor his argument toucheth not the matter, nor his premises anything<sup>293</sup> prove his conclusion.

And yet after this goodly reasoning of his, he rejoiceth in his heart highly to see how jollily he hath handled it, and saith: "Here it is plain that all things that More imagineth and feigneth are not possible to God. For it is not possible to God to make a creature equal to himself, for it includeth repugnance<sup>294</sup> and derogateth<sup>295</sup> his glory."

Master Masker speaketh much of mine unwritten dreams and vanities. But here have we had a written dream of his, and therein this foolish boast also so full of vainglorious vanity that if I had dreamed it in a fit of a fever, I would, I ween, have been ashamed to have told my dream to my wife when I woke. And now shall you, good readers, have here another piece as proper:<sup>296</sup>

God promised and swore that all nations should be blessed in the death of that promised seed which was Christ; God had determined and decreed it before the world was made,<sup>297</sup> ergo Christ must needs have died, and not to expound this word oportet, as More minceth it. For it was so necessary that the contrary was impossible, except<sup>298</sup> More would make God a liar, which is impossible. Paul concludeth that Christ must needs have died, using this Latin term nesesse, saying wheresoever is a testament, there must the death of the testament-maker go between, or else the testament is not ratified and sure, but righteousness and remission of sins in Christ's blood is his New Testament, whereof he is mediator; ergo the testament-maker must needs have died.<sup>299</sup> Wrest not therefore, Master More, this word oportet (though ye find potest for oportet in some corrupt copy) unto your unsavory sense. But let oportet signify "he must," or "it behooveth him" to die. For he took our very mortal nature for the same decreed council, himself saying (John 2 and 12), Oportet exaltari filium hominis, etc. ("It behooveth," or "the Son of Man must die, that everyone that believe in him perish not,<sup>300</sup> etc."). Here may ye see also that it is impossible for God to break his promise. It is impossible to God, which is that verity to be found contrary in his deeds and words, as to save them whom he hath damned, or to damn them whom he hath saved. Wherefore all things imagined of More's brain are not possible to God. And when More saith that Christ had power to let<sup>301</sup> his life and to take it again,<sup>302</sup> and therefore not to have died of necessity, I wonder me that his school matter<sup>303</sup> here failed him, so cunning<sup>304</sup> as he maketh himself therein, which granteth and affirmeth, as true it is, that with the necessary decreed works of God's foresight and providence standeth right well his free liberty.<sup>305</sup>

If this piece were, good readers, anything to the purpose of our principle matter, concerning the Blessed Sacrament, Master Masker had here given me hold enough to give him four or five such foul falls on the back that his bones should all-to<sup>306</sup> burst therewith. But forasmuch as<sup>307</sup> you shall perceive by the reading of my letter that all this gear<sup>308</sup> is but a by-matter, risen upon a certain place of Saint Augustine, which Frith alleged<sup>309</sup> imperfectly, I purpose not to spend the time in vain dispicions<sup>310</sup> with Master Masker, in a thing out of our matter. And namely since the man hath, after his long babbling against me, yet in the end answered himself well and sufficiently for me.

For when he hath said a great while that it was in such wise necessary that Christ must die, that the contrary thereof was impossible, at last, as though he would mock me therewith and show mine ignorance, he bringeth in his own, and showeth that for anything that God hath either foreseen or decreed and determined therein, he had left Christ at his liberty to die or live if he would.<sup>311</sup> And then if he was at his liberty not to die but if<sup>312</sup> he had would, then was it not impossible for him to have lived if he had would. But the keeping of his life was the contrary of his dying; ergo his dying, how necessary so ever it was for man's redemption — that is to wit, so behoveful<sup>313</sup> thereto that without it we should not have been saved — yet Master Masker here to show himself a great schoolman in respect of me confesseth himself, against himself, that Christ to die was not in such wise necessarily constrained, that the contrary thereof — that is to wit, Christ to live was impossible to him if he had would — while Master Masker cannot say nay, but must needs give place to the Scriptures that I laid<sup>314</sup> him, and therefore must confess, and so he doth, that Christ could by no constraint be compelled to die, but was offered because himself so would.

But the dispicions of this point is, as I say, good reader, all beside our principle matter, and therefore I will let his other follies that I find in this piece pass by.

Then goeth Master Masker forth and saith:

But Master More saith at last, "If God would tell me that he would make each of both their bodies too," (meaning the young man's body and Christ's) "to be in fifteen places at once, I would believe him, ay, that he were able to make his word true in the bodies of both twain,<sup>315</sup> and never would I so much as ask him whether he would glorify them both first or not, but I am sure, glorified or unglorified, if he said it, he is able to do it."<sup>316</sup> Lo, here may ye see what a fervent faith this old man hath, and what an earnest mind to believe Christ's words if he had told him; but I pray ye, Master More, what and if<sup>317</sup> Christ never told it you, nor said it nor never would, would ye not be as hasty to not believe it? If he told it you, I pray ye tell us where ye speak with him, and who was by to bear ye record, and yet if you bring as false a shrew<sup>318</sup> as yourself to testify this thing, yet by your own doctrine must ye make us a miracle to confirm your tale, ere we be bound to believe you, or yet to admit this your argument: God may make his body in many places at once, ergo it is so.<sup>319</sup>

THE SIXTEENTH CHAPTER

Read, good readers, in my letter, the twenty-first leaf, and then consider Master Masker's goodly mock that he maketh here, and you shall find it very foolish. But now Master Masker asketh me, where I spoke with Christ when he told me that he would make his own body in two places at once, as though Christ could not speak to me but if<sup>320</sup> I spoke to him, nor could not tell me the tale but if he appeared to me face to face, as he did after his resurrection to his disciples.<sup>321</sup> This question of Master Masker cometh of a high wit,<sup>322</sup> I warrant you. I answer Master Masker therefore, Christ told it at his Maundy to other good credible folk, and they told it forth to the whole Catholic Church, and the whole Church hath told it unto me, and one of them that was at it, that is to wit, Saint Matthew, hath put it in writing as the same Church telleth me.<sup>323</sup> For else<sup>324</sup> were I not sure whether that Gospel were his or not, nor whether it were any part of Holy Scripture or not. And therefore I can lack no good and honest witness to bear me record in that point that will depose for me that I feign not the matter of mine own head. And I have a testimonial also of many old holy doctors and saints, made afore<sup>325</sup> a good notary, the good man God himself, which hath with his seal of many a hundred miracles, both testified for the truth of those men, and also for the truth of the principle matter itself: that is to wit, that Christ's very body is in the Blessed Sacrament, though<sup>326</sup> the Sacrament be either in two or in ten thousand places at once. And thus Master Masker's questions concerning Christ's blessed body, that Christ hath told me that he would make it be in two places at once is, I trust, sufficiently answered. But now as for Frith's body (which writeth that Christ's body can be no more in two places at once than his), though<sup>327</sup> I would have believed that Christ could have made it in two places at once if Christ had so told me, yet since Christ hath now told me, by his whole Catholic Church, and by writing of the old holy saints of the same, and by his own Holy Scripture too, which Scripture by the same Church and the same holy saints I know, and also see declared and expounded, and over<sup>327</sup> that hath by many wonderful miracles manifestly proved and testified that the opinions in which Frith obstinately and therewith very foolishly died were very pestilent heresies, whereby he is perpetually severed from the lively body of Christ, and made a dead member of the devil, I believe therefore and very surely know as a thing taught me by God that the wretched body of that fellow shall never be in two places at once, but when it shall rise again and be restored to that wretched obstinate soul, shall therewith lie still ever more in one place, that is to wit, in the everlasting fire of hell, from which I beseech our Lord turn Tyndale and George Jay, with all the whole brotherhood and Master Masker among others (whosoever he be) betimes.<sup>328</sup>

Now upon his aforesaid such a proper-handled mock as you have heard, Master Masker goeth on, and giveth me right wholesome admonition that I meddle no more with such high matters, as is the great absolute almighty power of God, and therein thus he saith unto me: "Sir, you be too busy with God's almighty power, and have taken too great a burden upon your weak shoulders."<sup>329</sup>

THE SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER

Here he should have rehearsed what one word I had said of God's almighty power, in which word I was too busy. Read my letter over, and you shall clearly see that I say nothing else but that God is almighty, and that he therefore may do all things. And yet, as you shall hear Master Masker himself confess, I said not that God could do things that imply repugnance.<sup>330</sup> But I said that some things may seem repugnant unto us, which things God seeth how to set together well enough. Be these words, good reader, over-highly<sup>331</sup> spoken of God's almighty power? May not a poor unlearned man be bold to say that God is able to do so much? And yet for saying thus much, saith Master Masker that I am too busy, and have taken too great a burden upon my weak shoulders, and have overladen myself with mine own harness<sup>332</sup> and weapons, and many gay words more to utter his eloquence withal.<sup>333</sup> But Master Masker on the other side is not himself too busy at all with God's almighty power, in affirming that God hath not the power to make his own blessed body in many places at once. His mighty strong shoulders take not too much weight upon them when instead of omnipotent, he proveth God impotent, and that by such impotent arguments, as you see yourself so shamefully halt, that never lame cripple that lay impotent by the walls in creeping out unto a dole<sup>334</sup> halted half so sore.<sup>335</sup> But then goeth he further for the praise of young David and saith:

As for Master Masker's young Master David, whoso look upon his first treatise and my letter together shall soon see that his sling and his stone be beaten both about his ears. And whensoever his new sling and his new stone (which is, as I now hear say, very lately come over in print) come once into my hands, I shall turn his sling into a cock-stele<sup>337</sup> and his stone into a feather, for any harm that it shall be able to do, but if<sup>338</sup> it be to such as willingly will put out their own eyes, to which they never need neither stone nor sling, but with a feather they may do it and<sup>339</sup> they be so mad.

But a heavy thing it is to hear of his young foolish David, that hath thus, with his stone of stubbornness, stricken out his own brain, and with the sling of his heresies slungen himself to the devil.

Yet Master Masker cannot leave me thus, but on he goeth further in his railing rhetoric and thus he saith:

God hath infatuated your high subtle wisdom; your crafty conveyance is espied. God hath sent your Church a meet<sup>340</sup> cover for such a cup, even such a defender as you take yourself to be, that shall let all their whole cause fall flat in the mire, unto both your shames and utter confusion. God therefore be praised ever, amen.<sup>341</sup>

THE EIGHTEENTH CHAPTER

As for wisdom, I will not compare with Master Masker therein, nor would wax<sup>342</sup> much the prouder in good faith, though<sup>343</sup> men would say that I had more wit<sup>344</sup> than he. I pray God send us both a little more of his grace, and make us both good.

But whereas he jesteth concerning my defense of the Church, whoso look my books through shall find that the Church, in the truth of whose Catholic faith concerning the Blessed Sacrament I write against Frith and Tyndale and Master Masker, and such false heretics more, is none other Church but the true Catholic Church of Christ, the whole congregation of all true Christian nations, of which Church I take not myself to be any special defender; howbeit,<sup>345</sup> to defend it is indeed every good man's part. And as for hitherto, the things that I have written are (I thank God) strong enough to stand, as it is plainly proved against all these heretics that have wrestled therewith, whereof they could never yet overthrow one line, and no man more shamefully soused<sup>346</sup> in the mire than Master Masker here himself, that boasteth his victory while he lieth in the dirt. But the Catholic Church hath another manner<sup>347</sup> defender than is any earthly man. For it hath God himself therein, and his Holy Spirit, permanent and abiding by Christ's own promise to defend it from falsehood unto the end of the world.<sup>348</sup> And therefore it cannot fall flat in the mire, but God maketh heretics fall flat in the fire.

Yet to the intent, good readers, that you should well see that I left not untouched the point of repugnance, with which Master Masker hath all this while set out his high solemn reason against God's almightiness, himself showeth here at last that of repugnance I did speak myself, howbeit indeed somewhat more moderately than he, as ye shall not only perceive by the words of my letter, but also by the words of Master Masker himself which be these:

Then saith Master More, though it seemeth repugnant both to him and to me, one body to be in two places at once, yet God seeth how to make them stand together well enough. This man with his old eyes and spectacles seeth far in God's sight, and is of his privy council that knoweth belike<sup>349</sup> by some secret revelation how God seeth one body to be in many places at once includeth no repugnance. For word hath he none for him in all Scripture no more than one body to be in all places at once. It implieth first repugnance to my sight and reason that all this world should be made of nothing, and that a virgin should bring forth a child. But yet when I see it written with the words of my faith, which God spoke, and brought it so to pass, then implieth it no repugnance to me at all. For my faith reacheth it and receiveth it steadfastly. For I know the voice of my herdsman, which if he said in any place of Scripture that his body should have been contained under the form of bread and so in many places at once here in earth, and also abiding yet still in heaven too, verily I would have believed him, ay, as soon and as firmly as Master More. And therefore even yet, if he can show us but one sentence truly taken for his part, as we can do many for the contrary, we must give place.<sup>350</sup> For as for his unwritten verities and the authority of his anti-christian synagogue, unto which (the Scripture forsaken) he is now at last with shame enough compelled to flee, they be proved stark lies and very devilry.<sup>351</sup>

Is not this a wise invented scoff that Master Masker mocketh me withal,<sup>352</sup> and saith that with mine old eyes and my spectacles I see far in God's sight, and am of God's privy council, and that I know belike, by some secret revelation, how God seeth that one body to be in many places at once includeth no repugnance? It is no council, ye wot well, that is cried at the cross.<sup>353</sup> But Christ hath cried and proclaimed this himself, and sent his heralds, his blessed apostles, to cry it out abroad, and hath caused his evangelists also to write the proclamation, by which all the world was warned that his blessed body, his holy flesh and his blood, is verily eaten and drunken in the Blessed Sacrament. And therefore, either all those places be one in which the Blessed Sacrament is received at once, or else God may do the thing that is repugnant, or else he seeth that his body to be in diverse places at once is not repugnant. For well I wot, he saith he doth it, in all the four evangelists. And well I wot also that he cannot say but sooth.<sup>354</sup> And therefore neither need I to see very far for this point, nor need no secret revelation neither, since it is the point that to the whole world God hath both by word, writing, and miracles revealed and showed so openly. Where is Master Masker now?

For where he saith I have no word of Scripture for Christ's body to be in many places at once no more than to be in all places at once, if I had not, yet if God had otherwise than by writing revealed the one to his Church and not the other, I would and were bound to believe the one, and would not, nor were bounden to believe, the other, as I believe and am bound to believe now that the Gospel of Saint John is Holy Scripture, and not the gospel of Nicodemus.<sup>355</sup> And if God had revealed both twain<sup>356</sup> unto the Church, I would and were bound to believe both twain, as I believe now that the Gospel of Saint John is Holy Scripture, and the Gospel of Saint Matthew too.

But now of truth, Master Masker abominably belieth<sup>357</sup> the Word of God when he saith that we have not the Word of God, no more for the being of Christ's body in many places at once than in all places at once. For as for the being thereof in all places at once, we find no word plainly written in the Scripture. But for the being thereof in many places at once, Christ's words in his Last Supper, and before that in the sixth chapter of Saint John, be as open, as clear, and as plain as any man well could with any reason require,<sup>358</sup> except<sup>359</sup> any man were so wise as to ween that diverse men's mouths were all one place. And therefore when Master Masker, in his words following, maketh as though he would believe it as well as he believeth the creation of the world, and Christ's birth of a virgin, which seem also to his reason repugnant,<sup>360</sup> if Christ in any plain place of Scripture said it, the truth appeareth otherwise. For unto him that is not with his own frowardness<sup>361</sup> blinded by the devil, the thing that he denieth is as plainly spoken as are the other twain that he saith he believeth. And some other wretches such as himself is, in folly and stubbornness deny both the other twain for the repugnance, as well as he doth this, which thing you have heard him already, with very foolish reasons, declare for so repugnant that he saith that God cannot do it, because it were, as he saith, a giving away of his glory. And therefore his heart once set and fixed on the wrong side, the devil causeth him so to delight in such fond<sup>362</sup> foolish arguments of his own invention that he cannot endure to turn his mind to the truth, but every text, be it never so plain, is dark<sup>363</sup> unto him, through the darkness of his own brain.

THE TWENTIETH CHAPTER

But now for because he saith that he will be content and satisfied in this matter with any one text truly taken, while I shall say that the texts that I shall bring him be by me truly taken, and he shall say nay, and shall say that I take them amiss and untruly, while he and I cannot agree upon the taking, but vary upon the exposition and the right understanding of them, by whom will he be judged, whether he or I take those texts truly? If by the congregation of Christian people, the whole Christian nations have this fifteen hundred year judged it against him. For all this while have they believed that Christ, at his Maundy, when he said, "This is my body,"<sup>364</sup> meant that it was his very body indeed, and ever have believed and yet do that it was so indeed. If he will have it judged by a general council, it hath been judged for me against him by more than one already, before his days and mine both. If he will be judged by the writings of the old holy doctors and saints, I have already showed you sufficiently that they have already judged this point against him. If he and I would vary upon the understanding of the old saints' words, besides that you see them yourself so plain that he shall in that point but show himself shameful and shameless, yet the general councils (which himself denieth not) having read and seen those holy doctors themselves, and many of those holy saints being present at those councils themselves, have thereby judged that point against him too. For no wise man will doubt but that among them they understood the doctors then as well as Master Masker doth now. If he say that he will, with his other more than twenty texts of Scripture of which he spoke before, disprove us the texts one or two that I bring for the Blessed Sacrament, then cometh he, you see well, to the selfsame point again, wherein he is overthrown already. For all the corps of Christendom of this fifteen hundred year before us, and all the old holy doctors and saints, and all the general councils, and all the marvelous miracles that God hath showed for the Blessed Sacrament yearly almost, and I ween daily too, what in one place and other, all which things prove the texts that I lay<sup>365</sup> to be meant and understood as I say. All they do thereby declare against him also that none of his more than twenty texts can in any wise<sup>366</sup> be well and right understood as he saith. For else<sup>367</sup> should it follow that diverse texts of Holy Scripture, not only seemed (which may well be) but also were indeed (which is a thing impossible and cannot be) contrarious and repugnant unto others.

Now good Christian readers, here you see that in his shift<sup>368</sup> that he useth, where he saith that he will believe any one text truly taken, we bring him for the true taking, upon our part, all these things that I have here shortly rehearsed<sup>369</sup> you, of which things himself denieth very few, that is to wit,<sup>370</sup> the old holy doctors to hold on our part, and the people of their time. But therein have I showed you diverse of the best sort against him. And the faith of the people of the diverse times appeareth by their books and by the councils. And then that the general councils and the miracles are on our part, of these two things he denieth neither nother. But since he can deny none of them, he despiseth both. And the holy councils of Christ's Church he calleth the antichristian synagogue. And God's miracles both Frith and he be fain<sup>371</sup> to call the works of the devil. And therefore, good Christian readers, while you see all this, ye see well enough that the texts of the Gospel which we lay for the blessed body of Christ in the Blessed Sacrament be clear and plain for the purpose, and Master Masker will not agree it so, but saith that we take them not truly, only because he will not perceive and confess the truth.

THE TWENTY-FIRST CHAPTER

Now whereas Master Masker saith of me further thus:

"As for his unwritten verities and the authority of his antichristian synagogue, unto which (the Scripture forsaken) he is now at last with shame enough compelled to flee, they be proved stark lies and very devilry."<sup>372</sup> Consider, good Christian readers, that in these words Master Masker telleth you two things: first, that I am, with shame enough, compelled to flee from the Scripture to mine unwritten verities, and to the authority of the antichristian synagogue, by which he meaneth the traditions and the determinations of the Catholic Church; the other that

364 See Lk 22:19. 365 cite 366 way

369 told 370 say 371 glad; obliged; inclined 372 CW 11: 314

the traditions and determinations of the Church be already proved stark lies and very devilry. For the first point, you see that in this matter of the Blessed Sacrament, which is one of the things that he meaneth, he hath not yet compelled me to flee from the Scripture. For I have well already proved you this point, and very plain and clearly, by the selfsame place of Scripture which Master Masker hath expounded and falsely would wrest it another way: that is to wit, the words of Christ written in the sixth chapter of Saint John. Now if I do for the proof of this point lay the tradition of the whole Catholic Church beside, which thing is also sufficient to prove the matter alone, is that a fleeing from the Scripture? If that be a fleeing from the Scripture, then might the old heretics very well have said the same unto all the old holy doctors that this new heretic saith now to me. For this wotteth<sup>373</sup> well every man that any learning hath: that those old holy doctors and saints laid against those old heretics not the Scripture only, but also the traditions unwritten, believed, and taught by the Church. And if Master Masker, when he shall defend his book, dare deny me that they so did, I shall bring you so many plain proofs thereof that be he never so shameless he shall be ashamed thereof. And if he cannot say nay but<sup>374</sup> that they so did, as I wot well he cannot, then you see well, good readers that by Master Masker's wise reason, those old heretics might have said against each of those old holy doctors and saints, as Master Masker saith against me now, that they had made him with shame enough flee from the Scripture, because he besides the Scripture proved the true faith and reproveth their false heresies, by the authority of the Catholic Church. Such strength have always, lo, Master Masker's arguments.

Now touching the second point, where he calleth the Catholic Church the antichristian synagogue, and the unwritten verities stark lies and devilry, he hath already showed and declared partly which things they be that himself meaneth by that name. For he hath before specified purgatory, pilgrimages, and praying to saints, honoring of images, and creeping to the cross, and hallowing of bells against evil spirits in tempests, and boughs on Palm Sunday, and believing in the Blessed Sacrament. And Tyn-dale, that is either himself or his fellow, mocketh under the same name the sacrament of aneling,<sup>375</sup> and calleth the sacrament of confirmation the but-tering of the boy's forehead, and had as lief<sup>376</sup> have at his christening sand put in his mouth as salt, and mocketh much at fasting.<sup>377</sup> And as for Lent, Father Frith under name of Brightwell,<sup>378</sup> in the revelation of Antichrist calleth it the foolish fast, which jest was undoubtedly revealed Father Frith by the spirit of the devil himself, the spiritual father of Antichrist.

So that you may see, good readers, that to say the litany, or our Lady Matins, and creep to the cross at Easter, or pray for all Christian souls, these things and such others as I have rehearsed you, Master Masker saith are already proved stark lies and very devilry. But he showeth us no such proof yet, neither of lies nor of devilry. But every man may soon see that he which saith so much and nothing proveth maketh many a stark lie, and that thus to rail against God and all good men and holy saints, and helping of good Christian souls, and railing against the blessed body of Christ in the Blessed Sacrament, calling the belief thereof devilry, if such railing in Master Masker be not (as I ween it is) very plain and open devilry, that can be no less yet at the leastwise than very plain and open knavery.

THE TWENTY-SECOND CHAPTER

Master Masker cometh at last to the mocking of those words of my epistle, wherein I show that if men would deny the conversion of the bread and wine into the blessed body and blood of Christ, because that unto his own reason the thing seemeth to imply repugnance,<sup>379</sup> he shall find many other things, both in Scripture, and in nature, and in handicrafts too, of the truth whereof he nothing doubteth, which yet for any solution that his own reason could find, other than the omnipotent power of God, would seem repugnant too, of which manner things other good holy doctors have in the matter of the Blessed Sacrament used some examples before.

Now forasmuch as<sup>380</sup> in these words I speak of the appearing of the face in the glass, and one face in every piece of the glass broken into twenty, Master

Masker hath caught that glass in hand and mocketh and moweth<sup>381</sup> in that glass, and maketh as many strange faces and as many pretty pots<sup>382</sup> therein, as<sup>383</sup> it were an old rivelled ape. For these are his words, lo:

5 Then saith he that ye wot well that many good folk have used in this matter many good fruitful examples of God's other works, not only miracles written in Scripture — unde versus? (“where one,” I pray ye?) — but also done by the common course of nature here in earth (if they be done by the common course of nature, so be they no miracles), and some things made also by man's hand, as one face beholden in diverse glasses, and in every piece of one glass broke into twenty, etc. Lord, how this pontifical poet playeth his part. Because, as he saith, we see many faces in many glasses, therefore may one body be in many places, as though every shadow and similitude representing the body were a bodily substance. But I ask More, when he seeth his own face in so many glasses, whether all those faces that appear in the glasses be his own very face, having bodily substance, skin, flesh, and bone, as hath that face which hath his very mouth, nose, eyes, etc., wherewith he faceth us out<sup>384</sup> the truth thus falsely with lies? And if they be all his very faces, then in very deed there is one body in many places, and he himself beareth as many faces in one hood. But according to his purpose, even as they be no very faces nor those so many voices, sounds, and similitudes, multiplied in the air between the glass or other object and the body (as the philosopher proveth by natural reason) be no very bodies, no more is it Christ's very body, as they would make the belief in the bread in so many places at once.<sup>385</sup>

Now good readers, to the end that you may see the customable<sup>386</sup> manner of Master Masker in rehearsing my matter to his own advantage, since my words in my letter that touch this point be not very long, I shall rehearse them here unto you myself; lo, good readers, thus shall you find it there in the twenty-sixth leaf:

I wot well that many good folk have used in this matter many good fruitful examples of God's other works, not only miracles written in Scripture, but also done by the common course of nature here in earth and some things made also by man's hand, as<sup>387</sup> one face beholden in diverse glasses and in every piece of one glass broken into twenty and the marvel of the making of the glass itself such matter as it is made of. And of one word coming whole to a hundred ears at once and the sight of one little eye present and beholding a whole great country at once with a thousand such other marvels more, such as those that see them daily done and therefore marvel not at them shall yet never be able, no, not this young man himself, to give such reason by what means they may be done, but that he may have such repugnance laid against it that he shall be fain<sup>388</sup> in conclusion for the chief, and the most evident reason, to say that the cause of all those things is because God that hath caused them so to be done is almighty of himself and can do what him list.<sup>389</sup>

Lo, good Christian readers, here you see yourself that I made none such argument as Master Masker beareth me in hand.<sup>390</sup> Nor no man useth<sup>391</sup> upon a similitude to conclude a necessary consequence in the matter of the Blessed Sacrament, unto which we can bring nothing so like,<sup>392</sup> but that indeed it must be far unlike, saving<sup>393</sup> that it is, as seemeth me,<sup>394</sup> somewhat like in this: that God is as able by his almighty power to make one body be in twenty places at once, as he is by common course of nature, which himself hath made, able to make one face, keeping still his own figure in his own place, cast yet and multiply the same figure of itself, into twenty pieces of one broken glass, of which pieces each hath a several<sup>395</sup> place. And as he is able, by the nature that himself made, to make one self<sup>396</sup> word that the speaker hath breathed out in the speaking to be forthwith<sup>397</sup> in the ears of a whole hundred persons, each of them occupying a several place, and that a good distance asunder, of which two things, as natural and as common as they both be, yet can I never cease to wonder, for all the reasons that ever I read of the philosopher. And likewise as I verily trust that the time shall come, when we shall, in the clear sight of Christ's Godhead, see this great miracle soiled,<sup>398</sup> and well perceive how it is, and how it may be that his blessed body is both in heaven and in earth, and in so many places at once, so think I verily that in the sight of his Godhead then, we shall also perceive a better cause of those two other things than ever any philosopher hath hitherto showed us yet, or else I ween for my part I shall never perceive them well.

But now whereas Master Masker mocketh mine argument, not which I made, but which himself maketh in my name and maketh it feeble for the nonce<sup>399</sup> that he may, when he hath made it at his own pleasure, soil it, as children make castles of tile shards and then make them their pastime in the throwing down again, yet is it not even so — so feeble as his own, where he argueth in the negative, as I lay the example for the affirmative. For as for the one that he maketh for me, though the argument be nought<sup>400</sup> for lack of form, yet holdeth it somewhat so-so, by the matter in that the consequent<sup>401</sup> — that is to wit, that God may make one body to be at once in many places — is, whatsoever Master Masker babble, a truth without question necessary.

But where he argueth for himself in the negative, by that that the bodily substance of the face is not in the glass, that therefore the bodily substance of our Savior Christ is not in the Blessed Sacrament, that argument hath no manner<sup>402</sup> hold at all. For the antecedent<sup>403</sup> is very true, and except<sup>404</sup> God's word be untrue, else<sup>405</sup> as I have already, by the old holy expositors of the same, well and plainly proved you the consequent is very false.

Now if he will say that he maketh not that argument, but useth only the face in the glass for an example and a similitude, then he showeth himself to play the false shrew,<sup>406</sup> when of my bringing in the selfsame example, he maketh that argument for me. And therefore now when upon those faces in the glass, he maketh and faceth himself that lie upon<sup>407</sup> me, and then scoffeth that I face out the truth with lies, and then proveth never one, he doth but show what pretty words he could speak, and how properly he could scoff, if the matter would serve him.

And yet I pray you, good readers, consider well the words of that argument that he maketh in mine name: “We see many faces in many glasses; therefore may one body be in many places.” Now spoke not

I, you wot well, of many faces seen in many glasses, as he both falsely and foolishly rehearseth me, but of one face seen at once in many glasses. For that is like to the matter. For like<sup>408</sup> as all those glasses, while only one man looketh in them, he seeth but his own one face in all those places, so be (as Saint Chrysostom declareth) all the Hosts of the Blessed Sacrament being in so far distant several places asunder, all one very body of our blessed Savior himself, and all one host, one sacrifice, and one oblation.

And as properly as Master Masker scoffeth at that example and similitude of the glass, I would not have misliked mine own wit<sup>409</sup> therein if the invention thereof had been mine own. For I find not many examples so meet<sup>410</sup> for the matter, to the capacity of good and unlearned folk, as it is. For as for the point of which Master Masker maketh all the difficulty, that one substance being but a creature might be in many places at once, every man that is learned seeth an example that satisfieth him shortly. For he seeth and perceiveth by good reason that the soul is indivisible and is in every part of the body, and in every part it is whole.<sup>411</sup> And yet is every member a several<sup>412</sup> place. And so is the Blessed Substance of the spiritual Body of Christ's flesh and his bones whole in every part of the Sacrament.

But this example of the soul cannot every man unlearned conceive and imagine right, but of the glass hath for his capacity a more meetly similitude, and that that in one point also doth more resemble the matter. For the soul forsaketh every member that is clean<sup>413</sup> divided from the body. But the blessed body of our Savior abideth still whole in every part of the Blessed Sacrament, though it be broken into never so many parts, as the image and form of the face abideth whole still to him that beholdeth it, in every part of the broken glass. And thus, good readers, as for this example and similitude of the face in the glass, Master Masker may, for his foolish facing it out,<sup>414</sup> be much ashamed, if he have any shame, whensoever he looketh on his own face in the glass.

And for conclusion, this being of the body of Christ in diverse places at once, since the old holy doctors and saints saw and perceived that the soul of every man, which is a very substance, and peradventure<sup>415</sup> yet of less spiritual power than the flesh

once would after their days begin to be taken for 5 so strange and hard a thing as these heretics make it now. And therefore they made nothing so great a matter of that point, but the thing that they thought men would most marvel of was the conversion and turning of the bread and the wine into Christ's very 10 flesh and blood. And therefore to make that point well open, and to make it sink into men's breasts, those old holy doctors and saints, as I said in these words which Master Masker mocketh, used many more good examples of things done by nature.

15 But then were they no miracles, saith Master Masker. And what then, good Master Masker?
Might they not serve to prove that God might do as much by miracle as nature by her common course?
Those words, lo, were by Master Masker (you see 20 well) very well and wisely put in.

THE TWENTY-THIRD CHAPTER

25 Over<sup>416</sup> this, toward the perceiving and belief of that point of conversion of the bread and the wine into the very flesh and blood of Christ, I said that those holy doctors and saints used examples of other miracles done by God and written in Holy Scripture.

30 Now at this word, Master Masker asketh me, Unde versus? ("Where one," I pray you?). You have heard already, good readers, in the fifteenth chapter of the first book, the words of that holy doctor Saint

Cyril, in which for the credence of that point — that is to wit, the changing of the bread and the wine into Christ's flesh and his blood, he bringeth the miracles that God wrought in the Old Law, as the changing 35 of the water into blood — and the changing of Moses's rod into a serpent,<sup>417</sup> and diverse other changes and mighty miracles more.

You have heard also before how Saint Chrysostom, against them that would doubt how Christ 40 could give them his flesh to eat, layeth forth the miracle of the multiplying of five loaves so suddenly to twelve baskets full more than the sufficient feeding of five thousand folk.<sup>418</sup>

45 Here be, lo, some verses yet, Master Masker, and more than one miracle, pardie,<sup>419</sup> that those holy doctors and saints have used in this matter of the Blessed Sacrament. And yet such others more shall I bring you at another leisure, ere I have done with 50 your second course, that it shall grieve you to see them. And surely where properly<sup>420</sup> you scoff at me with my many faces in one hood, I have here in this first part already brought you for the true faith of the Catholic Church, against your false 55 heresy, wherewith you would face our Savior out of<sup>421</sup> the Blessed Sacrament, I have brought against you to your face Saint Bede and Theophylactus, Saint Augustine, and Saint Hilary, Saint Irenaeus, Saint Cyril, and Saint Chrysostom, so many such 60 good faces into this one hood that all the shameful lies that your shameless face can make shall never against these faces be able to face out the truth. And thus end I, good readers, my fourth book.

Here endeth the Fourth Book.

THE FIFTH BOOK AND THE LAST OF THE FIRST PART

THE FIRST CHAPTER

5 Now come I, good Christian readers, to the last point that I spoke of, the two contradictions of mine own that Master Masker hath highly laid unto my charge, whose words I shall, good readers, first rehearse<sup>1</sup> you whole. Lo, these they be, God 10 save them:

At last note, Christian reader, that Master More in the third book of his Confutation of Tyndale, the 249th side, to prove Saint John's Gospel unperfect and insufficient for leaving out of so necessary a point of our faith, as he calleth the Last Supper of Christ, his Maundy, saith that John spoke nothing at all of this Sacrament.<sup>2</sup> And now see again in these his letters against Frith, how himself bringeth in John's sixth chapter to impugn Frith's writing, and to make all for the Sacrament, even thus: "My flesh is verily meat and my blood drink." Belike<sup>3</sup> the man had there overshot<sup>4</sup> himself foul, the young man here causing him to put on his spectacles and pore better and more wishly<sup>5</sup> with his old eyes upon Saint John's Gospel to find that thing there now written, which before he would have made one of his unwritten verities. As yet, if he look narrowly, he shall espy that himself hath proved us by Scripture, in the thirty-seventh leaf of his dialogue of "quoth he" and "quoth I," our Lady's perpetual virginity, expounding non cognosco, id est, non cognoscam, which now written unwritten verity he numbereth a little before among his unwritten vanities. Thus may ye see how this old holy upholder of the pope's Church, his words fight against themselves into his own confusion, in finding us forth his unwritten written vanities—40 verities, I should say. But return we unto the exposition of Saint John.<sup>6</sup>

Now have you, good Christian readers, heard his whole tale concerning my two contradictions, of which twain<sup>7</sup> I will first answer the last that concerneth the perpetual virginity of our Lady, which point I have touched toward the end of the twenty-fifth chapter of the first book of my dialogue, wherein Master Masker mocketh me for "quoth I" and "quoth he," and would I see well in no wise<sup>8</sup> that in the rehearsing of a communication had between myself and another man, I should not for shame say 50 "quoth I" and "quoth he," but rather rehearse our two talkings, with "quoth we" and "quoth she."

I have also spoken of that point in more places than one of my work that I wrote of Tyndale's Confutation,<sup>9</sup> which places, whoso list<sup>10</sup> to read shall find this point of contradiction answered already, that Master Masker now layeth to my charge,<sup>11</sup> dissimuling<sup>12</sup> such things as I have answered it with.

And of this contradiction I am so sore<sup>13</sup> ashamed that for all Master Masker's words even here before in my first book of this work, I have not letted<sup>14</sup> the best that my wit<sup>15</sup> will serve me this unwritten verity to prove yet again by the selfsame place of Saint Luke's holy writing.

For why,<sup>16</sup> to say the truth, I do not so much force<sup>17</sup> to have that article taken for an unwritten verity with good Catholic folk for the maintenance of my word as to have it for the honor of our Lady, taken and believed for an undoubted truth, with Catholics and those heretics too, that will take it for no such truth but if<sup>18</sup> it be written in Scripture.

Now doth the clear certainty of this article indeed depend upon the tradition of the apostles, continued in the Catholic Church. For albeit that<sup>19</sup> myself think that I find some words written in Scripture that would well prove it, and upon those words let<sup>20</sup> not to write mine own mind,<sup>21</sup> and diverse old holy doctors too, yet while I see that holy Saint Jerome himself, a man far otherwise seen<sup>22</sup> in Scripture than I, arguing for the defense of that article against that heretic Helvidius did only soil<sup>23</sup> the Scriptures that Helvidius laid against it, and layeth no Scripture himself for the proof of his part, but resteth therein to the authority of Christ's Catholic Church,<sup>24</sup> which Master Masker here calleth the antichristian synagogue, I neither dare nor will take so much upon myself as to affirm surely that it is proved to be a written verity. And this lack of taking, lo, so much upon myself is the thing that Master Masker calleth so shameful repugnance,<sup>25</sup> to my great confusion.

And therefore in that place of my Dialogue,<sup>26</sup> though I upon that word of our Lady, "In what wise shall this thing be done, for I know not a man?"<sup>27</sup> do reason and show my mind that it proveth for this part, as indeed methinketh it doth, yet I am not so bold upon mine own exposition therein as to affirm that the Scripture saith there openly and plainly that she was a perpetual virgin. For if it had been a very precise plain evident open proof of that matter, mine own mind giveth me that Saint Jerome would not have failed to have found it before me.

I shall also for this point have Master Masker himself to say somewhat for me, though he do therein (as he is often wont<sup>28</sup> to do) speak somewhat against himself. For he saith here himself that if a man look narrowly, then he shall espy that I have myself proved our Lady's perpetual virginity. Now since that Master Masker saith that a man cannot spy it but if he look narrowly, he saith, you see well, himself that it is no plain open proof. And then is it no proof to them, you wot<sup>29</sup> well. For they receive no Scripture for proof of any purpose but only plain, open, and evident.

And therefore by Master Masker's own tale, though I proved it sufficiently a written verity unto good Catholics, yet rested it unproved still a written verity unto such heretics, and against them, ye wot well, wrote I. Howbeit,<sup>30</sup> here will I demand of Master Masker, touching the perpetual virginity of our Lady to be plainly written in Holy Scripture, whether I prove that point well or not? If not, then may I well enough, notwithstanding any such proof of mine, say still that it is an unwritten verity. If he will confess that I prove it well, I will be content with that praise of himself to abide his rebuke of that contradiction. For I set more, as I said, by<sup>31</sup> the profit of his soul in falling from the contrary heresy to the right belief of our Lady's perpetual virginity than I set by mine own praise and commendation of abiding well by my words.

But yet if he will allow my proof made of that point, I marvel me much but if<sup>32</sup> that he allow now my proof made for the blessed body of Christ present in the Blessed Sacrament. For I am very sure I have proved much more clearly, by much more open and plain words of the Scripture, and the sense of those words by diverse old holy doctors, other manner of men than myself, than I have proved or any man else the perpetual virginity of our blessed Lady.

Howbeit, of truth, though I proved well that point of the perpetual virginity of our Lady to be a verity written in Scripture, and that many other also proved it much better than I, as I think there do, and that myself had affirmed it never so strongly for never so clear a written verity, yet since William Tyndale, against whom I specially wrote, taketh it, as in his writing well and plain appeareth, for no written verity, and yet agreeth that it is to be believed, but not of necessity, and yet after upon his own words I prove him that of necessity too, I may, without any contradiction or repugnance at all, lay it against him for an unwritten verity, for as much as himself so taketh it.

Moreover all the proof that I make of our Lady's perpetual virginity is no more but that she was a perpetual virgin except<sup>33</sup> she broke her vow. And surely as I say, it seemeth to myself that I prove this very clearly. And this being proved is indeed enough to good Christian folk for a full proof that she was a perpetual virgin. But yet unto these heretics against whom I wrote, since they set nought by<sup>34</sup> vows of virginity, but say that they that make them do both unlawfully make them, and may, when they will, lawfully break them, and that therefore friars may run out of religion and wed nuns, this proof of mine is to them no manner<sup>35</sup> proof at all. And therefore I may to them, without contradiction or repugnance, lay it for an unwritten verity still.

And thus I trust you see, good readers, that as for this repugnance, turneth to Master Masker's confusion and not mine.

THE SECOND CHAPTER

Now come I then, good readers, to the other contradiction that he layeth against me, his words wherein, before mine answer, I pray you read 5 once again. And lest ye should be loath to turn back and seek them, here shall you have them again; lo, these they be:

At last note, Christian reader, that Master More, in the third book of his Confutation of Tyndale, 10 the 249th side, to prove Saint John's Gospel unperfect and insufficient for leaving out of so necessary a point of our faith, as he calleth the Last Supper of Christ, his Maundy, saith that John spoke nothing at all of this Sacrament. And 15 now see again in these his letters against Frith, how himself bringeth in John's sixth chapter to impugn Frith's writing, and to make all for the Sacrament, even thus: "My flesh is verily<sup>36</sup> meat and my blood drink." Belike<sup>37</sup> the man had there 20 overshot<sup>38</sup> himself foul, the young man here causing him to put on his spectacles and pore better and more wishly<sup>39</sup> with his old eyes upon Saint John's Gospel to find that thing there now written, which before he would have made one of his 25 unwritten verities.<sup>40</sup>

When myself, good reader, read first these words of his, albeit that I was sure enough that in the things that I purposed there was no repugnance 30 indeed, yet seeing that he so diligently laid forth the leaf in which my fault should be found, I very plainly thought that I had not so circumspectly seen unto my words as wisdom would I should.<sup>41</sup> And taking therefore mine oversight<sup>42</sup> for a very truth, I never vouchsafed<sup>43</sup> to turn my book and look.

But afterward it happed on a day I said in a certain company that I was somewhat sorry that it had 35 mishapped me to take in this one point no better heed to mine hand, but to write therein two things repugnant and contrary, whereunto some of them made answer that such a chance happeth sometimes 40 ere<sup>44</sup> a man be aware in a long work. "But yet," quoth one of them, a gentlewoman, "have you considered well the place in your book, and seen that he saith truth?" "Nay, by my troth,"<sup>45</sup> quoth I,

"that have I not. For it irketh me to look upon the 45 place again now when it is too late to mend it. For I am sure the man would not be so mad to name the very leaf, but if<sup>46</sup> he were well sure that he said true." "By our Lady," quoth she, "but since you have not looked it yourself, I will, for all the leaf laid out 50 by him, see the thing myself ere I believe his writing, I know these fellows for so false." And therewithal she sent for the book, and turned to the very 249th side, and with that number marked also. And in good faith, good readers, there found we no such 55 manner matter, neither on the one side of the leaf nor on the other.<sup>47</sup>

Howbeit, of truth, I cannot deny but that in a side after mismarked with the number of 249, which 60 should have been marked with the number of 259, there we found the matter in that place. But therein found we the most shameful either folly or falsehood of Master Masker that ever I saw lightly<sup>48</sup> in any man in my life, which because ye shall not seek 65 far to find, I shall rehearse you here the very words of that place. Lo, good readers, these they be:

But now because of Tyndale, let us take some one thing. And what thing rather than the Last 70 Supper of Christ, his Maundy with his apostles, in which he instituted the Blessed Sacrament of the altar, his own blessed body and blood. Is this no necessary point of faith? Tyndale cannot deny it for a necessary point of faith and though<sup>49</sup> it were but of his own false faith, agreeing with Luther, Hussgen, or Zwingli. And he cannot say 75 that Saint John speaketh anything thereof, specially not of the institution. Nor he cannot say that Saint John speaketh anything of the Sacrament at all, since that his sect expressly denieth that Saint John meant the Sacrament in his words
80 where he speaketh expressly thereof in the sixth chapter of his Gospel.<sup>50</sup>

Where have you ever, good Christian readers, seen any fond<sup>51</sup> fellow before this handle a thing 85 so falsely or so foolishly as Master Masker here handleth this? He telleth you that I said here that Saint John spoke nothing of the Sacrament at all. Now you see that Master Masker in that point belieth<sup>52</sup> me. For I said not here that Saint John spoke nothing thereof, but first I said there that Tyndale, against whom I there wrote, could not say that Saint John wrote anything of the Blessed Sacrament, specially not of the institution thereof. And this is very truth. For as touching the institution thereof at Christ's Last Supper and Maundy, neither Tyndale nor no man else can say that Saint John anything wrote thereof in his Gospel.

Then said I further there, as you see, not that Saint John speaketh nothing of the Sacrament, but that Tyndale cannot say that Saint John speaketh of the Sacrament anything at all. And that I meant not in those words, to say mine own self, that Saint John spoke nothing thereof, I declare plainly there forthwith,<sup>53</sup> by that I show the cause why Tyndale cannot say that Saint John spoke anything of the Sacrament at all—that is to wit,<sup>54</sup> because that all his sect expressly denieth that anything was meant of the Sacrament in the words of Christ written in the sixth chapter of Saint John.

By this ye may see plainly, good readers, that Master Masker plainly belieth me. For I said not myself that Saint John spoke nothing of the Sacrament, but that Tyndale, because of the opinion of all his sect in that point, could not say that Saint John spoke anything thereof, which was enough for my purpose, while Tyndale was the man against whom I wrote, though myself would for mine own part say the contrary. For it is that kind of argument that is in the schools called argumentum ad hominem.<sup>55</sup> And thus you see, good readers, Master Masker in this thing either shamefully false, or very shamefully foolish: shamefully false, if he perceived and understood my words, and then for all that thus belieth me; shamefully foolish if the thing being spoken by me so plain, his wit<sup>56</sup> would not serve him to perceive it.

But now as clear as ye see the matter already by this, to the intent yet that Master Masker shall have no matter left him in all this world to make any argument of for his excuse therein, read my words again, good readers, and bid Master Masker mark well my words therein, where I say expressly that Saint John spoke expressly thereof in the sixth chapter of his Gospel. For these words are, as you see, there the very last words of all: “Nor Tyndale cannot say that Saint John speaketh anything of the Sacrament at all, since that his sect expressly denieth that Saint John meant the Sacrament in his words where he speaketh expressly thereof in the sixth chapter of his Gospel.”

Whose words are these? Where he speaketh expressly thereof? Are not these words mine? And do I not in these words expressly say that Saint John expressly speaketh of the Blessed Sacrament in the sixth chapter of his Gospel, in which place Tyndale's sect saith expressly that he nothing spoke thereof? And now saith Master Masker that I said there that Saint John spoke nothing thereof at all, and layeth it for a foul repugnance<sup>57</sup> in me that in my letter against Frith, I say thereof the contrary.

But how now, Master Masker? What have you now to say? With what shameful shift<sup>58</sup> will your shameless face face us out<sup>59</sup> this foolish lie of yours, that you make upon me here? If you lied so loud wittingly,<sup>60</sup> how can you look<sup>61</sup> that any man should trust your word? If for lack of understanding, how can you look then for shame that any man should trust your wit? Why should we think that your wit will pierce into the perceiving of hard words in the Holy Scripture of God when it will not serve you to perceive such poor plain words of mine?

Ye write that the young man hath here made me don on my spectacles and look more wishly<sup>62</sup> on the matter, to find now written therein the thing that I said before was not written therein. But now must you look more wishly upon my words, on which you make here so loud a lie, and pore better on them with your spectacles upon your Masker's nose.

I wist<sup>63</sup> once a good fellow, which while he danced in a mask, upon boldness that no man could have known him, when he perceived that he was well espied by his evil-favored<sup>64</sup> dancing, he waxed<sup>65</sup> so ashamed suddenly that he softly said unto his fellow, “I pray you tell me, doth not my visor blush red?” Now surely, good readers, Master Masker here, if he were not utterly past shame, hath cause enough to be in this point so sore<sup>66</sup> ashamed that he might ween<sup>67</sup> the glowing of his visage should even pierce through his visor, and make it red for shame.

Thus have I now, good Christian readers, answered at the full in these five books of my first part,

<sup>61</sup> expect <sup>62</sup> fixedly, intently <sup>63</sup> knew <sup>64</sup> ugly <sup>65</sup> became <sup>66</sup> greatly <sup>67</sup> think, believe the first part of Master Masker's work, and taken up the first course of Master Masker's Supper, which he falsely calleth the last supper of the Lord, while 5 he hath with his own poisoned cookery made it the supper of the devil. And yet would the devil, I ween, disdain to have his supper dressed of such a rude ruffin,<sup>68</sup> such a scald<sup>69</sup> Colyn cook as under the name of a clerk, so ribaldiously railleth against 10 the blessed body of Christ in the Blessed Sacrament of the altar.

THE THIRD CHAPTER

But one thing will I yet rehearse you that I have hitherto deferred: that is to wit, my first argu-15 ment against Frith, which, as I showed you before, Master Masker let go by, as he hath done many things more, and made as though he saw them not.
That argument, good readers, was this:

In this heresy, besides the common faith of all 20 Catholic Christian regions, the expositions of all the old holy doctors and saints be clear against Frith, as whole as against any heretic that ever was hitherto heard of. For as for the words of Christ of which we speak touching the Blessed Sacra-25 ment, though he may find some old holy men that besides the literal sense doth expound them in an allegory, yet he shall never find any of them that did as he doth now, after<sup>70</sup> Wycliffe, Oecol-ampadius, Tyndale, and Zwingli, deny the literal 30 sense, and say that Christ meant not that it was his very<sup>71</sup> body and his very blood indeed, but the old holy doctors and expositors, besides all such allegories, do plainly declare and expound that in those words, our Savior as he expressly spoke 35 so did also well and plainly mean that the thing which he there gave to his disciples in the Sacrament was in very deed his very flesh and blood.
And so did never any of the old expositors of Scripture expound any of those other places in 40 which Christ is called a vine or a door. And therefore it appeareth well that the manner of speaking was not like.<sup>72</sup> For if it had, then would not the old expositors have used such so far unlike fashion in the expounding of them.<sup>73</sup>

This was, lo, good readers, the first argument of mine that Master Masker met with, and which he 45 should first therefore have soiled.<sup>74</sup> But it is such as he listed<sup>75</sup> little to look upon. For whereas he maketh much ado<sup>76</sup> to have it seem that both these words of our Savior at his Last Supper, "This is my body," 50 and his words of eating of his flesh and drinking of his blood, written in the sixth chapter of Saint John, should be spoken in a like phrase and manner of speaking, as were his other words, "I am the door" and "I am the very vine," I showed there unto Frith, 55 whom Master Masker maketh as though he would defend, that by the expositions of all the old holy doctors and saints that have expounded all those four places before, the difference well appeareth, since none of them declare him to be a very material 60 door, nor a natural very vine. This saith no man not so much as a very natural fool. But that in the Sacrament is his very natural body, his very flesh and his blood, this declare clearly all the old holy expositors of the Scripture, which were good men and gracious, 65 wise and well-learned both. And therefore, as I said, the difference may soon be perceived, but if<sup>77</sup> Master Masker list better to believe himself than all them, which if he do, as indeed he doth, then is he much more fool than a natural fool indeed.

For as for his three places of Saint Augustine, Ter-70 tullian, and Saint Chrysostom,<sup>78</sup> whom he bringeth in his second part, I shall in my second part in taking up of his second course, when we come to fruit, pare him, I warrant you, those three pears so near that he getteth not a good morsel among them, and 75 yet peradventure ere<sup>79</sup> I come at it too.

For so is it now, good readers, that I very certainly know that that book which Frith made last against the Blessed Sacrament is come over into this realm 80 in print, and secretly sent abroad into the brethren's hands and some good sisters too. And forasmuch as<sup>80</sup> I am surely informed for truth that Frith hath into that book of his taken many texts of old holy doctors, wilily handled by false Friar Hussgen be-85 fore, to make it falsely seem that the old holy doctors and saints were favorers of their false heresy, therefore will I for the while set Master Masker's second part aside till I have answered that pestilent peevish book of John Frith, about which I purpose 90 to go as soon as I can get one of them, which so many being abroad, shall I trust not be long too. And then shall I, by the grace and help of Almighty God, make you the folly and the falsehood of Frith and Friar Hussgen both as open and as clear as I have in this work made open and clear unto you the falsehood and the folly of Master Masker here.

And whereas I, a year now passed and more, wrote and put in print a letter against the pestilent treatise of John Frith,<sup>81</sup> which he then had made and secretly sent abroad among the brethren, against the Blessed Sacrament of the altar, which letter of mine, as I have declared in mine Apology, I nevertheless caused to be kept still and would not suffer<sup>82</sup> it to be put out abroad into every man's hands, because Frith's treatise was not yet at that time in print, yet now since I see that there are comen over in print, not only Frith's book,<sup>83</sup> but over<sup>84</sup> that this Masker's book also, and that either of their both books maketh mention of my said letter, and would seem to soil<sup>85</sup> it, and laboreth sore<sup>86</sup> thereabout, I do therefore now suffer the printer to put with this book my said letter also to sale.

And forasmuch also as those authorities of Saint Augustine, Saint Chrysostom, and Tertullian, which Master Masker layeth in his second part,<sup>87</sup> I shall of likelihood find also in Frith's book, and therefore answer them there, and all Master Masker's whole matter too, before I return to his second part, which yet I will after all this, God willing, not leave nor let go, so in the meanwhile, may Master Masker (since it is, as he saith, so great pleasure to him to be written against, having, as he boasteth, all solutions so readily) look and assay<sup>88</sup> whether he can soil these things with which I have in this first part overthrow his whole heresy, and proved him very plain a very false fool already, of whose false wily folly to beware our Lord give us grace, and of all such other like, which with foolish arguments of their own blind reason, wresting the Scripture into a wrong sense, against the very plain words of the text, against the expositions of all the old holy saints, against the determinations of diverse whole general councils, against the full consent of all true Christian nations this fifteen hundred year before their days, and against the plain declaration of almighty God himself, made in every Christian country by so many plain open miracles, labor now to make us so foolishly blind and mad as to forsake the very true Catholic faith, forsake the society of the true Catholic Church, and with sundry sects of heretics fallen out thereof, to set both holy days and fasting days at nought,<sup>89</sup> and for the devil's pleasure to forbear and abstain from all prayer to be made either for souls or to saints, jest on our Blessed Lady the immaculate mother of Christ, make mocks at all pilgrimages, and creeping of Christ's cross, the holy ceremonies of the Church and the sacraments to turn them into trifling, with likening them to wine garlands and ale-poles,<sup>90</sup> and finally, by these ways in the end and conclusion, forsake our Savior himself in the Blessed Sacrament, and instead of his own blessed body and his blood ween there were nothing but bare bread and wine, and call it idolatry there to do him honor. But woe may such wretches be. For this we may be sure: that whoso dishonor God in one place with occasion of a false faith, standing<sup>91</sup> that false belief and infidelity, all the honor that he doth him anywhere besides is odious and despitiful<sup>92</sup> and rejected of<sup>93</sup> God, and never shall save that faithless soul from the fire of hell, from which our Lord give them grace truly to turn in time, so that we and they together in one Catholic Church, knit unto God together in one Catholic faith — faith, I say, not faith alone as they do, but accompanied with good hope, and with her chief sister, well-working charity — may so receive Christ's blessed sacraments here, and specially that we may so receive himself, his very blessed body, very flesh and blood, in the Blessed Sacrament, our holy blessed housel, that we may here be with him incorporated so by grace, that after the short course of this transitory life, with his tender pity poured upon us in purgatory, at the prayer of good people and intercession of holy saints, we may be with them in their holy fellowship, incorporated in Christ in his eternal glory. Amen.

A Treatise upon the Passion of Christ

Most of Thomas More's unfinished Treatise on the Passion of Christ was probably written early in 1534, before his imprisonment on April 17 (CW 13: xli). Like the Sadness of Christ, this Treatise quotes biblical passages from John Gerson's Monotessaron (a Gospel harmony from the early 1400s), followed by commentaries that are referred to in this work as "exposition," "lecture," or "homily." Unlike Sadness, however, most sections of Treatise are followed by a related prayer. The other major source informing More's Treatise is the Catena aurea, or "Golden Chain," of Thomas Aquinas, which presents the text of the Gospels part by part, link by link, followed by relevant comments from the Church fathers (xliv). As More remarks in the title paragraph, his exposition is "taken for the more part out of the sayings of sundry good old holy doctors," whose writings he had studied since the beginning of his career.

A Treatise on the Passion of Christ is generally considered a continuation of More's doctrinal writings on the Eucharistic controversies of the time, and is possibly the second part of More's Answer to a Poisoned Book. Garry Haupt understands the Treatise as an expression of More's humanism: "More draws together devotional and exegetical currents in a work of the Christian humanist rhetorician attempting to persuade, to 'move,' rhetorically, his readers" (li). In his Treatise, More unites eloquence, piety, and learning in a synthesis that communicates "a feeling of heightened ordinary humanity avoiding extremes of intellectual and religious sensibility, solidly rooted on this earth in a world of common sense and yet looking confidently to heaven" (cxxii). More remarks in the short introduction to the Treatise that he writes for himself, and for readers like him, who in their human imprudence and forgetfulness, bestow little consideration on the hereafter, and "so little remember to labor and provide that they may have some house commodious for their ease, and well favoredly trimmed to their pleasure" in heaven.

Though incomplete, More's Treatise reflects his lifelong interest in the Passion as an example of Christ's charity and fortitude. As early as the The Life of Pico in 1510, for example, he writes of Christ's ascent to heaven "by manly fight / and bitter passion." As late as May 1535, in a letter to Margaret Roper, he shares with his daughter what he had told his interrogators: "I had fully determined with myself neither to study nor meddle with any matter of this world, but that my whole study should be upon the Passion of Christ and mine own passage out of this world." His last book, The Sadness of Christ, is a commentary on the example of Christ "the captain," and his experience of suffering in the garden of Gethsemane. Opposite God's love, in More's judgment, stands the sin of pride. The Treatise begins with More's account of the fall of the angels, the creation, and the fall of man, and More counsels readers to consider and beware the least "spice" or trace of pride, presented as the "pestilence" through which human beings fall first into "the delight and liking of themselves," and then proceed to neglecting, condemning, and finally forsaking God. "The premise of the Treatise," Seymour Baker House contends, "is that we are engaged in a perpetual spiritual war," one in which the Passion emerges as a most useful weapon and "remedy."

The Treatise breaks off after More's discussion of the washing of the feet (John 13) and in the midst of his third "lecture" on the Eucharist. As Louis Martz and Garry Haupt have indicated, More's thoughts at the end of the Treatise on the Passion are completed by the treatise that was published separately under the title of A Treatise to Receive the Blessed Body of Our Lord Sacramentally and Virtually Both. That text immediately follows the Treatise on the Passion in this edition.

More's Treatise was only published in full for the first time in Rastell's 1557 Workes. This edition of the Treatise is based on the text in volume 13 of The Yale Edition of the Complete Works of St. Thomas More. Garry E. Haupt's abbreviated edition, glossed and with standardized spelling and punctuation (part of Yale's Modernized Series) was published in 1980 and is also used extensively here.

A Treatise upon the Passion of Christ

A treatise historical, containing the bitter Passion of our Savior Christ, after the course and order of the four evangelists, with an exposition upon their words, taken for the more part out of the sayings of sundry good old holy doctors,<sup>1</sup> and beginning at the first assembly of the bishops, the priests, and the seniors<sup>2</sup> of the people about the contriving of Christ's death, written in the twenty-sixth chapter of Saint Matthew, the fourteenth of Saint Mark, and in the twenty-second of Saint Luke. And it endeth in the committing of his blessed body into his sepulchre, with the frustrate<sup>3</sup> provision of the Jews about the keeping thereof with soldiers appointed thereto, written in the twenty-seventh of Saint Matthew, the fifteenth of Saint Mark, the twenty-third of Saint Luke, and the nineteenth of Saint John.

FIRST: AN INTRODUCTION UNTO THE STORY

15 Non habemus hic civitatem manentem, sed futuram inquirimus* (“We have not here a dwelling city, but we seek the city that is to come”).<sup>4</sup>

If it be (good Christian reader) true, as out of doubt it is even very true, that (as Saint Paul in the afore-rehearsed words saith) we have not here any city to dwell in, but we be seeking for the city that we shall dwell in hereafter, then seemeth me<sup>5</sup> that many men are very far overseen,<sup>6</sup> such men, I mean, as I am (alack) myself, that so much time and study beset<sup>7</sup> about their night's lodging here in passing by the way, and so little remember to labor and provide<sup>8</sup> that they may have some house commodious for their ease, and well-favoredly trimmed<sup>9</sup> to their pleasure, in that place whither once go we shall, and when we come once there, dwell there we shall and inhabit there forever.

Sir Thomas More wrote no more of this introduction.

The First Point: The Fall of Angels

The glorious blessed Trinity—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, three distinct and diverse equal and like mighty persons, and all three nevertheless one undivisible and indistinct infinite almighty God, being from before all time eternally stablished in the infinite perfection of their incomprehensible and undecayable glory—did when it pleased themselves, not of any necessity nor for increase of any commodity<sup>10</sup> that their full and perfect and not increasable bliss could receive thereby, but only of their mere<sup>11</sup> liberal goodness, create of nothing the noble high beautiful nature of angels to make some creatures partners of the Creator's goodness. And albeit that<sup>12</sup> in that excellent company of angels all were not of like perfection, but ordinally<sup>13</sup> divided into diverse orders and degrees, the higher in excellence of nature far surmounting the lower, yet did the lowest far pass<sup>14</sup> and excel the natural state that mankind afterward had in his<sup>15</sup> creation.

But yet had not the angels forthwith<sup>16</sup> in their creation given unto them the perfect bliss, heaven, nor were forthwith endued<sup>17</sup> with the very<sup>18</sup> fruition and plain beholding of the glorious Trinity, but were left in the hand of their own free will and liberty, either with help of God's grace, by turning to God with laud<sup>19</sup> and thanks for that they had already of his gift to be received by grace unto that glory, or else willingly declining from grace and turning themselves from God, as graceless caitiffs frowardly<sup>20</sup> to fall into wretchedness. For if they had once already had the very sight of God at that time, in such wise as the glorious company of angels and saved souls blessedly have it now, the heavenly beholding thereof must needs have been so delectable and so joyful unto them, and so should have pierced and fulfilled them thoroughly with sweetness, that it should not have left any place in them for any contrarious appetite or affection<sup>21</sup> to enter. But now, standing<sup>22</sup> thus in the liberty of themselves, with those excellent beauteous gifts of their nature, and being by grace moved to turn unto God and love him and give him condign<sup>23</sup> thanks for the same, great multitude followed that instinct of grace, and so did, and were of God therefore exalted into the clear sight of the Godhead and by grace confirmed and established in the full surety of joyful perfect bliss and everlasting glory.

Lucifer, on the other side, an angel of excellent brightness, willfully letting slip the grace and aid of God, wherewith he was stirred to look upward unto his Maker, began in such wise<sup>24</sup> to look downward upon himself and so far-forth<sup>25</sup> to delight and dote in the regarding and beholding of his own beauty that, albeit<sup>26</sup> he well wist<sup>27</sup> he had a Maker infinitely far above him, yet thought he himself meet to be his match. And as wise as he was of nature, yet pride made him so frantic<sup>28</sup> that he boasted that he would be God's fellow<sup>29</sup> in deed, saying unto himself, In caelum conscendam super astra Dei. Exaltabo solium meum et sedebo in monte testamenti in lateribus aquilonis. Ascendam super altitudinem nubium: similis ero altissimo ("I will ascend into the heaven above the stars of God. I will exalt my seat and will sit in the hill of the testament<sup>30</sup> in the sides of the north. I will ascend above the height of the clouds, and I will be like unto the highest").<sup>31</sup> But as he used this blasphemous presumption in his mind against the great majesty of God, he was suddenly cast out and thrown down with an infinite number of the like traitorous angels, as the prophet Isaiah toucheth<sup>32</sup> him in these words: Quomodo cecidisti de caelo Lucifer, qui mane oriebaris? Corruisti in terram ("How art thou fallen out of the heaven, Lucifer, that sprangest in the morning? Thou art fallen into the earth").<sup>33</sup> And afterward he saith, Veruntamen ad infernum detraheris in profundum lacu ("Howbeit thou shalt be drawn down into hell into the depth of the lake").<sup>34</sup> These words, with others, the prophet Isaiah rehearseth in the fourteenth chapter in resembling<sup>35</sup> the fall of Nebuchadnezzar unto the ruin of Lucifer.

And as well of<sup>36</sup> his fall as the fall of his fellows may well be verified the words of Saint John in his Apocalypse, where he saith in the twelfth chapter, Et factum est praelium magnum in caelo. Michael et angeli eius praeliabantur cum dracone, et draco pugnabat et angeli eius, et non valuerunt, neque locus inventus est eorum amplius in caelo. Et proiectus est draco ille magnus, serpens antiquus qui vocatur diabolus, et Satanus qui seducit universum orbem. Et proiectus est in terram, et angeli eius cum eo missi sunt ("There was a great battle in heaven. Michael and his angels fought with the dragon. And the dragon and his angels fought and were not able, nor their place was no more found in heaven. And out was thrown that great dragon, the old serpent which is called the devil, and Satan which seduceth and deceiveth the whole world, and he is thrown down into the earth, and his angels be cast down with him").<sup>37</sup>

Thus the inflexible justice of almighty God cast out of heaven Lucifer and all his wicked proud spirits and deprived them from his grace forever, and thereby from all hope and comfort of recovery of any manner attaining to the celestial glory, but forever condemned to pain, howbeit<sup>38</sup> not to the uttermost part of their pain at the first, nor all to pain alike. But as their offenses were not all alike, but some part of them by reason of their more noble nature and greater gifts of God received, their unkindness so much the more, and their sin so much the more grievous, and in diverse angels also diverse degrees of malice, in some the more, in some the less, so did the righteousness of God temper and proportion their punishments, driving the great devil down into the deep dark den of hell, into the very bottom and center of the earth, and others hover about into the air and over part of the earth and the sea, which with continual recourse and counsel had with their chief prince and ruler Lucifer, that reigneth as king over all the children of pride, do (and shall do till the Day of Doom) persecute, attempt,<sup>39</sup> deceive, trouble, vex, and punish such as they can catch into their claws of the seely<sup>40</sup> sinful kind<sup>41</sup> of man. And then at the final judgment, they shall all (as they to their further discomfort be surely showed already) lose all their authority and rule over man, and enter with evil men into the self-same infernal fire that was first and principally prepared for themselves, and therein shall they, with the sinful souls that have left God and followed them, in torments intolerable burn in hell forever.

Let us here now, good readers, before we proceed further, consider well this matter, and ponder well this fearful point: what horrible peril there is in the pestilent sin of pride, what abominable sin it is in the sight of God when any creature falleth into the delight and liking of itself—as the thing, whereupon continued, inevitably faileth not to follow: first the neglecting, and after the contemning, and finally, with disobedience and rebellion, the very full forsaking of God.

If God was so wroth with pride that he spared not to drive down into hell for pride the noble high excellent angels of heaven, what state<sup>42</sup> can there be so great in this wretched world that hath not high cause to tremble and quake every joint in his body as soon as he feeleth a high proud thought enter once into his heart, remembering the terrible commination<sup>43</sup> and threat of God in Holy Scripture: Potentes potenter tormenta patientur<sup>44</sup> (“The mighty men shall mightily suffer torments”). And then if it be so sore<sup>45</sup> a thing and so far unsitting<sup>46</sup> in the sight of God to see the sin of pride in the person of a great estate, that hath yet many occasions of inclination thereunto, how much more abominable is that peevish<sup>47</sup> pride in a lewd unthrifty javel,<sup>48</sup> that hath a purse as penniless as any poor peddler, and hath yet a heart as high as many a mighty prince. And if it be odious in the sight of God that a woman beautiful indeed abuse the pride of her beauty to the vainglory of herself, how delectable is that dainty damsel to the devil, that standeth in her own light and taketh herself for fair, weening<sup>49</sup> herself well-liked for her broad forehead, while the young man that beholdeth her marketh more her crooked nose. And if it be a thing detestable for any creature to rise in pride upon the respect and regard of personage, beauty, strength, wit, or learning, or other such manner<sup>50</sup> thing as by nature and grace are properly their own, how much more foolish abusion<sup>51</sup> is there in that pride by which we worldly folk look up on height<sup>52</sup> and solemnly set by<sup>53</sup> ourselves, with deep disdain of other far better men, only for very vain worldly trifles that properly be not our own? How proud be men of gold and silver, no part of ourselves, but of the earth, and of nature no better than is the poor copper or tin, nor to man’s use so profitable as is the poor metal that maketh us the ploughshare, and horseshoes, and horse nails? How proud be many men of these glittering stones, of which the very brightest, though he<sup>54</sup> cost thee twenty pounds, shall never shine half so bright nor show thee half so much light as shall a poor halfpenny candle? How proud is many a man over his neighbor because the wool of his gown is finer? And yet as fine as it is, a poor sheep wore it on her back before it came upon his, and all the while she wore it, were her wool never so fine, yet was she pardie<sup>55</sup> but a sheep. And why should he be now better than she by that wool, that, though it be his, is yet not so verily his as it was verily hers?

But now how many men are there proud of that that<sup>56</sup> is not theirs at all? Is there no man proud of keeping another man’s gate? another man’s horse? another man’s hound or hawk? What a bragging maketh a bearward<sup>57</sup> with his silver-buttoned baldric<sup>58</sup> for pride of another man’s bear? Howbeit,<sup>59</sup> what speak we of other men’s and our own? I can see nothing, the thing well-weighed, that any man may well call his own. But as men may call him a fool that beareth himself proud because he jetteth<sup>60</sup> about in a borrowed gown, so may we be well called very<sup>61</sup> fools all if we bear us proud of anything that we have here. For nothing have we here of our own, not so much as our own bodies, but have borrowed it all of God, and yield it we must again, and send our seely soul out naked no man can tell how soon. “What hast thou,” saith Saint Paul, “that thou hast not received? And if thou have received it, whereof gloriest thou, as though thou haddest not received it?<sup>62</sup> All that ever we have, of God we have received: riches, royalty, lordship, beauty, strength, learning, wit, body, soul, and all. And almost all these things hath he but lent us. For all these must we depart from every whit again, except our soul alone. And yet that must we give God again also, or else shall we keep it still<sup>63</sup> with such sorrow as we were better lose it. And for the misuse thereof and of our bodies therewith, and of all the remnant of that borrowed ware whereof we be now so proud, we shall yield a full strait<sup>64</sup> account and come to a heavy reckoning, and many a thousand, body and soul together, burn in hell eternally, for the peevish<sup>65</sup> pride of that borrowed ware so gloriously boasted before in the transitory time and short soon-passed life of this fond wretched world. For surely this sin of pride, as it is the first of all sins, begun among the angels in heaven, so is it the head and root of all other sins and of them all most pestilent.

But it is not my purpose to declare<sup>66</sup> here, by the manifold branches thereof, all the kinds of mischief that proceedeth upon it (for that would occupy more time than were meet for this present matter), but only will I counsel every man and woman to beware even of the very least spice<sup>67</sup> thereof, which seemeth to be the bare delight and liking of ourselves for anything that either is in us or outwardly belonging to us. Let us every man lie well in await<sup>68</sup> of ourselves, and let us mark well when the devil first casteth any proud vain thought into our mind, and let us forthwith make a cross on our breast and bless it out by and by<sup>69</sup> and cast it at his head again. For if we gladly take in one such guest of his, he shall not fail to bring in two of his<sup>70</sup> fellows soon after, and every one worse than other.<sup>71</sup> This point expresseth well the Spirit of God by the mouth of the prophet, where he noteth the perilous progress of proud folk, in the person of whom he saith in this wise: Dixerunt linguam nostram magnificabimus, labia nostra a nobis sunt, quis noster dominus est? (“They have said, ‘We will magnify our tongues; our lips be our own; who is our Lord?’”)<sup>72</sup> First they begin, lo, but as it were with a vain delight and pride of their eloquent speech, and say they will set it out goodly to the show,<sup>73</sup> wherein yet seemeth little harm save a fond foolish vanity if they went no farther. But the devil, that bringeth them to that point first, intendeth not to suffer<sup>74</sup> them rest and remain there, but shortly he maketh them think and say farther: Labia nostra a nobis sunt (“Our lips be our own, we have them of ourselves”). At what point are they now, lo? Do they not now the thing that God hath lent them take for their own, and will not be aknow<sup>75</sup> that it is his? And thus become they thieves unto God. And yet, lo, the devil will not leave them thus neither, but carrieth them forth farther unto the very worst point of all. For when they say once that their lips be their own and of themselves, then against the truth that they have their lips lent them of our Lord, their proud hearts arise and they ask, Quis noster dominus est? (“Who is our Lord?”), and so deny that they have any Lord at all. And thus, lo, beginning but with a vain pride of their own praise, they become secondly thieves unto God, and finally from thieves they fall to be plain rebellious traitors, and refuse to take God for their God, and fall into the detestable pride that Lucifer fell to himself. Let us therefore (as I said, good Christian readers) beware of this horrible vice, and resist well the very first motions thereof; and the first suggestions<sup>76</sup> of the devil, as the young infants of Babylon, let us all-to frush<sup>77</sup> and break in pieces against the stone<sup>78</sup> — that is, our sure strong Savior Christ — with consideration of his great humility, by which he (being as verily God as man) humbled himself for our sake (to redeem us out of the proud devil’s dominion) unto the vile death of the cross, which is the matter of his bitter passion, whereof I have taken in hand to treat, and have for the first point toward it told you the sore<sup>79</sup> fall of the proud angels, whereby in part the occasion of our damnation, and consequently for our redemption the occasion of Christ’s Passion grew.

and so resist the proud suggestions<sup>81</sup> of those spiteful spirits that fell, as I may through the merits of thy bitter Passion be partner of thy bliss with those holy spirits that stood and, now confirmed by thy grace, in glory shall stand forever.

The Second Point:
The Creation and Fall of Mankind

The glorious majesty of almighty God, after the fore-rehearsed<sup>82</sup> ruin and fall of angels, not willing to suffer<sup>83</sup> the malice of his proud envious enemies make such a diminishment in his glorious court of heaven, determined of his great goodness to create a new kind of creature, wherewith he would make up and fulfill<sup>84</sup> with glorious blessed people the number of all those evil angels that were, through their high malicious pride, thrown out of wealth<sup>85</sup> into wretchedness.

This new kind<sup>86</sup> then, that he would for this purpose create, the deep wisdom of God determined marvelously to mingle<sup>87</sup> and temper.<sup>88</sup> For since it should be able (with help of his grace) to attain unto such high heavenly glory, he would have it spiritual and immortal. And yet, to refrain<sup>89</sup> it from the proud heart that Lucifer had and his fellows in their spiritual and immortal substance, God determined that this new kind of creature should also be bodily gross and mortal. And thus, after this visible world made,<sup>90</sup> and air, earth, and sea furnished with fowl and fish, and beasts, grass, herbs, trees, and fruit, he made the body of man of the slime of the earth, and created of nothing the spiritual substance of the soul after the image and similitude of himself, in that he endued<sup>91</sup> it with the three great gifts, memory, understanding, and will, in a certain manner of resemblance of the glorious blessed Trinity, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

This kind of man created God of a marvelous convenience<sup>92</sup> also with all other manner of creatures. For he made it have a being, as hath the dead stone, a life, as hath the insensible tree; a sensible feeling, as hath the unreasonable beast; a reasonable understanding, as hath the celestial angel.

Thus our forefather Adam being created of the earth, and our mother Eve formed and framed out of the rib of his side (as in the first and the second chapter of Genesis is declared), albeit that<sup>93</sup> they were ordained unto the high pleasant palace of heaven, yet lest over-sudden enhancing so high might make such pride spring in their hearts as might be the cause of their driving<sup>94</sup> down again, the great goodness of God measured their state and wealth, setting them not on high in heaven, but beneath in the pleasant garden or orchard of earthly paradise. And for the further safeguard of their persons from pride, he gave them precepts and commandments, whereby they should remember and consider themselves to be but servants. And therefore he both bade them there to be occupied and work in the keeping of that pleasant garden, and also forbade them the eating of the fruit of the tree of knowledge. And yet unto their further acknowledging of subjection and repressing of all occasion of pride, he set upon the breaking of his behest the threat of a very sore<sup>95</sup> pain — that is to wit,<sup>96</sup> that whensoever they did eat of the forbidden tree they should die; that is to wit, that whereas they had now their bodies such as though they might die by their own default,<sup>97</sup> yet such as, without their default should never die, there should, after that his commandment were by them broken, enter into their bodies and into the bodies of all their posterity an inevitable necessity of dying. Thus had God of his high goodness set them in the possession of a right wealthy<sup>98</sup> state, and in the expectation of yet a far passing<sup>99</sup> better, of which they could never fail without their own default. And to keep them from falling into the fault, he was ready to assist them with his grace, and against proud disobedience that might make them fly from his grace, he graciously fenced and hedged in their hearts with fear.

Now stood our father Adam and our mother Eve lords of all the whole earth, had<sup>100</sup> full dominion over all the beasts of the same, out of<sup>101</sup> dread of death or any bodily hurt. And authority they should have had over all their own offspring, with which they were with the blessing of God commanded to increase and multiply and replenish the world. Their palace was the most pleasant place of Paradise. Their apparel was the vesture of innocency, more glorious than cloth of gold. Their nakedness as far from dishonesty and all cause of shame as their bodies were far from all filthy tokens of sin. Their sensual parts comformable unto reason. Against their souls no rebellion in their obedient bodies, which for a season should have endured there without age, weariness, or pain, without spot or wem<sup>102</sup> or any decay of nature, preserved continually by the wholesome fruits and help of God's hand, and all their children forever after the same rate.<sup>103</sup> And each at sundry times when God's pleasure were, should have had their bodies changed suddenly into a glorious form, and without death depart out of the earth, carried up with the soul into the bliss of heaven, there to reign in joy and bliss eternally with God, fulfilling<sup>104</sup> the places from which the proud angels fell. This was, lo, the state in which our first father stood, a state full of heavenly hope of eternal joy to come, and a state for the meanwhile full of present wealth.

But oh, woe worth<sup>105</sup> wicked envy, the daughter of pestilent pride. For the proud hateful enemy of God and traitorous wretch, the devil, beholding this new creature of mankind set in so wealthy state, and either conjecturing by his natural understanding, or (to the increase of his grief for his proud envious stomach<sup>106</sup>) having it revealed unto him that of this kind should be restored the ruin that was happed<sup>107</sup> in heaven by the fall of himself and his fellows, conceived so great heart-burning again the kind<sup>108</sup> of man therefor, that he rather would wish his own damnation doubled, so that<sup>109</sup> he might destroy them, than suffer God honored in them, and them so to proceed and prosper that their gross mingled nature, so base in respect of his, should ascend up to that height of heaven that himself was fallen from.

The devil then, devising with himself upon some mischievous means by which he might bring mankind unto destruction, called to mind the means by which he had before wretchedly destroyed himself. And as he saw his own damnation grown by the occasion of pride, so wist<sup>110</sup> he well that if he might by some wily suggestion bring pride into the kind of man and make the first fathers disobey God's commandment, then would God of his justice keep his promise in their punishment and take from the posterity the gift that he promised their forefather for them, if the condition were broken upon which he gave it.

Upon this, this old serpent, the devil, being as the Scripture saith, "wilier than all the beasts of the earth,"<sup>111</sup> would not begin at the man, whom he perceived to be wiser and more hard to beguile, but first began at the woman, as the kind in wisdom more weak, more light<sup>112</sup> of belief, and more easy to be beguiled, whom if he might make on his side, then should he and she together be twain<sup>113</sup> against one. And the wily wretch perceived well also the tender mind that the man had to his make,<sup>114</sup> and thereby guessed (as it there happed<sup>115</sup> and elsewhere happeth oft) that to bring man to woe the woman may do more than with all his craft the devil can do himself. This wily serpent therefore, the devil, devising to entice this woman to this deadly deed, took his time<sup>116</sup> for his wretched wooing when her husband was not with her. And then gan he fall familiar<sup>117</sup> with her and inquisitive of such things as pertained to her husband and her and nothing<sup>118</sup> at all to himself. For there he asked her this question: "Wherefore did God," quoth he, "command you that ye should not eat of every tree of Paradise?" Or as it rather seemeth by the Greek phrase usual in many places of Scripture, he asked her thus: "Why did God command you that you should eat of no tree in Paradise?" And that his question was such appeareth by the manner of her answer.

Howbeit,<sup>119</sup> if she had showed herself unwilling to fall familiar with him and had said again,<sup>120</sup> "What is that for you," or had answered him and said, "My husband shall answer you," all his wretched wooing had been at end and he confounded and gone. But while she was content to be talkative with a stranger and wax a proper<sup>121</sup> entertainer (which property some gentlewomen ween<sup>122</sup> were a goodly praise), mark well what followed thereon. She answered the serpent and said, "Of the fruit of the trees that are in Paradise we eat. But of the fruit of the tree that is in the midst of Paradise, God hath commanded us that we shall not eat and that we should not touch it, lest we may hap to die."<sup>123</sup> conversation of this wicked serpent, with his questioning and her ear-giving thereto, wrought not as it seemeth, not outwardly only with her eye and her ear, but inwardly also with some subtle suggestion 5 in her heart. For by this answer of hers it appeareth that forthwith upon his questioning she began to stagger and half to doubt of the truth and steadfastness of God's word. For whereas God had precisely promised that if they did eat of the fruit of 10 that tree they should die, she, by the inward leaning to the devil's instigation and not cleaving to the grace of God, by this her answer turned it into a doubt, saying, Ne forte moriamur ("Lest peradventure<sup>124</sup> we die"). By reason of which doubting, and 15 thereby but half dreading, she made half the way herself for the devil to walk farther with her. For thereupon he letted<sup>125</sup> not boldly to blaspheme God before her and say, "Nay ye shall not die. But God doth know that whatsoever day you shall eat of that 20 tree, your eyes shall be opened and you shall be as gods, knowing both good and evil."<sup>126</sup> And upon these words, she seeing that it seemed a good tree to eat of, and fair to the eye, and delectable to behold, she by and by<sup>127</sup> plucked off the fruit thereof and 25 ate it, and gave it to her husband, and he ate it too.

O wretched wicked serpent, how much of thy deadly poison hast thou put into the seely<sup>128</sup> soul of this woeful woman at once? For here had he made her believe that of his own devilish conditions<sup>129</sup> 30 God had had twain, that is to wit, falsehood and envy. For he made her think that God had told them a lie, in that he said that whensoever they ate thereof they should die, and also that God were envious and could not for envy suffer<sup>130</sup> it that they should have so high a thing as the knowledge of good and evil.

Then struck he into her heart the poison of proud curious appetite and inordinate desire to know the thing which for her weal<sup>131</sup> God had forbidden her 40 to know. For God would of his goodness she should have known but good. But she by the devil's enticement would needs know evil too. And when her curious mind had made her once set her fair hands unto the feeling of that foul pitch, she could never 45 rub the filth from her fingers after. What should I speak of the other less<sup>132</sup> evils that he allured and

allected<sup>133</sup> her with, as the pleasure of the eye in the beholding of that fruit, with lickurous<sup>134</sup> desire of the delicious taste? — sins not small in themselves, but small in respect of the far passing greater, when 50 he made her desire and long by reason of high knowledge to be like a goddess, and for that cause proudly to disobey God and eat of the forbidden fruit. And she being thus infected and so sore<sup>135</sup> envenomed with so many poison spots, infected her
 55 husband forthwith. For at her enticement, and not so much for credence giving to<sup>136</sup> the serpent's words as to content his wife (whose request he could not find in his heart to contrary), he kept her company in her lewdness<sup>137</sup> and letted<sup>138</sup> not to eat with her.
 60 But the wallow<sup>139</sup> sweet pleasure of that fruit soon turned to displeasure and pain. For scant<sup>140</sup> was the fruit passed down both their throats, when it so began to wamble<sup>141</sup> in their stomachs that they wished it out again and in his belly that counseled
 65 them to eat it. For anon<sup>142</sup> was there such a marvelous change spread through both their bodies, that whereas when they put it in their mouth they were such as it was a great pleasure each of them to behold other and be beholden of the other, as soon
 70 as they both had eaten it they felt such filthy sensual motions of concupiscence rise and rebel against reason in their flesh, that their hearts abhorred to be beholden and seen, either of any other or themselves either, and for shame of their nakedness covered 75 their flesh with fig leaves.

Now is there no doubt but that their wicked enemy the serpent (which, as appeareth by the Bible, abode still by them till the sentence given by God upon their all three punishment<sup>143</sup>) in his mischievous<sup>144</sup> manner highly rejoiced to see his devilish 80 device brought unto such pass,<sup>145</sup> and had a great game<sup>146</sup> to behold them come forth so comely, appeared so richly in their royal robes of fig leaves.

O what a confusion was this unto them, to see 85 their feigned friend, their very deadly enemy the devil, first by their own folly so harmfully deceive them, and then so spitefully sit and laugh them to scorn. But they had no long leisure left them to take heed to that ere<sup>147</sup> that great confusion was overwhelmed with a greater. For suddenly, lo, they heard 90 our Lord coming, and therewith for shame they fell in a fear and fled and hid themselves from the face of God in the mids of a tree. And our Lord, as though he saw them not, called for Adam and said, “Adam, where art thou?” And he answered, “Lord, I heard thy voice and was afraid<sup>148</sup> to come before thee because I was naked, and therefore I hid me.” “Who showed thee,” quoth our Lord, “that thou were naked, but because thou hast eaten of the tree of which I commanded thee thou shouldst not?”<sup>149</sup>

Then took Adam a way far awry<sup>150</sup> from forgiveness. For he confessed not his fault, but began to excuse himself and lay the fault from him to his wife and in a manner unto God too. “The woman,” quoth he, “that thou gavest me for my companion, she gave it me, and so I ate it.” Then said our Lord God unto the woman, “Why didst thou so?” And she in like wise never acknowledged her fault nor asked forgiveness, but excused her by the serpent and said, “The serpent deceived me, and so I ate it.”<sup>151</sup>

Then gave God the sentence of punishment upon all three, using like order in declaring of his doom<sup>152</sup> as they did in the doing of their sin. For first he began at the serpent, the first malicious contriver of all this mischief. And unto him he said, “Because thou hast done this, accursed be thou among all the living things and beasts of the earth. Upon thy breast shalt thou creep, and earth shalt thou eat all the days of thy life. Enmity will I put between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and hers, and she shall crush<sup>153</sup> thine head in pieces, and thou shalt lie in await<sup>154</sup> to sting her heel.”<sup>155</sup> Then gave he the woman her judgment and said unto her, “I shall multiply thy miseries and thy conceptions, and in sorrow shalt thou bring forth thy children, and thou shalt be under the power of the man, and he shall be lord over thee.” Then finally said he to Adam, “Because thou hast given ear unto thy wife’s words and hast eaten of the tree of which I forbode thee to eat, accursed be the earth in thy work. With labor shalt thou eat of the earth all the days of thy life. It shall burgeon<sup>156</sup> thorns and briars, and thou shalt eat the herbs of the earth. In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat thy bread, till thou return again into the earth out of which thou were taken. For dust art thou, and into dust shalt thou return.”<sup>157</sup> Then our Lord made them coats of skins, and clothed them therein, and said, “Lo, Adam is like one of us now, knowing both good and evil.”<sup>158</sup> And God with that angry scorn, to keep him from the tree of everlasting life, put them both forthwith<sup>159</sup> out of that pleasant paradise into the wretched earth.

Long were it here, and not of necessity pertaining to this present point—that is to wit,<sup>160</sup> the fall of our forefather—to note and declare such things as in the discourse of this matter men may note and mark upon this part of the Scripture. As for example, that in these words of God with which he scorned Adam, saying, Ecce Adam factus est sicut unus ex nobis (“Lo, Adam is now made as one of us”), may be well marked that, like as by all words of the whole text appeareth plain that there is but one God, so is there in that God more persons than one. For else could he not conveniently<sup>161</sup> say, “Lo, Adam is now as one of us,” that is to wit, a god as we be, but he would have said, “Lo, Adam is now as I am.”

Those words also seem well to declare that though Adam were not so fully deceived by the persuasion of the serpent as Eve was (for which Saint Paul saith, “The man was not seduced but the woman,”<sup>162</sup> whereupon Saint Augustine at good length declar-eth certain difference between them),<sup>163</sup> yet was Adam by the means of his wife somewhat seduced and brought into a foolish hope, to be through the eating of that fruit, by the knowledge of good and evil, made like a god. For God, speaking to Eve no word of that foolish proud affection, taunted and checked Adam therewith specially by name, saying, Ecce Adam quasi unus ex nobis factus est, sciens bonum et malum (“Lo, Adam is now made as one of us, knowing both good and evil”). But this was not by the serpent’s persuasion, whom Adam would not have regarded but shortly shaken him off. But the seducing of Adam was by that that<sup>164</sup> the serpent’s shrewd<sup>165</sup> words came to his ear out of his wife’s mouth, whom he would suffer<sup>166</sup> to speak. And therefore our Lord, in declaring his punishment unto him, laid for the cause: Quia audisti vocem uxoris tuae, maledicta terra in opere tuo etc. (“Because thou hast given ear to the words of thy wife, accursed be the earth in thy work, and so forth”).<sup>167</sup> And because that the woman’s preaching and babbling to her husband did so much harm in the beginning and would, if it were suffered to proceed, do always more and more, therefore Saint Paul commandeth that a woman shall not take upon her to teach her husband, but that her husband should teach her and that she should learn of him in silentio (that is, in silence), that is to wit, she should sit and hear him and hold herself her tongue.<sup>168</sup> For Saint Paul well foresaw that if the wife may be suffered to speak too, she will have so many words herself that her husband shall have never one.

There may be marked also in the foresaid discourse the marvelous mischievous nature of envy. For the devil so well knew the justice of God, and by his own destruction so sore had assayed<sup>169</sup> it, that he doubted not but that his malicious deceit should not pass unpunished. And yet was he rather content to take harm himself than suffer another take good. And such a devilish delight he took in beholding their harm and shame that he voided<sup>170</sup> not at God's coming, but abode<sup>171</sup> to see the sentence of their damnation till he took his own with him too.

In this discourse is to be considered also that when God punisheth the sinner by and by,<sup>172</sup> he showeth him thereby more favor than when he deferreth it longer. And oftentimes when he delayeth it, he doth it not of favor but of indignation and anger. For if he had here punished Eve as soon as herself had broken his commandment, both had Adam been warned by it and their offspring by her sin alone, as holy doctors<sup>173</sup> declare, had not lost original justice nor fallen in damnation of death. But forasmuch as, though she was created to be Adam's fellow, she was yet of less perfection and more frail and more easy to fall than he, albeit<sup>174</sup> he had as then no dominion given him over her, yet his reason might show him that to give her good counsel he should have kept her company, which if he had done, the serpent had not deceived her. Therefore since he did not, but by wandering another way from her he suffered her to miscarry<sup>175</sup> and be infected, God suffered the contagion of the selfsame infection to stretch unto himself too and thereof to grow his destruction.

And this may be a warning to every man in this world to do the diligence<sup>176</sup> that he possibly can to keep every other man from hurt. For as the Holy Scripture saith, Et mandavit illis unicuique de proximo suo ("God hath given every man cure<sup>177</sup> and charge of his neighbor").<sup>178</sup> And harm creepeth from one to another by more means than men beware of. And he that care not though his neighbor's house fall afire may hap<sup>179</sup> to lose his own. Howbeit,<sup>180</sup> as this lesson generally pertaineth to every man for the natural love and Christian charity that every Christian man is bounden to bear other, yet pertaineth it most specially to those that have over other men that special charge given unto them, that our Lord therefore by the mouth of Ezekiel terribly threateneth them in this wise: Si dicente me ad impium, morte morieris, non annuntiaveris ei, neque locutus fueris uti avertatur a via sua impia et vivat, ipse impius in impietate sua morietur, sanguinem autem ejus de manu tua requiram ("If when I say to the wicked man 'thou shalt die,' thou do not show it him, nor do not speak unto him that he may turn from his wicked way and live, both shall that wicked man die in his wickedness, and yet the blood of him shall I require of thine hands").<sup>181</sup> This is a fearful word, lo, to those that have the cure<sup>182</sup> over other folk and a necessity to take good heed to their flock, to guide them well, call upon them and give them warning of such ways as they may perish in. For else shall the sheep not perish and be punished only, but the scab<sup>183</sup> of the flock shall catch and consume shepherd and all for his negligence.

This is here another thing specially to be marked, that like as the kind of man was not corrupted with original sin nor lost the state of innocency by the fault of Eve alone, which was but the feebler and inferior part, till Adam that was the stronger and superior part made himself partner to the same sin also, so is there no man accounted afore<sup>184</sup> God for an offender in any deadly actual sin<sup>185</sup> by any manner motion<sup>186</sup> or suggestion of the devil unto the sensual part, as long as the will after<sup>187</sup> the judgment of reason resisteth and refuseth to consent. But when reason giveth over to sensuality, whereby the man whole and entire falleth into the consent either to do a deadly sin or to delight in the devising and thinking upon any such sinful act for the pleasure that he taketh in that thought, all were it<sup>188</sup> so that he thought therewith he would not do the deed, yet were the full consent to the pleasure of that only thought,<sup>189</sup> full and whole deadly sin.

5 Howbeit,<sup>190</sup> a sudden surreptitious delight cast by the devil into the sensual part is no sin at all, but may be matter of merit, except the will, with reason giving over thereto, either consent to delight therein or else is so negligent in looking to sensuality that he letteth her over-long alone therein, and listeth<sup>191</sup> not to do his diligence in driving that sinful suggestion from her. For surely such manner negligence is afore the face of God accounted for a consent and so for a deadly sin.

15 It is also specially to be marked that the stubborn manner of Adam and Eve, not praying God of forgiveness but excusing their sin, was in manner more displeasure to God than was their sin itself.

This is also notably to be marked, that as tenderly 20 as Adam loved Eve, rather content to displease God than her, yet when he saw that sorrow should come thereon, he would fain<sup>192</sup> have laid it from himself unto her. And thus will it fare by these fleshly wretched lovers here: when they come in hell together, they shall curse each other full fast.<sup>193</sup> Howbeit, letting pass as impertinent to my matter many things that might be marked more, let us not forget to mark this one point well, which is the sum of all the second point: that is to wit,<sup>194</sup> let us consider 30 deeply from what weal<sup>195</sup> into what wretchedness, by the folly of our forefathers, mankind is woefully fallen through the false wily suggestion of our mortal enemy the devil. On which thing when I bethink me, methinketh<sup>196</sup> I may well say the words of Saint John in the Apocalypse, with which he bewaileth this wretched world by reason of that the devil fell out of heaven thereinto: Vae terrae et mari, quia descendit diabolus ad vos, habens iram magnam, sciens quia modicum tempus habet ("Woe to the earth and 40 to the sea, for the devil is come down to you, having great anger, knowing that he hath but a little time").<sup>197</sup> This woe well found our forefathers when the devil, full of ire for his own fall and envy that they should succeed him, labored to bring them to the place of his final damnation, from which 45 he saw well he had but a little time left, that is to wit, the time of this present world, which is transitory and soon shall pass and is a time in all together very short, from the first creation to the final change thereof at the Day of Doom, if all that 50 time be compared with his everlasting fire that followeth. He found them innocents joyful and merry, much in the favor of God, and oft rejoicing<sup>198</sup> his visitation and company, the man and his wife each delighting in other, finding nothing to mislike in themselves, lords of all the world, all beasts obedient unto them, their work without weariness, their meat<sup>199</sup> pleasant at hand, no necessity to die, nor any bodily hurt, high pleasure in hope of heaven, and all their children after them. 60

All this hath this false serpent bereft them by his deceitful train,<sup>200</sup> poisoning them with his own pride, that threw himself out of heaven. For as himself would have been<sup>201</sup> God's fellow, so made he them ween<sup>202</sup> they should. But while they weened 65 to be gods by the knowledge of good and evil both, they lost, alas, the good that they had and got but evil alone. They lost their innocency and became sinful. God's favor they lost and fell in his displeasure; his visitation they rejoiced not but were afraid 70 to come near him, each of them ashamed to behold the other or themselves either. All beasts were at war with them, and each of them with themselves, their own bodies in rebellion and battle against their souls, thrust out of pleasant paradise into the wretched earth, their living gotten with sore<sup>203</sup> sweat, their children born with pain. Then hunger, thirst, heat, cold, sickness sundry and sore. Sure sorry looking, for<sup>204</sup> the unsure time of death, and dread after all this of the fearful fire of hell, with 80 like pain and wretchedness to all their offspring forever.

This is, lo, good readers, the wretched change that our forefathers made with falling into pride at the devil's false suggestion. In honor they were and 85 would not see it. Honor they sought and thereby fell to shame. They would have waxed<sup>205</sup> gods and were turned into beasts, as the Scripture saith, Homo cum in honore esset non intellexit, comparatus est iumentis insipientibus, et similis factus est illis ("When man was in honor, he perceived it not, 90 but he was compared unto the foolish beasts, and to them was he made like<sup>206</sup>),<sup>206</sup> and yet brought indeed into far worse condition. For many beasts live with less labor and less pain too than man, and none of them go to hell. In danger whereof all the kind of man stood by the occasion of their fall if the goodness of God had not by his grace helped with his merciful hand. And unto heaven had no man gone had not our blessed Savior redeemed man and paid his ransom by his bitter painful Passion, whereof the occasion was this wretched fall of man. And thus finish I the second point that I said I would show you before I come to the woeful history of Christ's bitter Passion.

A Prayer

Almighty God, that of thine infinite goodness didst create our first parents in the state of innocence, with present wealth<sup>207</sup> and hope of heaven to come, till through the devil's train<sup>208</sup> their folly fell by sin to wretchedness, for thy tender pity of that Passion that was paid for their and our redemption, assist me so with thy gracious help, that unto the subtle suggestions of the serpent I never so incline the ears of mine heart, but that my reason may resist them and master my sensuality and refrain<sup>209</sup> me from them.

The Third Point: The Determination of the Trinity for the Restoration of Mankind

When the devil has thus guilefully betrayed<sup>210</sup> and thus falsely betrayed our first father and mother by their own oversight and folly, and thereby brought into miserable estate<sup>211</sup> and damnable themselves with all their posterity, neither would the mighty majesty of God endure and suffer<sup>212</sup> his malicious proud enemy the devil to rejoice the withdrawing of the kind of man from doing him honor, nor the marvelous mercy of God abide and sustain to see the frail kind of man eternally destroyed by the deceit and circumvention<sup>213</sup> of the false wily devil. For though his justice was content forever to lose all thankful service (for thankless they serve him still) of those malicious angels, that without other motion than their own malice wilfully turned from him, and that his mercy no cause had to counterplead<sup>214</sup> his justice, in abridging the eternity of the proud spirits' pain, that of obdurate heart would never be sorry for their sin, yet in beholding the wretched decayed kind of man brought into sin not all of himself but by the subtle suggestion of his false envious enemy, and that would after wax<sup>215</sup> meek and repent and pray for pardon, the sharp justice of God and his tender mercy entered into counsel together. And by the deep wisdom of God was the means found that man should so be restored as they should both twain be satisfied: that is to wit, both man by justice for his sin somewhat punished and yet upon repentance by means of mercy should his fault be paid for, and from all eternal bondage man redeemed and saved and, in spite of the devil, enhanced to more honor than ever he was entitled to before he took the fall.

To devise this way, lo, was a wonderful thing, far passing the capacity of all the angels in heaven. For since the amends must needs be made and, in maintenance of the true justice of God, the ransom must needs be paid for the kind of man, that was by sin addicted<sup>216</sup> and adjudged to the devil, as his perpetual thrall never to come in heaven, who-soever should pay this ransom must and was most convenient<sup>217</sup> to be such as would and were able and ought<sup>218</sup> it. Now ought there this ransom no creature but man, and therefore since by him that ought it of reason it should most conveniently be paid, man must he be that should of duty pay it. But now was there no one man able to pay the ransom for the whole kind of man. For since all the whole kind had lost heaven and were all in one damnation, condemned all to bodily death already, any of them all, though he should willingly suffer death in recompense of the sin, it could nothing serve his fellows, nor yet himself neither, for he paid but his debt of death for his own part, in which debt and much more himself was condemned already.

Now as for angels, neither can we know that any would then do so much for man, man being fallen by sin from God's favor, nor any of them all was able, being but a creature, to satisfy for the deadly trespass done unto the Creator. And yet was it over<sup>219</sup> this far from good convenience that any angel should have been suffered to do it. For the redemption of man after his fall was a greater benefit unto him than was his creation. For as our mother holy Church singeth in the paschal service, Quid enim nasci profuit, nisi redimi profuisset? (“What availeth it man to be born were not the profit of his redemption?”)<sup>220</sup> And therefore if angel had, by payment man’s ransom and recompense made for his trespass, redeemed him, then would man have thought himself more in a manner beholden to angel than to God. And the occasion<sup>221</sup> thereof had been a very foul disorder.

Thus was as I say, therefore, the device of a means convenient for man’s redemption the thing that far passed the wisdom of all the wise angels of heaven. But the deep and infinite high wisdom of almighty God devised the marvelous merciful just means himself, that is to wit,<sup>222</sup> that by the cruel painful death of that innocent person, that<sup>223</sup> should be both God and man, the recompense should be made unto God for man. For that person both, being God, should be of that nature that was able to do it and, being man, should be of that nature that was bounden to do it. And the devil (unware<sup>224</sup> that he were) unrighteously procuring that righteous man’s death should righteously lose the power upon man that God had for man’s unrighteousness righteously given unto him before.

This excellent means of man’s redemption the deep wisdom of God devised, and in time convenient the second Person (the Son of God, the wisdom of the Father, and the Father’s express absolute image and brightness of his Father’s glory), being sent by his Father and himself and the Holy Ghost down here into the earth (and nevertheless abiding still above in heaven), and in the blessed womb of the pure Virgin Mary taking into unity of person the poor nature of man (by the obumbration<sup>225</sup> of the Holy Ghost, of the pure blood of her body, without man’s seed or fleshly delectation,<sup>226</sup> and therefore without original sin conceived and without help of midwife or pain of travail born), living here in pain and labor, fasting, watch,<sup>227</sup> preaching and prayer, and finally, for the truth of his doctrine, by the procurement<sup>228</sup> of the devil, the treason of Judas, the malice of the Jews, and cruel hands of the paynims,<sup>229</sup> through the painful bitter Passion and death of his innocent manhead<sup>230</sup> (not bounden or subject unto death, neither by nature nor sin, but by death for man’s sake willingly suffered), that excellent means, I say, of man’s redemption so by himself devised, himself most graciously fulfilled; and by the pleasant acceptable sacrifice of himself obediently offered on the cross up to the Father, he pacified the wrath and indignation of God against man, and by his glorious resurrection and marvelous ascension, sitting in the nature of man upon the Father’s right hand, hath reduced<sup>231</sup> mankind (in such as will take the benefit) to more joy, more wealth, and far more honor too than ever the fall of our first father lost us.

Now albeit (as I suppose) few men have less lust<sup>232</sup> to move great questions and put manner of dispicions<sup>233</sup> in unlearned laymen’s mouths than I, which rather would wish every man to labor for good affections<sup>234</sup> than to long for the knowledge of less necessary learning or delight in debating of sundry superfluous problems, yet of some such demands<sup>235</sup> as I now see many men of much less than mean learning have oft right hot in hand,<sup>236</sup> I shall not let<sup>237</sup> one or twain myself here a little to touch.<sup>238</sup>

A Question

First be they commonly willing to search this thing: wherefore mankind should, more than Adam and Eve themselves, need any redemption at all. For how could it (say they) stand with the justice of God that for the fault of only Adam and Eve all that ever came of them should fall into such miserable fault? This question and many such other like, when they be of a curious bold presumption demanded, be not to be hearkened unto and answered, but with the words of the blessed apostle Paul rather to be rejected and rebuked: O homo tu quis es qui respondeas Deo? Numquid dicit figmentum ei qui se finxit, quid me fecisti sic? (“O man, what are thou to take upon thee to dispute with God? Is there any workman’s work that asketh the workman, ‘Wherefore hast thou made me thus?’”)<sup>239</sup> And must almighty God then of his work wrought in man give a reckoning to man that is but his hand-work? Howbeit,<sup>240</sup> on the other side, where such questions are not demanded of frowardness,<sup>241</sup> of a vain pride, nor of blasphemous purpose, it is not only no displeasure to God but is also a good occu-5 upon heavenly things rather than upon earthly. And many a holy man hath, of no vain curious mind but of very pure devotion, beset<sup>242</sup> much study upon the foresaid question. And of those holy men hath diverse had diverse opinions. One sort have thought 10 that by the fall of Adam the whole kind<sup>243</sup> of man not only lost original justice,<sup>244</sup> and became subject unto the necessity of temporal death, and therewith lost also the joyful bliss of heaven, but over<sup>245</sup> that, by the filth of original sin (with which every 15 man born into this world by natural propagation is infected in the vicious sinful stock, in that<sup>246</sup> we were all in, of Adam, as the fruit is in the tree, or the ear of corn in the grain that it came of) was also 20 damned unto perpetual pain and sensible<sup>247</sup> torment in hell, although it were a child that died in the cradle, which to the original sin taken of his parents (of which the prophet saith, “Lo, in wickedness was I conceived, and my mother conceived me in sin”)<sup>248</sup> never added actual sin<sup>249</sup> of his own. And 25 from this eternal damnation of sensible pain in the fire of hell, they thought that never any of the kind of man should be preserved but by the merits of the Passion of Christ and faith in him comen<sup>250</sup> or to come — faith, I say, actual or habitual,<sup>251</sup> and in in-30 fants by the faith of their parents and the faithful Church (with certain sacraments or sacrifices duly referred to God, after<sup>252</sup> the sundry laws and ceremonies of sundry diverse times, wherewith these infants have habitual faith infused).

35 And as touching the faith of Christ, that he should once come by whom they should be saved, revelation was given to Adam, Noah, Abraham, and all the old fathers and by them to the people of every generation before the law written;<sup>253</sup> and 40 at<sup>254</sup> the law written, revelation given to Moses, and by him to the people; and after to all the prophets, and by them to the people of Jews of every generation, unto the coming of our Savior Christ himself.
 Now as for such folk, either now or then, as among 45 the paynims<sup>255</sup> lived well according to nature, so that they lacked nothing to keep them from the perpetual fire of hell but the faith of Christ, some holy doctors have thought that God of his merciful goodness by one means or other failed not to give 50 them the faith, as he that is of so merciful goodness that he will fail no man in thing necessary without the man’s own fault.

But then other doctors that were in this point of opinion with them, that original sin damned every man to sensible pain of hell without the faith 55 of Christ, were not in that point agreed with them, that unto all such paynims as in any place lived naturally well and kept themselves from idolatry, God sent the faith of Christ to keep them from hell, as not suffering<sup>256</sup> any man to be perpetually damned 60 to the sensible pain of fire without his own actual fault, since they themselves denied not but that the infants of paynims and of the christened both that deceased without baptism were damned unto per-65 petual sensible pain in hell, and yet had they none actual sin of their own but only the sin original.

Now whereas this thing might haply<sup>257</sup> seem hard in the hearts of some such as direct their eye to the merciful nature of God and cannot also perceive by any rule of justice taught unto man, either by rea-70 son or Scripture, how this thing could agree with the merciful justice of God, these good men answer that hell is the place for sinful folk and that pain is due to sin and that those children and all be sinful in original sin. For all are sinful that are through 75 filthy concupiscence brought by propagation out of that sinful stock of our first sinful father, for in that stock were we all and were infected with sin in the same in such a certain manner as all the sour crabs<sup>258</sup> that ever come of the crab tree do take their 80 sourness of the kernel whereof the tree grew. And if a poor potter may, without reproach and uncontrolled,<sup>259</sup> make (as Saint Paul saith) of one self<sup>260</sup> piece of clay two vessels, the one to serve in honest use, the other in vile and filthy,<sup>261</sup> where the clay 85 whereof he maketh the vile vessel was nothing<sup>262</sup> faulty but good, who should be so bold and so blasphemous as to think that God doth wrong to make and use all those vessels for vile (that is to wit,<sup>263</sup> 90 all the kind of man) whereof the clay that they all

Besides this (say these good holy doctors) the 5 Scripture declareth us that God thus doth indeed. For Saint Paul calleth all the offspring of Adam by nature the children of wrath, saying, Eramus natura filii irae (“We were,” saith he, “by nature the children of wrath”).<sup>267</sup> And that we became such by the 10 corruption of our nature in our first father, Adam, he showeth well where he saith, Per unum hominem peccatum in hunc mundum introiit, et per peccatum mors, et ita in omnes homines mors pertransit, in quo omnes peccaverunt (“By one man sin entered into 15 the world, and by sin death, and so passed death through into all men, through that one man in whom all men have sinned”).<sup>268</sup>

And after he saith, Sicut enim unius delicto mors regnavit per unum, multo magis abundantiam gratiae et donationis et iusticiae accipientes in vita regnabunt per unum Iesum Christum. Igitur sicut per unius delictum in omnes homines in condemnationem, sic et per unius iusticiam in omnes homines in iustificationem vitae. Sicut enim per unius hominis inobedientiam peccatores constituti sunt multi, ita et per unius obedientiam iusti constituentur multi. Lex autem subintravit, ut abundaret delictum. Ubi autem abundavit delictum, superabundavit et gratia. Ut sicut regnavit peccatum in mortem, ita et gratia regnet per iustitiam in vitam eternam, per Iesum Christum Dominum nostrum (“Likewise as by the sin of one man death hath entered by one, much more men, receiving the abundance of grace and of the gift and of justice, shall reign in life by one Jesus Christ. Therefore 35 likewise as by the sin of one man it went into all men unto condemnation, so by the justice of one man also it goeth into all men unto justification<sup>269</sup> of life. For likewise as by the disobedience of one man many be constituted<sup>270</sup> and made sinners, so shall also by 40 the obedience of one many men be constituted and made righteous. The law truly hath entered,<sup>271</sup> that sin should abound. But where sin hath abounded, there hath grace also more abounded, that likewise as sin hath reigned unto death, so grace should also 45 reign by justice unto everlasting life through Jesus Christ our Lord”).<sup>272</sup>

By these words of wrath, of sin, of condemnation, of death grown by the sin and disobedience of Adam into all his offspring, that is to wit, into 50 all the kind of man by natural propagation engendered and begotten of him, and by the contrary words of justice, of obedience in Christ, and of justification and righteousness in man through grace
55 growing into everlasting life, it well appeareth (say some doctors) that Saint Paul meant that the death grown to all mankind contracted by original sin from Adam should be the death of everlasting pain. From which Saint Paul well, by all the process<sup>273</sup> of the same words, declareth that no man can be saved 60 but by our Savior Christ. Which thing Saint Peter showeth yet more expressly where he saith, Non aliud nomen est sub caelo datum hominibus, in quo oporteat nos salvos fieri (“There is none other name under heaven given to men in which we must be 65 saved”).<sup>274</sup> And that no man shall be saved without faith Saint Paul declareth where he saith, Sine fide impossibile est placere Deo,<sup>275</sup> that is to wit, either actual or habitual,<sup>276</sup> infounded<sup>277</sup> in the sacrament of baptism, or otherwise if God be so pleased, whose
70 power is at liberty, not so bounden to his holy sacraments but that he may beside them give his grace where he list.<sup>278</sup> But with his sacraments he hath by his promise bound himself to do, and without them he doth unto few men, and with contempt of them
75 to no man. And for this cause say those holy doctors infants be received to baptism to keep them from the peril of eternal damnation and perpetual pain in the fire of hell. And of this opinion was holy Saint Augustine, as in sundry plain places of his works
80 well appeareth.<sup>279</sup>

Now since it is so (say they) that by the Scripture this point so plainly appeareth, what should we dispute the righteousness thereof, as though that man might attain to see the bottom of God’s righteousness? How many things be there very well done and 85 righteously by men which yet seem unto children to be no right at all. And infinitely farther asunder be the wisdom of God and the wisdom of the wisest man than is the wisdom of the wisest man above the wisdom of the most foolish child. The prophet in the person of God saith, Non enim cogitationes meae cogitationes vestrae, neque viae meae viae your thoughts, nor my ways be not like your ways, and found out? Who hath known the mind of our Lord or who hath been of his counsel?)<sup>284</sup> God hath no rule of justice to be ruled by but is himself the rule by whose will all justice must be measured and 20 shapen.<sup>285</sup> And therefore he can do none injustice.

And when we be discharged once of this gross cor-ruptible body, that aggrieveth and beareth down the soul and oppresseth the mind that many things thinketh upon, then shall such folk as shall be saved 25 behold and see in the glorious Godhead the very clear solutions of such inexplicable problems.

With such things as this, and many more that were too long to rehearse<sup>286</sup> here, have those good fathers answered this matter, those I say that have 30 thought that by the sin of Adam every man old and young, though he deceased with none other sin than original only, was in like wise and in like reason<sup>287</sup> damned to perpetual sensible<sup>288</sup> pain in the fire of hell, as by the bondage of the father all his offspring 35 is in this world bounden unto perpetual thralldom.
Howbeit,<sup>289</sup> to tell you the whole truth, holy Saint Augustine, which was (among others) of this mind and opinion, for all the reasons with which he answered other men therein concerning the justice 40 of God in the damnation of infants unto perpetual sensible pain for that only sin original that they contracted by the natural propagation of the first condemned father, with all those reasons, I say, with which he contented other men, he could never yet 45 satisfy and content himself. For in a certain epistle which he writeth unto Saint Jerome<sup>290</sup> he debateth

this matter at length, very substantially and with great erudition. And in that epistle he confesseth the defense and maintenance of that opinion for so hard that, as he there toucheth, some great cunning 50 men for the defense thereof have been driven to the devising of a very great perilous error. For they, to maintain the justice of God in that point, said that the souls which every man have put in their bodies by succession of time were all created at once be-55 fore the seventh day in which God rested. And of those words, that God in the seventh day rested, they took a foundation for that error, forgetting the words of our Savior: Pater meus usque modo opera-tur, et ego operor (“My Father worketh still yet, and 60 I work still also”),<sup>291</sup> but in the seventh day God rested from the creating of any new kind of creature. Then said they that the souls offended God before they came into the bodies and that they were put into the bodies, some to be purged in them, 65 and some to be damned with them, so that the infants that die with original sin have the bodies worthy damnation because they naturally proceed out of the damned stock with lack of original justice,<sup>292</sup> and the soul was worthy to come into that body, 70 by the society whereof it should be bounden unto eternal pain. The soul they said was worthy for that other sin with which it had offended God before it came into the body. This fantasy<sup>293</sup> were some fain to find,<sup>294</sup> for maintenance of God’s justice, of those 75 that held the foresaid way in the damnation of infants unto sensible pain in hell.

But this erroneous opinion, as reason is, Saint Augustine rejected and confuteth. Howbeit,<sup>295</sup> that yet notwithstanding, he confesseth himself to find 80 such difficulty in the maintaining of God’s justice to stand with his own opinion of condemning infants to sensible pain in hell, that himself seemeth to doubt whether God create always every soul of new,<sup>296</sup> or else that as well the soul as the body be 85 produced and propagated of the father and the mother as well as the body. For if they so were, he thought that then the answer were more easy if the whole person of the man were taken by natural propagation of the substance of our first father and 90 mother, being subject unto that damnation. And therefore he desireth Saint Jerome to consider well that point and search whether it might stand with the Scripture or not. And if it might, he thought it meet<sup>297</sup> that Saint Jerome should take that way too. And if not, himself would not hold it neither. Howbeit, if that way would not be maintained, he then desired Saint Jerome to write unto him by what reason he thought that the justice of God might be maintained in the damning of infants unto sensible pain in hell. For he said that himself could not see how it could stand with justice that God should create a new soul that never offended and put it without any desert of itself into that body, by whose company it should contract forthwith<sup>298</sup> such an infelicity that, the body dying and the soul departing therefrom unchristened before it come to discretion, it should be damned to perpetual torment. And then layeth he forth there certain reasons with which himself was wont to answer other men in that point for the time, for lack of better. But there he requireth Saint Jerome to devise him better. For he plainly confesseth that those answers which himself was wont to make other folk in the matter never satisfied nor contented himself. Would God there remained the answer of Saint Jerome again. But whether ever he made any or not, we none find.

And thus have I, good readers, showed you the mind of some good holy doctors which were of the opinion that original sin, without actual adjoined thereto, damned the kind of man naturally descended from Adam unto perpetual sensible pain in the fire of hell. Now shall ye further understand that there are others which have another manner<sup>299</sup> mind therein, whereupon there ensueth nothing so great difficulty concerning the righteousness of God.

Their mind in the matter is this, that God in the creation of man gave to him two states: one, competent and convenient<sup>300</sup> for his mortal nature; another, of special grace, a further state of special prerogative,<sup>301</sup> that is to wit, the possibility of immortality put in his own hand and of the obtaining of eternal bliss in heaven, of which two things there was neither nother<sup>302</sup> naturally pertaining to him. If God had given him only the first, that is to wit, only natural, his soul yet should have been immortal, for God created the nature such. But unto the bliss of heaven, the fruition of the Godhead, he did not create it to attain by nature, nor as it seemeth angel neither, but by a special gift and prerogative of his grace. The body, being made of the earth and mixed with other elements, was of nature dissoluble and mortal, as the bodies of other beasts be. Howbeit, if God had given Adam no further gift than competent unto his nature, he had yet had a good state far above all beasts, and yet a state far under the state that he stood in by God's further gift. For first, if man had had but his natural state, albeit he should have had (as some men think) the rebellion of his sensuality against his reason, yet had he had (while he lived) the use of the reasonable soul, and should have had knowledge of God, and cause to love him, honor him, and serve him, and had been bounden to master his sensuality and resist the devil, and by the doing of the contrary should have deserved hell, and by doing his duty to God should have deserved to have after this life not the fruition of the Godhead (that is the bliss of heaven) but a life good quiet and restful, with spiritual delight in such knowledge of God and his wonderful works as reason at the least, without revelation, might attain unto. Which should have been a pleasure far above the pleasure that ever any man had by only natural means in this world since this world first began, and such as (I suppose) whosoever might attain it would not change that state with the state of the greatest king that ever reigned on earth.

And yet, though they call this the natural state of man, they mean not (I think) thereby that man was or should have been able to have lived well after his nature and have attained the end of that state by his own only<sup>303</sup> natural power, without special aid and help of God, since there is no creature nother<sup>304</sup> high nor low, but as it could not without God be created, no more can it without God be conserved. And man, if he never had had but his natural state, he should have been in danger to do sin more than he was with the state of innocency that God gave him further, and yet in that state he sinned. And therefore, if not only we, which now by more means than one have our naturals vitiated,<sup>305</sup> but also Adam, that had more than his naturals in Paradise whole and in good plight, had need yet of God's grace to help him there to stand, it must needs be (as I said) that he must have needed the help of God's grace to maintain him if he had

and appropriate 301 divinely given privilege 302 neither nother: neither of the two 303 solely 304 neither 305 naturals vitiated: natural gifts corrupted had his only natural state. And if any man marvel that God made all his creatures such as they should always need aid of his grace, let him know that God did it of his double goodness: first, to keep them 5 from pride, by causing them perceive<sup>306</sup> their feebleness and to call upon him; and secondly, to do his creatures honor and comfort. For the creature (that wise is) can never think himself in so noble condition, nor should take so great pleasure or so much

 10 rejoice that he were made able to do a thing well enough himself, as to remember and consider that he hath the most excellent majesty of God his creator and maker ever more attendant himself at his elbow to help him.

15 If any man will herein take a contrary part and affirm that man in the state of innocency, and the angels that fell, were able of themselves to have stood<sup>307</sup> in their former state and, by natural liberty of their will without peculiar<sup>308</sup> help of God,
 20 to have chosen the better and to have refused the worse; and that their strength therein then, and our feebleness in this state corrupted now, have their differences by reason of their nature then whole and unhurt and ours now sore<sup>309</sup> impaired
 25 and wounded; and that the cause why we cannot now without help of grace choose the good, but willingly apply the freedom of our will to the choice of the evil, is the corruption of our nature grown by the sin of Adam; and that therefore (before that sin) Adam was (before that fall) able to 30 choose the good of his own natural power, and angel yet more able than he, before the fall of Lucifer; and thereupon list<sup>310</sup> to conclude that neither angel nor man in the state of their first creation needed
 35 unto the resisting of sin none other help of God but only their natural power—to him that this list to reason, mine answer will I temper<sup>311</sup> thus: that they were of nature stronger and better able naturally than we, that will I gladly grant. But that they
 40 were so able to resist sin of their own nature then, that they needed for their assistance none help of God at all, that can I full hardly consent.<sup>312</sup> Howbeit, if any man affirm stiffly<sup>313</sup> yes, I will keep no schools<sup>314</sup> upon the matter nor almost in nothing
 45 else, but leave off and be content with that that<sup>315</sup> I trust he will grant me: that is to wit, that they were never so able to withstand sin by their own natural power but that, at the leastwise yet, with God's help (which was ready when they would ask it) they 50 should have been able the better.

Thus have I somewhat showed you of what mind some men be concerning the only<sup>316</sup> natural state given by God unto Adam. And now shall I further somewhat show you, what mind they be of, concerning that state which he had by the reason of the 55 other gifts given him conditionally, by special prerogative, above his natural state, which things he lost by the condition broken.

They say that, above the natural condition and state of his body, God gave him this gift, that his 60 body should never have died. He gave him this gift also, that his sensual parts should never have rebelled against his reason. He gave him also therewith that he should never have had dolor or pain 65 in body, nor heaviness<sup>317</sup> or sorrow of mind, but all things necessary without weariness or grief. He had further given him, above his nature, this excellent high gift very far surmounting all the remnant, that is to wit, undeceivable<sup>318</sup> hope and ability both body
 70 and soul through grace to come to glory, the bliss (I say) of heaven, the joyful fruition of the glorious Trinity forever. All these gifts God gave him above his naturals, and not for himself only, but for him
 75 and for all his posterity. But all these supernatural gifts he gave him with the knot<sup>319</sup> of this condition, that is to wit, that if he broke his commandment, then should he lose them all. And that was understood<sup>320</sup> by the promise of death, and not only the 80 necessity of temporal death, the dissolution of the soul and the body (by which the man doth indeed but half die, since his far better part, that is to say the soul, by that death dieth not at all) but, by the loss of heaven, the whole entire man hath a very sore death in that he is separate and departed<sup>321</sup> from the 85 fruition of the very fountain of life, almighty glorious God.

Now say there, as I told you, therefore some good men that Adam by his sin lost from himself and all his posterity all those gifts that God gave him above
 90 his nature. And therein could his posterity have no wrong nor any cause to complain upon God but upon Adam only. For they were all given unto us

306 to perceive 307 remained 308 special, particular 309 greatly 310 wishes 311 devise 312 full hardly consent: scarcely

but upon condition hanging on his hand,<sup>322</sup> which condition when he broke, those gifts could by no reason belong or be due unto us. But yet remained there high cause for us to thank God for the remnant. For the gifts only pertaining to the natural state of man (which I showed you before), those gave not God unto the kind of man upon condition to be lost by the sin of Adam, nor no man to be perpetually damned by sensible feeling of the fire of hell for original sin contracted without his witting,<sup>323</sup> but only for actual sin freely committed by his own vicious will. And then if the truth thus be, this matter may partly be resembled unto some great good prince, which, giving to a poor man for him and his heirs of his body forever lands to the yearly value of one hundred pounds, frank and free simpliciter<sup>324</sup> and without any condition, would give him farther other lands to the yearly value of ten thousand pounds with the honor of a dukedom also to him and his said heirs forever, restrained nevertheless with this condition, that, if he commit any treason against this prince's majesty, this duchy with all those lands of the yearly ten thousand pounds should be forfeited and lost from him and his said heirs perpetually, and that yet the other lands should still remain in the blood, and that every man of them, if he do either treason or other great crime against the king, should stand unto his personal peril of death or other pains, according to justice for his personal fault, without the loss of the land from the stock<sup>325</sup> for the fault of any their ancestor. If now this man committed treason and lost this duchy from his heirs by his deed and yet left them this hundred pound lands of the king's gift beside, there were (ye wot<sup>326</sup> well) none of his heirs that ever could have cause to blame the king for the loss of the duchy but had yet greater cause to thank him for their living of the yearly hundred pounds, which they still enjoy of his liberal gift, more by every groat<sup>327</sup> than ever the good king ought<sup>328</sup> them.

Lo, thus say they that likewise God took from the posterity of Adam the royal duchy, that is to wit, the joys of heaven with the commodities<sup>329</sup> of those other gifts above man's nature, which he gave Adam for himself, and then upon condition, which condition Adam broke. But yet he left them still the good honest living of the yearly hundred pounds, that is to wit, the commodities of man's competent<sup>330</sup> state natural, which I have before partly showed you, which state also man hath without his desert received, of<sup>331</sup> the only mere liberal goodness of God, and which commodities by affliction of perpetual pain felt in fire God never taketh from any man for the original sin contracted from his forefather without actual deadly sin of himself. Now to that that<sup>332</sup> the whole kind of man are called in Scripture the children of wrath by nature<sup>333</sup> and put under condemnation and death by the sin of Adam, and such other words like, they answer that those words are and well may be meant of the loss and condemnation of mankind in the loss of the inheritance of heaven and of those other gifts that God had conditionally given it, above the competent state of man's nature, for<sup>334</sup> the wrath of the condition broken by the sin of Adam, as it were a great condemnation to lose a duchy with ten thousand pounds and retain only a mean<sup>335</sup> man's living of one hundred pounds.

And they further declare that there are two manner of pains, that is to wit, poena damni et poena sensus (pain of loss and pain of feeling), as a man may be pained by loss of money or loss of his hand. Pain of loss may be also by two means, either by the losing of a thing that he hath in possession, or by duty should have come unto him, or by the losing of a thing that should have come unto him, and yet of no duty but of the mere liberality of some other man, which for displeasure given changeth his will and withdraweth it. Now say they that, for actual deadly sin, every man that impenitent dieth therein is damned both to the pain of loss and to the pain of feeling—that is to wit, to the pain of the loss of the joys of heaven, the fruition of the glorious sight of the Godhead forever, and to the perpetual sensible pain of feeling the fire of hell perpetual.

But for only original sin they say that no man is damned unto the pain of feeling, but only unto the pain of the said loss alone. And whereas the same pain of loss of the fruition of the Godhead is yet, unto those Christian people that are damned for actual deadly sin, a greater grief than is their intolerable feeling of the hot fire of hell, because they were by regeneration of their baptism made inheritors of heaven and have lost it by their own fault, yet unto those that die unchristened with none other sin than original, the pain of that loss is not grievous, because it was the thing which, though it might 5 have comen to them, yet were they never entitiled thereto indeed, nor were not by their own fault the cause of their own loss. And thus say some as I show you, concerning all folk old and young that, never being christened nor nothing hearing of 10 Christ, carry no deadly sin with them out of this world but sin original only. And as for infants dying unbaptized, albeit that<sup>336</sup> in many of these things that I have rehearsed by the way, many men will peradventure<sup>337</sup> think otherwise, yet in the effect and substance of the point whereunto all the matter draweth, that is to wit, that those infants be damned only to the pain of loss of heaven, and not unto the pain of feeling by any sensible pain in the fire of hell, to this point I think the most part of 20 all Christendom both learned and unlearned agree.

Now as for such as die unchristened at man's state and never heard of Christ, some say one and some say another, as I have showed you before. And some say that without the faith of Christ, if they come 25 to discretion,<sup>338</sup> they must besides original sin die of necessity in actual sin and be damned to sensible pain. For they say that all the deeds that ever they do be sin. Which saying meseemeth<sup>339</sup> hard, but I will not dispute it here. Howbeit, well I wot<sup>340</sup> that 30 some texts of Scripture that they lay<sup>341</sup> therefore nothing prove for their purpose. Yet shall I not leave unshowed you one comfortable<sup>342</sup> saying that Master Nicholas de Lyra<sup>343</sup> toucheth upon those words of Saint Paul in the eleventh chapter of his epistle 35 to the Hebrews: Sine fide autem impossibile est Deo placere quemquam. Credere enim oportet accedentem ad Deum, quia est, et inquiringibus se remuneratorem sit ("Without faith," saith Saint Paul, "it is impossible any man to please God. For every man that cometh unto God must believe that God is, and that he is the rewarder of them that seek him").<sup>344</sup> Upon these words saith Master Lyra that, although the people of the Jews to whom the law was given were bounden to the belief of more than this, and 40 the learned men of the Jews to the belief of more than the common people, and we Christian people and those that are the priests and learned among us be rateably<sup>345</sup> bounden to the belief of more things than were the Jews, or they that were learned 50 among them, yet unto the paynims and gentiles, to whom the law was not given, nor never had heard of Christ, it was sufficient for their salvation to believe those two points only which Saint Paul here rehearseth, that is to wit, that there is one God and that he will reward them that seek him. And those 55 two points be such as every man may attain by natural reason, helped forth with such grace as God keepeth from no man but from him that by his own default<sup>346</sup> either will not receive it or deserveth to have it withdrawn.

So that, if this be true that Master Lyra saith, then is there no man of discretion among the gentiles or paynims unsaved without his own default, and so no color<sup>347</sup> of quarrel against the justice of God in this matter. And it is to be considered that 65 Master Lyra there saith that in the belief of those two points is implied the belief of Christ, which is the means of our salvation, in that that<sup>348</sup> he which believeth that God will reward them that seek him hath therein implied that God hath a respect unto 70 man's salvation and provideth a means thereunto, and so believeth he that there is a means of man's salvation and reward, though he know not that the means is Christ. And there though he believe not on Christ by the name of Christ, yet believeth he 75 and hopeth for the means of salvation, which is indeed Christ. And that belief sufficeth (saith Master Lyra) for his salvation, though he think not on Christ, of whom he never heard.

Thus have I showed you, concerning the necessity 80 of man's redemption, and the manner of man's fall, and the things that he lost thereby, and the justice of God used therein, and as well his justice as his mercy tempered together in the marvelous means of man's redemption, sundry diverse things. And 85 concerning Adam's gifts and his losses for his posterity, I have showed you sundry things of diverse other men's opinions, in which I will bind myself to the defense of neither part. But this thing am I very sure of, that by the fall of Adam every man and 90 child that by natural propagation came of him had so verily lost and forfeited the bliss of heaven that never should nor never shall any of them all attain again thereto without the means of our mediator and savior, Jesus Christ, the merits of whose bitter Passion hath redeemed us and thereto made us inheritable<sup>349</sup> again — as many of us (I mean) as by his faith, without contempt of his sacraments, use<sup>350</sup> ourselves in such wise<sup>351</sup> as by our own sin we do not willfully and finally fall again from the benefit. And thus upon this first question, without any bold affirmations or opinion that I will hold or maintain, I have somewhat showed you diverse things that diverse doctors say.

Another Question

Then are there many men in hand<sup>352</sup> with another question, and therein demand<sup>353</sup> they this: while our Savior Christ (say they) bestowed upon the redemption of man all the blessed blood of his body to the very following of the water after, and that not only being an innocent sinless man and a good, but also being beside that very God too, by reason whereof the least drop of his blessed blood might have sufficed to recompense and satisfy for the sin of seven whole worlds, wherefore be not all men, by the virtue<sup>354</sup> of his such painful death, either taken up into heaven, glorified in body and beautified in soul, forthwith as soon as they be born, or else at the leastwise restored to the state that Adam by his sin lost them before in Paradise? — That is to wit, that their bodies might be preserved from death, and the reasonable soul from rebellion of the sensual body, and have but the devil alone left him to strive withal,<sup>355</sup> and man discharged of all pain and vexation, and live here in such pleasant plight as we should have lived if Adam had not sinned, and (by serving God in such wise) then in such time or times after as God should think convenient<sup>356</sup> all men to be translated<sup>357</sup> out of earth into the joys of heaven?

In this question are there more things than one. But for the first, we must mark and consider well that Christ willingly would, by the ordinance of the whole Trinity, suffer more pain for our redemption than was of necessity requisite. Howbeit, though he so did without necessity, yet did he it not without a great good cause. For the pleasure of God was that, by the hideous torment and willingly taken pain of that holy blessed and almighty Person, man should two things consider: one, how much we be bounden and beholden to him that would endure and sustain such horrible affliction for our sake; the other, that we should thereby consider the burden and weight of sin and well remember in ourselves, since that innocent almighty Person willingly suffered so sore<sup>358</sup> bitter pain for the sin of other, how much we very sinful wretches should of reason be well content, every man to suffer for our own. For unto sufferance for our sin, how loath and irksome<sup>359</sup> would we be of ourselves,<sup>360</sup> when we be so scantily<sup>361</sup> stirred yet thereto, for all that wonderful example? And whereas our hard hearts are so dispiteous<sup>362</sup> that many for all the consideration of Christ's bitter Passion and most painful death cannot yet with compassion relent into tears and weep, if he had paid our ransom but with one drop of his blessed blood pricked out with a pin, what doubt is there but that thereat then many a wretch would laugh?

Now as for bringing every man unto heaven forthwith upon his birth without any more ado,<sup>363</sup> why God would<sup>364</sup> not the effect of his Passion to weigh to<sup>365</sup> such purpose, there are more causes than one. First, that thing had been impertinent<sup>366</sup> to the nature of redemption, the nature whereof were at the farthest,<sup>367</sup> but to restore men to the liberty and freedom of their former state. But man in the state of innocency living in Paradise should not have been in that case<sup>368</sup> to have been forthwith translated into heaven, but should first have served God in Paradise, and somewhat have done therefor,<sup>369</sup> and in all that while have stood still<sup>370</sup> upon the winning or losing of heaven after his abearing.<sup>371</sup> For if he had abiden<sup>372</sup> in Paradise untempted many years more than he did and had afterward before his translation,<sup>373</sup> upon the suggestion of the old serpent the devil and of the young serpent the woman, eaten of the fruit as he did, he had in any time of his life had the selfsame fall. And peradventure any of his sons, if he had happed<sup>374</sup> any to beget before his fall, might, for himself and the posterity coming after of his own body, have lost by the like fall

349 capable of inheriting 350 behave

according to his conduct 372 dwelt 373 before his translation: before he was taken (up to heaven) 374 happened

the self-same state. And therefore I say that to bring man to heaven by and by<sup>375</sup> upon his birth was nothing belonging to the nature of redemption, which nature is to restore him only to the freedom of his first estate,<sup>376</sup> which was not (as I show you) man to go forthwith to heaven.

But then why be we not at the leastwise restored unto the same state, the state of innocency that Adam had in Paradise with all the commodities thereunto pertaining? To this I answer you, Christ when he redeemed us, how much pain soever himself took thereabout, was yet at his own liberty to temper the fruit that we should take thereby. And therefore if we took thereby much less fruit than we do, there could no man in reason find any fault therein. Howbeit,<sup>377</sup> as there is no doubt but that God could by the Passion of Christ have redeemed and restored us, not only to the conditional title of inheriting heaven at length, but also to the immediate attaining of heaven forthwith upon our birth or to the state of innocency in Paradise first for the meanwhile, if he had would,<sup>378</sup> so doubt I nothing also but likewise as he restored us not straightways to heaven because his high wisdom wist<sup>379</sup> it was not for God convenient,<sup>380</sup> so restored he us not to the state of innocency because his high wisdom well wist it was for ourselves not best. To be stablished<sup>381</sup> in the possession of eternal wealth, without any manner pain taken or anything done toward the deserving thereof, was and is so proper to God alone (the three persons of the glorious Trinity, the Creator) that God would never communicate<sup>382</sup> that thing with any other person being but a creature, neither man in earth nor yet angel in heaven. And therefore man to look for that point as the effect of his redemption were full unreasonable and far overproud a request.

Now man to be restored to the state of innocency, God saw that for man it was not best. For as the Scripture saith, Homo cum in honore esset, non intellexit (“When man was in honor, his understanding failed him; he could not know himself”).<sup>383</sup> And therefore to the keeping of him from sin, and specially from pride the root of all sin, a more base estate was better. And better was it also for him to have two enemies, that is to wit,<sup>384</sup> the devil and his own sensuality both, than for to lack the one. For the having of both is a cause of double fear, and therefore of double diligence, to set his reason to keep sure watch to resist them, and for double help to call double so much upon almighty God for grace. And then with his so doing, he is more able and more sure now to subdue them both, than with less looking for God’s help he was before the one,<sup>385</sup> and hath yet also thereby for his double victory against his double enemies the occasion of double reward.

Besides this, if God should by his Passion have restored them that came to his faith both in the Old Law and in the New unto the state of innocency, so that the children circumcised or christened should never have died till they were comen to discretion and had done some deadly sin, and that then their nature should change and by the sacrament of penance yet be restored again, then should it (as holy Saint Augustine saith)<sup>386</sup> have been a great occasion to make folk come to the faith and sacraments for the commodities of this present life, whereas God will have heaven so sore<sup>387</sup> desired and sought for that he will have the desirers thereof set by<sup>388</sup> the pleasures of this world not only nothing at all but also seek for the contrary and suffer displeasure and pain.

Moreover, if it so should have been, every person’s secret sinful state should by the sudden open change of his nature have been, to his open shame, detected and disclosed in the sight of all the people. And over this, if it should thus have been, then must there have been so many common open miracles continually that man should in manner<sup>389</sup> have been drawn to the faith by force, and by that means have lost more than half the merit, which God would in no wise of his great goodness suffer.<sup>390</sup> And yet besides this, God, that<sup>391</sup> well wist<sup>392</sup> what thing the bliss of heaven is, saw that it was not convenient to give so great a gift to every slothful javel<sup>393</sup> that nothing did set thereby. And he well showeth himself to set nothing by it that can find in his heart to do nothing for it. Finally, God wist that it was nothing meet, the servant to stand in better condition than his master, as our Lord saith himself in the Gospel. And therefore would he not suffer that, while he came to his own kingdom not without travail and pain, his servants should be slothful, and sit and pick their nails, and be carried up 5 to heaven at their ease, but biddeth every man that will be his disciple or servant take up his cross upon his back, and therewith come forth and follow him. And for this cause, lo, though the painful Passion of Christ, paid for all mankind, was of the nature of

 10 the thing much more than sufficient for the sins of us all, though we nothing did but sin all our whole life, yet God, not willing to fill heaven with hell hounds, limited of his own wisdom and goodness after what rate and stint the commodity<sup>394</sup> thereof
 15 should be employed upon us, and ordinarily<sup>395</sup> devised that the merits of his pain taken for us should make our labor and pain taken for ourselves meritorious, which else, had we taken for our sin never so much and done never so many good deeds toward 20 the attaining of heaven, could not have merited us a rush.<sup>396</sup> And this, I say, ordinarily. For by special privilege his liberal hand is yet nevertheless at liberty to give remission of sin, and to give grace and glory, where and whensoever he list.<sup>397</sup>

25 And thus have I somewhat touched the answer unto this question: wherefore the painful Passion of Christ restored not man again unto the former state of innocency that Adam before had in Paradise?

Now albeit that sundry other questions both may 30 be moved and are, which might be induced and entreated<sup>398</sup> here, yet (lest I should therewith make this work too tedious and the introduction longer than the principal process<sup>399</sup> of the Passion) we shall be content with these few as those that most 35 properly pertain unto the matter of the redemption; and, beseeching almighty God of his great grace that, all curious appetite of vain problems put apart, we may with meekness give our hearts to the very fruitful learning of those necessary things that 40 we be bound to know, we shall haste us to the matter of the blessed Passion itself.

The Prayer

O holy blessed Savior Jesus Christ, which willingly didst determine to die for man's sake, mollify mine 45 hard heart and supple it so<sup>400</sup> by grace that through tender compassion of thy bitter Passion I may be partner of thine holy redemption.

Whereas I have here before showed you three points, that is to wit, the ruin of angel, the fall of man, and the determination of the Trinity for man's redemption
 50 by means of Christ's Passion, as three things that were causes going before, whereupon his bitter Passion followed, I doubt not but that such as are learned will like also that, ere I begin with the lamentable story of the Passion itself, I should first 55 show further some other points, that is to wit, by what means this determination of the Trinity was notified<sup>401</sup> unto man. And also the other causes of Christ's death and Passion, as the malice of the Jews, the treason of Judas, and the obedient will of his 60 own holy manhead.<sup>402</sup> And verily these points might well and conveniently have been declared<sup>403</sup> before, and in the treating of these three other points, somewhat have I made mention of all these points too. But I have not thought it like<sup>404</sup> requisite to declare
 65 them before so full as those others, because the words of the Gospel itself give us more occasion to declare these points in the process of the Passion itself than those other three points which I have as a preamble touched more at large<sup>405</sup> before. 70

A Warning to the Reader

Here I will give the reader warning that I will rehearse the words of the evangelists in this process of the Passion in Latin word by word after my copy
 75 as I find it in the work of that worshipful father Master John Gerson, which<sup>406</sup> work he entitled Monotessaron<sup>407</sup> (that is to wit, "one of all four") as I have declared you before in my preface, because I will not in any word willingly mangle or mutilate that honorable man's work, but so rehearse it 80 that learned<sup>408</sup> which shall read it here may have

But yet will I not fully follow the same fashion in the rehearsing of the same thing in English. For if I should, there neither could any such fruit grow thereof, and also the context of the story should in the eye of the English reader (and yet much more in the ear of the English hearer) seem very far unsavory by reason of the often interposition of the initial letters signifying the names of the four evangelists, and some one sentence<sup>415</sup> with so little change so often repeated, and in some place the context so diversely entricked in his collection,<sup>416</sup> that himself with a note in the margin declareth himself to doubt and stand unsure whether in that place he join and link well in one the sundry words of the evangelists or no. And therefore in the rehearsing of his context in English, nothing will I put in of mine own, but out will I not let<sup>417</sup> to leave any such thing as I shall think to be unto the English reader no furtherance but a hindrance to the clear progress of this holy story, which we shall with help of God in this wise now begin.

THE FIRST CHAPTER

There approached near the holy day of the Unleavened Loaves, which feast is called Pascha.<sup>419</sup> For the Pascha and the Unleavened Loaves was two days after. And so was it that, when Jesus had ended all these sermons, he said unto his disciples, “You know that after two days shall be the Pascha, and the Son of Man shall be delivered<sup>420</sup> to be crucified.” Then gathered there together the princes of the priests, and the ancients<sup>421</sup> of the people into the palace of the prince of the priests which<sup>422</sup> is called Caiphias, and took counsel together. And they sought the ways, both the chief priests and the scribes, how they might with some wile<sup>423</sup> take him and put him to death. For they were afraid of the people. They said therefore, “Not on the holy day, lest there arise some seditious ruffle<sup>424</sup> among the people.” But there entered Satan into Judas, whose surname is Iscariot, one of the twelve. Then went he to the princes of the priests and to the chief priests to betray him to them. And he had communication with the princes of the priests and with the rulers, in what manner he should betray him to them. And he said unto them, “What will ye give me and<sup>425</sup> I shall deliver him to you,” who, when they heard him, were well apaid,<sup>426</sup> and promised and covenanted with him to give him money, and appointed to give him thirty goats.<sup>427</sup> And he made the promise. And from that time forth he sought opportunity that he might commodiously<sup>428</sup> betray him out of the presence of the people. Before the holy day of the Pascha, Jesus, knowing that his hour came on to go out of this world unto his Father, whereas he had loved those that were his, unto the end he loved them.

The First Lecture

5 There approached near the holy day of the Unleavened Bread, which is called Pascha.<sup>430</sup> For the Pascha and the Unleavened Loaves was two days after.

These words, good Christian readers, be the words of Saint Matthew, Saint Luke, and Saint Mark, three of the four evangelists, which, by the mention-
10 making of the Pascha and the Unleavened Bread, give us here in the beginning occasion to speak of the point which I before touched, that is to wit, in what wise the merciful, just, and high devised means of man's redemption, the deep secret mystery of the blessed Trinity (which, till God revealed 15 it unto them, none angel in heaven knew or could think upon) was of God's comfortable<sup>431</sup> goodness signified and declared to man. For which ye shall understand that, albeit our first parents Adam and 20 Eve were disobedient, and thereby broke God's commandment, and were also stubborn in the beginning (whereby they rather excused their default, and each of them put it from himself to some other, than meekly confessed their fault and asked for pardon and mercy) for which demean,<sup>432</sup> besides the sentence of death conditionally pronounced (before mentioned in the second chapter of Genesis, that whatsoever day Adam did eat of the tree of knowledge he should die), God, as is recited in the 30 third chapter, declared after<sup>433</sup> certain other punishments that either of them should have for them and their offspring too (the one with sore<sup>434</sup> travail about the getting of his daily living, the other with sore travail in bringing forth of her children, and either of them some other thing besides, as you have 35 in the second point heard rehearsed before), yet never find we that of God's mercy they fell into despair, as we find of Cain and of Judas.

40 And therefore after their not desperate<sup>435</sup> but fruitful repentance, taken upon<sup>436</sup> God's inward motion, and thereby calling to God for remission and mercy (with taking great wreak<sup>437</sup> willingly themselves upon themselves, as well with inward heaviness<sup>438</sup> and sorrow as outward labor and pain for their heinous offenses committed against God by the bold breaking of his high commandment), the 45 great goodness of God giving them knowledge of the means of their salvation and of that Mediator by whose death they and their offspring should be redeemed again to bliss, did, in the faith of the said

50 Mediator, remit and forgive them the eternality of the pain due unto their offense, reserving their actual enhancing<sup>439</sup> into heaven until the great mystery of Christ's Passion should be performed, and thereby the ransom paid, in such time as the high
55 foresight and providence of God had from the beginning, before the world wrought,<sup>440</sup> laid up out of sight in the deep treasure of his unsearchable knowledge, little and little<sup>441</sup> at sundry seasons to be signified and insinuate<sup>442</sup> conveniently<sup>443</sup> to man before. 60

And therefore this great secret mystery did God reveal in diverse wise, that is to wit, partly with inward inspiration, partly with outward means, as well by words as other outward tokens. The first mention that we find made thereof is the third chapter 65 of Genesis, where God unto the serpent said among other things thus: Inimicitias ponam inter te et mulierem, et semen tuum et semen illius. Ipsum conteret caput tuum, et tu insidiaberis calcaneo illius ("I shall put enmity," said our Lord to the serpent, "between thee and the woman, and between the seed of thee and the seed of her. That seed shall tread and all-to
75 pieces the devil's head and his power upon man, and that all that ever the devil should do again against Christ should not be able to reach his head (that is to wit, his Godhead), but only to fumble about his 80 foot (that is to wit, his manhead), and yet rather lie in await to hurt it than able to hurt it indeed. For all that ever the devil (when with long lying in await therefore, he could nothing prevail by himself) caused by his wily train the Jews and the gentiles to do against his holy manhead, was yet, the thing well weighed and considered, not able to do it hurt, 85

but (as the prophet saith) Sagittae parvulorum factae sunt plagae eorum ("The wounds that they gave him were like as they had been made with the arrows that are shot out of a little boy's bow").<sup>449</sup> For all the wounds that they gave him in his body could not so take hold, but that within three days after, all his flesh was rid of all manner pain, and in far better health and incomparable better condition after forever than it was five days before.

And here, good reader, marvel not though I rehearse you the text of Genesis otherwise here than I did in the second point before. For whereas I there rehearsed it after the Latin translation, whereof the sentence<sup>450</sup> may stand very well, yet seemeth this letter<sup>451</sup> after the Hebrew text to serve more meet and more proper for the matter, in that by the Latin text the treading down of the devil seemeth applied unto our blessed Lady (which she did indeed by means of her holy seed, our Savior), but by the Hebrew text it is, as you see, referred (as more meet is) unto her holy Son himself.

But now when this mystery of man's redemption was thus there prophesied by God, I doubt it not but that of this watchword<sup>452</sup> the devil gathered somewhat and ever gnawed after upon that bone from that time to the coming of Christ, as a matter of his grief and torment. But yet will I not warrant that he very well understood it. And Adam (would I ween)<sup>453</sup> at the first hearing understood that word yet much less. For though God suffered<sup>454</sup> the serpent, whom he threatened therewith to his grief and displeasure, somewhat to guess thereat, yet while man was at that time nothing yet reconciled, but in his heinous offense stubbornly stood at his defense and his sorrow shortly after thereupon declared unto him, it seemeth me<sup>455</sup> not likely that God gave him the knowledge of his pardon before the full knowledge of his punishment or the acknowledging and repentance of his fault. Howbeit upon his repentance after, I nothing doubt but that God gave him further understanding what was by those words meant. Besides this, he signified this mystery to them by the sacrifice. For by the killing and offering up unto God the innocent beast in sacrifice was betokened the death of our innocent Savior and offering up of his body by the hot fervent pain of the cross.

And thus by diverse ways was there revelation given of this great mystery unto other of the old fathers (as Noah, Abraham, Isaac, and Israel and Joseph) by sundry diverse tokens too long here to rehearse, before the law given<sup>456</sup> in writing. Then was there in the law written express warning given by Moses unto the children of Israel in desert,<sup>457</sup> when he wrote unto them in the eighteenth chapter of the Deuteronomy: Prophetam de gente tua et de fratribus tuis sicut me, suscitabit tibi Dominus Deus tuus, ipsum audies ("A prophet of thine own people and of thy brethren, like unto me, shall thy Lord God raise up unto thee, and that prophet shalt thou hear").<sup>458</sup> Here in these words Moses gave them warning of Christ, that he should be a very man coming lineally of one of their own tribes, and that he should be a bringer of a New Law to them, as himself was, and that they should therein, upon the pain of the vengeance of God (as after followeth in the text), be bounden when he should come to hear and obey him. Now to bring them a New Law, as Moses did, God never sent none after but only Christ. And therefore him were they, by those words of their old lawyer<sup>459</sup> Moses, commanded for to hear and obey in those words, Ipsum audies ("Him shalt thou hear").

And therefore since they so were commanded of God by the mouth of Moses, though there had been before Christ's coming no word spoken of his Godhead, yet when himself so plainly declared it unto them, they were, I say, by the said commandment of God given them by Moses, bounden to give therein full faith and credence to him. Howbeit, that Christ was the very Son of God, and himself very God, beside the figures<sup>460</sup> and prophecies of the Old Law very plain and plenteous, the Father of heaven himself, present with the Holy Ghost at Christ's baptism, testified and recognized him for his very Son, saying, Hic est filius meus dilectus, in quo mihi complacui ("This is my well beloved Son, in whom hath been my delight").<sup>461</sup> Besides this, of his birth, of the place and the time of his doctrine and his miracles, and the malice conceived against him by the Jews, and the false treason of his familiar<sup>462</sup> enemy, of his Passion, his death, his resurrection, and his glorious ascension was warning given by sundry wise, as well by the words of the holy prophets as by tokens and figures of things done among the chosen people (both before the law written<sup>463</sup> and after) and by things also commanded to be done among the children of Israel in their sacraments, rites, ceremonies, and sacrifices, commanded them (I say) by God (by the mouth of Moses) in the law given them by writing. For as saith Saint Paul, Omnia in figura contingebant illis (“All things came to them in figures”).<sup>464</sup>

But forasmuch as I wot<sup>465</sup> well no wise man would look that I should in this place rehearse all those things, which would make a long book alone, I will therefore (letting all the remnant pass) only with a word or two show you what feast the evangelists here speak of, in these words of theirs which I have rehearsed you, that is to wit, the feast of Pascha and of the Unleavened Bread.

That the children of Israel were in servitude and thralldom in Egypt under the proud prince Pharaoh; and that God conducted them thence in strong and mighty hand and made that high stubborn king, maugre his teeth,<sup>466</sup> fain<sup>467</sup> to let them go; and that when he farther followed them of his heart-burning malice through the Red Sea, the same way where God had sent his own people through safe, this fierce furious king with all his whole main mighty army was — with the waves of the water (which water, while the children of Israel passed through, stood up like high walls of crystal on both sides, leaving a great broad space of dry ground all the mids<sup>468</sup>) suddenly relented<sup>469</sup> and fallen and flowing shortly together again — involved<sup>470</sup> and tossed up, overthrown and tumbled down, overwhelmed and wretchedly drowned: all this process (I say) shall I nothing need to speak of, as things so commonly known that, for the atrocity<sup>471</sup> of the story and the wonderful work of God therein, almost every child hath heard.

And every man almost is (I trust) instructed also that, though these things be no feigned tales told for parables, but were things verily done indeed, yet did they by the provident ordinance of God serve also to signify certain great secret mysteries concerning the redemption of man. As for example, the thralldom of the children of Israel under King Pharaoh and the Egyptians signifieth the bondage of mankind under the prince of this dark world, the devil and his evil spirits. Their delivery<sup>472</sup> thence under the leading of Moses betokeneth the delivery of man from the devil and his evil angels under our captain Christ. The safe passage of the children of Israel through the Red Sea, and all the power of Pharaoh drowned in the same, signifieth mankind passing out of the devil’s danger<sup>473</sup> through the water of baptism, the sacrament taking his force of the red blood of Christ that he shed in his bitter Passion, and all the devil’s power, usurped upon<sup>474</sup> us before and laboring to keep us still, drowned and destroyed in the water of baptism and the red blood of Christ’s passion. And by all the course after of the people conveyed from the Red Sea, by the desert<sup>475</sup> toward the land of behest,<sup>476</sup> and their waywardness and many punishments, with manifold mercy showed again by the space of forty years together ere<sup>477</sup> any of them came there, is there signified and figured<sup>478</sup> the long painful wandering of men in the wild wilderness of this wretched world ere we can get hence to heaven and the frowardness<sup>479</sup> of ourselves that so sore<sup>480</sup> keepeth us from it that, with great help of God’s grace, in respect of the multitude that by their evil desert eternally perish in this worldly desert, very few (I fear), and with much work, attain unto it.

But for the perceiving of these words of the Gospel, “There approached near the feastful<sup>481</sup> day of the Unleavened Loaves, which feast is called Pascha,”<sup>482</sup> ye shall understand that the Jews among all their feasts and holy days through the year had one feast the most solemn that was called “Pascha” and “the Feast of the Unleavened Bread” which God specially commanded them to celebrate yearly forever, as appeareth at length in the twelfth chapter of Exodus.<sup>483</sup> For after that the proud stiff-necked Pharaoh, being by Moses in the name of God commanded to suffer<sup>484</sup> the children of Israel to depart out of his land into desert with all their wives and their children and all their cattle,<sup>485</sup> would in no wise suffer it, but albeit that<sup>486</sup> by the force and constraint of sundry sore strokes and plagues (where-with God wonderfully smote him) he granted their delivery<sup>487</sup> for the time that he stood in dread (the rod of God laying the lashes upon him), yet, after the rod scant<sup>488</sup> removed, ever more his stubborn pride sprang into his hard heart and made him forbid their passage again and hold them in thralldom

 5 still, our Lord at the last commanded Moses that the tenth day of that month they should take every household a lamb without spot, and the fourteenth day of the same month, in the evening, offer it and eat it up all together, head and guts and 10 all, so that they should leave nothing thereof, but if anything were left they should burn it up. And of this lamb should they nothing eat raw nor sod<sup>489</sup> but only roasted at the fire. And they should eat it with wild lettuce and unleavened bread, and should 15 have no leaven, neither that night nor in seven days following, within their house upon pain of death. And they should eat it having their gowns gird<sup>490</sup> or tucked up about the reins<sup>491</sup> of their back, and their shoes upon their feet, and their walking staves 20 in their hands, and so eat it in haste, as folk that had made them ready to be going and therefore might not tarry because they were upon their passage.

And then God showed them of two passages: the one of theirs, the other of his. For he showed 25 them that the twenty-first day of the same month, which should be at the end of the said seven days of the unleavened bread, they should all pass and depart out of Egypt over the Red Sea. And he showed them that in the night of the said fourteenth day,
 30 in which they should offer in sacrifice and eat the unspotted lamb, himself would make a passage through Egypt and by his angel kill in that one night all the first begotten of the Egyptians, as well men as cattle in every house, from the first begotten
 35 son of Pharaoh that sat in his seat, to the first begotten son of the poorest and most simple slave that lay in prison. And he commanded them that with a bundle of hyssop they should besprinkle the posts and the hance<sup>492</sup> of their doors with the blood 40 of the lamb, which blood should be the mark unto him that should strike these first begottens that should that night be slain, so that upon the sight of that mark the striker should pass by their houses so marked and not enter thereinto to do there any 45 harm; but he warned them that there should that night none of them come out of their doors.

And likewise as God had promised, so performed he that great sore<sup>493</sup> slaughter and vengeance thorough all Egypt in that one night, so that thereupon Pharaoh with all the Egyptians were so sore<sup>494</sup>
 50 daunted that both Pharaoh and all his people not only licensed<sup>495</sup> but also required and prayed the children of Israel to get them out of Egypt into the desert about their sacrifice, and, in all that they might, they also hastened them forward, and not only
 55 let them carry and convey out with them all their own but lent them also so great substance of theirs that the Hebrews, as the Scripture saith, in their going with that plentuous borrowing, “spoiled the Egyptians,”<sup>496</sup> and that by the special commandment of God—either in recompense of the wrongful oppression that the Egyptians had done them before, or because that, since Domini est terra et plenitudo eius, orbis terrarum, et universi qui habitant in eo (“The earth belongeth to our Lord, and all-thing that is therein, the whole roundel<sup>497</sup> of the world and all the people that dwell therein”),<sup>498</sup>
 60 God might well with reason take what he would from whom he would, and give it where he would, and make their possession lawful.

But now was this Feast of the Unleavened Bread yearly kept holy the space of the said seven days by the special commandment of God, and called dies azymorum in the Greek tongue, that is to say, “the days of the unleavened bread.” And the first day of 75 them was the great solemn day. And that first day began always the night before in the evening in the feast of Pascha, wherein was immolate<sup>499</sup> and offered in sacrifice the unspotted lamb. For, as I have showed you, that lamb were they commanded to eat
 80 with unleavened bread, and so forth from that time to continue the unleavened bread seven days after. This feast, therefore, of the sacrifice of the unspotted lamb is that feast that is called Pascha, whereof the evangelists here speak. And they call it also the Feast
 85 of the Unleavened Bread, because that feast began the same night in which the lamb was sacrificed.

This feast which was in the Greek called Pascha, and which name the Latins have taken of the Greeks and continued, was in the Hebrew tongue called Phase and (as Saint Jerome saith)<sup>500</sup> Pascha too. It was called Phase for that<sup>501</sup> Phase in the one of the common biblical glosses found in Bibles in More's period. 501 for that:

 because

Hebrew signifieth “passing” or “going” and the feast was (as I have showed you) ordained in remembrance of God’s passing through Egypt in doing the vengeance upon the Egyptians by the slaughter of 5 all their first begottens to compel them to suffer the Hebrews pass out of their thralldom. It is also called Pascha, for that that (as Saint Jerome saith) pascha in the Hebrew signifieth “immolation,” and therefore for the immolation of the lamb that feast hath in 10 Hebrew that name. The Greeks, as I have told you, have taken the name Pascha—and that peradventure<sup>502</sup> the rather for that that<sup>503</sup> the same Hebrew word signifieth also in their tongue another thing, very consonant and convenient for the season and 15 the matter. For pascha in the Greek tongue signifieth “passion.” And because that in that night of his Maundy,<sup>504</sup> in which he immolated the lamb, he began his bitter Passion—the immolation of the very unspotted Lamb, his own blessed body, which im-
 20 molation and passion he finished on the morrow—therefore they took and used the name of Pascha, wherein the Latin Church followeth them.

Thus have I somewhat showed you, good Christian readers, the first point that I spoke of rising of 25 the text, that is to wit, in what wise the determination of the Trinity for man’s redemption was notified<sup>505</sup> unto man, that is to say, by the inspiration and prophecies in words and writing, and by figures contained as well in other things done among 30 the chosen people as in their rites, sacraments, ceremonies, and sacrifices. I have also showed you somewhat concerning this feast of the Unleavened Loaves and the Pascha. But, as I said before, all these things which then were verily done foresignified in 35 Christ and his Church things after to be done. For that innocent lamb without spot was a figure betokening our Savior Christ, the very innocent Lamb of whom Saint John the Baptist witnessed, Ecce agnus Dei qui tollit peccata mundi (“Lo, the Lamb of 40 God, which taketh away the sins of the world”),<sup>506</sup> by whose immolation and sacrifice on the cross, and by his holy body received into ours as that lamb was into theirs, his faithful folk should be delivered out of thralldom of the devil’s dominion. And 45 therefore may we to the fruit<sup>507</sup> of our souls consider, in the foresaid figure, by these Egyptians that in Egypt (which signifieth by interpretation “darkness”) do labor to keep in captivity the children of Israel—the people which God calleth from their thralldom into the liberty of his service—we may 50 (I say) understand by the proud King Pharaoh and his chief captains, the great high proud prince, the Soldan<sup>508</sup> of Babylon, the devil. And as two the<sup>509</sup> special bashaws<sup>510</sup> of that proud souterly<sup>511</sup> soldan, may we well consider the world and the flesh. And 55 the whole people of the Egyptians under them may well betoken the devilish people, and the worldly people, and the fleshly people that follow them and willingly be governed by them.

For verily all these labor to draw into their service and to make their thrall servants, bondmen, and slaves, all those whom the goodness of God calleth out of the dark, devilish, worldly, and fleshy sub-60 jection into the lightsome<sup>512</sup> liberty of his celestial service. For surely the devil himself, nor the world, nor a man’s own flesh do not so much by their own strength to the bringing of good folk into their bondage as they do by the means and help of the 65 devilish, worldly, and fleshy people, by occasions of pride, envy, wrath, and covetise,<sup>513</sup> gluttony, sloth, and lechery (to which one vice of lechery, for an example, how oft hath an old wily wretched bawd brought and betrayed a good simple maid, whom 70 else neither the lust of her own flesh, nor the rewards of all the world, nor the labor of all the devils in hell should never have drawn thereto). By the first-begotten children of the Egyptians we may well understand the first motions of sin, as the subtle inward suggestions of the devil, and the inward
 75 incitation<sup>514</sup> of the flesh, and the outward occasions and provocations of the world and evil people, by all which manner of motions good well-disposed folk be many sundry wise solicited unto sin. And surely 80 killed must there be these first-begotten children, not only of the Egyptian people (that is to wit, the first motions unto such vices as have their springing of the soul) but also the first-begotten of their 85 beasts too (that is to wit, the first motions unto such vices as specially spring of the sensual beastly body), or else it will be very hard for the children of Israel, the well-disposed people, to escape well out of 90 bondage of these Egyptians.

But now to destroy those first-begotten children of the Egyptians the children of Israel are of themselves not sufficient,<sup>515</sup> but it must needs be the work of God for them. And yet will God that themselves shall do somewhat too. For he will that they shall make and receive this sacrifice of the Paschal lamb, and then, if they do worthily the one for him, he will do the other for them. And therefore he will that we shall receive the holy Paschal Lamb, his own blessed body, both bodily in the Blessed Sacrament and spiritually—with faith, hope, and charity—receive it worthily,<sup>516</sup> and in such wise also virtually<sup>517</sup> when we receive it not sacramentally. But he will we shall eat it with no leaven bread, that is to wit, with no sour taste of malice or sin, but with the sweet unleavened loaves of sincere love and verity. We must also, with a bundle of the low-growing herb of hyssop that signifieth humility, mark the posts and the hance<sup>518</sup> of the door of our house with the blood of the lamb, that is to wit, have remembrance of his bitter Passion and his blessed blood shed therein. And likewise as with a bundle of hyssop, the bitter eisell<sup>519</sup> and gall was given him to drink in the painful thirst of his Passion, which he so humbly suffered, we should with a bundle of humility (as it were with a painter's pencil<sup>520</sup>) dipped in the red blood of Christ, mark ourselves on every side and in the hance of our forehead with the letter of Tau,<sup>521</sup> the sign of Christ's holy cross.

And then will God himself with his holy angels pass by, and kill and destroy for us those first-begotten of the Egyptians, from the first-begotten child of the king that sitteth in his seat (that is to wit of pride, which is of all sin the prince) unto the first-begotten child of the poorest prisoned slave that is covetise,<sup>522</sup> lo, the very caitiff knave. For he is yet of all wretched vices the most base, by setting<sup>523</sup> and binding his affection neither unto God, nor man, nor woman, nor unto himself neither, but only made in the pleasure of possessing a great heap of round metal plates, which while he liveth he loveth better than himself and cannot find in his heart to break his heap to help himself. And when he goeth, he carrieth none hence with him, but is while he liveth in like wise rich (as the prophet saith) as a poor man is in a dream, which, when he waketh, hath never a penny of all the treasure that he was so glad of in his sleep.<sup>524</sup> And covetise is a very prisoner, for he cannot get away. Pride will away with shame, envy with his enemies' misery, wrath with fair entreating, sloth with hunger and pain, lechery with sickness, gluttony with the belly too full. But covetise can nothing get away—for the more full the more greedy, and the elder the more niggard, and the richer the more needy.

And while God killeth those Egyptians, that mark of Christ's bloody cross upon the posts of our house shall defend us, and be the mark by which we shall be marked from harm, as were the twelve thousand marked with the same sign of the letter Tau, mentioned in the seventh chapter of the Apocalypse Saint John.<sup>525</sup> But yet we must remember that in that perilous time we may not walk out abroad, but keep ourselves close (God biddeth us) within our so marked house from all evil outward occasions. We must also have our garments girt, and our walking staff in our hand, and eat apace for token of haste, in consideration of Christ's passage to kill the Egyptians for us by his own bitter Passion, and in remembrance also that we may not tarry here long about our meat, nor take leisure as we list<sup>526</sup> at our meal, but with our gear<sup>527</sup> girt and tucked up (for letting<sup>528</sup> us by the way), and our shoes upon our feet (for filing of<sup>529</sup> our affections with the dirt of sin), and with our walking staff in our hand (the remembrance of Christ's cross, to stay us with and beat from us venomous worms), get us forward apace upon our way out of the Egyptians' danger.<sup>530</sup>

Good Lord, which, upon the sacrifice of the Paschal lamb, didst so clearly destroy the first-begotten children of the Egyptians that Pharaoh was thereby forced to let the children of Israel depart out of his bondage, I beseech thee, give me the grace in such faithful wise to receive the very sweet Paschal lamb, the very<sup>531</sup> blessed Body of our sweet Savior, thy Son, that, the first suggestions of sin by thy power killed in mine heart, I may safe depart out of the danger of the most cruel Pharaoh, the devil.

The Second Lecture

So was it that, when Jesus had ended all these sermons, he said unto his disciples: “You know that after two days the Pascha shall be, and the Son of man shall be delivered<sup>532</sup> to be crucified.”

In these words we may, good Christian people, well perceive the goodness and the prescience of our holy Savior Christ—his prescience in that he foreknew the time of his parting by death out of this world unto his Father in heaven. And how could he but foreknow it, since he was not only man but God also, that foreknoweth all things and not his own Passion only, whereof he gave his disciples warning in this wise: “Two days hereafter not only shall the Paschal Feast be, which thing you know well, but also, which thing you think not on, the Son of Man shall be delivered to be crucified.” Christ was by more than one delivered to be crucified. His Father delivered him for pity upon mankind. Judas delivered him for covetise, the priests and the scribes for envy, the people for ignorance and folly. The devil delivered him for fear, lest he might lose mankind by his doctrine, and then lost he mankind after indeed more fully by his death than before by his doctrine.

His high provident goodness appeareth well in these words: Et factum est cum consummasset Iesus sermones hos omnes, dixit discipulis suis (“When Jesus had ended all these sermons, then he gave his disciples warning of his death coming so near at hand”).<sup>533</sup> What sermons these were appeareth well in the context of the Gospels before: that is to wit, his doctrine (that he taught them as well in the temple as elsewhere) and the revelations of the things to come (as of the destruction of Jerusalem and the Day of Doom), which things of doctrine and revelations he had preached unto them sundry days before that time. For since the cause of his coming into the earth was to bring man into heaven, and since he had also his life and his death in his own hand so that no man could, before himself would, force or compel him to die, he would not take the time for his death till he had first finished and ended those words and those things of heavenly doctrine that he had determined to do; and that done, as the thing finished that he had to do first, then sped he him apace toward his death.

And here is it good to consider that, as our Savior wist<sup>534</sup> when he should die (because he should not nor could not till he would) and yet did nevertheless diligence in those things that he had to do before his death (albeit he might have deferred his death unto what time him list<sup>535</sup> and have done in the meantime everything at ease and leisure), how much need have we—poor wretches that shall die ere<sup>536</sup> we would, and cannot tell the time when, but peradventure<sup>537</sup> this present day—what need have we, I say, to make haste about those things that we must needs do, so that we may have nothing left undone when we be suddenly sent for and must needs go. For when death cometh, the dreadful mighty messenger of God, there can no king command him, there can none authority strain<sup>538</sup> him, there can no riches hire him to tarry past his appointed time one moment of an hour. Therefore let us consider well in time what words we be bounden to speak and what deeds we be bounden to do, and say them and do them apace, and leave unsaid and undone all superfluous things (and much more all damnable things), witting<sup>539</sup> well that we have no void<sup>540</sup> time allowed us thereunto.

For as our Lord saith, “the day of our Lord shall steal on us like a thief,”<sup>541</sup> and “we wot<sup>542</sup> not when he will come, whether in the morning, or in the midday, or in the evening, or at the midnight.”<sup>543</sup> And therefore have we need, as our Savior saith, “to watch well that the thief break not in at the walls upon us, ere we be aware, when we be asleep in deadly sin.”<sup>544</sup> For then he robbeth us of all together<sup>545</sup> and maketh us poor miserable wretches forever. Let us then evermore make ourselves so ready for death, nothing left undone, that where our Savior said, after all his sermons ended, that after two days he should be delivered to be crucified, we may by help of his grace say to ourselves and our friends every day, “I have done all my business that I am come into this world for. For I shall, I wot nere<sup>546</sup> how soon, but peradventure this day, be delivered by God unto the cross of painful death. From which if I die naught,<sup>547</sup> I depart from death to the devil, as did the blasphemous thief that hung on his cross beside Christ. And if I die well, as I trust in God to do, I may with his mercy straight depart into Paradise, as did the penitent thief that hung on his other side.”

5 And God give us all the grace so to do all our business in time that we spend not our time in vanities, or worse than vanities, while we be in health, and drive off<sup>548</sup> the things of substance that we should do till we lie in our deathbed, where we shall 10 have so many things to do at once, and everything so unready, that every finger shall be a thumb and we shall fumble it up<sup>549</sup> in haste so unhandsomely<sup>550</sup> that we may hap, but if<sup>551</sup> God help the better, to leave more than half undone.

A Prayer

15 Good Lord, give me the grace so to spend my life that when the day of my death shall come, though I feel pain in my body, I may feel comfort in soul and, with faithful hope of thy mercy, in due love toward 20 thee and charity toward the world, I may through thy grace part hence into thy glory.

The Third Lecture

Then gathered there together the princes of the priests and the ancients<sup>552</sup> into the palace of the prince of the 25 priests, which<sup>553</sup> is called Caiphaz, and took counsel together. And they sought the ways, both the chief priests and the scribes, how they might with some wile<sup>554</sup> take him and put him to death. For they were afeard of the people. They said therefore: “Not on the holy day, lest 30 there arise some seditious ruffle<sup>555</sup> among the people.”

Upon these words, good Christian reader, riseth there occasion to speak of another point that I touched also before: that is to wit, the other cause of Christ’s death, rising upon the malice of the Jews.
35 For in these words is touched (as you see) their malicious assembly in devising and compassing<sup>556</sup> his death. Howbeit, before this council assembled here (which was the day before his Maundy, that is to wit, the Wednesday before his Passion, and the 40 morrow after the afore-remembered<sup>557</sup> warning of his Passion given unto his disciples), there was another council gathered together among them for the selfsame purpose, whereof mention is made in the eleventh chapter of Saint John. For whereas our Savior Christ had oftentimes reprov’d the priests, 45 the scribes, and the Pharisees for their pride and their hypocrisy, their avarice and their evil constitutions<sup>558</sup> (made unto the commodity<sup>559</sup> of themselves in derogation of the law and commandment of God), with which monitions<sup>560</sup> their part had 50 been to have amended their manners<sup>561</sup> and to have given him thanks for his good doctrine, they on the other side took so far the contrary way that for his goodness they so maliciously hated him that, albeit they perceived well by the prophecies fulfilled in his birth and his living and his doctrine — with the manifold marvelous miracles which he continually wrought — that he was Christ, yet so mighty was (I say) their malice that they labored to destroy him.

60 But specially after that he had raised Lazarus from death to life, the thing so well and openly known, and the wonder so far spread and so much in every man’s mouth, and the man well-known once for four days dead and buried, and so many men seeing him alive again, and eating and drinking and talking with him (for which the people fell so thick 65 unto Christ that the priests, the scribes, and the Pharisees were afeard to lose their authority), they waxed so wood<sup>562</sup> therewith that they thereupon devised both to have slain Lazarus and also to destroy Christ. For without his death they thought it in vain to slay Lazarus, since he that raised him once was able to raise him again.

But because they never read of any man in the Scripture before that ever after his death raised
75 again himself (for of raising other they had read), therefore, if they slew Christ too, they thought they should make all the matter safe. Whereupon as Saint John in the eleventh chapter of his Gospel remembereth,<sup>563</sup> “The bishops and the Pharisees gathered together a council and said: ‘What do we? This man doth many miracles, and if we leave him thus, all shall believe in him, and then shall the Romans come and destroy both our town and our people.’”<sup>564</sup> Thus the wily wretches, lo, the mischievous
80 deed that they went about<sup>565</sup> for the maintenance

548 drive off: put off 549 fumble it up: do it clumsily 550 unskillfully 551 but if: unless 552 elders 553 who conduct 562 waxed so wood: became so furious 563 mentions 564 Jn 11:47–48 565 went about: undertook of their own worldly winning<sup>566</sup> and in revenging of their own private malice, that would they color under the pretext of a great zeal unto the common wealth of all the people. And in this saying, they 5 very well wist that they lied. For the Romans nothing rough<sup>567</sup> what or on whom the Jews believed, whose true belief in one God they counted for superstition. And for nothing cared they among the Jews but that the emperor of Rome should be their 10 chief temporal governor and have them his tributaries, and that they should have no king but under him and at his assignment. Now that Christ went about no temporal authority, nor would take upon him as king<sup>568</sup> (albeit indeed he was king), was well

 15 enough known unto them by that he not only fled from being king when the people would have made him king, but also refused to be so much as a judge or an arbitrator in a temporal matter concerning the dividing of a private inheritance between two brethren, saying to the one, “Who hath appointed me
 20 judge or divider between you?”<sup>569</sup>

But yet for all this one of that council, called Caiphias (which was bishop for that year), well allowed<sup>570</sup> their false lying motion and was angry that 25 it went not farther straight unto Christ’s death; and therefore himself sharply, by the authority of his office, reproveth them and said unto them, “You know nothing” — as though he would say, “You be fools, you consider not that it is expedient for you that 30 one man die for the people, and not all the people to perish.” These words, as the evangelist saith, he spoke not of himself, but like as though<sup>571</sup> he were an evil bishop, yet he was a bishop, so, though he meant but to further his malicious purpose, yet God
 35 so framed his words that unware<sup>572</sup> to himself they should be a very true profitable prophecy, signifying that that one man, our Savior Christ, should die for all the people, and not only for that people, but also, as Saint John farther saith, to gather together
 40 in one the children of God that were dispersed abroad. And from that day did they purpose to kill our Savior Christ.<sup>573</sup> For which, for a while, our Savior forbore to walk abroad among the Jews, withdrawing himself into the city of Ephraim, with his 45 disciples, near unto the desert, because the bishops and the Pharisees had given a commandment that if any man might wit<sup>574</sup> where he were, he should show them that they might make him be taken.

But yet for to declare that this withdrawing of Christ was to give his disciples example, according to his own commandment<sup>575</sup> to fly from persecution when they conveniently can — lest in temerarious<sup>576</sup> and foolhardy offering themselves thereto
 55 their bold pride might turn into cowardice and take a foul shameful fall — that their instruction was (I say) the cause of his withdrawing, and not any fear of himself, he declared well on Palm Sunday after, when he letted not openly to ride into the city, with his disciples about him, where, without dread of his
 60 enemies, all the people received him with procession and reverence, where all the people cried out as he went, Hosanna filio David, benedictus qui venit in nomine Domini: Hosanna in altissimis! (“Hosanna to the son of David; blessed is he that is come in the name of our Lord! Hosanna in the high places!”)<sup>577</sup>
 65 Hosanna in Hebrew signifieth, “I beseech thee save me.”

But when the bishops, the priests, and the scribes, and the Pharisees heard and saw this, and that the people came so many with him, and among them so 70 many of those that had seen Lazarus both quick<sup>578</sup> and dead and four days buried too, and after yet now alive again, they thought again upon the killing of Lazarus and our Savior too. And because they
 75 durst<sup>579</sup> at that time not meddle with him for fear of the people, some of the Pharisees would have had him cease that voice of the people himself, and said unto him, “Master, make thy disciples here hold their peace,”<sup>580</sup> as though that cry were but the cry
 80 of his disciples and not the common voice of the people. But our Savior soon answered them far of another fashion and said unto them, “Though these would hold their peace, the very stones shall cry it out.”<sup>581</sup> And this word proved true upon the Good 85 Friday following. For when the bishops, the priests, the scribes, and the Pharisees had made the people leave off crying out of Christ’s praise, and also turned them to the crying out against him to have him crucified, then, after all their cruelty spent out upon his death, the very stones in their manner
 90 cried him out for Christ when, as the Gospel saith, Velum templi scissum est a summo usque deorsum,

Lo, all the world is fallen to him.”<sup>584</sup> And upon this arose this new council taken upon the Wednesday after (whereof our present lecture speaketh), in which there were gathered together against Christ the princes of the priests and the ancients of the people into the palace of Caiphaz, that was (as you have heard) bishop for that year, to devise and study the means to take and destroy our Savior.

Where the Gospel saith “the princes of the priests” ye shall understand that it was ordained in the law that there should be but one prince of the priests — bishop, or chief priest — and he to continue his office during his life. But afterward, by ambition of the priests, usurpation and covetise of the kings, the right order of the making or choosing of the bishop was changed, and they were put in and put out by the kings, sometimes for pleasure, sometimes for displeasure, and sometimes for money too, so that instead of one, now were they waxen<sup>585</sup> many. The ancients of the people were seventy, which, by Moses at the special commandment of God, were (as it appeareth in the eleventh chapter of Numbers) instituted and ordained to be judges over the people, and, in great causes wherein their sentences varied, to refer the matter unto the chief priest and stand to his determination in the matter.<sup>586</sup> This number was still continued in Jerusalem and these were their ordinary judges upon the people, and these were those whom he calleth here the ancients of the people.

Here was, as you see now, a solemn great assembly, but then consider whereabouts: about nothing else but to seek the ways and the means how they might by some wile<sup>587</sup> take and put an innocent unto death. So may we see that every great council is not always a good council, but as two or three be a good council that come together in God’s name to commune<sup>588</sup> and counsel about good, and among them is God (witnessing our Savior<sup>589</sup> where he saith, “Wheresoever are two or three gathered together in my name, there am I too myself in the mids of them”),<sup>590</sup> so when men assemble them together to devise and counsel about mischief and wretchedness, the more that are at it the worse is the council and the less to be regarded, be their personages in the sight of the world never so seemly<sup>591</sup> and their authority never so great as these that here assemble about the death of Christ were the chief heads and rulers of the people, and specially the chief of the spirituality,<sup>592</sup> so that those to whom it specially belonged to provide for an innocent’s surety, they were these, lo, that specially gathered together to compass<sup>593</sup> an innocent’s death. Out of such council God keep every good man. For that holy king and prophet David, speaking of blessedness, putteth in the beginning of all his psalter for a principal blessedness: Beatus vir qui non abit in consilium impiorum (“Blessed is that man that hath not gone into the council of wicked men”),<sup>594</sup> that is to wit, that unto their wicked council hath not been partner nor given his assent. For likewise as God is in the mids<sup>595</sup> of the good council, so in the midst<sup>596</sup> of an evil council is there undoubtedly the devil.

But why went they about<sup>597</sup> so busily to take him by some wily train rather than boldly by force? The Gospel showeth the cause: “For they were afraid of the people.” His living was so holy, his doctrine was so heavenly, his miracles were so many and so marvelous, that — though the priests, the scribes, and the Pharisees that bore the rule deeply desired his death for their malicious anger and envy — yet the people of their own minds so highly did esteem him that, if he had been taken in their company, they would not have failed to fight for him. And therefore agreed this great assembly that they would not take him on the holy day, ne forte tumultus fiat in populo (“lest there should arise some seditious business among the people”).<sup>598</sup> The people they feared, but God they feared not at all. And as the prophet saith, Illic trepidaverunt timore, ubi non fuit timor (“There trembled they for dread, where the dread was not”).<sup>599</sup> For as for the people, they might percase<sup>600</sup> by policy have founden the means to master, but God might they never master. people they found the means on the morrow so to turn against Christ, that as fast<sup>601</sup> as they honored him and lauded him within five days before, and not long afore that would fain<sup>602</sup> have made him king, as fast on the morrow they mocked him and cried out to have him crucified. But God, when all this great council had done their uttermost, the Godhead (I say) of Christ himself (for his Father and himself and their Holy Ghost are all three but one God) raised up his dead body again and, maugre<sup>603</sup> their men whom they set to keep his grave, he rose and went out through the hard stone, and after sent such a vengeance upon them all that from their misused liberty they be fallen ever since in every part of the world into perpetual thralldom.

And on this great assembled council against Christ, that thought themselves so strong and their wily devices so wise that they would, with the provision of that assembled council, utterly destroy the innocent, are also well verified the words of the prophet: Qui habitat in caelis irridebit eos, et Dominus subsanabit eos ("He that dwelleth in heaven shall laugh them to scorn, and our Lord shall make them a mow").<sup>604</sup> For soon after was their council dissolved, and their council house drawn down, and all the city destroyed, and he whom they killed with their council in despite of their council liveth and reigneth in heaven, while the foolish wretched wily counselors (such as die in their sin) lie weeping and wailing, the devil's burning prisoners, in the deep dungeon of hell.

The Prayer

Gracious God, give me thy grace so to consider the punishment of that false great council that gathered together against thee, that I be never to thy displeasure partner, nor give mine assent to follow the sinful device of any wicked council.

The Fourth Lecture

But there entered Satan into Judas, whose surname is Iscariot, one of the twelve. Then went he to the princes of the priests and to the chief priests to betray him to them. And he had communication with the princes of the priests and with the rulers in what manner he should betray him to them. And he said unto them: "What will you give me, and I shall deliver him to you?" And they, when they heard him, were well apaid<sup>605</sup> and promised and covenanted with him to give him money, and appointed to give him thirty groats. And he made them promise, and from that time forth he sought opportunity how that he might at most commodity<sup>607</sup> betray him out of presence<sup>608</sup> of the people.

Upon these words, good Christian people, is there given us the occasion to speak yet of the third cause of Christ's Passion: that is to wit, upon what occasion the false traitor Judas was first moved to fall to this heinous treason. For the perceiving whereof, we must here repeat you one thing that was done a few days before. As it is remembered in the twenty-sixth chapter of Saint Matthew, and in the fourteenth of Saint Mark, and in the twelfth of Saint John, our Savior six days before the feast of Pascha went into Bethany, where he had before raised Lazarus from death to life.<sup>609</sup> There had he supper prepared for him, in the house of Simon, the leper whom Christ had cured. Martha served them, and Lazarus was one of the guests that sat at the supper. Then came there Mary Magdalene, sister unto Lazarus and Martha, and she took a pound-weight of ointment of nard, truly made and very dear,<sup>610</sup> and therewith anointed she Christ's feet, and wiped them with the hairs of her head. And over that she broke the alabaster in which she brought it, and poured all the remnant on his head. And all the house smelled sweet of the savor of that sweet ointment.

Then Judas, which after fell to the treason and betrayed his master, grudged<sup>611</sup> therewith and was wroth therewith and said, "Wherefore was not this ointment sold for three hundred pence and given to poor folk? It might have been sold for a great deal, yea, more than for three hundred pence, and given to poor folk." And thus said the thief, not for anything that he cared for poor folk, but, as the Gospel saith, because he was a thief and bore the purse, into which he would fain<sup>612</sup> have had the price of that ointment so that he might thereof, after his customable<sup>613</sup> manner, have stolen out a part. Our Savior mildly answered for Mary Magdalene and said, "Why reprove you this woman? As for poor men you shall have ever with you, but me shall ye not ever have.” And then opened he the mystery secretly wrought by God in the open work of her good affection, that where she did it to show how glad she was of his presence there, as the manner was that folk at feasts with pleasant sweet odors used to gladden their guests, God wrought therein, as our Savior there declared, the signification of his burying. For the manner then was in that country to anoint the dead corpse with sweet odors, as we dress the winding sheet here with sweet herbs and flowers.

601 earnestly 602 gladly 603 in spite of 604 mow: derisive grimace. Ps 2:4

605 if 606 pleased 607 advantage 608 the company 609 Mt 26:6-15; Mk

14:3-10; Jn 12:1-8 610 costly; expensive 611 complained 612 gladly 613 usual

And then whereas the rude grudging words of Judas were spoken to her reproof, and in manner of her rebuke, our Savior on the other side even there openly showed that for that deed should she forever, with the preaching of that Gospel, be renowned and honored throughout all the world—so pleasant is to God the good affection of the heart declared by the frank outward deed. For him must we serve, though specially with the mind (which if it be not good, vitiateth all together), yet are we bound to serve him also with body and goods and all, for all have we received of him. But Judas, the covetous wretch, when he saw that this ointment was not sold so that he might steal a piece of the price, and then saw our Savior allow her devotion in the deed and disallow his finding of that fault, as mildly as his Master touched him, yet could not the proud beast bear it, but beside his covetise fell unto malice too. And the devil took his time and entered into his heart, and thereunto did put the suggestion of his horrible treason, and made him to devise and determine that the money which he lost by the anointing of his Master he would get it up again by the betraying of his Master. And thereupon came he to this assembly that we speak of now, and unsent-for presented himself unto them to help forward their ungracious council.

And therefore, good reader, here we may well consider that when men are in device about mischief, if they bring their purpose properly to pass, cause have they none to be proud and praise their own wits. For the devil it is himself that bringeth their matters about much more, a great deal, than they. There was once a young man fallen in a lewd mind toward a woman, and she was such as he could conceive none hope to get her, and therefore was falling to a good point in his own mind to let that lewd enterprise pass. He mishapped nevertheless to show his mind to another wretch, which encouraged him to go forward and leave it not. “For begin thou once, man, the matter,” quoth he, “and never fear it; let the devil alone with the remnant; he shall bring it to pass in such wise as thyself alone canst not devise how.” I trow that wretch had learned that counsel of these priests and these ancients, assembled here together against Christ at this council. For here you see that while they were at their wits’ end how to bring their purpose about in the taking of Christ, and were at a point to defer the matter and put it over till some other time, the devil sped them by and by. For he entered into Judas’ heart, and brought him to them to betray him forthwith out of hand.

And therefore at his first coming, he went roundly to the matter and said unto them, “What will ye give me and I shall deliver him to you?” Here shall you see Judas play the jolly merchant, I trow. For he knoweth how fain all this great council would be to have him delivered. He knoweth well also that it will be hard for any man to deliver him but one of his own disciples. He knoweth well also that of all the disciples, there would none be so false a traitor to betray his Master but himself alone. And therefore is this ware, Judas, all in thine own hand. Thou hast a monopoly thereof. And while it is so sought for and so sore desired, and that by so many, and them that are also very rich, thou mayest now make the price of thine own ware thyself, even at thine own pleasure; and therefore ye shall, good readers, see Judas wax now a great rich man with this one bargain. But now the priests and these judges were on the other side covetous too; and as glad as they were of this ware, yet while it was offered them to sell, they thought the merchant was needy, and that to such a needy merchant a little money would be welcome, and money they offered him, but not much. For thirty groats they said they will give, which amounteth not much above ten shillings of our English money. Now would we look that the fool would have set up his ware, namely being such ware as it was, so precious in itself that all the money and plate in the whole world were too little

I wot<sup>635</sup> it well that, of the value of the money that Judas had, all folk are not of one mind, but whereas the text saith triginta argenteos,<sup>636</sup> some men call argenteus a coin of one value and some of another. And some put a difference between argenteus and denarius, and say that denarius is but the tenth part of argenteus. But I suppose that argenteus was the same silver coin which the Romans at that time used stamped in silver, in which they expressed the image of the emperor's visage and the superscription of the emperor's name, and was in Greek called drachma, being in weight about the eighth part of an ounce. For of such coin there are yet many remaining both of Augustus' days and Tiberius' and of Nero's too. So that if the coin were that (for greater silver coin I nowhere find that the emperor coined at that time), then was Judas' reward the value of ten shillings of our English money, after the old usual groats used in the time of King Edward the Third, and long before and long after.

The ointment was of nard of the true making, as the Gospel declareth in this word, nardi pistici.<sup>637</sup> And that ointment truly made was very costly, which was the cause that the true making was less used, and folk for the great cost thereof used another making thereof that was called counterfeit ointment of nard. But this was of the true making, and was (as the Gospel saith) precious, and that so far-forth<sup>638</sup> that Judas valued it at three hundred deniers, which I take for three hundred pieces of the selfsame coin that was called argenteus. For if it were but a coin (as some take it) that were worth but the tenth part of that, then had all the ointment not been much above the value of four groats, which had been no such thing as had been likely that the evangelists would have called precious. And therefore I reckon that ointment to have been esteemed by Judas at a hundred shillings. And now was his reward ten shillings, which is the tenth part of that hundred shillings, as thirty groats is the tenth part of three hundred. And thus hath he by the betraying of his Master's body the tenth part of the value of that ointment whereof he lost his advantage by the anointing of his Master's body.

Now if it be, as some doctors reckon, that he minded to win as much by his treason as he reckoned for his own part lost in that ointment, then seemeth it after this count and reckoning that, of such as came in his keeping, he was after his customable<sup>639</sup> manner wont to steal the tenth. And then was Judas a figure of two false shrews<sup>640</sup> at once: the one the parishen<sup>641</sup> that stealeth his tithe from his curate, to whom his duty were to pay it in God's stead; the other yet the worse thief of them both, the evil curate himself, which, when he receiveth it, misspendeth upon himself such substance thereof as above his own necessary finding<sup>642</sup> God putteth him in trust to bestow upon the poor needy people.

It is a world<sup>643</sup> also to mark and consider how the false wily devil hath, in everything that he doth for his servants, ever more one point of his envious property,<sup>644</sup> that is to wit, to provide (his own purpose obtained) that they shall have of his service for their own part as little commodity as he can, even here in this world. For like as he got here unto<sup>645</sup> Judas no more advantage of his heinous treason (the occasion of his final destruction) but only this poor ten shillings—whereas if his Master Christ had lived, and he still carried his purse, there is no doubt but that he should at sundry times have stolen out for his part far above five times that—so fareth he<sup>646</sup> with all his other servants.

Look for whom he doth most in any kind of filthy fleshly delight, or false wily winning,<sup>647</sup> or wretched worldly worship; let him that attaineth it in his unhappy service make his reckoning in the end of all that feast and count well what is come in and what he hath paid therefore—that is to wit, lay all his pleasures and his displeasures together—and I dare say he shall find in the end that he had been a great winner if he never had had any of them both, so much grief shall he find himself to have felt, far above all his pleasure, even in those days in which his fantasies were in their flowers and prospered, besides the pain and heaviness of heart that now in the end grudgeth<sup>648</sup> and grieveth his conscience, when the time of his pleasure is passed and the fear of hell followeth at hand.

Let us therefore leave the devil's false deceitful service and take nothing at his hand. For he nothing giveth but trifles, nor never giveth half an inch of pleasure without a whole ell<sup>649</sup> of pain. And yet had Judas not the wit to disdain their simple niggardous<sup>650</sup> reward, but continued for it in his treason still, till he had wretchedly done it. And from 5 that time of that reward promised him, with which yet (as it seemeth) they would not trust him till they had the ware in their own hand, he studied and sought the time in which he might peaceably deliver our Lord, when the people were out of the 10 way.

In this, as the great clerk<sup>651</sup> Origen declareth, this Judas was a figure also of many other Judases.<sup>652</sup> For in many places when the people be out of the way and gone aside from the faith, then shall there some 15 false wretch that hath been with Christ many a fair day, and hath been his disciple, and among other true disciples hath faithfully preached the truth, come forth in the devil's name among the people and, for wretched worldly winning to be gotten by 20 their favor, shall falsely betray the truth and cause to be spitefully killed the faithful true doctrine of Christ. But woe may that wretch be by whom the truth is betrayed.

A Prayer

25 O my sweet Savior Christ, whom thine own wicked disciple, entangled with the devil, through vile wretched covetise betrayed, inspire, I beseech thee, the marvel of thy majesty with the love of thy goodness so deep into mine heart that, in respect of the 30 least point of thy pleasure, my mind may set always this whole wretched world at nought.<sup>653</sup>

The Fifth Lecture

Before the feast of the Pascha, Jesus, knowing that his hour came on to go out of this world unto his Father, whereas he had loved those that were his, unto the end he loved them.
35

In these words the holy evangelist Saint John, whom Christ so tenderly loved that on his breast he leaned in his Last Supper, and to him secretly he uttered<sup>654</sup> the false dissimuled<sup>655</sup> traitor, and into whose 40 custody he commended on the cross his own dear

heavy<sup>656</sup> mother, and which is (for the manifold tokens of Christ's special favor) specially called in the Gospel, discipulus ille quem diligebat Iesus ("the disciple that Jesus loved"),<sup>657</sup> declareth here what a manner of faithful lover our holy Savior was, of whom 45 himself was so beloved. For unto those words he putteth and forthwith joineth the rehearsing of his bitter Passion, beginning with his Maundy,<sup>658</sup> and therein his humble washing of his disciples' feet, the 50 sending forth of the traitor, and after that his doctrine, his prayer, his taking, his judging, his scourging, his crucifying, and all the whole piteous tragedy of his most bitter Passion. Before all which things he setteth these fore-rehearsed<sup>659</sup> words to declare
55 that all these things that Christ did, in all this he did it for very love. Which love he well declared unto his disciples by many manner means at the time of his Maundy, giving them in charge<sup>660</sup> that in loving each other they should follow the example of himself. For he, those that he loved, he loved unto the 60 end, and so would he that they should. He was not an unconstant lover that doth, as many do, love for a while and then upon a light occasion<sup>661</sup> leave off and turn from a friend to an enemy, as the false traitor Judas did. But he still so persevereth in love unto 65 the very end, that for very love he came to that painful end; and yet not only for his friends that were already his, but for his enemies, to make them friends of his, and that not for his benefit but only for their own.

And here shall we note that, whereas the Gospel saith in this place and diverse others that Christ should go out of this world unto his Father (as where he said, "Poor men shall ye always have, but me shall you not always have"),<sup>662</sup> it is not meant that he shall be no more with his Church here in the world nor come no more here till the Day of Doom. For himself promised and said, "I am with you all the days even unto the end of the world."<sup>663</sup> He is 75 here in his Godhead; he is here in the Blessed Sacrament of the altar, and sundry times hath here, since his ascension, appeared unto diverse holy men. But those other words, as Saint Jerome saith (and Saint Bede too), are understood<sup>664</sup> that he will not be 80 here in corporal conversation<sup>665</sup> among us, as he was

649 unit of length, roughly equivalent to a yard 650 niggardly; miserly 651 scholar 652 See Origen's commentary on Mt 26:14–16 (PG 13, 1726–27). 653 set at nought: regard as nothing 654 revealed

12:8. See also Mk 14:7. 663 Mt 28:20 664 interpreted as meaning 665 corporal conversation: bodily presence before his Passion among his disciples, with whom he commonly did eat and drink and talk.<sup>666</sup>

Let us here deep consider the love of our Savior Christ, which so loved his unto the end, that for their sakes he willingly suffered that painful end, and therein declared the highest point of love that can be. For as himself saith, Maiozem hac amorem nemo habet, quam ut animam suam ponat quis pro amicis suis (“A greater love no man hath than to give his life for his friends”).<sup>667</sup> This is indeed the greatest love that ever any other man had. But yet had our Savior a greater. For he gave his, and I said before, both for friend and foe.

But what a difference is there now between this faithful love of his and other kinds of false and fickle love used in this wretched world. The flatterer feigneth to love thee, for that he fareth well with thee. But now if adversity so diminish thy substance<sup>668</sup> that he find thy table unladen, farewell, adieu; thy brother flatterer is gone, and getteth him to some other board,<sup>669</sup> and yet shall turn sometimes to thine enemy too and wait<sup>670</sup> thee with a shrewd<sup>671</sup> word.

Who can in adversity be sure of many of his friends when our Savior himself was at his taking left alone and forsaken of his? When thou shalt go hence, who will go with thee? If thou were a king, will not all thy realm send thee forth alone and forget thee? Shall not thine own flesh let thee walk away, naked seely<sup>672</sup> soul, thou little wottest<sup>673</sup> whither? Howbeit, if thou die in the devil’s danger, some fleshly lover of thine may soon after hap to follow thee, some such as in lecherous love hath borne thee filthy company. But if<sup>674</sup> such a lover of thine happen there to come to thee, there will there be no love touches between you, but cursing and banning<sup>675</sup> shall you lie together wretchedly burning forever, where each of you shall be a hot faggot of fire to your filthy fellow.

Let us every man, therefore, in time learn to love, as we should, God above all things and all other things for him. And whatsoever love be not referred to that end, that is to wit, to the pleasure of God, it is a very vain and an unfruitful love. And whatsoever love we bear to any creature whereby we love

God the less, that love is a loathsome love and hindereth us from heaven. Love no child of thine own so tenderly but that<sup>676</sup> thou couldest be content so to sacrifice it to God as Abraham was ready with Isaac,<sup>677</sup> if it so were that God would so command thee. And since God will not so do, offer thy child otherwise to God’s service. For whatsoever thing we love whereby we break God’s commandment, that love we better than God—and that is a love deadly and damnable. Now, since our Lord hath so loved us for our salvation, let us diligently call for his grace that against<sup>678</sup> his great love we be not found unkind.<sup>679</sup>

A Prayer

O my sweet Savior Christ, which, of thine undeserved love toward mankind so kindly wouldest suffer the painful death of the cross, suffer not me to be cold nor lukewarm in love again toward thee.

THE SECOND CHAPTER

Of the sending of Saint Peter and Saint John, the first day of the Unleavened Loaves, specified in the twenty-sixth of Saint Matthew, the fourteenth of Saint Mark, the twenty-second of Saint Luke, and the thirteenth of Saint John<sup>680</sup>

The first day of the Unleavened Loaves, when the Paschal lamb was offered, in which the Paschal lamb must needs be killed, there came the disciples to Jesus and say to him, “Whither wilt thou that we go and make ready for thee, that thou mayest eat the Paschal lamb?” And he sendeth of his disciples Peter and John, saying, “Go you and make ready for us the Paschal lamb that we may eat it.” But they said, “Where wilt thou that we shall make it ready?” And he said unto them, “Go you into the city to a certain man. Lo, as you shall be entering into the city, there shall meet you a man bearing a pot of water; follow you him into the house into which he entereth. And ye shall say to the good-man<sup>681</sup> of the house, “The Master saith to thee, “My time is near, with thee I make my Paschal.<sup>682</sup> Where is my refectory,<sup>683</sup> where is my place where I may eat

And when the hour was come, he set down at the table, and the twelve apostles with him.

The Homily or Lecture upon the Second Chapter

I have before, good Christian readers, showed you in the exposition of the first chapter the ordinance<sup>685</sup> and institution of the Feast of the Paschal Lamb and of the Feast of the Unleavened Bread, and how the offering of that lamb was a figure of the offering up of Christ, the very unspotted lamb, that should be offered up to cleanse and wash away the spots of our sin with the innocent blood of himself that had no spot of sin of his own. The Paschal lamb was commanded to be sacrificed and eaten after the equinoctial in vere,<sup>686</sup> the fourteenth day of the month. And on the morrow, and so forth seven days after (that is to wit, beginning the fifteenth day), was the Feast of the Unleavened Bread, during which space they were commanded that they should have no leaven in their house.

Ye must understand also that though the first day of the Feast of the Unleavened Loaves was the fifteenth day, yet likewise as we begin every feast from the noon before, so did the Jews begin that first day of the Feast of the Unleavened Loaves in the evening before, when they might see the moon and the stars appear in the element.<sup>687</sup> And so, though the eating of the Paschal lamb was the fourteenth day of the month, and the first day of the Feast of the Unleavened Loaves was on the fifteenth day, yet by reason that the same first day of the feast began at the evening before (that is to wit, in the evening of the fourteenth day, in which evening the Paschal lamb was to be sacrificed and eaten), these two feasts were, as you see, coincident together. For the one fell in the beginning of the other. And for this cause were each of them called by the both names, that is to wit, by the name of “the Feast of the Paschal” and also by the name of “the Feast of the Unleavened Bread.” For since the Feast of the Paschal Lamb was the chief feast and was also the beginning of the other, all the Feast of the Unleavened Loaves was called the “Paschal.” And again because the first day of the Feast of the Unleavened Loaves, though it were the fifteenth day of the month, yet, since it began (I say) in the evening of the fourteenth day (at such time as the Paschal lamb was sacrificed and eaten), the Feast of the Paschal Lamb was also called the “Feast of the Unleavened Bread” and “the first day of the Feast of the Unleavened Bread.”

And for this cause do both Saint Matthew and Saint Mark call the Sheer Thursday<sup>688</sup> in which Christ made his Maundy<sup>689</sup> the first day of the Unleavened Loaves, saying: “The first day of the Unleavened Loaves, in which the Paschal lamb must be killed and sacrificed, the disciples came to Jesus and asked him, ‘Whither wilt thou that we shall go to make ready the Paschal lamb?’”<sup>690</sup> And, as I said, the Jews called also the Feast of the Unleavened Bread the “Feast of Paschal.” And specially they called and hallowed by that name of “Paschal” the first day of the Unleavened Bread, which was the morrow after the eating of the Paschal lamb.

And after that manner of their naming that day the “Feast of Paschal,” Saint John in the thirteenth chapter of his Gospel: Ante diem festum Paschae, sciens Iesus quia venit hora eius ut transeat ex hoc mundo ad patrem, etc. (“Before the holy day of Paschal, Jesus, knowing that his time was come that he should go out of this world unto his Father, and so forth”).<sup>691</sup> Here, lo, Saint John calleth Sheer Thursday, in the evening of which day the Paschal lamb was eaten, he calleth it (I say) by the name of “the day before that feastful<sup>692</sup> day of the Paschal,” because the Jews did celebrate the morrow (after the Paschal eaten)<sup>693</sup> very solemnly, and called (as I have told you) that feast the Feast of the Paschal. And therefore Saint John here saying Ante diem festum Paschae, and calling Sheer Thursday “the day before the feastful day of Paschal” (because the Jews so used to call the first day of the Unleavened Bread that began in the evening before, in which the Paschal lamb was killed), used such a manner of

as Matthew and Mark. 691 Jn 13:1 692 festal 693 was eaten

speaking as we might call “Christmas Even” the day before the feastful day of Christmas.

I would not, good readers, stick so long upon the declaration of this point (as a thing wherein some shall peradventure<sup>694</sup> take little savor),<sup>695</sup> saving that I thought it not a time all lost to let you know that, upon<sup>696</sup> the Scripture in this point mistaken,<sup>697</sup> the Church of Greece fell from the Church of the Latins in a point or twain. For upon their own wrong construing this place of Saint John, they say that Christ did anticipate the time of eating his Paschal lamb with his apostles, and (where the very day was the fourteenth day after their vernal equinoctial<sup>698</sup> in the evening) he did it, say they, the day before.<sup>699</sup>

And you shall understand that this is the cause for which they consecrate the body of Christ in leavened bread, contrary to the Latin Church, which consecrateth in unleavened bread. For they say (and truth it is) that the Feast of the Unleavened Loaves began the fifteenth day. And then (say they) he consecrated his blessed body at his Maundy on the thirteenth day (that was, say they, Sheer Thursday), and therefore he consecrated then with leavened bread. Now to this we have showed you that the first day of that Feast of Unleavened Bread began the feast in the evening before, that is to wit,<sup>700</sup> on Sheer Thursday at night, and that Christ made then his Maundy in the very time that was by the law appointed to the eating the Paschal lamb. And since he intended to fulfill the law, so was it most convenient that he should and most likely that he would—and so of truth he did, as the three evangelists, Saint Matthew, Saint Mark, and Saint Luke, plainly do declare. For they three agree together that it was in the first day of the Unleavened Bread and in which day the Paschal lamb must be killed. And so it appeareth by them that, though the first day of that feast was the fifteenth day, yet the feast of that fifteenth day began in the evening before in which the Paschal lamb was eaten, and eaten (as it appeareth plainly) with unleavened bread.

And verily methinketh that if it so had been (as it was not) that Christ had made his Maundy a day before the time, yet would not that sufficiently serve for the proof of their purpose<sup>701</sup> that he consecrated in leavened bread. For though it be a good proof that, since he consecrated in the Feast of the Unleavened Loaves, he consecrated not in leavened bread (because the law forbade them to have any leaven in the house), yet if he had consecrated five days before that feast began, it would not prove that he consecrated in leavened bread. For they might then and at all times have unleavened bread, since that was at no time forbidden.

But surely the Church of Greece was far overseen<sup>702</sup> in this point and diverse others, in which they partly acknowledged their errors after and were reformed in general councils,<sup>703</sup> and yet returned of frowardness<sup>704</sup> to their errors again, and in conclusion we see whereto they be comen.<sup>705</sup>

But ye shall understand that, when I speak of the Church of Greece in this error, I speak but of the posteriors.<sup>706</sup> For the old holy doctors of the Greeks were of the contrary mind, as appeareth in this point by the plain words of Saint Eusebius and Saint Chrysostom both.<sup>707</sup> And that you may the more plainly perceive what peril it was unto them to fall to an opinion contrary to the Church by construing the Scripture after<sup>708</sup> a few folks’ fantasies, those Greeks that began this opinion were fain<sup>709</sup> in conclusion for the defense of their error to say that Saint Matthew, Saint Mark, and Saint Luke wrote in that point wrong all three, and that therefore Saint John wrote otherwise and corrected them—which untrue saying of theirs is so far out of all frame<sup>710</sup> that it is among Christian men more than shame to say it, that any of the four evangelists should in the story write anything false, for then which of them might we trust, since we can be no more sure of the one than of the other. But now let us proceed forth in the letter.<sup>711</sup>

“When his disciples had asked him where his pleasure was that they should make ready the Paschal for him, he sent two of his apostles, that is to wit, Peter and John, and said unto them: ‘Go you and prepare the Paschal lamb for us that we may eat it.’”

Our Savior, which said of himself, Non veni solvere legem sed adimplere ("I am not come to break the law but to fulfill it"),<sup>712</sup> likewise as he would be circumcised first before he changed that sacrament into the more perfect sacrament of baptism, so, for the fulfilling of the Old Law, before he would offer up his own blessed body, the very unspotted lamb, upon the cross, and before also that he would institute the eating of his own blessed body in form of bread and wine in the Blessed Sacrament of the altar, he would first fulfill the precept of the law by the eating of the Paschal lamb in time and manner appointed by the law, and so fulfill and finish the figure, and institute in the stead thereof the sacrament of highest perfection, the Blessed Sacrament of the altar, and offer up for the spots of our sin his own unspotted body as the most sweet sacrifice unto the Father upon the altar of the cross.

It followeth: "Then they said unto him, 'Where wilt thou that we shall make it ready?' And he said unto them: 'Go you into the city to a certain man. Lo, as you be entering into the city, there shall a man meet you bearing a pot of water; follow you him into the house into which he entereth, and you shall say to the goodman<sup>713</sup> of the house: 'The Master saith to thee, 'My time is near, with thee I make my Paschal. Where is my place where I may with my disciples eat the Paschal?'" And he shall show you a great supping place on high paved,<sup>714</sup> and there do you make it ready."

In these words it appeareth well that our Lord, when he sent Saint Peter and Saint John unto the house where they should prepare his Maundy, he would neither name them the dweller of the house nor tell them any known token of the house, of which thing diverse of the old doctors conject<sup>715</sup> and tell diverse causes. Some say he sent them to a man not named in token that God will come not only to men that are in the world famous and of great name but also to folk of none estimation in the count of the world nor of no name. Some others say (and both twain may well be true) that forasmuch as our Savior (to whom nothing was unknown) knew the promise of the false traitor Judas made unto the Jews upon the day before to betray him, and that he went about ever after that to seek a time fit therefore where he might betray him to them out of sight of the people, if he should have named the man or the place, the traitor might have caused him and his disciples to be taken before his Maundy made and his holy body consecrated in the Blessed Sacrament. And therefore, albeit that<sup>716</sup> if the traitor had come and all the whole town with him, our Savior could have kept them all off with one word of his mouth or with one thought of his holy heart, yet this way liked his high wisdom as the most meet and convenient by which he would keep the traitor from the accomplishment of his traitorous purpose till the time should come in which himself had determined to suffer it. And therefore our Savior used<sup>717</sup> himself in this point wonderfully. For albeit that the two disciples whom he sent were of all his apostles the most special chosen and most in trust and favor with him, Saint Peter, which (as it appeareth in Scripture and as the doctors say) specially loved him, and Saint John, which (as the Scripture saith and the doctors thereon) specially was beloved of him, yet would he not take them aside and tell them the name of the man, lest he might thereby have given occasion of envy or suspicion to Judas, or peradventure grief to the remnant, if Christ should have seemed to trust them with that errand secretly with which he would trust none of them; he gave them therefore their errand in so strange a fashion that neither themselves nor any of the other ten could wit<sup>718</sup> what to think therein. For he answered them as though he would say, "Where you shall prepare I will not tell you, nor who shall bring you thither I will not show you, but to let you see what I can do when me list,<sup>719</sup> such a token shall I tell you to bring you thither as neither no man knoweth nor no man can know but myself that am able at the time to make it so."

Then it followeth: "And his disciples went forth and came into the city, and they found as Jesus had said unto them and prepared there the Paschal."

Here had his apostles and by them we too a proof of his glorious Godhead, secretly covered and unseen under the cloak of his seeming feeble man-head. And that not in this thing alone, but in this among many more, some of other kind of miracle, and some also like unto this. For as he did here show his disciples where they should meet the man with the water pot and then what he would have them do further, and that his bidding should surely be fulfilled and obeyed, so did he on the Palm Sunday before, when he sent his disciples and told them where they should find the ass and the colt tied, and bade them take them boldly without any leave of the owner, and, whosoever would say aught<sup>720</sup> unto them therefor,<sup>721</sup> they should say that their Master must occupy<sup>722</sup> them. A much like manner of message he gave his two apostles now, telling them where they should meet with a strange man and so forth what they should do further.

Now who but God could surely send men on such manner messages in which they should be sure to find such things as are unto all creatures unsure and uncertain, as things accounted to fall under chance and hap?<sup>723</sup> And therefore, while they found everything come to pass as he had before told them, they might (and we may) surely know him for God. For who could tell that the man with his pot of water walking on his errand and the two apostles going forth on theirs, neither party looking for other, should so begin to set forth and in such wise hold on their way that they should, at a place which neither of the both parties appointed, so justly<sup>724</sup> meet together? This could none do but he that not only beheld both parties at once but was able also to put in both their minds to set forth in time such as should serve therefore, and to moderate and measure their paces himself in such wise as themselves wist<sup>725</sup> not why, and by his sure providence (seeming to themselves hap, fortune, or chance) suddenly to meet together. This thing can there of himself none other do but he that hath the acts and the deeds of all creatures in his own hand, that of two sparrows being both not worth a halfpenny, not so much as the one falleth, as our Savior saith, upon the ground without him.<sup>726</sup>

Then it followeth further: "When the evening was come, Christ came with his twelve. And when the hour was come, he sat him down at the table and his twelve apostles with him."

Notwithstanding that the bishops and the Pharisees had before given commandment (as appeareth in the eleventh chapter of the Gospel of Saint John) that if any man wist where Christ were, he should give them knowledge that they might take him,<sup>727</sup> and notwithstanding also that his own disciple Judas had promised them to do that traitorous deed himself, yet our Savior, since his time came on in which he was determined willingly to die, letted<sup>728</sup> not to come into the city and came also not alone but with his twelve apostles waiting upon him, whereby his coming was well likely to be noted. But he wist well enough what would befall, and that upon any marking of that coming he should not be taken. For he would not so be taken, nor would not so prevent<sup>729</sup> his traitor of his purpose, nor so disturb him of his promise, nor so make him lose his reward, but, benignly suffering him and taking patience with him, and yet offering him grace and kindness to win him, brought him to the Maundy with him. And therefore saith Saint Mark, "He came and his twelve with him."<sup>730</sup> Whereby it should seem that Saint Peter and Saint John, after their errand done, resorted unto Christ again and made him report of their speed,<sup>731</sup> and so came in company with the other ten unto the Maundy with him.

Judas the traitor, in such places as the evangelists make mention of his going to the council and assembly of the priests to offer them his service in the treason, both<sup>732</sup> Saint Matthew, Saint Mark, and Saint Luke make specially mention that he was one of the twelve.<sup>733</sup> And here we see therefore by the evangelists not only mention that he came with our Lord but also that he sat at the supper with our Lord, and so for all the treason that the traitor wrought, yet was the traitor Christ's apostle still. And this point the evangelists again and again rehearse, not only to the shame of his traitorous falsehood, in betraying such a Master with whom he was so taken forth<sup>734</sup> to be so near about him, one of that few chosen number and so specially put in trust, but also that we should note well and mark thereby that the vice of a vicious person vitiateth not the company or congregation. For Christ with his twelve apostles were a holy company as a company, though one companion of the company was a very false traitorous wretch. And for all his falsehood, both before that in theft and then in treason too, Christ abode still with him among his other apostles, and his ungraciousness letted<sup>735</sup> not but that of that company (as evil as he was) yet one he was. Nor now likewise the vices of vicious folk in Christ's Church cannot let but that his Catholic Church, of which they be part, is, for all their unholiness, his holy Catholic Church, with which he hath promised to be unto the end of the world.

Upon this chapter among many things that men may take occasion to note, I note specially twain: one, the example that our Savior here giveth us to be diligent and studious in the keeping of his New Law (which he hath ordained to endure in this world as long as the world shall last), while himself was so diligent in the observing of the Old Law (which, given unto Moses, himself came to change into so far the better and to deliver us from the sore yoke thereof). But surely I fear me sore<sup>736</sup> that with a great part of Christian people the law of Christ is worse kept a great deal than was with the Jews the law of Moses at the coming of Christ, when it was kept worst. As for the sovereign points of patience and charity and contempt of the world, wherein our Savior saith in the sixth chapter of Saint Matthew that he would have his new Church far pass and excel the old synagogue,<sup>737</sup> be so far, I fear me, let slip and forgotten that even in the very plain precepts we be more negligent than they. The Jews were in the keeping of the spirit of the law so negligent that God therefore, by the mouths of his prophets David and Isaiah, showed himself to reject and set at nought<sup>738</sup> their outward ceremonies, sacrifices, and observances of their law, wherein he confessed them diligent, and said that with so little as they used of the other, he had of them so much that he was full thereof fastidious<sup>739</sup> and weary. Not that those things misliked<sup>740</sup> him, either done of their private devotion or for the fulfilling of the law, but for that they rested and satisfied their hearts in them, and both left the better things undone and also did much evil too, trusting that those outward works of their ceremonies and sacrifices should recompense it, and afore God bear it out.<sup>741</sup> Which erroneous mind of theirs our Lord by the prophets reproveth, declaring that on their fasting days they would, while they fasted from meat, not fast from sin but strive and chide and fight and sharply sue their debtors. He bade them amend those faults and be charitable and forgive and give, and then would he better allow their bare offering and sacrifice by word than now, with these fashions used,<sup>742</sup> he would their sacrifice in offering up of their beasts unto their no little cost. This tale that I tell you doth well appear upon the forty-ninth psalm of David and upon the fifty-eighth chapter of Isaiah, whose words to rehearse here were very long.

But now me think that we Christian folk wax<sup>743</sup> in worse case. For in the deeds of charity we walk, I fear me, nothing afore them. And in those evil things we be nothing behind them. And yet in the outward ceremonies also, I ween<sup>744</sup> we be nothing matches with them. For surely they did much more cost<sup>745</sup> and used more devotion than we do. Of the cost there can no man deny but that their offerings and their sacrifices were besides their tithes far more chargeable<sup>746</sup> and costly to them than the rites and ceremonies of Christendom are unto the Christian people. Of their diligence and devotion therein, we may well perceive, both by the places that I have spoken of (in which our Lord rejecteth their diligence therein because of their negligence of charity and their froward malicious manners<sup>747</sup> besides) and also by many other places in the Old Law where the commendable devotion of their costly ceremonies and sacrifices appear. Their fastings were also very painful and precise,<sup>748</sup> and ours negligent, slack and remiss, and now almost worn away. Their Sabbath days and their feasts kept they very solemn. How slackly we keep ours in many places, and in what manner fashion, I cannot for sorrow and very shame rehearse. As for their faith, from those that among them held on the truth, the Jews were fallen into sects one or twain. But now if we should count and reckon the sundry sects which from the true faith are fallen about in diverse parts of Almayne,<sup>749</sup> I fear me we should find almost as many score. I can no more but pray God therefore that we may have the grace to follow the example of our Savior and observe his New Law, which we be bounden to keep, as he observed the Old Law, which, though he came to change it, yet he would first fulfill it, for all that<sup>750</sup> he was not bound to keep it.

The other thing that I note in this chapter is that

736 I... sore: I am greatly afraid 737 Mt 6:2-6 738 set at nought: regard as nothing 739 disgusted 740 were displeasing to 741 bear it out: make it supportable

742 with... used: with the practice of these customs 743 grow 744 think 745 did... cost: expended much more money 746 expensive 747 froward

malicious manners: perverse moral conduct 748 strict 749 Germany 750 for... that: even though it appeareth thereupon, as Theophilactus and Saint Bede say and Saint Chrysostom also,<sup>751</sup> that Christ had none house of his own, nor none of his apostles neither, as himself said of himself in the ninth chapter of Saint Luke: Filius hominis non habet ubi caput suum reclinet (“The Son of Man hath not where to lay his head”).<sup>752</sup> And therefore his apostles asked him in what house he would eat his Paschal. And our Savior again, to let them see that whoso for God’s sake is content to lack a house shall not be disappointed when they should need it, sent them to another man’s house, they neither wist whose nor where, and yet were they there welcome and well-received.

In this we may take example also, that those that will be the disciples of Christ and followers of his apostles should not long to be great possessors<sup>753</sup> and build up great palaces in this wretched wilderness of the world, wherein, to show that we have, as Saint Paul saith, “no dwelling city,”<sup>754</sup> our Savior and his apostles would have no dwelling house. One of the most special things to move us to the contempt of this world and to regard much the world to come is to consider that in that world we shall be forever at home and that in this world we be but wayfaring folk. And verily though it be (as indeed it is) easy enough for any man to say the word that he is here but a pilgrim, yet is it hard for many a man to let it fall feelingly and sink down deep into his heart, which (against<sup>755</sup> that word slightly<sup>756</sup> spoken once in a year) useth to rejoice and boast many times in a day, by the space peradventure of many years together, what goodly places in this world he hath of his own, in every of which continually he calleth himself at home. And that such folk reckon themselves not for pilgrims here, they feel full well at such time as our Lord calleth them hence. For then find they themselves much more loath to part from this world than pilgrims to go from their inn.

The Prayer

Almighty Jesus Christ, which wouldest for our example observe the law that thou camest to change, and being maker of the whole earth wouldest have yet no dwelling house therein, give us thy grace so to keep thine holy law and so to reckon ourselves for no dwellers but for pilgrims upon earth, that we may long and make haste, walking with faith in the way of virtuous works, to come to the glorious country wherein thou hast bought us inheritance forever with thine own precious blood.

THE THIRD CHAPTER

Of the washing of the feet, specified<sup>757</sup> in the thirteen chapter of the Gospel of Saint John

And when supper was done, when the devil had put into the heart of Judas, the son of Simon of Iscariot, to betray him, Jesus, knowing that his Father had given him all things into his hands, and that he was come from God and goeth to God, ariseth from supper and putteth off his clothes and took a linen cloth and did gird it about him. Then he did put water into a basin and began to wash the feet of his disciples and wipe them with the linen cloth that he was gird withal.<sup>758</sup> Then cometh he to Simon Peter, and Peter saith unto him, “Lord, washest thou my feet?” Jesus answered and said unto him, “What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know after.” Peter saith unto him, “Thou shalt never wash my feet.” Jesus answered unto him, “If I wash thee not, thou shalt have no part with<sup>759</sup> me.” Simon Peter said unto him, “Lord, not only my feet, but my hands and my head too.” Jesus saith unto him, “He that is washed needeth no more but that he wash his feet, but is all clean. And you be clean, but not all.” For he knew who he was should betray him. Therefore he said, “You be not clean all.” Then, after that he had washed their feet, he took his clothes again. And when he was set down again at the table, he said unto them, “Wot<sup>760</sup> ye what I have done to you? You call me master and lord. And you say well, for so I am. Therefore if I have washed your feet, being your lord and your master, you owe<sup>761</sup> also one to wash another’s feet. For I have given you an example that, likewise as I have done to you, so should you do too. Verily, verily, I say to you, the bondman is not more than his lord, nor an apostle greater than he that hath sent him. If you know these things, blessed shall you be if you do these things.”

The Exposition

The holy evangelist Saint John, in the beginning of the thirteenth chapter, beginning to speak of the Last Supper of our Lord, showeth that our Savior, Cum dilexisset suos qui erant in mundo, in finem dilexit eos (“Whereas he loved those that were his which were in the world, he loved them into the end”),<sup>762</sup> that is to wit,<sup>763</sup> as some doctors say, “He loved them to the uttermost.” For well ye wot the end of everything is the uttermost. And Christ loved his to the very uttermost, that is to wit, unto that extreme point of love beyond which no man could go. For he said himself, Maiorem amorem nemo habet, quam ut animam suam ponat quis pro amicis suis (“Greater love can there no man have, than that a man give his life for his friends”).<sup>764</sup> This kind of extreme kindness had Christ, not to his friends only, but to his enemies too. For he gave his own life for both twain. And therefore those that he loved he loved unto the end, that is to wit, unto the very uttermost.

Some doctors expound those words, “He loved them to the end,” that is to wit, not for a while and then cast them off, as many folk love in this world, but “He loved them to the end” so that when he should part out of this world (by a death so painful that the thinking thereof would make a man forget all his friends for heaviness, dread, and fear), he, the nearer he drew toward that painful terrible death, the more he remembered his twelve apostles whom he had specially loved in the world, and the more tenderly took he thought for them when he was parting out of this world. And for to show that as himself said, Qui ad me venit non eiiciam foras (“He that cometh to me, I will not cast him out”),<sup>765</sup> our Savior would not cast out Judas the traitor till he cast out himself, but, for all his traitorous purpose, tenderly went about to mend<sup>766</sup> him and brought him to the supper with him.

Some expound also those words, “He loved them into the end,” to signify that the love that he bore them was not such a kind of love as worldly minded folk use to bear each to other — that is to wit, either for their own commodity to take pleasure by them, while that in this passage toward the end (that is to wit, the world to come) they be by the way walking with them, or else to do them some such kind of commodity as may serve them and stand them in some stead for their use in the way. But our Savior, those that he loved in the world, he loved not into the way (that is to wit, not only unto their worldly commodities that are transitory and shall pass from them, which they shall leave behind them in the way) but he loved them into the end, that is to wit, toward the bringing of them to the end that he by his precious blood bought<sup>767</sup> them to.

And thus you see how all these expositions of the old holy doctors are very meet<sup>768</sup> for the matter, which Saint John here beginneth to treat, which in this thirteenth chapter beginneth to enter toward the treating of Christ’s Passion, by which our Lord declared well that he loved unto the end, that is to wit, as I told you, to the uttermost. And first he beginneth therein to treat of his Last Supper, wherein he declared by many things, as shall after appear, that he loved his apostles to the end, that is to wit, that the nearer he drew to his death the more tenderly he remembered them. He declared also at that supper that he loved them into the end, that is to wit, into the world to come to the bliss of heaven, the end that he by his death prepared for them. This he declared specially at the Last Supper, both by the institution of the Blessed Sacrament and by the godly doctrine that he taught them to conduit<sup>769</sup> them thitherward, of which the very entry and open gate our Savior showed them in these words of the Gospel that I have here before rehearsed you, as you shall well perceive by the perusing of the letter, which in this wise beginneth: “When the supper was done, when the devil had put into the heart of Judas, the son of Simon of Scariot, to betray him,” etc.

In these words, “when the supper was done,” it is not to be taken that it was all done. For (as you see here) our Lord and all his apostles, after their feet washed, sat down at the table again. But you shall understand that the supper of the Paschal lamb was done. For that was then eaten before that our Lord rose from the table to go about the washing of the apostles’ feet.

“Whereas the devil had put into the heart of Judas, the son of Simon of Scariot, to betray him.” By this, that the devil did put that treason in his heart, is meant the secret suggestion of the devil by which he stirred the traitor Judas thereunto. By which we be learned<sup>770</sup> to know and consider that, when an ungracious<sup>771</sup> purpose falleth in our mind, we may well think that the devil is then even busy about<sup>772</sup> us, and not (as it is commonly said) at our elbow, but even at our very heart. For into the fleshly body can the devil enter and cast imagination<sup>773</sup> in our mind and offer us outward occasions also to illect,<sup>774</sup> stir, and draw us to his purpose.

Judas was called not Scariot, but Iscariot, that is to wit, Iscariotes, “of a place named Iscariot.”

“Jesus, knowing that the Father had given him all things into his hands, and that he was come out from God and goeth to God, riseth from the supper, and putteth off his garments, and took a linen cloth and gird<sup>775</sup> it about him, and then put water into the basin, and began to wash the feet of his disciples, and wipe them with the linen cloth with which he was gird.”

We need (I trust) to put no man in remembrance that our Savior Christ was as verily God as man. And therefore where the Evangelist saith that he came out from his Father and goeth again to his Father, it is not meant that his Godhead was at any time departed from the Father; but by his going from the Father was nothing meant but his being incarnate in the world, and his going again to the Father, the taking up of his manhead into heaven with him. For by his coming into the earth he left not heaven but ever was, and ever is, and ever shall be, with his Father and their Holy Spirit both in heaven and in earth, and everywhere else at once. Nor by that he saith his Father had given him all things into his hands is not meant that God the Father giveth anything unto the equal God the Son. But like as he hath been eternally begotten of him, so hath he had eternally equal dominion of all things with him. I mean not only as much dominion, but also the selfsame dominion, in like manner<sup>776</sup> as he is equal God with his Father and the Holy Ghost not by being another God as great but by being, albeit another distinct person, yet the selfsame God that they be.

And therefore the Father hath nothing in time given the Son but eternally before all time gave him all (if a man may call it giving) by his only begetting.<sup>777</sup> Howbeit, Christ as man might receive of God’s gift in time, as he was created in time. And therefore is there in these words expressed Christ’s marvelous excellent humility, as though the Evangelist had in more words declared it in this manner: our Savior Christ, whereas Judas had by the suggestion of the devil made promise to betray him and continually persevered in that traitorous purpose, notwithstanding that he was very God and descended from heaven to be incarnate and should ascend thither again in the glorious body and soul of his blessed manhood, and that his Godhead had ever had of his Father by his eternal generation, and<sup>778</sup> to his manhood, by the unity of person with his Godhead, belonged also of all-thing the whole dominion, so that with the traitor and all those to whom he should be betrayed he was able to do what him list,<sup>779</sup> yet would he, not only to his other apostles but also to that very traitor too (whereby he should give his high stubborn heart occasion to relent and repent and amend if it would be), so far humble himself that, being their Master, their Lord, and their God, he would vouchsafe to do them lowly service in the washing, not of their heads or their hands, but even of their very feet, and wipe them too his<sup>780</sup> own hands. And therefore he would have nobody help him therein, nor do a piece himself for a countenance<sup>781</sup> and let another do the remnant, but he would put off his overgarments himself, put the water into the basin himself, wash all their feet himself, and wipe their feet all himself.

Then followeth it in the letter: “He came then unto Simon Peter, and Peter saith unto him, ‘Lord, washest thou my feet?’” Saint Peter, having our Savior in such estimation and honor, as it well became him to have, thought it in his mind unmeetly<sup>782</sup> that his Lord and Master should wash his feet. And therefore he said unto him, “Lord, washest thou my feet?” To whom our Savior said, “That that I do thou knowest not now. But thou shalt know afterward.” As though he would say, “Though thou think it not convenient because thou canst not see for what cause I do it, yet I (all whose deeds are of such perfection that I do nothing for nought) know a great cause necessary and convenient<sup>783</sup> for which I do it, which thou canst not conject.<sup>784</sup> But when we have done, thou shalt know it, and therefore suffer<sup>785</sup> me first to do it.”

But Saint Peter had so deep imprinted in his breast the marvelous high majesty of the person of Christ, being the very Son of God, and with his almighty Father and his Holy Ghost equal and one
 5 God, and therefore infinitely more in dignity above him than the heaven is in distance above the earth, could not, for all that word of our Savior, find in his heart to suffer him do such simple humble service unto him. And therefore with plain refusing thereof he withdrew his feet and answered our Savior
 10 in this wise: “Thou shall never wash my feet in this world.” Our Lord, then — as he sometimes did in other things touch<sup>786</sup> and temper the zeal of Peter, through fervor and heat somewhat indiscreet,<sup>787</sup> so 15 to show him here that there could no virtue stand in stead<sup>788</sup> without a humble obedience, but that it would work unto damnation (seemed the thing never so good) if it were joined with disobedience against the will of God — spoke sharply to him and 20 said, “But if<sup>789</sup> I wash thee, thou shalt have no part with<sup>790</sup> me.” When Saint Peter heard that word, he cast off his indiscreet courtesy and turned it unto perfect obedience, submitting himself whole unto the will of Christ, and said: “Lord, not only my feet, 25 but also my hands and my head too.” As though he would say: “Though I would for mine unworthiness be loath to have thy most excellent person do such simple service unto me, yet since I see that for cause unknown unto me, of which it becometh me not 30 to ask thee a reckoning, thou hast so determined to wash mine unworthy feet, that if I therein obey not thine high pleasure I shall by disobedience fall in thy displeasure and be departed<sup>791</sup> from thee and lose my part of thy glory, I rather will be content to suffer thee not only, Lord, to wash my feet, but over that mine hands and mine head too.”

“Jesus answered and said unto him, ‘He that is washed needeth not to wash but his feet, but is all clean.’” Forasmuch as Saint Peter offered himself to 40 suffer to be of Christ’s holy hands washed, not his feet only that are the lowest part but his hands also that are about the mids<sup>792</sup> and his head too which is the highest part, by which three he signified himself content that Christ should wash all his whole body, 45 Christ answered him that that thing were more than needed. For he that is washed once already by baptism is so clean washed altogether from all sin, both actual and original, that he never needeth to be all washed again, nor never shall be all washed again 50 by baptism. For baptized shall no man be but once; the character and spiritual token by baptism imprinted in the soul is indelible and never can be put out. But in them that, for their unfaithfulness or for their evil living after their baptism, shall finally be

 55 damned, that token shall in their soul perpetually remain to their harm and shame, by which it shall evermore appear that they be neither paynims, Jews, nor Saracens, but (which worst is of all) false and unkind<sup>793</sup> Christian men. But there is none washed 60 so clean by baptism but that (if he live) he shall have need to have his feet washed often. For by his feet are meant his affections.<sup>794</sup> For likewise as our feet bear our body hither and thither, so do our affections carry us to good works or bad. For look which 65 way that our affections lead us and that way commonly walk we. And therefore said our Savior to Saint Peter when he offered to be all washed again both<sup>795</sup> feet, hands, and head, “He that is washed is all clean and needeth to have no more washed but his feet,” that is to wit, his affections, “and then is he 70 all clean.” And with that our Savior, considering the traitor Judas (the filthy feet of whose wretched covetous affection had carried him to the council of the Jews to offer them his Master for money to sell, and from which traitorous affection Christ’s great marvelous 75 humanity, washing the traitor’s filthy feet, had not cleansed him), he said unto them all, “You be clean, but yet all you be not clean,” for he knew who it was that should betray him. And therefore he said, “All you be not clean.”

Upon the foresaid words of Christ unto Peter, “He that is washed needeth but to wash his feet,” and those words, “You be clean,” it appeareth, as the old holy doctors say, that the apostles were before that all baptized and clean. But Judas had by 85 his filthy affection of his wretched covetise<sup>796</sup> defiled himself by his false treason again.

“Then after that he had washed their feet, he took his clothes again, and when he was set at the table again, he said unto them, ‘Wot<sup>797</sup> ye what I have 90 done to you?’” Our Savior here giveth us in these words a good occasion to perceive that his outward works had, beside those visible apparent things which every man might behold and see, such secret spiritual mysteries meant and signified, and not only signified but also wrought and done in them, that those spiritual things unseen were so much the more principal parts of his deed that whoso know 5 not them, though they know his outward deed, yet may it be said that they know not what he did.

So where our Savior healed a man in his body outwardly, and inwardly also in his soul—whereof it is said, Totum hominem sanum fecit in sab-
 10 bato (“He made all the man whole in the Sabbath day”),<sup>798</sup> that is to wit, not the body only, for the body alone is not all the man, but the soul too—
 15 they that looked on, though they wist<sup>799</sup> what he had outwardly done in the healing of the body, yet was that inward work of his in healing of the soul so far passing<sup>800</sup> that, that it may well be said they wist not what he did. And so was it in his works that he wrought in the Blessed Sacrament: as, when he con-
 20 secrated his blessed body and blood in the form of bread and wine at this his Last Supper, had he not told them that point himself, who could have told what he did?

And therefore here in the washing of his disciples’ feet, albeit that<sup>801</sup> they could not but both 25 see and feel what he did, yet because his outward work therein was not in such a special manner his deed as was the inward mystery that he did and meant therein, he asked them, “Know you what I have done to you?” As though he would say: “I
 30 have done more than you know, for by the outward washing of your feet I have given you example of humility,” which thing he declared unto them with most effectual words. For first, to the intent that they should consider of what weight and authority 35 both his deed and his word should be with them, he plainly declared, taking occasion upon their own confession, that he was their very lord and their very master. And therefore he said unto them, “You call me master and lord, and you say well. For so I am 40 indeed.”

He was very lord of them as of his creatures; he was very master of them as of his disciples. Now putting this first in their remembrance for a foundation, thereupon he builded them a marvelous fruitful lesson with the declaration<sup>802</sup> of his former deed, 45 saying unto them, “Therefore if I have washed your feet, being your lord and your master, you must also wash one another’s feet.” Then goeth he farther and declareth wherefore he washed their feet, as he 50 before said to Saint Peter that he should know it afterward. And therefore now he telleth that he did it to give example by his own deed unto them that they should each to other do the like. And therefore he said: “An example have I given you, that likewise 55 as I have done to you, so should you do also, that is to wit, do each of you to other as I have done to you all.”

Then goeth our Savior further yet and enforceth<sup>803</sup> his doctrine and his example with a strong mighty reason, saying, “Verily, verily, I tell you, the 60 bondman is not greater than his lord, nor a messenger more<sup>804</sup> than he that hath sent him.” As though he would say, “Since the bondman is no better than his lord, and I that am your creator am more highly 65 lord over you that are my creatures than any earthly lord is over his bondman, how should you disdain to wash your fellow’s feet, when I your high lord have not disdained to wash yours? And since the mes-
 70 senger is not better than he that hath sent him, and all you be but mine apostles, that is to wit, but my messengers to do my message in preaching my word about the world, since I that send you and there-
 75 fore so far your better and yet have not disdained to wash your feet, there can none of you without very sinful and shameful pride disdain to wash the feet of his fellow.”

And finally Christ knitteth<sup>805</sup> up all the whole matter with a very short substantial lesson: “If you know these things, blessed shall you be if you do these things.” In which words our Savior well declareth that the bliss of heaven will not be gotten by 80 knowing of virtue but by the use and doing thereof. For as no man can come at Canterbury by the bare knowledge of the way thither if he will sit still at home, so by knowing the way to heaven we can 85 never the more come there but if<sup>806</sup> we will walk therein. And therefore saith our Lord by the mouth of the prophet: Beati immaculati qui ambulant in lege Domini. Non enim qui operantur iniquitatem in viis eius ambulaverunt (“Blessed are they that 90 are undefiled, that walk in the law of our Lord. But they that work wickedness walk not in his ways”).<sup>807</sup> And our Savior saith<sup>808</sup> his own mouth that the knowledge without work not only doth no profit

but also causeth increase of a man's punishment, in respect that<sup>809</sup> his punishment should be if, without his willful ignorance, his knowledge had been much less. For thus saith our Lord: "The bondman that knoweth not the will of his lord and doth it not shall be beaten with few stripes. But the bondman that knoweth his lord's will and doth it not shall be beaten with many stripes."<sup>810</sup> And therefore with this necessary fruitful doctrine our Lord did knit up all and said, "If you know these things," that is to wit, "that my washing of your feet is done for your example, that since I am indeed (as yourselves do call me) your Lord and your Master, and that the bondman is not better than his lord, nor the messenger more than his master that sent him, you should not be so proud as to disdain to do as lowly service, each of you to other, as I have done to you all. If you know this and do it indeed, then shall you be blessed, or else for the bare knowledge shall you be but the worse."

Upon these words before rehearsed, had between our Savior and Saint Peter, that refused for reverence the thing that our Lord would do to him, holy doctors note that no man lawfully may for any private mind of reverence or devotion to God do the thing that God forbiddeth nor leave the thing undone that God biddeth. For it is an undiscree<sup>811</sup> devotion, and an unreverent reverence, and no right humility, but an unperceived pride to stand stiff<sup>812</sup> against God's will and disobey his pleasure. For as the Scripture saith, "Better is obedience than sacrifice."<sup>813</sup> Nor never shall God's precepts be obeyed if every man may boldly frame himself<sup>814</sup> a conscience with a gloze<sup>815</sup> of his own making after his own fantasy put unto God's word. For of such manner dealing, whereby folk will of their private devotions, against the commandment of God, follow their own way, may these words of the Scripture be verified: Est via quae videtur hominibus iusta, et novissima eius tendit ad infernum. ("There is a way that unto men seemeth just, and the last end thereof leadeth unto hell").<sup>816</sup>

King Saul thought, after his own mind, that he did very well when he kept and spared the goodly oxen for sacrifice. But while he broke, in his so doing, the commandment of God, this false-framed devotion helped him not but that he lost his kingdom therefore. Saint Peter here thought he did well when he for reverence toward Christ would not suffer him wash his feet. But our Savior showed him that, if he would for any such framed reverence of his own stand obstinately disobedient unto God's pleasure, he should have no part with him. And therefore, while Christ was presently conversant<sup>817</sup> with him, he was the interpreter of his own precept. And King Saul should not have followed his own wit, but should have asked the prophet by whom that precept came to him. And in like wise, if a man doubt of the sentence and understanding of anything written in the Scripture, it is no wisdom for him then to take upon him such authority of interpretation himself, as that he shall therein boldly stand unto<sup>818</sup> his own mind, but lean unto the interpretation of the old holy doctors and saints and unto that interpretation that is received and allowed by the universal Church, by which Church the Scripture is comen to our hands and delivered unto us, and without which we could not (as Saint Augustine saith) know which books were Holy Scripture.<sup>819</sup>

Our Savior here saith, "I have given you an example, that, likewise as I have done to you, so should you do also." Would God that all the prelates, and all curates, and all preachers, yea, and fathers and mothers, and all masters of households too, would here of our Savior take example for to give good example. There are many that can be well content to be preaching, some to show their cunning<sup>820</sup> and some to show their authority. But would God they would use the fashion that our Savior used, that is to wit, the things that they bid other men do, do it first themselves. The Scripture saith of our Savior, Cepit Iesus facere et docere ("Jesus began to do and to teach"),<sup>821</sup> so that he not only taught men to do this or that, but he gave them also the example and did the thing first himself. To stir us to fast, he not only taught us what fashion we should use in fasting, but also for our example fasted forty days himself. To stir us to wake and pray, he not only taught us by word, but used also by night to go forth into the Mount of Olivet and there to wake and pray by night himself, by which custom the traitor knew where to find him. To set nought by the royalty<sup>822</sup> of the world he not only taught us by word, but also by his poor birth, and all the course of his poor life, he gave us the example himself. To stir us to patience and suffering of tribulation, he not only taught us and exhorted us by word, but gave us the example by his own cross, his own passion, and his own painful death. And surely, albeit that<sup>823</sup> the best is (for him that hath a good thing taught him by one whom he seeth do the contrary himself) to do as he is well taught and not follow the lewd<sup>824</sup> example of his evil deed, yet is our common condition such that, whereas word and deed both be scant able to draw us to do good, every one of the both is able enough to draw us to naught.<sup>825</sup> And therefore he that biddeth other folk do well and giveth evil example with the contrary deed himself fareth<sup>826</sup> even like a foolish weaver that would weave apace with the one hand and unweave as fast with the other.

The example of Christ in washing the apostles' feet, with his exhortation unto them by his example to do the like, bindeth not men to follow the literal fashion thereof in washing of folks' feet as for a rite or a ceremony or a sacrament of the Church—howbeit much it hath been ever since and yet in every country of Christendom in places of religion used it is, and noble princes and great estates<sup>827</sup> use that godly ceremony very religiously. And none I suppose nowhere more godly than our sovereign lord the King's Grace here of this realm, both in humble manner washing and wiping and kissing also many poor folks' feet after the number of years of his age, and with right liberal and princely alms therewith.

And surely if the interpretation of the Scripture were not by the Spirit of God put in the whole corps<sup>828</sup> of the Catholic Church, he that would upon his own head stick upon the letter of the Gospel and his own exposition thereto might contend that the washing of the feet were a sacrament unto which our Savior bound his Church of necessity. But, as the universal Church believeth, so is it not. Howbeit, in time and place convenient, it is (as Saint Augustine saith) a thing of the more perfection if we not only do not disdain in our hearts but do it also in deed with our hands as our Lord did with his.<sup>829</sup>

When our Lord said, "You be clean but not all," he meant that the congregation and company of his twelve apostles, as a congregation and a company, was a clean company, though Judas, one of the company, was not clean. For many a right honest company is there that hath yet some not honest among them. And so is the Catholic Church called Sancta Ecclesia, "Holy Church," because that out thereof<sup>830</sup> there is none holiness, and for those that are holy therein, which are always many, both priests and laymen too, though there be therein besides many bad of both sorts also.

Finally, where our Savior saith, Si haec scitis, beati eritis si feceritis ea ("If you know these things, you shall be blessed if you do them"),<sup>831</sup> two things in those words he giveth us warning of: the one, that without faith there can be no good work that can be meritorious touching<sup>832</sup> the bliss of heaven; the other, that have we the faith never so great, yet if we will not work well our faith shall fail of the bliss. And therefore to give us warning of the necessity that we have of faith, he said not these words alone, "If you do this you shall be blessed," but he began with these words, "If you know these things." Now the knowledge of those things that pertain to such kind of well doing as shall stand us in stead toward<sup>833</sup> salvation, that knowledge have we not but by faith. As the apostles there, though they saw him wash their feet, yet that he did it to give them an example of humility, and that such humility should be requisite to help them to heaven, and to be rewarded there, this knew they not but by the faith that they gave therein unto Christ's word. For, fides ex auditu, auditus autem per verbum Dei ("Faith," saith Saint Paul, "cometh of hearing, and the hearing thereof is by the word of God").<sup>834</sup> Therefore, as I say, our Lord began their blessedness with faith. For faith is the very gate and first entry toward heaven: accidentem ad Deum oportet credere ("He that is coming to God must give credence and believe").<sup>835</sup> For if a man that believeth not do the selfsame thing either by chance or of some other affection,<sup>836</sup> which thing done by a faithful man in faith were meritorious, 822 magnificence, pomp 823 albeit that: although 824 wicked 825 wrongdoing 826 acts 827 great estates: persons of high social rank 828 body 829 See use to us with regard to 834 Rom 10:17 835 Heb 11:6 836 inclination, passion that deed done by the faithless is not meritorious at all. But yet, though faith be the first gate into heaven, he that standeth still at the gate and will not walk forth in the way of good works shall not come where the reward is. And therefore our Savior left<sup>837</sup> not with these words, Si haec scitis beati eritis (“If you know these things you shall be blessed”), but went further and, to make up his tale perfect, he added, si feceritis ea (“if you do them”).

I fear me there be many folk that, for delight of knowledge or for a foolish vainglory to show and make it known how much themselves know, labor to know the law of God (and know it right well indeed, and can well preach it out again) that shall yet see many a poor simple soul with a gross plain faith (with no learning but good devout affection, walking the way of good works in this world) sit after full high with our Lord in heaven, when those great clerks<sup>838</sup> wandering here in evil works shall, for all their great knowledge and for all gay<sup>839</sup> preaching in the name of Christ, hear our Lord say to them (as in the thirteenth chapter of Saint Luke he saith he will say to such): Discedite a me operarii iniquitatis (“Walk you from me you workers of wickedness”).<sup>840</sup>

And for conclusion, all the work (with this example of his and all his declaration<sup>841</sup> thereupon) our Savior instructeth and exhorteth his apostles to, is the work of humility. For likewise as pride threw down the devil out of heaven, so shall there never none ascend but with meekness thither. And since the devil that fell himself by pride is ever most busy to tempt every man to the same sin (and specially those that he seeth aspire toward any excellence in spiritual kind of virtue or that he espieth put in prelacy<sup>842</sup> and authority over other men, whereby he hopeth to find a gate open to enter), our Savior therefore to keep against the ghostly<sup>843</sup> enemy that gate well warded<sup>844</sup> and sure, in sundry places again and again giveth his apostles (whom he made prelates and spiritual governors of his flock) special counsel against the prick<sup>845</sup> of pride, and with words and with this example of washing their feet his<sup>846</sup> own hands, exhorteth them by meekness and humility to count<sup>847</sup> and reckon and use<sup>848</sup> themselves as far under others as himself doth in order<sup>849</sup> and authority prefer and enhance<sup>850</sup> them above, and would that we should of duty for their degree do great honor unto them, and that they should themselves of<sup>851</sup> meekness as fast<sup>852</sup> again put it from them.

The Prayer

Almighty Jesus, my sweet Savior Christ, which wouldest vouchsafe thine<sup>853</sup> own almighty hands to wash the feet of thy twelve apostles, not only of the good but of the very traitor too, vouchsafe, good Lord, of thine excellent goodness, in such wise to wash the foul feet of mine affections that I never have such pride enter into mine heart as to disdain either in friend or foe, with meekness and charity for the love of thee, to file<sup>854</sup> mine hands with washing of their feet.

THE FOURTH CHAPTER

Of the institution of the sacrament, written in the twenty-sixth of Saint Matthew, the fourteenth of Saint Mark, and in the twenty-second of Saint Luke

The First Lecture upon the Blessed Sacrament

And as they were sitting at the table and eating, Jesus saith, “With desire have I desired to eat the Paschal with you before I suffer. I say to you that from this time I shall not eat it, till it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God.” As they were at supper Jesus took bread, gave thanks, and blessed and broke it, and gave it to his disciples, and saith, “Take you and eat you. This is my body, the which for you shall be delivered. This do you for the remembrance of me.” Likewise, taking the chalice after that he had supped, gave thanks and gave it them, saying, “Take and divide it among you, and drink of this all. This is my blood of the new testament. This is the chalice, the new testament in my blood, which for you and for many shall be shed for remission of sins. I say verily to you that I shall not drink from henceforth of this generation<sup>855</sup> of the vine, until that day when I shall drink it new<sup>856</sup> with you in the kingdom of my Father God.” And they drank all thereof.

Albeit, good readers, that I have rehearsed you this chapter in such wise as the right famous clerk Master John Gerson rehearseth in his work called Monotessaron, gathered of the words of all the three evangelists, Saint Matthew, Saint Mark, and Saint Luke, and in a convenient order, linked and chained ensuingly<sup>857</sup> together, yet seemeth me<sup>858</sup> that for the beginning the thing shall somewhat the better appear if we rehearse the words of Saint Luke somewhat more full, which words he writeth upon the end of the eating of the Paschal lamb and before the institution of the Blessed Sacrament of the altar. For in his twenty-second chapter thus beginneth he this matter: Et cum facta esset hora, discubuit, et duodecim apostoli cum eo. Et ait illis: Desiderio desideravi hoc Pascha manducare vobiscum antequam patiar. Dico enim vobis, quia ex hoc non manducabo illud, donec impleatur in regno Dei. Et accepto calice gratias egit, et dixit: Accipite et dividite inter vos. Dico enim vobis quod non bibam de generatione vitis donec regnum Dei veniat (“And when the hour was come, he sat down at the table, and his twelve apostles with him. And he saith unto them, ‘With desire have I desired to eat this Paschal lamb with you before I suffer. For I tell you that from this time I shall not eat it till it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God.’ And the cup taken, he gave thanks and said, ‘Take you and divide you it among you. For I say to you that I shall not drink of the generation of the vine till the kingdom of God come’”).<sup>859</sup>

These words hath Saint Luke whole<sup>860</sup> together of the finishing of the old Paschal before he entereth into the rehearsing of the new Paschal, whereof the old was a figure, that is to wit,<sup>861</sup> before he beginneth to rehearse the institution of the Blessed Sacrament of the altar, of which he beginneth to speak forthwith after these words ended.

In the beginning of these words, written in the twenty-second chapter of Saint Luke, our Savior expresseth the great desire that he had to eat the Paschal lamb at that time with his apostles, saying, Desiderio desideravi hoc Pascha manducare vobiscum antequam patiar (“With desire have I desired to eat this Paschal lamb with you before my Passion”).<sup>862</sup> These words “with desire have I desired” are spoken after the manner of the Hebrew speech, in which speech our Savior spoke at the time himself. For the Hebrews to express a thing vehemently use oftentimes, as it appeareth in sundry places of Scripture, to double a word, sometimes by the participle and the verb, sometimes by the noun and the verb, as our Savior did here, saying, “with desire have I desired,” that is to wit, “very sore<sup>863</sup> have I desired,” or “very desirously have I longed for to eat this Paschal lamb with you.”

Two causes there were for which our Savior so sore longed at that time to eat the Paschal lamb with his disciples. The one appeareth upon that<sup>864</sup> I have showed you before, that is to wit, because that (as Saint John saith): Cum dilexisset suos qui erant in mundo, usque in finem dilexit eos (“Whereas he had loved his that were in the world, he loved them to the end”).<sup>865</sup> And therefore, since he was now so near drawing to his Passion, which he had determined to suffer on the morrow, he, like a most tender lover, longed with that Last Supper to make them his farewell at his departing from them.

Wherein, as I before have said, appeared his wonderful loving heart. For had he been after the manner of other men (since himself saw his Passion drawing so near, to which he should be so violently taken so shortly upon<sup>866</sup> his supper, and that Passion so bitter as himself well wist<sup>867</sup> it should, of which he was so feared<sup>868</sup> and for which he was so sorrowful within so few hours after), he would have taken little pleasure or comfort in the company of his apostles nor list<sup>869</sup> to make them a supper at that time.

But he loved them so tenderly that all the pain, sorrow, dread, and fear that was toward<sup>870</sup> him could not so master and overwhelm his kind loving affection toward them, but that the desire and longing to make his Last Supper with them so much increased greater as he surely saw that his bitter Passion drew nearer. And that was therefore (as I say) one of the causes for which he said unto them at the eating thereof, “With desire have I desired,” that is to say, “Sore have I longed to eat this Paschal lamb with you before my Passion.”

The other cause for which he longed so sore to eat that Paschal lamb with them was because that he longed for the time in which he should, with his bitter Passion, pay the price of our redemption and restore the kind<sup>871</sup> of man unto the inheritance of 857 in due sequence 858 seemeth me: I think 859 Lk 2:14–18 860 all 861 say 862 Lk 22:15 863 greatly 864 what 865 Jn 13:1 866 after 867 knew

the kingdom of heaven. And because that he would, before the offering up of his own blessed body (the very lamb, innocent and immaculate) unto the Father, institute the new Paschal (the very eating of the selfsame holy, unspotted lamb, his own blessed body and blood, to be continually sacrificed, offered up unto the Father, and eaten in remembrance of his bitter Passion under the form of bread and wine), he would, as was convenient,<sup>872</sup> before the institution of the new very Paschal, reverently finish the old Paschal that was the figure thereof.

And therefore at the Last Supper, to declare the desire that he had so to do (that is to wit, to institute his new Paschal by the finishing of the old), he said unto them, “With desire have I desired to eat this Paschal lamb with you before my Passion.” And for to declare the more clearly that the cause of his desire was to the intent that he would finish it and offer up himself the very lamb, whereof the other was the figure, and would by that pleasant sacrifice bring the nature of man into the kingdom of heaven, he therefore said farther unto them: Dico enim vobis, quia ex hoc non manducabo illud, donec impleatur in regno Dei (“I say verily to you, that from this time I shall eat that no more till it be performed<sup>873</sup> in the kingdom of God”).<sup>874</sup>

The fulfilling or performing of the sacrifice of the Paschal lamb, being a figure, was the offering of his own blessed body in sacrifice, by which the nature of man was restored unto the kingdom of heaven. And by that new offering up of that innocent lamb so offered (which offering was the verity) was that old offering of the Paschal lamb in Jerusalem (that was the figure) fully performed and thereupon took his full perfection in the kingdom of heaven.

But here must we consider that our Savior, in saying that he would eat the old Paschal lamb no more till it were performed in the kingdom of heaven, did not mean that after that the figure were performed and had his perfection in heaven, he would then use or have used the same figure again in earth, but he meant that he would no more eat it at all. For this word donec in Latin (that is to say, “until” in English), when it limiteth<sup>875</sup> a time before which it denieth a certain thing to be done, doth not always mean or imply (though sometimes it do) the doing of the same thing after that time. As when the Gospel saith, Non cognovit eam, donec peperit filium suum primogenitum (Joseph “knew not her till she had brought forth her first-begotten son”),<sup>876</sup> meaneth not that he knew her after. Nor where the prophet speaketh as in the person of the Father unto Christ, Sede a dextris meis, donec ponam inimicos tuos scabellum pedum tuorum (“Sit on my right hand till I put thine enemies for a footstool under thy feet”),<sup>877</sup> the prophet there meaneth not that when the enemies of Christ be thrown under his feet he shall then sit on the Father’s right hand no longer. Nor here in like wise our Savior meant not that, after the verity fulfilled and perfected in the kingdom of God, he would use or have used the figure here still in earth.

And that appeareth plain by two things. One, by this word impleatur, “till it be fulfilled.” For, since it was but a figure, and he said he would use it no more till it were fulfilled, he must needs mean that he would use it no more at all. For, being but a figure, it had no cause of use after that it was by the verity fulfilled.

And therefore as touching<sup>878</sup> the Paschal lamb, when our Savior said, “I will from henceforth eat this no more till it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God,” was as much as to say, “after this I will never eat it more,” after such manner of speaking as one might say that looked for to die or that were entering into the Charterhouse,<sup>879</sup> “I will never eat flesh more in this world,” or thus, “I trust to be in heaven ere I eat any more flesh,” — or such other kind of speaking like, not meaning that he would eat flesh in another world, but that he would eat none here, and consequently never eat flesh more.

The other thing, by which it appeareth plain that our Savior intended not to have the figurative old Paschal lamb any longer continue, is that he forthwith instituted the verity thereof, the new sacrifice, his Blessed Body and Blood, the Blessed Sacrament of the altar.

But before the institution of his own Christian sacrament, to the intent it should appear that he would fully finish the old Paschal of the Jews (and as who say wash it away), himself with his apostles, as for a final end thereof, after the eating thereof, drank thereunto. Whereof Saint Luke proceedeth farther and saith, Accepto calice gratias egit, et

879 a Carthusian monastery in London, known for its austerity

dixit: accipite et dividite inter vos (“He took the cup and gave thanks and said, ‘Take and divide among you’”).<sup>880</sup>

Our Savior as man gave thanks unto God the Father that the old sacrifice of the Paschal lamb was now come to an end and that he was now come to the institution of the new sacrifice, his own blessed body in the Holy Sacrament of the altar.

Then our Lord commanded them to take and divide the cup of wine among them and drink all thereof, as the farewell of the old Paschal. And then said he further unto them, Dico enim vobis, quod non bibam de generatione vitis, donec regnum Dei veniat (“I say to you that I shall not drink of the generation of the vine till the kingdom of God come”).<sup>881</sup>

The kingdom of God he calleth here the state of his glory after his resurrection, in which he rose immortal, impassible,<sup>882</sup> and glorious. Afore which time he said here unto them that he would drink no wine, as though he would say, “Such drink as I now drink with you to the old sacrifice of the Paschal lamb will I drink no more till I arise again in my glory after my Passion.”

But after his resurrection, he did verily eat and drink with them again, as appeareth plain by the evangelists, and as Saint Peter beareth witness where he saith, Qui manducavimus et bibimus cum illo postquam resurrexit a mortuis (“We have eaten and drunken with him after that he was arisen from death”).<sup>883</sup>

After this done, our Savior Christ by and by, in the stead of that old sacrifice of the Paschal lamb so ended, did institute the new sacrifice and the only sacrifice to be continued in his Church, the Blessed Sacrament of the altar. Which new sacrifice, instead of that old sacrifice and of all the old sacrifices which among the Jews fore-figured the very fruitful<sup>884</sup> sacrifice of Christ’s blessed body upon the cross, should, in his own Church of Jews and gentiles together, continually with the selfsame body and blood offered in the Mass under the form of bread and wine, represent that sacrifice in which on Good Friday Christ once forever offered the selfsame body and blood in their proper form to the Father upon the cross.

And therefore, after the old sacrifice of the Paschal lamb clearly finished, as ye have heard, ere ever they rose from the board,<sup>885</sup> our Savior forthwith went in hand<sup>886</sup> with the instituting of that that should be the new sacrifice, the Blessed Sacrament of the altar, his own holy body and blood under form of bread and wine.

The manner of which institution, in the Gospel of Saint Matthew, Saint Mark, and Saint Luke, is rehearsed in this wise: “Jesus took bread, gave thanks and blessed it, and broke it, and gave it his disciples, saying, ‘Take you and eat you. This is my body, which shall be delivered for you.’”

First our Savior, in the beginning of this excellent work, gave thanks and blessed the bread to give us example, as saith Saint Bede, that in the beginning of every good work we should give thanks to God. Then he broke it and gave it unto them himself to signify, saith Saint Bede, that he gave himself to his Passion of his own free will.<sup>887</sup> But to the intent they should well understand that this holy sacrament that himself instituted in his own holy person wonderfully far passed the old sacrifice of the Paschal lamb instituted by the ministry of Moses in the Old Law, lest they might peradventure<sup>888</sup> take it for a far less thing than it was — as they should have had a great cause to do if it had been none other substance than the substance of bread, as to their eyes it seemed (for then had the lamb, which was a living sensible<sup>889</sup> creature, been of the proper nature<sup>890</sup> much more excellent than the insensible substance of bread) — our Savior therefore, to give them sure knowledge how great a gift it was that he there gave them and how incomparably far above all the merit of man to receive (that they should thereby consider how deeply they were bounden and beholden to him therefore, and with devout thanks inwardly remember his inestimable bounty therein), he gave them knowledge that though it was bread when he took it in hand and that to their bodily senses seemed yet bread still, yet it was now his own very body indeed. And therefore he said unto them, “Take you and eat you. This is my body.” As though he might say, “Think not that for my special new sacrifice, that I institute to represent forever in mine own Church (till I return to the general judgment) my most precious Passion, I give you a thing of more base nature than was the thing that was wont to be sacrificed to fore-figure it in the short<sup>891</sup> and soon passing synagogue—which you might think if my sacrifice of representation were but insensible bread, where their fore-figuring sacrifice was celebrated in a living creature, a fair unspotted lamb. But I will that you shall understand and know that the thing which I give you here to eat is of a nature above all measure more excellent. For though it seem bread, yet is it flesh. And though it seem dead, yet is it living. The lamb, though it was quick taken to the sacrifice, yet was it eaten dead. But this shall you eat quick, and it shall rest and abide quick in you. And the lamb did feed and nourish your bodies; but this shall feed and nourish your souls. For this is mine own body, and not my dead body, but animated and living with my soul. And mine own body shall never be separated from my Godhead, so that if you receive and eat virtuously the one into your body, you receive the other graciously<sup>892</sup> into your souls.”

In these few compendious<sup>893</sup> words of our Savior, “This is my body,” is all this long tale included, and many a long holy process more. And albeit that in those words alone he told them the thing plain enough, and notwithstanding that he had also declared them before that he would give them his own body to eat, inculking<sup>894</sup> that point into them with many words at length, mentioned in the sixth chapter of Saint John, yet to make them the more clearly perceive that this was the thing that he then told them of, he said not only, “This is my body,” but he farther also added thereunto, “which shall be delivered for you”—as though he would say, “If any would be so far from believing of the truth, that rather than believe this to be my very body, he would seek a gloss<sup>895</sup> against mine own word and say that by this word, ‘my body,’ I meant but a sign or a figure or a token of my body, to put all such folk out of doubt I say that this which I give you here to receive and eat is that sameself body that shall be delivered for you to the Jews and to gentiles and by them to the cross and to the death.”

Now to the intent that it should appear plain that he gave them not his body for that only time, as a special show of kindness to their own persons alone, but that they should perceive that he did it to begin and institute a new sacrament, instead of the old Paschal, which should endure in his Church in the stead of the other there finished, he said unto them, Hoc facite in meam commemorationem (“This do you in the remembrance of me”)<sup>896</sup>—as though he would say to them, “Likewise as the synagogue of the Jews have hitherto used for a figure of my Passion the old sacrifice of the Paschal lamb, so do you use in my Church from henceforth in remembrance of my Passion this new sacrifice of mine own body, that shall suffer that Passion and be sacrificed once forever upon the cross”—which sentence of our Savior’s words is also declared by Saint Paul in the eleventh chapter of his first epistle to the Corinthians, of which we shall speak hereafter.<sup>897</sup> But first shall we peruse the words of our Savior himself.

After that he had thus given them his own blessed body to eat in the form of bread, he gave them likewise his blessed blood to drink in the form of wine, whereof it followeth in the Gospel: “And likewise taking the chalice after supper, he gave thanks and gave it to them, saying, ‘Take you and drink all you of this. This is my blood of the new testament. This is the chalice, the new testament in my blood, which for you and for many shall be shed into the remission of sins.’”

Our Savior at the converting and turning of the wine into his own precious blood, which he should so shortly after shed for our sins upon his painful cross, murmured not nor grudged<sup>898</sup> not at the remembrance of his bitter passion, but was glad, and gave God the Father thanks that he vouchsafed to suffer<sup>899</sup> him by his pain to pay our ransom and buy our souls from pain, as say Saint Remigius and Saint Chrysostom. And our Savior in his so doing (saith Saint Chrysostom) teacheth us what pain soever we suffer, to suffer it in such wise as we give God thanks therefore.<sup>900</sup>

“And after his thanks given to God, he gave the chalice to his apostles and commanded them all drink thereof, saying, ‘This is my blood of the new testament. This is the chalice, the new testament in my blood.’”

In these words our Savior showed them what thing it was that he gave them to drink in the chalice, that is to wit,<sup>901</sup> that it was his own blood, saying, “This is my blood of the new testament,” as Saint Matthew rehearseth<sup>902</sup> it, or, “This is the

to passages by Remigius and Chrysostom in the Catena aurea of Aquinas. 901 say 902 recounts, tells

chalice, the new testament in my blood,” as Saint Luke rehearseth it, either for that our Savior spoke both the one words and the other, or else for that both of the one words and the other the sentence is all one. For in the twenty-fourth chapter of Exodus is it specified how that Moses in the confirmation of the Old Law put half the blood of the sacrifice into a cup, and the other half he shed upon the altar, and, after the volume of the law read, he besprinkled the blood upon the people and said unto them, Hic est sanguis foederis, quod pepigit Dominus vobiscum super cunctis sermonibus his (“This is the blood of the league<sup>903</sup> that our Lord hath made with you upon all these words”).<sup>904</sup> And so was the old testament ratified and confirmed with blood. And in like wise was the new testament confirmed with blood, saving that for to declare the great excellency of the new testament brought by the Son of God above the old testament brought by the prophet Moses, whereas the old testament was ratified with the blood of a brute beast, the new testament was ratified with the blood of a reasonable man, and of that man that was also God, that is to wit, with the blessed blood of our holy Savior himself. And the selfsame blood gave our Lord here unto his apostles in this Blessed Sacrament, as he plainly declared himself, saying, Hic est sanguis meus novi testamenti (“This is my blood of the new testament”),<sup>905</sup> or, Hic est calix novum testamentum in meo sanguine, qui pro vobis et pro multis fundetur in remissionem peccatorum (“This is the chalice, the new testament in my blood, which shall be shed for you and for many for remission of sins”).<sup>906</sup>

Here you see that by the words of our Savior rehearsed by Saint Matthew, and upon his words rehearsed by Saint Luke, our Lord very plainly declared unto his apostles that in that cup was the same blood of his own with which he could ratify his new testament, and which blood should be shed upon the altar of the cross for the remission of sins, not of themselves alone but also of many more.

When our Lord said, “This is the cup of the new testament in my blood, which shall be shed for you and for many into remission of sins,” he declared therein the efficacy of the New Testament above the old in that the Old Law in the blood of beasts could but promise the remission of sin afterward to come. For as Saint Paul saith, “It was impossible that sin should be taken away with the blood of brute beasts.”<sup>907</sup> But the New Law with the blood of Christ performeth the thing that the Old Law promised, that is to wit, remission of sins. And therefore our Savior said, “This is the chalice, the new testament in my blood,” that is to wit, “to be confirmed in my blood, which shall be shed into remission of sins.”

His words also declared the wonderful excellency of this new Blessed Sacrament above the sacrifice of the Paschal lamb in these words: Pro vobis et pro multis (“For you and for many”). For in these words our Savior spoke (saith Saint Chrysostom) as though he would say, “The blood of the Paschal lamb was shed only for the first-begotten among the children of Israel, but this blood of mine shall be shed for remission of sin of all the whole world.” And so was it, according as Saint Chrysostom saith, shed for the sin of the whole world. For sufficient it was for the sin of the whole world and as many more too.

But it was effectually shed for those only that shall take the effect thereof, which are only those that shall be saved thereby, which shall be as Saint Remigius saith, and as the truth is, not the apostles only but also many other of many regions, according to the foresaid words of our Savior: “This is the chalice, the new testament in my blood, which shall be shed for you and for many into remission of sins.”

Then likewise as he had before said (as you have heard rehearsed by Saint Luke) that, when he had with his disciples drunken after the Paschal lamb, he would drink no more of the generation<sup>908</sup> of the vine till the kingdom of God were come, so said he here again to them after the institution of his holy Blessed Sacrament: Dico enim vobis quia non bibam a modo de hoc genimine vitis, usque in diem illum cum illud bibam novum vobiscum in regno Patris mei Dei.<sup>909</sup>

These words diverse doctors do declare diversely. Some take this saying of our Savior rehearsed by Saint Matthew and Saint Mark to be the selfsame that Saint Luke rehearseth, and that they were spoken only after the institution of the Sacrament, and that Saint Luke observed the verity of the saying and not observed the time. And of this mind seemeth Master Gerson to have been, as appeareth by his rehearsing of the matter.

But diverse other doctors take them as spoken at diverse times, the one after the Paschal finished, the other after that at the institution of the Blessed Sacrament. And so seemeth it most plain to appear upon the words of Saint Luke. And albeit that the first words rehearsed by Saint Luke and these other rehearsed by Saint Matthew and Saint Mark may be both understood in one sentence and as one thing twice said—that is to wit, that in both the times of that saying our Savior meant that he would no more drink with his apostles (after that time in which they should then depart after that supper) until himself were risen again from death, and his body forever immortal and impassible<sup>910</sup> (which glory of his he called the kingdom of his Father), after which entry thereinto by his resurrection, he would both eat and drink with them again, and so would drink with them the wine new<sup>911</sup> in the kingdom of his Father (that is to wit, himself being in the kingdom of his Father should drink the wine with them in a new manner, that is to wit, when he should be forever immortal and impassible), and that he would no more drink of that kind of wine of which he consecrated, and which he turned into his blessed blood, till his Passion were passed and his new life comen—albeit (I say) that I deny not but that thus they may be taken (and by some of the old holy doctors thus are declared indeed), yet are they by diverse others of those old holy doctors expounded diverse other wise, and (as it seemeth) may well be declared thus.

In the words rehearsed by Saint Luke when our Savior said, Dico enim vobis quod non bibam de generatione vitis, donec regnum Dei veniat (“I say verily to you that I shall not drink of the generation of the vine till the kingdom of God come”),<sup>912</sup> our Savior meant in these words that not only not after the supper but also not after the time of that draft there drunken to the Paschal lamb, he would drink no more of the generation of the vine till the kingdom of God were come, that is to wit, that he would before his resurrection drink no more wine after that draft of wine which he drank next before those words spoken. And so did he then by those words also teach them to know and perceive well afterward that the wine, which (before his other words that Saint Matthew and Saint Mark rehearse spoken at the institution of the Blessed Sacrament) was in the chalice, and which wine he there converted into his own precious blood, was, at the time of the drinking thereof, not wine but his own holy blood under the form of wine, which thing they were (I say)—besides his other plain words: “This is my blood of the new testament, which shall be shed for you and for many into remission of sins”—well showed and taught, in that he told them before the drinking of that (of which as I shall after show he drank himself with them) that before his resurrection, which was not then comen, he would drink no wine.

Now in his second words rehearsed by Saint Matthew and Saint Mark—which words he spoke at the institution of the Blessed Sacrament, when that (after the wine turned into his blood and taken to his apostles) he said, Dico autem vobis, quia non bibam a modo de hoc genimine vitis, usque in diem illum cum illud bibam novum vobiscum in regno Patris mei Dei<sup>913</sup>—in these words (gathered together in one out of the Gospel of the two foresaid evangelists) our Savior meant that he would after that draught<sup>914</sup> no more drink with them of his own blessed blood, which he drank with them then, until his bitter Passion and his glorious resurrection were performed. For after his glorious resurrection it is very probable, both upon these words and some other places of the Scripture too, that he not only did eat with them common meat but also did consecrate and eat with them the Blessed Sacrament also.

Now that he should call here his own blessed blood by the name of the generation of the vine is nothing to be marveled, while we see it in the common manner of Holy Scripture to call his blessed body and blood by the former names of the thing which he converted into them, as God in the Scripture calleth Adam earth because he was made of the earth, saying, Terra es et in terram reverteris.<sup>915</sup> And the Scripture calleth the serpent into which the rod of Aaron was turned by the name of a rod or a yard,<sup>916</sup> while it was not a rod but a serpent: Virga Aaron devoravit virgas magorum Aegyptiorum.<sup>917</sup>

<sup>912</sup> Lk 22:18 <sup>913</sup> Mt 26:29 and Mk 14:25: “I say verily to you that I shall not drink henceforth from this fruit of the vine

until that day when I will drink it with you new in the kingdom of my Father, God.” <sup>914</sup> act of drinking <sup>915</sup> Gn 3:19. “For dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return.” <sup>916</sup> stick <sup>917</sup> Ex 7:12. “The rod of Aaron swallowed up the rods of the magicians of Egypt.”

And over this our Savior in those second words, as some holy doctors declare, by the vine meant himself, which afterward unto his apostles he declared himself, saying in the fifteenth chapter of Saint John, Ego sum vitis vera (“I am the very vine”).<sup>918</sup>

And so may every way these words of our Savior (spoken after the conversion of the wine into his blessed blood) be well thus understand:<sup>919</sup> “I say verily to you that I shall not, from this time in which I drink now thereof with you, drink again of the generation of the vine, that is to wit, of my blood which I have here consecrated, and into which I have here converted and turned the generation of the vine (that is to say, the wine that came of the vine and was in the chalice before) until that day when,” etc.

Or else, after those other holy doctors that expound the vine to be himself, they may be well understood thus: “I say verily to you that I shall not, from this time in which I drink thereof with you now, drink anymore of this generation of the vine that we now drink of, that is to say, of mine own blood of the new testament (as I have told you), which is the generation of that vine of which these other words of mine are verified, Ego sum vitis vera, ‘I am the very vine’<sup>920</sup> (for of mine own body is mine own blood) — of this generation of the vine will I no more drink after this time until that day in which I shall drink it with you new, that is to wit, when it shall be new in the kingdom of my Father God (that is to say, that I being in the kingdom of God, my very natural Father,<sup>921</sup> that is to wit, after my resurrection when my body shall be forever immortal and impassible and in eternal glory), until that day will I not after this time drink anymore of this generation of the vine, that is myself, which am the very vine. And then after that will I drink it again with you, at which time it shall be new.”

Now that with those words this exposition, by which they be understood not of wine but of his blessed blood, most properly should agree, it appeareth both by diverse other things that well may be gathered upon the circumstance<sup>922</sup> of the matter and also upon this latter saying of our Savior compared with the former. For in the former, he said that he would, after that draft of wine that he drank to the Paschal lamb, drink no more wine till after his resurrection. And now had he drunken wine again after that and before his resurrection, if that which he drank the second time had been wine (as it was not, but was only his own blessed blood). And therefore is it very probable that, in his second saying, by these words, “this generation of the vine,” he meant not any wine, but the blessed blood of himself.

Also in the words that he spoke before of the Paschal lamb (when he said he would eat the Paschal lamb after that no more till it were fulfilled and perfected in the kingdom of God) he meant that the Mosaical sacrifice of the Paschal lamb, that was the only figure,<sup>923</sup> he would never eat more. But the very Paschal lamb that was the verity of that figure, that is to wit, his own blessed body and blood, after that the figure were by his new sacrament instituted, and (by his Passion suffered and by his glorious body risen again from death) fulfilled in the kingdom of God, that would he then eat again with them in the Blessed Sacrament under the form of bread, as he now would when he instituted it, and as he did after indeed. And so are these words of the chalice understood in like wise of his blessed blood in the sacrament, which it seemeth that he by those words in like wise promised to drink again with them after his resurrection.

Finally, for this exposition, I note this word novum, that is to say, “new.” Where our Savior in the said latter saying saith, Dico autem vobis, quia a modo non bibam de hoc genimine vitis, usque in diem illum cum illud bibam novum vobiscum in regno Patris mei Dei (“I say verily to you that from henceforth I shall not drink of this generation of the vine, until that day when I shall drink it with you new in the kingdom of my Father God”),<sup>924</sup> in these words, I say, I note and mark this word novum, “new.” For albeit that diverse doctors expound it, novum, id est novo modo (“new,” that is to wit, “in a new manner”), because our Lord after his resurrection did both eat and drink with his disciples such common meat and drink as he was before wont to do, but yet in a new manner (that is to wit, now immortal and impassible, and not for the necessary food of the body, but for the proof of that he was risen with his very body), albeit, I say, that some doctors expound that word novum thus, yet seemeth me that the other exposition is much more apt and consonant

918 Jn 15:1 919 understood 920 Jn 15:1 921 my... Father: the true Father of my nature 922 context 923 the...figure: merely a type thereunto. For this word novum seemeth not there to be put for an adverb, but is a noun adjective, and therefore it signifieth some kind of newness in the drink itself, whereas by that exposition all the newness is in the drinker (that is to wit, in the person of Christ) and in the act of drinking, as done for a new cause, but no manner of newness in the drink itself at all.

For in the common wine that our Savior drank with them after his resurrection was there none other manner of newness than there was therein before. And therefore, as I said, this other exposition that I have here showed seemeth much more agreeable unto the text, that is to wit, that after that time he would no more drink with them his own blessed blood, which he drank with them then in the Blessed Sacrament, until that day when he should in the kingdom of God his Father drink that blood with them new. For after his glorious resurrection that holy blood of his and all his blessed body was waxen new, that is to wit, of a new condition, other than it was at that time in which they received it in the Blessed Sacrament.

For albeit that his body, so delivered them at that time, suffered not, nor by their eating and receiving into their bodies was not pained, yet was it such that afterward it did suffer pain and death upon the cross. But when they received it again sacramentally after his resurrection, then was it in eternal glory so confirmed, and in such wise immortal and impassible, that it should never die nor never suffer pain after. And so, though there were in his blessed body and his blood given them in the sacrament before his Passion such a secret wonderful glory of impassibility for the time (as was in his body for the time a visible, open glory at his marvelous transfiguration), yet in the sacramental receiving after his glorious resurrection it had that point of newness which it had not actually before, that is to wit, without loss, diminishment, or intermission,<sup>925</sup> eternal enduring of impassible and immortal glory.

And so should (as I say) that generation of that vine, that is to wit, the blessed blood of his own holy person which he drank with them, consecrated of the generation of the common vine and in the likeness and form of common wine, be new after his glorious resurrection, before which time he there told them that he would drink no more thereof after that time, in which at his Maundy in the first institution he and all they did drink thereof together, of which their drinking with him Saint Mark maketh mention, saying, Et biberunt ex eo omnes (“and they drank thereof all”),<sup>926</sup> that is to wit, all the twelve apostles.

That all the apostles drank thereof appeareth well by these words, at the leastwise as many as were present at the time, and that were they all twelve. For though some have doubted and some also thought that Judas was gone before, yet is it the most common sentence<sup>927</sup> of all the old holy men, and most received for the truth among all Christian people, that the traitor received it too, whereof we shall have occasion to speak after in other places.

But now that our Savior did receive and eat his own blessed body, and drink his own blessed blood in the Blessed Sacrament at his Maundy with his apostles himself, if any man doubt, it seemeth me<sup>928</sup> that his own holy words afore-rehearsed will well declare it, in which words he said that himself would drink no more thereof till he would drink it with them new in the kingdom of God, that is to wit, in his glory as I have before showed you.

And that he called his glory the kingdom of God appeareth both by other places of Scripture and also by his own words, where, intending to show to some of his disciples (that is to wit, Saint Peter, Saint James, and Saint John) a sight and show of his glory in his transfiguration, he said, Sunt quidam de hic stantibus qui non gustabunt mortem, donec videbunt regnum Dei (“There be some here standing that shall not taste the death till they shall see the kingdom of God”).<sup>929</sup>

Besides this, likewise as he did himself both eat and drink with them of the old Paschal lamb that was but the figure, so is it none other to be thought but that in the instituting of this new Blessed Sacrament, the verity of that figure, he did himself eat and drink with them too. And that he so did indeed holy Saint Chrysostom declareth, which in an homily upon these words of Christ, Bibite ex hoc omnes (“Drink you of this all”), saith thus: Ne autem hoc audientes turbarentur, primum ipse sanguinem suum bibit, inducens eos sine turbatione in communionem mysteriorum (“Lest that they hearing that word should be troubled therewith, he drank his blood first himself, inducing them into the communion of the sacraments without abashment or trouble”).<sup>930</sup> Holy Saint Jerome also in his book against the great heretic Helvidius writeth in this wise: Sic igitur Dominus Iesus fuit conviva et convivium, ipse comedens et qui comeditur (“So therefore was our Lord Jesus both the guest and the feast. He was both the eater, and was also he that was eaten”).<sup>931</sup>

Now forasmuch as we shall somewhat farther enter into the treating of this Blessed Sacrament, let us pray him that hath instituted it that we may in such wise treat thereof that it may both in the writer and the reader stretch to<sup>932</sup> the fruit of their souls.

The Prayer

Our most dear Savior Christ, which after the finishing of the old Paschal sacrifice hast instituted the new sacrament of thine own blessed body and blood for a memorial of thy bitter Passion, give us such true faith therein and such fervent devotion thereto that our souls may take fruitful ghostly<sup>933</sup> food thereby.

The Second Lecture upon the Blessed Sacrament

So excellent is, good Christian readers, this holy Blessed Sacrament above all other, that neither is there any man able to enter, pierce,<sup>934</sup> and perceive so many great wonderful things as are to be noted therein, nor those that of the old holy doctors are already noted, and of all Christian regions already received and believed, able (as the dignity of the thing requireth) well to declare or worthily to speak of. For in this holy sacrament is the very body and the very blood of him of whom all other sacraments receive their virtue and strength. For it is (as you have heard of Christ’s own words) the selfsame sacred body of Christ, and the selfsame blessed blood of his, that was delivered and shed for our sin.

Now albeit that there are in diverse countries of Christendom some (and hard it is to find any country so fortunate as to be clear and clean without) that labor in this Blessed Sacrament to subvert the very true Christian faith—and would make men ween<sup>935</sup> that those plain words of Christ, “This is my body” (etc.), were otherwise meant than they were indeed, and that our Savior in his so saying did not affirm nor intend that the thing which he gave his apostles to eat and to drink was his very body and his very blood, but that they were still bread and wine which he called then (say they) by the names of his body and his blood because he would institute them for to stand as tokens of his body and his blood for perpetual remembrance of his Passion—albeit there lack not, I say, some that labor to bring good faithful folk out of the true belief into this erroneous mind, yet is it not my present purpose to dispute the matter with them but to show and set forth the truth before the eyes of the reader, that he may rather of the truth read, increase in faith, and conceive devotion, than with much time bestowed in the reading of their erroneous fallacies misoccupy his ears and heap up in his heart a dunghill of their devilish vanities.

Howbeit, somewhat of theirs is it, good readers, in my mind necessary that you know, to the intent you may the better beware of their wiliness. Three special engines<sup>936</sup> use these manner of folk with which they busily with all their might oppugn<sup>937</sup> the inexpugnable<sup>938</sup> person of our Savior Christ, enforcing themselves<sup>939</sup> by force to put out his glorious body out of the Blessed Sacrament.

First, using the name of sacrament of Christ’s body with us, whereby good simple folk would ween they meant as we do, they misuse the meaning of that word against us, and in corners<sup>940</sup> corrupt some well-minded men before they perceive the train<sup>941</sup> of their crafty purpose. For they make them ween that, since we call it all the Blessed Sacrament of Christ’s body and blood, therefore it is none other but a bare sacrament only, that is to wit, a token, a figure, a sign or memorial of his body and his blood crucified and shed, and not his own very body and his blood indeed.

Secondly, they say that those words of Christ may be well and conveniently expounded in such wise as they may serve to prove the sacrament a figure. And upon that they conclude that, since they may be so expounded conveniently by an allegory, there is no necessity to expound them otherwise, nor that those words should not be so taken and declared as to say that they signify that in the sacrament is Christ’s blessed body indeed.

<sup>939</sup> enforcing themselves: striving <sup>940</sup> in corners: in secluded places <sup>941</sup> deceit

Thirdly, they enforce that reason<sup>942</sup> with the expositions of old holy men, which have expounded those words in an allegory<sup>943</sup> sense and have in their writings called this blessed Holy Housel<sup>944</sup> by the name of a sacrament, a sign, a memorial, and a figure. By which words of those old holy saints those new folk labor to blear the unlearned reader's eye and make him therewith ween that those old holy men, in that they called it a sign, a token, or a figure, did well declare that they took it not for the very body indeed, for that body cannot be (they say) by no means a figure of itself.

These three are, I say, good reader, their three special darts. For I deny not but that they use more as the words of Scripture, whereby they would prove Christ's body not in earth because he said before his ascension to heaven that they should not have him here still in earth (but he meant of his corporal conversation<sup>945</sup> as they had him before), and where they would also by the words of Scripture prove the Blessed Sacrament bread (but the custom of the Scripture is so common in that point to call a thing, not as it is, but as it was, or as it seemeth, whereof I have told you an example or two before, that all the hold they can take thereof slippeth out of their hand).

I deny not also but that they lay against<sup>946</sup> the Sacrament and say that Christ's blessed body is not there, because they say it cannot. For it cannot be (they say) in so many places at once. But now since the truth is that himself saith it is there, and in his so saying so meant in very deed (as both before is proved and yet shall hereafter), all that reason of theirs (that it cannot be so) hath to any Christian man (that taketh Christ for God) no manner taste of any reason at all. For it standeth, you see, well upon this ground only, that God is not able to perform his word.

Therefore albeit that (as I say) they say such other things too, yet are those three things that I have rehearsed you<sup>947</sup> the special things, and in effect the only things, with which they have their special hope to deceive unlearned folk.

Now purpose I not yet, in this present treatise upon the Passion, to enter much in dispicions<sup>948</sup> with them upon these three points neither. For that thing would require a whole volume alone (the labor whereof, if God hereafter give me time and opportunity thereto, I purpose not to refuse); but I will in effect, for this while, only rehearse you some of those things that holy cunning<sup>949</sup> men before my days have of this holy Blessed Sacrament, concerning this matter, left us behind them in writing. Which things, if the reader diligently consider, shall (I trust) be able somewhat to serve and suffice him to spy the fallacies and soil<sup>950</sup> the subtleties of all those folks' false arguments and objections by himself.

Consider now, good readers, and remember that—since this excellent high Sacrament, under a form and likeness so common and so simple in sight, covertly containeth in it a wonderful secret treasure, and signifieth and betokeneth also manifold marvelous mysteries—the holy cunning fathers afore our days have had much ado to find names enough and convenient with which they might in any wise insinuate<sup>951</sup> and show so many such manner things of this Blessed Sacrament as are partly contained therein and partly signified thereby. And therefore, by the secret instinct<sup>952</sup> of the Spirit of God, by which the Catholic Church of Christ is in such things led and ruled, the old holy virtuous fathers have not only called (upon effectual causes)<sup>953</sup> this Holy Sacrament by sundry diverse names, to signify thereby sundry singular things thereof, but have also, for the same intent (upon diverse effectual respects that they saw and considered therein), called some two sundry things both by one common name.

For the better perceiving whereof, we must mark and consider that in this Blessed Sacrament there are two things actually and really contained: one that is a very bodily substance and that is the very blessed body and blood of our Savior himself; the other that is not any substance but accidents, that is to wit, those accidents that were before in the bread and wine (which bread and wine are converted by the almighty power of God into the very body and blood of Christ). Those accidents, I say, of whiteness, redness, hardness, softness, weight, savor, and taste, and such other like, remain and abide in the Blessed Sacrament, and by the mighty power of almighty God they remain without the body of which they be the accidents, which—while they be now neither accidents in the bread and wine (since bread or wine none is there), nor accidents unto the blessed body and blood of Christ (which two things are the only corporal substance that are there) and accidents are not naturally, nor the mind of a living man cannot well imagine how any accident can be but in a bodily substance whereunto it is accident and whereupon it dependeth — much folly were it therefore much to muse thereupon how, and in what wise, and wherein these accidents abide and are conserved. But that question with many such other more — wherewith a proud curious mind hath carried many a man out of faith — let us remit unto God. For as he only can make those miracles, so can he only tell how.

Now albeit that an accident, by a general manner of speaking, is a thing (since it is not nothing), and in such wise I mean by this word “a thing” when I say there are in the Blessed Sacrament two things; yet, forasmuch as the name of “sacrament” properly signifieth a sign or token, which betokeneth a holy thing, the “thing” of a sacrament is properly called that holy thing that the sacrament betokeneth — as in baptism the washing of the body with water, signifying the washing of the soul by grace, is properly the sacrament, and the washing of the soul from sin is called the “thing” of the sacrament, that is to say, the thing that the sacrament or sacramental sign (I mean the washing in the water) betokeneth.

Now in this Holy Sacrament of the altar (which hath, as reason is,<sup>954</sup> above all other sacraments sundry special prerogatives)<sup>955</sup> there are two sacraments or sacramental signs of sundry kinds: the one an outward sacrament or sacramental sign sensible (as baptism hath, and confirmation, and the other four), the other an inward sacrament or sacramental sign unsensible,<sup>956</sup> which none of the remnant<sup>957</sup> have. The outward sensible sacrament or sacramental sign is the form of bread and the form of wine. The inward sacrament and sacramental sign unsensible is the very blessed body of Christ under that form of bread and the very blessed blood of Christ under the form of wine.

Now are there likewise in this Blessed Sacrament (above the nature also of all the other six) two things of the sacrament, or two sacramental things — that is to wit, two things that are by the two sacramental signs betokened. And those two things, though they be both secret and unsensible, yet are they of diverse sundry kinds too. For the one is both by the sacrament (that is to wit, by the sacramental sign) signified and also in the sacrament contained. The other is only by the sacrament signified, but in the sacrament it is not contained. The thing of the sacrament that is both signified and contained is the very body and the very blood of our Savior himself, therein actually and really present. The thing of this Blessed Sacrament that is signified thereby and not contained therein is the unity or society of all good holy folk in the mystical body of Christ.

For this must we now first understand, that the first kind of sacrament that we spoke of (that is to wit, the outward sacramental signs) be sacraments (that is to wit, signs and tokens) of both these two sacramental things: that is to wit, of the very natural body of Christ that is in the sacrament contained, and also of the society of all saints in the mystical body of Christ that is not contained in it but signified and betokened by it. For the outward sacramental signs (that is to wit, the form of bread and wine) betoken the very natural body and blood of Christ being in the Sacrament. For as the holy doctors declare, likewise as bread specially refresheth and sustaineth the body — whereof the Scripture saith, Panis confirmat cor hominis<sup>958</sup> (“Bread strengthens a man’s heart”) — and wine gladdeth the heart — whereof the Scripture saith also, Vinum laetificat cor hominis<sup>959</sup> — so the very blessed body and blood of Christ in the Sacrament, received worthily,<sup>960</sup> doth specially above all other sacraments refresh, make strong, and confirm the soul in grace, and so fulfilleth in some good folk the soul with spiritual consolation that the soul is in a certain manner of a heavenly drunkenness. In proof whereof our Savior saith of his body in the Sacrament, Panis quem ego dabo caro mea est; qui manducat hunc panem vivet in aeternum (“The bread that I shall give is my flesh; he that eateth this bread shall live everlastingly”).<sup>961</sup> And of his blessed blood in the Sacrament he saith by the mouth of the prophet, Calix meus inebrians quam praeclarus est? (“My cup that maketh men drunk, how noble it is?”)<sup>962</sup>

These outward sacramental signs (the form of bread and wine) do also signify and betoken unto us the other sacramental thing (or the other thing

of the Sacrament), that is to wit, that thing of the sacrament that is signified by the Sacrament but not contained therein — that is to wit, the society of all saints in the mystical body of Christ. For likewise as the bread, which is in this Holy Sacrament turned into Christ's very body (of which bread the form still remaineth), was made of many corns<sup>963</sup> of wheat into one loaf and the wine that is converted into his blessed blood (of which wine the form remaineth) was made of many grapes flowing into one wine, so be all holy saints gathered together in one, into the unity of Christ's holy mystical body, as Saint Paul toucheth in his epistle to the Corinthians, saying, Unus panis et unum corpus multi sumus; omnes qui de uno pane, et de uno calice participamus ("We many be one bread and one body, as many as be partakers of one bread and one cup").<sup>964</sup>

The other kind of sacrament or sacramental sign (that is to wit, the sacrament or sacramental sign secret and unsensible)<sup>965</sup> is, I say, the very natural body and blood of our Savior in the form of bread and wine. For his very body and his very blood in these forms so known and seen unto us, not by our senses but by the truth of our faith, do betoken and represent unto us the selfsame body and the selfsame blood crucified and shed upon the cross. For our Savior at his Last Supper, at the institution of the Blessed Sacrament, did ordain, institute, and appoint them to signify, betoken, and represent unto his Church under those forms the selfsame body crucified and the selfsame blood also shed for remission of man's sins at his bitter Passion.

And therefore when our Savior gave his blessed body in form of bread unto his apostles, saying unto them, Hoc est corpus meum, quod pro vobis tradetur and hic est sanguis meus qui pro vobis et multis effundetur in remissionem peccatorum ("This is my body, which shall be delivered for you;<sup>966</sup> this is my blood, which for you and for many shall be shed into remission of sins"),<sup>967</sup> he said unto them farther, Hoc facite in meam commemorationem ("This do ye in the remembrance of me").<sup>968</sup> So that there we may see that he there instituted the same body of his that should be delivered for us unto death and the same blood that should be shed for our sins to be in his Church continually consecrated and celebrated as a monument and a memorial representing to us himself.

Now in what wise those secret invisible sacraments (his own very natural blessed body and blood) under those visible sacraments (those forms of bread and wine) should signify, betoken, and represent unto us himself (that is to say, the same body and blood in their proper form), the apostle explaineth in the eleventh chapter of his first epistle to the Corinthians, saying, Quotiescumque manducabitis panem hunc et calicem bibetis, mortem Domini annunciabitis donec veniat ("As often as you shall eat this bread and drink this cup, you shall show the death of our Lord till he come").<sup>969</sup> Here we see that, whereas our Savior in his own words ordained his own very body and blood in the Sacrament to signify, betoken, and represent himself unto our remembrance, Saint Paul showeth here that it is the remembrance of him as in his Passion; and so betoken his body and his blood in the Sacrament the selfsame body in his<sup>970</sup> own likeness hanging on the cross and the selfsame blood in the proper likeness on the same shed for our sin. The selfsame insensible<sup>971</sup> Sacrament also, the natural body of Christ that is under the sensible sacrament of bread, signifieth and betokeneth the other aforesaid sacramental thing, that is to wit, the society of saints. For like as the natural body of Christ is many members in one natural body, so is that society of saints many lively<sup>972</sup> members in the unity of Christ's mystical body.

And thus we see, good Christian readers, that the outward sensible sacraments (the forms of bread and wine) be in such wise figures, tokens, and sacramental signs, that they be only sacramental signs and not sacramental things. And on the other side, the secret sacramental thing which is both by the outward sensible sacraments and by the secret unsensible sacraments signified and not contained (that is to wit, the society of saints in the unity of Christ's body mystical) is only the thing of the sacrament, or the sacramental thing, and not a sacramental sign, neither sensible nor unsensible (for it is signified only and signifieth not). But the very natural body and blood of Christ, in the form of bread and wine, be both sacramental signs, because they signify, and also sacramental things, because they be signified.

5 Yet must we further know that, albeit we speak only of the blessed body and blood of Christ, that are verily present in form of bread and wine, yet is there with them the soul of our Savior also. For his blessed body and blood in the Sacrament, though
10 they seem dead—for the more full representation and figuring of the same body and blood remaining dead on the cross after his holy soul given up to the Father, whereby his bitter Passion was fully performed and finished—yet be they not dead in the 15 Sacrament, but quick<sup>973</sup> and animated with his blissful soul, which after the return thereof and copulation<sup>974</sup> again with his immortal and impassible body never departed after from it nor never shall.

There is with it also, beside his blessed soul, his 20 almighty Godhead. For the Godhead from the first time of his incarnation never departed neither from the soul nor from the body. But when they two were by death departed<sup>975</sup> and severed asunder, the Godhead—that is to wit, the almighty natural Son
25 of the almighty Father, the second person in Trinity (of which Father and Son the third almighty person of the coeternal Trinity proceeded)—was still in unity of person, both with the blessed soul delivering the old fathers in hell, and with the body lying 30 dead in the sepulcher too.

Moreover, albeit that the blessed blood is consecrated severally under the form of wine, to signify and represent unto us that in the Passion (of which the Blessed Sacrament is a memorial) the blood was 35 severed from the body, yet is there in the Blessed Sacrament both the blood with the body that is in the form of bread, and the body with the blood that is under form of wine—that is to wit, the body (under the form of bread) immediately, as by the form
40 of bread most specially signified, and the blood by concomitance, because the body is never without it; and likewise, under the form of wine the blessed blood immediately, because there by that form of 45 wine the blood is chiefly signified, and the whole blessed body is there with it by concomitance, because that the blood, since his glorious resurrection, never was, nor is, nor never shall be separate from his whole blessed body.

If men ask then the question, what we may think of the holy blood of Christ out of the Sacrament, continually kept and honored in diverse places and 50 with many great miracles approved,<sup>976</sup> me thinketh it may be answered in two manner wise without any peril of our faith. For I see no necessity to say that all the blood that Christ had in his body
55 at any time here in earth is in his body now. And so may some part of his very holy blood that hath been sometimes in his blessed body be now remaining in earth. And also, since his blessed body may be where it will, his very glorious blood may be by miracle 60 in sundry places sensible, where it pleaseth himself, and his blessed body invisible also therewith.

In a crucifix striken,<sup>977</sup> God may also create new blood, which is none of his. And over this, the blissful soul of Christ and his almighty Godhead also be 65 both twain,<sup>978</sup> I say, not immediately contained in the Sacrament, because they be neither immediately signified by those sensible sacramental signs (the forms of bread and wine), nor be there as secret unsensible signs appointed to signify any other things
70 (as the blessed body and the blood be), but be therefore there by concomitance, because from the body and the blood neither the soul nor the Godhead is at no time since the resurrection asunder.

And by concomitance are there also both the Father and the Holy Ghost. For since the Godhead of the Son and the Godhead of them both is all one 75 self<sup>979</sup> Godhead, neither of them both can be severed from him, but it must needs be that where he is, there be they both, not only by a general manner of being (by which each of them is ever with any of 80 all the things that they have created), but also by that special manner of being by which (whatsoever manner that be) any of those three persons is with himself, except the only personal distinction.<sup>980</sup> It
85 seemeth also that by concomitance, though not a concomitance following of like necessity (yet by a certain concomitance following of convenient congruity), there is everywhere evermore about this Blessed Sacrament a glorious heavenly company 90 of blessed angels and saints, as diverse holy doctors declare.

973 living 974 union 975 separated distinction: except that the distinction among the persons remains (Thus, the Father is with the Son as the Son is with himself, except that the Father is a distinct person from the Son, whereas the Son is not personally distinct from himself.)

Now forasmuch as under any of the two outward sensible sacraments (the forms either of the bread or the wine) the whole inward unsensible sacrament (the very body and blood of Christ) is, as I have showed you, verily and fully contained, and also under every part thereof (be it divided into never so many), therefore whosoever worthily do receive his Holy Housel<sup>981</sup> under any one of those two forms only<sup>982</sup> doth verily and sufficiently receive both the blessed body and blood of our Savior and therewith his blessed soul and his Godhead too, yea, and all the whole Trinity together. And albeit that of old time lay people did commonly receive their Housel under both the forms, yet always from the beginning did they sometime receive it some under the one form and some under the other alone, as by the old writings of the old holy saints it doth in diverse places appear. Howbeit,<sup>983</sup> when they received their Housel under the one kind alone, it was most commonly under the form of bread, because that under that form it was most able both to be carried without peril of spilling and longest to be kept without peril of turning.<sup>984</sup>

Upon which thing so long ago begun and used, it came to that point afterward that for diverse inconveniences,<sup>985</sup> which many times mishapped<sup>986</sup> in the blessed blood under the form of wine when the common people were houseled<sup>987</sup> under both the forms, the whole people through<sup>988</sup> Christendom fell in a custom uniform all in one fashion to receive their holy housel (that is to wit, the very whole body of Christ and blood both) under the form of bread only — of which custom no man hath heard or read any beginning, which thing alone may well suffice to make indifferent<sup>989</sup> men perceive that it began even forthwith<sup>990</sup> after Christ's death and that the leefulness<sup>991</sup> thereof was known and taught by the tradition of the apostles themselves. For surely if it had not been known for leeful of old, the whole people of all Christendom would never have taken it up of new,<sup>992</sup> being a thing of neither pleasure nor winning, nor being nothing forced unto it (for law was there none made to command it).

Howbeit, when that the country of Boheme, falling into many heresies, began not only to do the contrary, receiving it under both the forms (wherein the body of Christendom would not have sticked to suffer<sup>993</sup> them as a thing leeful to them that would),<sup>994</sup> but also took upon them farther to reprove and reproach for damnable the common long-continued custom of the whole corps<sup>995</sup> of Christendom — upon this demeanor of theirs, the general Council of Constance<sup>996</sup> condemned in their so doing their over-arrogant error. For upon that point of theirs, if the whole body of Christendom may damnably be deceived in matter concerning our faith or the use of the sacraments, then followeth there an inevitable confusion and nothing can there in the Catholic Church be sure: neither tradition, law, custom, nor Scripture — neither to know how it is to be understood nor yet so much as which the very books be, as holy Saint Augustine (against the great heretics the Manichees) doth very clearly declare.<sup>997</sup>

Now is this custom (and long was, ere their heresies began in Boheme) so universal that neither lay nor priest, man nor woman, good nor bad, either otherwise used<sup>998</sup> in receiving the Holy Housel beside<sup>999</sup> the Mass or anything repugned<sup>1</sup> thereat. Howbeit, though (as I say) this guise<sup>2</sup> and custom was universal both with lay people and priests, in being houseled of<sup>3</sup> another man's hand (as the priests be themselves always, save only when they say Mass), yet did there never priest in the Mass use to consecrate in the one form alone. And the cause is because that in the Mass the Blessed Sacrament is (as the old holy doctors all with one voice agree, and all the corps of Christendom with them from the apostles' days) not only a sacrament but also a sacrifice that by the offering of the body and blood of Christ (under the forms of bread and wine upon the altar) representeth the sacrifice in which the selfsame body and blood in their own proper form was offered upon the cross.

And therefore, albeit that in each of the two forms is the whole sacrament, both for the thing that it signifieth and for the thing that it containeth, yet under the one kind only was it never used to offer that holy sacrifice, but under the both twain together, that the thing should be correspondent unto the figure (for this holy sacrifice was forefigured in the offering of Melchizedek,<sup>4</sup> that offered both bread and wine).

Yet is there also put into the wine, before the consecration, a little water always, whereof we find no word written in the Gospel, nor any plain place in all the Scripture for it. And yet may it not be leefully<sup>5</sup> left out, as all the old holy doctors teach us. And diverse causes they lay<sup>6</sup> of that institution,<sup>7</sup> partly for that out of the holy heart of Christ, when it was pierced with the spear, there issued both blood and water.<sup>8</sup> And some allege that it is done for to signify the joining of the people with Christ (for, as it appeareth in the Apocalypse, by water is signified people).<sup>9</sup> And finally, some holy saints say that it is done because that our Savior himself, at his Maundy, tempered his wine with water. And all these may be good causes, with the truth and the will of God well-known. But else I verily believe that no good man (upon any of these considerations or any other), when he should consecrate, would presume or adventure<sup>10</sup> to put water into his wine—where the Gospel of the institution<sup>11</sup> speaketh of no water at all (but only of wine alone)—and therefore it well and clearly appeareth, both by this point and diverse other more (as in the very words and manner of consecration), the rites and the manner of this Holy Sacrament were more at large showed and more fully taught by Christ’s apostles by mouth than afterward written by their pen.

And so appeareth it also by Saint Paul, which first taught it the Corinthians without any book written thereof; and, after writing them somewhat thereof, saith yet finally, Caetera cum venero ipse disponam (“The remnant I will order when I come myself”).<sup>12</sup> And never wrote he those orders after<sup>13</sup> that he took farther at his coming, as far as ever I could hear proved. Origen saith also (and diverse other old holy doctors) that many things of the Mass were taught by the apostles by tradition, without writing, by mouth.<sup>14</sup> Saint Denis also, in his book De Ecclesiastica hierarchia, saith that the apostles taught the manner of consecrating in the Mass by mouth.<sup>15</sup>

Now because of these wonderful things, and many other wherein this most Blessed Sacrament so far excelleth all other, as that sacrament that not only signifieth and betokeneth but also verily and really containeth the holy and blessed blood of him of whom all the other sacraments take their strength (for he is, as I have said, not only man but also God, and with his holy body and blood is also his holy soul, and with both his body and soul joined his unseparable Godhead, and of him his Father and their Holy Spirit is all one Godhead and therefore there present all three)—for these causes, I say, for which this Blessed Sacrament so many manner ways differeth from all other, the old holy doctors have accustomed to speak of this Holy Sacrament in diverse wise and, to signify and insinuate thereby the diverse properties thereof, by sundry diverse names have been accustomed to call it.

Whereas the sacrament of baptism is not called “the sacrament” alone but “the sacrament of baptism,” nor any of the remnant<sup>16</sup> without the addition of their own proper name (as the sacrament of confirmation, the sacrament of penance, and so forth the remnant), only this Blessed Sacrament is called and known by the name of “Sacrament” alone, signifying and showing thereby that this Blessed Sacrament is the most excellent and of all holy sacraments the chief. And that I see not why it were, if it were not (as it is) the very body of Christ, for the sacrament of baptism is unto salvation of more necessity than it, and the sacrament of penance too.

This Blessed Sacrament of the body and blood of Christ is called also distinctly by the name of either form, Sacramentum Panis et Sacramentum Vini (“the Sacrament of Bread and the Sacrament of Wine”), because that the form of bread betokeneth and immediately containeth the one, and the form of wine the other. And albeit that they be indeed two distinct sacraments (that is to wit, both two distinct sacramental outward signs, for neither is the form of bread the form of wine, nor the form of wine the form of bread, and two distinct sacramental inward signs too), and two distinct sacramental things also, of that kind of thing that is contained therein (for neither is the body the blood, nor the blood the body), yet is all together called by the name of “the Blessed Sacrament” in the singular number, Sacramentum altaris (“the Sacrament of the altar”); and yet is it never used at the altar but in both the forms. But for because that the very real thing that is contained under both those forms is one entire body—that is to wit, the very lively, natural, glorious body of our Savior Christ himself, to the integrity whereof the blood of the same pertaineth, and whereof it is now an inseparable part—5 which blessed body and blood (though they, being in the Sacrament under several forms, severally do signify and therefore be well and with good reason called several sacraments) be yet never severally separate asunder indeed; therefore to give us knowledge that all that is really contained in both these sacramental forms is one very real thing—that is to wit, the very blessed one entire body of Christ—all the whole, under the both forms together, is called 10 by the name of “the Sacrament of the altar” in the singular number.

It is called Sacramentum Panis (“the Sacrament of Bread”) and it is called also Panis (that is to say, “Bread”) because that of bread it was consecrated and that, after the bread converted and turned into the body of Christ, the form and accidents of the bread abide and remain (as I before have showed you that in Scripture a man is called “earth” because he was made of the earth, and in the Scripture Moses’s yard<sup>17</sup> was called still a “yard” when it was turned from a dead yard into a quick serpent that devoured all the serpents that the witches of Egypt had by their enchantment brought forth before Pharaoh their king). But yet, lest the naming it 20 “Bread” might make some men ween<sup>18</sup> it were but bread indeed, it is called also plainly by the name of the thing that it is indeed, the Body and Blood of our Lord.

It is also called Sacramentum Communionis (“the Sacrament of Communion”) because that the thing that all the sacraments or sacramental signs (both outward signs and inward, both sensible and unsensible) do signify is, as I showed you, the communion—that is to wit, the union together—of all holy 30 saints in one society, as lively members in the mystical body of Christ. It is also called not only “the Sacrament of Communion” but over that the “Communion” itself, which is called in Latin Communio and Synaxis in the Greek. And this Blessed Sacrament is called the Communion—that is to say, the union or gathering together in one—because that this sacrament doth not only signify that communion but that the very real thing that is in this

Blessed Sacrament (beside the signification thereof) doth also effectually make<sup>19</sup> it. For the blessed person of our Savior Christ, being verily both God and 50 man, doth as God, of his almighty power, by his manhead as by his instrument (not an instrument dead and separate as are all his other sacraments, but by his instrument lively, quick, conjoined, unied,<sup>20</sup> 55 and forever unseparable), in special manner—by grace that he giveth with the joining of his own holy body and blood unto them that effectually receive it—doth work, I say, this wonderful work of this communion of men together with God.

And over this, our Savior, that is in the Sacrament, is not only the worker of this communion, but, since that this communion is a gathering together of all saints into his own mystical body, this Holy Sacrament therefore, in which his own very 65 body is, may be well called the communion. And so by their calling this Blessed Sacrament by the name of Communion, the old holy doctors and all the congregation of all Christian people have and do put every man and woman of the same congregation in remembrance that in that Blessed Sacrament is the very body and blood, and by concomitance (as I have before declared) the very whole 70 person, of our sovereign Lord and almighty Savior Christ, from whom (as I have said) neither his almighty Father nor their almighty Spirit either is or can be sundered.

This Blessed Sacrament is also called Eucharistia, which in the Greek tongue signifieth “giving of thanks,” to put us in remembrance how high hearty 80 thanks we be bounden of duty to give unto God for this inestimable benefit. This Holy Sacrament is also called Sacrificium (“the sacrifice”) because it is, as I have told you, the only sacrifice betaken<sup>21</sup> by Christ unto his Christian Church, instead of the old Paschal (which was the figure thereof), to be offered up while the world standeth:<sup>22</sup> instead of flesh and blood of beasts, the very flesh and blood of our Savior himself, immortal and impassible under the forms of bread and wine, representing the most acceptable sacrifice of the same flesh and blood offered up, once forever, mortal and passible<sup>23</sup> upon the cross at his bitter Passion.

This Holy Sacrament is also called of the old holy doctors Cena Dominica (“the Supper of our Lord”), 95 by which name there are signified unto us two things. One is the excellency of this Blessed Sacrament, this new very Paschal lamb, the sacred body of our Savior himself, over and above the old Paschal lamb of the Jews. For that Paschal being but 5 the figure, and this of that figure the verity, the figure passed<sup>24</sup> and finished, this only<sup>25</sup> verity—the blessed body and blood of Christ—beareth now the name alone of the Supper of our Lord to signify the other to be nothing in the respect of<sup>26</sup> this. The 10 other thing which that name signifieth and representeth unto us is the verity of the blessed body and blood of Christ in the Sacrament. For it is called the Supper of our Lord to put us in mind and to let us know that it is not another thing but the self-

 15 same thing that our Lord gave there to his apostles: not another supper, but the selfsame Supper. For his body is the selfsame body now that it was then, and his blessed blood the selfsame in like wise, and that was the supper that he last gave unto them after the 20 Paschal lamb eaten.<sup>27</sup> And that selfsame body and blood is the thing that he giveth us. And therefore is it called the Supper of our Lord, to let us (as I say) perceive that the thing that we receive at God's board now is the very selfsame thing that the apostles 25 received then, and that is not the same bread and the same wine that were then turned but the very selfsame body and blood into which they were then turned.

Finally, beside yet diverse other names diversely 30 signifying the manifold great graces thereof, it is, as I have said, both by the Scripture and all the holy doctors plainly and clearly called by the proper name of the thing that indeed it is, that is to wit, Corpus Domini et Sanguis Domini (“the Body and 35 Blood of our Lord”).

And likewise as by all these names afore-rehearsed, and yet other more, for the cause above-remembered, this Blessed Sacrament is called by the 40 old holy doctors and all the corps of Christendom, not in Latin only and in Greek, but in other vulgar tongues too, so in our English tongue is it also called the “Holy Housel”—which name of “housel” doth not only signify unto us the blessed body and blood
 45 of our Lord in the sacramental form, but also, like as this English word “God” signifieth unto us not only the unity of the Godhead but also the Trinity of the three Persons, and not only their supersubstantial<sup>28</sup>

substance but also every gracious property (as justice, mercy, truth, almightiness, eternity, and every good thing more than we can imagine), so doth 50 unto us English folk this English word “housel” though not express, yet imply and under a reverent devout silence signify both the sacramental signs and the sacramental things, as well the things contained as the things holly signified, with all the secret unsearchable mysteries of the same. All which 55 holy things right many persons—very little learned, but yet in grace godly minded, with heart humble and religious, not arrogant, proud, and curious—under the name of Holy Housel, with inward heavenly comfort, do full devoutly reverence, as many a good, poor, simple, unlearned soul honoreth God
 60 full devoutly under the name of God that cannot yet tell such a tale of God as some great clerks can that are yet for lack of like devotion nothing near so 65 much in God's grace and favor.

Here have I, good Christian readers, rehearsed you some of those many names by which, for the manifold mysteries contained therein and signified 70 thereby, this Blessed Sacrament is called. And this have I done to the intent that if it hap<sup>29</sup> you at any time hereafter to hear or read any of these things that are said or written by them that use of some of these names to take occasion of oppugning<sup>30</sup> the 75 truth, you may have ready before, at your hand, the fallacy of their sophism soiled.<sup>31</sup> As for example, because it is called (as it is indeed) the sacrament of Christ's body—that is to wit, a figure, a token, or a representation of his body—they labor to make 80 men ween<sup>32</sup> that it cannot be his very body indeed. But I have here before showed you in what wise it is a sacrament and doth betoken, and in what wise it is the thing of the sacrament and is betokened.

Howbeit, where we say that the very body in the form of bread betokeneth and representeth unto us 85 the selfsame body in his own proper form hanging upon the cross, they say that nothing can be a figure or a token of itself, which thing I marvel much that any man taketh for so strange. For if there were 90 but even in a play or an interlude<sup>33</sup> the personages of two or three known princes represented, if one of them now liked for his pleasure to play his own part himself, did he not there, his own person under the form of a player, represent his own person in form of his own estate? Our Savior (as Saint Augustine saith), walking with his two disciples toward the castle<sup>34</sup> of Emmaus in form of a wayfaring man, betokened and was a figure of himself in form

 5 of his own person glorified, going out of the corporal conversation of this world by his wonderful ascension unto heaven.<sup>35</sup> And in like wise our Savior, appearing to Mary Magdalene in the form of a gardener, was a figure of himself in his own proper
 10 form, planting the faith and other virtues in the garden of our souls.<sup>36</sup>

Now as you see, good readers, that these folk trifle in this point, so do they (as earnest and as great as the matter is) but in a manner utterly trifle in the 15 remnant. As (for another example) because the Sacrament is called in Scripture “bread,” they say it is bread indeed. And surely if that argument be so sure as they would have it seem, the selfsame reason must of reason<sup>37</sup> serve sufficiently (since it is in 20 Scripture as plainly called “flesh”) to drive them to grant that it is very flesh indeed. Howbeit indeed, the most part of these that are fallen from the right belief of the Sacrament are not yet in that point fallen fully so foul but that they let<sup>38</sup> not to confess 25 that in the Blessed Sacrament is Christ’s very flesh indeed. But then say they that it is very bread too. Howbeit, the custom of Scripture in calling it bread though it be not bread, that have I twice touched before.

But then say the other sort (the far worse sort again) if the calling it bread in Scripture prove it not bread indeed, then by the same reason the calling 30 it flesh in Scripture proveth it not flesh indeed. To that we say that, if it were but a bare word spoken, it might be taken for an allegory or some other trope
 35 or figure of common speaking. But in this point so many things in Scripture agree together upon the very thing, that it is very clear and plain that in calling it bread the Scripture meaneth not that it
 40 is bread, but calleth it by the name that it did bear before and that it seemeth still. But in calling it the body of Christ, though it useth (as it doth in many places) an allegorical sense besides, yet appeareth it, I say, plain upon<sup>39</sup> the circumstances that the Scrip-
 45 ture meaneth that it is the very blessed body of our Savior himself indeed. To this say they again, “Yea, but we can and do conster<sup>40</sup> all those texts another way with an allegory<sup>41</sup> sense and prove by the old doctors that our exposition is true.”

To this we answer them and say, if you conster
 50 all those texts diverse other good ways with your allegories — so that<sup>42</sup> you do not with any of those ways take away the true sense of the letter — we will not withstand<sup>43</sup> your allegories but will well allow them, for the old holy doctors did the same. But on 55 the other side, if with any of your allegorical expositions you deny the very literal sense beside, and say that the body of our Savior is not really under the form of bread in the Sacrament, then say we that in 60 your such expounding you plain expound it false. For we say that such manner of your expositions is plain against the very sentence and the meaning of the text. And we say that in this point you report the old holy doctors untruly. For all the holy 65 doctors and saints from the apostles’ days to your own declare the Scripture clear against you. I will not here enter into the declaring of all the places of Scripture, by which places (opened and explained with the circumstances of the letter) good Christian 70 people may well and plainly perceive that the very meaning of the Scripture is against these folk and proveth plain for the Catholic Church. For that were both a very long work and also a digression somewhat too long from my present purpose, which is only to declare those words that I
 75 have already declared — that is to wit, the words of our Savior himself, rehearsed by the three foresaid evangelists, Saint Matthew, Saint Mark, and Saint Luke, and spoken by our Savior at the institution of this Blessed Sacrament — and not to declare here
 80 all his other words that he spoke thereof before — rehearsed in the sixth chapter of Saint John, where he said, Panis quem ego dabo vobis caro mea est pro mundi vita (“The bread that I shall give you is my flesh for the life of the world”)<sup>44</sup> and Caro mea vere
 85 est cibus, et sanguis meus vere est potus (“My flesh is verily meat and my blood is verily drink”),<sup>45</sup> with many more plain words further — nor to declare the words of Saint Paul either — where he saith in the eleventh chapter of the first epistle to the Corin-90 thians, Dominus Iesus in qua nocte tradebatur, accepit panem et gratias agens fregit et dixit: Accipite et manducate; hoc est corpus meum quod pro vobis tradetur (“Our Lord Jesus in the same night that he

But yet to the intent you shall see that in the fore-said exposition of those words of our Savior at the institution of the Blessed Sacrament, where he calleth it his own body and his own blood, I have not told you a tale of mine own head, but that the old holy doctors and saints, contrary to these new men’s tale, do plainly declare the same and plainly do affirm that in the Blessed Sacrament is the very body and blood of our Savior Christ himself, I shall rehearse you the plain words of some of them.<sup>50</sup>

Here have you, good Christian readers, heard the very plain open words of diverse of the old holy doctors, by which we may plainly perceive and see that they were of the selfsame belief of old that we be now, and which hath ever been the belief of Christ’s whole Church since the institution of the Blessed Sacrament unto this day. And many years was it ere ever any man began to doubt, but that as well Catholics as all other that were yet in sundry other points heretics agreed together all in one that in this Blessed Sacrament is the very body and the very blood of Christ. For like as it was known to the apostles by the teaching of our Savior Christ himself, and so forth<sup>51</sup> unto the primitive Church or congregation of Christian people that were gathered together in many parts of the world in the apostles’ days, so was the selfsame truth taught by the apostles themselves, first fully and thoroughly by mouth and tradition, or delivery without writing, and afterward by writing conveniently also. Of the understanding of which writing there could at that time no doubt or debate arise, forasmuch as the whole people knew the truth of the thing before the writing of the apostles and evangelists, by the faith that the apostles and evangelists had taught them before by mouth.

And so using and teaching the sacraments, and understanding without any difficulty the words of the Scripture therein, by their foretaught<sup>52</sup> and from time to time kept and continued faith, lived in unity and concord of belief concerning this Blessed Sacrament, no man gainsaying<sup>53</sup> the very blessed body and blood to be therein, even after that many folk were fallen in many other points from the true Catholic faith. And this appeareth very plain, by that we see both<sup>54</sup> Saint Irenaeus confound the Valentinians, and Saint Hilarius confound the Arians, and Saint Augustine confound the Manichees, by certain arguments grounded upon the verity of the very body and blood of our blessed Savior in this Holy Sacrament, which had been, you wot<sup>55</sup> well, nothing to the purpose if those three sects of heretics had not agreed with those three holy saints, and with the Catholic Church, that in the Sacrament is the very body and blood of Christ.

Howbeit, after that began there some (among their other heresies) to fall then unto some of these concerning the Blessed Sacrament. For when men began once to take the bridle in the teeth and run forth at rovers<sup>56</sup> out of the common trade<sup>57</sup> of the foretaught and received—and by the whole Catholic Church believed and professed—faith, then could there not, nor yet can, with such manner of folk the letter of Holy Scripture be any bridle to refrain them back. For setting the authority of the whole corps of the known Catholic Church at nought<sup>58</sup> and challenging<sup>59</sup> the Spirit of God from the same, and ascribing that Holy Spirit, some to such a known church of heretics as themselves assigned, and the more part of them ascribing that Spirit to an only<sup>60</sup> unknown church, and challenging yet nevertheless (contrary to their own position) the truth of understanding and interpreting of Holy Scripture (to which they confessed the inspiration of that Holy Spirit requisite) every man of them to himself—using<sup>61</sup> (I say) themselves in this wise, the Scripture could not hold them. For they would and did (and yet such folk do) deny for Scripture which books of Scripture they list,<sup>62</sup> and such as they list to receive, interpret and conster<sup>63</sup> as they list. By reason whereof at sundry times sundry heresies sprung<sup>64</sup> and spread abroad, and—with great trouble of the good Catholic folk, and great decay of the true Catholic folk, and eternal destruction of their souls that took those wrong ways—flowered for a little while. Howbeit,<sup>65</sup> our Lord (laud and thanks be to him) ever provided with his Holy Spirit that all these heresies were in short space by his Catholic Church condemned and suppressed. And so hath his Catholic faith in his Catholic Church, as well in this article of the Blessed Sacrament as in all the remnant, this fifteen hundred year continued and ever continue shall while this world last, what wrestling soever the infidels shall make with it.

Howbeit, men may gather upon the Scripture that, like as Christendom hath now in some place lost many lands and in some other win<sup>66</sup> many lands again, so shall it be, after the faith spread<sup>67</sup> so full round about it, that there shall be no land in any part thereof (in which part people are dwelling) but that they shall have heard of the name and faith of Christ. Which was not all done (as Saint Augustine saith) in the time of the apostles themselves, but, like these words of Christ (saith Saint Augustine), Qui vos audit, me audit (“He that heareth you, heareth me”),<sup>68</sup> though they were spoken only to the apostles, were not yet only meant for the apostles’ persons only but spoken to them in the name of the Church as governors for the same—and therefore to those governors of the Church also as to the world’s end should succeed in their places—so this prophecy of In omnem terram exiit sonus eorum, et in fines orbis terrae verba eorum (“Into all the world is gone out the sound of them, and into the ends of the roundel<sup>69</sup> of the earth the words of them”),<sup>70</sup> which words were written by the prophet David many years ere the apostles were born (and yet prophesied by the verb of the pretertemp<sup>71</sup>, or time past, to signify that the thing prophesied should as surely succeed and be verified as though it were past already), were not meant that the thing should be fully performed by their own persons, but part in one time, part in other, by such as the governors of the Catholic Church, which should succeed in their places, should in times and opportunity convenient<sup>72</sup> send forth about it and appoint thereunto.

But afterward, when it is all preached round about upon all parts of the earth, the time shall come when it shall so sore decay again, and the Church by persecution so straited<sup>73</sup> into so narrow a corner, that, in respect of<sup>74</sup> the countries into which Christendom hath been and shall be dilated and spread before, it shall seem that there shall be then no Christian countries left at all. Whereof our Savior said, Quum venerit filius hominis, putas inveniet fidem in terra? (“When the Son of man shall come—that is to wit, at the day of doom to judge the world—trowest<sup>75</sup> thou that he shall find faith in the earth?”)<sup>76</sup> But that time shall be but short, for our Savior saith, Propter electos breviabuntur dies illi;<sup>77</sup> and then shall our Lord come soon after, and finish this present world, and reward every good man after his good works wrought in his true Catholic faith: Reddet unicuique secundum opera sua (“He shall yield every man according to his works”).<sup>78</sup> But yet such works we must understand as are wrought in faith, for as Saint Paul saith, Sine fide impossibile est placere Deo (“Without faith it is impossible to please God”).<sup>79</sup>

But finally this Catholic faith of the presence of Christ’s very body and blood in the Blessed Sacrament hath, as I have showed, been the faith of Christ’s whole Catholic Church ever since Christ’s first institution thereof until this present time, and ever shall be while the world endureth. Whereagainst<sup>80</sup> whoso wrestleth cannot fail in conclusion to take a very foul fall, as far down—except he repent—as from the place that he walketh on in the earth into the deep pit of hell, from which fall our Lord of his goodness defend every Christian man.

The Third Lecture of the Sacrament

I have in the first lecture, good readers, expounded you the words of our Savior at the institution of the Blessed Sacrament. And after have I in the second showed you somewhat of the sacramental signs and of the sacramental things that are either contained therein or signified thereby, and have also somewhat rehearsed you the very words of the old holy doctors, whereby we may plainly perceive that the old holy saints believed the presence of the very body and blood of Christ in the Blessed Sacrament in like wise as we do.

Now is it convenient<sup>81</sup> that we somewhat speak in what manner wise we ought to use<sup>82</sup> ourselves in the receiving. We must understand that of this Holy Sacrament there are three manners of receiving. For some folk receive it only sacramentally, and some only spiritually, and some receive it both.

Only sacramentally do they receive it which receive the Blessed Sacrament unworthily. For they verily receive the very body and blood of our blessed Savior into their body in the Blessed Sacrament in form of bread out of<sup>83</sup> the Mass, or in form of bread and wine in the Mass. For as holy Saint Augustine saith of the false traitor Judas, though he was naught<sup>84</sup> and received it at the Maundy to his damnation, yet was it our Lord's body that he received.<sup>85</sup> But because they receive it in deadly sin—that is to wit, either in will to commit deadly sin again, or impenitent of that they have committed before—therefore they receive it not spiritually; that is to say, they receive not the spiritual thing of the Sacrament, which (as I before have showed) is the sacramental thing that is signified thereby, that is to wit, the society of holy saints—that is to say, he is not by the spirit of God united<sup>86</sup> with holy saints as a lively<sup>87</sup> member of Christ's mystical body.

For we must understand that Christ in giving his own very body into the very body of every Christian man, he doth in a certain manner incorporate all Christian folk and his own body together in one corporation mystical. And therefore saith Saint Paul, Omnes de uno pane manducamus (“All we eat of one loaf”).<sup>88</sup> Not that all the people eat of one material loaf, for there were among them distributed many, but he meaneth that that very thing that is there under the form of that loaf of bread is that one thing that the apostle and all they and all we too eat. And then saith he also, Unus panis multi sumus (“We many be of one loaf”).<sup>89</sup> And so are we, as I say, by the receiving each of us that loaf that is himself mystically, all incorporate together and all made that one loaf. And therefore when our Lord in giving that loaf at the first institution unto his apostles that there represented his Church said, “This is my body,” in giving (I say) to his Church his very body, he not by word but by his deed called (as Saint Cyprian saith in his sermon De cena Domini) his Church his body too.<sup>90</sup>

But now, though that every Christian man so receiving is in a certain manner a member of his mystical body, the Church, by this sacramental receiving, yet, for his receiving it in deadly sin, he receiveth it not spiritually; that is to say, though he receive Christ's holy flesh into his body, he receiveth not yet Christ's Holy Spirit into his soul. And therefore this manner of deadly receiving his quick flesh giveth no quickness or life unto the soul. And in such a receiver of Christ's flesh are these words of Christ verified: Spiritus est qui vivificat, caro non prodest quicquam (“The flesh availeth nothing; the spirit is it that giveth life”).<sup>91</sup>

And therefore I say that, without the spiritual receiving, the sacramental receiving nothing availeth. And not over that it nothing availeth, but over that it sore noyeth<sup>92</sup> and hurteth. For Saint Paul, after that he hath plainly told and showed the Corinthians that the thing which they did eat and drink was the Body and Blood of Christ, he said unto them, Quicumque manducaverit panem et biberit calicem Domini indigne, reus erit corporis et sanguinis Domini, et iudicium sibi manducat et bibit, non diiudicans corpus Domini (“Whosoever eat the bread and drink the cup of our Lord unworthily shall be guilty of the Body and Blood of our Lord, and eateth and drinketh judgment unto himself, for that that<sup>93</sup> he discerneth not the body of our Lord, that is to wit, considereth it not and useth it like as he ought to do, it being the body of our Lord as it is”).<sup>94</sup>

Here we see that, notwithstanding that he that receiveth the Blessed Sacrament receiveth the very body of our Lord, yet receiving it unworthily (and therefore not spiritually), though he be by the 5 only<sup>95</sup> sacramental receiving of Christ's body incorporate as a member (in a certain manner) in the mystical body of his Catholic Church, yet, for lack of the spiritual receiving by cleanness of spirit, he attaineth not the fruitful thing of the sacrament, is not by the spirit of Christ animated and quickened and made a lively member in the pure mystical body, the fellowship and society of saints.

Some, as I said before, receive this Blessed Sacra- 15 ment only spiritually and not sacramentally, and so do all they receive it which are in clean life and are at their high Mass devoutly. For there the curate of-fereth it for him and them too. And although that only himself receive it sacramentally, that is to wit, 20
 the very body and blood under the sacramental signs (the forms of bread and wine), yet as many of them as are present at it and are in clean life receive it spiritually, that is to wit, the fruitful thing of the sacra-25 ment; that is to say, they receive grace, by which they be by the spirit of Christ more firmly knit and unied quick lively members in the spiritual society of saints.

A Treatise to Receive the Blessed Body of Our Lord Sacramentally and Virtually Both made in the year of our Lord 1534 by Sir Thomas More, Knight, while he was prisoner in the Tower of London<sup>1</sup>

They receive the blessed body of our Lord both sacramentally and virtually<sup>2</sup> which<sup>3</sup> in due manner and worthily receive the Blessed Sacrament. When I say “worthily,” I mean not that any man is so good, or can be so good, that his goodness could make him of very right and reason worthy to receive into his vile earthly body that holy blessed glorious flesh and blood of almighty God himself, with his celestial soul therein, and with the majesty of his eternal Godhead, but that he may prepare himself, working with the grace of God, to stand in such a state as the incomparable goodness of God will, of his liberal bounty, vouchsafe<sup>4</sup> to take and accept for worthy to receive his own inestimable precious body into the body of so simple<sup>5</sup> a servant.

Such is the wonderful bounty of almighty God that he not only doth vouchsafe but also doth delight to be with men if they prepare to receive him with honest and clean souls, whereof he saith: Deliciae meae esse cum filiis hominum (“My delight and pleasures are to be with the sons of men”).<sup>6</sup> And how can we doubt that God delighteth to be with the sons of men when the Son of God, and very almighty God himself, liked not only to become the Son of Man (that is to wit,<sup>7</sup> the son of Adam, the first man) but, over that, in his innocent manhood to suffer his painful Passion for the redemption and restitution<sup>8</sup> of man.

In remembrance and memorial whereof he disdaineth not to take for worthy such men as wilfully make not themselves unworthy to receive the selfsame blessed body into their bodies, to the inestimable wealth<sup>9</sup> of their souls. And yet of his high sovereign patience, he refuseth not to enter bodily into the vile bodies of those whose filthy minds refuse to receive him graciously<sup>10</sup> into their souls. But then do such folk receive him only sacramentally and not virtually, that is to wit, they receive his very blessed body into theirs under the sacramental sign; but they receive not the thing of the sacrament, that is to wit, the virtue and the effect thereof (that is to say, the grace by which they should be lively<sup>11</sup> members incorporate<sup>12</sup> in Christ’s holy mystical body), but instead of that lively grace, they receive their judgment and their damnation.

And some such, by the outrageous enormity of their deadly sinful purpose, in which they presume to receive that blessed body, deserve to have the devil (through the sufferance of God) personally so to enter into their breasts that they never have the grace after to cast him out, but like as a man with bridle and spur rideth and ruleth a horse and maketh him go which way he list<sup>13</sup> to guide him, so doth the devil by his inward suggestions govern and guide the man, and bridle him from all good and spur him into all evil, till he finally drive him to all mischief, as he did the false traitor Judas, that sinfully received that holy body, whom the devil did therefore first carry out about the traitorous death of the selfsame blessed body of his most loving Master (which he so late so sinfully received) and, within a few hours after, unto the desperate destruction of himself.

And therefore have we great cause, with great dread and reverence, to consider well the state of our own soul when we shall go to the board<sup>14</sup> of God, and as near as we can (with help of his special grace, diligently prayed for before) purge and cleanse our souls by confession, contrition, and penance, with full purpose of forsaking from thenceforth the proud desires of the devil, the greedy covetise<sup>15</sup> of wretched worldly wealth, and the foul affection of the filthy flesh, and be in full mind to persevere and continue in the ways of God and holy cleanness of spirit, lest that (if we presume so unrepentantly to receive this precious margarite,<sup>16</sup> this pure pearl, the blessed body of our Savior himself, contained in the sacramental sign of bread) that like a sort<sup>17</sup> of swine rooting in the dirt and wallowing in the mire, we tread it under the filthy feet of our foul affections, while we set more by<sup>18</sup> them than by it, intending to walk and wallow in the puddle of foul filthy sin; therewith the legion of devils may get leave of Christ so to enter into us as they got leave of him to enter into the hogs of Genezareth,<sup>19</sup> and, as they ran forth with them and never stinted till they drowned them in the sea, so run on with us (but if<sup>20</sup> God of his great mercy refrain<sup>21</sup> them and give us the grace to repent), else not fail to drown us in the deep sea of everlasting sorrow.

Of this great outrageous peril, the blessed apostle Saint Paul giveth us gracious warning where he saith in his first epistle to the Corinthians: Quicumque manducaverit panem et biberit calicem Domini indigne, reus erit corporis et sanguinis Domini (“Whosoever eat the bread and drink the cup of our Lord unworthily, he shall be guilty of the body and blood of our Lord”).<sup>22</sup> Here is, good Christian readers, a dreadful and terrible sentence that God here (by the mouth of his holy apostle) giveth against all them that unworthily receive this most Blessed Sacrament, that their part shall be with Pilate and the Jews, and with that false traitor Judas, since God reputeth<sup>23</sup> the unworthy receiving and eating of his blessed body for a like heinous offense against his majesty as he accounts theirs that wrongfully and cruelly killed him.

And therefore to the intent that we may avoid well this importable<sup>24</sup> danger, and in such wise<sup>25</sup> receive the body and blood of our Lord, as God may of his goodness accept us for worthy (and therefore not only enter with his blessed flesh and blood sacramentally and bodily into our bodies but also with his Holy Spirit graciously<sup>26</sup> and effectually into our souls), Saint Paul, in the place afore-remembered,<sup>27</sup> saith: Probet seipsum homo, et sic de pane illo edat, et de calice bibat (“Let a man prove himself, and so eat of that bread and drink of that cup”).<sup>28</sup> But then in what wise shall we prove ourselves? We may not go rashly to God’s board,<sup>29</sup> but by a convenient<sup>30</sup> time taken before we must (as I began to say) consider well and examine surely what state our soul standeth in.

In which thing it will be not only right hard, but also peradventure impossible, by any possible diligence of ourselves to attain unto the very full undoubted surety thereof, without special revelation of God. For as the Scripture saith: Nemo vivens scit, utrum odio vel amore dignus sit (“No man living knoweth whether he be worthy the favor or hatred of God”).<sup>31</sup> And in another place: Etiamsi simplex fuero, hoc ipsum ignorabit anima mea (“If I be simple,<sup>32</sup> that is to say, without sin, that shall not my mind surely know”).<sup>33</sup> But God yet in this point is of his high goodness content if we do the diligence<sup>34</sup> that we can to see that we be not in the purpose<sup>35</sup> of any deadly sin. For though it may be that, for all our diligence, God (whose eye pierceth much more deeper into the bottom of our heart than our own doth) may see therein some such sin as we cannot see there ourselves — for which Saint Paul saith: Nullius mihi conscius sum, sed non in hoc iustificatus sum (“In mine own conscience I know nothing, but yet am I not thereby justified”)<sup>36</sup> — yet our true diligence done in the search God of his high bounty so far-forth<sup>37</sup> accepteth that he imputeth not any such secret lurking sin unto our charge for an unworthy receiving of this Blessed Sacrament, but rather the strength and virtue thereof purgeth and cleanseth that sin.

In this proving and examination of ourselves which Saint Paul speaketh of, one very special point must be to prove and examine ourselves and see that we be in the right faith and belief concerning that holy Blessed Sacrament itself: that is to wit, that we verily believe that it is, as indeed it is, under the form and likeness of bread, the very blessed body, flesh

14 table 15 covetousness 16 any precious stone 17 herd 18 set more by: value more highly 19 Mt 8:28–32; Mk 5:11–14; Lk 8:32–33 20 but if: unless and blood of our holy Savior Christ himself, the very selfsame body and the very selfsame blood that died and was shed upon the cross for our sin, and the third day gloriously did arise again to life and, with the souls of holy saints fetched out of hell, ascended and stied<sup>38</sup> up wonderfully into heaven, and there sitteth on the right hand of the Father, and shall visibly descend in great glory to judge the quick<sup>39</sup> and the dead, and reward all men after<sup>40</sup> their works.

We must, I say, see that we firmly believe that this Blessed Sacrament is not a bare sign, or a figure,<sup>41</sup> or a token of that holy body of Christ, but that it is, in perpetual remembrance of his bitter Passion that he suffered for us, the selfsame precious body of Christ that suffered it by his own almighty power and unspeakable goodness, consecrated and given unto us.

And this point of belief is, in the receiving of this Blessed Sacrament, of such necessity and such weight with them that have years and discretion that, without it, they receive it plainly to their damnation. And that point believed very full and fastly<sup>42</sup> must needs be a great occasion to move any man in all other points to receive it well. For note well the words of Saint Paul therein: Qui manducat de hoc pane, et bibit de calice indigne, iudicium sibi manducat et bibit, non diiudicans corpus Domini (“He that eateth of this bread and drinketh of this cup unworthily eateth and drinketh judgment upon himself, in that he discerneth not the body of our Lord”).<sup>43</sup> Lo, here this blessed apostle well declareth that he which<sup>44</sup> in any wise unworthily receiveth this most excellent sacrament receiveth it unto his own damnation, in that he well declareth by his evil demeanor toward it, in his unworthy receiving of it, that he discerneth it not, nor judgeth it, nor taketh it for the very body of our Lord, as indeed it is. And verily it is hard, but<sup>45</sup> that this point deeply rooted in our breast should set all our heart in a fervor of devotion toward the worthy receiving of that Blessed Body. But surely there can be no doubt, on the other side, but that, if any man believe that it is Christ’s very body and yet is not inflamed to receive him devoutly thereby, that man were likely to receive this Blessed Sacrament very coldly and far from all devotion if he believed that it were not his body, but only a bare token of him instead of his body.

But now, having the full faith of this point fastly grounded in our heart, that the thing which we receive is the very blessed body of Christ, I trust there shall not greatly need any great information further to teach us, or any great exhortation further to stir and excite us, with all humble manner and reverent behavior to receive him. For if we will but consider, if there were a great worldly prince which for special favor that he bore us would come visit us in our own house, what a business we would then make, and what a work it would be for us to see that our house were trimmed up in every point to the best of our possible power, and everything so provided and ordered that he should by his honorable receiving perceive what affection we bear him and in what high estimation we have him, we should soon by the comparing of that worldly prince and this heavenly prince together (between which twain<sup>46</sup> is far less comparison than is between a man and a mouse) inform and teach ourselves with how lowly mind, how tender loving heart, how reverent humble manner we should endeavor ourselves to receive this glorious heavenly king, the king of all kings, almighty God himself, that so lovingly doth vouchsafe<sup>47</sup> to enter not only into our house (to which the noble man Centurio acknowledged himself unworthy)<sup>48</sup> but his precious body into our vile wretched carcass, and his Holy Spirit into our poor simple soul.

What diligence can here suffice us? What solicitude can we think here enough, against<sup>49</sup> the coming of this almighty king, coming for so special gracious favor, not to put us to cost, not to spend of ours, but to enrich us of his, and that after so manifold deadly displeasures done him so unkindly<sup>50</sup> by us, against so many of his incomparable benefits before done unto us? How would we now labor and foresee that the house of our soul (which God were coming to rest in) should neither have any poisoned spider or cobweb of deadly sin hanging in the roof, nor so much as a straw or a feather of any light lewd<sup>51</sup> thought that we might spy in the floor, but we would sweep it away?

But forasmuch, good Christian readers, as we neither can attain this great point of faith, nor any other virtue but by the special grace of God, of whose high goodness every good thing cometh — for as Saint James saith: Omne datum optimum, et omne donum

38 rose, ascended 39 living 40 according to 41 type 42 steadfastly, firmly 43 1 Cor 11: 27–29 44 who 45 except

perfectum, de sursum est, descendens a Patre luminum (“Every good gift, and every perfect gift, is from above, descending from the Father of lights”)<sup>52</sup>—let us therefore pray for his gracious<sup>53</sup> help in the attaining of this faith, and for his help in the cleansing of our soul against<sup>54</sup> his coming, that he may make us worthy to receive him worthily. And ever let us of our own part fear our unworthiness, and on his part trust boldly upon his goodness if we forslow<sup>55</sup> not to work with him for our own part. For if we willingly upon the trust and comfort of his goodness leave our own endeavor undone, then is our hope no hope, but a very foul presumption.

Then when we come unto his holy board, into the presence of his Blessed Body, let us consider his high glorious majesty, which his high goodness there hideth from us and the proper form of his holy flesh covereth under the form of bread—both to keep us from abashment,<sup>56</sup> such as we could not peradventure<sup>57</sup> abide if we (such as we yet be) should see and receive him in his own form such as he is, and also for the increase of the merit of our faith in the obedient belief of that thing (at his commandment) whereof our eyes and our reason seem to show us the contrary.

And yet forasmuch as, although we believe it, yet is there in many of us that belief very faint and far from the point of such vigor and strength as would God it had, let us say unto him with the father that had the dumb son, Credo Domine, adiuva incredulitatem meam (“I believe, Lord, but help thou my lack of belief”),<sup>58</sup> and with his blessed apostles, Domine, adauge nobis fidem (“Lord, increase faith in us”).<sup>59</sup> Let us also with the poor publican, in knowledge of our own unworthiness, say with all meekness of heart, Deus, propitius esto mihi peccatori (“Lord God, be merciful to me sinner that I am”).<sup>60</sup> And with the Centurion, Domine, non sum dignus ut intres sub tectum meum (“Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldst come into my house”).<sup>61</sup>

And yet with all this remembrance of our own unworthiness, and therefore the great reverence, fear, and dread for our own part, let us not forget on the other side to consider his inestimable goodness, which disdaineth not for all our unworthiness to come unto us and to be received of us.

But likewise as at the sight or receiving of this excellent memorial of his death (for in the remembrance thereof doth he thus consecrate and give his own blessed flesh and blood unto us) we must with tender compassion remember and call to mind the bitter pains of his most painful Passion, and yet therewithal rejoice and be glad in the consideration of his incomparable kindness (which in his so suffering for us to our inestimable benefit he showed and declared toward us), so must we be both sore afraid<sup>62</sup> of our own unworthiness, and yet therewith be right glad and in great hope at the consideration of his unmeasurable goodness.

Saint Elizabeth, at the visitation and salutation of our blessed Lady (having by revelation the sure inward knowledge that our Lady was conceived with our Lord), albeit that<sup>63</sup> she was herself such as else (for<sup>64</sup> the diversity between their ages) she well might and would have thought it but convenient and meetly<sup>65</sup> that her young cousin should come visit her, yet now, because she was mother to our Lord, she was sore amarvelled<sup>66</sup> of her visitation and thought herself far unworthy thereto, and therefore said unto her: Unde hoc, ut veniat mater Domini mei ad me? (“Whereof is this, that the mother of our Lord should come to me?”)<sup>67</sup> But yet for all the abashment of her own unworthiness she conceived throughly<sup>68</sup> such a glad blessed comfort that her holy child Saint John the Baptist hopped in her belly for joy, whereof she said: Ut facta est vox salutationis tuae in auribus meis, exultavit gaudio infans in utero meo (“As soon as the voice of thy salutation was in mine ears, the infant in my womb leapt for joy”).<sup>69</sup>

Now like as Saint Elizabeth by the Spirit of God had those holy affections,<sup>70</sup> both of reverent considering her own unworthiness in the visitation of the mother of God, and yet for all that so great inward gladness therewith, let us at this great high visitation, in which not the mother of God, as came to Saint Elizabeth, but one incomparably more excelling the mother of God than the mother of God passed Saint Elizabeth doth so vouchsafe to come and visit each of us with his most blessed presence that he cometh not into our house but into ourselves—let us (I say) call for the help of the same

Holy Spirit that then inspired her, and pray him at this high and holy visitation so to inspire us that we may both be abashed with the reverent dread of our own unworthiness and yet therewith conceive 5 a joyful consolation and comfort in the consideration of God's inestimable goodness, and that each of us, like as we may well say with great reverent dread and admiration, Unde hoc, ut veniat Dominus meus ad me? ("Whereof is this, that my Lord should 10 come unto me?")<sup>71</sup> and not only unto me but also into me, so we may with glad heart truly say at the sight of his blessed presence, Exultavit gaudio infans in utero meo ("The child in my belly — that is to wit, the soul in my body, that should be then such a 15 child in innocency as was that innocent infant Saint John — leapeth, good Lord, for joy").<sup>72</sup>

Now when we have received our Lord and have him in our body, let us not then let him alone and get us forth about other things and look no more 20 unto him (for little good could he that<sup>73</sup> so would serve any guest), but let all our business be about him. Let us by devout prayer talk to him, by devout meditation talk with him. Let us say with the prophet: Audiam quid loquatur in me Dominus ("I 25 will hear what our Lord will speak within me").<sup>74</sup>

For surely, if we set aside all other things and attend unto him, he will not fail with good inspirations to speak such things to us within us as shall serve to the great spiritual comfort and profit of our 30 soul. And therefore let us with Martha provide that all our outward business may be pertaining to him, in making cheer to him and to his company for his sake, that is to wit, to poor folk, of which he taketh every one not only for his disciple but also as for 35 himself. For himself saith: Quamdiu fecistis uni de his fratribus meis minimis, mihi fecistis ("That that you have done to one of the least of these my brethren, you have done it to myself").<sup>75</sup> And let us with Mary also sit in devout meditation and hearken well
 40 what our Savior, being now our guest, will inwardly say unto us. Now have we a special time of prayer, while he that hath made us, he that hath bought<sup>76</sup> us, he whom we have offended, he that shall judge us, he that shall either damn us or save us, is of his great goodness become our guest, and is personally 45 present within us, and that for none other purpose

but to be sued unto for pardon and so thereby to save us.

Let us not lose this time, therefore; suffer not this occasion to slip, which we can little tell whether 50 ever we shall get in again or never. Let us endeavor ourselves to keep him still,<sup>77</sup> and let us say with his two disciples that were going to the castle<sup>78</sup> of Emmaus, Mane nobiscum Domine ("Tarry with us, good Lord"),<sup>79</sup> and then shall we be sure that he will
 55 not go from us, but if<sup>80</sup> we unkindly put him from us. Let us not play<sup>81</sup> like the people of Genezareth, which prayed him to depart out of their quarters because they lost their hogs by him, when instead of the hogs he saved the man out of whom he cast the 60 legion of devils that after destroyed the hogs.<sup>82</sup> Let not us likewise rather put God from us by unlawful love of worldly winning<sup>83</sup> or foul filthy lust, rather than for the profit of our soul to forbear it. For sure may we be that, when we wax<sup>84</sup> such, God will not
 65 tarry with us, but we put him unkindly from us. Nor let us not do as did the people of Jerusalem which on Palm Sunday received Christ royally and full devoutly with procession, and on the Friday after put him to a shameful Passion; on the Sunday cried, 70 Benedictus qui venit in nomine Domini ("Blessed be he that cometh in the name of our Lord"),<sup>85</sup> and on the Friday cried out, Non hunc, sed Barabbam ("We will not have him but Barabbas");<sup>86</sup> on the Sunday cried, Hosanna in excelsis,<sup>87</sup> on the Friday, Tolle, tolle, crucifige eum.<sup>88</sup> Sure if we receive him never 75 so well nor never so devoutly at Easter, yet whensoever we fall after to such wretched sinful living as casteth our Lord in such wise out of our souls, as his grace carrieth not with us, we show ourself to have 80 received him in such manner as those Jews did. For we do as much as in us is<sup>89</sup> to crucify Christ again: Iterum (saith Saint Paul) crucifigentes filium Dei.<sup>90</sup>

Let us, good Christian readers, receive him in such wise as did the good publican Zacchaeus, which,<sup>91</sup>
 85 when he longed to see Christ and because he was but low of stature did climb up into a tree, our Lord, seeing his devotion, called unto him and said: "Zacchaeus, come off<sup>92</sup> and come down, for this day must I dwell with thee."<sup>93</sup> And he made haste and came 90 down, and very gladly received him into his house. But not only received him with a joy of a light<sup>94</sup> and

And therefore he said not, “Thou shalt hear that I shall give it,” but he said, Ecce dimidium bonorum meorum do pauperibus (“Lo, look, good Lord, the one half of my goods I do give unto poor men”).<sup>99</sup>

With such alacrity, with such quickness of spirit, with such gladness, and such spiritual rejoicing as this man received our Lord into his house, our Lord give us the grace to receive his blessed body and blood, his holy soul, and his almighty Godhead both, into our bodies and into our souls, that the fruit of our good works may bear witness unto our conscience that we receive him worthily, and in such a full faith and such a stable purpose of good living as we be bounden to do. And then shall God give a gracious sentence<sup>100</sup> and say upon our soul, as he said upon Zacchaeus, Hodie salus facta est huic domui (“This day is health and salvation come unto this house”),<sup>101</sup> which that holy blessed person of Christ, which we verily in the Blessed Sacrament receive, through the merit of his bitter Passion (whereof he hath ordained his own blessed body in that Blessed Sacrament to be the memorial), vouchsafe,<sup>102</sup> good Christian readers, to grant unto us all.

A Dialogue of Comfort against Tribulation

made by a Hungarian in Latin, and translated out of Latin into French, and out of French into English

Written in 1534 while More was imprisoned in the Tower of London, A Dialogue of Comfort was first published by Richard Tottel in London, November 1553, eighteen years after More's execution, and five months after Queen Mary's accession. The Dialogue was published again in 1557 by William Rastell as part of his 1,458-page folio of The Workes of Sir Thomas More Knight. In 1573, John Fowler published a smaller, convenient edition of the Dialogue in Antwerp.

In this late work, More again employs the dialogue form, as he did in the earlier Utopia and 1529 Dialogue of Sir Thomas More. Here the focus is on "comfort" (from the Latin confortare, meaning "to strengthen") against "tribulation" (from the Latin tribulare, meaning "to oppress or afflict," and tribulum, a "threshing-sledge"). The Dialogue works to explore the fundamental questions: Is there any credible hope of "comfort" in the face of human "tribulation" and suffering? What is the best way to understand—and respond to—suffering?

The rest of the title is more playful. The details about the work's "Hungarian" authorship and subsequent translation from Latin into French and then into English may be a prudent expedient to protect More. More may also be suggesting the universality of his work on suffering through this witty means (CW 12: 331).

In any case, the underlying plot is a thin veil to the situation faced by More and his family during his imprisonment. Set in Vienna on the brink of another Turkish invasion, the Dialogue records a conversation between two family members. Old Antony, suffering on his deathbed, has experienced similar terrors twice before. Young Vincent—a wealthy leader concerned for his family, friends, and country—comes to Antony for advice, terrified by the threat of an imminent invasion and death. These interlocutors are close relatives who share common perspectives. As the reader learns through Antony's Socratic questioning, however, Vincent does not know himself well and has not reflected sufficiently on the pressing issues facing him. Though a leader, Vincent seems unprepared intellectually, imaginatively, and affectively for the trials at hand.

Their conversation takes place in Hungary in 1527–28, before the Turks would attack in 1529, led by Suleiman I. Vincent begins the dialogue overcome by the fear of these invasions, perhaps recalling the battle of Mohács in 1526 and its bloody conclusion. After three long conversations at three different sittings, however, Vincent is presented hopeful of "conquering" (playing upon his name's etymology from vincens), equipped and ready to face whatever comes—or so he states at the end of Book 3, as he prays for "the grace to follow your good counsel." For his part, Antony seems to have practiced, across the work, an artful and loving fatherhood toward Vincent and, through Vincent, toward anxious Vienna and its citizens.

The title and the introductory chapters place this work within both the classical tradition of "comfort" books (especially Boethius's De consolazione philosophiae, as well as certain writings by Cicero and Seneca) and the biblical tradition. While Antony thinks the classical tradition useful at times, he considers ancient wisdom to be inadequate for dealing with human suffering. Even the keenest reason, he suggests, needs help when it considers—or experiences—a mystery like human suffering.

The Dialogue is noted for the number and variety of its "merry tales," and the work is shot through with More's customary mingling of high wit, good humor, and sudden incisive seriousness. The Dialogue can seem rambling and digressive—perhaps an imitation of real conversation—and even remarkably simple at times. Old Antony, however, insists that he is highly selective in his approach to the conversation, as shown in his careful delay of Vincent's greatest concern—the fear of violent death and martyrdom—until the end of the work, once the necessary groundwork has been established through friendly conversation.

As Louis Martz has observed, the Dialogue is “an ultimate spiritual testament,” a work that, composed in solitude and silence—in the shadow of death—“displays all the signs of More’s finest literary skill, both in the details of its language and in the total command of its development” (CW 12: lxvi).

TIMELINE

16 May 1532	More resigns from his office as Lord Chancellor.
1 June 1533	More does not attend Anne Boleyn’s coronation.
21 Feb 1534	Henry VIII demands More’s indictment; the House of Lords refuses.
Feb–Mar 1534	More admits great fear (Letter 210).
17 April 1534	More is imprisoned for refusing the oath of the Act of Succession.
Later 1534	Margaret (Letter 211), Wilson (Letters 207–8), and others express great fear. More writes A Dialogue of Comfort against Tribulation .

(First day of the conversation)

Preface	Vincent asks for Antony's counsel in the face of great suffering . . . . .	1111
1	Antony on why the pagan philosophers' counsel is inadequate . . . . .	1114
2	Antony on the foundation of all comfort . . . . .	1115
3-6	1st cause of comfort: the desire to be comforted by God; who can and cannot be comforted . .	1116
7-10	2nd cause: knowledge that suffering is or can become medicinal or is better than medicinal . .	1120
11-12	3rd cause: knowledge that we can earn merit here, but not in purgatory . . . . .	1125
13-20	4th cause: knowledge that the cross is necessary and that wealth and prosperity are perilous . .	1128

Book 2

(Second day of the conversation, after breakfast)

Preface	Antony apologizes for having talked too much, insisting Vincent talk more . . . . .	1145
1-3	Vincent objects to Antony's teaching on suffering; Antony explains and distinguishes three kinds of suffering: first, that freely chosen for the sake of penance or devotion; second, that willingly borne; and third, that which one cannot avoid, already treated in Book 1 . . . . .	1146
4-7	The first kind of suffering: freely chosen . . . . .	1149
8-10	The second kind: temptation and persecution, the latter of which will be treated in Book 3 . .	1154
11-17	Antony distinguishes four types of temptation based on Psalm 91: first, fear or "the terror of the night" (12-16); second, pride or "the arrow that flies by day" (16); third, worldly business or "the pestilence that stalks in the darkness" (17); and fourth, open persecution, which will be treated in the next book . . . . .	1157

(Second day of the conversation continued, after Antony's lunch and nap)

Preface	Vincent's renewed fears and Antony on the necessity of habitual spiritual strength . . . . .	1193
1	They discuss if one should prepare in mind and heart before the onslaught of tribulation. . . .	1196
2-4	The fourth and worst temptation: open persecution or the attack of the "noonday devil" . . . .	1198

This octavo edition of A Dialogue of Comfort was printed in 1573 by John Fowler, son-in-law of John Harris, More's last secretary who appears in The Family of Sir Thomas More (Plate 4b). In 1553 Richard Tottel had printed the first edition of More's Dialogue of Comfort, which was also the first book from Tottel's press. The English translation of the Latin poem reads:

As painters' art can skill, O More;

THE FIRST BOOK

PREFACE

VINCENT: Who would have weened,<sup>1</sup> O my good Uncle, afore a few years passed, that such as in this country would visit their friends lying in disease and sickness should come, as I do now, to seek and fetch comfort<sup>2</sup> of them, or in giving comfort to them, use the way that I may well use to you?
For albeit that<sup>3</sup> the priests and friars be wont<sup>4</sup> to call upon sick men to remember death, yet we worldly friends, for fear of discomfoting them, have ever had a guise<sup>5</sup> in Hungary to lift up their hearts and put them in hope of life. But now, my good Uncle, the world is here waxen<sup>6</sup> such, and so great perils appear here to fall at hand,<sup>7</sup> that methinketh the greatest comfort that a man can have is when he may see that he shall soon be gone. And we that are likely long to live here in wretchedness have need of some comfortable counsel against tribulation<sup>8</sup> to be given us by such as you be, good Uncle, that have so long lived virtuously and are so learned in the law of God, as very few be better in this country here, and have had, of such things as we now do fear, good experience and assay<sup>9</sup> in yourself, as he that<sup>10</sup> hath been taken prisoner in Turkey two times in your days, and now likely to depart hence ere<sup>11</sup> long. But that may be your great comfort, good Uncle, since you depart to God. But us here shall you leave of your kindred a sort of very<sup>12</sup> comfort-less orphans, to all whom your good help and counsel and comfort hath long been a great stay,<sup>13</sup> not as an uncle unto some, and to some as one farther of kin,<sup>14</sup> but as though unto us all you had been a natural father.

ANTONY: Mine own good Cousin,<sup>15</sup> I cannot much say nay but that there is indeed, not here in Hungary only, but almost in all places of Christendom, such a customable manner<sup>16</sup> of unchristian comforting, which, albeit that in any sick man it doth more harm than good — withdrawing him, in time of sickness, with the looking and longing for life, from the meditation of death, judgment, heaven, and hell, whereof<sup>17</sup> he should beset<sup>18</sup> much part of his time, even all his whole life in his best health — yet is that manner in my mind more than mad where such kind of comfort is used to a man of mine age: for as we well wot<sup>19</sup> that a young man may die soon, so be we very sure that an old man cannot live long. And yet since there is, as Tully<sup>20</sup> saith, “no man, for all that, so old but that he hopeth yet that he may live one year more” — and of<sup>21</sup> a frail folly delighteth to think thereon, and comfort himself therewith — other men’s words of like manner<sup>22</sup> comfort, adding more sticks to that fire, shall in a manner<sup>23</sup> burn up quite<sup>24</sup> the pleasant moisture that most should refresh him: the wholesome dew, I mean, of God’s grace, by which he should wish with God’s will to be hence,<sup>25</sup> and long to be with him in heaven. Now where<sup>26</sup> you take my departing from you so heavily<sup>27</sup> — as of him of whom ye recognize of your goodness to have had herebefore<sup>28</sup> help and comfort — would God<sup>29</sup> I had, to you and others more, done half so much as myself reckoneth had been my duty to do. But whensoever God take me hence, to reckon yourself then comfortless, as 5 though your chief comfort stood in me, therein make ye, methinketh, a reckoning very much like as though ye would cast away a strong staff and lean upon a rotten reed; for God is and must be

 10 that,<sup>31</sup> as he said to his disciples, never leaveth his servants in case<sup>32</sup> of comfortless orphans, not even when he departed from his disciples by death, but both (as he promised) sent them a comforter, the Holy Spirit of his Father and himself, and made
 15 them also sure that to the world's end he would ever dwell with them himself.<sup>33</sup> And therefore, if ye be part of his flock and believe his promise, how can ye be comfortless in any tribulation, when Christ and his Holy Spirit, and with them their inseparable 20 Father — if you put full trust and confidence in them — be never one finger-breadth of space, nor one minute of time from you?

VINCENT: O my good Uncle, even these same
 25 self<sup>34</sup> words, wherewith ye well prove that because of God's own gracious presence we cannot be left comfortless, make me now feel and perceive what a miss<sup>35</sup> of much comfort we shall have when ye be gone; for albeit, good Uncle, that while<sup>36</sup> ye do tell me this, I cannot but grant it for true, yet if I now
 30 had not heard it of you, I had not remembered it, nor it had not fallen in my mind.<sup>37</sup> And over<sup>38</sup> that, like<sup>39</sup> as our tribulations shall in weight and number increase, so shall we need not only one such good word or twain,<sup>40</sup> but a great heap thereof, to stable 35 and strengthen the walls of our hearts against the great surges of the tempestuous sea.

ANTONY: Good Cousin, trust well in God, and he shall provide you teachers abroad,<sup>41</sup> convenient<sup>42</sup> in every time, or else shall himself sufficiently teach 40 you within.

VINCENT: Very well, good Uncle. But yet, if we would leave<sup>43</sup> the seeking of outward learning where we might have it, and look to be inwardly taught only by God, then should we thereby tempt 45 God and displease him. And since that<sup>44</sup> I now see the likelihood that when ye be gone, we shall be sore<sup>45</sup> destitute of any such other like,<sup>46</sup> therefore thinketh me that God of<sup>47</sup> duty bindeth me to sue to<sup>48</sup> you now, good Uncle, in this short time that we have you, that it may like<sup>49</sup> you, against these great 50 storms of tribulations — with which both I and all mine are sore beaten already, and now upon the coming of this cruel Turk, fear to fall in far more — I may learn of you such plenty of good counsel and comfort that I may, with the same laid up in remem-
 55 brance, govern and stay<sup>50</sup> the ship of our kindred, and keep it afloat from peril of spiritual drowning.

You be not ignorant, good Uncle, what heaps of heaviness<sup>51</sup> hath of late fallen among us already, with which some of our poor family be fallen into 60 such dumps that scantily can any such comfort as my poor wit<sup>52</sup> can give them anything<sup>53</sup> assuage their sorrow. And now, since the tidings have come hither so breme<sup>54</sup> of the great Turk's enterprise into these parts here, we can almost neither talk nor 65 think of any other thing else than of his might and our mischief.<sup>55</sup> There falleth so continually before the eyes of our heart a fearful imagination of this terrible thing: his mighty strength and power, his high malice and hatred, and his incomparable cru-
 70 elty, with robbing, spoiling,<sup>56</sup> burning, and laying waste all the way that his army cometh, then killing or carrying away the people far hence from home, and there sever the couples and kindred asunder, every one far from the other, some kept in thrall-
 75 dom,<sup>57</sup> and some kept in prison, and some for a triumph<sup>58</sup> tormented and killed in his presence. Then send his people hither, and his false faith therewith, so that such as are here and remain still shall either 80 both lose all, and be lost too, or forced to forsake the faith of our Savior Christ, and fall to the false sect of Muhammad. And yet — which we more fear than all the remnant — no small part of our own folk that

29 would God: I wish to God 30 secure; certain 31 who 32 the position 33 See Jn 14:16–18, 25–26; Mt 28:20. 34 same self: very same 35 lack, loss 36 albeit... that while: although 37 nor... mind: nor would it have come to mind (More often uses a double negative where modern English uses only one.) 38 beyond 39 just 40 two 41 outside yourself 42 suitable, appropriate; at hand 43 leave off 44 since that: because; seeing that 45 grievously; very much 46 any such other like: anyone else like you 47 out of 48 sue to: ask 49 please 50 steady, support 51 grief, sadness 52 mind, intellect 53 in any way 54 loudly, much spoken of 55 misfortune, evil plight 56 despoiling, plundering 57 servitude; slavery 58 for a triumph: during a victory festival

5 dwell even here about us are, as we hear, fallen to him, or already confedered<sup>59</sup> with him, which if it so be, shall haply<sup>60</sup> keep this quarter from the Turk's incursion; but then shall they that turn to his law
 10 leave all their neighbors nothing, but shall have our goods given them and our bodies both, but if<sup>61</sup> we turn as they do, and forsake our Savior too. And then (for there is no born Turk so cruel to Christian folk as is the false Christian that falleth from the faith) we shall stand in peril, if we persevere in the truth, to be more hardly<sup>62</sup> handled and die more cruel death by our own countrymen at home than if we were taken hence and carried into Turkey.

15 These fearful heaps of peril lie so heavy at our hearts — while we wot<sup>63</sup> not into which we shall fortune<sup>64</sup> to fall, and therefore fear all the worst — that, as our Savior prophesied of the people of Jerusalem, many wish among us already before the peril come that the mountains would overwhelm them, or the valleys open and swallow them up and cover them.<sup>65</sup>

20 Therefore, good Uncle, against these horrible fears of these terrible tribulations — of which some, you wot well, our house already hath, and the remnant stand<sup>66</sup> in dread of — give us, while God lendeth you us, such plenty of your comfortable<sup>67</sup> counsel as I may write and keep with us, to stay<sup>68</sup> us when God shall call you hence.

30 ANTONY: Ah, my good Cousin, this is a heavy<sup>69</sup> hearing, and likewise<sup>70</sup> as we that dwell here in this part fear that thing so sore<sup>71</sup> now which<sup>72</sup> few years passed feared it not at all, so doubt I that ere<sup>73</sup> it long be, they shall fear it as much that think themselves now very sure<sup>74</sup> because they dwell further off. Greece feared not the Turk when that<sup>75</sup> I was born, and within a while after, all the whole empire was his.<sup>76</sup> The great Soldan<sup>77</sup> of Syria thought himself more than his match, and long since ye were born

40 hath he that empire too. Then hath he taken Belgrade, the fortress of this realm.<sup>78</sup> And since<sup>79</sup> hath he destroyed our noble young goodly king.<sup>80</sup> And now strive there twain<sup>81</sup> for us — our Lord send the grace that the third dog<sup>82</sup> carry not away the bone from them both. What should I speak of the noble strong city of Rhodes?<sup>83</sup> The winning thereof he counteth as a victory against the whole corps<sup>84</sup> of Christendom, since all Christendom was not able to defend that strong town against him. Howbeit,<sup>85</sup> if the princes of Christendom everywhere about would, where as need was,<sup>86</sup> have set to their hands<sup>87</sup> in time, the Turk had never<sup>88</sup> taken any one place of all these places; but partly dissensions<sup>89</sup> fallen among ourselves, partly that<sup>90</sup> no man careth what harm other folk feel, but each part suffer<sup>91</sup> other to shift<sup>92</sup> for itself, the Turk is in few years wonderfully increased, and Christendom on the other side very sore decayed. And all this worketh our unkindness,<sup>93</sup> with which God is not content.<sup>94</sup>

55 But now, whereas you desire<sup>95</sup> of me some plenty of comfortable<sup>96</sup> things, which ye may put in remembrance and comfort therewith your company,<sup>97</sup> verily<sup>98</sup> in the rehearsing<sup>99</sup> and heaping of your manifold fears, myself began to feel that there should much need,<sup>100</sup> against so many troubles, many comfortable counsels; for surely, Cousin, a little before your coming, as I devised<sup>101</sup> with myself upon the Turk's coming, it happed<sup>102</sup> my mind to fall suddenly from that into the devising upon mine own departing, wherein,<sup>103</sup> albeit that I fully put my trust, and hope to be a saved soul, by the great mercy of God, yet since there is here no man so sure that, without revelation,<sup>104</sup> may clean<sup>105</sup> stand out of dread, I bethought me also upon the pains of hell, and after, I bethought me then upon the Turk again. And first methought his terror nothing, when I compared it with the joyful hope of heaven. Then compared I it

And yet when I now heard your lamentable words, laying forth, as it were present before my face, that heap of heavy sorrowful tribulations that, besides those that are already fallen,<sup>109</sup> are in short space like<sup>110</sup> to follow, I waxed therewith<sup>111</sup> myself suddenly somewhat aflight.<sup>112</sup> And therefore I well allow<sup>113</sup> your request in this behalf, that would have store of comfort aforehand ready by you, to resort to and to lay up in your heart, as a treacle<sup>114</sup> against the poison of all desperate<sup>115</sup> dread that might rise of occasion<sup>116</sup> of sore<sup>117</sup> tribulation. And herein shall I be glad (as my poor wit<sup>118</sup> will serve me) to call to mind with you such things as I before have read, heard, or thought upon, that may conveniently<sup>119</sup> serve us to this purpose.

THE FIRST CHAPTER

That the comforts devised by the old paynim<sup>120</sup> philosophers were insufficient, and the cause wherefore

ANTONY: First shall ye, good Cousin, understand this: that the natural wise men of this world, the old moral philosophers, labored much in this matter, and many natural reasons<sup>121</sup> have they written, whereby they might encourage men to set little by<sup>122</sup> such goods (or such hurt either), the going and coming whereof are the matter and cause of tribulation — as are the goods of fortune (riches, favor, and friends, fame, worldly worship,<sup>123</sup> and such other things), or of the body (as<sup>124</sup> beauty, strength, agility, quickness, and health). These things, ye wot<sup>125</sup> well, coming to us are matter<sup>126</sup> of worldly wealth, and taken from us by fortune or by force, or the fear of the losing, be matter of adversity or tribulation. For tribulation seemeth generally to signify nothing else but some kind of grief, either pain of the body or heaviness of the mind.

Now the body not to feel that<sup>127</sup> it feeleth, all the wit in the world cannot bring about. But that the mind should not be grieved, neither with the pain that the body feeleth, nor with the occasions of heaviness<sup>128</sup> offered and given unto the soul itself, this thing labored the philosophers very much about, and many goodly sayings have they toward<sup>129</sup> the strength and comfort against tribulation, exhorting men to the full contempt of all worldly loss, and despising<sup>130</sup> of sickness, and all bodily grief, painful death and all. Howbeit,<sup>131</sup> in very deed, for anything that ever I read in them, I never could yet find that ever these natural reasons were able to give sufficient comfort of themselves, for they never stretch so far but that they leave untouched, for lack of necessary knowledge, that special point, which is not only the chief comfort of all, but without which also all other comforts are nothing — that is to wit,<sup>132</sup> the referring the final end of their comfort unto God, and to repute<sup>133</sup> and take for the special cause of comfort that, by the patient sufferance of their tribulation, they shall attain his favor, and for their pain receive reward at his hand in heaven. And for lack of knowledge of this end, they did (as they needs must) leave untouched also the very special<sup>134</sup> means without which we can never attain to this comfort: that is to wit, the gracious help and aid of God to move, stir, and guide us forward in the referring all our ghostly<sup>135</sup> comfort — yea, and our worldly comfort too — all unto that heavenly end. And therefore, as I say, for lack of these things, all their comfortable counsels are very far insufficient. Howbeit, though they be far unable to cure our disease of themselves, and therefore are not sufficient to be taken for our physicians, some good drugs have they yet in their shops, for which they may be suffered<sup>136</sup> to dwell among our apothecaries<sup>137</sup> — if the medicines be not made of their own brains, but after the bills<sup>138</sup> made by the great Physician, God, prescribing the medicines himself and correcting the faults of their erroneous receipts;<sup>139</sup> for without this way taken with them, they shall not fail to do as many bold blind apothecaries do, which,<sup>140</sup> either for lucre<sup>141</sup> or of a foolish pride, give sick folk medicines of their own devising, and therewith kill up in corners<sup>142</sup> many such simple folk as they find so foolish to put their lives in such lewd<sup>143</sup> and unlearned blind bayards<sup>144</sup> hands.

We shall therefore neither fully receive<sup>145</sup> those philosophers' reasons in this matter, nor yet utterly refuse them, but, using them in such order<sup>146</sup> as shall beseem<sup>147</sup> them, the principal and the effectual medicines against these diseases of tribulation shall we fetch from the high, great, and excellent Physician, without whom we could never be healed of our very deadly disease of damnation; for our necessity wherein, the Spirit of God spiritually speaketh of himself to us, and biddeth us of all our health give him the honor, and therein thus saith unto us: Honora medicum, propter necessitatem enim ordinavit eum Altissimus (“Honor thou the physician, for him hath the high God ordained for thy necessity”).<sup>148</sup>

Therefore, let us require<sup>149</sup> that high Physician, our blessed Savior Christ, whose holy manhood God ordained for our necessity to cure our deadly wounds with the medicine made of the most wholesome blood of his own blessed body, that, likewise as he cured by that incomparable medicine our mortal malady, it may like<sup>150</sup> him to send us and put in our minds such medicines at this time as against the sickness of sorrows and tribulations may so comfort and strengthen us in his grace as our deadly enemy the devil may never have the power, by his poisoned dart of murmur,<sup>151</sup> grudge,<sup>152</sup> and impatience, to turn our short sickness of worldly tribulation into the endless everlasting death of infernal damnation.

THE SECOND CHAPTER

That for a foundation, men must need begin with faith

ANTONY: Since all our principal comfort must come of God, we must first presuppose in him to whom we shall with any ghostly<sup>153</sup> counsel give any effectual comfort, one ground to begin withal,<sup>154</sup> whereupon all that we shall build must be supported and stand: that is to wit,<sup>155</sup> the ground and foundation of faith, without which had ready<sup>156</sup> before, all the spiritual comfort that any man may speak of can never avail<sup>157</sup> a fly. For likewise<sup>158</sup> as it were utterly vain to lay<sup>159</sup> natural reasons of comfort to him that hath no wit,<sup>160</sup> so were it undoubtedly frustrate<sup>161</sup> to lay spiritual causes of comfort to him that hath no faith. For except<sup>162</sup> a man first believe that Holy Scripture is the word of God, and that the word of God is true, how can a man take any comfort of that that<sup>163</sup> the Scripture telleth him therein? Needs must the man take little fruit of the Scripture if he either believe not that it were the word of God, or else ween<sup>164</sup> that though it were, it might yet be, for all that, untrue. This faith, as it is more faint or more strong, so shall the comfortable words of Holy Scripture stand the man in more stead<sup>165</sup> or less. This virtue of faith can neither any man give himself, nor yet any one man another, but though men may with preaching be ministers unto God therein, and the man, with his own free will obeying freely the inward inspiration of God, be a weak worker with almighty God therein, yet is the faith indeed the gracious gift of God himself. For as Saint James saith, Omne datum optimum et omne donum perfectum de sursum est, descendens a Patre luminum (“Every good gift, and every perfect gift, is given from above, descending from the Father of lights”).<sup>166</sup> Therefore feeling our faith by many tokens very faint, let us pray to him that giveth it, that it may please him to help and increase it. And let us first say with him in the Gospel, Credo Domine, adiuva incredulitatem meam (“I believe, good Lord, but help thou the lack of my belief”).<sup>167</sup> And after, let us pray with the apostles, Domine, adauge nobis fidem (“Lord, increase our faith”).<sup>168</sup> And finally, let us consider by Christ's saying unto them that if we would not suffer<sup>169</sup> the strength and fervor of our faith to wax<sup>170</sup> lukewarm — or rather, key-cold<sup>171</sup> — and in manner<sup>172</sup> lose his vigor by scattering our minds abroad about so many trifling things that of the matters of our faith we very seldom think, but that we would withdraw our thought from the respect<sup>173</sup> and regard of all worldly fantasies,<sup>174</sup> and so gather our faith together into a little narrow room, and, like the little grain of mustard seed (which is of nature hot), set it in the garden of our soul, all weeds pulled out for the better feeding of our faith, then shall it grow, and so spread up in height that the birds (that is to wit,<sup>175</sup> the holy angels of heaven) shall breed in our soul, and bring forth virtues in the branches of our faith; and then, with the faithful trust that, through the true belief of God's word, we shall put in his promise, we shall be well able to command a great mountain of tribulation to void<sup>176</sup> from the place where he stood in our heart, whereas with a very feeble faith and a faint, we shall be scant able to remove a little hillock. And therefore, as for the first conclusion, as we must of necessity before any spiritual comfort presuppose the foundation of faith, so, since no man can give us faith, but only God, let us never cease to call upon God therefor.<sup>177</sup>

VINCENT: Forsooth,<sup>178</sup> good Uncle, methinketh that this foundation of faith, which, as you say, must be laid first, is so necessarily requisite that without it all spiritual comfort were utterly given in vain. And therefore now shall we pray God for a full and a fast<sup>179</sup> faith. And I pray you, good Uncle, proceed you farther in the process<sup>180</sup> of your matter of spiritual comfort against tribulation.

ANTONY: That shall I, Cousin, with good will.

THE THIRD CHAPTER

The first comfort in tribulation may a man take in this: when he feeleth in himself a desire and longing to be comforted by God

ANTONY: I will, in my poor mind, assign for the first comfort the desire and longing to be by God comforted; and not without some reason call I this the first cause of comfort. For like<sup>181</sup> as the cure of that person is in a manner desperate that<sup>182</sup> hath no will to be cured, so is the discomfort of that person desperate that desireth not his own comfort. 40

And here shall I note you two kinds of folk that are in tribulation and heaviness:<sup>183</sup> one sort that will seek for no comfort, another sort that will. And yet of these that will not are there also two sorts. For first, one sort there are that are so drowned in sorrow that they fall into a careless deadly dullness, regarding nothing, thinking almost on nothing, no more than if they lay in a lethargy, with which it may so fall that wit and remembrance will wear away, and fall even fair<sup>184</sup> from them. And this comfortless kind of heaviness in tribulation is the highest kind of the deadly sin of sloth. Another sort are there that will seek for no comfort, nor yet none receive, but are in their tribulation (be it loss or sickness) so testy, so fumish,<sup>185</sup> and so far out of all patience, that it booteth<sup>186</sup> no man to speak to them. And these are in a manner<sup>187</sup> with impatience so furious as though they were half in a frenzy, and may, with a custom of such fashioned behavior, fall in thereto full and whole. And this kind of heaviness in tribulation is even a mischievous<sup>188</sup> high branch of the mortal sin of ire. And then is there, as I told you, another kind of folk, which fain<sup>189</sup> would be comforted, and yet are they of two sorts too. One sort are those that in their sorrow seek for worldly comfort, and of them shall we now speak the less, for<sup>190</sup> the diverse occasions that we shall after have to touch<sup>191</sup> them in more places than one. But this will I here say, that I learned of Saint Bernard:<sup>192</sup> he that in tribulation turneth himself unto worldly vanities, to get help and comfort by them, fareth like a man that in peril of drowning catcheth whatsoever cometh next to hand, and that holdeth he fast, be it never so simple a stick; but then that helpeth him not, for that stick he draweth down under the water with him, and there lie they drowned together.<sup>193</sup> 75

So surely, if we custom<sup>194</sup> ourselves to put our trust of comfort in the delight of these peevish<sup>195</sup> worldly things, God shall for that foul fault suffer<sup>196</sup> our tribulation to grow so great that all the pleasure of this world shall never bear us up, but all our 80

173 consideration; esteem 174 delusive imaginations 175 say 176 leave 177 for it 178 In truth 179 steadfast 180 discussion 181 just 182 i.e., in that person who 183 sadness, grief 184 even fair: quite completely 185 irascible, hot-tempered 186 helps 187 in a manner: very nearly, as it were 188 harmful 189 gladly 190 on account of 191 discuss 192 St. Bernard of Clairvaux

(1090–1153) 193 See St. Bernard's Sermon on the Advent of the Lord 1.1. 194 accusation 195 foolish; perverse 196 allow peevish pleasure shall in the depth of tribulation drown with us.

The other sort is, I say, of those that long and desire to be comforted of God. And as I told you before, they have an undoubted great cause of comfort even in that point alone, that they consider themselves to desire and long to be of almighty God comforted.

This mind<sup>197</sup> of theirs may well be cause of great comfort unto them for two great considerations. The one is that they see themselves seek for their comfort where they cannot fail to find it. For God both can give them comfort and will: he can, for he is almighty; he will, for he is all good, and hath promised himself, Petite et accipietis ("Ask and you shall have").<sup>198</sup> He that hath faith (as he must needs have that shall take comfort) cannot doubt but God will surely keep this promise, and therefore hath he a great cause to be of good comfort (as I say) in that he considereth that he longeth to be comforted by him which<sup>199</sup> his faith maketh him sure will not fail to comfort him.

But here consider this, that I speak here of him that in tribulation longeth to be comforted by God, and that is he that referreth the manner of his comforting to God, holding himself content whether it be by taking away or diminishment of the tribulation itself, or by the giving of him patience and spiritual consolation therein. For him that only longeth to have God take his trouble from him, we cannot so well warrant<sup>200</sup> that mind for a cause of so great comfort: for both may he desire that that never mindeth<sup>201</sup> to be the better, and may miss also the effect of his desire, because his request is haply<sup>202</sup> not good for himself. And of this kind of longing and requiring<sup>203</sup> we shall have occasion further to speak hereafter. But he that, referring the manner of his comfort unto God, desireth of God to be comforted, asketh a thing so lawful<sup>204</sup> and so pleasant unto God that he cannot fail to speed;<sup>205</sup> and therefore hath he, as I say, great cause to take comfort in the very desire itself. Another cause hath he to take of that desire a very great occasion of comfort, for since his desire is good, and declareth<sup>206</sup> unto himself that he hath in God a good faith, it is a good token unto him that he is not an abject<sup>207</sup> cast out of God's gracious favor while he perceiveth that God hath put such a virtuous well-ordered appetite<sup>208</sup> in his mind. For as every evil mind cometh of the world and ourselves and the devil, so is every such good mind, either immediately<sup>209</sup> or by the means of our good angel or other gracious occasion, inspired into man's heart by the goodness of God himself. And what a comfort may then this be unto us, when we by that desire perceive a sure undoubted token that toward our final salvation our Savior is himself so graciously busy about us.

THE FOURTH CHAPTER

That tribulation is a means to draw man to that good mind to desire and long for the comfort of God

VINCENT: Forsooth,<sup>210</sup> good Uncle, this good mind of longing for God's comfort is a good cause of great comfort indeed; our Lord in tribulation send it us. But by this I see well that woe may they be which in tribulation lack that mind, and that desireth not to be comforted by God, but are either of<sup>211</sup> sloth or impatience discomfortless,<sup>212</sup> or of folly seek for their chief ease and comfort anywhere else.

ANTONY: That is, good Cousin, very true, as long as they stand in that state; but then must ye consider that tribulation is yet a means to drive him from that state. And that is one of the causes for the which God sendeth it unto man: for albeit that<sup>213</sup> pain was ordained of<sup>214</sup> God for the punishment of sin (for which they that can never now but sin can never be but ever punished in hell), yet in this world, in which his high mercy giveth men space to be better, the punishment by tribulation that he sendeth serveth ordinarily for a means of amendment.

Saint Paul was himself sore<sup>215</sup> against Christ till Christ gave him a great fall, and threw him to the ground and struck him stark blind. And with that tribulation, he turned to him at the first word, and

God was his physician and healed him soon after, both in body and soul, by his minister Ananias, and made him his blessed apostle.<sup>216</sup>

Some are in the beginning of tribulation very stubborn and stiff against God, and yet at length tribulation bringeth them home. The proud king Pharaoh did abide<sup>217</sup> and endure two or three of the first plagues, and would not once stoop at them. But then God laid on a sorer lash, that made him cry to him for help, and then sent he for Moses and Aaron, and confessed himself for a sinner and God for good and righteous, and prayed them to pray for him and to withdraw that plague, and he would let them go. But when his tribulation was withdrawn, then was he naught<sup>218</sup> again.<sup>219</sup> So was his tribulation occasion of his profit, and his help again cause of his harm. For his tribulation made him call to God, and his help made hard his heart again.

Many a man that in an easy tribulation falleth<sup>220</sup> to seek his ease in the pastime of worldly fantasies findeth, in a greater pain, all these comforts so feeble that he is fain<sup>221</sup> to fall to the seeking of God's help. And therefore is, as I say, the very tribulation itself many times a means to bring the man to the taking of the aforeremembered<sup>222</sup> comfort therein — that is to wit,<sup>223</sup> to the desire of comfort given by God, which desire of God's comfort is, as I have proved you, great cause of comfort itself.

THE FIFTH CHAPTER

ANTONY: Howbeit,<sup>224</sup> though the tribulation itself be a means oftentimes to get man this first comfort in it, yet itself sometimes alone bringeth not a man to it. And therefore, since without this comfort first had, there can in tribulation none other good comfort come forth, we must labor<sup>225</sup> the means that<sup>226</sup> this first comfort may come. And thereto seemeth me<sup>227</sup> that if the man — of<sup>228</sup> sloth, or impatience, or hope of worldly comfort — have no mind to desire and seek for comfort of God, those that are his friends that come to visit and comfort him must afore all things put that point in his mind, and not spend the time (as they commonly do) in trifling and turning him to the fancies of the world. They must also move him to pray God to put this desire in his mind, which, when he getteth once, he then hath the first comfort, and without doubt, if it be well-considered, a comfort marvelous great. His friends also that thus counsel him must, unto the attaining thereof, help to pray for him themselves and cause him to desire good folk to help him to pray therefor. And then if these ways be taken for the getting, I nothing doubt but the goodness of God shall give it.

THE SIXTH CHAPTER

It sufficeth not that a man have a desire to be comforted by God only by the taking away of the tribulation

VINCENT: Verily<sup>229</sup> methinketh, good Uncle, that this counsel is very good. For except<sup>230</sup> the person have first a desire to be comforted by God, else<sup>231</sup> can I not see what it can avail to give him any further counsel of any spiritual comfort. Howbeit, what if the man have this desire of God's comfort: that is to wit, that it may please God to comfort him in his tribulation by taking that tribulation from him? Is not this a good desire of God's comfort, and a desire sufficient for him that is in tribulation?

ANTONY: No, Cousin, that is it not. I touched before a word of<sup>232</sup> this point, and passed it over because I thought it would fall in our way again; and so wot<sup>233</sup> I well it will, offer than once. And now am I glad that ye move it me<sup>234</sup> here yourself.

A man may many times well and without sin desire of God the tribulation to be taken from him; but neither may we desire that in every case, nor yet very well in no case (except very few) but under a certain condition either expressed or implied; for tribulations are, ye wot well, of many sundry kinds: some by loss of goods or possessions, and some by the sickness of ourselves, and some by the loss of friends, or by some other pain put unto our bodies,

some by the dread of the losing of those things that we fain<sup>235</sup> would save—under which fear fall all the same things that we have spoken of before. For we may fear loss of goods or possessions, or the loss of our friends, their grief and trouble, or our own, by sickness, imprisonment, or other bodily pain; we may be troubled with the dread of death, and many a good man is troubled most of all with the fear of that thing which he that most need hath, feareth least of all: that is to wit, the fear of losing through deadly<sup>236</sup> sin the life of his seely<sup>237</sup> soul. And this last kind of tribulation is the sorest<sup>238</sup> tribulation of all; though we touch here and there some pieces thereof before, yet the chief part and principal point will I reserve, to treat apart effectually<sup>239</sup> that matter in the last<sup>240</sup> end.

But now, as I said, where the kinds of tribulation are so diverse, some of these tribulations a man may pray God to take from him, and take some comfort in the trust that God will so do. And therefore, against hunger, sickness, and bodily hurt, and against the loss of either body or soul, men may lawfully many times pray to the goodness of God, either for themselves or for their friend. And toward this purpose are expressly prayed many devout orisons<sup>241</sup> in the common service<sup>242</sup> of our mother, holy Church. And toward our help in some of these things serve some of the petitions in the Pater Noster,<sup>243</sup> wherein we pray for our daily food, and to be preserved from the fall in temptation and to be delivered from evil.<sup>244</sup>

But yet may we not always pray for the taking away from us of every kind of temptation. For if a man should in every sickness pray for his health again, when should he show himself content to die and depart unto God? And that mind a man must have, ye wot well, or else it will not be well.

One tribulation is it unto good men to feel in themselves the conflict of the flesh against the soul, the rebellion of sensuality against the rule and governance of reason, the relics that remain in mankind of our old original sin, of which Saint Paul so sore complaineth in his epistle to the Romans.<sup>245</sup> And yet may we not pray while we stand<sup>246</sup> in this life to have this kind of tribulation utterly taken from us. For it is left us by God's ordinance to strive against it and fight withal,<sup>247</sup> and by reason and grace to master it, and use it for the matter of our merit.

For the salvation of our soul may we boldly pray. For grace may we boldly pray—for faith, for hope, and for charity, and for every such virtue as shall serve us to heavenward.<sup>248</sup> But as for all other things before remembered,<sup>249</sup> in which is contained the matter of every kind of tribulation, we may never well make prayer so precisely but<sup>250</sup> that we must express, or imply, a condition therein—that is to wit, that if God see the contrary better for us, we refer it whole<sup>251</sup> to his will, and, instead of our grief taken away, pray that God of his goodness may send us either spiritual comfort to take it gladly, or strength at the leastways to take it patiently. For if we determine with ourselves that we will take no comfort in nothing<sup>252</sup> but in the taking of our tribulation from us, then either prescribe we to God that we will he shall no better turn<sup>253</sup> do us—though he would—than we will ourselves appoint<sup>254</sup> him, or else we declare that what thing is best for us, ourselves can better tell than he.

And therefore, I say, let us in tribulation desire<sup>255</sup> this help and comfort, and let us remit<sup>256</sup> the manner of that comfort unto his own high pleasure; which, when we do, let us nothing doubt but that, like as his high wisdom better seeth what is best for us than we can see ourselves, so shall his sovereign goodness give us the thing that shall indeed be best; for else,<sup>257</sup> if we will presume to stand unto<sup>258</sup> our own choice—except it so be that God offer us the choice himself, as he did to David in the choice of his own punishment after his high pride conceived in the numbering of his people<sup>259</sup>—we may foolishly choose the worse, and by the prescribing unto God ourselves so precisely what we will that he shall do for us, except that of his gracious favor he reject our folly, he shall for indignation grant us our own request, and after shall we well find that it shall turn us to harm. How many men attain health of body, that were better for their soul's health,<sup>260</sup> their body were sick still?

How many men get out of prison that hap on<sup>261</sup> such harms abroad as the prison should have kept them from? How many that have been loath to lose their worldly goods have in keeping of them soon after lost their life? So blind is our mortality, and so
 5 unware<sup>262</sup> what will fall — so unsure also what manner mind<sup>263</sup> we will ourselves have tomorrow — that God could not lightly<sup>264</sup> do man a more vengeance than in this world to grant him his own foolish 10 wishes.

What wit<sup>265</sup> have we poor fools to wit<sup>266</sup> what will serve<sup>267</sup> us, when the blessed Apostle himself, in his sore tribulation praying thrice unto God to take it away from him, was answered again<sup>268</sup> by 15 God in a manner<sup>269</sup> that he was but a fool in asking that request, but that the help of God's grace in that tribulation to strengthen him was far better for him than to take the tribulation from him.<sup>270</sup> And therefore, by experience perceiving well the truth 20 of that lesson, he giveth us good warning not to be too bold of our own mind when we require aught<sup>271</sup> of God, nor to be precise in our asking, but refer<sup>272</sup> the choice to God at his own pleasure. For his own Holy Spirit so sore<sup>273</sup> desireth our weal<sup>274</sup> that, as man might say, he groaneth for us in such wise<sup>275</sup> as no tongue can tell: Nos autem, saith Saint Paul, quid oremus, ut oportet nescimus; sed ipse Spiritus postulat pro nobis gemitibus inenarrabilibus (“What may we 25 pray that were behovable<sup>276</sup> for us, cannot ourselves tell; but the Spirit himself desireth for us with unspeakable groanings”).<sup>277</sup>

And therefore I say for conclusion of this point, let us never ask of God precisely our own ease by delivery from our tribulation, but pray for his aid 35 and comfort by which ways himself shall best like. And then may we take comfort even of our such request, for both are we sure that this mind cometh of God, and also be we very sure that, as he beginneth to work with us, so, but if<sup>278</sup> ourselves flit from 40 him, he will not fail to tarry with us. And then, he dwelling with us, what trouble can do us harm? Si Deus nobiscum, quis contra nos? (“If God be with us,” saith Saint Paul, “who can stand against us?”)<sup>279</sup>

THE SEVENTH CHAPTER

A great comfort it may be in tribulation, that every tribulation is (if we will ourselves) a thing either 45 medicinal or else more than medicinal

VINCENT: You have, good Uncle, well opened<sup>280</sup> and declared<sup>281</sup> the question that I demanded you: that is to wit,<sup>282</sup> what manner<sup>283</sup> comfort a man might 50 pray for in tribulation. And now proceed forth, good Uncle, and show us yet further some other spiritual comfort in tribulation.

ANTONY: This may be, thinketh me, good Cousin, great comfort in tribulation: that every tribulation 55 which anytime falleth unto us is either sent to be medicinal if men will so take it, or may become medicinal if men will so make it, or is better than medicinal but if<sup>284</sup> we will forsake<sup>285</sup> it.

VINCENT: Surely this is very comfortable if we 60 may well perceive it.

ANTONY: These three things that I tell you, we shall consider thus: every tribulation that we fall in cometh either by our own known deserving deed bringing us thereunto, as<sup>286</sup> the sickness that fol-
 65 loweth our intemperate surfeit,<sup>287</sup> or the punishment or other punishment put upon a man for his heinous crime; or else it is sent us by God without any certain deserving cause open<sup>288</sup> and known unto ourselves, either for punishment of some sins past 70 (we certainly know not for which), or for preserving us from some sins in which we were else like<sup>289</sup> to fall; or finally for no respect<sup>290</sup> of the man's sin at all, but for the profit of his patience and increase of his merit. In all the former cases, tribulation is, if 75 we will, medicinal; in this latter case of all, it is yet better than medicinal.

THE EIGHTH CHAPTER

The declaration larger<sup>291</sup> concerning them that fall in tribulation by their own well-known fault, and that yet such tribulation is medicinable

5 VINCENT: This seemeth me very good, good Uncle, saving<sup>292</sup> that it seemeth somewhat brief and short, and thereby methinketh somewhat obscure and dark.

10 ANTONY: We shall therefore, to give it light withal, touch every member<sup>293</sup> somewhat more at large. One member is, ye wot<sup>294</sup> well, of them that fall in tribulation through their own certain well-deserving deed, open and known to themselves, as where we fall in a sickness following upon our own 15 gluttonous feasting, or a man that is punished for his own open fault.

These tribulations, lo, and such other like, albeit that<sup>295</sup> they may seem discomfortable,<sup>296</sup> in that a man may be sorry<sup>297</sup> to think himself the cause of 20 his own harm, yet hath he good cause of comfort in them if he consider that he may make them medicinable for himself, if himself will.

For whereas there was due to that sin, except it were purged here, a far greater punishment after 25 this world in another place, this worldly tribulation of pain and punishment, by God's good provision for him put upon him here in this world before, shall by the means of Christ's Passion (if the man will in true faith and good hope, by meek and patient sufferance of his tribulation, so make it) serve
30 him for a sure medicine to cure him and clearly discharge<sup>298</sup> him of all his sickness and disease of those pains that else he should suffer after; for such is the great goodness of almighty God that he punisheth
35 not one thing twice. And albeit so that<sup>299</sup> this punishment is put unto the man not of his own election and free choice, but so by force as he would fain<sup>300</sup> avoid it, and falleth in it against his will, and therefore seemeth worthy no thanks,<sup>301</sup> yet so far
40 passeth<sup>302</sup> the great goodness of God the poor unperfect<sup>303</sup> goodness of man that, though men make their reckoning one here with another such, God

yet of his bounty in man's account toward him alloweth<sup>304</sup> it far otherwise. For though that<sup>305</sup> a man fall in his pain by his own fault, and also first against 45 his will, yet as soon as he confesseth his fault, and applyeth his will to be content to suffer that pain and punishment for the same, and waxeth<sup>306</sup> sorry — not for that only that<sup>307</sup> he shall sustain such punishment, but for that also that he hath offended God,
50 and thereby deserved much more — our Lord from that time counteth it not for pain taken against his will, but it shall be a marvelous good medicine and work,<sup>308</sup> as a willingly taken pain, the purgation and 55 cleansing of his soul, with gracious remission of his sin, and of the far greater pain that else had been prepared therefor peradventure<sup>309</sup> forever in hell.

For many there are undoubtedly that would else<sup>310</sup> drive forth and die in their deadly sin, which<sup>311</sup> yet in such tribulation — feeling their own frailty so 60 effectually,<sup>312</sup> and the false flattering world failing them so fully — turn goodly to God and call for mercy, and by grace make virtue of necessity, and make a medicine of their malady, taking their trouble meekly, and make a right godly end.
65

Consider well the story of Achan, that<sup>313</sup> committed sacrilege at the great city of Jericho, whereupon God took a great vengeance upon the children of Israel, and after told them the cause, and bade them 70 go seek the fault<sup>314</sup> and try it out by lots:<sup>315</sup> When the lot fell upon the very man that did it — being tried by the falling first upon his tribe, and then upon his family, and then upon his house, and finally upon his person — he might well see that he was deprehended<sup>316</sup> and taken against his will. But
75 yet, at the good exhortation of Joshua saying unto him, Fili mi, da gloriam Deo Israel, et confitere et indica mihi quid feceris, et ne abscondas (“Mine own son, give glory to the God of Israel, and confess and show me what thou hast done, and hide it not”),<sup>317</sup>
80 he confessed humbly the theft, and meekly took his death therefor, and had, I doubt not, both strength and comfort in his pain, and died a very good man, which,<sup>318</sup> if he had never comen in the tribulation — had been in peril — never haply<sup>319</sup> to have had just 85 remorse thereof in all his whole life, but might have died wretchedly and gone to the devil eternally. And thus made this thief a good medicine of his well-deserved pain and tribulation.<sup>320</sup> Consider the well-converted thief that hung on Christ's right hand: did not he — by his meek sufferance and humble knowledge<sup>321</sup> of his fault, asking forgiveness of God, and yet content to suffer for his sin — make of his just punishment and well-deserved tribulation a very good special medicine to cure him of all the pain in the other world, and win him eternal salvation?<sup>322</sup> And thus I say that this kind of tribulation, though it seem the most base and the least comfortable, is yet (if the man will so make it) a very marvellous wholesome medicine, and may therefore be, to the man that will so consider it, a great cause of comfort and spiritual consolation.

THE NINTH CHAPTER

The second point: that is to wit, that tribulation that is sent us by God without any open<sup>323</sup> deserving cause known unto ourselves, and that this kind of tribulation is medicinable if men will so take it, and therefore great occasion of comfort

VINCENT: Verily,<sup>324</sup> mine Uncle, this first kind of tribulation have you to my mind opened<sup>325</sup> sufficiently, and therefore I pray you resort<sup>326</sup> now to the second.

ANTONY: The second kind was, ye wot<sup>327</sup> well, of such tribulation as is so sent us by God that we know no certain cause deserving that present trouble: as we certainly know that upon such a surfeit,<sup>328</sup> we fell in such a sickness; or as the thief knoweth that for such a certain theft, he is fallen into such a certain punishment.

But yet since we seldom lack faults against God worthy<sup>329</sup> and well deserving great punishment indeed, we may well think — and wisdom is so to do — that with sin we have deserved it, and that God for some sin sendeth it, though we certainly know not ourselves for which. And therefore as yet, thus farforth<sup>330</sup> is this kind of tribulation (somewhat in effect) in comfort to be taken like unto the other:

for this, as ye see, if we will thus take it well, reckoning it to be sent for our sin and suffering it patiently therefor, is medicinable against the pain in the other world to come, for our sins in this world past, which is, as I showed you, a cause of right great comfort.

But yet may then this kind of tribulation be to some men of more sober living (and thereby of the more clear conscience) somewhat a little more comfortable, for though they may none otherwise reckon themselves than sinners — for as Saint Paul saith, Nullius mihi conscius sum, sed non in hoc iustificatus sum (“My conscience grudgeth<sup>331</sup> me not of anything, but yet am I not thereby justified”),<sup>332</sup> and Saint John saith, Si dixerimus quia peccatum non habemus, ipsi nos seducimus, et veritas in nobis non est (“If we say that we have no sin in us, we beguile ourselves, and truth is there not in us”)<sup>333</sup> — yet forasmuch as<sup>334</sup> the cause is to them not so certain as it is to the other aforeremembered<sup>335</sup> in the first kind, and that it is also certain that God sometimes sendeth tribulation for keeping and preserving a man from such sin as he should else fall in, and sometimes also for exercise of their patience and increase of merit, great cause of increase in comfort have these folk of the clearer conscience in the fervor of their tribulation, in that they may take the comfort of a double medicine, and of a thing also that is of the kind which we shall finally speak of, that I call better than medicinable. But as I have before spoken of this kind of tribulation, how it is medicinable in that it cureth the sin past, and purchaseth remission of the pain due therefor, so let us somewhat consider how this tribulation sent us by God is medicinable in that it preserveth us from the sin into which we were else like<sup>336</sup> to fall.

If that thing be a good medicine that restoreth us our health when we lose it, a good medicine must this needs be that preserveth our health while we have it, and suffereth<sup>337</sup> us not to fall into that painful sickness that must after drive us to a painful plaster.<sup>338</sup>

Now seeth God sometimes that worldly wealth is with one that is yet good coming upon him so fast that, foreseeing how much weight of worldly

320 See Josh 7:1–26. 321 acknowledgement 322 See Lk 23:32–33, 39–43. 323 evident 324 Truly, Indeed 325 explained 326 pray you resort: ask you

seeing that, inasmuch as 335 previously mentioned 336 else like: otherwise likely 337 allows 338 treatment

wealth the man may bear, and how much will over-charge<sup>339</sup> him and enhance<sup>340</sup> his heart up so high that grace should fall from him low, God of his goodness, I say, preventeth<sup>341</sup> his fall and sendeth

5 him tribulation betime,<sup>342</sup> while he is yet good, to gar him to ken<sup>343</sup> his Maker, and by less liking the false flattering world, set a cross upon the ship of his heart, and bear a low sail thereon, that the boistous blast<sup>344</sup> of pride blow him not under the water.

10 Some young lovely lady, lo, that is yet good enough, God seeth a storm coming toward her that would, if her health and her fat feeding should a little longer last, strike her into some lecherous love, and instead of her old-acquainted knight, lay her

20 very bottom of her stomach<sup>352</sup> that she should not be able to refrain<sup>353</sup> it from him, but suddenly lay it all in his neck.

Did not (as I before showed you) the blessed Apostle himself confess that the high revelations

30 that God had given him might have enhanced<sup>354</sup> him into so high pride that he might have caught a foul fall, had not the provident goodness of God provided for his remedy? And what was his remedy but a painful tribulation, so sore<sup>355</sup> that he was fain<sup>356</sup>

35 to call thrice to God to take the tribulation from him? And yet would God not grant his request, but let him lie so long therein till himself, that saw more in Saint Paul than Saint Paul saw in himself, wist<sup>357</sup> well the time was come in which he might

40 well without his harm take it from him.<sup>358</sup>

And thus ye see, good Cousin, that tribulation is double medicine: both a cure for the sin past, and a preservative from the sin that is to come. And therefore in this kind of tribulation is there good occasion of a double comfort; but that is, I say, diversely to sundry diverse folk, as their own conscience is with sin cumbered<sup>359</sup> or clear.

Howbeit,<sup>360</sup> I will advise no man to be so bold as to think that their tribulation is sent them to keep them from the pride of their holiness: let men leave that kind of comfort hardily<sup>361</sup> to Saint Paul, till their living be like;<sup>362</sup> but of the remnant may men well take great comfort, and good besides.

THE TENTH CHAPTER

Of the third kind of tribulation, which is not sent a man for his sin, but for exercise of his patience and increase of his merit— which is better than medicinal

VINCENT: The third kind, Uncle, that remaineth now behind — that is to wit, which is sent a man by God, and not for his sin (neither committed, nor which would else come), and therefore is not medicinal, but sent for exercise of our patience and increase of our merit, and therefore better than medicinal — though<sup>363</sup> it be, as you say (and as indeed it is), better for the man than any of the other two kinds in another world, where the reward shall be received, yet can I not see by what reason a man may in this world, where the tribulation is suffered, take any more comfort therein than in any of the other twain<sup>364</sup> that are sent a man for his sin, since he cannot here know whether it be sent him for sins before committed, or sin that else should fall,<sup>365</sup> or for increase of merit and reward after to come, namely<sup>366</sup> since every man hath cause enough to fear and to think that his sin already past hath deserved it, and that it is not without peril [for] a man to think otherwise.

ANTONY: This that ye say, Cousin, hath place of truth in far the most part of men, and therefore must they not envy nor disdain<sup>367</sup> — since they may take in their tribulation consolation for their part sufficient — that some other that more be worthy take yet a great deal more. For as I told you, Cousin, though the best man must confess himself a sinner, yet be there many men (though to the multitude,<sup>368</sup> 5 few) that for the kind<sup>369</sup> of their living, and thereby the clearness of their conscience, may well and without sin have a good hope that God sendeth them some great grief for exercise of their patience and for increase of their merit, as it appeareth not only 10 by Saint Paul in the place<sup>370</sup> before remembered, but also by that holy man Job,<sup>371</sup> which in sundry places of his dispicions<sup>372</sup> with his burdenous comforters letted<sup>373</sup> not to say that the clearness of his own conscience declared and showed unto himself 15 that he deserved not the sore tribulation that he then had. Howbeit,<sup>374</sup> as I told you before, I will not advise every man at adventure<sup>375</sup> to be bold upon this manner of comfort. But yet some men know

 I such as I durst,<sup>376</sup> for their more ease and comfort 20 in their great and grievous pain, put them in right good hope that God sendeth it unto them not so much for their punishment as for exercise of their patience. And some tribulations are there also that grow upon<sup>377</sup> such causes that in these cases I would 25 never let, but always would without any doubt give that counsel and comfort to any man.

VINCENT: What causes, good Uncle, be those?

ANTONY: Marry,<sup>378</sup> Cousin, wheresoever a man falleth in tribulation for the maintenance of justice 30 or for the defense of God's cause. For if I should hap to find a man that had long lived a very virtuous life, and had at last happened to fall into the Turk's hands, and there did abide by the truth of his faith, and with the suffering of all kind of torments taken 35 upon his body, still did teach and testify the truth, if I should in his passion<sup>379</sup> give him a spiritual comfort, might I be bold to tell him no further but that he should take patience in this pain, and that God sendeth it him for his sin, and that he is well wor-40 thy to have it although<sup>380</sup> it were yet much more?
 He might well answer me and such other comforters as Job answered his: Onerosi consolatores estis vos

(“Burdenous and heavy comforters be you”).<sup>381</sup> Nay, I would not fail to bid him boldly (while I should see him in his passion) cast sin and hell and pur- 45 gatory and all upon the devil's pate,<sup>382</sup> and doubt not but likewise<sup>383</sup> as if he gave over his hold, all his merit were lost and he turned into misery, so if he stand and persevere still in the confession of his faith, all his whole pain shall turn all into glory. 50

Yet more shall I yet say you than this: that if there were a Christian man that had among those infidels committed a very deadly crime, such as were worthy death not only by their law, but by Christ's too (as manslaughter, adultery, or such other thing like); if, 55 when he were taken, he were offered pardon of his life upon condition that he should forsake the faith of Christ; if this man would now rather suffer death than so do—should I comfort him in his pain but as I would a malefactor?<sup>384</sup> Nay, this man, though he 60 should have died for his sin, dieth now for Christ's sake, while he might live still if he would forsake him. The bare patient taking<sup>385</sup> of his death should have served for the satisfaction of his sin — through the merit of Christ's Passion, I mean, without help 65 of which no pain of our own could be satisfactory.<sup>386</sup> But now shall Christ, for his forsaking<sup>387</sup> of his own life in the honor of his faith, forgive the pain of all his sins of his mere liberality,<sup>388</sup> and accept all the pain of his death for merit of reward 70 in heaven, and shall assign no part thereof to the payment of his debt in purgatory, but shall take it all as an offering, and requite it all with glory. And this man, among Christian men, all had he<sup>389</sup> been before a devil, nothing would I after doubt to take 75 him for a martyr.

VINCENT: Verily,<sup>390</sup> good Uncle, methinketh this is said marvelous well, and it specially delighteth and comforteth me to hear it because of our principal fear that I first spoke of: the Turk's cruel incursion 80 into this country of ours.

ANTONY: Cousin, as for the matter of that fear, I purpose to touch<sup>391</sup> last of all; nor I meant not here to speak thereof, had it not been that the vehemence

368 to the multitude: compared to the total number of people 369 for the kind: because of the manner 370 passage (2 Cor 12:7–10) 371 See Job 16:2. 372 discussions 373 hesitated 374 However 375 at adventure: at

of your objection brought it in my way. But rather would I else have put some example for this place of such as suffer tribulation for maintenance of right and justice, and that rather chose to take harm than do wrong in any manner<sup>392</sup> of matter. For surely if a man may, as indeed he may, have great comfort in the clearness of his conscience that<sup>393</sup> hath a false crime put upon him, and by false witness proved upon him, and he falsely punished and put to worldly shame and pain therefor, a hundred times more comfort may he have in his heart that,<sup>394</sup> where white is called black and right is called wrong, abideth by the truth and is persecuted for justice.

VINCENT: Then if a man sue me wrongfully for my land, in which myself have good right, it is a comfort yet to defend it well, since God shall give me thanks therefor?

ANTONY: Nay, nay, Cousin, nay. There walk ye somewhat wide,<sup>395</sup> for there you defend your own right for your temporal avail.<sup>396</sup> And since Saint Paul counseleth, Non vosmet defendentes carissimi (“Defend not yourselves, most dear friends”),<sup>397</sup> and our Savior counseleth, Si qui vult tecum in iudicio contendere et tunicam tuam tollere dimitte ei et pallium (“If a man will strive with thee at law and take away thy coat, leave him thy gown too”),<sup>398</sup> the defense therefore of our right asketh no<sup>399</sup> reward. Say you speed well if ye get leave;<sup>400</sup> look hardily<sup>401</sup> for no thanks.

But on the other side, if you do as Saint Paul biddeh, Quaerentes non quae sua sunt sed quae aliorum (“Seek not for your own profit but for other folks”),<sup>402</sup> but defend therefore of<sup>403</sup> pity a poor widow, or a poor fatherless child, and rather suffer sorrow by some strong extortion than suffer<sup>404</sup> them take wrong, or if ye be a judge and will have such zeal to justice that ye will rather abide<sup>405</sup> tribulation by the malice of some mighty man than judge wrong for his favor, such tribulations, lo, be those that are better than only medicinable, and every man upon whom they fall may be bold so to reckon them, and in his deep trouble may well say to himself the words that Christ hath taught him for his comfort: Beati misericordes, quia misericordiam consequentur (“Blessed be the merciful men, for they shall have mercy given them”); Beati qui persecutionem patiuntur propter iustitiam, quoniam ipsorum est regnum caelorum (“Blessed be they that suffer persecution for justice, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven”).<sup>406</sup> Here is a high comfort, lo, for them that are in the case. And in this case their own conscience can show it them, and so may fulfill their hearts with spiritual joy that the pleasure may far surmount the heaviness<sup>407</sup> and the grief of all their temporal trouble. But God’s nearer cause of<sup>408</sup> faith against the Turks hath yet a far passing<sup>409</sup> comfort, and by many degrees far excelleth this — which, as I have said, I purpose<sup>410</sup> to treat last. And for this time this sufficeth concerning the special comfort that men may take in the third kind of tribulation.

THE ELEVENTH CHAPTER

Another kind of comfort, yet in the base kind of tribulation, sent for our sin

VINCENT: Of truth, good Uncle, albeit that<sup>411</sup> every of these kinds of tribulation have cause of comfort in them (as ye have well declared), if men will so consider them, yet hath this third kind above all a special prerogative therein.

ANTONY: That is undoubtedly true. But yet is there not, good Cousin, the most base kind of them all but that yet hath more causes of comfort than I have spoken of yet, for I have, ye wot well, in that kind that is sent us for our sin, spoken of none other comfort yet but twain:<sup>412</sup> that is to wit, one that it refraineth us from the sin that else we would fall in, and in that serveth us, through the merit of Christ’s Passion, as a means by which God keepeth us from hell, and serveth for the satisfaction of such pain as else<sup>413</sup> we should endure in purgatory.

Howbeit,<sup>414</sup> there is therein another great cause of joy besides this: for surely these pains sent us here for our sins, in whatsoever wise<sup>415</sup> they hap unto us, be our own sin never so sore,<sup>416</sup> nor never so open and evident unto ourselves and all the world too, yet if we pray for grace to take it meekly and patiently, and, confessing to God that it is far over-little for our fault, beseech him yet — nevertheless<sup>417</sup> that since<sup>418</sup> we shall come hence so void of all 5 good works whereof we should have any reward in heaven — to be not only so merciful unto us as to take that (our present tribulation) in release of our pain in purgatory, but also so gracious unto us as to take our patience therein for a matter of merit and reward in heaven, I verily trust and nothing doubt 10 it but God shall, of his high bounty,<sup>419</sup> grant us our boon.<sup>420</sup> For likewise as in hell pain serveth only for punishment without any manner of purging because all possibility of purging is past, and in purgatory punishment serveth for only purging because 15 the place of deserving<sup>421</sup> is past, so while we be yet in this world, in which is our place and our time of merit and well deserving, the tribulation that is sent us here for our sin shall, if we faithfully so desire, besides the cleansing and purging of our pain, serve us 20 also for increase of reward.

And so shall, I suppose (and trust in God's goodness), all such penance and good works as a man willingly performeth enjoined by his ghostly<sup>422</sup> fa-25 ther in confession, or which he willingly further do of his own devotion besides. For though man's penance, with all the good works that he can do, be not able to satisfy of themselves for the least sin that we do, yet the liberal goodness of God through the merit of Christ's bitter Passion — without which all 30 our works could neither satisfy nor deserve,<sup>423</sup> nor yet do not indeed neither merit nor satisfy so much as a spoonful to a great vesselful in comparison of the merit and satisfaction that Christ hath merited and satisfied for us himself — this liberal goodness 35 of God, I say, shall yet, at our faithful instance<sup>424</sup> and request, cause our penance and tribulation patiently taken in this world to serve us in the other world both for release and reward, tempered after such rate<sup>425</sup> as his high goodness and wisdom shall 40 see convenient<sup>426</sup> for us, whereof our blind mortality cannot here imagine nor devise the stint.<sup>427</sup> And thus hath yet even the first kind of tribulation and the most base — though not fully so great as the second, and very far less than the third — far greater 45 cause of comfort yet than I spoke of before.

THE TWELFTH CHAPTER

A certain objection against the things aforesaid

VINCENT: Verily, good Uncle, this liketh<sup>428</sup> me very well; but yet is there, ye wot<sup>429</sup> well, some of these things now brought in question: for as for 50 any pain due for our sins to be diminished in purgatory by the patient sufferance of our tribulation here, there are, ye wot well, many that utterly deny that, and affirm for a sure truth that there is no purgatory at all; and then is (if they say true) the cause 55 of that comfort gone, if the comfort that we shall take be but in vain and need not. They say, ye wot well also, that men merit nothing at all, but God giveth all for faith alone, and that it were sin and sacrilege to look for any reward in heaven, either 60 for our patient and glad suffering for God's sake, or for any other good deed; and then is there gone, if this be thus, the other cause of our further comfort too.

ANTONY: Cousin, if some things were as they be 65 not, then should some things be as they shall not.
 I cannot indeed say nay but that some men of late have brought up some such opinion, and many more than these besides, and have spread them abroad. And albeit that it is a right heavy thing 70 to see such variance<sup>430</sup> in our belief rise and grow among ourselves — to the great encouraging of the common enemies of us all, whereby they have our faith in derision and catch hope to overwhelm us all — yet do there three things not a little recomfort 75 my mind.

The first is that in some communications had of late together hath appeared good likelihood of some good agreement to grow in one accord of our faith.

The second, that in the meanwhile till this may 80 come to pass, contentions (dispicions<sup>431</sup> with uncharitable behavior) is prohibited and forbidden in effect upon all parties<sup>432</sup> — all such parties, I mean, as fell before to fight for it.

The third is that all Germany, for all their di- 85 verse opinions, yet as they agree together in profession of Christ's name, so agree they now together in preparation of a common power in defense of 417 notwithstanding 418 subsequently

Christendom against our common enemy the Turk. And I trust in God that this shall not only help us here to strengthen us in this war, but also that as God hath caused them to agree together in the defense of his name, so shall he graciously bring them to agree together in the truth of his faith.

Therefore will I let God work and leave off contention, and nothing shall I now say but that with which they that are themselves of the contrary mind shall in reason have no cause to be discontent. For first, as for purgatory, though they think there be none, yet since they deny not that all the corps<sup>433</sup> of Christendom by so many hundred years have believed the contrary — and among them, all the old interpreters of Scripture from the Apostles' days down to our own time, of whom they deny not many for holy saints, that I dare not now believe these men against all those — these men must of their courtesy hold my poor fear excused. And I beseech our Lord heartily for them that when they depart out of this wretched world, they find no purgatory at all, so<sup>434</sup> God keep them from hell. And as for the merit of man in his good works, neither are they that deny it full agreed among themselves, nor any man is there almost of them all that, since he began to write, hath not somewhat changed and varied from himself. And far the more part are thus far agreed with us that like as we grant them that no good work is aught worth to heavenward<sup>435</sup> without faith; and that no good work of man is rewardable in heaven of his<sup>436</sup> own nature but through the mere<sup>437</sup> goodness of God, that list<sup>438</sup> to set so high a price upon so poor a thing; and that this price God setteth through Christ's Passion, and for that also that<sup>439</sup> they be his own works with us (for good works to Godward<sup>440</sup> worketh no man without<sup>441</sup> God work with him); and as we grant them also that no man may be proud of his works, for his<sup>442</sup> own unperfect<sup>443</sup> working and for that that<sup>444</sup> in all that man may do, he can do God no good, but is a servant unprofitable and doth but his bare duty<sup>445</sup> — as we, I say, grant unto them these things, so this one thing or twain do they grant us again:<sup>446</sup> that men are bound to work good works if they have time and power, and that whoso worketh in true faith most shall be most rewarded. But then set they thereto<sup>447</sup> that all his reward shall be given him for his faith alone, and nothing for his works at all, because his faith is the thing, they say, that forceth him to work well. Strive will I not with them for this matter now, but yet this I trust to the great goodness of God: that if the question hang on that narrow point, while Christ saith in the Scripture in so many places that men shall in heaven be rewarded for their works, he shall never suffer our souls — that are but mean-witted men, and can understand his words but as himself hath set them, and as old holy saints hath construed<sup>448</sup> them before, and as all Christian people this thousand years have believed — to be damned for lack of perceiving such a sharp subtle thing, specially since some men that have right good wits, and are besides that right well-learned too, can in no wise<sup>449</sup> perceive for what cause or why these folk that from good works take away the reward, and give the reward all whole to faith alone, give the reward to faith rather than to charity; for this grant they themselves, that faith serveth of nothing, but if<sup>450</sup> she be companied with her sister charity. And then saith the Scripture too, Fides, spes, caritas; tria haec, maior autem horum, caritas (“Of the three virtues faith, hope, and charity, of all these three, the greatest is charity”)<sup>451</sup> — and therefore as worthy to have the thanks<sup>452</sup> as faith. Howbeit, as I said, I will not strive therefor; nor indeed, as our matter standeth, I shall not greatly need. For if they say that he which suffereth tribulation or martyrdom for the faith shall have his high reward, not for his work, but for his well-working faith, yet since they grant that have it he shall, the cause of the high comfort in the third kind of tribulation standeth. And that is, ye wot well, the effect of all my purpose.<sup>453</sup>

VINCENT: Verily, good Uncle, this is truly driven<sup>454</sup> and tried out<sup>455</sup> to the uttermost, as it seemeth me. I pray<sup>456</sup> you proceed at your pleasure.

THE THIRTEENTH CHAPTER

That a man ought to be comfortable to himself, and have good hope, and be joyful also in tribulation appeareth well by this: that a man hath great cause of fear and heaviness that continueth always still in wealth discontinued with no tribulation

ANTONY: Cousin, it were too long work to peruse every comfort that a man may well take in tribulation; for as many comforts, ye wot<sup>457</sup> well, may a man take thereof as there be good commodities<sup>458</sup> therein, and that be there surely so many that it would be very long to rehearse and treat of them. But meseemeth we cannot lightly<sup>459</sup> better perceive what profit and commodity, and thereby what comfort, they may take of it that<sup>460</sup> have it, than if we well consider what harm the lack is, and thereby what discomfort the lack thereof should be, to them that never have it. So it is now that all holy men agree, and all the Scripture is full, and our own experience proveth at our eye,<sup>461</sup> that we be not come into this wretched world to dwell here, nor have not, as Saint Paul saith, “our dwelling city here, but we be seeking for that city that is to come;”<sup>462</sup> and therefore Saint Paul showeth us that we do seek for it because he would put us in mind that we should seek for it, as they that are good folk and fain<sup>463</sup> would come thither do.

For surely whoso<sup>464</sup> setteth so little thereby<sup>465</sup> that he lusteth<sup>466</sup> not to seek therefor, it will be, I fear me, long ere<sup>467</sup> he come thereat, and marvelous great grace if ever he come thither. Sic currite, saith Saint Paul, ut comprehendatis (“Run so that ye may get it”).<sup>468</sup> If it must then be gotten with running, when shall he come at it that list<sup>469</sup> not once to step toward it?

Now because this world is, as I tell you, not our eternal dwelling, but our little while wandering, God would that we should<sup>470</sup> in such wise use it as folk that were weary of it, and that we should in this vale of labor, toil, tears, and misery not look for rest and ease, game, pleasure, wealth, and felicity, for they that so do fare like a fond<sup>471</sup> fellow that, going toward his own house where he should be wealthy, would for a tapster’s<sup>472</sup> pleasure become a hostler<sup>473</sup>

by the way, and die in a stable and never come at home. 45

And would God that those that drown themselves in the desire of this world’s wretched wealth were not yet more fools than so, but alas, their folly as far passeth<sup>474</sup> the foolishness of that other fond fellow as there is distance between the height of heaven and the very depth of hell, for as our Savior saith, Vae vobis qui ridetis nunc, quia lugebitis et flebitis (“Woe may you be that laugh now, for you shall wail and weep”).<sup>475</sup> Est tempus flendi, saith the Scripture, et est tempus ridendi (“There is time of weeping, and there is time of laughing”);<sup>476</sup> but as you see, he setteth the weeping time before, for that is the time of this wretched world, and the laughing time shall come after in heaven. There is also a time of sowing, and a time of reaping too.<sup>477</sup> Now must we in this world sow, that we may in the other world reap, and in this short sowing time of this weeping world must we water our seed with the showers of our tears, and then shall we have in heaven a merry laughing harvest forever. Euntes ibant et flebant, saith the prophet, mittentes semina sua (“They went forth sowing their seeds weeping”)—but what saith he shall follow thereof? Venientes autem venient cum exultatione portantes manipulos suos (“They shall come again more than laughing with great joy and exultation, with their handfuls of corn in their hands”).<sup>478</sup> 60

Lo, they that in their going home toward heaven sow their seeds with weeping shall at the Day of Judgment come to their bodies again with everlasting plentiful laughing. And for to prove that this life is no laughing time, but rather the time of weeping, we find that our Savior himself wept twice or thrice,<sup>479</sup> but never find we that he laughed so much as once. I will not swear that he never did, but at the leastwise he left us no examples of it. But on the other side, he left us example of weeping. Of weeping have we matter enough, both for our own sins and other folks’ too—for surely so should we do: bewail their wretched sins, and not be glad to detract them,<sup>480</sup> nor envy them neither. Alas, seely<sup>481</sup> souls, what cause is there to envy them that are ever wealthy in this world and ever out of tribulation, 85

459 readily, easily 460 who 461 at which,<sup>482</sup> as Job saith, ducunt in bonis dies suos et in puncto ad inferna descendunt (“lead all their days in wealth, and in a moment of an hour descend into their grave and be painfully buried in hell”)?<sup>483</sup>

 5 Saint Paul saith to the Hebrews that God, “those that he loveth, he chastiseth,” et flagellat omnem filium quem recipit (“and he scourgeth every son of his that he receiveth”).<sup>484</sup> Saint Paul saith also, Per multas tribulationes oportet nos introire in regnum Dei
 10 (“By many tribulations must we go into the kingdom of God”).<sup>485</sup> And no marvel, for as our Savior said of himself unto his two disciples that were going into the castle<sup>486</sup> of Emmaus, An nesciebatis quia oportebat Christum pati et sic introire in regnum suum? (“Know you not that Christ must suffer and 15 so go into his kingdom?”)<sup>487</sup> And would we that are servants look for more privilege in our Master’s house than our Master himself? Would we get into his kingdom with ease, when himself got not into 20 his own but by pain?<sup>488</sup> His kingdom hath he ordained for his disciples, and he saith unto us all, Qui vult meus esse discipulus, tollat crucem suam et sequatur me (“If any man will be my disciple, let him learn at<sup>489</sup> me to do as I have done: take his cross of 25 tribulation upon his back and follow me”).<sup>490</sup> He saith not here, lo, “Let him laugh and make merry.”

Now if heaven serve but<sup>491</sup> for Christ’s disciples, and they be those that take their cross of tribulation, when shall these folk come there that<sup>492</sup> never 30 have tribulation? And it be<sup>493</sup> true that Saint Paul saith — that God chastiseth all them that he loveth, and scourgeth every child that he receiveth, and to heaven shall none come but such as he loveth and receiveth — when shall they then come thither 35 whom he never chastiseth, nor never do vouchsafe to file<sup>494</sup> his hands upon them and give them so much as one lash? And if we cannot (as Saint Paul saith we cannot) come to heaven but by many tribulations, how shall they come thither then that never 40 have none at all?

Thus see we well by the very Scripture itself how true the words are of the old holy saints, that with one voice, in a manner,<sup>495</sup> say all one thing: that is to wit, that we shall not have both continual wealth in this world and in the other too. And therefore, since 45 that<sup>496</sup> they that in this world without any tribulation enjoy their long continual course of never-interrupted prosperity have a great cause of fear and of discomfort — lest they be far fallen out of God’s favor, and stand deep in his indignation and displeasure while he never send them tribulation, which he 50 is ever wont<sup>497</sup> to send them whom he loveth — they therefore, I say, that are in tribulation have on the other side<sup>498</sup> a great cause to take in their grief great inward comfort and spiritual consolation. 55

THE FOURTEENTH CHAPTER

A certain objection, and the answer thereto

VINCENT: Verily, good Uncle, this seemeth so indeed, howbeit<sup>499</sup> yet methinketh that you say very 60 sore<sup>500</sup> in something concerning such persons as are in continual prosperity — and they be, ye wot well, not a few. And those are they also that have the rule and authority of this world in their hand; and I wot well that when they talk with such great cunning<sup>501</sup>
 65 men as I trow<sup>502</sup> can tell the truth, and when they ask them whether, while they make merry here in earth all their life, they may not yet, for all that, have heaven after too, they do tell them, “Yes, yes, well enough,” for I have heard them tell them so myself.

ANTONY: I suppose, good Cousin, that no very 70 wise man, and specially none that very good is therewith,<sup>503</sup> will tell any man fully of<sup>504</sup> that fashion; but surely such as so say to them, I fear me that they flatter them, either for lucre<sup>505</sup> or fear. Some of them think peradventure<sup>506</sup> thus: “This man
 75 maketh much of me now, and giveth me money also, to fast and watch<sup>507</sup> and pray for him; but so, I fear me, would he do no more<sup>508</sup> if I should go tell him now that all that I do for him will not serve
 80 him but if<sup>509</sup> he go fast and watch and pray for himself too; for if I should set thereto<sup>510</sup> and say further that my diligent intercession for him should, I trust, be the means that God should the sooner give him grace to amend, and fast and watch and pray

it be 494 vouchsafe to file: deign to defile 495 in a manner: so to speak 496 since that: because; seeing that 497 accused 498 hand 499 although 500 severely, oppressively 501 intelligent; learned 502 trust 503 besides and take affliction in his own body for the bettering of his sinful soul, he would be wondrous wroth<sup>511</sup> with that, for he would be loath to have any such grace at all as should make him go leave off any of his mirth, and so sit and mourn for his sin.” Such mind as this is, lo, have there some of those that are not unlearned and have worldly wit at will, which<sup>512</sup> tell great men such tales as perilously beguile them, rather than the flatterer that so telleth them would with a true tale jeopard<sup>513</sup> to lose his lucre.

Some are there also that such tales tell them for consideration of another fear: for seeing the man so sore<sup>514</sup> set on his pleasure that they despair any amendment of him whatsoever they should show him, and then seeing also besides that the man doth no great harm, but of a gentle nature doth some good men some good, they pray God themselves to send him grace, and so they let him lie lame still in his fleshly lusts ad probaticam piscinam, expectantes aquae motum<sup>515</sup> — at the pool that the Gospel speaketh of, beside the Temple, wherein they washed their sheep for the sacrifice, and they tarry to see the water stirred<sup>516</sup> — and when his good angel coming from God shall once begin to stir the water of his heart, and move him to the lowly meekness of a simple sheep, then if he call them to him, they will tell him another tale, and help to bear him and plunge him into the pool of penance over the hard ears.<sup>517</sup> But in the meanwhile, for fear lest when he would wax<sup>518</sup> never the better, he would wax much the worse — and from gentle, smooth, sweet, and courteous wax angry, rough, froward,<sup>519</sup> and sour, and thereupon be troublous and tedious<sup>520</sup> to the world — to make fair weather withal,<sup>521</sup> they give him fair words for the while, and put him in good comfort, and let him for the remnant stand at his own adventure.<sup>522</sup> And in such wise deal they with him as the mother doth sometimes with her child, which<sup>523</sup> when the little boy would not rise for her in time but lie still abed and slug,<sup>524</sup> and when he is up, weepeth because he hath lain so long, fearing to be beaten at school for his late coming thither, she telleth him it is but early days<sup>525</sup> and he shall come time enough,<sup>526</sup> and biddeth, “Go, good son; I warrant<sup>527</sup> thee, I have sent<sup>528</sup> to thy master myself; take thy bread and butter with thee; thou shalt not be beaten at all.” And so thus she may send him merry forth at door,<sup>529</sup> that he weep not in her sight at home; she studieth<sup>530</sup> not much upon the matter, though he be taken tardy and beaten when he cometh to school. Surely thus, I fear me, fare<sup>531</sup> there many friars, and states<sup>532</sup> chaplains too, in comfort-giving to great men when they be loath to displease them. I cannot commend their thus doing; but surely thus, I fear me, they do.

THE FIFTEENTH CHAPTER

Other objections

VINCENT: But yet, good Uncle, though that<sup>533</sup> some do thus, this answereth not full the matter. For we see that the whole Church, in the common service,<sup>534</sup> use diverse collects,<sup>535</sup> in which all men pray specially for the princes and prelates,<sup>536</sup> and generally every man for other, and for himself too, that God would vouchsafe<sup>537</sup> to send them all perpetual health and prosperity. And I can see no good man pray God send another sorrow, nor no such prayers are there put in the priest’s porteous,<sup>538</sup> as far as I can hear.

And yet if it were as you say, good Uncle, that perpetual prosperity were to the soul so perilous, and tribulation thereto<sup>539</sup> so fruitful, then were, as meseemeth, every man bound of charity not only to pray God send their neighbors sorrow, but also to help thereto themselves; and when folk are sick, not pray God send them health, but when they come to comfort them, they should say, “I am glad, good gossip,<sup>540</sup> that ye be so sick; I pray God keep you long therein”; and neither should any man give any medicine to other, nor take any medicine himself neither, for by the diminishing of the tribulation, he taketh away part of the profit from his soul, which can by no bodily profit be sufficiently recompensed.

And also, this wot<sup>541</sup> ye well, good Uncle: that we read in Holy Scripture of men that were wealthy and rich, and yet very good withal.<sup>542</sup> Solomon was, ye wot well, the richest and wealthiest king that any man could in his time tell of, and yet was he well-beloved with God.

Job was also no beggar, pardie,<sup>543</sup> nor no wretch otherwise, nor lost his riches and his wealth for that<sup>544</sup> God would not that his friend should have wealth, but for the show of his patience, to the increase of his merit and confusion<sup>545</sup> of the devil. And for proof that prosperity may stand with God's favor, Reddidit Deus Iob omnia duplicia ("God restored him double of all that ever he lost"),<sup>546</sup> and gave him after<sup>547</sup> long life to take his pleasure long.<sup>548</sup> Abraham was eke,<sup>549</sup> ye wot well, a man of great substance,<sup>550</sup> and so continued all his life in honor and in wealth—yea, and when he died too, he went unto such wealth that Lazarus, which<sup>551</sup> died in tribulation and poverty, the best place that he came to was that rich man's bosom.<sup>552</sup> Finally, good Uncle, this we find at our eye,<sup>553</sup> and every day we perceive it by plain experience: that many a man is right wealthy, and yet therewith right good, and many a man a miserable wretch, as evil as he is wretched. And therefore it seemeth hard, good Uncle, that between prosperity and tribulation the matter should go thus, that tribulation should always be given by God to all those he loveth for a sign of salvation, and prosperity sent for displeasure as a token of eternal damnation.

THE SIXTEENTH CHAPTER

The answer to the objections

ANTONY: Either I said not, Cousin, or else meant I not to say, that for an undoubted rule worldly pleasure were always displeasing to God, or tribulation evermore wholesome to every man. For well wot<sup>554</sup> I that our Lord giveth in this world unto every sort of folk either sort of fortune: Et facit solem suum oriri super bonos et malos, et pluit super iustos et iniustos ("He maketh his sun to shine both upon the good and the bad, and the rain to rain both upon the just and unjust").<sup>555</sup> And on the other side, Flagellat omnem filium quem recipit ("He scourgeth every son that he receiveth").<sup>556</sup> And yet he beateth not only good folk that he loveth, but multa flagella peccatoris too ("there are many scourges for sinners" also).<sup>557</sup>

He giveth evil folk good fortune in this world both to call them by kindness (and if they thereby come not, the more is their unkindness), and yet where wealth will not bring them, he giveth them sometimes sorrow. And some that in prosperity cannot to God creep forward, in tribulation they run toward him apace:<sup>558</sup> Multiplicatae sunt infirmitates eorum, postea acceleraverunt ("Their infirmities were multiplied," saith the prophet, "and after that, they made haste").<sup>559</sup>

To some that are good men, God showeth wealth here also, and they give him great thanks for his gift, and he rewardeth them for that thanks too. To some good folk he sendeth sorrow, and they thank him thereof too. If God should give the goods of this world only to evil folk, then would men ween<sup>560</sup> that God were not lord thereof; if God would give the goods only to good men, then would folk take occasion to serve him but for them.

Some will in wealth fall to folly: Homo cum in honore esset non intellexit, comparatus est iumentis insipientibus, et similis factus est illis ("When man was in honor, his understanding failed him; then was he compared with beasts and made like unto them").<sup>561</sup>

Some man with tribulation will fall into sin, and therefore saith the prophet, Non relinquet Dominus virgam peccatorum super sortem iustorum ut non extendant iusti ad iniquitatem manus suas ("God will not leave the rod of wicked men upon the lot of righteous men, lest the righteous peradventure hap<sup>562</sup> to extend and stretch out their hands to iniquity").<sup>563</sup>

So say I not nay but<sup>564</sup> that in either state—wealth or tribulation—may be matter of virtue and matter of vice also; but this is the point, lo, that standeth here in question between you and me: not whether every prosperity be a perilous token, but whether continual wealth in this world without any tribulation be a fearful sign of God's indignation. And therefore, this<sup>565</sup> mark that we must shoot at set up well in our sight, we shall now mete<sup>566</sup> for the shot, and consider how near toward or how far off

5 your arrows are from the prick.<sup>567</sup>

VINCENT: Some of my bolts,<sup>568</sup> Uncle, will I now take up myself, and prettily<sup>569</sup> put them under your belt again, for some of them, I see well, be not worth the meting; and no great marvel though<sup>570</sup> I shoot 10 wide, while I somewhat mistake the mark.

ANTONY: These that make toward the mark and light<sup>571</sup> far too short, when the shot is met,<sup>572</sup> shall I take up for you. To prove that perpetual wealth should be no evil token, you lay<sup>573</sup> first that for 15 princes and prelates, and every man for other, we pray all for perpetual prosperity, and that in the common prayers of the Church too.

Then say you secondly that if prosperity were so perilous, and tribulation so profitable, every man 20 ought then to pray God to send others sorrow.

Thirdly, ye further your objections with examples of Solomon, Job, and Abraham.

And fourthly, in the end of all, you prove by experience of our own time daily before our face that 25 some wealthy folk are good, and some needy very naught.<sup>574</sup> That last bolt,<sup>575</sup> since I lie the same<sup>576</sup> myself, you may be content to take up, it lieth so far wide.

VINCENT: That will I with good will, Uncle.

ANTONY: Well, do so then, Cousin, and we shall 30 mete<sup>577</sup> for the remnant. First must you, Cousin, be sure that you look well to the mark, and that can you not but if<sup>578</sup> ye know what thing tribulation is, for since that is one of the things that we principally 35 speak of; but if you consider well what thing that is, you may miss the mark again.

I suppose now that you will agree that tribulation is every such thing as troubleth and grieveth the man, either in body or in mind, and is as it were the 40 prick of a thorn, a bramble, or a briar thrust into his flesh or into his mind. And surely, Cousin, the prick that very sore pricketh the mind as far almost passeth<sup>579</sup> in pain the grief that paineth the body as doth a thorn that sticketh in the heart pass and exceed in 45 pain the thorn that is thrust in the heel.

Now, Cousin, if tribulation be this that I call it, then shall you soon consider this: that there be more kinds of tribulation than peradventure<sup>580</sup> ye thought on before. And thereupon it followeth also that, since every kind of tribulation is an interrup-
50 tion of wealth, prosperity (which is but of wealth another name) may be discontinued<sup>581</sup> by more ways than you would before have weened.<sup>582</sup>

Then say I thus unto you, Cousin: that since tribulation is not only such pains as pain the body, but 55 every trouble also that grieveth the mind, many good men have many tribulations that every man marketh not, and consequently their wealth interrupted therewith when other men are not ware<sup>583</sup> — for trow<sup>584</sup> you, Cousin, that the temptations of the devil, the world, and the flesh, soliciting<sup>585</sup> the mind of a good man to sin, is not a great inward trouble and secret grief in his heart?

To such wretches as care not for their conscience, but like unreasonable beasts follow their foul affec-65 tions, many of these temptations be no trouble at all, but matter of their beastly pleasure. But unto him, Cousin, that standeth in the dread of God, the tribulation of temptation is so painful that to be rid thereof or sure of the victory therein, be his substance<sup>586</sup> never so great, he would gladly give more than half.
70

Now if he that careth not for God think this trouble but a trifle, and with such tribulation prosperity not interrupted, let him cast in his mind if him-
75 self hap upon a fervent longing for the thing which get he cannot — and as a good man will not, as percase<sup>587</sup> his pleasure of some certain good woman that will not be naught — and then let him tell me whether the ruffle<sup>588</sup> of his desire shall so torment 80 his mind as all the pleasure that he can take besides shall, for lack of that one, not please him of a pin.<sup>589</sup> And I dare be bold to warrant<sup>590</sup> him that the pain in resisting, and the great fear of falling, that many a good man hath in his temptation, is an anguish and a grief every deal as great as his.

565 having this 566 measure 567 bull's eye 568 arrows 569 quietly, unobtrusively 570 if; that 571 land 572 measured 573 allege, argue 574 wicked 575 arrow 576 lie the same: am in the same place; agree with you 577 measure 578 but if; unless 579 surpasses 580 perhaps 581 interrupted; broken off, withdrawn 582 thought 583 aware 584 think; believe 585 tempting

586 possessions 587 perhaps 588 disturbance, turbulence 589 of a pin: in the least 590 guarantee, promise

Now say I further, Cousin, that if this be true (as in very deed, true it is) that such trouble is tribulation, and thereby consequently an interruption of prosperous wealth, no man precisely meaneth
 5 to pray for other<sup>591</sup> to keep him in continual prosperity, without any manner of discontinuance or change in this world; for that prayer, without any other condition added or implied, were inordinate and were very childish, for it were to pray that 10 either they should never have temptation, or else that if they had, they might follow it and fulfill their affection.

Who dare, good Cousin, for shame or for sin, for himself or any man else, make this manner kind<sup>592</sup> 15 of prayer? Besides this, Cousin, the Church, ye wot well, adviseth every man to fast, to watch,<sup>593</sup> and pray, both for taming of his fleshly lusts, and also to mourn and lament his sin before committed, and to bewail his offenses done against God—and as they 20 did at the city of Nineveh<sup>594</sup> and as the prophet David did,<sup>595</sup> for their sin put affliction unto their flesh. And when a man so doth, Cousin, is this no tribulation to him because he doth it himself? For I wot well ye would agree that it were, if another 25 man did it against his will. Then is tribulation, ye wot well, tribulation still, though it be taken well in worth<sup>596</sup>—yea, and though it be taken with very right good will, yet is pain, ye wot well, pain, and therefore so is it though a man do it himself.

Then, since the Church adviseth every man to take tribulation for his sin, whatsoever words you find in any prayer, they never mean, ye may be fast<sup>597</sup> 30 and sure, to pray God to keep every good man, nor every bad man neither, from every manner kind of tribulation.

Now he that is not in some kind of tribulation (as peradventure in sickness, or in loss of goods) is not yet out of tribulation if he have his ease of body or of mind inquieted<sup>598</sup>—and thereby his wealth 40 interrupted—with another kind of tribulation, as is either temptation to a good man, or voluntary affliction, either of body by penance, or of mind by contrition and heaviness<sup>599</sup> for his sin and offense against God.

And thus I say that for precise perpetual wealth and prosperity in this wretched world—that is to say, for the perpetual lack of all trouble and all tribulation—there is no wise man that either prayeth for himself or for any man else. And thus answer 50 I your first objection.

Now before I meddle<sup>600</sup> with your second, your third will I join unto this, for upon this answer will the solution of your examples conveniently<sup>601</sup> depend. As for Solomon was, as you say, all his days a marvelous wealthy king, and much was he beloved 55 with God, I wot well, in the beginning of his reign; but that the favor of God persevered with him as his prosperity did, that can I not tell. And therefore will I not warrant it. But surely we see that his continual wealth made him fall, first into such wanton<sup>602</sup> folly in multiplying wives to a horrible number, contrary to the commandment of God given in the law by Moses, and secondly taking to wife, among others, such as were infidels, contrary to another commandment of God's written law also; that 60 finally, by the means of his miscreant<sup>603</sup> wife, he fell into the maintenance<sup>604</sup> of idolatry himself;<sup>605</sup> and of this find we none amendment or repentance, as we find of his father. And therefore, though he were buried where his father was, yet whether he went to the rest that his father did, through some secret sorrow for his sin at last—that is to say, by some kind of tribulation—I cannot tell, and am therefore content to trust well, and pray God he did so. But surely we be not sure. And therefore the example of 65 Solomon can very little serve you; for you might as well lay it for a proof that God favored idolatry as that he favored prosperity, for Solomon was, ye wot well, in both.

As for Job, since our question hangeth upon perpetual prosperity, the wealth of Job, that was with so great adversity so sore interrupted, can (as yourself seeth) serve you for no example. And that God gave him here in this world all things double that he lost little toucheth my matter, which did deny not 80 prosperity to be God's gift and given to some good men too, namely<sup>606</sup> such as have tribulation too.

But Abraham, Cousin, I suppose is all your chief hold,<sup>607</sup> because that you not only show riches and prosperity perpetual in him through the course of 90 all his whole life in this world, but that after his death also, Lazarus—the poor man that lived in tribulation and died for pure hunger and thirst—had after his death his place, comfort, and rest in

Abraham, the wealthy rich man's bosom. But here must you consider that Abraham had not such continual prosperity, but that it was discontinued with diverse tribulations. Was it nothing to him, trow<sup>608</sup> ye, to leave his own country, and at God's sending to go into a strange land which God promised him and his seed forever, but in all his whole life he gave himself<sup>609</sup> never a foot?<sup>610</sup>

Was it no trouble that his cousin<sup>611</sup> Lot and himself were fain<sup>612</sup> to part company because their servants could not agree together?<sup>613</sup>

Though he recovered Lot again from the three kings, was his taking<sup>614</sup> no trouble to him, trow you, in the meanwhile?<sup>615</sup>

Was the destruction of the five cities none heaviness<sup>616</sup> to his heart? A man would ween<sup>617</sup> "yes" that readeth in the story what labor he made to save them.<sup>618</sup>

His heart was, I dare say, in no little sorrow when he was fain to let Abimelech the king have his wife, whom though God provided to keep undefiled, and turned all to wealth, yet was it no little woe to him for the meantime.<sup>619</sup>

What a continual grief was it to his heart many a long day, that he had no child of his own body begotten? He that doubteth thereof shall find it in Genesis, of his own moan made unto God.<sup>620</sup>

No man doubteth but Ishmael was great comfort to him at his birth. And was it no grief then when he was cast out, the mother and the child both?<sup>621</sup>

Isaac, that was the child of promission,<sup>622</sup> although God kept his life, which was unlooked for, yet, while the loving father bound him and went about to behead him, and offer him up in sacrifice, who but himself can conceive what heaviness his heart had then?<sup>623</sup> I would ween in my mind—because you speak of Lazarus—that Lazarus's own death panged not him so sore.<sup>624</sup> Then, as Lazarus' pain was patiently borne, so was Abraham's taken not only patiently, but—which is a thing much more meritorious—of obedience willingly. And therefore, though Abraham had not, as he did indeed, far excel Lazarus in merit of reward for many other things besides—and specially for that he was a special patriarch of the faith—yet had he far passed<sup>625</sup> him even by the merit of tribulation well taken here for God's sake too. And so serveth for your purpose no man less than Abraham.

But now, good Cousin, let us look a little longer here upon the rich Abraham and Lazarus the poor, and as we shall see Lazarus sit in wealth somewhat under the rich Abraham, so shall we see another rich man lie full low beneath Lazarus, crying and calling out of his fiery couch that Lazarus might, with a drop of water falling from his finger's end, a little cool and refresh the tip of his burning tongue.

Consider well, now, what Abraham answered to the rich wretch: Fili, recordare quia recepisti bona in vita tua, et Lazarus similiter mala, nunc autem hic consolatur tu vero cruciaris ("Son, remember that thou hast in thy life received wealth, and Lazarus in like wise pain; but now receiveth he comfort, and thou sorrow, pain, and torment").<sup>626</sup>

Christ describeth his wealth and his prosperity: gay<sup>627</sup> and soft apparel, with royal delicate fare<sup>628</sup> continually, day by day. Epulabatur, saith our Savior, quotidie splendide ("He did fare<sup>629</sup> royally every day")<sup>630</sup>—his wealth was continual, lo, no time of tribulation between. And Abraham telleth him<sup>631</sup> the same tale: that he had taken his wealth in this world, and Lazarus in like wise his pain, and that they had now changed each to the clean<sup>632</sup> contrary, poor Lazarus from tribulation into wealth, and the rich man from this continual prosperity into perpetual pain.

Here was laid expressly to Lazarus no very great virtue by name, nor to this rich glutton no great heinous crime but the taking of his own continual ease and pleasure, without any tribulation or grief. Whereof grew sloth and negligence to think upon the poor man's pain: for that ever himself saw Lazarus and wist him die for<sup>633</sup> hunger at his door, that laid neither Christ nor Abraham to his charge.<sup>634</sup> And therefore, Cousin, this story, lo, of which by occasion of Abraham and Lazarus you put me in remembrance, well declareth<sup>635</sup> what peril is in continual worldly wealth, and contrariwise what comfort cometh of tribulation. And thus, as your

5 THE SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER

An answer to the second objection

VINCENT: Surely, Uncle, you have shaken mine example sore, and have in meting<sup>637</sup> of your shot removed me these arrows, methinketh, farther from the prick<sup>638</sup> than methought they stuck when I shot them; and I shall now be content to take them up again. But yet meseemeth surely that my second shaft may stand: for of truth, if every kind of tribulation be so profitable that it be good to have it (as you say it is), I cannot see wherefore any man should wish or pray or any manner thing do to have any kind of tribulation withdrawn, either from himself or any friend of his.

ANTONY: I think in very deed tribulation so good and so profitable that I should haply<sup>639</sup> doubt as ye do, wherefore a man might labor or pray to be delivered of it, saving<sup>640</sup> that God, which teacheth us the one, teacheth us also the other, and as he biddeth us take our pain patiently, and exhort our neighbor to do also the same, so biddeth he us also not let<sup>641</sup> to do our devoir<sup>642</sup> to remove the pain from us both. And then when it is God that teacheth both, I shall not need to break my brain in devising wherefore he would bid us do both, the one seeming to resist the other.

If he send the scourge of scarcity and great famine, he will we shall<sup>643</sup> bear it patiently, but yet would he that we should eat our meat<sup>644</sup> when we can hap to get it.

If he send us the plague of pestilence, he will we shall patiently take it, but yet will he that we let<sup>645</sup> us blood and lay plasters to draw it,<sup>646</sup> and ripe it,<sup>647</sup> and lance it, and so get it away. Both these points teacheth God in Scripture in more than many places.

40 Fasting is better than eating, and more thanks hath of God, and yet will God that we shall eat. Praying is better than drinking, and much more pleasant to God, and yet will God that we drink. Waking in good business is much more acceptable to God than sleeping, and yet will God that we shall sleep.

God hath given us our bodies here to keep,<sup>648</sup> and will that we maintain them to do him service with, till he send for us hence. Now can we not surely tell how much tribulation may mar it, or peradventure<sup>649</sup> hurt the soul also; wherefore the Apostle,<sup>650</sup> after that he had commanded the Corinthians to deliver to the devil the abominable fornicator that forbore not<sup>651</sup> the bed of his own father's wife, yet after that he had been a while accursed and punished for his sin, the Apostle commanded them charitably to receive him again,<sup>652</sup> and give him consolation, ut non a magnitudine doloris absorbeatur ("that the greatness of his sorrow should not swallow him up").<sup>653</sup>

And therefore when God sendeth the tempest, he will that the shipmen shall get them to their tackling<sup>654</sup> and do the best they can for themselves, that the sea eat them not up; for help ourselves as well as we can, he can make his plague as sore<sup>655</sup> and as long-lasting as himself list.<sup>656</sup> And as he will that we do for ourselves, so will he that we do for our neighbor too, and that we shall in this world be each to other piteous,<sup>657</sup> and not sine affectione,<sup>658</sup> for which the Apostle rebuketh them that<sup>659</sup> lack their tender affections, so that of charity sorry should we be for their pains too, upon whom for cause necessary we be driven ourselves to put it. And whoso<sup>660</sup> saith that for pity of his neighbor's soul, he will have none of<sup>661</sup> his body, let him be sure that, as Saint John saith, "he that loveth not his neighbor, whom he seeth, loveth God but a little, whom he seeth not,"<sup>662</sup> so he that hath no pity on the pain that he feeleth his neighbor feel afore<sup>663</sup> him pitieth little, whatsoever he saith, the pain of his soul that he seeth not yet. God sendeth us also such tribulation sometimes because his pleasure is to have us pray unto him for help. And therefore when Saint Peter was in prison, the Scripture showeth that the whole Church without intermission prayed incessantly for

636 nothing. . . you: did not advance your argument at all 637 measuring 638 bull's-eye 639 perhaps 640 except 641 hesitate 642 task, duty 643 will we shall: wants us to 644 food 645 draw, let out 646 lay plasters to draw it: use curative applications to draw out the

When the disciples in the tempest stood in fear of drowning, they prayed unto Christ and said, 5 Salva nos, Domine, perimus (“Save us, Lord, we perish”);<sup>665</sup> and then, at their prayer, he shortly ceased the tempest.<sup>666</sup> And now see we proved often that in sore weather or sickness, by general processions<sup>667</sup> God giveth gracious help. And many a man in his 10 great pain and sickness by calling upon God is marvelously made whole.

This is God’s goodness, that, because in wealth we remember him not but forget to pray to him, sendeth us sorrow and sickness to force us to draw toward him, and compelleth us to call upon him and pray for release of our pain; whereby, when we learn to know him and seek to him, we take a good occasion to fall after into a further grace.

THE EIGHTEENTH CHAPTER

20 Of them that in tribulation seek not unto God, but some to the flesh, and some to the world, and some to the devil himself

VINCENT: Verily,<sup>668</sup> good Uncle, with this good answer am I well content.

25 ANTONY: Yea, Cousin, but many men are there, with whom God is not content, which<sup>669</sup> abuse this great high goodness of his, whom neither fair treating nor hard handling can cause them to remember their Maker, but in wealth they be wanton,<sup>670</sup> forget 30 God and follow their lust, and when God with tribulation draweth them toward him, then wax they wood<sup>671</sup> and draw back all that ever they may, and rather run and seek help at any other hand than to go fetch it at his.

35 Some for comfort seek to the flesh, some to the world, and some to the devil himself.

Some man that in worldly prosperity is very full of wealth, and hath deep stepped into many a sore<sup>672</sup> sin — which sins, when he did them, he counted for 40 part of his pleasure — God, willing of his goodness to call the man to grace, casteth a remorse into his mind among<sup>673</sup> after his first sleep, and maketh him lie a little while and bethink<sup>674</sup> him. Then beginneth he to remember his life, and from that he falleth to think upon his death, and how he must leave 45 all this worldly wealth within a while behind here in this world and walk hence alone — he wotteth<sup>675</sup> not whither, nor how soon he shall take his journey thither, nor can tell what company he shall meet there. And then beginneth he to think that it

 50 were good to make sure and to be merry so that we be wise therewith, lest there hap to be such black bugs<sup>676</sup> indeed as folk call devils, whose torments he was wont<sup>677</sup> to take for poets’ tales.

These thoughts, if they sink deep, are a sore tribulation, and surely if he take hold of the grace that God therein offereth him, his tribulation is wholesome, and shall be full comfortable to remember that God by this tribulation calleth him and bid-
 55 deth him come home out of the country of sin that he was bred and brought up so long in, and come into the Land of Behest,<sup>678</sup> that floweth<sup>679</sup> milk and honey. And then if he follow this calling (as many one full well doth), joyful shall his sorrow be, and glad shall he be to change his life, leave his wanton 60 lusts, and do penance for his sins, bestowing his time upon better business. But some men, now, when this calling of God causeth them to be sad, they be loath to leave their sinful lusts that hang in their hearts; and specially if they have any such 65 kind of living as they must leave off or fall deeper in sin, or if they have done so many great wrongs that they have many amends to make that must (if they follow God) diminish much their money, then are those folk, alas, woefully bewrapped,<sup>680</sup> for God
 70 pricketh upon them oft of his great goodness still, and the grief of this great pang pincheth them by the heart, and of wickedness they wry<sup>681</sup> away, and from this tribulation they turn to their flesh for help, and labor to shake off this thought. And then 75 they amend their pillow and lay their head softer, and assay<sup>682</sup> to sleep; and when that will not be, then they find a talk awhile with them that lie by them. If that cannot be neither, then they lie and long for day, and then get them forth about their worldly 80 wretchedness, the matter of their prosperity, the selfsame sinful things with which they displease God most. And at length, with many times using this manner, God utterly casteth them off; and then they set nought neither by<sup>683</sup> God nor devil: Peccator cum in profundum venerit, contemnit (“When the sinner cometh into the depth, then he contemneth”),<sup>684</sup> and setteth nought by nothing saving<sup>685</sup> worldly fear that may fall by chance, or that needs must (they wot well) fall once by death.

10 But alas, when death cometh, then cometh again their sorrow: then will no soft bed serve, nor no company make him merry; then must he leave his outward worship<sup>686</sup> and comfort of his glory, and lie panting in his bed as he were on a pinebank.<sup>687</sup> Then 15 cometh his fear of his evil life, and of his dreadful death; then cometh the torment of his cumbered<sup>688</sup> conscience and fear of his heavy judgment. Then the devil draweth him to despair with imagination of hell, and suffereth<sup>689</sup> him not then to take it for a 20 fable. And yet if he do, then findeth it, the wretch, no fable. Ah, woe worth the while, that folk think not of this in time.

God sendeth to some man great trouble in his mind, and great tribulation about his worldly 25 goods, because he would, of his goodness, take his delight and his confidence from them; and yet the man withdraweth no part of his fond fantasies,<sup>690</sup> but falleth more fervently to them than before, and setteth his whole heart, like a fool, more upon
30 them; and then he taketh him all to the devices of his worldly counselors, and, without any counsel of God or any trust put in him, maketh many wise ways (as he weeneth), and all turn at length to folly, and one subtle drift<sup>691</sup> driveth another to naught.<sup>692</sup>

35 Some have I seen — even in their last sickness — sit up in their deathbed underpropped with pillows, take their playfellows to them, and comfort themselves with cards. And this, they said, did ease them well to put fantasies out of their head. And what 40 fantasies, trow you?<sup>693</sup> Such as I told you right now: of their own lewd<sup>694</sup> life and peril of their soul, of heaven and of hell, that irked them to think of, and therefore cast it out with card-play as long as ever

they might, till the pure pangs of death pulled their heart from their play, and put them in the case<sup>695</sup> 45 they could not reckon their game. And then left them their gamers and slyly slunk away, and long was it not ere<sup>696</sup> they galped<sup>697</sup> up the ghost. And what game they came then to, that God knoweth and not I. I pray God it were good, but I fear it very sore.<sup>698</sup> 50

Some men are there also that do as did King Saul: in their tribulation go seek unto the devil. This king had commanded all such to be destroyed as use the false abominable superstition of this ungracious<sup>699</sup> witchcraft and necromancy, and yet fell he to such 55 folly afterward himself that ere he went to battle he sought unto a witch, and besought her to raise up a dead man to tell him how he should speed.<sup>700</sup>

Now had God showed him before by Samuel that he should come to naught, and he went about 60 none amendment, but waxed<sup>701</sup> worse and worse, so that God list<sup>702</sup> not to look to him; and when he sought by the prophet<sup>703</sup> to have answer of God, there came none answer to him, which thing he thought strange, and because he was not with God 65 heard at his pleasure, he made suit to the devil, desiring a woman by witchcraft to raise up dead Samuel. But speed<sup>704</sup> had he such thereof, as commonly they have all that<sup>705</sup> in their business meddle with such matters, for an evil answer had he, and an evil speed<sup>706</sup> thereafter: his army discomfit<sup>707</sup> and himself slain. And as it is rehearsed in Paralipomenon<sup>708</sup> (the tenth chapter of the First Book), one cause of his fall was for lack of trust in God, for which he left<sup>709</sup> to take counsel of God and fell to seek 75 counsel of the witch, against God’s prohibition in the law, and against his own good deed by which he punished and put out all witches so late afore.<sup>710</sup> Such speed let them look for that play the same part (as I see many do) that in a great loss send to seek 80 a conjurer to get their gear<sup>711</sup> again, and marvelous things there they see sometimes, but never groat<sup>712</sup> of their goods.

And many fond fools are there that when they be sick will meddle with no physic, in no manner 85 wise,<sup>713</sup> nor send his water to no cunning man, but

In such wise witches, and in such mad medicines, have their souls more faith a great deal than in God. And thus, Cousin, as I tell you, all these kind of folk in their tribulation call not upon God, but seek for their ease and help otherwise: to the flesh and the world and to the flinging fiend.<sup>719</sup> The tribulation that God's goodness sendeth them for good, themselves by their folly turn into their harm. And they that on the other side seek unto God therein, both comfort and profit they greatly take thereby.

THE NINETEENTH CHAPTER

Another objection, with the answer thereunto

VINCENT: I like well, good Uncle, all your answer herein. But one doubt yet remaineth there in my mind, which riseth upon<sup>720</sup> this answer that you make; and that doubt soiled,<sup>721</sup> I will as for this time, mine own good Uncle, encumber<sup>722</sup> you no further, for methink I do you very much wrong to give you occasion to labor yourself so much, in matter of some study, with long talking at once. I will therefore at this time move<sup>723</sup> you but one thing, and seek some other time for the remnant at your more ease. My doubt, good Uncle, is this: I perceive well, by your answers gathered and considered together, that you will well agree that a man may both have worldly wealth, and yet well go to God; and that on the other side a man may be miserable and live in tribulation, and yet go to the devil. And as a man may please God by patience in adversity, so may he please God by thanksgiving in prosperity.

Now since you grant these things to be such that either of them both may be matter of virtue or else matter of sin — matter of damnation or matter of salvation — they seem neither good nor bad of their own nature, but things of themselves equal and indifferent, turning to good or the contrary after<sup>724</sup> they be taken. And then if this be thus, I can perceive no cause why you should give the preeminence unto tribulation, or wherefore you should reckon more cause of comfort therein than you should reckon to stand in prosperity, but rather a great deal less — by, in a manner,<sup>725</sup> half — since that in prosperity the man is well at ease, and may also by giving thanks to God get good unto his soul, whereas in tribulation, though he may merit by patience, as in abundance of worldly wealth the other may by thanks, yet lacketh he much comfort that the wealthy man hath, in that he is sore grieved with heaviness<sup>726</sup> and pain, besides this also: that a wealthy man, well at ease, may pray to God quietly and merrily, with alacrity and great quietness of mind, whereas he that lieth groaning in his grief cannot endure to pray, nor think almost upon nothing but upon his pain.

ANTONY: To begin, Cousin, where you leave<sup>727</sup> — the prayers of him that is in wealth and him that is in woe — if the men be both naught,<sup>728</sup> their prayers be both like. For neither hath the one list<sup>729</sup> to pray nor the other neither; and as the one is let<sup>730</sup> with his pain, so is the other with his pleasure, saving<sup>731</sup> that the pain stirreth him sometimes to call upon God in his grief, though the man be right bad, where<sup>732</sup> the pleasure pulleth his mind another way, though the man be meetly<sup>733</sup> good.

And this point I think there are few that can, if they say true, say that they find it otherwise. For in tribulation — which cometh, you wot<sup>734</sup> well, in many sundry kinds — any man that is not a dull beast or a desperate<sup>735</sup> wretch calleth upon God, not hovertly<sup>736</sup> but right heartily, and setteth his heart full whole upon his request, so sore he longeth for ease and help of his heaviness.

But when men are wealthy and well at their ease, while our tongue pattereth<sup>737</sup> upon our prayers 5 apace,<sup>738</sup> good God, how many mad ways our mind wandereth the while.

Yet wot I well that in some tribulation, the while such sore sickness there is, or other grievous bodily pain, that hard it were for a man to say a long pair
10 of Matins.<sup>739</sup> And yet some that lie a-dying say full devoutly the Seven Psalms<sup>740</sup> and other prayers with the priest at their own aneling.<sup>741</sup> But those that for the grief of their pain cannot endure to do it, or that be more tender and lack that strong heart and 15 stomach<sup>742</sup> that some others have, God requireth no such long prayers of them; but the lifting up of their heart alone, without any word at all, is more acceptable to him of one in such case<sup>743</sup> than long service so said as folk use<sup>744</sup> to say it in health.

The martyrs in their agony made no long prayers aloud, but one inch of such a prayer so prayed in that pain was worth a whole ell<sup>745</sup> and more, even of their own prayers prayed at some other time.

Great learned men say that Christ, albeit that<sup>746</sup>
25 he was very God, and as God was in eternal equal bliss with his Father, yet as man merited not for us only, but for himself too. For proof whereof they lay,<sup>747</sup> in these words, the authority of Saint Paul: Christus humiliavit semet ipsum factus oboediens
30 usque ad mortem, mortem autem crucis, propter quod et Deus exaltavit illum, et donavit illi nomen quod est super omne nomen, ut in nomine Iesu omne genu flectatur, caelestium, terrestrium, et infernorum, et omnis lingua confiteatur quia Dominus Iesus Christus in gloria est Dei Patris (“Christ hath humbled himself, and became obedient unto the death, and that 35 unto the death of the cross, for which thing God hath also exalted him and given him a name which is above all names, that in the name of Jesus every 40 knee be bowed, both of the celestial creatures and the terrestrial, and of the infernal too, and that every tongue shall confess that our Lord Jesus Christ is in the glory of God his Father”).<sup>748</sup>

Now, if it so be as these great learned men upon 45 such authority of Holy Scripture say—that our

Savior merited as man, and as man deserved reward not for us only, but for himself also—then were there in his deeds, as it seemeth, sundry degrees and difference of deserving, and not his Maundy<sup>749</sup> like merit as his Passion, nor his sleep like merit as his 50 watch<sup>750</sup> and his prayer, no, nor his prayers peradventure<sup>751</sup> all of like merit neither, but though there none was nor none could be in his most blessed person but excellent and uncomparably passing<sup>752</sup> the prayer of any pure creature, yet his own not all alike, 55 but some one far above some other. And then, if it thus be, of all his holy prayers the chief seemeth me those that he made in his great agony and pain of his bitter Passion.

The first, when he thrice fell prostrate in his 60 agony<sup>753</sup>—when the heaviness of his heart with fear of death at hand so painful and so cruel as he well beheld it—made such a fervent commotion in his blessed body that the bloody sweat of his holy flesh
65 dropped down on the ground.<sup>754</sup>

The others were the painful prayers that he made upon the cross, where, for all<sup>755</sup> the torment that he hanged in—of beating, nailing, and stretching out all his limbs, with the wresting of his sinews, and breaking of his tender veins, and the sharp crown
70 of thorns so pricking him into the head that his blessed blood streamed down all his face—in all these hideous pains, in all their cruel despites,<sup>756</sup> yet two very devout and fervent prayers he made: the one for their pardon that so dispiteously<sup>757</sup> put him
75 to this pain, and the other about his own deliverance, commending his own soul unto his holy Father in heaven. These prayers of his—among all that ever he made, made in his most pain—reckon I for the chief. And these prayers of our Savior at his bitter 80 Passion, and of his holy martyrs in the fervor of their torment, shall serve us to see that there is no prayer made at pleasure so strong and effectual as in tribulation.

Now come I to the touching of the reason you 85 make where you tell me that I grant you that both in wealth and in woe some man may be naught and offend God, the one by impatience, the other by fleshly lust; and on the other side, both in tribulation and prosperity too, some man may also do very well and deserve thanks of God by thanksgiving to God, as well of his gift of riches, worship, and wealth as of need, penury, prisonment, sickness, and pain; and that therefore you cannot see 5 for what cause I should give any preeminence in comfort unto tribulation, but rather allow prosperity for the thing more comfortable, and that not a little, but in a manner by double, since therein hath the soul comfort and the body both — the soul by 10 thanks given unto God for his gift, and then the body by being well at ease — where<sup>758</sup> the person pained in tribulation taketh no comfort but in his soul alone.

First, as for your double comfort, Cousin, you 15 may cut off the one: for a man in prosperity, though he be bound to thank God of<sup>759</sup> his gift, wherein he feeleth ease, and may be glad also that he giveth thanks to God, yet for that<sup>760</sup> he taketh his ease here hath he little cause of comfort, except that<sup>761</sup>
 20 the sensual feeling of bodily pleasure you list for<sup>762</sup> to call by the name of comfort — nor I say not nay but that sometimes men use<sup>763</sup> so to take it when they say, “this good drink comforteth well my heart,” but comfort, Cousin, is properly taken by 25 them that take it right, rather for the consolation of good hope that men take in their heart of some good growing toward them than for a present pleasure with which the body is delighted and tickled for the while. Now, though a man without patience
 30 can have no reward for his pain, yet when his pain is patiently taken for God’s sake, and his will conformed to God’s pleasure therein, God rewardeth the sufferer after the rate<sup>764</sup> of his pain. And this thing appeareth by many a place in Scripture, of 35 which some have I showed you, and yet shall I show you more. But never found I any place in Scripture that I remember in which, though the wealthy man thank God for his gift, our Lord promised any reward in heaven because the man took his ease and 40 pleasure here. And therefore, since I speak but of such comfort as is very<sup>765</sup> comfort indeed, by which a man hath hope of God’s favor and remission of his sins (with diminishing of his pain in purgatory, or reward else in heaven), and such comfort cometh of 45 tribulation, and for tribulation well-taken, but not for pleasure, though it be well-taken — therefore of your comfort that you double by prosperity, you may, as I told you, cut very well away the half.

Now, why I give prerogative in comfort unto tribulation far above prosperity, though a man may do
 50 well in both, of this thing will I show you causes two or three, for (as I before have at length showed you) out of all question,<sup>766</sup> continual wealth interrupted with no tribulation is a very uncomfortable token of everlasting damnation, whereupon 55 it followeth that tribulation is one cause of comfort unto a man’s heart, in that it dischargeth him of the discomfort that he might of reason take of overlong-lasting wealth.

Another is that Scripture much commendeth
 60 tribulation as occasion of more profit than wealth and prosperity, not to them only that are therein,<sup>767</sup> but to them too that resort<sup>768</sup> unto them. And therefore saith Ecclesiastes, Melius est ire ad domum luctus quam ad domum convivii. In illa enim finis cunctorum admonetur hominum, et vivens cogitat quid futurum sit (“Better it is to go to the house of weeping and wailing for some man’s death than to the house
 65 of a feast: for in that house of heaviness<sup>769</sup> is a man put in remembrance of the end of every man, and while he yet liveth he thinketh what shall come after”).<sup>770</sup> And yet he further saith, Cor sapientium ubi tristitia est, et cor stultorum ubi laetitia (“The heart of wise men is thereas<sup>771</sup> heaviness is, and the heart of 70 fools is thereas is mirth and gladness”).<sup>772</sup> And verily, thereas you shall hear worldly mirth seem to be commended in Scripture, it is either commonly spoken, as in the person of some worldly-disposed people, or understood of<sup>773</sup> rejoicing spiritual, or meant of 75 some small moderate refreshing of the mind against a heavy uncomfortable dullness.

Now whereas prosperity was to the children of Israel promised in the Old Law as a special gift of God, that was for their imperfection at that time, to 80 draw them to God with gay<sup>774</sup> things and pleasant, as men, to make children learn, give them cake-bread and butter; for as the Scripture maketh mention, that people were much after the manner of children in lack of wit and in waywardness,<sup>775</sup> and therefore was their master Moses called pedagogus<sup>776</sup> — that 90

758 whereas 759 for 760 for that: because 761 except that: except for 762 list for: choose 763 are accustomed 764 after the rate: according to the amount

774 fine, beautiful; merry 775 Jer 3:14 776 See Gal 3:24–5, although Moses himself is never actually called pedagogus.

is, a “teacher of children,” or, as they call such one in the grammar schools, an “usher,” or a “master of the petits”;<sup>777</sup> for as Saint Paul saith, Nihil ad perfectum duxit lex (“The Old Law brought nothing to perfection”).<sup>778</sup>

And God also threateneth folk with tribulation in this world for sin, not for that<sup>779</sup> worldly tribulation is evil, but for that we should be well ware<sup>780</sup> of the sickness of sin, for fear of that thing to follow, which,<sup>781</sup> though it be indeed a very good wholesome thing if we will well take it, is yet, because it is painful, the thing that we be loath to have.

But this I say yet again and again: that, as for the far better thing in this world toward the getting of the very good that God giveth in the world to come, the Scripture undoubtedly so commendeth tribulation that, in respect and comparison thereof, it discommendeth this worldly wretched wealth and discomfortable comfort utterly. For to what other thing soundeth the words of Ecclesiastes that I rehearsed<sup>782</sup> you now, that it is “better to be in the house of heaviness<sup>783</sup> than to be at a feast”? Whereto<sup>784</sup> soundeth this comparison of his, that “the wise man’s heart draweth thither as<sup>785</sup> folk are in sadness, and the heart of a fool is thereas<sup>786</sup> he may find mirth”? Whereto draweth<sup>787</sup> this threat of the wise man, that he that delighteth in wealth shall fall into woe?<sup>788</sup> Risus, saith he, dolore miscbitur, et extrema gaudii luctus occupat (“Laughter shall be mingled with sorrow, and the end of mirth is taken up with heaviness”).<sup>789</sup> And our Savior saith himself, Vae vobis qui ridetis, quia lugebitis et flebitis (“Woe be to you that laugh, for you shall weep and wail”).<sup>790</sup> But he saith on the other side, Beati qui lugent, quoniam illi consolabuntur (“Blessed be they that weep and wail, for they shall be comforted”);<sup>791</sup> and he saith to his disciples, Mundus gaudebit, vos autem dolebitis, sed tristitia vestra vertetur in gaudium (“The world shall joy, and you shall be sorry, but your sorrow shall be turned into joy”);<sup>792</sup> and so is it, you wot well, now, and the mirth of many that then were in joy is now turned all to sorrow. And thus you see by the Scripture plain that in matter of very comfort, tribulation is as far above prosperity as the day is above the night.

Another preeminence of tribulation over wealth in occasion of merit and reward shall well appear upon certain considerations well marked in them both.

Tribulation meriteth in patience, and in the obedient conforming of the man’s will unto God, and in thanksgiving to God for his visitation.<sup>793</sup>

If you reckon me<sup>794</sup> now against these many other good deeds that a wealthy man may do — as<sup>795</sup> by riches give alms, by authority labor in doing many men justice, or if you find further any such other thing like — first I say that the patient person in tribulation hath, in all those virtues of a wealthy man, an occasion of merit too, the which a wealthy man hath not againward<sup>796</sup> in the fore-rehearsed<sup>797</sup> virtues of his; for it is easy for the person that is in tribulation to be well willing to do the selfsame if he could, and then shall his good will, where the power lacketh, go very near to the merit of the deed.

But now is not the wealthy man in a like case with the will of patience and conformity and thanks given to God for tribulation, since it is not so ready<sup>798</sup> for the wealthy man to be content to be in the tribulation that is the occasion of the patient’s desert<sup>799</sup> as for the troubled to be content to be in prosperity to do the good deeds that the wealthy man doth.

Besides this, all that the wealthy man doth, though he could not do them without those things that are accounted for wealth and called by that name — as not do great alms without great riches, nor do those many men right by his labor without authority — yet may he do these things being not in wealth indeed, as where he taketh his wealth for no wealth, nor his riches for no riches, nor in heart setteth by neither nother,<sup>800</sup> but secretly liveth in a contrite heart and a life penitential, as many times did the prophet David, being a great king, so that worldly wealth was no wealth unto him.<sup>801</sup> And therefore it is not of necessity worldly wealth to be cause of these good deeds, since he may do them and doth them best indeed to whom the thing that worldly folk call wealth is yet — for<sup>802</sup> his godly-set mind drawn from the delight thereof — no pleasure in manner<sup>803</sup> nor no wealth at all.

5 Finally, whensoever the wealthy man doth those good virtuous deeds, if we consider the nature of them right, we shall perceive that in the doing of them, he doth ever for the rate<sup>804</sup> and portion of those deeds diminish the matter of his worldly
10 wealth — as in giving great alms, he departeth with<sup>805</sup> so much of his worldly goods, which are in that part the matter of his wealth. In laboring about the doing of many good deeds, his labor diminisheth his quiet and his rest, and for the rate of so much, it diminisheth his wealth — if pain and wealth be each 15 to other contrary, as I ween<sup>806</sup> ye will agree they be.

Now whosoever then will well consider the thing, he shall, I doubt not, perceive and see therein — in these good deeds that the wealthy man doth — 20 though he doth them by that that<sup>807</sup> his wealth maketh him able, yet in the doing of them he departeth for the portion<sup>808</sup> from the nature of wealth toward the nature of some part of tribulation. And therefore even in those good deeds themselves that prosperity doth in goodness, the prerogative of tribulation above wealth appears. Now, if 25 it hap<sup>809</sup> that some man cannot perceive this point because the wealthy man, for all his alms, abideth rich still, and for all his good labor abideth still in his authority, let him consider that I speak but after<sup>810</sup> the portion. And because the portion of all that he giveth of his goods is very little in respect of that he leaveth, therefore is the reason haply<sup>811</sup> with some folk little perceived; but if<sup>812</sup> it so were that 30 he went forth with giving till he had given out all and left himself nothing, then would a very blind man see it: for as he were from riches come to poverty, so were he from wealth willingly fallen into tribulation. And between labor and rest the reason goeth alike, which who can so consider shall see that for the portion in every good deed done by the wealthy man, the matter is all one. Then, since 40 we have somewhat weighed the virtues of prosperity, let us consider on the other side the aforementioned things that are the matter of merit and reward in tribulation: that is to wit,<sup>813</sup> patience, conformity, and thanks. 45

Patience the wealthy man hath not in that that<sup>814</sup> he is wealthy: for if he be pinched<sup>815</sup> in any point wherein he taketh patience, in that part he suffereth 50 some tribulation; and so not by his prosperity, but by his tribulation hath the man that merit.

Like is it if we would say that the wealthy man hath another virtue in the stead<sup>816</sup> of patience: that is to wit, to keep himself from pride, and from such 55 other sins as wealth would bring him to; for the resisting of such motions is, as I before told you, without any doubt a diminishing of fleshly wealth, and is a very true kind — and one of the most profitable kinds — of tribulation, so that all that good merit
60 groweth to the wealthy man not by his wealth, but by the diminishing of his wealth with wholesome tribulation.

The most color of<sup>817</sup> comparison is in the other twain:<sup>818</sup> that is to wit, in the conformity of man's will unto God, and in the thanksgiving unto God; for like as the good man in tribulation sent him by God conformeth his will to God's will in that behalf,<sup>819</sup> and giveth God thanks therefor,<sup>820</sup> so doth the wealthy man, in his wealth which God giveth 70 him, conform his will to God's in that point, since he is well content to take it of<sup>821</sup> his gift, and giveth God again<sup>822</sup> also right hearty thanks therefor.

And thus, as I said, in these two things may you catch the most color<sup>823</sup> to compare the wealthy 75 man's merit with the merit of tribulation. But yet that they be not matches, you may soon see by this: For in tribulation can there none conform his will unto God's and give him thanks therefor but such a man as hath in that point a very special good mind. But he that is very naught,<sup>824</sup> or hath in his heart but very little good, may well be content to take wealth at God's hand and say, "Marry,<sup>825</sup> I thank you, sir, for this, with all mine heart, and will not fail to love you well while you let me fare no worse." Confitebitur tibi cum benefeceris ei.<sup>826</sup> 80

Now if the wealthy man be very good, yet in conformity of his will and thanks given to God for his wealth, his virtue is not like yet to his that doth the same in tribulation. For as the philosophers said in that thing very well of old, virtue standeth in things of hardness and difficulty.<sup>827</sup> And then, as I told you, much less hardness and less difficulty there is by a great deal to be content and to conform our will to God's will—and to give him thanks too—for our ease than for our pain, for our wealth than for our woe. And therefore is the conforming of our will unto God's, and the thanks that we give him for our tribulation, more worthy thanks again,<sup>828</sup> and more reward meriteth in the very fast<sup>829</sup> wealth and felicity of heaven, than our conformity with our thanks given for and in our worldly wealth here.

And this thing saw the devil when he said unto our Lord of Job that it was no marvel though<sup>830</sup> Job had a reverent fear unto God, God<sup>831</sup> had done so much for him and kept him in prosperity; but the devil wist<sup>832</sup> well that it was a hard thing for Job to be so loving and so to give thanks to God in tribulation and adversity. And therefore was he glad to get leave of<sup>833</sup> God to put him in tribulation, and thereby trusted to cause him murmur and grudge<sup>834</sup> against God with impatience.<sup>835</sup> But the devil had there a fall in his own turn. For the patience of Job in the short time of his adversity got him much more favor and thanks of God,<sup>836</sup> and more is he renowned and commended in Scripture<sup>837</sup> for that than for all the goodness of his long prosperous life.

Our Savior saith himself also that if we say well by them or yield them thanks that do us good, we do no great thing therein, and therefore can we with reason look for no great thanks again.

And thus have I showed you, lo, no little preeminence that tribulation hath in merit—and therefore no little preeminence of comfort in hope of heavenly reward—above the virtues, the merit, and cause of good hope and comfort that cometh of wealth and prosperity.

THE TWENTIETH CHAPTER

A summary: comfort of tribulation

ANTONY: And therefore, good Cousin, to finish our talking for this time, lest I should be too long a let<sup>838</sup> unto your other business: If we lay first, for a sure ground, a very fast<sup>839</sup> faith, whereby we believe to be true all that the Scripture saith—understanding truly, as the old holy doctors declare it, and as the Spirit of God instructeth his Catholic Church—then shall we consider tribulation as a gracious gift of God; a gift that he specially gave his special friends; the thing that in Scripture is highly commended and praised; a thing whereof the contrary long-continued is perilous; a thing which, but if<sup>840</sup> God send it, men have need by penance to put upon themselves and seek it; a thing that helpeth to purge our sins past; a thing that preserveth us from sin that else would come; a thing that causeth us set less by<sup>841</sup> the world; a thing that excitemeth us to draw more toward God; a thing that much diminisheth our pains in purgatory; a thing that much increaseth our final reward in heaven; the thing by which our Savior entered his own kingdom; the thing with which all his apostles followed him thither; the thing which our Savior exhorteth all men to; the thing without which, he saith, we be not his disciples; the thing without which no man can get to heaven.

Whoso these things thinketh on, and remembereth well, shall in his tribulation neither murmur nor grudge, but first by patience take his pain in worth,<sup>842</sup> and then shall he grow in goodness and think himself well worthy, then shall he consider that God sendeth it for his weal,<sup>843</sup> and thereby shall he be moved to give God thanks therefor.

Therewith shall his grace increase, and God shall give him such comfort by considering that God is in his trouble evermore near unto him—Quia Deus iuxta est iis qui tribulato sunt corde (“God is near,” saith the prophet, “to them that have their heart in trouble”)<sup>844</sup>—that his joy thereof shall diminish much of his pain. And he shall not seek for vain comfort elsewhere, but specially trust in God and seek for help of him, submitting his own will wholly to God's pleasure, and pray to God in his heart, and pray his friends to pray for him, and specially the priests, as Saint James biddeth.<sup>845</sup> And begin first with confession, and make us clean to God and ready to depart

 5 and be glad to go to God, putting purgatory in his pleasure. If we this do, this dare I boldly say: we shall never live here the less of half an hour but shall with this comfort find our hearts lightened, and thereby the grief of our tribulation lessened, and the more
 10 likelihood to recover and to live the longer. Now, if God will we shall hence, then doth he much more for us, for he that this way taketh cannot go but well; for of him that is loath to leave this wretched world, mine heart is much in fear lest he die not well: hard
 15 it is for him to be welcome that cometh against his will, that saith unto God when he cometh to fetch him, “Welcome, my Maker, maugre my teeth,”<sup>846</sup> but he that so loveth him that he longeth to go to him, mine heart cannot give me but he shall be welcome, all were it<sup>847</sup> so that he should come ere<sup>848</sup> he were well purged, for “charity covereth a multitude of sins,”<sup>849</sup> and “he that trusteth in God cannot be confounded.”<sup>850</sup> And Christ saith, “He that cometh to me, I will not cast him out.”<sup>851</sup> And therefore 20 let us never make our reckoning of long life; keep it while we may because God hath so commanded, but if God give the occasion that with his goodness we may go, let us be glad thereof and long to go to him. And then shall hope of heaven comfort our heaviness,<sup>852</sup> and out of our transitory tribulation shall we 30 go to everlasting glory — to which, my good Cousin, I pray God bring us both.

VINCENT: Mine own good Uncle, I pray God reward you. And at this time will I no longer trouble you. I trow<sup>853</sup> I have this day done you much tribulation, with mine importune<sup>854</sup> objections of very little substance. And you have even showed me an example of sufferance<sup>855</sup> in bearing my folly so long and so patiently. And yet shall I be so bold upon you further as to seek some time to talk forth of the remnant: the most profitable point of tribulation, which you said you reserved to treat of last of all.

ANTONY: Let that be hardily<sup>856</sup> very shortly, Cousin, while this is fresh in mind.

VINCENT: I trust, good Uncle, so to put this in remembrance that it shall never be forgotten with me; our Lord send you such comfort as he knoweth to be best.

ANTONY: That is well said, good Cousin, and I pray the same good for you, and for all our other friends that have need of comfort — for whom, I think, more than for yourself, you needed of some counsel.

VINCENT: I shall, with this good counsel that I have heard of you, do<sup>857</sup> them some comfort, I trust in God — to whose keeping I commit you.

ANTONY: And I you also. Farewell, mine own good Cousin.

THE SECOND BOOK

PREFACE

VINCENT: It is to me, good Uncle, no little 5 comfort that, as I came in here, I heard of<sup>1</sup> your folk that you have had since my last being here (God be thanked) meetly<sup>2</sup> good rest, and your stomach<sup>3</sup> somewhat more come to you. For verily, albeit<sup>4</sup>
 I had heard before that in respect of the great grief 10 that for a month's space had holden you, you were a little before my last coming to you somewhat eased and relieved—for else would I not, for no good,<sup>5</sup> have put you to the pain to talk so much as you then did—yet after my departing from you, remembering 15 how long we tarried together, and that we were all that while in talking, and all the labor yours in talking so long together without interpausing between,<sup>6</sup> and that of matter studious and displeas-ant, all of disease and sickness and other pain and tribu-20 lation, I was, in good faith, very sorry, and not a little wroth<sup>7</sup> with myself for mine own oversight, that I had so little considered your pain; and very feared
 I was, till I heard other word,<sup>8</sup> lest you should have waxed<sup>9</sup> weaker and more sick thereafter. But now I 25 thank our Lord, that hath sent the contrary; for else a little casting back<sup>10</sup> were, in this great age of yours, no little danger and peril.

ANTONY: Nay, nay, good Cousin, to talk much, except some other pain let<sup>11</sup> me, is to me little grief. A fond<sup>12</sup> old man is often so full of words as a woman.
 30 It is, you wot<sup>13</sup> well, as some poets paint<sup>14</sup> us, all the lust<sup>15</sup> of an old fool's life to sit well and warm with a cup and a roasted crab and drivel<sup>16</sup> and drink and talk.

But in earnest,<sup>17</sup> Cousin, our talking was to me 35 great comfort, and nothing displeas-ant at all, for though we communed<sup>18</sup> of sorrow and heaviness, yet was the thing that we chiefly thought upon not the tribulation itself, but the comfort that may grow thereon. And therefore am I now very glad 40 that you be come to finish up the remnant.

VINCENT: Of truth, my good Uncle, it was comfortable to me, and hath been since to some others of your friends, to whom, as my poor wit and remembrance would serve me, I did—and not 45 needless—report and rehearse<sup>19</sup> your most comfortable counsel; and now come I for the remnant, and am very joyful that I find you so well refreshed and so ready thereto. But yet this one thing, good Uncle,
 I beseech you heartily: that if I, for delight to hear 50 you speak in the matter, forget myself and you both, and put you to too much pain, remember you your own ease, and when you list to leave,<sup>20</sup> command me to go my way and seek some other time.

ANTONY: Forsooth,<sup>21</sup> Cousin, many words, if a man were very weak, spoken (as you said right now) 55 without interpausing, would peradventure<sup>22</sup> at length somewhat weary him. And therefore wished I the last time, after you were gone—when I felt myself, to say the truth, even a little weary—that I had not so told you still a long tale alone, but that 60 we had more often interchanged words, and parted the talk between us with ofter enterparling<sup>23</sup> upon your part, in such manner as learned men use between the persons whom they devise disputing in their feigned dialogues. But yet in that point I soon 65 excused you, and laid the lack<sup>24</sup> even where I found it, and that was even upon mine own neck. For I remembered that between you and me it fared as it did once between a nun and her brother.

Very virtuous was this lady, and of a very virtu-70 ous place—a close religion<sup>25</sup>—and therein had been long, in all which time she had never seen her brother, which<sup>26</sup> was in like wise very virtuous too, and had been far off at a university, and had there taken the degree of Doctor in Divinity. When he 75 was come home, he went to see his sister, as he that<sup>27</sup> highly rejoiced in her virtue. So came she to the grate that they call, I trow,<sup>28</sup> the locutory.<sup>29</sup> And after their holy watchword spoken on both the sides, after the 80 manner<sup>30</sup> used in that place, the one took the other be wrungen<sup>31</sup> through the grate; and forthwith<sup>32</sup> began my lady to give her brother a sermon of the wretchedness of this world, and the frailty of the 5 flesh, and the subtle sleight<sup>33</sup> of the wicked fiend,<sup>34</sup> and gave him surely good counsel (saving<sup>35</sup> somewhat too long) how he should be well wary in his living, and master well his body for saving of his soul.

 And yet, ere<sup>36</sup> her own tale came all at an end, she 10 began to find a little fault with him, and said, “In good faith, brother, I do somewhat marvel that you, that have been at learning so long, and are a doctor, and so learned in the law of God, do not now at our meeting (while we meet so seldom) to me, that am 15 your sister and a simple unlearned soul, give of your charity some fruitful exhortation, and as I doubt not but you can say some good thing yourself.” “By my troth,<sup>37</sup> good sister,” quoth her brother, “I cannot for you, for your tongue hath never ceased, but said 20 enough for us both.” And so, Cousin, I remembered that when I was once fallen in,<sup>38</sup> I left you little space to say aught<sup>39</sup> between. But now will I therefore take another way with you, for I shall of our talking drive you to the one half.

25 VINCENT: Now forsooth, Uncle, this was a merry tale. But now, if you make me take the one half, then shall you be contented far otherwise<sup>40</sup> than there was of late a kinswoman of your own — but which will I not tell you; guess her and<sup>41</sup> you can. Her hus-30 band had much pleasure in the manner and behavior of another honest man, and kept him therefore much company, by the reason whereof he was at his mealtime the more oft from home. So happed it on a time that his wife and he together dined or supped 35 with that neighbor of theirs. And then she made a merry quarrel to him for making her husband so good cheer<sup>42</sup> out at door that she could not have him at home. “Forsooth,<sup>43</sup> mistress,” quoth he (as he was a dry merry man), “in my company nothing 40 keepeth him but one. Serve you him with the same, and he will never be from you.” “What gay<sup>44</sup> thing may that be?” quoth our cousin<sup>45</sup> then. “Forsooth, mistress,” quoth he, “your husband loveth well to talk, and when he sitteth with me, I let him have all the words.” “All the words?” quoth she. “Marry,<sup>46</sup> 45 that am I content he shall have: all the words, with good will, as he hath ever had; but I speak them all myself, and give them all to him, and for aught that I care for them, so shall he have them still; but otherwise, to say that he shall have them all — you shall 50 keep him still<sup>47</sup> rather than he get the half.”

ANTONY: Forsooth, Cousin, I can soon guess which of our kin<sup>48</sup> she was. I would we had none therein, for all her merry words, that less would let their husbands for to talk. 55

VINCENT: Forsooth, she is not so merry but she is as good.<sup>49</sup> But where you find fault, Uncle, that I speak not enough, I was in good faith ashamed that I spoke so much, and moved<sup>50</sup> you such questions, as I found upon your answer, might better have been 60 spared, they were so little worth. But now, since I see you be so well-content that I shall not forbear<sup>51</sup> boldly to show my folly, I will be no more so shame-fast,<sup>52</sup> but ask you what me list.<sup>53</sup>

THE FIRST CHAPTER

Whether a man may not in tribulation use some worldly recreation for his comfort 65

VINCENT: And first, good Uncle, ere we proceed further, I will be bold to move<sup>54</sup> you one thing more of that we talked when I was here before. For when 70
 I revolved<sup>55</sup> in my mind again the things that were here concluded by you, methought you would in no wise<sup>56</sup> that in any tribulation men should seek for comfort either in worldly things or fleshly — which mind, Uncle, of yours seemeth somewhat hard. For 75 a merry tale with a friend refresheth a man much, and without any harm lighteneth his mind and amendeth<sup>57</sup> his courage and his stomach,<sup>58</sup> so that it seemeth but well done to take such recreation. And Solomon saith, I trow,<sup>59</sup> that men should in heavi- 80 ness<sup>60</sup> give the sorry<sup>61</sup> man wine to make him forget his sorrow.<sup>62</sup> And Saint Thomas saith that proper pleasant talking, which is called εὐτραπελία,<sup>63</sup> is a good virtue, serving to refresh the mind and make it quick and lusty<sup>64</sup> to labor and study again, where continual fatigation<sup>65</sup> would make it dull and

5

ANTONY: Cousin, I forgot not that point, but I longed not much to touch<sup>67</sup> it. For neither might I well utterly forbear<sup>68</sup> it where the case might hap<sup>69</sup> to fall that it should not hurt, and on the other side,<sup>70</sup> if the case so should fall, methought yet it should little need to give any man counsel to it: folk are prone enough to such fancies of their own mind; you may see this by ourselves, which, coming now together to talk of as earnest sad<sup>71</sup> matter as men can devise, were fallen yet even<sup>72</sup> at the first into wanton<sup>73</sup> idle tales. And of truth, Cousin, as you know very well, myself am of nature even half a giglet<sup>74</sup> and more. I would I could as easily mend my fault as I well know it. But scant<sup>75</sup> can I refrain it, as old a fool as I am; howbeit,<sup>76</sup> so partial will I not be to my fault as to praise it. But for that you require<sup>77</sup> my mind in the matter, whether men in tribulation may not lawfully<sup>78</sup> seek recreation, and comfort themselves with some honest mirth: first agreed that our chief comfort must be of God—and that with him we must begin, and with him continue, and with him end also—a man to take now and then some honest worldly mirth, I dare not be so sore<sup>79</sup> as utterly to forbid it, since good men and well-learned have in some cases allowed it, specially for the diversity of diverse men’s minds; for else,<sup>80</sup> if we were all such as I would God we were, and such as natural wisdom would we should<sup>81</sup> be (and is not all clean<sup>82</sup> excusable that we be not indeed), I would then put no doubt but that unto<sup>83</sup> any man the most comfortable talking that could be were to hear of heaven, whereas now (God help us) our wretchedness is such that in talking a while thereof, men wax<sup>84</sup> almost weary, and as though to hear of heaven were a heavy burden, they must refresh themselves after with a foolish tale.

wonderfully cold; if dread of hell were as far gone, very few would fear God, but that yet a little sticketh in our stomachs: mark me, Cousin, at the sermon, and commonly toward the end, somewhat the preacher speaketh of hell and of heaven; now, while he preacheth of the pains of hell, still they stand<sup>86</sup> and yet give him the hearing; but as soon as he cometh to the joys of heaven, they be busking them<sup>87</sup> backward and flockmeal<sup>88</sup> fall away. It is in the soul somewhat as it is in the body. Some are there, of nature or of evil custom, come to that point that a worse thing sometimes more steadeth them<sup>89</sup> than a better. Some man if he be sick can away with<sup>90</sup> no wholesome meat,<sup>91</sup> nor no medicine can go down with him but if<sup>92</sup> it be tempered<sup>93</sup> with some such thing for his fancy<sup>94</sup> as maketh the meat or the medicine less wholesome than it should be. And yet while<sup>95</sup> it will be no better, we must let him have it so.

60

Cassian,<sup>96</sup> that very good virtuous man, rehearseth in a certain collation<sup>97</sup> of his that a certain holy father, in making of a sermon, spoke of heaven and of heavenly things so celestially that much of his audience with the sweet sound thereof began to forget all the world and fall asleep; which when the father beheld, he dissembled<sup>98</sup> their sleeping and suddenly said unto them, “I shall tell you a merry tale,” at which word they lift up their heads and hearkened unto that, and after the sleep therewith broken, heard him tell on of heaven again. In what wise that good father rebuked then their untoward<sup>99</sup> minds—so dull unto the thing that all our life we labor for, and so quick and lusty toward other trifles—I neither bear in mind nor shall here need to rehearse. But this much of that matter sufficeth for our purpose: that whereas you demand me whether in tribulation men may not sometimes refresh themselves with worldly mirth and recreation, I can no more say but he that cannot long endure to hold up his head and hear talking of heaven except he be now and then between (as though heaven were heaviness) refreshed with a foolish merry tale, there is none other remedy but you must let him have it; better would I wish it, but I cannot help it.

Howbeit, let us, by mine advice, at the leastwise make these kinds of recreation as short and seldom as we can; let them serve us but for sauce, and make them not our meat; and let us pray unto God, and all our good friends for us, that we may feel such a savor in<sup>100</sup> the delight of heaven that in respect of<sup>101</sup> the talking of the joys thereof, all worldly recreation be but a grief to think on. And be sure, Cousin, that if we might once purchase the grace to come to that point, we never of worldly recreation had so much comfort in a year as we should find in bethinking us of heaven in less than half an hour.

15 VINCENT: In faith, Uncle, I can well agree to this, and I pray God bring us once<sup>102</sup> to take such a savor in it. And surely, as you began the other day, by faith must we come to it, and to faith by prayer. But now I pray you, good Uncle, vouchsafe<sup>103</sup> to proceed in 20 our principal matter.

THE SECOND CHAPTER

Of the short uncertain life in extreme age or sickness

ANTONY: Cousin, I have bethought me somewhat of this matter since we were last together, and I find it (if we should go some way to work)<sup>104</sup> a thing that would require many more days to treat of than we should haply<sup>105</sup> find meet<sup>106</sup> thereto in so few as myself ween<sup>107</sup> that I have now to live, while<sup>108</sup> every time is not like<sup>109</sup> with me, and among many painful<sup>110</sup> in which I look every day to depart; my mending days<sup>111</sup> come very seldom and are very shortly gone. For surely, Cousin, I cannot liken myself more meetly<sup>112</sup> now than to the snuff<sup>113</sup> of a candle that burneth within the candlestick nose:<sup>114</sup> for as that snuff burneth down so low that who<sup>115</sup> that looketh on it would ween it were quite out, and yet suddenly lifteth a leam<sup>116</sup> half an inch above the nose, and giveth a pretty short light again, and thus playeth diverse times till at last, ere it be looked 40 for, out it goeth altogether, so have I, Cousin, diverse such days together, as every day of them I look even for to die. And yet have I then after that some such few days again as you see me now have yourself, in which a man would ween that I might yet well continue. But I know my lingering not likely 45 to last long, but out will my soul suddenly someday within a while. And therefore will I with God's help, seem I never so well amended,<sup>117</sup> nevertheless reckon every day for my last, for though that<sup>118</sup> to the repressing of the bold courage of blind youth 50 there is a very true proverb that "as soon cometh a young sheep's skin to the market as an old," yet this difference there is at the least between them: that as the young man may hap sometimes to die soon, so the old man can never live long. And therefore, Cousin, in our matter here, leaving out many things that I would else<sup>119</sup> treat of, I shall for this time speak but of very few, howbeit<sup>120</sup> hereafter, if God send me more such days, then will we, when 55 you list,<sup>121</sup> further talk of more. 60

THE THIRD CHAPTER

He divideth tribulation into three kinds; of which three, the last he shortly passeth over

ANTONY: All manner of tribulation, Cousin, that any man can have, as far as for this time cometh
65 to my mind, falleth under some one at the least of these three kinds: either is it such as himself willingly taketh, or secondly such as himself willingly suffereth, or finally such as he cannot put from him. 70

This third kind I purpose<sup>122</sup> not much more to speak of now, for thereof shall, as for this time, suffice these things that we have treated between us this other day; what kind of tribulation this is, I am sure yourself perceive. For sickness, imprisonment,
75 loss of goods, loss of friends, or such bodily harm as a man hath already caught and can in no wise avoid — these things and such-like are the third kind of tribulation that I speak of, which a man neither willingly taketh in the beginning, nor can, though 80 he would, put willingly away.

Now think I that as to the man that lacketh wit<sup>123</sup> and faith no comfort can serve, whatsoever counsel be given, so to them that have both, I have as to this kind said in manner enough already.

And considering that suffer it needs he must while he can by no manner of means put it from him, the very necessity is half counsel enough to take it in good worth<sup>124</sup> and bear it patiently, and rather of his patience to take both ease and thanks than by fretting and by fuming to increase his present pain, and by murmur and grudge<sup>125</sup> to fall into further danger after, by displeasing of God with his froward<sup>126</sup> behavior. And yet, albeit that<sup>127</sup> I think that that<sup>128</sup> is said sufficeth, yet here and there I shall in the second kind show some such comforts as shall well serve unto this last kind too.

THE FOURTH CHAPTER

ANTONY: The first kind also will I shortly pass:<sup>129</sup> for the tribulation that a man taketh himself willingly, which no man putteth upon him against his own will, is, you wot<sup>130</sup> well, as I somewhat touched the last day, such affliction of the flesh or expense of his goods as a man taketh himself, or willingly bestoweth in punishment of his own sin and for devotion to God.

Now in this tribulation needeth the man none to comfort him; for while no man troubleth him but himself (which feeleth how far-forth he may conveniently bear,<sup>131</sup> and of reason and good discretion shall not pass<sup>132</sup> that—wherein if any doubt arise, counsel needeth,<sup>133</sup> and not comfort), the courage that for God's sake and his soul's health kindleth his heart and inflameth it thereto shall, by the same grace that put it in his mind, give him such comfort and such joy therein that the pleasure of his soul shall pass the pain of his body—yea, and while he hath in heart also some great heaviness<sup>134</sup> for his sin, yet when he considereth the joy that shall come of it, his soul shall not fail to feel then that strange case which my body felt once in a great fever.

VINCENT: What strange case was that, Uncle?

ANTONY: Forsooth,<sup>135</sup> Cousin, even in this same bed—it is now more than fifteen years ago—I lay in a tertian<sup>136</sup> and had passed,<sup>137</sup> I trow,<sup>138</sup> three or four fits.<sup>139</sup> But after<sup>140</sup> fell there on me one fit out of course so strange and so marvelous that I would in good faith have thought it impossible; for I suddenly felt myself verily<sup>141</sup> both hot and cold throughout all my body, not in some part the one and in some part the other (for that had been, you wot well, no very strange thing, to feel the head hot while the hands were cold), but the selfsame parts, I say, so God save my soul, I sensibly felt, and right painfully too, all in one instant both hot and cold at once.

VINCENT: By my faith, Uncle, this was a wonderful thing, and such as I never heard happen<sup>142</sup> any man else in my days. And few men are there of whose mouths I could have believed it.

ANTONY: Courtesy, Cousin, peradventure letteth<sup>143</sup> you to say that you believe it not yet of my mouth neither. And surely for fear of that, you should not have heard it of me neither, had there not happed me another thing soon after.

VINCENT: I pray you, what was that, Uncle?

ANTONY: Forsooth, Cousin, this: I asked a physician or twain that then looked unto me how this should be possible; and they twain told me both that it could not be so, but that I was fallen in some slumber and dreamed that I felt it so.

VINCENT: This hap hold I little cause<sup>144</sup> you to tell the tale the more boldly.

ANTONY: No, Cousin, that is true, lo; but then happed there another: that a young girl<sup>145</sup> here in this town—whom a kinsman of hers had begun to teach physic<sup>146</sup>—told me that there was such a kind of fever indeed.

124 in good worth: as valuable 125 murmur and grudge: muttering complaints and grumbling 126 rebellious, unruly 127 albeit that: although 128 that that: that which 129 go over 130 know 131 which . . . bear: and he himself

VINCENT: By our Lady, Uncle, save for the credence of you,<sup>147</sup> the tale would I not tell again upon that hap of<sup>148</sup> the maid. For though I know her now for such as I durst<sup>149</sup> well believe her, it might hap
5 her very well at that time to lie, because she would ye should<sup>150</sup> take her for cunning.<sup>151</sup>

ANTONY: Yea, but yet happed there another hap thereon, Cousin: that a work of Galen,<sup>152</sup> De differentiis februum, is ready to be sold in the booksellers' shops, in which work she showed me then the chapter where Galen saith the same.<sup>153</sup>

VINCENT: Marry,<sup>154</sup> Uncle, as you say, that hap happed well, and that maid had, as hap was, in that one point more cunning than had both your physicians besides — and hath, I ween,<sup>155</sup> at this day in many points more.

ANTONY: In faith, so ween I too — and that is well-warded<sup>156</sup> on her. For she is very wise and well-learned, and very virtuous too. But see now, what age is, lo! I have been so long in my tale that I have almost forgotten for what purpose I told it. Oh, now I remember, lo: likewise, I say, as myself felt my body then both hot and cold at once, so he that is contrite and heavy<sup>157</sup> for his sin shall have cause to be, and shall be indeed, both sad and glad, and both twain<sup>158</sup> at once, and shall do as I remember holy Saint Jerome biddeth: Et doleas et de dolore gaudeas (“Both be thou sorry,”<sup>159</sup> saith he, “and be thou also of thy sorrow joyful”);<sup>160</sup> and thus, as I began to say, of comfort to be given unto him that is in this tribulation (that is to wit,<sup>161</sup> in fruitful heaviness and penance for his sin) shall we none need to give, other than only to remember and consider well the goodness of God's excellent mercy, that infinitely passeth the malice of all men's sins, by which he is ready to receive every man, and did spread his arms abroad upon the cross lovingly to embrace all them that will come, and even there accepted the thief at his last end, that turned not to God till he might steal no longer,<sup>162</sup> and yet maketh more feast 40 in heaven at one that from sin turneth than of fourscore and nineteen good men that sinned not at all.<sup>163</sup> And therefore of that first kind will I make no longer tale.

THE FIFTH CHAPTER

An objection concerning them that turn not to God till they come at the last cast<sup>164</sup>

VINCENT: Forsooth,<sup>165</sup> Uncle, this is unto that kind comfort very great — and so great also that it may make many a man bold to abide in his sin even 50 unto his end, trusting to be then saved as that thief was.

ANTONY: Very sooth you say, Cousin, that some wretches are there such that<sup>166</sup> in such wise abuse the great goodness of God, that the better that he is, the worse again<sup>167</sup> be they. But, Cousin, though there be more joy made of his turning that<sup>168</sup> from the point of perdition cometh to salvation — for pity that God had, and his saints all, of the peril of perishing that the man stood in — yet is he not set in like state in heaven as he should have been if he had lived better before, except it so fall<sup>169</sup> that he live so well after, and do so much good, that he therein outrun in the shorter time those good folk that yet did not so much in much longer.

As it proved in the blessed apostle Saint Paul, which<sup>170</sup> of a persecutor became an apostle, and last of all came in into that office, and yet in the labor of sowing the seed of Christ's faith outran all the remnant, and so far-forth<sup>171</sup> that he letted not<sup>172</sup> to say of himself, Plus omnibus laboravi (“I have labored more than all the remnant have”).<sup>173</sup>

But yet, my Cousin, though God, I doubt not, be so merciful unto them that in any time of their life turn and ask his mercy and trust therein, though it be at the last end of a man's life, and hireth him as well for heaven that cometh to work in his vineyard

 5 this parable be bold all his life to lie still in sin. For let him remember that into God's vineyard there goeth no man but he that is called thither. Now he that in hope to be called toward night will sleep out the morning and drink out the day is full likely to 10 pass at night unspoken to, and then shall he with shrewd<sup>175</sup> rest go supperless to bed.

They tell of one that was wont<sup>176</sup> always to say that all the while he lived he would do what he list;<sup>177</sup> for three words when he died should make 15 all safe enough. But then so happed it that long ere he were old, his horse once stumbled upon a broken bridge; and as he labored to recover him, when he saw it would not be, but down into the flood headlong needs he should, in a sudden flight<sup>178</sup> he cried
 20 out in the falling, "Have all to the devil!" And there was he drowned—with his three words ere he died, whereon his hope hung all his wretched life. And therefore let no man sin in hope of grace; grace cometh but at God's will, and that mind may be the 25 let<sup>179</sup> that grace of fruitful repenting shall never after be offered him, but that he shall either graceless go linger on careless, or with a care fruitless fall into despair.

THE SIXTH CHAPTER

30 An objection of them that say the tribulation of penance needeth not, but is a superstitious folly

VINCENT: Forsooth, Uncle, in this point methinketh you say very well. But then are there some again that say on the other side that heaviness<sup>180</sup> for our 35 sins we shall need none at all, but only change our intent and purpose to do better, and for all that that<sup>181</sup> is past take no thought at all.

And as for fasting and other affliction of the body, they say we should not do it but only to tame 40 the flesh when we feel it wax wanton<sup>182</sup> and begin to rebel; for fasting, they say, serveth to keep the body

in temperance. But for to fast for penance, or to do any other good work, alms-deed or other, toward satisfaction of our own sin, this thing they call plain 45 injury to the Passion of Christ, by which only are our sins forgiven freely, without any recompense<sup>183</sup> of our own. And they that would do penance for their own sins look to be their own Christs and pay their own ransoms, and save their souls themselves. And with these reasons, in Saxony many cast fasting
 50 off, and all other bodily affliction, save<sup>184</sup> only where need requireth to bring the body to temperance; for other good, they say, can it none do to ourselves, and then to our neighbor can it do none at all. And therefore they condemn it for superstitious folly. 55

Now heaviness of heart and weeping for our sins, this they reckon shame almost and womanish peevishness<sup>185</sup>—howbeit,<sup>186</sup> thanked be God, their women wax<sup>187</sup> there now so mannish that they be not so peevish nor so poor of spirit, but<sup>188</sup> that they 60 can sin on as men do, and be neither afraid nor ashamed, nor weep for their sins at all.

And surely, mine Uncle, I have marveled the less ever since I heard the manner of their preachers there; for, as you remember, when I was in Saxony these matters were, in manner,<sup>189</sup> but in a mammering;<sup>190</sup> nor Luther was not then wedded yet, nor religious men<sup>191</sup> out of their habit,<sup>192</sup> but suffered<sup>193</sup> were those that would be of the sect<sup>194</sup> freely to preach what they would unto the people. And 70 forsooth, I heard a religious man there myself, one that had been reputed and taken for very good, and which, as far as the folk perceived, was of his own living somewhat austere and sharp.<sup>195</sup> But his preaching was wonderful; methink I hear him yet: his voice was so loud and shrill, his learning less than mean.<sup>196</sup> But whereas his matter was much part against fasting and all affliction for any penance, which he called men's inventions, he cried ever
 75 out upon them to keep well the laws of Christ, let go their peevish<sup>197</sup> penance and purpose them<sup>198</sup> to amend, and seek nothing to salvation but the death of Christ: "For he is our justice, and he is our Savior, and our whole satisfaction for all our deadly sins; he did full penance for us all upon his painful cross; 85

174 See Mt 20:1-16. 175 poor; not good 176 accustomed 177 wished, pleased, desired 178 state of agitation 179 hindrance, obstruction 180 sorrow 181 that that: that which 182 wax wanton: become unruly 183 reparation;

satisfaction; atonement 184 except 185 foolishness, silliness 186 however, although 187 grow 188 except 189 in manner: so to speak 190 but . . . mammering: only in a state of doubt 191 religious men: religious-order priests 192 religious uniform 193 allowed 194 those . . . sect: those that later would be Lutherans 195 strict 196 average 197 foolish, silly 198 purpose them: make up their minds; resolve

he washed us there all clean with the water of his sweet side, and brought us out of the devil's danger with his dear precious blood! Leave therefore — leave, I beseech you — these inventions of men, your foolish Lenten fasts and your peevish penance! Diminish never Christ's thanks, nor look to save yourselves! It is Christ's death, I tell you, that must save us all! Christ's death, I tell you yet again, and not our own deeds! Leave your own fasting therefore and lean to<sup>199</sup> Christ alone, good Christian people, for Christ's dear bitter Passion!"

Now so loud and so shrill he cried "Christ" in their ears, and so thick he came forth with "Christ's bitter Passion," and that so bitterly<sup>200</sup> spoken, with the sweat dropping down his cheeks, that I marveled not though<sup>201</sup> I saw the poor women weep. For he made mine hair stand up upon mine head. And with such preaching were the people so brought in<sup>202</sup> that some fell to break the fasts on the fasting days, not of frailty or of malice first,<sup>203</sup> but almost of devotion, lest they should take from Christ the thanks of<sup>204</sup> his bitter Passion. But when they were a while nuzzled<sup>205</sup> in that point first, they could endure and abide after many things more, with which had he begun, they would have pulled him down.<sup>206</sup>

ANTONY: Cousin, God amend that man, whatsoever he be, and God keep all good folk from such manner of preachers. Such one preacher much more abuseth the name of Christ and of his bitter Passion than five hundred hazarders<sup>207</sup> that in their idle business swear and forswear<sup>208</sup> themselves by his holy bitter Passion at the dice.

They carry the minds of the people from the perceiving of their craft<sup>209</sup> by the continual naming of the name of Christ, and crying his Passion so shrilly into their ears.

They forget that the Church hath ever taught them that all our penance, without Christ's Passion, were not worth a pea. And they make the people ween that we<sup>210</sup> would be<sup>211</sup> saved by our own deeds without Christ's death, where<sup>212</sup> we confess that his only Passion<sup>213</sup> meriteth incomparably more for us than all our own deeds do. But his pleasure is that we shall also take pain our own selves with him. And therefore he biddeth all that will be his disciples take their crosses on their back as he did, and with their crosses follow him.<sup>214</sup>

And where they say that fasting serveth but for temperance, to tame the flesh and keep it from wantonness,<sup>215</sup> I would in good faith have went<sup>216</sup> that Moses had not been so wild that for taming of his flesh he should have needed to fast whole<sup>217</sup> forty days together.<sup>218</sup> No, nor Elijah neither,<sup>219</sup> nor yet our Savior himself, which began — and the apostles followed, and all Christendom have kept — the Lenten forty-days' fast that these folk now call so foolish.<sup>220</sup> King Ahab was not disposed to be wanton in his flesh when he fasted and went clothed in sackcloth and all besprent<sup>221</sup> with ashes.<sup>222</sup>

Nor no more was in Nineveh the king and all the city; but they wailed and did painful penance for their sin, to procure<sup>223</sup> God to pity them and withdraw his indignation.<sup>224</sup> Anna, that in her widowhood abode so many years with fasting and praying in the Temple till the birth of Christ, was not, I ween, in her old age so sore disposed to the wantonness of her flesh that she fasted all therefor.<sup>225</sup> Nor Saint Paul, that fasted so much, fasted not all therefor neither.<sup>226</sup> The Scripture is full of places that prove the fasting not to be the invention of man, but the institution of God, and that it hath many more profits than one.

And that the fasting of one man may do good to another, our Savior showeth himself, where he saith that some kinds of devils cannot be by one man cast out of another nisi in oratione et ieiunio ("without prayer and fasting").<sup>227</sup> And therefore I marvel that they take this way against fasting and other bodily penance.

And yet much more I marvel that they mislike the sorrow and heaviness and displeasure of mind that a man should take in forthinking<sup>228</sup> of his sin. The prophet saith, Scindite corda vestra et non vestimenta ("Tear your hearts," saith he, "and not your clothes").<sup>229</sup> And the prophet David saith, Cor

contritum et humiliatum Deus non despicias (“A contrite heart and a humbled” — that is to say, a heart broken, torn, and with tribulation of heaviness for his sin laid alow underfoot — “shall thou not, good Lord, despise”).<sup>230</sup> He saith also, of his own contrition, Laboravi in gemitu meo, lavabo per singulas noctes lectum meum, lacrimis meis stratum meum rigabo (“I have labored<sup>231</sup> in my wailing; I shall every night wash my bed with my tears; my couch will I water”).<sup>232</sup>

But what should I need in this matter lay forth one place or twain?<sup>233</sup> The Scripture is full of those places by which it plainly appeareth that God looketh of duty<sup>234</sup> not only that we should amend and be better in the time to come, but also be sorry,<sup>235</sup> and weep and bewail our sins committed before. And all the old holy doctors be full and whole of that mind: that men must have for their sins contrition and sorrow in heart.

THE SEVENTH CHAPTER

What if a man cannot weep, nor in his heart be sorry, for his sins?

VINCENT: Forsooth,<sup>236</sup> Uncle, yet seemeth me this thing somewhat a sore sentence<sup>237</sup> — not for that<sup>238</sup> I think otherwise but that there is good cause and great wherefore a man so should, but for that of truth some man cannot be sorry and heavy<sup>239</sup> for his sin that he hath done, though he never so fain<sup>240</sup> would. But though he can be content for God’s sake to forbear it from thenceforth,<sup>241</sup> yet for every sin that is past can he not only not weep, but some were haply so wanton<sup>242</sup> that when he happeth to remember them, he can scanty forbear to laugh. Now, if contrition and sorrow of heart be so requisite of necessity to remission, many a man should stand, as it seemeth, in very perilous case.

ANTONY: Many so should indeed, Cousin, and indeed many so do; and the old saints write very sore<sup>243</sup> in this point. Howbeit, Misericordia Domini super omnia opera eius (“The mercy of God is above all his works”),<sup>244</sup> and he standeth not bounden unto common rule; Et ipse cognovit figmentum suum, et propitiatur infirmitatibus nostris (“And he knoweth the frailty of his earthen vessel that is of his own making, and is merciful and hath pity upon our feeble infirmities”),<sup>245</sup> and shall not exact of us above the thing that we may do.

But yet, Cousin, he that findeth himself in that case, in that<sup>246</sup> he is minded to do well hereafter, let him give God thanks that he is no worse; but in that he cannot be sorry for his sin past, let him be sorry hardly<sup>247</sup> that he is no better. And as Saint Jerome biddeth him that<sup>248</sup> for his sin sorroweth in his heart be glad and rejoice in his sorrow, so would I counsel him that cannot be sad for his sin to be sorry yet at the least that he cannot be sorry.

Besides this, though I would in no wise any man should despair, yet would I counsel such a man, while that affection lasteth, not to be too bold of courage, but live in double fear.

First, for it is a token either of faint faith, or of a dull diligence; for surely if we well believe in God, and therewith deeply consider his majesty, with the peril of our sin and the great goodness of God also, either should dread make us tremble and break our stony heart, or love should for sorrow relent<sup>249</sup> it into tears.

Besides this, since I can scant<sup>250</sup> believe but since so little misliking of our old sin is an affection not very pure and clean, and none unclean thing shall enter into heaven,<sup>251</sup> cleansed shall it be and purified before that we come there. And therefore would I further advise one in that case the counsel which Master Gerson<sup>252</sup> giveth every man: that since the body and the soul together make the whole man, the less affliction that he feeleth in his soul, the more pain in recompense let him put upon his body, and purge the spirit by the affliction of the flesh.<sup>253</sup> And he that so doth, I dare my life, shall have his hard heart after relent into tears, and his soul in a wholesome heaviness<sup>254</sup> and heavenly gladness too — specially if (which must be joined with every good thing) he join faithful prayer therewith.

But, Cousin, as I told you the other day before, in these matters with these new men I will not dispute; but surely, for mine own part, I cannot well hold with them, for as far as mine own poor wit can perceive, the Holy Scripture of God is very plain against them. And the whole corps<sup>255</sup> of Christendom in every Christian region — and the very places in which they dwell themselves — have ever unto their own days clearly believed against them. And all the old holy doctors have evermore taught against them. And all the old holy interpreters have construed<sup>256</sup> the Scripture against them. And therefore, if these men have now perceived so late<sup>257</sup> that the Scripture hath been misunderstood all this while, and that of all those old holy doctors no man could understand it, then am I too old at this age to begin to study it now; and trust these men's cunning, Cousin, that dare I not in no wise, since I cannot see nor perceive no cause wherefore I should think that these men might not now in the understanding of Scripture as well be deceived themselves, as they bear us in hand,<sup>258</sup> that all those others have been all this while before.

Howbeit, Cousin, if it so be that their way be not wrong, but that they have found out so easy a way to heaven as to take no thought but make merry, nor take no penance at all, but sit them down and drink well for our Savior's sake — set cock a-hoop<sup>259</sup> and fill in all the cups at once, and then let Christ's Passion pay for all the scot<sup>260</sup> — I am not he that will envy their good hap;<sup>261</sup> but surely counsel dare I give no man to adventure<sup>262</sup> that way with them. But such as fear lest that way be not sure, and take upon them willingly tribulation of penance — what comfort they do take and well may take therein, that have I somewhat told you already. And since these other folk sit so merry without such tribulation, we need to talk to them, you wot<sup>263</sup> well, of no such manner comfort. And therefore of this kind of tribulation will I make an end.

THE EIGHTH CHAPTER

Of that kind of tribulation which, though they not willingly take, yet they willingly suffer

45

VINCENT: Verily, good Uncle, so may you well do, for you have brought it unto a very good pass.<sup>264</sup> And now I require<sup>265</sup> you to come to the other kind, of which you purposed always<sup>266</sup> to treat last.

ANTONY: That shall I, Cousin, very gladly do. The other kind is this, which I rehearsed<sup>267</sup> second, and, sorting out the other twain, have kept it for the last. This kind of tribulation is, you wot well, of them that willingly suffer tribulation, though that<sup>268</sup> of their own choice they took it not at the first. This kind, Cousin, divide we shall into twain. The first might we call temptation; the second, persecution. But here must you consider that I mean not every kind of persecution, but that kind only which, though the sufferer would be loath to fall in, yet will he rather abide<sup>269</sup> it and suffer it than by the flitting from it fall in the displeasure of God, or leave God's pleasure unprocured. Howbeit, if we well consider these two things, temptation and persecution, we may find that either of them is incident<sup>270</sup> to the other. For both by temptation the devil persecuteth us, and by persecution the devil also tempteth us; and as persecution is tribulation to every man, so is temptation tribulation to every good man. Now, though the devil, our spiritual enemy, fight against man in both, yet this difference hath the common temptation from the persecution: that temptation is, as it were, the fiend's train,<sup>271</sup> and persecution, his plain open fight. And therefore will I now call all this kind of tribulation here by the name of temptation, and that shall I divide into two parts. The first shall I call the devil's trains; the other, his open fight.

THE NINTH CHAPTER
First of temptation in general, as it is common to both

ANTONY: To speak of every kind of temptation particularly by itself, this were, ye wot well, in manner an infinite thing; for under that, as I told you, fall persecutions and all. And the devil hath of his trains<sup>272</sup> a thousand subtle ways, and of his open fight as many poisoned darts.

He tempteth us by the world; he tempteth us by our own flesh; he tempteth us by pleasure; he tempteth us by pain; he tempteth us by our foes; he tempteth us by our own friends—and under color<sup>273</sup> of kindred, he maketh many times our next<sup>274</sup> friends our most foes.<sup>275</sup> For as our Savior saith, Inimici hominis domestici eius.<sup>276</sup>

But in all manner of so diverse temptations, one marvelous comfort is this: that with the more we be tempted, the gladder have we cause to be; for as Saint James saith, Omne gaudium existimate, fratres, cum in tentationes varias incideritis (“Esteem it and take it,” saith he, “my brethren, for a thing of all joy when you fall into diverse and sundry manner of temptations”).<sup>277</sup> And no marvel, for there is in this world set up, as it were, a game of wrestling, wherein the people of God come in on the one side, and on the other side come mighty strong wrestlers and wily: that is to wit, the devils, the cursed proud damned spirits. For it is not our flesh alone that we must wrestle with, but with the devil too. Non est nobis colluctatio adversus carnem et sanguinem, sed adversus principes et potestates tenebrarum harum, adversus spiritalia nequitiae in caelestibus (“Our wrestling is not here,” saith Saint Paul, “against flesh and blood, but against the princes and potestates<sup>278</sup> of these dark regions, against the spiritual wicked ghosts of the air”).<sup>279</sup>

But as God—unto them that on his<sup>280</sup> part give his adversary the fall—hath prepared a crown, so he that will not wrestle shall none have; for as Saint Paul saith, Nemo coronabitur nisi qui legitime certaverit (“There shall no man have the crown but he that doth his devoir<sup>281</sup> therefor, according to the law of the game”).<sup>282</sup> And then, as holy Saint Bernard saith, how couldst thou fight or wrestle therefor, if there were no challenger against thee that would provoke thee thereto?<sup>283</sup> And therefore may it be a great comfort, as Saint James<sup>284</sup> saith, to every man that seeth himself challenged and provoked by temptation. For thereby perceiveth he that it cometh to his course<sup>285</sup> to wrestle, which shall be—but if<sup>286</sup> he willingly will play the coward or the fool—the matter of his eternal reward.

A special comfort in all temptation

ANTONY: But now must this needs be to man an inestimable comfort in all temptation, if his faith fail him not: that is to wit, that he may be sure that God is always ready to give him strength against the devil’s might, and wisdom against the devil’s trains.<sup>287</sup> For as the prophet saith, Fortitudo mea et laus mea est Dominus; factus est mihi in salutem (“My strength and my praise is our Lord; he hath been my safeguard”).<sup>288</sup> And the Scripture saith, Pete a Deo sapientiam et dabit tibi (“Ask wisdom of God and he shall give it thee”)<sup>289</sup> ut possitis, as Saint Paul saith, deprehendere omnes artes (“that you may spy and perceive all the crafts”).<sup>290</sup>

A great comfort may this be in all kinds of temptation: that God hath so his hand upon him that is willing to stand and will trust in him and call upon him, that he hath made him sure, by many faithful promises in Holy Scripture, that either he shall not fall, or if he sometimes through faintness of faith stagger or hap to fall, yet if he call upon God betimes,<sup>291</sup> his fall shall be no sore bruising to him, but as the Scripture saith, Iustus si ceciderit non collidetur, quia Dominus supponit manum (“The just man, though he fall, shall not be bruised, for our Lord holdeth under his hand”).<sup>292</sup>

The prophet expresseth a plain comfortable promise of God against all temptation where he saith, Qui habitat in adiutorio Altissimi, in protectione Dei caeli commorabitur (“Whoso dwelleth in the help of the highest God, he shall abide in the protection or defense of the God of heaven”).<sup>293</sup> Who dwelleth now, good Cousin, in the help of the high God? Surely he that through a good faith abideth in the trust and confidence of God’s help, and never for lack of that faith and trust in his help falleth desperate of all help, nor departeth from the hope of his help to seek himself help<sup>294</sup> (as I told you the other day) of the flesh, the world, or the devil.

Now he then that by fast<sup>295</sup> faith and sure hope dwelleth in God’s help and hangeth always thereupon, never falling from that hope, he shall, saith the prophet, “ever dwell and abide in God’s defense and protection” — that is to say that, while he faileth not to believe well and hope well, God will never fail in all temptation to defend him. For unto such a faithful well-hoping man, the prophet in the same psalm saith further, Scapulis suis obumbrabit tibi, et sub pennis eius sperabis (“With his shoulders shall he shadow thee,<sup>296</sup> and under his feathers shalt thou trust”).<sup>297</sup> Lo, here hath every faithful man a sure promise: that in the fervent<sup>298</sup> heat of temptation or tribulation (for as I have said diverse times before, they be in such wise coincident<sup>299</sup> that every tribulation the devil useth for temptation to bring us to impatience — and thereby to murmur and grudge<sup>300</sup> and blasphemy — and every kind of temptation, to a good man that fighteth against it and will not follow it, is a very painful tribulation) — in the fervent heat, I say therefore, of every temptation, God giveth the faithful man that hopeth in him the shadow of his holy shoulders, which are broad and large, sufficient to refrigerate<sup>301</sup> and refresh the man in that heat; and in every tribulation he putteth his shoulders for a defense between. And then what weapon of the devil may give us any deadly wound, while that impenetrable pavise<sup>302</sup> of the shoulder of God standeth always between?

Then goeth the verse further and saith unto such a faithful man, Et sub pennis eius sperabis (“Thine hope shall be under his feathers”): that is to wit, for the good hope thou hast in his help, he will take thee so near him into his protection that, as the hen, to keep her young chickens from the kite,<sup>303</sup> nestleth them together under her own wings, so from the devil’s claws — the ravenous kite of this dark air — will the God of heaven gather the faithful trusting folk near unto his own sides, and set them in surety, very well and warm, under the covering of his heavenly wings.

And of this defense and protection, our Savior spoke himself unto the Jews (as mention is made in the twenty-third chapter of Saint Matthew), to whom he said in this wise: Ierusalem, Ierusalem, quae occidis prophetas et lapidas eos qui ad te missi sunt, quotiens volui congregare te quemadmodum gallina congregat pullos suos sub alas suas et noluisti — that is to say, “Jerusalem, Jerusalem, that killest the prophets and stonest unto death them that are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy sons together as the hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and thou wouldst not?”<sup>304</sup>

Here are, Cousin Vincent, words of no little comfort unto every Christian man, by which we may see with how tender affection God of his great goodness longeth to gather under the protection of his wings, and how often like a loving hen he clucketh home unto him even those chickens of his that willfully walketh abroad into the kite’s danger and will not come at his clucking; but ever the more he clucketh for them, the farther they go from him. And therefore can we not doubt if we will follow him, and with faithful hope come run to him, but that he shall, in all matter of temptation, take us near unto him and set us even under his wing. And then are we safe, if we will tarry there; for against our will can there no power pull us thence, nor hurt our souls there. Pone me, saith the prophet, iuxta te, et cuiusvis manus pugnet contra me (“Set me near unto thee, and fight against me whose hand that will”).<sup>305</sup>

And to show the great safeguard and surety that we shall have while we sit under his heavenly feathers, the prophet saith yet a great deal further: sub umbra alarum tuarum exsultabo<sup>306</sup> — that is to wit, that we shall not only, when we sit by his sweet side under his holy wing, sit in safeguard, but that we shall also under the covering of his heavenly wings with great exultation rejoice.

THE ELEVENTH CHAPTER

Of four kinds of temptation — and therein, both the parts of that kind of tribulation that men willingly suffer — touched in the two verses of the Psalter

5 ANTONY: Now, in the two next verses following, the prophet briefly comprehendeth<sup>307</sup> four kinds of temptation, and therein all the tribulation that we shall now speak of, and also some part of that which we have spoken of before. And therefore I shall per-10 adventure, except any further thing fall in our way, with treating of those two verses finish and end all our matter.<sup>308</sup>

The prophet saith in the psalm, Scuto circumdabit te veritas eius; non timebis a timore nocturne, a sagitta volante in die, a negotio perambulante in tenebris, ab incursu et daemonio meridiano (“The truth of God shall compass thee about with a pavise; thou shalt not be afeard of the night’s fear, nor of the arrow flying in the day, nor of the business walking 20 about in the darkneses, nor of the incursion or invasion of the devil in the midday”).<sup>309</sup>

First, Cousin, in these words, “the truth of God shall compass thee about with a pavise,” the prophet, for the comfort of every good man in 25 all temptation, and in all tribulation, beside those other things that he said before (that the shoulders of God should shadow them, and that also they should sit under his wing), here saith he further that “the truth of God shall compass thee with a 30 pavise” — that is to wit, that as God hath faithfully promised to protect and defend those that faithfully will dwell in the trust of his help, so will he truly perform it. And thee, that such one art, will the truth of his promise defend,<sup>310</sup> not with a lit-
35 tle round buckler<sup>311</sup> that scant<sup>312</sup> can cover the head, but with a long large pavise that covereth all along the body, made, as holy Saint Bernard saith, broad above with the Godhead, and narrow beneath with the manhood, so that this pavise is our Savior
40 Christ himself.<sup>313</sup>

And yet is not this pavise like other pavises of this world, which are not made but in such wise as while it defendeth one part, the man may be wounded upon the other; but this pavise is such that, as the prophet saith, it shall round about en- 45 close and compass thee, so that thine enemy shall hurt thy soul on no side. For scuto, saith he, circum- dabit te veritas eius (“with a pavise shall his truth environ and compass thee round about”). And then continently<sup>314</sup> following, to the intent that 50 we should see that it is not without necessity that the pavise of God should compass us about upon every side, he showeth in what wise we be by the devil with trains<sup>315</sup> and assaults — by four kinds of temptations and tribulations — environed upon ev- 55 ery side; against all which compass<sup>316</sup> of temptations and tribulations, that round compassing<sup>317</sup> pavise of God’s truth shall in such wise defend us and keep us safe that we shall need to dread none of them all.

THE TWELFTH CHAPTER

The first kind of the four temptations

ANTONY: First he saith, Non timebis a timore nocturno (“Thou shalt not be afeard of the fear of the night”). By “the night” is there in Scripture some-60 times understood tribulation, as appeareth in the thirty-fourth chapter of Job: Novit enim Deus opera eorum, idcirco inducet noctem (“God hath known the work of them, and therefore shall he bring night upon them”)<sup>318</sup> — that is to wit, tribulation for their wickedness. 70

And well you wot that the night is of the nature of itself discomfortable and full of fear. And therefore by the “night’s fear” here I understand the tribulations by which the devil, through the sufferance of God,<sup>319</sup> either by himself or others that are his instruments, tempteth good folk to impatience, as he did Job. But he that, as the prophet saith, dwell-
75 eth and continueth faithfully in the hope of God’s help shall so be clipped in<sup>320</sup> on every side with the shield or pavise of God that he shall have no need to be afeard of such tribulation that is here called the night’s fear. And it may be also conveniently<sup>321</sup> called the night’s fear for two causes: the one, for that<sup>322</sup> many times the cause of his tribulation is, unto him that suffereth, dark and unknown, and therein vari-
80 eth it and differeth from that tribulation by which

307 describes; includes 308 all our matter: our whole discussion 309 Ps 90(91):4–6 310 thee . . . defend: the truth of His promise will defend you, who are such a one 311 shield 312 barely

313 See St. Bernard’s In Psalmum 90, 5:2. 314 immediately 315 snares, deceits 316 artifice, crafty stratagem 317 surrounding 318 Job 34:25 319 the sufferance of God: God’s allowing this 320 clipped in: closely surrounded 321 fittingly; appropriately 322 for that: because the devil tempteth a man by open fight and assault for a good known thing from which he would withdraw him, or for some known evil thing into which he would drive him by force of such persecution.

5 Another cause for which it is called the night's fear may be for that that the night is so far out of courage,<sup>323</sup> and naturally so casteth folk in fear, that of everything whereof they perceive any manner dread, their fantasy doubleth their fear, and maketh them
10 often ween<sup>324</sup> that it were much worse than indeed it is. The prophet saith in the Psalter, Posuisti tenebras, et facta est nox, in illa pertransibunt omnes bestiae silvarum, catuli leonum rugientes quaerentes a Deo escam sibi ("Thou hast, good Lord, set the darkness, 15 and made was the night; and in the night walken all the beasts of the woods, the whelps<sup>325</sup> of the lions roaring and calling unto God for their meat").<sup>326</sup>

Now though that<sup>327</sup> the lions' whelps walk about roaring in the night and seek for their prey, yet can 20 they not get such meat as they would always, but must hold themselves content with such as God suffereth<sup>328</sup> to fall in their way. And though they be not ware<sup>329</sup> thereof, yet of God they ask it, and of him they have it.

25 And this may be comfort to all good men in their "night's fear," in their dark tribulation: that though they fall into the claws or the teeth of those lions' whelps, yet shall all that they<sup>330</sup> can do not pass beyond the body, which is but as the garment of the 30 soul. For the soul itself, which is the substance of the man, is so surely fenced in round about with the shield or pavise<sup>331</sup> of God that as long as he will abide faithfully in adiutorio Altissimi ("in the hope of God's help"),<sup>332</sup> the lions' whelps shall not be able 35 to hurt it; for the great lion himself could never be suffered to go further in the tribulation of Job than God from time to time gave him leave.<sup>333</sup> And therefore the deep darkness of the midnight maketh men that standeth out of<sup>334</sup> faith and out of good hope 40 in God to be in their tribulation far in the greater fear, for lack of the light of faith, whereby they might perceive that the uttermost of their peril is a far less thing than they take it for.

45 But we be so wont<sup>335</sup> to set so much by<sup>336</sup> our body, which we see and feel, and in the feeding and fostering whereof we set our delight and our wealth, and so little (alas) and so seldom we think upon our soul, because we cannot see that but by spiritual understanding, and most specially by the eye

50 of our faith (in the meditation whereof we bestow, God wot, little time), that the loss of our body we take for a sorer<sup>337</sup> thing, and for a greater tribulation a great deal, than we do the loss of our soul. And where<sup>338</sup> our Savior biddeth us that we should not
55 fear those lions' whelps that can but kill our bodies, and when that is done have no further thing in their power wherewith they can do us harm, but biddeth us stand in dread of him which, when he hath slain the body, is able then besides to cast the soul into 60 everlasting fire, we be so blind in the dark night of tribulation, for lack of full and fast<sup>339</sup> belief of God's word, that whereas in the day of prosperity we very little fear God for our soul, our night's fear of adversity maketh us very sore<sup>340</sup> to fear the lion and his 65 whelps for dread of loss of our bodies.

And whereas Saint Paul in sundry places showeth us that our body is but as the garment of the soul, yet the faintness of our faith to the Scripture of God maketh us with the night's fear of tribulation 70 more to dread not only the loss of our body than of our soul<sup>341</sup> — that is to wit, of the clothing than of the substance that is clothed therewith — but also of the very outward goods that serve for the clothing of the body. And much more foolish are we in 75 that dark night's fear than were he that would forget the saving of his body, for fear of losing of his old rain-beaten cloak that is but the covering of his gown or his coat.

Now consider further yet that the prophet, in the fore-rehearsed verses, saith not that in the night 80 walk only the lions' whelps, but also omnes bestiae silvarum ("all the beasts of the wood"). Now wot you well that if a man walk through the wood in the night, many things may make him afraid of which in the day he would not be afraid a whit. For 85 in the night, every bush, to him that waxeth<sup>342</sup> once afraid, seemeth a thief.

I remember that when I was a young man, I was once in the war with the king then my master 90 (God assoil<sup>343</sup> his soul), and we were camped within the Turk's ground, many a mile beyond Belgrade (which would God were ours now as well as it was then); but so happened it that in our camp, about midnight, there suddenly rose a rumor and a scry<sup>344</sup> that the Turk's whole army was secretly stealing upon us, wherewith our whole host<sup>345</sup> was warned to arm 5 them<sup>346</sup> in haste, and set themselves in array to fight; and then were the scourers<sup>347</sup> of ours that brought those sudden tidings examined more leisurely by the council, what surety, or what likelihood, they had perceived therein. Of whom, one showed that 10 by the glimmering of the moon he had espied and perceived and seen them himself, coming on softly and soberly in a long range,<sup>348</sup> all in good order, not one farther forth than the other in the forefront, but as even as a thread, and in breadth farther than 15 he could see in length.

His fellows, being examined, said that he was somewhat pricked forth before them,<sup>349</sup> and came so fast back to tell it them that they thought it rather time to make haste and give warning to the 20 camp than to go nearer unto them.<sup>350</sup> For they were not so far off but that they had yet themselves somewhat an unperfect<sup>351</sup> sight of them too.

Thus stood we watching all the remnant of the night, evermore hearkening when we should hear 25 them come, with "hush, stand still, methink I hear a trampling," so that at last many of us thought we heard them ourselves also. But when the day was sprung<sup>352</sup> and that we saw no man, out was our scourer sent again, and some of our captains with 30 him, to show whereabouts the place was in which he perceived them. And when they came thither, they found that the great fearful army of the Turks so soberly coming on turned (God be thanked) into a fair long hedge standing even stone-still. And 35 thus fareth it in the night's fear of tribulation, in which the devil, to bear down and overwhelm with dread the faithful hope that we should have in God, casteth in our imagination much more fear than cause; for while there walk in that night not only 40 the lions' whelps, but over<sup>353</sup> that, all the beasts of the wood besides, the beast that we hear roar in the dark night of tribulation, and fear it for a lion, we sometimes find well afterward in the day that it was no lion at all, but a seely<sup>354</sup> rude roaring ass. And 45 the thing that on the sea seemeth sometimes a rock is indeed nothing else but a mist. Howbeit, as the prophet saith, he that faithfully dwelleth in the hope of God's help, the pavise of his truth shall so fence him round about that be it an ass, colt, or a lion's whelp, or a rock of stone, or a mist, Non timebit 50 a timore nocturno ("The night's fear thereof shall he nothing need to dread").

THE THIRTEENTH CHAPTER

Of pusillanimity

ANTONY: Therefore find I that in the night's fear, 55 one great part is the fault of pusillanimity—that is to wit, faint and feeble stomach<sup>355</sup>—by which a man, for faint heart, is afraid where he needeth not, by the reason whereof he fleeth oftentimes for fear of that thing of which, if he fled not, he should 60 take none harm. And some man doth sometimes by his fleeing make his enemy bold on him, which<sup>356</sup> would, if he fled not, but durst<sup>357</sup> abide thereby, give over and flee from him.

This fault of pusillanimity maketh a man in his 65 tribulation, for feeble heart, first impatient, and afterward oftentimes driveth him by impatience into a contrary affection, making him frowardly<sup>358</sup> stubborn and angry against God, and thereby to fall into blasphemy as do the damned souls in hell. This 70 fault of pusillanimity and timorous mind letteth<sup>359</sup> a man also many times from the doing of many good things which, if he took a good stomach<sup>360</sup> to him in the trust of God's help, he were well able to do. But the devil casteth him in a cowardice, and maketh 75 him take it for humility to think himself unmeet<sup>361</sup> and unable thereto, and therefore to leave the good thing undone whereof God offereth him occasion and had made him convenient<sup>362</sup> thereto.

But such folk have need to lift up their hearts and 80
 call upon God, and, by the counsel of other good ghostly<sup>363</sup> folk, cast away the cowardice of their own conceit<sup>364</sup> which the night's fear by the devil hath framed in their fantasy, and look in the Gospel upon him which<sup>365</sup> laid up his talent and left it unoccu- 85 pied,<sup>366</sup> and therefore utterly lost it, with a great reproach of his pusillanimity, by which he had weened

 5 in God. And therefore let us faithfully dwell in the good hope of his help, and then shall the pavise of his truth so compass us about that of this night's fear we shall have no fear at all.

THE FOURTEENTH CHAPTER

 a scrupulous conscience*

ANTONY: This pusillanimity bringeth forth by the night's fear a very timorous daughter: a seely<sup>370</sup> wretched girl and ever puling,<sup>371</sup> that is called scrupulosity, or a scrupulous conscience. This girl is a meetly<sup>372</sup> good pucelle<sup>373</sup> in a house, never idle, but ever occupied and busy; but albeit<sup>374</sup> she hath a very gentle mistress that loveth her well and is well content with that she doth — or if it be not all 20 well (as all cannot always be well), content to pardon her, as she doth other of her fellows, and so letteth her know that she will — yet can this peevish<sup>375</sup> girl never cease whining and puling for fear lest her mistress be always angry with her, and that she shall shrewdly be shent.<sup>376</sup> Were her mistress, ween you,<sup>377</sup> like<sup>378</sup> to be content with this condition? Nay, surely.

I knew such one myself, whose mistress was a very wise woman and (which thing is in women very 30 rare) very mild also and meek, and liked very well such service as she did her in the house. But this continual discomfortable fashion of hers she so much disliked that she would sometimes say, “Ay, what aileth this girl? The elvish urchin weeneth I were a 35 devil, I trow.<sup>379</sup> Surely if she did me ten times better service than she doth, yet with this fantastical fear of hers I would be loath to have her in my house.”

Thus fareth, lo, the scrupulous person, which frameth himself many times double the fear that he 40 hath cause, and many times a great fear where there is no cause at all, and of that that<sup>380</sup> is indeed no sin, maketh a venial, and that that is venial, imagineth to be deadly,<sup>381</sup> and yet, for all that, falleth in them being namely<sup>382</sup> of their nature such as no man 45 long liveth without. And then he feareth that he be never full confessed, nor never fully contrite, and then that his sins be never full forgiven him; and then he confesseth and confesseth again, and cumbereth<sup>383</sup> himself and his confessor both; and then every prayer that he saith, though he say it as well

 50 as the frail infirmity of the man will suffer,<sup>384</sup> yet is he not satisfied but if<sup>385</sup> he say it again, and yet after that again; and when he hath said one thing thrice, as little is he satisfied at the last as with the first; and then is his heart evermore in heaviness, unquiet, 55 and in fear — full of doubt and of dullness, without comfort or spiritual consolation.

With this night's fear the devil sore<sup>386</sup> troubleth the mind of many a right good man, and that doth he to bring him to some great inconvenience.<sup>387</sup> For 60 he will, if he can, drive him so much to the minding of God's rigorous justice that he will keep him from the comfortable remembrance of God's great mighty mercy, and so make him do all his good works wearily, and without consolation or quick-
 65 ness.<sup>388</sup> Moreover, he maketh him to take for sin something that is none, and for deadly<sup>389</sup> some such as are but venial, to the intent that when he shall fall into them, he shall by reason of his scruple sin where else he should not, or sin deadly, while his conscience in the deed doing so gave<sup>390</sup> him, where indeed he had offended but venially. Yea, and further, the devil longeth to make all his good works and spiritual exercise so painful and so tedious unto 70 him that with some other suggestion, or false wily doctrine of a false spiritual liberty, he should, for the false ease and pleasure that he should suddenly find therein, be easily conveyed from that evil fault into a much worse, and have his conscience as wide
 75 and as large after as ever it was narrow and strait before. For better is yet, of truth, a conscience a little too strait than a little too large.

My mother had, when I was a little boy, a good old woman that took heed to<sup>391</sup> her children; they called her Mother Maud — I trow you have heard of her?

ANTONY: She was wont,<sup>392</sup> when she sat by the fire with us, to tell us that were children many childish tales; but, as Pliny saith that there is no book lightly<sup>393</sup> so bad but that some good thing a man
 5 may pick out thereof,<sup>394</sup> so think I that there is almost no tale so foolish but that yet, in one matter or other, to some purpose it may hap to serve; for I remember me that among other of her fond<sup>395</sup> tales, she told us once that the ass and the wolf came upon
 10 a time to confession to the fox. The poor ass came to shrift<sup>396</sup> in the Shrovetide,<sup>397</sup> a day or two before Ash Wednesday; but the wolf would not come to confession till he saw first Palm Sunday past, and then foded yet forth<sup>398</sup> farther, till Good Friday. The fox
 15 asked the ass, before he began Benedicite,<sup>399</sup> wherefore<sup>400</sup> he came to confession before Lent began, so soon. The poor beast answered him again,<sup>401</sup> for fear of deadly sin, if he should lose his part of any of those prayers that the priest in the cleansing days<sup>402</sup>
 20 pray for them that are then confessed already. Then, in his shrift,<sup>403</sup> he had a marvelous grudge<sup>404</sup> in his inward conscience that he had one day given his master a cause of anger, in that that<sup>405</sup> with his rude roaring before his master arose, he had awaked him
 25 out of his sleep and bereaved him of his rest. The fox for that fault, like a good discreet<sup>406</sup> confessor, charged him to do so no more, but lie still and sleep like a good son himself till his master were up and ready to go to work, and so should he be sure that he 30 should not wake him no more.

To tell you all the poor ass's confession, it were a long work; for everything that he did was deadly sin with<sup>407</sup> him, the poor soul was so scrupulous. But his wise wily confessor accounted them for trifles, 35 as they were, and swore after unto the badger that he was so weary to sit so long and hear him that, saving for the manner sake,<sup>408</sup> he had liefer<sup>409</sup> have sitten all that while at breakfast with a good fat goose.

But when it came to the penance-giving, the fox 40 found that the most weighty sin in all his shrift<sup>410</sup> was gluttony; and therefore he discreetly gave him in penance that he should never for greediness of his meat<sup>411</sup> do any other beast any harm or hindrance, and then eat his meat and study<sup>412</sup> for no more.

Now, as good Mother Maud told us, when the 45 wolf came to Father Reynard<sup>413</sup> (that was, she said, the fox's name) to confession upon Good Friday, his confessor shook his great pair of beads<sup>414</sup> upon<sup>415</sup> him (almost as big as bowls) and asked him wherefore he came so late. "Forsooth,<sup>416</sup> Father Reynard,"
 50 quoth he, "I must needs tell you the truth. I come, you wot well, therefor. I durst<sup>417</sup> come no sooner for fear lest you would for my gluttony have given me in penance to fast some part of this Lent." "Nay, nay," 55 quoth Father Fox, "I am not so unreasonable; for I fast none of it myself. For I may say to thee, son — here in confession, between us twain — it is no commandment of God, this fasting, but an invention of man. The priests make folk fast, and put them to 60 pain about the moonshine in the water,<sup>418</sup> and do but make folk fools; but they shall make me no such fool, I warrant<sup>419</sup> thee, son. For I eat flesh all this Lent myself, I. Howbeit<sup>420</sup> indeed, because I will not be occasion of slander, I therefore eat it secretly in my chamber,<sup>421</sup> out of sight of all such foolish brethren
 65 as for their weak scrupulous conscience would wax offended withal.<sup>422</sup> And so would I counsel you to do." "Forsooth, Father Fox," quoth the wolf, "and so, I thank God, I do, as near as I can; for when I go to my meat, I take none other company with me
 70 but such sure brethren as are of mine own nature — whose consciences are not weak, I warrant you, but their stomachs<sup>423</sup> as strong as mine." "Well then, no force,"<sup>424</sup> quoth Father Fox.

But when he heard after<sup>425</sup> by his confession that 75 he was so great a ravener<sup>426</sup> that he devoured and spent sometimes so much victual<sup>427</sup> at one meal as the price thereof would well find<sup>428</sup> some poor man, with his wife and his children, almost all 80 the week, then he prudently reprov'd that point in him, and preached him a process of<sup>429</sup> his own temperance, which<sup>430</sup> never used, as he said, to pass er’s shop—where folk find them out of the feathyet for sixpence buy and choose the best—but out of the housewife’s house, at the first hand, which may somewhat better cheap afford them,<sup>432</sup> you wot well, than the poulterer may; nor yet cannot be suffered<sup>433</sup> to see them plucked, and stand and choose them by day, but am fain<sup>434</sup> by night to take at a venture,<sup>435</sup> and when I come home, am fain to do the labor to pluck her myself too; yet for all this, though it be but lean, and I ween not well worth a groat,<sup>436</sup> serveth it me sometimes for all that both dinner and supper too. And therefore, as for that you live of ravin,<sup>437</sup> therein can I find no fault; you have used<sup>438</sup> it so long that I think you can do none other. And therefore were it folly to forbid it you, and to say the truth, against good conscience too;

for live you must, I wot well, and other craft can you none.<sup>439</sup> And therefore (as reason is)<sup>440</sup> must you live by that. But yet, you wot well, too much is too much, and measure<sup>441</sup> is a merry mean, which I perceive by your shrift<sup>442</sup> you have never used to keep;
and therefore surely this shall be your penance: that you shall all this year never pass upon yourself<sup>443</sup> the price of sixpence at a meal, as near as your conscience can guess the price.”

Their shrift have I showed you as Mother Maud showed it us. But now serveth for our matter the conscience of them both in the true performing of their penance.

The poor ass, after his shrift, when he waxed a-hungered,<sup>444</sup> saw a sow lie with her pigs well lapped<sup>445</sup> in new straw; and near he drew, and thought to have eaten of the straw, but anon<sup>446</sup> his scrupulous conscience began therein to grudge<sup>447</sup> him: for while his penance was that, for greediness of his meat, he should do none other body none harm, he thought he might not eat one straw there, lest for lack of that straw, some of those pigs might hap to die for cold; so held he still his hunger till one<sup>448</sup> brought him meat;<sup>449</sup> but when he should fall thereto,<sup>450</sup> then fell he yet in a far further scrup-ple. For then it came in his mind that he should yet break his penance if he should eat any of that either, since he was commanded by his ghostly<sup>451</sup> father that he should not for his own meat hinder any other beast; for he thought that if he ate not that meat, some other beast might hap to have it, and so should he, by the eating of it, peradventure<sup>452</sup> hinder another. And thus stood he, still fasting, till when he told the cause, his ghostly father came and informed him better; and then he cast off that scrup-ple and fell mannerly<sup>453</sup> to his meat, and was a right honest ass many a fair day after.

The wolf, now, coming from shrift clean soiled<sup>454</sup> from his sins, went about to do as a shrewd<sup>455</sup> wife once told her husband that she would do when she came from shrift. “Be merry, man,” quoth she now, “for this day, I thank God, was I well shriven;<sup>456</sup> and I purpose now therefore to leave off all mine old shrewdness and begin even afresh.”

VINCENT: Ah, well, Uncle, can you report her so?
That word heard I her speak, but she said it in sport,
to make her husband laugh.

ANTONY: Indeed, it seemed she spoke it half in sport. For that she said she would cast away all her shrewdness, therein I trow<sup>457</sup> she sported; but in that she said she would begin it all afresh, her husband found that good earnest.<sup>458</sup>

VINCENT: Well, I shall show her what you say, I warrant<sup>459</sup> you.

ANTONY: Then will you make me make my word good;<sup>460</sup> but whatsoever she did, at the leastwise so fared now this wolf, which had cast out in confession all his old ravin;<sup>461</sup> and then hunger pricked<sup>462</sup> him forward that, as the shrewd wife said, he should begin all afresh. But yet the prick of conscience withdrew and held him back, because he would not, for breaking of his penance, take any 5 prey for his mealtide<sup>463</sup> that should pass the price of sixpence.

It happed him then, as he walked prowling for his gear<sup>464</sup> about, he came where a man had in few days before cast off two old lean and lame horses, so sick 10 that no flesh was there left upon them. And the one, when the wolf came by, could scant<sup>465</sup> stand on his legs, and the other already dead, and his skin ripped off and carried away. And as he looked upon them suddenly, he was first about to feed upon them and 15 whet his teeth on their bones. But as he looked aside, he spied a fair cow in a close,<sup>466</sup> walking with her young calf by her side; and as soon as he saw them, his conscience began to grudge him against both those two horses. And then he sighed and said 20 to himself, “Alas, wicked wretch that I am, I had almost broken my penance ere I was aware. For yonder dead horse—because I never saw dead horse sold in the market, and I should die therefor<sup>467</sup> by the way that my sinful soul shall to—I cannot devise<sup>468</sup> what price I should set upon him; but in my 25 conscience I set him far above sixpence, and therefore I dare not meddle with him.

“Now, then, is yonder quick<sup>469</sup> horse of likelihood worth a great deal of money. For horses be 30 dear<sup>470</sup> in this country—specially such soft amblers; for I see by his pace he trottesth not, nor can scant shift a foot; and therefore I may not meddle with him, for he very far passeth my sixpence. But kine<sup>471</sup> this country here hath enough, but money have they very little. And therefore, considering the 35 plenty of the kine and the scarcity of the money, as for yonder peevish<sup>472</sup> cow, seemeth unto me, in my conscience, worth not past a groat and<sup>473</sup> she be worth so much. Now, then, as for her calf, is not 40 so much as she by half; and therefore, while the cow is in my conscience worth but fourpence, my conscience cannot serve<sup>474</sup> me, for sin of my soul, to praise<sup>475</sup> her calf above twopence; and so pass<sup>476</sup> they not sixpence between them both. And therefore they twain may I well eat at this one meal and 45 break not my penance at all.” And so thereupon<sup>477</sup> he did, without any scruple of conscience. If such beasts could speak now as Mother Maud said they could then, some of them would, I ween, tell a tale 50 almost as wise as this; wherein, save<sup>478</sup> for the diminishing<sup>479</sup> of old Mother Maud’s tale, else<sup>480</sup> would a shorter process<sup>481</sup> have served.

But yet, as peevish<sup>482</sup> as the parable is, in this it serveth for our purpose: that the night’s fear of a 55 conscience somewhat scrupulous, though it be painful and troublous to him that hath it (like as this poor ass had here), is less harm yet than a conscience overlarge,<sup>483</sup> or such as for his own fantasy the man list<sup>484</sup> to frame himself—now drawing it 60 narrow, now stretching it in breadth, after the manner of a cheverel point,<sup>485</sup> to serve on every side for his own commodity<sup>486</sup>—as did here the wily wolf.

But such folk are out<sup>487</sup> of tribulation, and comfort need they none; and therefore are they out of 65 our matter.

But those that are in the night’s fear of their own scrupulous conscience, let them be well ware,<sup>488</sup> as I said, that the devil for weariness of the one draw 70 them not into the other, and while he would flee from Scylla, drive him into Charybdis.<sup>489</sup> He must do as doth a ship that should come into a haven, in the mouth whereof lie secret<sup>490</sup> rocks under the water on both the sides: if he be by mishap entered in among them that are on the one side and cannot 75 tell how to get out, he must get a substantial cunning<sup>491</sup> pilot that so can conduce him<sup>492</sup> from the rocks on that side that, yet he bring him not into those that are on the other side, but can guide him in the midway. Let them, I say, therefore that are
80 in the troublous fear of their own scrupulous conscience submit the rule of their own conscience to the counsel of some other good man, which, after<sup>493</sup> the variety and the nature of the scruples, may temper the advice; yea, although a man be very

463 meal 464 food 465 hardly, barely 466 enclosed field 467 for that 468 imagine 469 live 470 scarce; expensive 471 cattle 472 silly, worthless 473 groat if: four pence if 474 allow 475 appraise 476 exceed 477 upon those grounds; directly after that 478 except 479 belittling

480 otherwise 481 story, narrative 482 silly 483 too permissive 484 pleases, chooses 485 cheverel point: a strap made of a famously flexible kind of leather 486 advantage 487 outside 488 aware; wary 489 Scylla . . . Charybdis: a mythological monster living on one side of a narrow channel, and a whirlpool on the other side of that same narrow channel. See Homer, Odyssey, Book 12. 490 hidden 491 substantial cunning: thoroughly knowledgeable 492 conduce him: lead him away 493 which, after: who, according to well-learned himself, yet let him in this case learn the custom used among physicians. For be one of them never so cunning, yet in his own disease and sickness he never useth<sup>494</sup> to trust all to himself, but 5 send for such of his fellows as he knoweth meet,<sup>495</sup> and putteth himself in their hands for many considerations whereof they assign<sup>496</sup> the causes. And one of the causes is fear—whereof, upon some tokens,<sup>497</sup> he may conceive in his own passion<sup>498</sup> a 10 great deal more than needeth and than were good for his health, that for the time, that he knew no such thing at all.

I knew once in this town one of the most cunning men in that faculty,<sup>499</sup> and the best expert, and therewith the most famous too, and he that the greatest cures did upon other men. And yet when he was himself once very sore<sup>500</sup> sick, I heard his fellows that then looked unto him—of all which every one would in their own disease have used his help 20 before any other man—wish yet that for the time of his own sickness, being so sore as it was, he had known no physic<sup>501</sup> at all: he took so great heed unto every suspicious token, and feared so far the worst, that his fear did him sometimes much more harm than the sickness gave him cause.

And therefore, as I say, whoso<sup>502</sup> hath such a trouble of his scrupulous conscience, let him for a while forbear the judgment of himself, and follow the counsel of some other whom he knoweth
 30 for well-learned and virtuous—and specially in the place of confession. For there is God specially present with his grace, assisting<sup>503</sup> his sacrament. And let him not doubt to acquit<sup>504</sup> his mind, and follow that that<sup>505</sup> he is there bade,<sup>506</sup> and think for a while less of the fear of God's justice, and be more merry in remembrance of his mercy, and persevere in prayer for grace, and abide and dwell faithfully in the sure hope of his help; and then shall he find, without any doubt, that the pavise<sup>507</sup> of God's truth 35 shall, as the prophet saith, so compass him about that he shall not dread the night's fear of scrupulosity, but shall have his conscience stablished in good quiet and rest.
 40

THE FIFTEENTH CHAPTER

Another kind of the night's fear—another daughter of pusillanimity—that is to wit, that horrible temptation by which some folk are tempted to kill and destroy themselves 45

VINCENT: Verily, good Uncle, you have in my mind well declared<sup>508</sup> these kinds of the night's fear. 50

ANTONY: Surely, Cousin, but yet are there many more than I can either remember or find; howbeit,<sup>509</sup> one yet cometh now to my mind, of which I before nothing thought, and which is yet, in mine 55 opinion, of all the other fears the most horrible: that is to wit, Cousin, where the devil tempteth a man to kill and destroy himself.

VINCENT: Undoubtedly this kind of tribulation is marvelous and strange, and the temptation is of such a sort that some men have opinion that such 60 as once fall in that fantasy can never full cast it off.

ANTONY: Yes, yes, Cousin, many a hundred, and else God<sup>510</sup> forbid. But the thing that maketh men so say is because that of those which finally do destroy themselves, there is much speech and much 65 wondering (as it is well worthy); but many a good man and woman hath sometimes—yea, diverse years, one after other continually—been tempted thereto, and yet have by grace and good counsel well and virtuously withstood it, and been in 70 conclusion<sup>511</sup> clearly delivered of it, and their tribulation nothing known abroad, and therefore nothing talked of. But surely, Cousin, a horrible sore trouble it is to any man or woman that the devil tempteth therewith; many have I heard of, and with 75 some have I talked myself, that have been sore cumbered<sup>512</sup> with that temptation; and marked have I not a little the manner of them.

VINCENT: I require<sup>513</sup> you, good Uncle, show me somewhat of such things as you perceive therein. 80

For first, where<sup>514</sup> you call this kind of temptation the daughter of pusillanimity and thereby so near of sib<sup>515</sup> unto the night's fear, methinketh on the other

494 makes it his practice 495 suitable, qualified 496 name 497 symptoms 498 suffering 499 profession 500 greatly, intensely, grievously 501 medical science side that it is rather a thing that cometh of a great courage and boldness when they dare their<sup>516</sup> own hands put themselves to death, from which we see almost every man shrink and flee, and that<sup>517</sup> many 5 such as we know by good proof and plain experience for men of great heart and excellent hardy courage.

ANTONY: I said, Cousin Vincent, that of pusilla-nimity cometh this temptation — and very truth it is that indeed so it doth — but I meant it not that 10 of only faint heart and fear it cometh and groweth always; for the devil tempteth sundry folks by sundry ways. But the cause wherefore I spoke of none other kind of that temptation than of only that which is the daughter that the devil begetteth upon 15 pusillanimity was for that that<sup>518</sup> those other kinds of that temptation fall not under the nature of tribulation and fear, and therefore fall they far out<sup>519</sup> of our matter here, and are such temptations as only need counsel and not comfort or consolation, for 20 that the persons therewith tempted be with that kind of temptation not troubled in their mind, but verily well content both in the tempting and following. For some hath there been, Cousin, such that they have been tempted thereto by means of a fool-25 ish pride, and some by the means of anger, without any dread at all, and very glad to go thereto; to this I say not nay. But where you ween that none fall thereto by fear, but that they have all a strong mighty stomach<sup>520</sup> — that shall ye well see the con-30 trary, and that peradventure in those of whom you would ween the stomach most strong and their heart and courage most hardy.

VINCENT: Yet is it marvel unto me that it should be as you say it is: that this temptation is unto them 35 that do it for pride or for anger no tribulation, nor that they should need in so great a distress, and peril both of body and soul to be lost, no manner of good ghostly<sup>521</sup> comfort.

ANTONY: Let us therefore, Cousin, consider an ex-40 ample or two, for thereby shall we the better perceive it.

There was here in Buda, in King Ladislaus's<sup>522</sup> days, a good poor honest man's wife. This woman was so fiendish that the devil, perceiving her nature, put her in the mind that she should anger her hus-45 band so sore that she might give him occasion to kill her, and then should he be hanged for her.

VINCENT: This was a strange temptation indeed — what the devil should she be the better then?

ANTONY: Nothing, but that it eased her shrewd 50 stomach<sup>523</sup> before to think that her husband should be hanged after. And peradventure if you look about the world and consider it well, you shall find more such stomachs than a few. Have you never heard no 55 furious body plainly say that to see some such man have a mischief,<sup>524</sup> he would with good will be content to lie as long in hell as God liveth in heaven?

VINCENT: Forsooth,<sup>525</sup> and some such have I heard of.

ANTONY: This mind of his was not much less mad 60 than hers, but rather, haply,<sup>526</sup> the more mad of the twain; for the woman peradventure did not cast so far<sup>527</sup> peril therein. But to tell you now to what good pass<sup>528</sup> the charitable purpose came: as her husband (the man was a carpenter) stood hewing with his 65 chip-axe upon a piece of timber, she began, after<sup>529</sup> her old guise,<sup>530</sup> so to revile him that the man waxed wroth<sup>531</sup> at last, and bade her get her in or he would lay the helm<sup>532</sup> of his axe about her back, and said also that it were little sin even with that axe-head 70 to chop off that unhappy head of hers that carried such an ungracious tongue therein. At that word the devil took his time and whetted her tongue against her teeth; and when it was well sharped, she swore 75 to him in very fierce anger, "By the Mass, whore-son husband, I would thou wouldst; here lieth mine head, lo" — and therewith, down she laid her head upon the same timber log — "if thou smite it not off, I beshrew<sup>533</sup> thine whoreson heart"; with that, likewise as<sup>534</sup> the devil stood at her elbow, so stood 80 (as I heard say) his good angel at his, and gave him ghostly<sup>535</sup> courage, and bade him be bold and do it.
And so the good man up with his chip-axe and at a chop chopped off her head indeed. There were standing other folk by, which had a good sport to hear her chide, but little they looked for this chance till it was done, ere they could let<sup>536</sup> it. They said they heard 5 her tongue babble in her head and call “Whoreson! Whoreson!” twice after that the head was from the body. At the leastwise, afterward unto the king thus they reported, all except only one—and that was a woman, and she said that she heard it not.

10 VINCENT: Forsooth, this was a wonderful work. What became, Uncle, of the man?

ANTONY: The king gave him his pardon.

VINCENT: Verily, he might in conscience do no less.

15 ANTONY: But then was further,<sup>537</sup> almost, at another point: that there should have been a statute made that in such case there should never after pardon be granted, but, the truth being able to be proved, none husband should need any pardon, but should have leave by the law to follow the example 20 of the carpenter and do the same.

VINCENT: How happed it, Uncle, that that good law was left unmade?

25 ANTONY: How happed it? As it happeth, Cousin, that many more be left unmade as well as it, and within a little as good as it too, both here and in other countries, and sometimes some worse made in their stead.<sup>538</sup> But as they say, the let<sup>539</sup> of that law was the queen’s grace (God forgive her soul). It was the greatest thing, I ween, good lady, that she had to 30 answer for when she died. For surely, save<sup>540</sup> for that one thing, she was a full blessed woman.

But letting now that law pass, this temptation in procuring her own death was unto this carpenter’s wife no tribulation at all, as far as ever men could 35 perceive: for it liked her well to think thereon, and she even longed therefor. And therefore if she had told you or me before her mind, and that she would so fain<sup>541</sup> bring it so to pass, we could have had none occasion to comfort her as one that were in tribulation; but, marry,<sup>542</sup> counsel her (as I told you before) we might, to refrain and amend that malicious devilish mind.

VINCENT: Verily, that is truth; but such as are well willing to do any purpose that is so shameful will never tell their mind to nobody, for very shame. 45

ANTONY: Some will not indeed; and yet are there some again that, be their intent never so shameful, find some yet whom their heart serveth<sup>543</sup> them to make of their counsel<sup>544</sup> therein. Some of my own folk here can tell you that no longer ago than even yesterday, one that came out of Vienna showed us, among other talking, that a rich widow (but I forgot to ask him where it happed), having all her life a high proud mind<sup>545</sup> and a fell<sup>546</sup> (as those two virtues are wont<sup>547</sup> always to keep company together), was 55 at debate with another neighbor of hers in the town. And on a time<sup>548</sup> she made of her counsel a poor neighbor of hers, whom she thought for money she might induce to follow her mind.<sup>549</sup> With him she secretly broke<sup>550</sup> and offered him ten ducats for his labor to do so much for her as in a morning, early, to come to her house, and with an axe—unknown, privily—strike off her head; and when he had so done, then convey the bloody axe into the house of him with whom she was at debate,<sup>551</sup> in some such 65 manner wise<sup>552</sup> as it might be thought that he had murdered her for malice; and then she thought she should be taken for a martyr. And yet had she further devised that another sum of money should after be sent to Rome, and there should be means made 70 to the Pope that she might in all haste be canonized.

This poor man promised, but intended not to perform it; howbeit, when he deferred it, she provided the axe herself, and he appointed<sup>553</sup> with her the morning when he should come and do it; and thereupon, into her house he came. But then set he such other folk as he would should<sup>554</sup> know her frantic fantasy in such place appointed as they might well hear her and him talk together. And after that he had talked with her thereof what he would, so much as 75 he thought was enough, he made her lie down and took up the axe in his one hand, and with the other hand he felt the edge and found a fault, that it was not sharp, and that therefore he would in no wise

do it till he had grounden it sharper: he could not else, he said, for pity; it would put her to so much pain. And so, full sore<sup>555</sup> against her will, for that time she kept her head still; but because she would 5 no more suffer any more deceive<sup>556</sup> her so, and feed her forth<sup>557</sup> with delays, ere it was very long after, she hanged herself with her own hands.

VINCENT: Forsooth, here was a tragical story whereof I never heard the like.

10 ANTONY: Forsooth, the party that told it me swore that he knew it for a truth. And himself is, I promise you, such as I reckon for right honest and of substantial truth.

15 Now here she letted not,<sup>558</sup> as shameful a mind as she had, to make one of her counsel yet — and yet, as I remember, another too, whom she trusted with the money that should procure her canonization.

20 And here I wot well that her temptation came not of fear, but of high malice and pride. But then was she so glad in the pleasant device thereof that, as I showed you, she took it for no tribulation, and therefore comforting of her could have no place; but if men should anything give her toward her help, it must have been, as I told you, good counsel.
 25 And therefore, as I said, this kind of temptation to a man's own destruction — which requireth<sup>559</sup> counsel, and is out<sup>560</sup> of tribulation — was out of our matter, that is to treat of comfort in tribulation.

THE SIXTEENTH CHAPTER

30 Of him that were moved to kill himself by illusion of the devil, which he reckoneth for a revelation

ANTONY: But lest you might reject both these examples, weening they were but feigned tales, I shall put you in remembrance of one which I reckon 35 yourself have read in the Collations of Cassian<sup>561</sup> — and if you have not, there may you soon find it. For myself have half forgotten the thing, it is so long since I read it; but thus much I remember: that he telleth there of one that was many days a very special holy man in his living, and among the other 40 virtuous monks and anchors<sup>562</sup> that lived there in wilderness was marvelously much esteemed, saving that some were not all out of fear of him<sup>563</sup> lest his “revelations,” whereof he told many by himself, would prove illusions of the devil. And so proved 45 it after indeed. For the man was by the devil's subtle suggestions brought into such a high spiritual pride that in conclusion<sup>564</sup> the devil brought him to that horrible point that he made him go kill himself. And (as far as my mind giveth me now, with-

 50 out new sight of the book) he brought him to it by this persuasion: that he made him believe that it was God's will he should so do, and that thereby should he go straight to heaven.

55 And then, if it were by that persuasion with which he took very great comfort in his own mind himself, then was it, as I said, out of our case, and needed not comfort, but counsel against giving credence to the devil's persuasion.

60 But marry,<sup>565</sup> if he made him first perceive how he had been deluded, and then tempted him to his own death by shame and by despair, then was it within our matter, lo; for then was his temptation fallen down from pride to pusillanimity, and was 65 waxen<sup>566</sup> that kind of the “night's fear” that I spoke of, wherein a good part of the counsel that were to be given him should have need to stand in<sup>567</sup> good comforting. For then was he brought into right 70 sore<sup>568</sup> tribulation.

75 But as I was about to tell you, strength of heart and courage is there none therein, not only for that very<sup>569</sup> strength, as it hath the name of virtue in a reasonable creature, can never be without prudence, but also for that, as I said, even in them that seem men of most hardiness it shall well appear — 80 to them that well weigh the matter — that the mind whereby they be led to destroy themselves groweth of pusillanimity and very foolish fear.

85 Take for the example Cato Uticensis,<sup>570</sup> which in Africa killed himself after the great victory<sup>571</sup> that Julius Caesar had. Saint Augustine well declareth in his work De civitate Dei<sup>572</sup> that there was no strength nor magnanimity therein, but plain pusillanimity and impotency of stomach,<sup>573</sup> whereby he was forced to the destruction of himself because his heart was too feeble for to bear the beholding of another man's glory, or the suffering of other worldly calamities that he feared should fall on himself. So that, as Saint Augustine well proveth, that horrible deed is none act of strength, but an act of a mind either drawn from the consideration of itself with some devilish fantasy, wherein the man hath need to be called home by good counsel, or else oppressed by faint heart and fear, wherein a good part of the counsel must stand in lifting up his courage with good consolation and comfort.

And therefore, if we found any such religious person,<sup>574</sup> as was that father which Cassian writeth of, that were of such austerity and apparent ghostly<sup>575</sup> living that he were with such as well knew him reputed for a man of singular virtue, and that it were perceived that he had many strange visions appearing unto him, if it should now be perceived after that that the man went about secretly to destroy himself, whoso<sup>576</sup> should hap to come to the knowledge thereof, and intended to do his devoir in the let,<sup>577</sup> first must he find the means to search and find out whether the man be in his manner and his countenance lightsome,<sup>578</sup> glad, and joyful, or dumpish,<sup>579</sup> heavy, and sad, and whether he go thereabout as one that were full of the glad hope of heaven, or as one that had his breast farced<sup>580</sup> full of tediousness and weariness of the world. If he were found in the first fashion, it were a token that the devil hath by his fantastical apparitions puffed him up in such a peevish<sup>581</sup> pride that he hath finally persuaded him, by some illusion showed him for the proof, that God's pleasure is that he shall for his<sup>582</sup> sake with his own hands kill himself.

VINCENT: Now, if a man so found it, Uncle, what counsel should a man give him then?

ANTONY: That were somewhat out<sup>583</sup> of our purpose, Cousin, since, as I told you before, the man were not then in sorrow and tribulation — whereof our matter speaketh<sup>584</sup> — but in a perilous merry mortal temptation, so that if we should, besides our own matter that we have in hand, enter into that too, we might make a longer work between them both than we could well finish this day. Howbeit, to be short, it is soon seen that therein the sum and the effect of the counsel must in manner rest<sup>585</sup> in giving him warning of the devil's sleights,<sup>586</sup> and that must be done under such sweet pleasant manner as the man should not abhor to hear it; for while it could lightly be none other but<sup>587</sup> that the man were rocked and sung asleep by the devil's craft, and his mind occupied, as it were, in a delectable dream, he should never have good audience for him that<sup>588</sup> would rudely and boistously shog<sup>589</sup> him and wake him, and so shake him out thereof. Therefore must you fair and easily touch him, and with some pleasant speech awake him, so that he wax not wayward,<sup>590</sup> as children do that are waked ere they list to rise.<sup>591</sup>

But when a man hath first begun with his praise (for if he be proud ye shall much better please him with a commendation than with a dirge), then, after favor won therewithal, a man may a little and little insinuate<sup>592</sup> the doubt of such revelations — not at the first as<sup>593</sup> it were for any doubt of his,<sup>594</sup> but of some other's that men in some other places talk of. And peradventure it shall not discontent himself to show<sup>595</sup> great perils that may fall therein in another man's case than his own, and shall begin to preach upon it.

Or if you were a man that had not so very great scrupulous conscience of a harmless lie devised to do good withal — which kind Saint Augustine,<sup>596</sup> though he take always for sin, yet he taketh but for venial, and Saint Jerome<sup>597</sup> (as by diverse places in his books appeareth) taketh not fully for so much — then may you feign some secret friend of yours to be in such case, and that yourself somewhat fear his peril, and have made, of charity, this voyage<sup>598</sup> for his sake, to ask this good father's counsel. And in that communication, upon these words of Saint John, Nolite omni spiritui credere, sed probate

spiritus, si ex Deo sint (“Give not credence to every spirit, but prove<sup>599</sup> the spirits, whether they be of God”),<sup>600</sup> and these words of Saint Paul, Angelus Satanae transfiguratur se in angelum lucis (“The angel of Satan transfigureth himself into the angel of light”),<sup>601</sup> you shall take occasion — the better if they hap to come in on his side; but yet not lack occasion neither if those texts, for lack of his offer, come in upon your own — occasion, I say, you shall not lack to inquire by what sure and undeceivable<sup>602</sup> tokens a man may discern the true revelations from the false illusions; whereof a man shall find many, both here and there in diverse other authors, and whole together diverse goodly treatises of that good godly doctor Master John Gerson entitled De probatione spirituum<sup>603</sup> — as whether the party be naturalwise, or anything seem fantastical, or whether the party be poor-spirited or proud (which will somewhat appear by his delight in his own praise), or, if of wiliness or of another pride for to<sup>604</sup> be praised of humility, he refuse to hear thereof yet<sup>605</sup> any little fault found in himself, or diffidence declared and mistrust of his own revelations and doubtful tokens told, wherefore himself should fear lest they be the devil’s illusions — such things, as Master Gerson saith,<sup>606</sup> will make him spit out somewhat of his spirit if the devil lie in his breast.

Or if the devil be yet so subtle that he keep himself close<sup>607</sup> in his warm den, and blow out never a hot word, yet is it to be considered what end his revelations draw to: whether to any spiritual profit to himself or other folk, or only to vain marvels and wonders.

Also whether they withdraw him from such other good virtuous business as by the common rules of Christendom, or any rules of his profession, he was wont<sup>608</sup> to use or were bound to be occupied in.

Or whether he fall into any singularity of opinions against the Scripture of God, or against the common faith of Christ’s Catholic Church.

Many other tokens are there in that work of Master Gerson spoken of to consider by whether the person — never having revelations of God nor illusions from the devil — do, either for winning of money or worldly favor, feign<sup>609</sup> his revelations himself and delude the people withal.<sup>610</sup> But now for our purpose: if among any of the marks by which the true revelations may be known from false illusions, that man himself bring forth for one mark the doing or teaching of anything against the Scripture of God or the common faith of the Church, then have you an entry made you by which, when you list,<sup>611</sup> you may enter into the special matter, wherein he can never well flit from you.

Or else may you yet, if you list, feign that your secret friend (for whose sake you come to him for counsel) is brought in that mind by a certain apparition showed unto him — as himself saith, by an angel; as you fear, by the devil — that he can be by you none otherwise persuaded as yet but that the pleasure of God is that he shall go kill himself, and that if he so do, then shall he be thereby so specially participant of Christ’s Passion that he shall forthwith<sup>612</sup> be carried up with angels into heaven. For which is he so joyful that he firmly purposeth upon<sup>613</sup> it, no less glad to do it than another man would be glad to avoid it. And therefore may you desire his good counsel to instruct you with some substantial good advice wherewith you may turn him from this error, that he be not, under hope of God’s true revelation, in body and soul destroyed by the devil’s false illusion.

If he will in this thing study<sup>614</sup> and labor to instruct you, the things that himself shall find of his own invention, though they be less effectual, shall peradventure more work with himself toward his own amendment — since he shall of likelihood better like them — than shall double so substantial told him by another man.

If he be loath to think upon that side, and therefore shrink from the matter, then is there none other way but adventure,<sup>615</sup> after<sup>616</sup> the plain fashion, to fall into the matter and show what you hear, and to give him counsel and exhortation to the contrary — but if you list<sup>617</sup> to say that thus and thus hath the matter been reasoned already between your friend and you. And therein may you rehearse<sup>618</sup> such things as should prove that the vision which moveth him is no true revelation, but a very false illusion.

VINCENT: Verily, Uncle, I well allow this: that a man should, as well in this thing as every other wherein he longeth to do another man good, seek such a pleasant way as the party should be likely to 5 like, or at the leastwise, well to take in worth<sup>619</sup> his communication, and not so to enter in thereunto as he whom he would help should abhor him and be loath to hear him, and therefore take no profit by him. But now, Uncle, if it come, by the one way or 10 the other, to the point that hear me he will or shall, what be the reasons effectual with which I should by my counsel convert him?

ANTONY: All those by which you may make him perceive that himself is deceived, and that his visions 15 be no godly revelations, but very devilish illusions. And those reasons must you gather of the man, of the matter, and of the law of God, or of some one of these. Of the man, if you can peradventure show him that in such a point or such he is waxen worse, 20 since such revelations have haunted him, than he was before — as in those that are deluded, whoso be well acquainted with them shall well mark and perceive: for they wax more proud, more wayward, more en-
25 vious, suspicious, misjudging and depraving<sup>620</sup> other men, with the delight of their own praise and such other spiritual vices of the soul.

Of the matter may you gather if it have happed his revelations before to prove false, or that they be things rather strange than profitable, for that is a 30 good mark between God's miracles and the devil's wonders; for Christ and his saints have their miracles always tending to fruit and profit; the devil and his witches and necromancers, all their wonderful works draw to no fruitful end, but to a fruit-35 less ostentation and show, as<sup>621</sup> it were a juggler that would, for a show before the people, play masteries<sup>622</sup> at a feast.

Of the law of God you must draw your reasons in showing by the Scripture that the thing which 40 he weeneth God by his angel biddeth, God hath his own mouth forbidden. And that is, you wot well, in the case that we speak of, so easy to find that I need not to rehearse it to you, since there is plain among the commandments forbidden the unlawful kill-45 ing of any man — and therefore of himself (as Saint Augustine saith,<sup>623</sup> and all the Church teacheth), except<sup>624</sup> himself be no man.

VINCENT: This is very true, good Uncle, nor I will not dispute upon any glossing<sup>625</sup> of that prohibition; but since we find not the contrary, but that 50 God may dispense with that commandment himself, and both license and command also, if himself list,<sup>626</sup> any man to go kill either another man or himself either, this man that is now by such a mar-
55 velous vision induced to believe that God so bid- deth him, and therefore thinketh himself, in that case, of that prohibition discharged, and charged with the contrary commandment, with what reason may we make him perceive that his vision is but 60 an illusion and not a true revelation?

ANTONY: Nay, Cousin Vincent, ye shall in this case not need to require<sup>627</sup> those reasons of me, but, taking the Scripture of God for a ground for this mat-
65 ter, you know very well yourself you shall go some- what a shorter way to work if you ask this question of him: that since God hath once forbidden the thing himself, though he may dispense therewith if he will, yet since the devil may feign himself God, 70 and with a marvelous vision delude one and make as though God did it, and since the devil is also more likely to speak against God's commandment than God against his own, you shall have good cause, I say, to demand of the man himself whereby he knoweth that his vision is God's true revelation and 75 not the devil's false delusion.

VINCENT: Indeed, Uncle, I think that would be a hard question to him. May a man, Uncle, have in such a thing even a very sure knowledge of his own mind?

ANTONY: Yea, Cousin, God may cast into the 80 mind of man, I suppose, such an inward light of understanding that he cannot fail but be sure thereof. And yet he that is deluded by the devil may think himself as sure, and yet be deceived indeed. And such a difference is there, in a manner,<sup>628</sup> between 85 them as is between the sight of a thing while we be waking and look thereon and the sight with

619 in worth: as valuable 620 disparaging, vilifying 621 as if 622 magic tricks

627 ask 628 in a manner: so to speak; very nearly which we see a thing in our sleep while we dream thereof.

VINCENT: This is a pretty<sup>629</sup> similitude, Uncle, in this thing; and then is it easy for the monk that we 5 speak of to declare how he knoweth his vision for a true revelation and not a false delusion, if there be so great difference between them.

ANTONY: Not so easy, Cousin, as you ween it were. For how can you now prove unto me that you be 10 awake?

VINCENT: Marry, lo, do I not now wag my hand, shake my head, and stamp with my foot here in the floor?

ANTONY: Have you never dreamed ere this that 15 you have done the same?

VINCENT: Yes, that have I, and more too than that; for I have ere this in my sleep dreamed that I doubted whether I were asleep or awake, and have, in good faith, thought that I did thereupon 20 even the same things that I do now indeed, and thereby determined that I was not asleep. And yet have I dreamed, in good faith, further that I have been afterward at dinner, and there, making merry with good company, have told the same dream at 25 the table, and laughed well thereat, that while I was asleep, I had, by such means of moving the parts of my body and considering thereof, so verily thought myself waking.

ANTONY: And will you not now soon, trow you,<sup>630</sup> 30 when you wake and rise, laugh as well at yourself when you see that you lie now in your warm bed asleep again, and dream all this time while you ween so verily that you be waking and talking of these matters with me?

VINCENT: God's Lord, Uncle, you go now merrily to work with me indeed when you look and speak so sadly,<sup>631</sup> and would make me ween I were asleep.

ANTONY: It may be that you be so; for anything that you can say or do whereby you may, with any reason that you make, drive me to confess that yourself be sure of the contrary, since you can do nor say 40 nothing now whereby you be sure to be waking but that you have ere this, or hereafter may, think yourself as surely to do the selfsame things indeed while 45 you be all the while asleep, and nothing do but lie dreaming.

VINCENT: Well, well, Uncle, though I have ere this thought myself awake while I was indeed asleep, yet for<sup>632</sup> all that, this I know well enough: that I am 50 awake now—and so do you too, though I cannot find the words by which I may with reason force you to confess it but that always you may drive me off by the example of my dream.

ANTONY: This is, Cousin, as meseemeth,<sup>633</sup> very true. And likewise seemeth me the manner and difference between some kinds of true revelations and some kinds of false illusions as it standeth between the things that are done waking and the things that in our dreams seem to be done while we be sleeping: that is to wit, that he which hath that kind of 60 revelation from God is as sure of the truth as we be of our own deed while we be waking, and he that is illuded<sup>634</sup> by the devil is in such wise deceived, and worse too, than be they by their dream, and yet reckoneth for the time himself as sure as the other, 65 saving<sup>635</sup> that the one falsely weeneth, the other truly knoweth.

But I say not, Cousin, that this kind of sure knowledge cometh in every kind of revelation, for there are many kinds—whereof were too long to 70 talk now, but I say that God doth or may do to man in some thing certainly send some such.

VINCENT: Yet then may this religious man of whom we speak, when I show him the Scripture against his revelation, and therefore call it an illusion, bid me, with reason, go care for myself. For he knoweth well and surely himself that his revelation is very good and true and not any false illusion, since, for all the general commandment of 75 God in the Scripture, God may dispense where he will and when he will, and may command him to do the contrary, as he commanded Abraham to kill his own son,<sup>636</sup> and as Samson had, by inspiration

629 clever, artful; appropriate; admirable 630 trow you: do you suppose

of God, commandment to kill himself with pulling down the house upon his own head at the feast of the Philistines.<sup>637</sup>

Now, if I would then do as you bade me right now — tell him that such apparitions may be illusions, and since God's word is in the Scripture against him plain for the prohibition, he must prove the truth of his revelation, whereby that I may know it is not a false illusion — then shall he bid me again<sup>638</sup> tell him whereby that I can prove myself to be awake and talk with him and not to be asleep and dream so, since in my dream I may as surely ween so as I know that I do so. And thus shall he drive me to the same bay<sup>639</sup> to which I would bring him.

ANTONY: This is well said, Cousin, but yet could he not escape you so. For the dispensation of God's common precept — which dispensation he must say that he hath by his private revelation — is a thing of such sort as showeth itself naught<sup>640</sup> and false. For it never hath had any example like, since the world began unto now, that ever man hath read or heard of among faithful people commended.

First, in Abraham, touching the death of his son: God intended it not, but only tempted the towardness<sup>641</sup> of the father's obedience. In Samson, all men make not the matter very sure whether he be saved or not, but yet therein some matter appeareth. For the Philistines being enemies to God, and using Samson for their mocking-stock<sup>642</sup> in scorn of God, it is well likely that God gave him the mind to bestow his own life upon the revenging of the displeasure that those blasphemous Philistines did unto God. And that appeareth meetly<sup>643</sup> clear by this: that though his strength failed him when he wanted his hair, yet had he not, as it seemeth, that strength evermore at hand while he had his hair, but at such times as it pleased God to give it him; which thing appeareth by these words that the Scripture (in some place) of that matter saith: Irruit virtus Domini in Samsonem (“The power or might of God rushed into Samson”).<sup>644</sup> And so, therefore, while this thing that he did, in the pulling down of the house, was done by the special gift of strength then at that point given him by God, it well declareth that the strength of God, and therewith the Spirit of God, entered into him therefor. 45

Saint Augustine also rehearseth<sup>645</sup> that certain holy virtuous virgins in time of persecution, being by God's enmious<sup>646</sup> infidels pursued upon to be deflowered by force, ran into a water and drowned themselves rather than they would be bereaved of their virginity. And albeit that he thinketh it is not lawful for any other maid to follow their example — but rather suffer other<sup>647</sup> to do her any manner violence by force, and commit sin of his own upon her against her will, than willingly, and thereby sinfully, herself become a homicide of herself — yet he thinketh that in them it happed by the special instinct<sup>648</sup> of the Spirit of God that, for causes seen unto himself, would rather that they should avoid it with their own temporal death than abide the defiling and violation of their chastity.<sup>649</sup> 50

But now this good man neither hath any of God's enemies to be by his own death revenged on, nor any woman that violently pursue him by force to bereave him of his virginity; nor never find we that God proved<sup>650</sup> any man's obedient mind by the commandment of his own slaughter of himself; therefore is his case both plain against God's open precept, and the dispensation strange and without example, no cause appearing or well imaginable but if he would think that he could neither any longer live without him nor take him to him in such wise as he doth other men, but command him to come by a forbidden way, by which without other cause we never heard that ever he bade<sup>651</sup> any man else before. 55

Now whether you think, if you should after this bid him tell you by what way he knoweth that his intent riseth upon a true revelation and not upon a false illusion, he would bid you then again<sup>652</sup> tell him by what means you know that you be talking with him well waking<sup>653</sup> and not dream it sleeping, you may tell him again that men thus to talk together as you do, and in such manner wise,<sup>654</sup> and to prove and perceive that they so do by the moving of themselves, with putting the question thereof unto themselves for their pleasure, and the marking and considering thereof, is in waking a daily common 60

thing that every man doth or may do when he will; and when they do it, they do it but of<sup>655</sup> pleasure; but in sleep it happeth very seldom that men dream they so do, nor in the dream never put the question but for doubt. And therefore it is more reason<sup>656</sup> that since his revelation is such also as happeth so seldom, and offer<sup>657</sup> happeth that men dream of such than have such indeed—therefore it is more reason, you may tell him, that he show you whereby he knoweth in such a rare thing, and a thing more like a dream, that himself is not asleep, than you, in such a common thing among folk that are waking, and so seldom happening in a dream, should need to show him whereby you know that you be not asleep.

Besides this, himself, to whom you should show it, seeth and perceiveth the thing that he would bid you prove; but the thing that he would make you believe—the truth of his revelation, which you bid him prove—you see not, he wotteth<sup>658</sup> well himself. And therefore, ere you believe it against the Scripture, it were well consonant unto reason that he should show you whereby he knoweth it for a true waking revelation, and not a false dreaming delusion.

VINCENT: Then shall he peradventure say to me again that whether I believe him or not maketh him no matter; the thing toucheth himself and not me, and himself is in himself as sure that it is a true revelation as that he can tell that he dreameth not but talketh with me waking.

ANTONY: Without doubt, Cousin, if he abide<sup>659</sup> at that point, and can be by no reason brought to do so much as doubt, nor can by no means be shogged<sup>660</sup> out of his deep sleep, but will needs take his dream for a very truth and, as some by night rise and walk about their chamber in their sleep, will so rise and hang himself, I can then none other way see but either bind him fast in his bed, or else assay<sup>661</sup> whether that might hap to help him with which the common tale goeth that a carver's wife in such a frantic fantasy helped her husband, to whom, when he would upon a Good Friday needs have killed himself for Christ's sake as Christ was killed for him, she would not in vain plead against his mind, but well and wisely put him in remembrance that if he would die for Christ as Christ did for him, it were then convenient<sup>662</sup> for him to die even after the same fashion, and that might not be by his own hands, but by the hand of some other; for Christ, pardie,<sup>663</sup> killed not himself.

And because her husband should need to make no more of counsel<sup>664</sup> (for that would he not in no wise), she offered him that, for God's sake, she would secretly crucify him herself, upon a great cross that he had made to nail a new-carved crucifix upon; whereof when he was very glad, yet she bethought her that Christ was bounden to a pillar and beaten first, and after crowned with thorns; whereupon when she had by his own assent bound him fast<sup>665</sup> to a post, she left not beating, with holy exhortation to suffer, so much and so long that ere ever she left work and unbound him—praying<sup>666</sup> nevertheless that she might put on his head, and drive it well down, a crown of thorns that she had wreathen<sup>667</sup> for him and brought him—he said he thought this was enough for that year; he would pray God forbear<sup>668</sup> him of the remnant till Good Friday come again; but when it came again the next year, then was his lust<sup>669</sup> passed; he longed to follow Christ no farther.

VINCENT: Indeed, Uncle, if this help him not, then will nothing help him, I trow.

ANTONY: And yet, Cousin, the devil may peradventure make him toward such a purpose first gladly to suffer other pain—yea, and diminish his feeling too therein—that he may thereby the less fear his death. And yet are peradventure sometimes such things, and many more, to be assayed;<sup>670</sup> for as the devil may hap to make him suffer, so may he hap to miss, namely<sup>671</sup> if his friends fall to prayer for him against his temptation—for that can himself never do while he taketh it for none. But for conclusion, if the man be surely proved so inflexibly set upon the purpose to destroy himself, as commanded thereto by God, that no good counsel that men can give him, nor any other thing that men may do to him, can refrain<sup>672</sup> him, but that he would surely shortly kill himself, then, except only good prayer by his friends made for him, I can find no further shift<sup>673</sup> but either have him ever in sight or bind him fast in his bed. And so must he needs of reason be content to be ordered. For though himself take his fantasy for a true revelation, yet since he cannot make us perceive it for such, likewise as he thinketh himself by his secret commandment bounden to follow it, so must he needs agree that, since it is against the plain open prohibition of God, we be by the plain open precept bounden to keep him from it.

VINCENT: In this point, Uncle, I can go no further. But now, if he were, upon the other side,<sup>674</sup> perceived to mind<sup>675</sup> his destruction and go thereabout with heaviness of heart and thought and dullness, what way were there to be used to him then?

ANTONY: Then were his temptation, as I told you before, properly pertaining to our matter, for then were he in a sore tribulation, and a very perilous; for then were it a token that the devil had either, by bringing him into some great sin, brought him in despair, or — peradventure by his revelations foun- den false and reprov'd, or by some secret sin of his reprehended<sup>676</sup> and divulg'd — cast him both in despair of heaven through fear and in a weariness of this life for shame, since he seeth his estimation lost among other folk, of whose praise he was wont to be proud. And therefore, Cousin, in such case as this is, the man is to be fair handled, and sweetly, and with douce<sup>677</sup> and tender loving words to be put in good courage and comfort in all that men goodly<sup>678</sup> may.

Here must they put him in mind that if he despair not, but pull up his courage and trust in God's great mercy, he shall have in conclusion great cause to be glad of this fall. For before, he stood in greater peril than he was aware of, while he took himself for better than he was. And God, for favor that he beareth him, hath suffered him to fall deep into the devil's danger to make him thereby know what he was while he took himself for so sure.<sup>679</sup> And therefore, as he suffered<sup>680</sup> him then to fall for a remedy against overbold pride, so will God now — if the man meek<sup>681</sup> himself, not with fruitless despair, but with fruitful penance — so set him up again upon his feet, and so strengthen him with his grace, that for this one fall that the devil hath given him, he shall give the devil a hundred. And here must he be put in remembrance of Mary Magdalene, of the prophet David, and specially of Saint Peter, whose high bold courage took a foul fall; and yet, because he despaired not of God's mercy, but wept and called upon it, how highly God took him into his favor again in his Holy Scripture is well testified, and well through Christendom known.

And now shall it be charitably done if some good virtuous folk — such as himself somewhat esteemeth, and hath afore longed to stand in estimation with<sup>682</sup> — do resort sometimes unto him,<sup>683</sup> not only to give him counsel, but also to ask advice and counsel of him in some cases<sup>684</sup> of their own conscience, to let him thereby perceive that they no less esteem him now, but rather, more than they did before, since they think him now, by his fall, better expert of the devil's craft, and thereby not only better instructed himself, but also better able to give good advice and counsel unto others. This thing will, in my mind, well amend and lift up his courage from the peril of that desperate shame.

VINCENT: Methink, Uncle, that this were a perilous thing; for it may peradventure make him set the less by<sup>685</sup> his fall, and thereby cast him into his first pride or into his other sin again, the falling whereinto drove him into this despair.

ANTONY: I do not mean, Cousin, that every fool should at adventure<sup>686</sup> fall in hand with him; for so, lo, might it hap for to do harm indeed. But, Cousin, if a cunning physician have a man in hand, he can well discern when and how long some certain medicine is necessary, which at another time ministered, or at that time overlong continued, might put the patient to peril.

If he have his patient in an ague,<sup>687</sup> to the cure whereof he needeth his medicines in their working cold, yet if he hap ere that fever be full cured to fall into some such other disease as, except it were helped with hot medicines, were likely to kill the body before the fever could be cured, he would

for the while have his most care to the cure of that thing wherein were most present peril, and when that were once out of jeopardy, do then the more exact diligence after about the further cure of the fever.

And likewise, if the ship were in peril to fall into Scylla, the fear of falling into Charybdis<sup>688</sup> on the other side shall never let<sup>689</sup> any wise master thereof to draw him from Scylla toward Charybdis first, in all that ever he may. But when he hath him once so far away from Scylla that he seeth him safely out of that danger, then will he begin to take good heed to keep him well from the other. And in like wise, while this man is falling down to despair, and to the final destruction of himself, a good wise spiritual leech<sup>690</sup> will first look unto that, and by good comfort lift up his courage, and when he seeth that peril well past, care for the cure of his other faults after. Howbeit, even in the giving of his comfort, he may find ways enough in such wise to temper his words that the man may take occasion of good courage, and yet far from occasion giving of new recidivation<sup>691</sup> into his former sin, since the great part of his counsel shall be to courage him to amendment — and that is, pardie, far from falling unto sin again.

VINCENT: I think, Uncle, that folk fall into this ungracious mind through the devil's temptation by many more ways than one.

ANTONY: That is, Cousin, very true, for the devil taketh his occasions as he seeth them fall meet<sup>692</sup> for him. Some he stirreth to it for weariness of themselves after some great loss; some for fear of horrible bodily harm; and some, as I said, for fear of worldly shame. One wist<sup>693</sup> I myself that had been long reputed for a right honest man, which was fallen in such a fantasy that he was well-near worn away therewith; but what he was tempted to do, that would he not tell no man; but he told unto me that he was sore cumbered,<sup>694</sup> and that it always ran in his mind that folks' fantasies were fallen from him,<sup>695</sup> and that they esteemed not his wit as they were wont to do, but ever his mind gave<sup>696</sup> him that the people began to take him for a fool. And folk of truth nothing so did at all, but reputed him both for wise and honest.

Two others knew I that were marvelous feared<sup>697</sup> that they should kill themselves and could tell me no cause wherefore they so feared it, but only that their own mind so gave them; neither loss had they any had, nor no such thing toward<sup>698</sup> them, nor none occasion of any worldly shame — the one in body very well-liking and lusty<sup>699</sup> — but wondrous weary were they both twain<sup>700</sup> of that mind.<sup>701</sup> And always they thought that do it they would not, for nothing. And nevertheless, ever they feared they should, and wherefore they so feared, neither of them both could tell; and the one, lest he should do it, desired his friends to bind him.

VINCENT: This is, Uncle, a marvelous strange manner.

ANTONY: Forsooth,<sup>702</sup> Cousin, I suppose many of them are in this case. The devil, as I said before, seeketh his occasions; for as Saint Peter saith, Adversarius vester diabolus quasi leo rugiens circuit quaerens quem devoret (“Your adversary the devil as a roaring lion goeth about, seeking whom he may devour”).<sup>703</sup> He marketh well therefore the state and condition that every man standeth in, not only concerning these outward things — lands, possessions, goods, authority, fame, favor, or hatred of the world — but also men's complexions<sup>704</sup> within them: health or sickness, good humors<sup>705</sup> or bad, by which they be lighthearted or lumpish,<sup>706</sup> strong-hearted or faint and feeble of spirit, bold and hardy or timorous and fearful of courage. And after, as these things minister<sup>707</sup> him matter of temptation, so useth he<sup>708</sup> himself in the manner of his temptation.

Now likewise as such folk as are full of young warm lusty blood and other humors exciting the flesh to filthy<sup>709</sup> voluptuous living, the devil useth<sup>710</sup> to make those things his instruments in tempting them and provoking them thereunto. And where he findeth some folk full of hot blood and choler,<sup>711</sup> he maketh those humors his instruments to set their heart on fire in wrath and fierce furious anger, so where he findeth some folk which through some dull melancholious<sup>712</sup> humors are naturally disposed to fear, he casteth sometimes such a fearful imagination in their mind that without help of God they can never cast it out of their heart. Some, at the sudden falling of some horrible thought into their mind, have not only had a great abomination thereat (which abomination they well and virtuously had thereat), but the devil, using their malicious humor — and thereby their natural inclination to fear — for his instrument, hath caused them to conceive therewith such a deep dread besides that they ween<sup>713</sup> themselves with that abominable thought to be fallen into such an outrageous sin that they be ready to fall into despair of grace, weening that God hath given them over forever, whereas that thought, were it never so horrible and never so abominable, is yet unto them that never like it, but ever still abhor it and strive still thereagainst, matter of conscience and merit, and not any sin at all.

Some have, with holding a knife in their hand, suddenly thought upon the killing of themselves, and forthwith<sup>714</sup> in devising what a horrible thing it were if they should mishap so to do, have fallen in a fear that they should so do indeed, and have, with long and often thinking thereon, imprinted that fear so sore<sup>715</sup> in their imagination that some of them have not after cast it off without great difficulty, and some could never in their life be rid thereof, but have after in conclusion<sup>716</sup> miserably done it indeed. But likewise as where the devil useth the blood of a man's own body toward his purpose in provoking him to lechery, the man must and doth with grace and wisdom resist it, so must that man do whose malicious humors the devil abuseth toward the casting of such a desperate dread into his heart.

VINCENT: I pray you, Uncle, what advice were to be given him in such case?

ANTONY: Surely methinketh his help standeth in two things: counsel and prayer. First, as concerning counsel, likewise as it may be that he hath two things that hold him in his temptation — that is to wit, some evil humors of his own body, and the cursed devil that abuseth them to his pernicious purpose — so must he need against them twain<sup>717</sup> the counsel of two manner of folk: that is to wit, physicians for the body and physicians for the soul. The bodily physician shall consider what abundance the man hath of those evil humors that the devil maketh his instrument in moving the man toward that fearful affection, and as well by diet convenient<sup>718</sup> and medicines meet therefor,<sup>719</sup> to resist them, as by purgations to disburden the body of them.

Nor let no man think strange that I would advise a man to take counsel of a physician for the body in such a spiritual passion.<sup>720</sup> For since the soul and the body be so knit and joined together that they both make between them one person, the distemperance<sup>721</sup> of either other<sup>722</sup> engendereth sometimes the distemperance of both twain.

And therefore, like<sup>723</sup> as I would advise every man in every sickness of the body be shriven<sup>724</sup> and seek of a good spiritual physician the sure health of his soul, which shall not only serve against peril that may peradventure further grow by that sickness than in the beginning men would ween were likely, but the comfort thereof and God's favor increasing therewith, shall also do the body good — for which cause the blessed apostle Saint James exhorteth men that they shall in their bodily sickness induce<sup>725</sup> the priests, and saith that it shall do them good both in body and soul<sup>726</sup> — so would I sometimes advise some men in some sickness of the soul, besides their spiritual leech,<sup>727</sup> take also some counsel of the physician for the body. Some that are wretchedly disposed and yet long to be more vicious than they be go to physicians and apothecaries<sup>728</sup> and inquire what things may serve to make them more lusty to their foul fleshly delight. And were it then any folly upon the other side, if he that feeleth himself against his will much moved unto such uncleanness should inquire of the physician what thing, without diminishing of his health, were meet for the diminishing of such foul fleshly motion?

Of spiritual counsel, the first is to be shriven, that by reason of his other sins the devil have not the more power upon him.

VINCENT: I have heard some say, Uncle, that when such folk have been at shrift,<sup>729</sup> their temptation hath been the more breme<sup>730</sup> upon them than it was before.

5 ANTONY: That think I very well; but that is a special token that shrift is wholesome for them, while the devil is with that most wroth. You find in some places of the Gospel that the devil the person whom he possessed did most trouble<sup>731</sup> when he saw that 10 Christ would cast him out. We must else let the devil do what he will if we fear his anger, for with every good deed will he wax angry.

Then is it in his shrift to be showed him that he not only feareth more than he needeth, but also feareth 15 where he needeth not, and over<sup>732</sup> that is sorry of that thing whereof, but if he will willingly turn his good into his harm, he hath more cause to be glad.

First, if he have cause to fear, yet feareth he more than he needeth. For there is no devil so diligent to 20 destroy him as God is to preserve him, nor no devil so near him to do him harm as God is to do him good, nor all the devils in hell so strong to invade and assault him as God is to defend him, if he distrust him not but faithfully put his trust in him.

25 He feareth also where he needeth not; for where he dreadeth that he were out of God's favor because such horrible thoughts fall in his mind against his will, they be not imputed unto him. He is, finally, sad of that<sup>733</sup> he may be glad. For since he taketh
30 such thoughts displeasantly and striveth and fighteth against them, he hath thereby a good token that he is in God's favor, and that God assisteth him and helpeth him, and may make himself sure that so will God never cease to do but if<sup>734</sup> himself fail and fall 35 from him first. And over that, this conflict that he hath against his temptation shall (if he will not fall where he need not) be an occasion of his merit, and of a right great reward in heaven; and the pain that he taketh therein shall for so much (as Master Ger-40 son well showeth)<sup>735</sup> stand him in stead<sup>736</sup> of his purgatory. The manner of the fight against this temptation must stand in three things: that is to wit, in resisting, and in contemning,<sup>737</sup> and in the invocation of help.

Resist must a man for his own part with reason, 45 considering what a folly it were to fall where he need not, while he is not driven to it in avoiding of any other pain, or in hope of winning any manner of pleasure, but contrariwise should by that pain lose everlasting life and fall into everlasting pain. 50 And if it were in avoiding of other great pain, yet could he void<sup>738</sup> none so great thereby as he should thereby fall into.

He must also consider that a great part of this temptation is in effect but the fear of his own fan- 55 tasy: the dread that he hath lest he shall once be driven to it, which thing he may be sure that (but if<sup>739</sup> himself will, of his own folly) all the devils in hell can never drive him to; but his own foolish imagination may. For likewise as some man going 60 over a high bridge waxeth so feared through his own fantasy that he falleth down indeed, which<sup>740</sup> were else able enough to pass over without any danger; and as some man shall upon such a bridge, if folk call upon him, "You fall! You fall!", fall with the 65 fantasy that he taketh thereof, which bridge, if folk looked merrily upon him and said, "There is no danger therein," he would pass over well enough, and would not let<sup>741</sup> to run thereon if<sup>742</sup> it were but a foot from the ground—thus fareth it in this tempta- 70 tion. The devil findeth the man of his own fond<sup>743</sup> fantasy afeard, and then crieth he in the ear of his heart, "Thou fallest! Thou fallest!" and maketh the fond man afeard that he should at every foot fall indeed. And the devil so wearieth him with that contin- 75 ual fear (if he give the ear of his heart unto him) that at the last he withdraweth his mind from due remembrance of God, and then driveth him to that deadly mischief indeed. Therefore, like as against the vice of the flesh the victory standeth<sup>744</sup> not all whole 80 in the fight, but sometimes also in the flight (saving that it is indeed a part of a wise warrior's fight, to flee from his enemy's trains),<sup>745</sup> so must a man in this temptation too not only resist it always with reason- 85 ing thereagainst, but sometimes set it clear at right nought<sup>746</sup> and cast it off when it cometh, and not once regard it so much as to vouchsafe<sup>747</sup> to think thereon. Some folk have been clearly<sup>748</sup> rid of such pestilent fantasies with very full contempt thereof,

729 at shrift: to confession 730 fierce, raging 731 the devil...trouble: the devil gave the most trouble to the person whom he possessed. See Mk 1:23–6; 9:25–7; Mt 8:28–32; Lk 4:33–5. 732 in addition to making a cross upon their heart and bidding the devil avaunt,<sup>749</sup> and sometimes laugh him to scorn too, and then turn their mind to some other matter. And when the devil hath seen that they have set so little by him,<sup>750</sup> after certain assays,<sup>751</sup> made in such times as he thought most meet,<sup>752</sup> he hath given that temptation quite over, both for that<sup>753</sup> the proud spirit cannot endure to be mocked, and also lest with much tempting the man to the sin whereto he could not in conclusion bring him, he should much increase his merit.

The final fight is by invocation of help unto God: both praying for himself and desiring<sup>754</sup> others also to pray for him, both poor folk for his alms and other good folk of their charity, specially good priests in that holy sacred service of the Mass — and not only them, but also his own good angel and other holy saints such as his devotion specially stand unto; or if he be learned, use then the Litany<sup>755</sup> with the holy suffrages<sup>756</sup> that follow, which is a prayer in the Church of marvelous old antiquity, not made first, as some ween it were, by that holy man Saint Gregory (which opinion rose of that, that in<sup>757</sup> the time of a great pestilence in Rome, he caused the whole city go in solemn procession therewith), but it was in use in the Church many years before Saint Gregory's days, as well appeareth by the books of other holy doctors and saints that were dead hundreds of years before Saint Gregory was born. And holy Saint Bernard giveth counsel that every man should make suit unto<sup>758</sup> angels and saints to pray for him to God in the things that he would have sped at<sup>759</sup> his holy hand. If any man will stick at<sup>760</sup> that and say it need not, because God can hear us himself, and will also say that it is perilous so to do because, they say, we be not so counseled by no Scripture — I will not dispute the matter here; he that will not<sup>761</sup> do it, I let<sup>762</sup> him not to leave it undone. But yet for mine own part, I will as well trust to the counsel of Saint Bernard, and reckon him for as good and as well-learned in the Scripture as any man that I hear say the contrary. And better dare I jeopard<sup>763</sup> my soul with the soul of Saint Bernard than with his that findeth that fault in his doctrine.

Unto God himself every good man counseleth to have recourse above all, and in this temptation to have special remembrance of Christ's Passion, and pray him, for the honor of his death, the ground of man's salvation, keep this person thus tempted from that damnable death. Special verses may there be drawn out of the Psalter against the devil's wicked temptations, as for example, Exsurgat Deus et dissipentur inimici eius, et fugiant qui oderunt eum a facie eius,<sup>764</sup> and many others which are, in such horrible temptation, to God pleasant and to the devil very terrible. But none more terrible nor more odious to the devil than the words with which our Savior drove him away himself — Vade, Satana<sup>765</sup> — nor no prayer more acceptable unto God, nor more effectual for the matter, than those words which our Savior hath taught us himself: Ne nos inducas in tentationem, sed libera nos a malo.<sup>766</sup>

And I doubt not, by God's grace, but he that in such a temptation will use good counsel and prayer, and keep himself in good virtuous business and good virtuous company, and abide in the faithful hope of God's help, shall have the truth of God (as the prophet saith in the verse afore-rehearsed)<sup>767</sup> so compass him about with a pavise<sup>768</sup> that he shall not need to dread this night's fear of this wicked temptation. And thus will I finish this piece of the night's fear. And glad am I that we be past it and comen once unto the day, to those other words of the prophet, a sagitta volante in die,<sup>769</sup> for methinketh I have made it a long night.

VINCENT: Forsooth, Uncle, so have you; but we have not slept in it, but been very well occupied. But now I fear that except<sup>770</sup> you make here a pause till you have dined, you shall keep yourself from your dinner overlong.

ANTONY: Nay, nay, Cousin, for both broke I my fast even as you came in and also you shall find this night and this day like a winter day and a winter night: for as the winter hath short days and long nights, so shall you find that I made you not this fearful night so long, but I shall make you this light courageous day as short. And so shall the matter require well<sup>771</sup> of itself indeed; for in those words of the prophet, Scuto circumdabit te veritas eius a sagitta volante in die (“The truth of God shall compass thee round about with a pavis from the arrow flying in the day”), I understand the arrow of pride, with which the devil tempteth a man not in the night (that is to wit, in tribulation and adversity), for that time is too discomfortable and too fearful for pride, but in the day (that is to wit, in prosperity), for that time is full of lightsome lust<sup>772</sup> and courage. But surely this worldly prosperity wherein a man so rejoiceth, and whereof the devil maketh him so proud, is but even a very short winter day.

For we begin, many, full poor and cold; and up we fly like an arrow that were shot up into the air; and yet, when we be suddenly shotten up into the highest, ere we be well warm there, down we come unto the cold ground again, and then even there stick we still. And yet for the short while that we be upward and aloft, Lord, how lusty<sup>773</sup> and how proud we be, buzzing above busily like as a bumblebee flieth about in summer, never aware that she shall die in winter. And so fare many of us (God help us), for in the short winter day of worldly wealth and prosperity, this flying arrow of the devil — this high spirit of pride, shot out of the devil’s bow and piercing through our heart — beareth us up in our affection aloft into the clouds, where we ween we sit on the rainbow and overlook the world under us, accounting, in the regard of<sup>774</sup> our own glory, such other poor souls as were peradventure wont<sup>775</sup> to be our fellows for seely<sup>776</sup> poor pismires<sup>777</sup> and ants.

But this arrow of pride, fly it never so high in the clouds, and be the man that it carrieth up so high never so joyful thereof, yet let him remember that be this arrow never so light, it hath yet a heavy iron head, and therefore fly it never so high, down must it needs come, and on the ground must it light,<sup>778</sup> and falleth sometimes not in a very cleanly place, but the pride turneth into rebuke and shame, and there is then all the glory gone.

Of this arrow speaketh the Wise Man in the fifth chapter of Sapience,<sup>779</sup> where he saith in the person of them that in pride and vanity passed the time of this present life, and after that so spent, passed hence<sup>780</sup> into hell, Quid profuit nobis superbia aut divitiarum iactantia, quid contulit nobis? Transierunt omnia illa tamquam umbra etc aut tamquam sagittae emissae in locum destinatum, divisus aer continuo in se reclusus est, ut ignoretur transitus illius. Sic et nos nati continuo desivimus esse, et virtutis quidem nullum signum valuimus ostendere; in malignitate autem nostra consumpti sumus. Talia dixerunt in inferno ii qui peccaverunt (“What hath pride profited us, or what good hath the glory of our riches done unto us? Passed are all those things like a shadow, or like an arrow shot out into the place appointed.”)<sup>781</sup>

The air that was divided is by and by<sup>782</sup> returned into the place, and in such wise closed together again that the way is not perceived in which the arrow went. And in like wise we, as soon as we were born, be by and by vanished away, and have left no token of any good virtue behind us, but are consumed and wasted and come to nought in our malignity.’

“They, lo, that have lived here in sin, such words have they spoken when they lay in hell.”<sup>783</sup>

Here shall you, good Cousin, consider that whereas the Scripture here speaketh of the arrow shot into his place appointed or intended, in shooting of this arrow of pride there be diverse purposings and appointments; for the proud man himself hath no certain purpose or appointment at any mark, butt, or prick<sup>784</sup> upon earth whereat he determineth to shoot and there to stick and tarry, but ever he shooteth as children do that love to shoot up a-cop-high,<sup>785</sup> to see how high their arrow can fly up.

But now doth the devil intend and appoint a certain prick surely<sup>786</sup> set in a place into which he purposeth — fly this arrow never so high, and the proud heart thereon — to have them light<sup>787</sup> both at last. And that place is in the very pit of hell. There is set the devil’s well-acquainted prick and his very just mark down, upon which prick, with his pricking shaft of pride, he hath by himself a plain proof and experience that — but if<sup>788</sup> it be stopped by some grace of God by the way — the soul that flieth up therewith can never fail to fall. For when himself was in heaven and began to fly up a-cop-high with

Now may it peradventure, Cousin, seem that since this kind of temptation of pride is no tribulation or pain, all this that we speak of this arrow of pride flying forth in the “day” of prosperity were beside our matter.

VINCENT: Verily, mine Uncle, and so seemed it unto me, and somewhat was I minded so to say to you too, saving<sup>791</sup> that were it properly pertaining to the present matter or somewhat digressing therefrom, good matter methought it was, and such as I had no lust to let.<sup>792</sup>

ANTONY: But now must you, Cousin, consider that though prosperity be contrary to tribulation, yet unto many a good man the devil’s temptation unto pride in prosperity is a greater tribulation, and more need hath of good comfort and good counsel both than he that never felt it would ween.<sup>793</sup> And that is the thing, Cousin, that maketh me speak thereof as of a thing proper to this matter. For, Cousin, as it is a thing right hard to touch pitch and never file<sup>794</sup> the fingers, to put flax unto fire and yet keep them from burning, to keep a serpent in thy bosom and yet be safe from stinging, to put young men with young women without danger of foul fleshly desire, so is it hard for any person—either man or woman—in great worldly wealth and much prosperity, so to withstand the suggestions of the devil and occasions given by the world, that they keep themselves from the deadly desire of ambitious glory, whereupon there followeth (if a man fall thereto) a whole flood of all unhappy mischief: arrogant manner, high sullen solemn port,<sup>795</sup> overlooking the poor, in word and countenance displeasent, and disdainous behavior, ravin,<sup>796</sup> extortion, oppression, hatred, and cruelty.

Now many a good man, Cousin, comen<sup>797</sup> into great authority, casting<sup>798</sup> in his mind the peril of such occasions of pride as the devil taketh of prosperity to make his instruments of, wherewith to move men to such high point of presumption as engendereth so many great inconveniences<sup>799</sup>—and feeling the devil therewith offering to themselves suggestions thereunto—they be sore troubled therewith, and some fall so feared thereof that even in the day of prosperity they fall into the night’s fear of pusillanimity, and doubting<sup>800</sup> overmuch lest they should misuse themselves, leave the things undone wherein they might use themselves well, and mistrusting the aid and help of God in holding them upright in their temptations, give place to the devil in the contrary temptation, whereby for faint heart they leave off good business wherein they were well occupied, and under pretext (as it seemeth to themselves) of humble heart and meekness, and serving God in contemplation and silence, they seek their own ease and earthly rest unaware, wherewith (if it so be) God is not well content.

Howbeit, if it so be that a man feel himself such indeed as, by the experience that he hath of himself, he perceiveth that in wealth and authority he doth his own soul harm, and cannot do therein the good that to his part appertaineth, but seeth the things that he should set his hand to sustain decay through his default<sup>801</sup> and fall to ruin under him, and that to the amendment thereof he leaveth his own duty undone, then would I in any wise advise him to leave off that thing—be it spiritual benefice that he have (parsonage or bishopric) or temporal room<sup>802</sup> and authority—and rather give it over quite<sup>803</sup> and draw himself aside, and serve God, than take the worldly worship and commodity<sup>804</sup> for himself, with incommodity of them whom his duty were to profit. But on the other side, if he see not the contrary but that he may do his duty conveniently<sup>805</sup> well, and feareth nothing but that the temptations of ambition and pride may peradventure turn his good purpose and make him decline unto sin, I say not nay but that well done it is to stand in moderate fear always, whereof the Scripture saith, Beatus homo qui semper est pavidus (“Blessed is the man that is always fearful”),<sup>806</sup> and Saint Paul saith, Qui stat videat ne cadat (“He that standeth, let him look that he fall not”);<sup>807</sup> yet is overmuch fear perilous, and draweth toward the mistrust of God’s gracious help, which immoderate fear and faint heart Holy Scripture forbiddeth, saying, Noli esse pusillanimis (“Be not feeble-hearted or timorous”).<sup>808</sup> Let such a man therefore temper his fear with good hope, and think that since God hath set him in that place (if he think that God have set him therein), God will assist him with his grace to the well using thereof. Howbeit, if he came thereto by simony<sup>809</sup> or some such other evil means, then were that thing one good reason wherefore he should the rather leave it off. But else<sup>810</sup> let him continue in his good business, and against the devil’s provocation unto evil bless himself and call unto God and pray, and look what<sup>811</sup> thing the devil tempteth him to, lean the more to the contrary. Let him be piteous and comfortable to those that are in distress and affliction. I mean not to let every malefactor<sup>812</sup> pass forth unpunished and freely run out and rob at rovers,<sup>813</sup> but in his heart be sorry to see that, of necessity for fear of decaying the common weal, men are driven to put malefactors to pain. And yet where he findeth good tokens and likelihood of amendment, there, in all that he may, help that mercy may be had. There shall never lack desperately disposed wretches enough besides, upon whom, for example, justice may proceed. Let him think in his own heart every poor beggar his fellow.<sup>814</sup>

VINCENT: That will be very hard, Uncle, for an honorable man to do, when he beholdeth himself richly appareled and the beggar rigged in his rags.

ANTONY: If here were, Cousin, two men that were beggars both, and afterward a great rich man would take the one unto him and tell him that for a little time he would have him in his house, and thereupon arrayed him in silk and give him a great bag by his side filled even full of gold, but giving him this knot<sup>815</sup> therewith: that within a little while, out he should in his old rags again, and bear never a penny with him — if this beggar met his fellow now while his gay gown were on, might he not, for all his gay gear,<sup>816</sup> take him for his fellow still? And were he not a very fool if, for a wealth of a few weeks, he would ween himself far his better?

VINCENT: Yes, Uncle, if the difference of their state were none other.

ANTONY: Surely, Cousin, methinketh that in this world, between the richest and the most poor, the difference is scant<sup>817</sup> so much. For let the highest look on the most base, and consider how poor they came both into this world, and then consider further therewith, how rich soever he be now, he shall yet within a while, peradventure less than one week, walk out again as poor as that beggar shall. And then, by my troth,<sup>818</sup> methinketh this rich man much more than mad, if for the wealth of a little while, haply<sup>819</sup> less than one week, he reckon himself in earnest any better than the beggar’s fellow. And less than thus can no man think that hath any natural wit and well useth it.

But now, a Christian man, Cousin, that hath the light of faith, he cannot fail to think on this thing much further. For he will not think only upon his bare coming hither and his bare going hence again, but also upon the dreadful judgment of God, and upon the fearful pains of hell, and the inestimable joys of heaven. And in the considering of these things, he will call to remembrance that peradventure when this beggar and he be both departed hence, the beggar may be suddenly set up in such royalty that well were himself that ever was he born if he might be made his fellow. And he that well bethinketh him, Cousin, upon these things, I verily think that the arrow of pride, flying forth in the “day” of worldly wealth, shall never so wound his heart that ever it shall bear him up one foot.

But now to the intent he may think on such things the better, let him use often<sup>820</sup> to resort to confession, and there open his heart, and by the mouth of some virtuous ghostly<sup>821</sup> father, have such things oft renewed in his remembrance.

Let him also choose himself some secret solitary place in his own house, as far from noise and company as he conveniently can. And thither let him sometimes secretly resort alone, imagining himself as one going out of the world, even straight unto the giving up his reckoning unto God of his sinful living. Then let him there before an altar or some pitiful image of Christ's bitter Passion—the beholding whereof may put him in remembrance of the thing and move him to devout compassion—kneel down or fall prostrate as at the feet of almighty God, verily believing him to be there invisibly present, as without any doubt he is. There let him open his heart to God and confess his faults, such as he can call to mind, and pray God of forgiveness. Let him call to remembrance the benefits that God hath given him, either in general among other men, or privately to himself, and give him humble hearty thanks therefor. There let him declare unto God the temptations of the devil, the suggestions of the flesh, the occasions of the world, and of his worldly friends—much worse many times in drawing a man from God than are his most mortal enemies, which thing our Savior witnesseth himself where he saith, Inimici hominis domestici eius (“The enemies of a man are they that are his own familiars”).<sup>822</sup>

There let him lament and bewail unto God his own frailty, negligence, and sloth in resisting and withstanding of temptation, his readiness and privity<sup>823</sup> to fall thereunto.

There let him lamentably beseech God of<sup>824</sup> his gracious aid and help to strengthen his infirmity withal,<sup>825</sup> both in keeping himself from falling, and, when he by his own fault misfortuneth to fall, then with the helping hand of his merciful grace to lift him up and set him on his feet in the state of his grace again.

And let this man not doubt but that God heareth him and granteth him gladly his boon.<sup>826</sup> And so dwelling in the faithful trust of God's help, he shall well use his prosperity and persevere in his good profitable business, and shall have therein the truth of God so compass him about with a pavise<sup>827</sup> of his heavenly defense that of the devil's arrow flying in the day of worldly wealth, he shall not need to dread.

VINCENT: Forsooth, Uncle, I like this good counsel well, and I would ween that such as are in prosperity and take such order therein may do, both to themselves and other folk about, much good.

ANTONY: I beseech our Lord, Cousin, put this and better in the mind of every man that needeth it. And now will I touch one word or twain of the third temptation, whereof the prophet speaketh in these words: a negotio perambulante in tenebris (“from the business walking in the darkness”). And then will we call for our dinner, leaving the last temptation—that is to wit, ab incursu et daemónio meridiano (“from the incursion and the devil of the midday”)<sup>828</sup>—till afternoon. And then shall we therewith, God willing, make an end of all this matter.

VINCENT: Our Lord reward you, good Uncle, for your good labor with me. But for our Lord's sake, take good heed, Uncle, that you forbear not your dinner overlong.

ANTONY: Fear not that, Cousin, I warrant you, for this piece will I make you but short.

THE SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER
Of the devil named negotium perambulans in tenebris—that is to wit, “business walking in the darkness”

ANTONY: The prophet saith in the said psalm, Qui habitat in adiutorio Altissimi, in protectione Dei caeli commorabitur, scuto circumdabit te veritas eius; non timebis a timore, etc. A negotio perambulante in tenebris (“He that dwelleth in the faithful hope of God's help, he shall abide in the protection and safeguard of the God of heaven. And thou that art such one shall the truth of him so compass about with a pavise that thou shalt not be afeard of the business walking about in the darknesses”).<sup>829</sup>

Negotium is here, Cousin, the name of a devil that is ever full of busyness in tempting folk to much evil business; his time of tempting is in the darknesses. For you wot well that besides the very full night, which is the deep dark, there are two times of darknesses: the one ere the morning wax light, the other when the evening waxeth dark.

822 Mt 10:36 823 inclination, proneness of God's aid and help 826 favor 824 for 825 with them (i.e., by means 827 large shield 828 Ps 90(91):6

829 Ps 90(91):1, 4–6

Two times of like manner<sup>830</sup> darkness are there also in the soul of man: the one ere the light of grace be well in the heart sprung up, the other when the light of grace out of the soul beginneth to walk fast away.

In these two darknesses the devil that is called Business busily walketh about, and such folk as will follow him, he carrieth about with him, and setteth them awork with many manner bumbling business.

He setteth, I say, some to seek the pleasures of the flesh: in eating, drinking, and other filthy<sup>831</sup> delight. And some he setteth about incessant seeking for these worldly goods.

And of such busy folk whom this devil called Business “walking about in the darkness” setteth awork with such business, our Savior saith in the Gospel, Qui ambulat in tenebris nescit quo vadit (“He that walketh in darknesses wotteth not whither he goeth”).<sup>832</sup> And surely in such case are they: they neither wot which way they go nor whither. For verily they walk round about, as it were, in a round maze; when they ween themselves at an end of their business, they be but at the beginning again. For is not the going about the serving of the flesh a business that hath none end, but evermore from the end cometh to the beginning again? Go they never so full-fed to bed, yet evermore on the morrow as new be they<sup>833</sup> to be fed again as they were the day before.

Thus fareth it by the belly; thus fareth it by those parts that are beneath the belly. And as for covetise,<sup>834</sup> fareth like the fire: the more wood that cometh thereto, the more fervent and the more greedy it is.

But now hath this maze a center or a middle place, into which sometimes they be conveyed suddenly when they ween they were not yet far from the brink.

The center or middle place of this maze is hell. And into that place be these busy folk that with this devil of Business walk about in this busy maze in the darknesses suddenly sometimes conveyed, nothing ware<sup>835</sup> whither they be going, and even while they ween that they were not far walked from the beginning, and that they had yet a great way to walk about before they should come to the end.

But of these fleshly folk walking in this busy pleasant maze, the Scripture declareth the end: Ducunt in bonis dies suos, et in puncto ad inferna descendunt (“They lead their life in pleasure, and at a pop,<sup>836</sup> down they descend into hell”).<sup>837</sup>

Of the covetous men saith Saint Paul, Qui volunt divites fieri, incidunt in tentationem et in laqueum diaboli, et desideria multa inutilia et nociva, quae mergunt homines in interitum et perditionem (“They that long to be rich do fall into temptation, and into the grin<sup>838</sup> of the devil, and into many desires unprofitable, and harmful, which drown men into death and into destruction”).<sup>839</sup>

Lo, here is the middle place of this busy maze: the grin of the devil, the place of perdition and destruction that they fall and be caught and drowned in ere they be aware.

The covetous rich man also that our Savior speaketh of in the Gospel, that had so great plenty of corn that his barns would not receive it, but intended to make his barns larger, and said unto himself that he would make merry many days, had weened, you wot well, that he had had a great way yet to walk; but God said unto him, Stulte, hac nocte tollent a te animam tuam; quae autem parasti, cuius erunt? (“Fool, this night shall they take thy soul from thee; and then all this good that thou hast gathered, whose shall it be?”)<sup>840</sup> Here you see that he fell suddenly into the deep center of this busy maze, so that he was fallen full therein long ere ever he had went he should have come near thereto.

Now this wot I very well, that those that are walking about in this busy maze take not their business for any tribulation. And yet are there many of them forwearied as sore,<sup>841</sup> and as sore panged and pained therein—their pleasures being so short, so little and so few, and their displeasures and their griefs so great, so continual and so many—that maketh me think upon a good worshipful<sup>842</sup> man which, when he diverse times beheld his wife,<sup>843</sup> what pain she took in strait<sup>844</sup> binding up her hair to make her a fair large forehead, and with strait bracing in her body to make her middle small (both twain<sup>845</sup> to her great pain, for the pride of a little foolish praise) he said unto her, “Forsooth, madam, if God give you not hell, he shall do you great wrong. For it

830 like manner: the same kind of

831 disgraceful, base 832 Jn 12:35

833 as new be they: they are as ready anew

834 lust, especially for wealth 835 aware, wary 836 at a pop: in an instant, suddenly 837 Job 21:13 838 snare, trap

839 1 Tim 6:9 840 See Lk 12:16–20.

841 forwearied as sore: worn out as grievously 842 honorable 843 Harpsfield says this is Lady Alice, More's wife (94). 844 tightly 845 together must needs be your own of very right, for you buy it very dear,<sup>846</sup> and take great pain therefor.”

They that now lie in hell for their wretched living here do now perceive their folly in the more pain that they took here for the less pleasure. There confess they now their folly and cry out, Lassati sumus in via iniquitatis (“We have been wearied in the way of wickedness”).<sup>847</sup> And yet while they were walking therein, they would not rest themselves but run on still in their weariness, and put themselves still unto more pain and more, for that little peevish<sup>848</sup> pleasure, short and soon gone, that they took all that labor and pain for, besides the everlasting pain that followed it for their further advantage after.

So help me God, and none otherwise but as I verily think that many a man buyeth hell here with so much pain that he might have bought heaven with less than the one half.

But yet, as I say, while these fleshly and worldly busy folk are walking about in this round busy maze of this devil that is called Business, that<sup>849</sup> walketh about in these two times of darkness, their wits are so by the secret enchantment of the devil bewitched that they mark not the great long miserable weariness and pain that the devil maketh them take and endure about nought;<sup>850</sup> and therefore they take it for no tribulation, so that they need no comfort; and therefore it is not for their sakes that I speak all this, saving<sup>851</sup> that it may serve them for counsel toward the perceiving of their own foolish misery through the good help of God’s grace beginning to shine upon them again. But there are very good folk and virtuous that are in the daylight of grace, and yet because the devil tempteth them busily to such fleshly delight, and since they see plenty of worldly substance fall unto them, and feel the devil in like wise busily tempt them to set their heart thereupon, they be sore troubled therewith and begin to fear thereby that they be not with God in the light, but with this devil that the prophet calleth Negotium (that is to say, Business) walking about in these two times of darkneses.

Howbeit, as I said before of those good folk and gracious that are in the worldly wealth of great power and authority, and thereby fear the devil’s arrow of pride, so say I now here again of these that stand in dread of fleshly foul sin and covetise:<sup>852</sup> since they be but tempted therewith and follow it not, albeit that they do well to stand ever in moderate fear, lest with waxing overbold and setting the thing overlight,<sup>853</sup> they might peradventure mishap<sup>854</sup> to fall in thereto, yet sore<sup>855</sup> to vex and trouble themselves with the fear of loss of God’s favor therefor is without necessity and not always without peril. For as I said before, it withdraweth the mind of a man far from spiritual consolation of the good hope that he should have in God’s help. And as for those temptations, while he that is tempted followeth them not, the fight against them serveth a man for matter of merit and reward in heaven, if he not only flee the deed, the consent, and the delectation,<sup>856</sup> but also (in that he conveniently<sup>857</sup> may) flee from all occasions thereof. And this point is, in those fleshly temptations, easy to perceive and meetly<sup>858</sup> plain enough. But in these worldly businesses pertaining unto covetise, therein is the thing somewhat more dark, and in the perceiving more difficulty. And very great troublous fear doth there oftentimes arise thereof in the hearts of very good folk, when the world falleth fast unto them, because of the sore<sup>859</sup> words and terrible threats that God in Holy Scripture speaketh against those that are rich, as where Saint Paul saith, Qui volunt divites fieri incidunt in tentationem, et in laqueum diaboli (“They that will be rich fall into temptation, and into the grin<sup>860</sup> of the devil”),<sup>861</sup> and where our Savior saith himself, Facilius est camelum per foramen acus transire quam divitem intrare in regnum Dei (“It is more easy for a camel” — or as some say, for camelus so signifieth in the Greek tongue, “for a great cable-rope” — “to go through a needle’s eye than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God”).<sup>862</sup>

No marvel now though<sup>863</sup> good folk that fear God take occasion of great dread at so dreadful words when they see the worldly goods fall to them. And some stand in doubt whether it be lawful for them to keep any goods or no. But evermore in all those places of Scripture, the having of the worldly goods is not the thing that is rebuked and threatened, but the affection that the haver unlawfully bearth thereto. For where Saint Paul saith, Qui volunt divites fieri, etc. (“They that will be made rich”), he speaketh not of the having, but of the will and the desire and affection to have and the longing for it. For that cannot be lightly<sup>864</sup> without sin. For the thing that folk sore long for, they will make many shifts<sup>865</sup> to get and jeopard themselves therefor. And to declare<sup>866</sup> that the having of riches is not forbidden, but the inordinate affection of the mind sore set thereupon, the prophet saith, Divitiae si affluent nolite cor apponere (“If riches flow unto you, set not your heart thereupon”).<sup>867</sup> And albeit that our Lord, by the said example of the camel or cable-rope to come through the needle’s eye, said that it is not only hard but also impossible for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven, yet he declared that though the rich man cannot get into heaven of himself, yet God, he said, can get him in well enough. For unto men, he said, it was impossible, but not unto God: “for unto God,” he said, “all things are possible”;<sup>868</sup> yet over that, he told of which manner rich men he meant that could not get into the Kingdom of Heaven, saying, Filioli, quam difficile est confidentes in pecuniis regnum Dei introire (“My babes, how hard is it for them that put their trust and confidence in their money to enter into the Kingdom of God”).<sup>869</sup>

VINCENT: This I suppose very true, and else God forbid; for else were the world in a very hard case, if every rich man were in such danger and peril.

ANTONY: That were it, Cousin, indeed; and so, I ween, is it yet. For I fear me that to the multitude there be very few but that they long sore to be rich; and of those that so long to be, very few reserved<sup>870</sup> also but that they set their heart very sore thereon.

VINCENT: This is, Uncle, I fear me, very true, but yet not the thing that I was about to speak of. But the thing that I would have said was this: that I cannot well perceive (the world being such as it is, and so many poor people therein) how any man may be rich, and keep him rich, without danger of damnation therefor; for all the while that he seeth poor people so many that lack, while himself hath to give them, and whose necessity (while he hath therewith)<sup>871</sup> he is bound in such case of duty to relieve — so far-forth<sup>872</sup> that holy Saint Ambrose saith that whoso that die for default<sup>873</sup> where we might help them, we kill them<sup>874</sup> — I cannot see but that every rich man hath great cause to stand in great fear of damnation; nor I cannot perceive, as I say, how he can be delivered of that fear as long as he keepeth his riches. And therefore, though he might keep his riches if there lacked poor men, and yet stand in God’s favor therewith — as Abraham did, and many another holy rich man since — yet in such abundance of poor men as there be now in every country, any man that keepeth any riches, it must needs be that he hath an inordinate affection thereunto, while he giveth it not out unto the poor needy persons, that the duty of charity bindeth and straineth<sup>875</sup> him to. And thus, Uncle, in this world, at this day, meseemeth<sup>876</sup> your comfort unto good men that are rich and troubled with fear of damnation for the keeping can very scantily<sup>877</sup> serve.

ANTONY: Hard is it, Cousin, in many manner things, to bid or forbid, affirm or deny, reprove or allow, a matter nakedly proponed<sup>878</sup> and put forth, or precisely to say “this thing is good,” or “this thing is naught,”<sup>879</sup> without consideration of the circumstances.

Holy Saint Augustine telleth of a physician that gave a man a medicine in a certain disease that helped him. The selfsame man at another time in the selfsame disease took the selfsame medicine himself, and had thereof more harm than good; which thing when he showed unto the physician, and asked him whereof that harm should hap, “That medicine,” quoth he, “did thee no good, but harm, because thou tookest it when I gave it thee not.” This answer Saint Augustine very well alloweth. For that though<sup>880</sup> the medicine were one, yet might there be peradventure in the sickness some such difference as the patient perceived not — yea, or in the man himself, or in the place, or the time of the year — many things might make the let<sup>881</sup> for which the physician would not then have given him the selfsame medicine that he gave him before.<sup>882</sup> To peruse every circumstance that might, Cousin, in this matter be touched and were to be considered and weighed would indeed make this part of this devil of Business a very busy piece of work and a long. But I shall a little open<sup>883</sup> the point that you speak of, and shall show you what I think therein, with as few words as I conveniently<sup>884</sup> can — and then will we go to dinner.

First, Cousin, he that is a rich man and keepeth all his goods, he hath, I think, very good cause to be very feared<sup>885</sup> indeed. And yet I fear me that such folk fear least. For they be very far from the state of good men, since if they keep still all, then are they very far from charity, and do,<sup>886</sup> you wot well, alms either little or none at all. But now is our question, Cousin, not in what case the rich man standeth that keepeth all, but whether we should suffer men to stand in a perilous dread and fear for the keeping of any great part; for if that<sup>887</sup> by the keeping still of so much as maketh a rich man still, they stand in the state of damnation, then are the curates<sup>888</sup> bounden plainly to tell them so, according to the commandment of God given unto them all in the person of Ezekiel: Si dicente me ad impium morte morieris non annuntiaveris ei, etc. (“If when I say to the wicked man, ‘Thou shalt die,’ thou do not show it unto him, nor speak unto him, that he may be turned from his wicked way and may live, he shall soothly<sup>889</sup> die in his wickedness, and his blood shall I verily require of thine hand”).<sup>890</sup>

But, Cousin, though God invited men unto the following of himself in willful poverty, by the leaving of altogether at once for his sake, as the thing whereby, with being out of the solicitude of worldly business and far from the desire of earthly commodities, they may the more speedily get and attain the state of spiritual perfection and the hungry desire and longing for celestial things, yet doth he not command every man so to do upon the peril of damnation. For where he saith, Qui non renuntiaverit omnibus quae possidet non potest meus esse discipulus (“He that forsake not all that ever he hath cannot be my disciple”),<sup>891</sup> he declareth well, by other words of his own in the selfsame place a little before, what he meaneth: for there saith he more, Si quis venit ad me, et non odit patrem suum et matrem, et uxorem et filios et fratres et sorores, adhuc autem et animam suam, non potest meus esse discipulus (“He that cometh to me, and hateth not his father and his mother, and his wife and his children, and his brethren and his sisters — yea, and his own life too — cannot be my disciple”).<sup>892</sup>

Here meaneth our Savior Christ that none can be his disciple but if he love him so far above all his kin, and above his own life too, that for the love of him, rather than to forsake him, he shall forsake them all. And so meaneth he by those other words that whosoever do not so renounce and forsake all that ever he hath in his own heart and affection that he will rather lose it all, and let it go every whit, than deadly displease God with the reserving of any one part thereof, he cannot be Christ’s disciple, since Christ teacheth us to love God above all things, and he loveth not God above all things that contrary to God’s pleasure keepeth any thing that he hath, for that thing he showeth himself to set more by than by God while<sup>893</sup> he is better content to lose God than it. But as I said, to give away all, or that no man should be rich or have substance,<sup>894</sup> that find I no commandment of. There are, as our Savior saith, in the house of his Father many mansions.<sup>895</sup> And happy shall he be that shall have the grace to dwell even in the lowest.

It seemeth verily by the Gospel that those which for God’s sake patiently suffer penury shall not only dwell above those in heaven that live here in plenty in earth, but also that heaven in some manner of wise<sup>896</sup> more properly belongeth unto them, and is more specially prepared for them than it is for the rich, by that that<sup>897</sup> God in the Gospel counseleth the rich folk to buy, in a manner,<sup>898</sup> heaven of them, where he saith unto the rich men, Facite vobis amicos de mammona iniquitatis, ut cum defeceritis recipiant vos in aeterna tabernacula (“Make you friends of the wicked riches, that when you fail here, they may receive you into the everlasting tabernacles”).<sup>899</sup>

But now, although this be thus in respect of the riches and the poverty compared together, yet, they being good men both, there may be some other virtue besides wherein the rich man may so peradventure excel that he may in heaven be far above that poor man that was here in earth in other virtues far under him, as the proof appeareth clear in Lazarus and Abraham.<sup>900</sup>

Nor I say not this to the intent to comfort rich men in heaping up of riches. For a little comfort is bent<sup>901</sup> enough thereto for them that be not so proud-hearted and obstinate but that they would, I ween, to that counsel be with right little exhortation very conformable;<sup>902</sup> but I say this for that<sup>903</sup> those good men — to whom God giveth substance<sup>904</sup> and the mind to dispose it well, and yet not the mind to give it all away at once, but for good causes to keep some substance still — should not despair of God’s favor for the not doing of the thing which God hath given them no commandment of, nor drawn by any special calling thereunto.

Zacchaeus, lo, that climbed up into the tree for desire that he had to behold our Savior, at such time as Christ called aloud unto him and said, “Zacchaeus, make haste and come down, for this day must I dwell in thine house,”<sup>905</sup> was so glad thereof, and so touched inwardly with special grace to the profit of his soul, that whereas all the people murmured much that Christ would call him and be so familiar with him as of his own offer to come unto his house — considering that they knew him for the chief of the publicans, that were customers or toll-gatherers<sup>906</sup> of the emperor’s duties (all which whole company were among the people sore infamed of ravin,<sup>907</sup> extortion, and bribery), and then Zacchaeus not only the chief of that fellowship, but also grown greatly rich, whereby the people accounted him in their own opinion for a man very sinful and naught — he forthwith,<sup>908</sup> by the instinct<sup>909</sup> of the Spirit of God, in reproach of all such temerarious,<sup>910</sup> bold, and blind judgment given upon a man whose inward mind and sudden change they cannot see, shortly proved them all deceived, and that our Lord had, at those few words outwardly spoken to him, so wrought in his heart within that whatsoever he was before, he was then, unware<sup>911</sup> unto them all, suddenly waxen good. For he made haste and came down, and gladly received Christ and said, “Lo, Lord, the one half of my goods here I give unto the poor people. And yet over that, if I have in anything deceived any man, here am I ready to recompense him fourfold as much.”<sup>912</sup>

VINCENT: This was, Uncle, a gracious hearing. But I marvel me somewhat wherefore Zacchaeus used his words in that manner of order. For methinketh he should first have spoken of making restitution unto those whom he had beguiled, and speak of giving of his alms after. For restitution is, you wot well, duty, and a thing of such necessity that in respect of<sup>913</sup> restitution, alms-deed is but voluntary. Therefore it might seem that to put men in mind of their duty in making restitution first and doing their alms after, Zacchaeus should have said more conveniently<sup>914</sup> if he had said first that he would make every man restitution whom he had wronged, and then give half in alms of that that<sup>915</sup> remained after, for only that might he call clearly his own.

ANTONY: This is true, Cousin, where a man hath not enough to suffice both. But he that hath is not bounden to leave his alms ungiven to the poor man that is at his hand, and peradventure calleth upon him, till he go seek up all his creditors and all those that he hath wronged — so far peradventure asunder<sup>916</sup> that, leaving the one good deed undone the while, he may, before they come together, change that good mind again and do neither the one nor the other. It is good always to be doing some good out of hand<sup>917</sup> while we think thereon; grace shall the better stand with us and increase also to go the farther in the other after. And this I answer if the man had there done the one out of hand — the giving, I mean, half in alms — and not so much as speak of restitution till after; whereas now, though he spoke the one in order before the other, and yet all at one time, the thing remained still in his liberty to put them both in execution after such order as he should then think expedient. But now, Cousin, did the Spirit of God temper the tongue of Zacchaeus in the utterance of these words, in such wise as it may well appear the saying of the Wise Man to be verified in them where he saith, Domini est gubernare linguam (“To God it belongeth to govern the tongue”).<sup>918</sup> For here — when he said he would give half of his whole goods unto poor people, and yet besides that not only recompense any man whom he had wronged, but more than recompense him by three times as much again — he doubly reproved<sup>919</sup> the false suspicion of the people that accounted him for so evil that they reckoned in their mind all his goods gotten in effect with wrong because he was grown to substance<sup>920</sup> in that office that was commonly misused extortiously.<sup>921</sup> But his words declared that he was ripe<sup>922</sup> enough in his reckoning that if half his goods were given away, yet were he well able to yield every man his duty with the other half, and yet leave himself no beggar neither — for he said not he would give away all.

Would God, Cousin, that every rich Christian man that is reputed right worshipful<sup>923</sup> — yea, and (which yet in my mind more is) reckoned for right honest too — would and were able to do the thing that little Zacchaeus, that same great publican (were he Jew or were he paynim<sup>924</sup>), said: that is to wit, with less than half his goods recompense every man whom he had wronged four times as much; yea, yea, Cousin, as much for as much, hardly. And then they that shall receive it shall be content, I dare promise for them, to let the other thrice-as-much go and forgive it, because it was one of the hard points of the Old Law, whereas Christian men must be full of forgiving and not use<sup>925</sup> to require and exact their amends to the uttermost. But now, for our purpose here, notwithstanding that he promised not neither to give away all, nor to become a beggar neither, no, nor yet to leave off his office neither, which, albeit that he had not used before peradventure in every point so pure as Saint John the Baptist had taught them the lesson — Nihil amplius quam constitutum est vobis faciatis (“Do no more than is appointed unto you”)<sup>926</sup> — yet forasmuch as<sup>927</sup> he might both lawfully use his substance that he minded to reserve, and lawfully might use his office too, in receiving the prince’s duty according to Christ’s express commandment, Reddite quae sunt Caesaris Caesari (“Give the Emperor those things that be his”),<sup>928</sup>

refusing all extortion and bribery besides, our Lord, well allowing his good purpose, and exacting no further forth of him concerning his worldly behavior, answered and said, Hodie salus facta est huic domui, eo quod et ipse filius sit Abrahae (“This day is health comen to this house, for that<sup>929</sup> he too is the son of Abraham”).<sup>930</sup>

But now forget I not, Cousin, that in effect thus far you condescended unto<sup>931</sup> me, that a man may be rich and yet not out of the state of grace, nor out of God’s favor. Howbeit, you think that though it may be so in some time, or in some place, yet at this time and in this place or any such other like, wherein be so many poor people upon whom they be (you think) bounden to bestow their goods, they can keep no riches with conscience.<sup>932</sup>

Verily, Cousin, if that reason would hold, I ween the world was never such anywhere in which any man might have kept any substance without the danger of damnation, as for<sup>933</sup> since Christ’s days to the world’s end, we have the witness of his own word that there hath never lacked poor men, nor never shall; for he said himself, Pauperes semper habebitis vobiscum, quibus cum vultis benefacere potestis (“Poor men shall you always have with you, whom when you will you may do good unto”).<sup>934</sup> So that, as I tell you, if your rule should hold, then were there, I ween, no place in no time since Christ’s days hither — nor, as I think, in as long before that neither, nor never shall there hereafter — in which there would abide any man rich without the danger of eternal damnation even for his riches alone, though he demeaned<sup>935</sup> it never so well. But, Cousin, men of substance must there be, for else more beggars shall you have, pardie,<sup>936</sup> than there be, and no man left able to relieve another. For this I think in my mind a very sure conclusion: that if all the money that is in this country were tomorrow next brought together out of every man’s hand, and laid all upon one heap, and then divided out unto every man alike, it would be on the morrow after worse than it was the day before. For I suppose when it were all equally thus divided among all, the best should be left little better than almost a beggar is now. And yet he that was a beggar before, all that he shall be the richer for that<sup>937</sup> he should thereby receive shall not make him much above a beggar still; but many one<sup>938</sup> of the rich men, if their riches stood but in movable substance,<sup>939</sup> shall be safe enough from riches haply<sup>940</sup> for all their life after.

5 Men cannot, you wot well, live here in this world but if that<sup>941</sup> some one man provide a means of living for some other many. Every man cannot have a ship of his own, nor every man be a merchant without a stock. And these things, you wot well, must 10 needs be had; nor every man cannot have a plow by himself. And who might live by the tailor's craft, if no man were able to put a gown to make?<sup>942</sup> Who by the masonry, or who could live a<sup>943</sup> carpenter, if no man were able to build neither church nor 15 house? Who should be the makers of any manner cloth, if there lacked men of substance to set sundry sorts awork? Some man that hath but two ducats in his house were better forbear<sup>944</sup> them both and leave himself not a farthing, but utterly lose all
20 his own, than that some rich man by whom he is weekly set awork should of his money lose the one half, for then were himself like<sup>945</sup> to lack work. For surely the rich man's substance is the wellspring of the poor man's living. And therefore here would it
25 fare by the poor man as it fared by<sup>946</sup> the woman in one of Aesop's fables, which<sup>947</sup> had a hen that laid her every day a golden egg, till on a day she thought she would have a great many eggs at once; and therefore she killed her hen, and found but one or 30 twain in her belly, so that for a few, she lost many.

But now, Cousin, to come to your doubt how it may be that a man may with conscience keep riches with him when he seeth so many poor men upon whom he may bestow it; verily, that might he not 35 with conscience do, if he must bestow it upon as many as he may. And so must of truth every rich man do, if all the poor folk that he seeth be so specially by God's commandment committed unto his charge alone that, because our Savior saith omni pe-
40 tentii te da ("give every man that asketh thee"),<sup>948</sup> therefore he be bounden to give out still to every beggar that will ask him, as long as any penny lasteth in his purse. But verily, Cousin, that saying hath (as Saint Augustine saith other places in Scripture hath) need of interpretation;<sup>949</sup> for as Saint Augustine saith, [Omni petenti, inquit; non, omnia petenti] 45 ("Though Christ saith 'give every man that asketh thee,' he saith not, yet, 'give them all that they will ask thee'").<sup>950</sup> But surely all were one if he meant to bind me by commandment to give every man with- 50 out exception somewhat, for so should I leave myself nothing.

Our Savior in that place of the sixth chapter of Saint Luke speaketh both of the contempt that we should in heart have of these worldly things, and 55 also of the manner that men should use toward their enemies; for there he biddeth us love our enemies, give good words for evil, and not only suffer injuries patiently, both by taking away of our goods and harm done unto our body, but also be ready to 60 suffer the double, and over<sup>951</sup> that to do them good again<sup>952</sup> that do us the harm.<sup>953</sup> And among these things he biddeth us "give every man that asketh," meaning that in the thing that we may conveniently 65 do a man good, we should not refuse it, what manner of man soever he be, though he were our mortal enemy, namely<sup>954</sup> where we see that but if<sup>955</sup> we help him ourselves, the person of the man should stand in peril of perishing; and therefore saith, Si es- 70 urierit inimicus tuus, da illi cibum ("If thine enemy be in hunger, give him meat").<sup>956</sup> But now, though I be bound to give every manner man, in some manner, of his necessity — were he my friend or my foe, Christian man or heathen — yet am I not unto all 75 men bound alike, nor unto any man in every case alike; but, as I began to tell you, the differences of the circumstances make great change in the matter. Saint Paul saith, Qui non providet suis est infidelis de- 80 terior ("He that provideth not for those that are his is worse than an infidel").<sup>957</sup> Those are ours that are belonging to our charge, either by nature or by law, or any commandment of God (by nature, as<sup>958</sup> our children; by law, as our servants in our household), so that, albeit these two sorts be not ours all alike, 85 yet would I think that the least ours of the twain — that is to wit, our servants — if they need or lack, we be bounden to look to them and provide for their need, and see, so far-forth<sup>959</sup> as we may, that they

 5 in any wise turn them then out of doors, and cast them up comfortless while they be not able to labor and help themselves, for this were a thing against all humanity. And surely if he were but a wayfar-
 10 ing man that I received into my house as a guest, if he fall sick therein and his money gone, I reckon myself bounden to keep him still, and rather to beg about for his relief than cast him out in that case to the peril of his life, what loss soever I should hap
 15 to sustain in the keeping of him. For when God hath by such chance sent him to me, and there once matched me with him, I reckon myself surely charged with him, till I may without peril of his life be well and conveniently<sup>960</sup> discharged of him.

By God's commandment are in our charge our 20 parents, for by nature we be in theirs since, as Saint Paul saith, it is not the children's part to provide for the parents, but the parents' to provide for the children<sup>961</sup>—provide, I mean, conveniently<sup>962</sup> good 25 learning, or good occupations to get their living by with truth and the favor of God, but not to make provision for them of such manner living as to God-
 30 ward<sup>963</sup> they should live the worse for; but rather, if they see by their manner that too much would make them naught, the father should then give them a great deal the less. But although that<sup>964</sup> na-
 35 ture put not the parents in the charge of the children, yet not only God commandeth, but the order of nature also compelleth, that the children should both in reverent behavior honor their father and mother, and also in all their necessity maintain
 40 them. And yet as much as God and nature both bindeth us to the sustenance of our own father, his need may be so little (though it be somewhat), and a fremd<sup>965</sup> man's so great, that both nature and God 45 also would I should, in such unequal need, relieve that urgent necessity of a stranger—yea, my foe and God's enemy too, the very Turk or Saracen—before a little need, and unlikely to do great harm, in my father, and my mother too. For so ought they both twain themselves to be well content I should.

But now, Cousin, out<sup>966</sup> of the case of such extrene needs well perceived and known unto myself, I am not bound to give every beggar that will ask, nor to believe every faitour<sup>967</sup> that I meet in the 50 street that will say himself that he is very sick, nor to reckon all the poor folk committed by God only so to my charge alone that none other man should 55 give them nothing of his till I have first given out all mine, nor am not bounden neither to have so evil opinion of all other folk save myself as to think that but if<sup>968</sup> I help, the poor folk shall all fail at once, for 60 God hath left in all this quarter no more good folks now but me. I may think better by<sup>969</sup> my neighbors and worse by myself than so, and yet come to heaven by God's grace well enough.

VINCENT: Marry,<sup>970</sup> Uncle; but some man will peradventure be right well content in such case to think his neighbors very charitable, to the intent that he may think himself at liberty to give nothing at all.

ANTONY: That is, Cousin, very true; so will there 65 some be content either to think or make<sup>971</sup> as though they thought—but those are they that are content to give nought because they be naught. But our question is, Cousin, not of them, but of 70 good folk that by the keeping of worldly goods stand in great fear to offend God. For the acquieting<sup>972</sup> of their conscience speak we now, to the intent that they may perceive what manner of having of worldly goods and keeping thereof may stand
 75 with the state of grace. Now think I, Cousin, that if a man keep riches about him for a glory and royalty<sup>973</sup> of the world, in the consideration whereof he taketh a great delight, and liketh himself therefor—80 taking the poorer, for the lack thereof, as one far worse than himself—such a mind is very vain foolish pride, and such a man is very naught indeed. But on the other side, if there be a man such (as would 85 God were many) that hath unto riches no love, but having it fall abundantly unto him, taketh to his own part no great pleasure thereof, but as though he had it not, keepeth himself in like<sup>974</sup> abstinence and 90 penance privily as he would do in case he had it not, and in such things as he doth openly, bestow somewhat more liberally upon himself in his house after some manner of the world, lest he should give other folk occasion to marvel and muse and talk of his manner and misreport him for a hypocrite, therein between God and him doth truly protest and testify<sup>975</sup> as did the good queen Esther,<sup>976</sup> that he doth it not for any desire thereof in the satisfying of his own pleasure, but would with as good will or better forbear the possession of riches, saving<sup>977</sup> for the commodity<sup>978</sup> that other men have by his possessing thereof—as percase<sup>979</sup> in keeping a good household in good Christian order and fashion, and in setting other folk awork with such things as they gain their living the better by his means—this man’s having of riches I might, methinketh, in merit match, in a manner, with another man’s forsaking of all, if there were none other circumstance more pleasant unto God added further unto the forsaking besides—as percase for the more fervent contemplation, by reason of the solicitude of all worldly business left off, which was the thing that made Mary Magdalene’s part the better. For else would Christ have canned<sup>980</sup> her much more thanks to go about and be busy in the helping her sister Martha to dress<sup>981</sup> his dinner than to take her stool and sit down at her ease and do nought.<sup>982</sup>

Now if he that have these goods and riches by him have not haply fully so perfect a mind, but somewhat loveth to keep himself from lack, and not, so fully as a pure Christian fashion requireth, determined to abandon his pleasure—well, what will you more? The man is so much the less perfect than I would he were, and haply than himself would wish if it were as easy to be it as to wish it, but yet not by and by<sup>983</sup> in state of damnation for all that—no more than every man is forthwith<sup>984</sup> in state of damnation that, forsaking all and entering into religion,<sup>985</sup> is not yet always so clear depured<sup>986</sup> from all worldly affections as he himself would very fain<sup>987</sup> he were and much bewaileth that he is not; of whom, some man that hath in the world willingly forsaken the likelihood of right worshipful rooms<sup>988</sup> hath afterward had much ado to keep himself from the desire of the office of cellarer or sexton,<sup>989</sup> to bear yet at the leastwise some rule and authority, though it were but among the bells. But God is more merciful to man’s imperfection—if the man know it and knowledge it and mislike it, and little and little<sup>990</sup> labor to amend it—than to reject and cast to the devil him that, after as<sup>991</sup> his frailty can bear and suffer, hath a general intent and purpose to please him, and to prefer or set by<sup>992</sup> nothing in all this world before him.

And therefore, Cousin, to make an end of this piece withal,<sup>993</sup> a negotio perambulante in tenebris—of this devil, I mean, that the prophet calleth “Business walking in the darkneses”—if a man have a mind to serve God and please him, and rather lose all the goods he hath than wittingly<sup>994</sup> to do deadly sin, and would without murmur or grudge<sup>995</sup> give it every whit away in case that God should so command him, and intend to take it patiently if God would take it from him, and glad would be to use it unto God’s pleasure, and do his diligence to know and to be taught what manner using thereof God would be pleased with, and therein from time to time be glad to follow the counsel of good virtuous men, though he neither give away all at once nor give every man that asketh him neither, let every man fear and think in this world that all the good that he doth or can do is a great deal too little, but yet for all<sup>996</sup> that fear let him dwell therewith in the faithful hope of God’s help, and then shall the truth of God so compass him about (as the prophet saith) with a pavise<sup>997</sup> that he shall not so need to dread the trains<sup>998</sup> of and the temptations of the devil that the prophet calleth “Business walking about in the darkneses,” but that he shall, for all the having of riches and worldly substance, so avoid his trains and his temptations that he shall in conclusion,<sup>999</sup> by the great grace and almighty mercy of God, get into heaven well enough. And now was I, Cousin, about, lo, after this piece thus ended, to bid them bring in our dinner; but now shall I not need, lo, for here they come with it already.

ANTONY: Well, Cousin, now will we say grace, and then for a while will we leave talking, and assay<sup>1</sup> how our dinner shall like us, and how fair we can fall to feeding;<sup>2</sup> which done, you know my custom-10 able guise<sup>3</sup> (for “manner” I may not call it, because the guise is unmannerly) to bid you not farewell, but steal away from you to sleep. But, you wot well, I am not wont<sup>4</sup> at afternoon to sleep long, but even a little to forget the world; and when I wake, I will again
15 come to you. And then is, God willing, all this long day ours, wherein we shall have time enough to talk much more than shall suffice for the finishing of this one part of our matter, which only now remaineth.

VINCENT: I pray you, good Uncle, keep your customable manner, for “manner” may you call it well
20 enough: for as it were against good manner to look<sup>5</sup> that a man should kneel down for courtesy when his knee is sore, so is it very good manner that a man of your age, aggrieved with such sundry sicknesses besides that suffer you not always to sleep when you
25 should, let this sleep not slip away, but take it when you may. And I will, Uncle, in the meanwhile steal<sup>6</sup> from you too, and speed<sup>7</sup> a little errand and return to you again.

ANTONY: Tarry while you will, and when you have 30 dined, go at your pleasure — but I pray you tarry not long.

PREFACE

5 VINCENT: Somewhat have I tarried the longer, Uncle, partly for that<sup>1</sup> I was loath to come oversoon, lest my soon coming might have happed<sup>2</sup> to have made you wake too soon, but specially by reason that I was letted with<sup>3</sup> one that showed me a 10 letter dated at Constantinople, by which letter it ap-peareth that the great Turk prepareth a marvelous mighty army. And yet whither he will therewith,<sup>4</sup> that can there yet no man tell. But I fear in good faith, Uncle, that his voyage shall be hither. How-15 beit,<sup>5</sup> he that wrote the letter saith that it is secretly said in Constantinople that great part of his army shall be shipped and sent either into Naples or into Sicily.

20 ANTONY: It may fortune, Cousin, that the letter of the Venetian dated at Constantinople was devised at Venice; from thence come there some among,<sup>6</sup> and sometimes from Rome too, and sometimes also from some other places, letters all farced<sup>7</sup> full 25 of such tidings—that the Turk is ready to do some great exploit which tidings they blow about for the furtherance of some such affairs as they then have themselves in hand.

The Turk hath also so many men of arms in his retinue at his continual charge that,<sup>8</sup> lest they 30 should lie still and do nothing but peradventure<sup>9</sup> fall in devising of some novelties among themselves, he is fain<sup>10</sup> yearly to make some assemblies, and some changing of them from one place to another, and part some sort asunder, that they wax not 35 overwell acquainted by dwelling overlong together.

By these ways also he maketh those that he mindeth<sup>11</sup> suddenly to invade indeed the less to look therefor—and thereby the less preparation to make before—while they see him so many times make 40 a great visage of war when he mindeth it not. But then, at one time or other, they suddenly feel it when they fear it not.

Howbeit,<sup>12</sup> full likely, Cousin, it is of very truth that into this realm of Hungary he will not fail 45 to come; for neither is there any country through Christendom that lieth for him so meet,<sup>13</sup> nor never was there any time till now in which he might so well and surely win it.

For now call we him in ourselves (God save us), as Aesop telleth that the sheep took in the wolf unto 50 them to keep them from the dogs.<sup>14</sup>

VINCENT: Then are there very like,<sup>15</sup> good Uncle, all those tribulations to fall upon us here that I spoke of in the beginning of our first communication here the other day. 55

ANTONY: Very truth it is, Cousin, that so there will of likelihood in a while, but not forthwith<sup>16</sup> all at the first. For while he cometh under the color of aid for the one<sup>17</sup> against the other, he will some-60 what see the proof<sup>18</sup> before he fully show himself.
But in conclusion, if he be able to get it for him,<sup>19</sup> you shall see him so handle it that he shall not fail to get it from him, and that forthwith out of hand,<sup>20</sup> ere<sup>21</sup> ever he suffer him settle himself over-65 sure therein.

VINCENT: Yet say they, Uncle, that he useth not<sup>22</sup> to force any man to forsake his faith.

ANTONY: Not any man, Cousin? They say more than they can make good that tell you so. He maketh a solemn oath among the ceremonies of the 70 feast in which he first taketh upon him the authority that he shall, in all that he possibly may, diminish the faith of Christ, and dilate<sup>23</sup> the faith of Muhammad. But yet hath he not used<sup>24</sup> to force every whole country at once to forsake their faith; for of some countries hath he been content only to take a tribute yearly, and let them then live as they list.<sup>25</sup>

Out of some he taketh the whole people away, dispersing them for slaves among many sundry countries of his very far from their own, without any sufferance of regress.<sup>26</sup>

Some country, so great and populous that they cannot well be carried and conveyed thence, he destroyeth the gentlemen and giveth the lands, part to such as he bringeth, and part to such as willingly will renay<sup>27</sup> their faith, and keepeth the others in such misery that they were in manner as good be dead at once. In rest, he suffereth else no<sup>28</sup> Christian man almost, but those that resort<sup>29</sup> as merchants, or those that offer themselves to serve him in his war.

But as for those Christian countries that he useth not for only tributaries (as he doth Chios, Cyprus, or Candia),<sup>30</sup> but reckoneth for clear conquest and utterly taketh for his own (as Morea,<sup>31</sup> Greece, and Macedonia, and such other like — and as I verily<sup>32</sup> think he will Hungary, if he get it), in all those useth he Christian people after sundry fashions; he letteth them dwell there indeed, because they were too many to carry all away, and too many to kill them all too, but if<sup>33</sup> he should either leave the land depopled and desolate, or else some other countries of his own from whence he should (which would not well be done) convey the people thither to people that land withal.<sup>34</sup>

There, lo, those that will not be turned from their faith, of which God keepeth (lauded be his holy name) very many, he suffereth<sup>35</sup> to dwell still in peace; but yet is their peace for all that not very peaceable. For lands he suffereth them to have none of their own; office or honest room<sup>36</sup> they bear none; with occasions of his wars he pillesh<sup>37</sup> them with taxes and tallages<sup>38</sup> unto the bare bones. Their children he chooseth where he list in their youth and taketh them from their parents, conveying them whither he list where their friends never see them after, and abuseth them as he list; some young maidens maketh harlots, some young men he bringeth up in war, and some young children he causeth to be gelded<sup>39</sup> — not their stones cut out as the custom was of old, but cutteth off their whole members by the body; how few escape and live he little forceth,<sup>40</sup> for he will have enough. And all that he so taketh young to any use of his own are betaken to such Turks or false renegates<sup>41</sup> to keep that they be turned from the faith of Christ every one, or else so handled that, as for this world, they come to an evil chieving.<sup>42</sup> For besides many other contumelies and despites<sup>43</sup> that the Turks and the false renegade Christians many times do to good Christian people that still persevere and abide by the faith, they find the means sometimes to make some false shrews<sup>44</sup> say that they heard such a Christian man speak opprobrious words against Muhammad. And upon that point falsely testified will they take occasion to compel him forsake the faith of Christ, and turn to the profession of their shameful superstitious sect, or else will they put him unto death with cruel intolerable torments.

VINCENT: Our Lord, Uncle, for his mighty mercy, keep those wretches hence. For by my troth,<sup>45</sup> if they hap to come hither, methink I see many more tokens than one that we shall have of our own folk here ready to fall in unto them. For like as before a great storm, the sea beginneth sometimes to work and roar in itself ere ever<sup>46</sup> the wind waxeth boistous,<sup>47</sup> so methink I hear at mine ear some of our own here among us, which within these few years could no more have borne the name of a Turk than the name of the devil, begin now to find little fault therein — yea, and some to praise them too, little and little<sup>48</sup> as they may, more glad to find faults at every state of Christendom: priests, princes, rites, ceremonies, sacraments, laws and customs, spiritual, temporal, and all.

ANTONY: In good faith, Cousin, so begin we to fare here indeed, and that but even now of late. For since the title of the crown hath comen in question, the good rule of this realm hath very sore decayed, as little while as it is. And undoubtedly Hungary shall never do well as long as it standeth in this case: that men's minds hearken after novelties, and have their hearts hanging upon a change. And much the worse I like it when their words walk so large<sup>49</sup> toward the favor of the Turk's sect, which they were ever wont<sup>50</sup> to have in so great abomination, as every true-minded Christian man and Christian woman too must have.

5 I am of such age as you see, and verily from as far as I can remember, it hath been marked and oftentimes proved true that when children have in Buda fallen in a fantasy by themselves to draw together, and in their playing make as it were corpses
10 carried to church, and sing after their childish fashion the tune of the Dirge,<sup>51</sup> there hath great death there shortly followed after. And twice or thrice I may remember in my days when children in diverse parts of this realm have gathered themselves 15 in sundry companies, and made as it were parties<sup>52</sup> and battles, and after their battles in sport (wherein some children have yet taken great hurt), there hath fallen very<sup>53</sup> battle and deadly war indeed.

These tokens were somewhat like your example of the sea, since they be of things that after follow tokens foregoing, through some secret motion or instinct, whereof the cause is unknown. But by Saint Mary, Cousin, these tokens like I much worse—
20 these tokens, I say, not of children's plays, nor of children's songs, but old shrews' large<sup>54</sup> open words so boldly spoken in the favor of Muhammad's sect in this realm of Hungary, that hath been ever hitherto a very sure key of Christendom. And out of<sup>55</sup> doubt, if Hungary be lost, and that the Turk have 30 it once fast in his possession, he shall, ere it be long after, have an open ready way into almost the remnant of all Christendom; though he win it not all in a week, the great part will be won after, I fear me, within very few years.

35 VINCENT: But yet evermore I trust in Christ, good Uncle, that he shall not suffer that abominable sect of his mortal enemies in such wise<sup>56</sup> to prevail against his Christian country.

40 ANTONY: That is very well said, Cousin. Let us have our sure hope in him, and then shall we be very sure that we shall not be deceived, for either shall we have the thing that we hope for, or a better thing in the stead;<sup>57</sup> for as for the thing itself that we pray for, and hope to have, God will not always send us. And therefore, as I said in our first communication,<sup>58</sup> in all things save<sup>59</sup> only for heaven, our prayer nor our hope may never be too precise, although the thing be lawful to require.<sup>60</sup> 45

Verily, if we people of the Christian nations were such as would God we were, I would little 50 fear all the preparations that the great Turk could make. No, nor yet being as bad as we be, I nothing doubt at all but that in conclusion,<sup>61</sup> how base soever Christendom be brought, it shall spring up again till the time be come very near to the Day of 55 Doom,<sup>62</sup> whereof some tokens, as methinketh, are not comen yet. But somewhat before that time shall Christendom be striated sore,<sup>63</sup> and brought into so narrow a compass<sup>64</sup> that, according to Christ's words, Filius hominis cum venerit putas inveniet fidem in terra? (“When the Son of Man shall come 60 again”—that is to wit,<sup>65</sup> to the day of general judgment—“weenest<sup>66</sup> thou that he shall find faith in the earth?”),<sup>67</sup> as who say,<sup>68</sup> but a little; for as appeareth in the Apocalypse and other places of Scripture,<sup>69</sup> the faith shall be at that time so far faded that he shall for the love of his elects,<sup>70</sup> lest they should fall and perish too, abridge those days and accelerate his coming.

But as I say, methinketh I miss yet in my mind
70 some of those tokens that shall by the Scripture come a good while before that—and among others, the coming in of the Jews,<sup>71</sup> and the dilating<sup>72</sup> of Christendom again—before the world come to that strait. So that I say for mine own mind, I little 75 doubt but that this ungracious sect of Muhammad shall have a foul fall, and Christendom spring and spread, flower and increase again. Howbeit, the pleasure and the comfort shall they see that shall be born after that we be buried, I fear me both twain.<sup>73</sup> 80
For God giveth us great likelihood that, for our sinful wretched living, he goeth about to make these infidels, that are his open professed enemies, the sorrowful scourge of correction over evil Christian people that should be faithful, and are of truth his 85 falsely professed friends. And surely, Cousin, albeit that<sup>74</sup> methinketh I see diverse evil tokens of this misery coming to us, yet can there not in my mind be a worse prognostication<sup>75</sup> thereof than this ungracious token that you note here yourself. For undoubtedly, Cousin, this new manner here of men's favorable fashion in their language toward these ungracious Turks declareth plainly that not only their minds give them that hither in shall he come,<sup>76</sup> but also that they can be content both to live under him and, over<sup>77</sup> that, from the true faith of Christ, to fall into Muhammad's false abominable sect.

VINCENT: Verily, mine Uncle, as I go more about than you, so must I needs more hear—which is a heavy<sup>78</sup> hearing in mine ear—the manner of men in this matter, which increaseth about us here. I trust in other places of this realm by God's grace it is otherwise, but in this quarter here about us, many of these fellows that are meet<sup>79</sup> for the war, first were wont as it were in sport, and in a while after, half between game and earnest, and, by our Lady, now not far from fair<sup>80</sup> flat earnest indeed, talk as though they looked for a day when, with a turn unto the Turk's faith, they should be made masters here of true Christian men's bodies, and owners of all their goods.

ANTONY: Though I go little abroad, Cousin, yet hear I sometimes, when I say little, almost as much as that. But while there is no man to complain to for the redress, what remedy but patience, and fain<sup>81</sup> to sit still and hold my peace? For of these two that strive whether of them both shall reign upon us—and each of them calleth himself king, and both twain<sup>82</sup> put the people to pain—the one is, you wot<sup>83</sup> well, too far from our quarter here to help us in this behalf, and the other, while he looketh for the Turk's aid, either will not, or I ween well dare not, find any fault with them that favor the Turk and his sect. For of Turks natural<sup>84</sup> this country lacketh none now, which are here conversant<sup>85</sup> under diverse pretexts, and of everything advertise<sup>86</sup> the great Turk full surely. And therefore, Cousin, albeit I would advise every man pray still and call unto God to hold his gracious hand over us, and keep away this wretchedness if his pleasure be, yet would I further advise every good Christian body to remember and consider that it is very likely to come, and therefore make his reckoning and cast his pennyworths<sup>87</sup> before, and every man and every woman both appoint<sup>88</sup> with God's help in their own mind beforehand what thing they intend to do if the very worst fall.

THE FIRST CHAPTER

Whether a man should cast in his mind and appoint in his heart before, that if he were taken with Turks, he would rather die than forsake the faith

VINCENT: Well fare your heart, good Uncle, for this good counsel of yours. For surely methinketh that this is marvelous good. But yet heard I once a right cunning<sup>89</sup> and a very good man say that it were great folly, and very perilous too, that a man should think upon any such thing, or imagine any such case in his mind, for fear of double peril that may follow thereupon: for either shall he be likely to answer himself, to that case put<sup>90</sup> by himself, that he will rather suffer any painful death than forsake his faith—and by that bold appointment<sup>91</sup> should he fall in the fault of Saint Peter, that<sup>92</sup> of oversight made a proud promise and soon had a foul fall—or else were he likely to think that, rather than abide the pain, he would forsake God indeed, and by that mind should sin deadly<sup>93</sup> through his own folly, whereas he needeth not, as he that shall peradventure<sup>94</sup> never come in the peril to be put thereunto. And that therefore it were most wisdom never to think upon any such manner case.

ANTONY: I believe well, Cousin, that you have heard some man that would so say. For I can show almost as much as that, left of a very good man and a great solemn doctor in writing. But yet, Cousin, although I should hap to find one or two more as good men, and as well-learned too, that would both twain say and write the same, yet would I not fear for my part to counsel my friend to the contrary; for, Cousin, if his mind answer him as Saint Peter

74 albeit that: although 75 prophecy; prediction 76 not... come: not only do they think he will come in here 77 beyond 78 distressing, sorrowful, grievous 79 suitable 80 plain, open

81 willingly 82 both twain: each separately 83 know 84 Turks natural: native Turks 85 dwelling 86 notify 87 cast his pennyworths: consider what it will cost him 88 determine, decide 89 learned

90 case put: hypothetical scenario proposed 91 decision, determination 92 who 93 mortally 94 perhaps

answered Christ, that he would rather die than forsake him, though he say therein more unto himself than he should be peradventure able to make good if it came to the point, yet perceive I not that he doth in that thought any deadly displeasure unto God—nor Saint Peter, though he said more than he could perform, yet in his so saying offended not God greatly neither. But his offense was when he did not after so well as he said before. But now may this man be likely never to fall in the peril of breaking that appointment, since of some ten thousand that so shall examine themselves, never one shall fall in the peril; and yet to have that good purpose all their life seemeth me no more harm the while than a poor beggar that hath never a penny to think that if he had great substance,<sup>95</sup> he would give great alms for God's sake.

But now is all the peril, if the man answer himself that he would in such case rather forsake the faith of Christ with his mouth, and keep it still in his heart, than for the confessing of it to endure a painful death; for by this mind he falleth in deadly sin, which, while he never cometh in the case indeed, if he never had put himself the case, he never had fallen in. But in good faith methinketh that he which<sup>96</sup> upon that case put unto himself by himself will make himself that answer hath the habit of faith so faint and so cold that, to the better knowledge of himself and of his necessity, to pray for more strength of grace he had need to have the question put him either by himself or some other man.

Besides this, to counsel a man never to think on that case is in my mind as much reason<sup>97</sup> as the medicine that I have heard taught one for the toothache: to go thrice about a churchyard and never think on a foxtail. For if the counsel be not given them, it cannot serve them; and if it be given them, it must put the point of the matter in their mind, which by and by<sup>98</sup> to reject and think therein neither one thing nor other is a thing that may be sooner bid-den than obeyed.

I ween also that very few men can escape it, but that though they would never think thereon by themselves, but that yet in one place or other where they shall hap to come in company, they shall have the question by adventure so proponed<sup>99</sup> and put forth that, like<sup>100</sup> as while he heareth one talking to him, he may well wink<sup>101</sup> if he will, but he cannot make himself sleep, so shall he, whether he will or no, think one thing or other therein.

Finally, when Christ spoke so often and so plain of the matter that every man should, upon pain of damnation, openly confess his faith, if men took him and by dread of death would drive him to the contrary,<sup>102</sup> it seemeth me in a manner implied therein that we be bounden conditionally to have evermore that mind (actually<sup>103</sup> sometimes, and evermore habitually) that, if the case so should fall, then with God's help so we would.

And thus much thinketh me necessary for every man and woman to be always of this mind, and often to think thereupon, and where they find in the thinking thereon their hearts agrise<sup>104</sup> and shrink in the remembrance of the pain that their imagination representeth to the mind, then must they call to mind and remember the great pain and torment that Christ suffered for them, and heartily pray for grace, that if the case should so fall, God should give them strength to stand. And thus with exercise of such meditation, though men should never stand full out of fear of falling, yet must they persevere in good hope, and in full purpose of standing.

And this seemeth me,<sup>105</sup> Cousin, so far-forth<sup>106</sup> the mind that every Christian man and woman must needs have that methinketh every curate<sup>107</sup> should often counsel all his parishions,<sup>108</sup> and every man and woman their servants and their children, even beginning in their tender youth, to know this point and think thereon, and little and little<sup>109</sup> from their very childhood to accustom them dulcely<sup>110</sup> and pleasantly in the meditation thereof; whereby the goodness of God shall not fail so to aspire<sup>111</sup> the grace of his Holy Spirit into their hearts, in reward of that virtuous diligence, that through such actual<sup>112</sup> meditation he shall conserve them in such a sure habit of spiritual faithful strength that all the devils in hell, with all the wrestling that they can make, shall never be able to wrest it out of their heart.

ANTONY: I say surely, Cousin, as I think; and yet all this have I said concerning them that dwell in such places as they be never like<sup>113</sup> in their lives to come in the danger to be put to the proof. Howbeit
 5 many a man may ween himself far therefrom that<sup>114</sup> yet may fortune by some one chance or other to fall in the case that either for the truth of faith, or for the truth of justice (which go almost all alike), he may fall in the case. But now be you and I, Cousin,
 10 and all our friends here, far in another point. For we be so likely to fall in the experience thereof so soon that it had been more time<sup>115</sup> for us (all other things set aside) to have devised<sup>116</sup> upon this matter, and firmly to have settled ourselves upon a fast point<sup>117</sup>
 15 long ago, than to begin to commune<sup>118</sup> and counsel upon it now.

VINCENT: In good faith, Uncle, you say therein very truth, and would God it had come sooner in my mind. But better is it yet late than never. And 20 I trust God shall yet give us respite and time—whereof, Uncle, that we lose no part, I pray you proceed now with your good counsel therein.

ANTONY: Very gladly, Cousin, shall I now go forth in the fourth temptation, which only remaineth to be treated of, and properly pertaineth whole<sup>119</sup> unto this present purpose.

THE SECOND CHAPTER

Of the fourth temptation, which is persecution for the faith, touched in these words of the prophet:

30 ab incursu et daemonio meridiano<sup>120</sup>

ANTONY: The fourth temptation, Cousin, that the prophet speaketh of in the fore-remembered psalm, Qui habitat in adiutorio Altissimi,<sup>121</sup> etc., is plain open persecution, which is touched in these 35 words: ab incursu et daemonio meridiano. And of all his temptations this is the most perilous, the most bitter sharp, and the most rigorous. For whereas in other temptations he useth either pleasant allectives<sup>122</sup> unto sin, or either secret sleights and 40 trains,<sup>123</sup> and cometh in the night, and stealeth<sup>124</sup> on in the dark unware,<sup>125</sup> or in some other part of the day flieth and passeth by like an arrow (so shaping himself, sometimes in one fashion, sometimes in another, and so dissimuling<sup>126</sup> himself and his high mortal malice, that a man is thereby so blinded and 45 beguiled that he may not sometimes perceive well what he is), in this temptation, this plain open persecution for the faith, he cometh even in the very midday—that is to wit, even upon them that have a high light of faith shining in their heart—and

 50 openly suffereth<sup>127</sup> himself so plainly be perceived by his fierce malicious persecution against the faithful Christians for hatred of Christ's true Catholic faith that no man having faith can doubt what he is; for in this temptation he showeth himself such as 55 the prophet nameth him, daemonium meridianum (“the midday devil”), he may be so lightsomely<sup>128</sup> seen with the eye of a faithful soul by his fierce furious assault and incursion; for therefore saith the prophet that the truth of God shall compass that
 60 man round about that<sup>129</sup> dwelleth in the faithful hope of his help with a pavise<sup>130</sup> ab incursu et daemonio meridiano (“from the incursion and the devil of the midday”), because this kind of persecution is not a wily temptation, but a furious force and a 65 terrible incursion. In others of his temptations he stealeth on like a fox; but in this Turk's persecution for the faith, he runneth on roaring with assault like a ramping<sup>131</sup> lion.

This temptation is of all temptations also the most perilous: for whereas in temptations of prosperity he useth only delectable allectives to move a man to sin, and in other kinds of tribulation and 70 adversity he useth only grief and pain to pull a man into murmur,<sup>132</sup> impatience, and blasphemy, in this kind of persecution for the faith of Christ he useth both twain—that is to wit, both his allective of quiet and rest by deliverance from death and pain, with other pleasures also of this present life, and besides that, the terror and infliction of intolerable 75 pain and torment.

In other tribulation, as<sup>133</sup> loss, or sickness, or death of our friends, though the pain be peradventure as great and sometimes greater too, yet is not the peril nowhere nigh<sup>134</sup> half so much; for in other

113 likely 114 who 115 more time: more the time 116 decided, resolved 117 fast point: firm resolution 118 discuss together 119 entirely, completely 120 “From the incursion and devil of the midday” (Ps 90(91):6) 121 “He who dwells in the help of the Most High” (Ps 90(91)) 122 enticements 123 sleights and trains: sly tricks and snares 124 moves stealthily and secretly 125 unnoticed 126 disguising 127 allows 128 clearly 129 who 130 large shield 131 rampaging, raging; 1 Pt 5:8 132 muttering complaints 133 such as 134 near tribulations, as I said before, that necessity that the man must of fine force<sup>135</sup> abide and endure the pain, wax<sup>136</sup> he never so wroth<sup>137</sup> and impatient therewith, is a great reason to move him to keep his patience therein, and be content therewith, and thank God thereof, and of necessity to make a virtue, that he may be rewarded for. But in this temptation, this persecution for the faith, I mean not by fight in the field by which the faithful man standeth at his defense and putteth the faithless in half the fear and half the harm too, but where he is taken and in hold,<sup>138</sup> and may for the forswearing or the denying of his faith be delivered and suffered to live in rest and some in great worldly wealth also. In this case, I say, this thing—that he needeth not to suffer this trouble and pain but he will<sup>139</sup>—is a marvelous great occasion for him to fall into the sin that the devil would drive him to: that is to wit, the forsaking of the faith. And therefore as I say, of all the devil's temptations is this temptation, this persecution for the faith, the most perilous.

VINCENT: The more perilous, Uncle, that this temptation is, as indeed of all temptations the most perilous it is, the more need have they that stand in peril thereof to be before with substantial advice and good counsel well-armed against it, that we may, with the comfort and consolation thereof, the better bear that tribulation when it cometh, and the better withstand the temptation.

ANTONY: You say, Cousin Vincent, therein very truth, and I am content to fall therefore in hand with<sup>140</sup> it. But forasmuch, Cousin, as methinketh, that<sup>141</sup> of this tribulation somewhat you be more feared than I—and of truth somewhat more excusable it is in you than it were in me, mine age considered, and the sorrow that I have suffered already, with some other considerations upon my part besides—rehearse<sup>142</sup> you therefore the griefs and the pains that you think in this tribulation possible to fall unto you, and I shall against<sup>143</sup> each of them give you counsel, and rehearse you such occasion of comfort and consolation as my poor wit and learning can call unto my mind.

VINCENT: In good faith, Uncle, I am not all-thing afraid<sup>144</sup> in this case only for myself, but well you wot I have cause to care also for many more, and that folk of sundry sorts, men and women both, and that not all of one age.

ANTONY: All that you have cause to fear for, Cousin, for all them have I cause to fear with you too, since all your kinsfolk and allies within a little<sup>145</sup> be likewise unto me; howbeit,<sup>146</sup> to say the truth, every man hath cause in this case to fear both for himself and also for every other. For since, as the Scripture saith, Unicuique dedit Deus curam de proximo suo (“God hath given every man cure<sup>147</sup> and charge of his neighbor”),<sup>148</sup> there is no man that hath any spark of Christian love and charity in his breast but that<sup>149</sup> in a matter of such peril as this is, wherein the soul of man standeth in so great danger to be lost, he must needs care and take thought, not for his friends only, but also for his very foes; we shall therefore, Cousin, not rehearse your harms or mine that may befall in this persecution, but all the great harms in general, as near as we can call to mind, that may hap unto any man.

THE THIRD CHAPTER

ANTONY: Since a man is made of the body and the soul, all the harm that any man may take, it must needs be in one of these two, either immediately, or by the means of some such thing as serveth for the pleasure, weal, or commodity<sup>150</sup> of the one of these two. As for the soul, first, we shall need no rehearsal of any harm that by this kind of tribulation may attain thereto,<sup>151</sup> but if that<sup>152</sup> by some inordinate love and affection that the soul bear to the body, she consent to slide from the faith, and thereby doth her harm herself.

Now remain there the body and these outward things of fortune which serve for the maintenance of the body, and minister<sup>153</sup> matter of pleasure to the soul also, through the delight that she hath in the body for the while that she is matched therewith.

Consider then first the loss of those outward things, as somewhat the less in weight than is the body itself. In them what may a man lose, and thereby what pain may he suffer?

VINCENT: He may lose, Uncle (of which I should somewhat lose myself), money, plate,<sup>154</sup> and other movable substance;<sup>155</sup> then offices, authority; and finally all the lands of his inheritance forever, that himself and his heirs perpetually might else<sup>156</sup> enjoy. And of all these things, Uncle, you wot<sup>157</sup> well that myself have some—little in respect of that that<sup>158</sup> some others have here, but somewhat more yet than he that hath most here would be well content to lose.

Upon the loss of these things follow neediness and poverty, the pain of lacking, the shame of begging (of which twain<sup>159</sup> I wot not well which is the most wretched necessity), besides the grief of heart and heaviness<sup>160</sup> in beholding good men and faithful, and his dear friends, bewrapped in like misery, and ungracious wretches and infidels, and his mortal enemies, enjoy the commodities that himself and his friends have lost.

Now for the body, very few words shall serve us. For therein I see none other harm but loss of liberty, labor, imprisonment, painful and shameful death.

ANTONY: There needeth not much more, Cousin, as the world is now, for I fear me that less than a fourth part of this will make many a man sore<sup>161</sup> stagger in his faith, and some fall quite therefrom, that<sup>162</sup> yet at this day, before he come to the proof, weeneth himself that he would stand very fast.<sup>163</sup> And I beseech our Lord that all they that so think, and would yet, when they were brought unto the point, swerve therefrom for fear or for pain, may get of God the grace to ween still as they do, and not to be brought to the assay,<sup>164</sup> where pain or fear should show them (as it showed Saint Peter) how far they be deceived now.

But now, Cousin, against these terrible things, what way shall we take in giving men counsel of comfort? If the faith were in our days as fervent as it hath been ere this in time before passed, little counsel and little comfort would suffice. We should not much need with words and reasoning to extenuate and diminish the vigor and asperity of the pains, but the greater, the more bitter that the passion were, the more ready was of old time the fervor of faith to suffer it.

And surely, Cousin, I doubt it little in my mind but that if a man had in his heart so deep a desire and love-longing to be with God in heaven to have the fruition<sup>165</sup> of his glorious face, as had those holy men that were martyrs in old times, he would no more now stick at<sup>166</sup> the pain that he must pass between than at that time those old holy martyrs did. But alas, our faint and feeble faith, with our love to God less than lukewarm, by the fiery affection that we bear to our own filthy<sup>167</sup> flesh, make us so dull in the desire of heaven that the sudden dread of every bodily pain woundeth us to the heart and striketh our devotion dead. And therefore hath there every man, Cousin, as I said before, much the more need to think upon this thing many times and oft beforehand, ere any such peril fall; and by much devising<sup>168</sup> thereupon before they see cause to fear it—while the thing shall not appear so terrible unto them—reason shall better enter and, through grace working with their diligence, engender and set sure not a sudden slight affection of sufferance<sup>169</sup> for God's sake, but by a long continuance, a strong deep-rooted habit, not like a reed ready to wave with every wind, nor like a rootless tree scant up on end<sup>170</sup> in a loose heap of light sand, that will with a blast or two be blown down.

THE FOURTH CHAPTER 75

ANTONY: For if we now consider, Cousin, these causes of terror and dread that you have recited, which in this persecution for the faith, this midday devil, may by these Turks rear against us to make his incursion with, we shall well perceive, weighing them well with reason, that albeit<sup>171</sup> somewhat they be indeed, yet every part of the matter pondered, they shall well appear in conclusion things nothing so much to be dread and fled from as to folk at the first sight they do suddenly seem.

Of the loss of the goods of fortune

ANTONY: For first to begin at the outward goods, that neither are the proper goods of the soul nor 5 of the body, but are called the goods of fortune, that serve for the substance and commodity<sup>172</sup> of man for the short season of this present life — as<sup>173</sup> worldly substance, offices, honor, and authority — what great good is there in these things of themselves, for which they were worthy so much as to 10 bear the name by which the world of a worldly favor customably<sup>174</sup> calleth them? For if the having of strength make a man strong, and the having of heat make a man hot, and the having of virtue make a 15 man virtuous, how can those things be verily and truly good which he that hath them may, by the having of them, as well be the worse as the better, and as experience proveth more oft is the worse than the better? What<sup>175</sup> should a good man greatly rejoice in 20 that that<sup>176</sup> he daily seeth most abound in the hands of many that be naught?<sup>177</sup> Do not now the great Turk and his bashaws,<sup>178</sup> in all these advancements of fortune, surmount very far above any Christian estate,<sup>179</sup> and any lords living under him? And was 25 there not yet hence upon twenty years<sup>180</sup> the great Soldan<sup>181</sup> of Syria, which many a year together<sup>182</sup> bore as great a port<sup>183</sup> as the great Turk? And after, in one summer, unto the great Turk the whole empire was lost. And so may all his empire now, and 30 shall hereafter by God's grace, be lost into Christian men's hands likewise, when Christian people shall be mended and grow in God's favor again.

But when that whole kingdoms and mighty great empires are of so little surety to stand, but be so 35 soon translated<sup>184</sup> from one man unto another, what great thing can you or I — yea, or any lord, the greatest in the land — reckon himself to have by the possession of a heap of silver or gold, white and yellow metals, not so profitable of their own nature, save<sup>185</sup> 40 for a little glistering, as the rude rusty metal of iron?

THE SIXTH CHAPTER
Of the unsurety of lands and possessions

ANTONY: Lands and possessions many men yet much more esteem than money, because the lands 45 seem not so casual<sup>186</sup> as money is or plate, for that<sup>187</sup> though their other substance may be stolen and taken away, yet evermore they think that their land will lie still where it lay. But what are we the better that our land cannot be stirred but will lie still 50 where it lay, while ourselves may be removed and not suffered<sup>188</sup> to come near it?

What great difference is there to us whether our substance be movable or unmovable, since we be so movable ourselves that we may be removed from 55 them both and lose them both twain,<sup>189</sup> saving that sometimes in the money is the surety somewhat more? For when we be fain<sup>190</sup> ourselves to flee, we may make shift<sup>191</sup> to carry some of our money with us, where of our land we cannot carry one inch.

If our land be of more surety than our money, 60 how happeth it then that in this persecution we be more feared to lose it? For if it be a thing of more surety, then can it not so soon be lost.

In the translation<sup>192</sup> of these two great empires — Greece first (since myself was born), and after Syria 65 (since you were born too) — the land was lost before the money was found.

O, Cousin Vincent, if the whole world were animated with a reasonable soul, as Plato had weened<sup>193</sup>
70 it were, and that it had wit and understanding to mark and perceive all things — Lord God, how the ground on which a prince buildeth his palace would loud laugh his lord to scorn when he saw him proud of his possession, and heard him boast himself that 75 he and his blood are forever the very lords and owners of that land; for then would the ground think the while in himself, “Ah, thou seely<sup>194</sup> poor soul, that weenest thou were half a god, and art amid thy glory but a man in a gay<sup>195</sup> gown. I that am the 80 ground here, over whom thou art so proud, have had a hundred such owners of me as thou callest thyself, more than ever thou hast heard the names of. And some of them that proudly went over my

5 Who ought<sup>197</sup> your castle, Cousin, three thousand years ago?

VINCENT: Three thousand, Uncle? Nay, nay; in any king, Christian or heathen, you may strike off a third part of that well enough, and as far as 10 I ween, half of the remnant too. In far fewer years than three thousand, it may well fortune that a poor plowman’s blood<sup>198</sup> may come up to a kingdom, and a king’s right royal kin, on the other side,<sup>199</sup> fall down to the plow and cart, and neither that the 15 king know that ever he came from the cart, nor the carter know that ever he came from the crown.

ANTONY: We find, Cousin Vincent, in full antique<sup>200</sup> stories, many strange changes as marvelous as that come about in the compass of very few 20 years in effect. And be such things then in reason so greatly to be set by,<sup>201</sup> that we should esteem the loss at so great, when we see that in the keeping our surety is so little?

VINCENT: Marry,<sup>202</sup> Uncle, but the less surety that 25 we have to keep it, since it is a great commodity<sup>203</sup> to have it, the fearder<sup>204</sup> by so much and the more loath we be to forgo it.

ANTONY: That reason shall I, Cousin, turn against yourself. For if it be so as you say, that since the 30 things be commodious,<sup>205</sup> the less surety that you see you have of the keeping, the more cause you have to be afeard of the losing, then on the other side, the more that a thing is of his nature such that the commodity thereof bringeth a man little surety 35 and much fear, that thing of reason the less have we cause to love. And then the less cause that we have to love a thing, the less cause have we to care therefor, or fear the loss thereof, or be loath to go therefrom.

THE SEVENTH CHAPTER

These outward goods or gifts of fortune are by two manner wise<sup>206</sup> to be considered

ANTONY: We shall yet, Cousin, consider in these outward goods of fortune — as<sup>207</sup> riches, good name, honest estimation, honorable fame, and authority —
45 in all these things we shall, I say, consider that either we love them and set by them as things commodious unto us for the state and condition of this present life, or else as things that we purpose by the good 50 use thereof to make them matter of our merit with God’s help in the life after to come. Let us then first consider them as things set by and beloved for the pleasure and commodity of them for this present life.

THE EIGHTH CHAPTER

The little commodity of riches being set by but<sup>208</sup> for this present life

ANTONY: Now riches loved and set by for such, if we consider it well, the commodity that we take there thereof is not so great as our own fond<sup>209</sup> affection and fantasy maketh us imagine it. It maketh 60 us (I say not nay) go much more gay and glorious in sight, garnished in silk; but cloth<sup>210</sup> is within a little<sup>211</sup> as warm. It maketh us have great plenty of many kinds of delicate<sup>212</sup> and delicious victual,<sup>213</sup>
65 and thereby to make more excess; but less exquisite and less superfluous fare, with fewer surfeits<sup>214</sup> and fewer fevers growing thereonto, were within a little as wholesome. Then the labor in the getting, the fear in the keeping, and the pain in the parting from do
70 more than counterpoise a great part of all the pleasure and commodity that they bring. Besides this, the riches is the thing that taketh many times from its master all his pleasure and his life too, for many a man is for his riches slain. And some that keep their 75 riches as a thing pleasant and commodious for their life take none other pleasure in a manner thereof in all their life than as though they bore the key of another man’s coffer, and rather are content to live in neediness miserably all their days than they could 80 find in their heart to diminish their hoard, they have

196 akin 197 owned 198 kin

THE NINTH CHAPTER

15 *The little commodity of fame, being desired
but for worldly pleasure*

ANTONY: Let us now consider good name, honest estimation, and honorable fame, for these three things are of their own nature one, and take their 20 difference, in effect, but of the manner of the common speech in diversity of degrees; for a “good name” may a man have be he never so poor; “honest estimation,” in the common taking<sup>217</sup> of the people, belongeth not unto any man but him that is 25 taken for one of some countenance and haviour,<sup>218</sup> and among his neighbors had in some reputation.
In the word of “honorable fame,” folk conceive the renown of great estates,<sup>219</sup> much and far spoken of by reason of their laudable acts.

30 Now all this gear<sup>220</sup> used as a thing pleasant and commodious for this present life, pleasant it may seem to him that fasteneth his fantasy therein, but of the nature of the thing itself, I perceive no great commodity that it hath. I say “of the nature of the 35 thing itself” because it may be by chance some occasion of commodity, as if it hap that for the good name the poor man hath, or for the honest estimation that a man of some haviour and substance<sup>221</sup> standeth in among his neighbors, or for the honor-40 able fame wherewith the great estate is renowned — if it hap, I say, that any man bearing them the better will<sup>222</sup> therefor do them therefore any good. And yet as for that, like as it may sometimes so hap (and sometimes so happeth indeed), so may it hap sometimes on the other side (and on the other side so 45 it sometimes happeth indeed) that such folk are of some others envied and hated, and as readily by them that envy them and hate them take harm as they take by them that love them good.

But now to speak of the thing itself in his own 50 proper nature, what is it but a blast of another man’s mouth, as soon passed as spoken, whereupon he that setteth his delight feedeth himself but with wind — whereof be he never so full, he hath little substance therein? And many times shall he much 55 deceive himself, for he shall ween that many praise him that never speak word of him; and they that do, say it much less than he weeneth, and far more seldom too; for they spend not all the day, he may be sure, in talking of him alone. And whoso commend 60 him most will yet, I ween, in every four-and-twenty hours wink<sup>223</sup> and forget him once; besides this, that while one talketh well of him in one place, another sitteth and saith as shrewdly<sup>224</sup> of him in another.
And finally some that most praise him in his pres-65 ence, behind his back mock him as fast,<sup>225</sup> and loud laugh him to scorn, and sometimes slyly to his own face too. And yet are there some fools so fed with this fond fantasy of fame that they rejoice and glory to think how they be continually praised all about, 70 as though all the world did nothing else, day nor night, but ever sit and sing Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus<sup>226</sup> upon them.

THE TENTH CHAPTER

Of flattery

ANTONY: And into this pleasant frenzy of much foolish vainglory be there some men brought sometimes by such as themselves do in a manner hire to flatter them, and would not be content if a man should do otherwise, but would be right angry, not 80 only if a man told them truth when they do nought<sup>227</sup> indeed, but also if they praise it but slenderly.

VINCENT: Forsooth,<sup>228</sup> Uncle, this is very truth. I have been ere this, and not very long ago, where I saw so proper experience of this point that I must 85 stop your tale for so long while I tell you mine.

215 used, had possession of 216 anything 217 conception 218 countenance and haviour: position and possessions

219 positions 220 business; matter 221 wealth 222 regard, good will 223 close his eyes 224 wickedly, harshly

225 vigorously 226 Holy, Holy, Holy;
a prayer sung at every Mass. See Is 6:1–3.
227 nothing 228 In truth

ANTONY: I pray you, Cousin, tell on.

VINCENT: When I was first in Almain,<sup>229</sup> Uncle, it happed me to be somewhat favored with a great man of the Church, and a great state,<sup>230</sup> one of the 5 greatest in all that country there. And indeed whosoever might spend as much as he might in one thing and other were a right great estate in any country of Christendom. But glorious was he very 10 far above all measure, and that was great pity, for it did harm, and made him abuse many great gifts that God had given him. Never was he satiate of hearing his own praise.

So happed it one day that he had in a great audience made an oration in a certain manner, wherein 15 he liked himself so well that at his dinner he sat, him thought, on thorns till he might hear how they that sat with him at his board<sup>231</sup> would commend it.
And when he had sat musing awhile, devising<sup>232</sup> (as I thought after) upon some pretty<sup>233</sup> proper way to 20 bring it in withal, at the last, for lack of a better (lest he should have letted<sup>234</sup> the matter too long), he brought it even blunt forth, and asked us all that sat at his board's end (for at his own mess in the mids,<sup>235</sup> there sat but himself alone) how well we liked his 25 oration that he had made that day.

But in faith, Uncle, when that problem was once proponed,<sup>236</sup> till it was fully answered, no man, I ween, ate one morsel of meat<sup>237</sup> more, every man was fallen in so deep a study for the finding of some 30 exquisite praise. For he that should have brought out but a vulgar<sup>238</sup> and a common commendation would have thought himself shamed forever.

Then said we our sentences<sup>239</sup> by row as we sat, from the lowest unto the highest, in good order, as<sup>240</sup> 35 it had been a great matter of the common weal in a right solemn council. When it came to my part (I will not say it, Uncle, for no boast), methought, by our Lady, for my part I quit<sup>241</sup> myself meetly<sup>242</sup> well; and I liked myself the better because methought my 40 words, being but a stranger,<sup>243</sup> went yet with some grace in the Almain tongue, wherein, letting my Latin alone, me listed<sup>244</sup> to show my cunning. And

I hoped to be liked the better because I saw that he that sat next me and should say his sentence<sup>245</sup> after me was an unlearned priest, for he could speak 45 no Latin at all. But when he came forth for his part with my lord's commendation, the wily fox had been so well accustomed in court with the craft of flattery that he went beyond me to too far. And then might I see by him what excellence a right mean<sup>246</sup> 50 wit may come to in one craft, that in all his whole life studieth and busieth his wit about no more but that one. But I made after a solemn vow to myself that if ever he and I were matched together at that board again, when we should fall to our flattery, I 55 would flatter in Latin, that he should not contend with me no more; for though I could be content to be outrun of a horse, yet would I no more abide it to be outrun of an ass.

But Uncle, here began now the game. He that sat highest, and was to speak last, was a great beneficed<sup>247</sup> man, and not a doctor<sup>248</sup> only, but also somewhat learned indeed in the laws of the Church.
A world it was to see how he marked every man's word that spoke before him. And it seemed that ev-65 ery word, the more proper<sup>249</sup> that it was, the worse he liked, for the cumbrance<sup>250</sup> that he had to study out<sup>251</sup> a better to pass<sup>252</sup> it. The man even sweat with the labor, so that he was fain<sup>253</sup> in the while now and then to wipe his face. Howbeit,<sup>254</sup> in conclusion, 70 when it came to his course,<sup>255</sup> we that had spoken before him had so taken up all among us before, that we had not left him one wise word to speak after.

ANTONY: Alas, good man, among so many of you,
some good fellow should have lent him one. 75

VINCENT: It needed not, as hap was, Uncle, for he found out such a shift<sup>256</sup> that in his flattering he passed us all the many.

ANTONY: Why, what said he, Cousin?

VINCENT: By our Lady, Uncle, not one word. But 80 like as, I trow,<sup>257</sup> Pliny telleth, that when Apelles<sup>258</sup>

254 Nevertheless 255 turn 256 tactic
257 believe 258 Apelles of Kos (fourth c. BC); Pliny called him the greatest painter of all time. However, the painting of Iphigenia described here is attributed by Pliny to Timanthes of Cythnus (also fourth c. BC).

the painter, in the table<sup>259</sup> that he painted of the sacrifice and the death of Iphigenia, had, in the making of the sorrowful countenances of the other noble-
 5 men of Greece that beheld it, spent out so much his craft and his cunning<sup>260</sup> that, when he came to make the countenance of King Agamemnon, her father, which he reserved for the last — lest if he had made his visage before, he must in some of the others af-
 10 ter either have made the visage less dolorous<sup>261</sup> than he could, and thereby have forborne<sup>262</sup> some part of his praise, or doing the uttermost of his craft, might have happened to make some other look more heavily<sup>263</sup> for the pity of her pain than her own fa-
 15 ther, which had been yet a far greater fault in his painting — when he came, I say, to the making of his face therefore last of all, he could devise no man-20 ner of new heavy cheer<sup>264</sup> or countenance for her father but that he had made there already in some of the others a much more heavy before. And therefore to the intent that no man should see what man-25 ner<sup>265</sup> countenance it was that her father had, the painter was fain<sup>266</sup> to paint him holding his face in his handkerchief.<sup>267</sup>

The like pageant,<sup>268</sup> in a manner, played us there 25 this good ancient honorable flatterer; for when he saw that he could find no words of praise that would pass<sup>269</sup> all that had been spoken before already, the wily fox would speak never a word, but, as he that were ravished unto heavenward with the wonder of 30 the wisdom and eloquence that my Lord's Grace had uttered in that oration, he fetched a long sigh with an "Oh!" from the bottom of his breast, and held up both his hands, and lifted up his head, and cast up his eyes into the welkin,<sup>270</sup> and wept.

35 ANTONY: Forsooth, Cousin, he played his part very properly.

But was that great prelate's oration, Cousin, anything praiseworthy? For you can tell, I see well. For 40 you would not, I ween, play as Juvenal merrily describeth the blind senator, one of the flatterers of Tiberius the emperor, that among the remnant so magnified the great fish that the emperor had sent for them to show them — which this blind senator

(Montanus,<sup>271</sup> I trow, they called him) marveled of as much as any that marveled most; and many
 45 things he spoke thereof, with some of his words directed thereunto, looking himself toward his left side, while the fish lay on his right side<sup>272</sup> — you would not, I trow, Cousin, have taken upon you to praise it so but if<sup>273</sup> you had heard it. 50

VINCENT: I heard it, Uncle, indeed, and to say the truth, it was not to dispraise, howbeit<sup>274</sup> surely somewhat less praise might have served it by more a great deal than the half. But this am I sure: had it 55 been the worst that ever was made, the praise had not been the less of one hair. For they that used<sup>275</sup> to praise him to his face never considered how much the thing deserved, but how great a laud and praise themselves could give his good Grace.

ANTONY: Surely, Cousin, as Terence saith, such 60 folk make men of fools even stark mad,<sup>276</sup> and much cause have their lords to be right angry with them.

VINCENT: God hath indeed, and is, I ween. But as for their lords, Uncle, if they would after wax an-65 gry with them therefor, they should in my mind do them very great wrong, when it is one of the things that they specially keep them for; for those that are of such vainglorious mind (be they lords, or be they meaner men) can be much better contented to have their devices commended than amended; and re-
 70 quire<sup>277</sup> they their servants and their friend never so specially<sup>278</sup> to tell them the very truth, yet shall they better please them if he speak them fair than if he telleth them truth. For they be in the case that Mar-
 75 tial speaketh of in an epigram unto a friend of his that required his judgment, how he liked his verses. But he prayed<sup>279</sup> him in any wise to tell him even the very truth. To whom Martial made answer in this wise:

The very truth of me thou dost require. 80
 The very truth is this, my friend dear:
 The very truth thou wouldst not gladly hear.<sup>280</sup>

And in good faith, Uncle, the selfsame prelate that I told you my tale of—I dare be bold to swear it, I know it so surely—had on a time<sup>281</sup> made of his own drawing<sup>282</sup> a certain treatise that should serve for a league between that country and a great prince. In which treatise himself thought that he had devised his articles so wisely, and indited<sup>283</sup> them so well, that all the world would allow them; whereupon, longing sore to be praised, he called unto him a friend of his, a man well-learned and of good worship,<sup>284</sup> and very well expert in those matters, as he that had been diverse times ambassador for that country, and had made many such treatises himself. When he took him the treatise, and that he had read it, he asked him how he liked it, and said, “But I pray you heartily, tell me the very truth”; and that he spoke so heartily that the other had weened he would fain<sup>285</sup> have heard the truth. And in trust thereof, he told him a fault therein; at the hearing whereof, he swore in great anger, “By the Mass, thou art a very fool.” The other afterward told me that he would never tell him truth again.

ANTONY: Without question, Cousin, I cannot greatly blame him. And thus themselves make every man mock them, flatter them, and deceive them—those, I say, that are of such vainglorious mind. For if they be content to hear the truth, let them then make much of them that tell them the truth, and withdraw their ear from them that falsely flatter them, and they shall be more truly served than with twenty requests praying<sup>286</sup> men to tell them true.

King Ladislaus,<sup>287</sup> our Lord assoil<sup>288</sup> his soul, used much this manner among his servants. When one of them praised any deed of his or any condition in him, if he perceived that they said but the truth, he would let it pass by, uncontrolled.<sup>289</sup> But when he saw that they set a gloss<sup>290</sup> upon it for his praise of their own making besides, then would he shortly<sup>291</sup> say unto them, “I pray thee, good fellow, when thou say grace at my board,<sup>292</sup> never bring in Gloria Patri<sup>293</sup> without a sicut erat.<sup>294</sup> Any act that ever I did, if thou report it again to mine honor with a Gloria Patri, never report it but with a sicut erat—that is to wit, even as it was, and none otherwise. And lift me not up with no lies, for I love it not.”

If men would use this way with them that this noble king used, it would diminish much of their false flattery. I can well allow that men should commend (keeping them within the bonds<sup>295</sup> of truth) such things as they see praiseworthy in other men, to give them the greater courage to the increase thereof. For men keep still in that point one condition of children, that praise must prick<sup>296</sup> them forth. But better it were to do well and look for none. Howbeit, they that cannot find in their heart to commend another man’s good deed show themselves either envious or else of nature very cold and dull.

But out of question,<sup>297</sup> he that putteth his pleasure in the praise of the people hath but a fond<sup>298</sup> fantasy; for if his finger do but ache of a hot blain,<sup>299</sup> a great many men’s mouths blowing out his praise will scanty<sup>300</sup> do him among them all half so much ease as to have one boy blow upon his finger.

THE ELEVENTH CHAPTER

The little commodity that men have of rooms, offices, and authority, if they desire them but for their worldly commodity

ANTONY: Let us now consider in like wise what great worldly wealth ariseth unto men by great offices, rooms,<sup>301</sup> and authority—to those worldly-disposed people, I say, that desire them for no better purpose; for of them that desire them for better, we shall speak after anon.<sup>302</sup>

The great thing that they chief like all therein is that they may bear a rule, command and control other men, and live uncommanded and uncontrolled themselves. And yet this commodity took I so little heed of that I never was aware it was so great till a good friend of ours merrily told me once that his wife once in a great anger taught it him.<sup>303</sup> For when her husband had no list<sup>304</sup> to grow greatly upward in the world, nor neither would labor for office of authority, and over that forsook<sup>305</sup> a right worshipful room<sup>306</sup> when it was offered him, she fell in hand<sup>307</sup> with him, he told me, and all-to rated<sup>308</sup> him, and asked him, “What will you do, that you list not to put forth yourself as other folk do? Will you sit still by the fire and make goslings in the ashes with a stick as children do? Would God I were a man, and look what I would do.”

“Why, wife,” quoth her husband, “what would you do?”

“What? By God, go forward with the best; for as my mother was wont<sup>309</sup> to say (God have mercy on her soul), it is evermore better to rule than to be ruled. And therefore, by God, I would not, I war-rant<sup>310</sup> you, be so foolish to be ruled where I might rule.”

“By my troth, wife,” quoth her husband, “in this I dare say you say truth, for I never found you willing to be ruled yet.”

20 VINCENT: Well, Uncle, I wot where you be now well enough: she is indeed a stout master woman. And in good faith, for aught that I can see, even that same womanish mind<sup>311</sup> of hers is the greatest commodity<sup>312</sup> that men reckon upon in rooms and offices of authority.

ANTONY: By my troth, and methinketh very few there are of them that attain any great commodity therein. For first there is in every kingdom but one that can have an office of such authority that no man may command him or control him; none officer can there stand in that case but the king himself, which only uncontrolled or uncommanded may control and command all. Now, of all the remnant, each is under him. And yet besides him, almost every one is under more commanders and controllers too than one. And some man that is in a great office commandeth fewer things and less labor to many men that are under him than some one that is over him commandeth him alone.

40 VINCENT: Yet it doth them good, Uncle, that men must make courtesy to them, and salute them with reverence, and stand barehead before them, or unto some of them kneel peradventure too.

ANTONY: Well, Cousin, in some part they do but play at gleek,<sup>313</sup> receive reverence, and to their cost pay honor again therefor; for except, as I said, only a king, the greatest in authority under him receiveth not so much reverence of no man as according to reason himself doth honor to him; nor twenty men’s courtesies do him not so much pleasure as his own once kneeling doth him pain, if his knee hap to be sore.

And I wist<sup>314</sup> once a great officer of the king’s say, and in good faith I ween he said but as he thought, that twenty men standing barehead before him kept not his head half so warm as to keep on his own cap. Nor he took never so much ease with their being barehead before him as he caught once grief with a cough that came upon him by standing barehead long before the king.

But let it be that these commodities be somewhat such as they be; yet then consider whether that any incommunities<sup>315</sup> be so joined therewith that a man were almost as good lack both as have both.<sup>316</sup>

Goeth all things evermore as every one of them would have it? That were as hard as to please all the people at once with one weather, while in one house the husband would have fair weather for his corn, and his wife would have rain for her leeks. So while they that are in authority be not all evermore of one mind, but sometimes variance<sup>317</sup> among them, either for the respect<sup>318</sup> of profit, or for contention of rule, or for maintenance of matters — sundry parties for their sundry friends — it cannot be that both the parties can have their own mind; nor often are they content which<sup>319</sup> see their conclusion quail,<sup>320</sup> but ten times they take the missing of their mind more displeasantly than other poor men do. And this goeth not only to men of mean<sup>321</sup> authority, but unto the very greatest. The princes themselves cannot have, you wot well, all their will. For how were it possible while each of them almost would, if he might, be lord over all the remnant? Then many men under their princes in authority are in that case that privy<sup>322</sup> malice and envy many bear them in heart, falsely speak them full fair and praise them with their mouth, which when there happeth any great fall unto them, bawl and bark and bite upon them like dogs.

305 turned down 306 worshipful room: distinguished office 307 fell in hand: dealt 308 all-to rated: soundly rebuked 309 accustomed 310 promise, guarantee

311 purpose; desire, wish; opinion 312 advantage, benefit 313 a card game 314 knew 315 disadvantages 316 as good . . . have both: as well off lacking both as having both 317 (there is) dissension 318 consideration 319 who 320 fail 321 little 322 secret

Finally, the cost and charge, the danger and peril of war, wherein their part is more than a poor man's is, since the matter more dependeth upon them, and many a poor plowman may sit still by the fire, while they must arise and walk. And sometimes their authority falleth by change of their master's mind. And of that see we daily, in one place or other, examples such and so many that the parable of the philosopher can lack no testimony, which likened the servants of great princes unto the counters<sup>323</sup> with which men do cast a count.<sup>324</sup> For like as that counter that standeth sometimes for a farthing is suddenly set up and standeth for a thousand pounds, and after, as soon set down eftsoon<sup>325</sup> beneath, to stand for a farthing again, so fareth it, lo, sometimes with those that seek the way to rise and grow up in authority by the favor of great princes: that as they rise up high, so fall they down again as low.<sup>326</sup>

Howbeit, though a man escape all such adventures and abide in great authority till he die, yet then at the leastwise every man must leave it at the last. And that which we call "at last" hath no very long time to it. Let a man reckon his years that are passed of his age ere ever he can get up aloft, and let him, when he have it first in his fist, reckon how long he shall be like to live after, and I ween that then the most part shall have little cause to rejoice; they shall see the time likely to be so short that their honor and authority by nature shall endure, besides the manifold chances whereby they may lose it more soon. And then when they see that they must needs leave it, the thing which they did much more set their heart upon than ever they had reasonable cause — what sorrow they take therefor, that shall I not need to tell you.

And thus it seemeth unto me, Cousin, in good faith, that since in the having the profit is not great, and the displeasures neither small nor few, and of the losing so many sundry chances, and that by no means a man can keep it long, and that to part therefrom is such a painful grief, I can see no very great cause for which, as a high worldly commodity, men should greatly desire it.

THE TWELFTH CHAPTER

That these outward goods, desired but for worldly wealth, be not only little good for the body, but are also much harm for the soul

ANTONY: And thus far have we considered hitherto, in these outward goods that are called the gifts of fortune, no further but the slender commodity that worldly-minded men have by them. But now if we consider further what harm to the soul they take by them that desire them but only for the wretched wealth of this world, then shall we well perceive how far more happy is he that well loseth them than he that evil<sup>327</sup> findeth them.

These things, though they be such as are of their own nature indifferent — that is to wit, of themselves things neither good nor bad, but are matter that may serve to the one or the other, after<sup>328</sup> as men will use them — yet need we little to doubt it but that they that desire them but for their worldly pleasure and for no further godly purpose, the devil shall soon turn them from things indifferent unto them and make them things very naught.<sup>329</sup> For though that<sup>330</sup> they be indifferent of their nature, yet cannot the use of them lightly<sup>331</sup> stand indifferent, but determinately<sup>332</sup> must either be good or bad; and therefore he that desireth them but for worldly pleasure desireth them not for any good; and for better purpose than he desireth them, to better use is he not likely to put them, and therefore not unto good, but consequently to naught.

As for example, first consider it in riches: he that longeth for them as for thing of temporal commodity, and not for any godly purpose, what good they shall do him Saint Paul declareth where he writeth unto Timothy, Qui volunt divites fieri incidunt in tentationem, et in laqueum diaboli, et desideria multa inutilia et noxia, quae mergunt homines in interitum et perditionem ("They that long to be rich fall into temptation, and into the grin<sup>333</sup> of the devil, and into many desires unprofitable and noxious,<sup>334</sup> which drown men into death and into perdition").<sup>335</sup> And the Holy Scripture saith also, in the twentieth chapter of the Proverbs, Qui congregat thesauros impingetur ad laqueos mortis ("He that gathereth treasures shall be shoved into the grin of death"),<sup>336</sup> so that whereas by the mouth of Saint

Polybius, Histories 5:26:12–13. 327 wickedly 328 according 329 wicked 330 though that: even though 331 easily

332 definitely 333 snare 334 troublesome, harmful 335 1 Tim 6:9 336 Prv 21:6

Paul God saith that they shall fall into the devil's grin, he saith in the other place that they shall be pushed and shoved in by violence. And of truth, while a man desireth riches not for any good godly purpose, but for only worldly wealth, it must needs be that he shall have little conscience in the getting, but by all evil ways that he can invent shall labor to get them; and then shall he either niggardly<sup>337</sup> heap them up together (which is, you wot well, damnable) or wastefully misspend them about worldly pomp, pride, and gluttony, with occasion of many sins more. And that is yet much more damnable.

As for fame and glory desired but for worldly pleasure, doth<sup>338</sup> unto the soul inestimable harm, for that setteth men's hearts upon high devices and desires of such things as are immoderate and outrageous, and, by help of false flatterers, puff up a man in pride, and make a brotle<sup>339</sup> man lately made of earth — and that shall again shortly be laid full low in earth, and there lie and rot and turn again into earth — take himself in the meantime for a god here upon earth, and ween to win himself to be lord of all the earth.

This maketh battles between these great princes, and — with much trouble to much people, and great effusion of blood — one king to look to reign in five realms, that cannot well rule one. For how many hath now this great Turk, and yet aspireth to more? And those that he hath, he ordereth evil, and yet himself worse.

Then offices and rooms<sup>340</sup> of authority, if men desire them only for their worldly fantasies, who can look<sup>341</sup> that ever they shall occupy them well, but abuse their authority, and do thereby great hurt? For then shall they fall from indifferency<sup>342</sup> and maintain false matters of their friends, bear up<sup>343</sup> their servants and such as depend upon them with bearing down of<sup>344</sup> other innocent folk and not so able to do hurt, as easy to take harm. Then the laws that are made against malefactors shall they make, as an old philosopher said, to be much like unto cobwebs, in which the little gnats and flies stick still and hang fast, but the great humble-bees<sup>345</sup> break them and fly quite through.<sup>346</sup> And then the laws that are made as a buckler<sup>347</sup> in the defense of innocents, those shall they make serve for a sword to cut and sore<sup>348</sup> wound them with, and therewith wound they their own souls sorer.

And thus you see, Cousin, that of all these outward goods which men call the goods of fortune, there is never one that unto them which long therefore, not for any godly purpose, but only for their worldly wealth, hath any great commodity<sup>349</sup> to the body; and yet are they all in such case besides that very deadly destruction unto the soul.

THE THIRTEENTH CHAPTER

Whether men desire these outward goods for their own worldly wealth or for any good virtuous purpose, this persecution of the Turk against the faith will declare, and the comfort that both twain may take in the losing them thus

VINCENT: Verily,<sup>350</sup> good Uncle, this thing is so plainly true that no man may by any good reason deny it. But I ween, Uncle, also that there will no man say nay; for I see no man that will for very shame confess that he desireth riches, honor, and renown, offices and rooms of authority, for his own worldly pleasure; for every man would fain<sup>351</sup> seem as holy as a horse, and therefore will every man say — and would it were believed too — that he desireth these things (though for his own worldly wealth a little so) yet principally to merit thereby, through doing some good therewith.

ANTONY: This is, Cousin, very sure so: that so doth every man say. But first, he that in the desire thereof hath his respect therein unto his worldly wealth, as you say, but a little so, so much as himself weeneth<sup>352</sup> were but a little may soon prove a great deal too much. And many men will say so too that have indeed their principal respect therein unto their worldly commodity,<sup>353</sup> and unto Godward therein little or nothing at all, and yet they pretend the contrary, and that unto their own harm: quia Deus non irridetur (“God cannot be mocked”).<sup>354</sup>

And some peradventure<sup>355</sup> know not well their own affection themselves, but there lieth more imperfection secret in their affection than themselves are well aware of, which only God beholdeth; and

337 in miserly fashion 338 i.e., that or it doth 339 frail, brittle; mortal 340 positions 341 expect 342 impartiality 343 bear up: elevate 344 with bearing

But now, Cousin, this tribulation of the Turk — if he so persecute us for the faith that those that will forsake their faith shall keep their goods, and those shall lose their goods that will not leave their faith — this manner of persecution, lo, shall like a touchstone try them, and show the feigned from the true-minded, and teach also them that ween they mean better than they do indeed, better to discern themselves. For some there are that ween they mean well while they frame themselves a conscience, and ever keep still a great heap of superfluous substance<sup>358</sup> by them, thinking ever still that they will bethink themselves upon<sup>359</sup> some good deed, whereon they will well bestow it once, or that else their executors shall. But now if they lie not unto themselves, but keep their goods for any good purpose to the pleasure of God indeed, then shall they in this persecution, for the pleasure of God in keeping of his faith, be glad to depart from them.

And therefore as for all these things — the loss, I mean, of all these outward things that men call the gifts of fortune — this is methinketh in this Turk’s persecution for the faith consolation great and sufficient, that since every man that hath them either setteth by<sup>360</sup> them for the world or for God, he that setteth by them for the world hath, as I have showed you, little profit by them to the body, and great harm unto the soul, and therefore may well (if he be wise) reckon that he winneth by the loss, although he lost them but by some common chance — and much more happy then while he loseth them by such a meritorious means. And on the other side, he that keepeth them for some good purpose, intending to bestow them for the pleasure of God, the loss of them in this Turk’s persecution, for keeping of the faith, can be no manner<sup>361</sup> grief unto him, since that by his so parting from them, he bestoweth them in such wise unto God’s pleasure that at the time when he loseth them, by no way could he bestow them unto his high pleasure better. For though it had been peradventure better to have bestowed them well before, yet since he kept them for some good purpose, he would not have left them unbestowed if he had foreknown the chance; but being now prevented so by persecution that he cannot bestow them in that other good way that he would, yet while he parteth from them because he will not part from the faith, though the devil’s escheator<sup>362</sup> violently take them from him, yet willingly giveth he them to God.

THE FOURTEENTH CHAPTER

Another cause for which any man should be content to forgo his goods in the Turk’s said persecution

VINCENT: I cannot in good faith, good Uncle, say nay to none of this. And indeed unto them that by the Turk’s overrunning of the country were happed to be despoiled and robbed, and all their substance, movable and unmovable, bereft and lost already, their persons only fled and safe, I think that these considerations (considered therewith that, as you lately said, their sorrow could not amend their chance) might unto them be good occasion of comfort, and cause them, as you said, make a virtue of necessity. But in the case, Uncle, that we now speak of — that is to wit, where they have yet their substance untouched in their own hands, and that the keeping or the losing shall hang both in their own hands by the Turk’s offer upon the retaining or the renouncing of the Christian faith — here, Uncle, I find it as you said, that this temptation is most sore<sup>363</sup> and most perilous, for I fear me that we shall find few of such as have much to lose that shall find in their hearts so suddenly to forsake their goods, with all those other things aforerehearsed, whereupon their worldly wealth dependeth.

ANTONY: That fear I much, Cousin, too; but thereby shall it well, as I said, appear that seemed they never so good and virtuous before, and flattered they themselves with never so gay a gloss<sup>364</sup> of good and gracious purpose that they keep their goods for, yet were their hearts inwardly in the deep sight of God not sound and sure such as they should be, and as peradventure some had themselves weened they had been, but like a puff ring of Paris,<sup>365</sup> hollow, light, and counterfeit indeed.

363 intense, grievous 364 interpretation

365 puff. . . Paris: a finger ring made of plaster of Paris (hollow)

And yet, they being even such, this would I fain<sup>366</sup> ask one of them—and I pray you, Cousin, take you his person upon you, and in this case answer for him—what letteth<sup>367</sup> you, would I ask (for we will take no small man for an example in this part, nor him that had little to lose; for such one were, methink, so far from all frame<sup>368</sup> that would cast away God for a little that he were not worthy to talk with), what letteth, I say therefore, your lordship, that you be not gladly content, without any deliberation at all, in this kind of persecution, rather than to leave your faith, to let go all that ever you have at once?

VINCENT: Since you put it, Uncle, unto me, to make the matter the more plain, that I should play that great man's part that is so wealthy and hath so much to lose, albeit I cannot be very sure of another man's mind, nor what another man would say, yet as far as mine own mind can conjecture, I shall answer in his person what I ween would be his let.<sup>369</sup>

And therefore, to your question I answer that there letteth me the thing that yourself may lightly<sup>370</sup> guess: the losing of the manifold commodities which I now have, riches and substance, lands and great possessions of inheritance, with great rule and authority here in my country, all which things the great Turk granteth me to keep still in peace, and have them enhanced too, so that<sup>371</sup> I will forsake the faith of Christ; yea, I may say to you, I have a motion<sup>372</sup> secretly made me further, to keep all this yet better cheap:<sup>373</sup> that is to wit, not be compelled utterly to forsake Christ, nor all the whole Christian faith, but only some such parts thereof as may not stand with Muhammad's law; and only granting Muhammad for a true prophet, and serving the Turk truly in his wars against all Christian kings, I shall not be letted to praise Christ also, and to call him a good man, and worship him and serve him too.

ANTONY: Nay, nay, my lord, Christ hath not so great need of your lordship as rather than to lose your service, he would fall at such covenants with you to take your service at halves, to serve him and his enemy both; he hath given you plain warning already, by Saint Paul, that he will have in your service no parting fellow:<sup>374</sup> Quae societas luci ad tenebras, Christi ad Belial? (“What fellowship is there between light and darkness, between Christ and Belial?”)<sup>375</sup> And he hath also plainly showed you himself by his own mouth, Nemo potest duobus dominis servire (“No man may serve two lords at once”).<sup>376</sup> He will have you believe all that he telleth you, and do all that he biddeth you, and forbear all that he forbiddeth you, without any manner exception. Break one of his commandments and break all; forsake one point of his faith and forsake all, as for any thanks you get of him for the remnant.

And therefore if you devise as it were indentures<sup>377</sup> between God and you—what thing you will do for him and what thing you will not do, as though he should hold him content with such service of yours as yourself list to appoint<sup>378</sup> him—if you make, I say, such indentures, you shall seal both the parts yourself, and you get thereto none agreement of him.

And this I say though the Turk would make such an appointment<sup>379</sup> with you as you speak of, and would when he had made it keep it, whereas he would not, I warrant you, leave you so when he had once brought you so far-forth,<sup>380</sup> but would little and<sup>381</sup> little after, ere he left you, make you deny Christ altogether, and take Muhammad in his stead; and so doth he in the beginning, when he will not have you believe him to be God. For surely if he were not God, he were no good man neither, while he plainly said he was God.

But though he would never go so far-forth with you, yet Christ will (as I said) not take your service to halves, but will that you shall love him with all your whole heart. And because that<sup>382</sup> while he was living here fifteen hundred years ago, he foresaw this mind of yours that you have now, with which you would fain<sup>383</sup> serve him in some such fashion as you might keep your worldly substance<sup>384</sup> still, but rather forsake his service than put all your substance from you, he telleth you plain, fifteen hundred years ago, his<sup>385</sup> own mouth, that he will no such service of you, saying, Non potestis servire Deo et mammonae (“You cannot serve both God and your riches together”).<sup>386</sup>

conclusion, which you must needs grant if you have faith; and if you be gone from that ground of faith already, then is all our disputation, you wot well, at an end. For whereto<sup>388</sup> should you then rather lose 5 your goods than forsake your faith, if you have lost your faith and let it go already?

This point I say therefore put first for a ground between us both twain agreed: that you have yet the faith still, and intend to keep it always still in your 10 heart, and are but in doubt whether you will lose all your worldly substance rather than forsake your faith in your only word;<sup>389</sup> now shall I reply to the point of your answer, wherein you tell me the loath-ness of your loss, and the comfort of the keeping, 15 letteth you to forgo<sup>390</sup> them, and moveth you rather to forsake your faith.

I let pass all that I have spoken of the small commodity<sup>391</sup> of them unto your body, and of the great harm that the having of them do to your soul. And 20 since the promise of the Turk made unto you for the keeping of them is the thing that moveth you and maketh you thus to doubt, I ask you first whereby you wot that when you have done all that he will have you do against Christ to the harm of your soul, 25 whereby wot you, I say, that he will keep you his promise in these things that he promiseth you concerning the retaining of your well-beloved worldly wealth, for the pleasure of your body?

VINCENT: What surety can a man have of such 30 a great prince but his promise, which for his own honor it cannot become<sup>392</sup> him to break?

ANTONY: I have known him and his father afore him to break more promises than five as great as this is that he should make with you. Who shall come 35 and cast it in his teeth and tell him it is a shame for him to be so fickle and so false of his promise? And then what careth he for those words that he wotteth well he shall never hear? Not very much, although they were told him too. If you might come after and 40 complain your grief unto his own person yourself, you should find him as shamefast<sup>393</sup> as a friend of mine, a merchant, found once the Soldan<sup>394</sup> of Syria, to whom, being certain years about his merchandise in that country, he gave a great sum of money for a certain office meet<sup>395</sup> for him there for the while; 45 which he scant<sup>396</sup> had him granted and put in his hand but that, ere ever it was aught<sup>397</sup> worth unto him, the Soldan suddenly sold it to another of his own sect, and put our Hungarian out. Then came he to him and humbly put him in remembrance of 50 his grant passed<sup>398</sup> his own mouth and signed with his own hand, whereunto the Soldan answered him with a grim countenance, "I will thou wit it, losel,<sup>399</sup> that neither my mouth nor my hand shall be master over me, to bind all my body at their pleasure, 55 but I will so be lord and master over them both that whatsoever the one say or the other write, I will be at mine own liberty to do what me list<sup>400</sup> myself, and ask them both no leave.<sup>401</sup> And therefore go get thee hence out of my country, knave." 60

Ween you<sup>402</sup> now, my lord, that Soldan and this Turk being both of one false sect, you may not find them both like<sup>403</sup> false of their promise?

VINCENT: That must I needs jeopard,<sup>404</sup> for other surety can there none be had. 65

ANTONY: An unwise jeoparding to put your soul in peril of damnation for the keeping of your bodily pleasures, and yet without surety thereof must jeopard them too.

But yet go a little further, lo. Suppose me that you 70 might be very sure that the Turk would break no promise with you. Are you then sure enough to retain all your substance still?

VINCENT: Yea, then.

ANTONY: What if a man should ask you how long? 75

VINCENT: How long? As long as I live.

ANTONY: Well, let it be so, then. But yet as far as I can see, though the great Turk favor you never so much, and let you keep your goods as long as ever you live, yet if it hap that you be this day fifty years 80 old, all the favor he can show you cannot make you one day younger tomorrow, but every day shall you wax elder<sup>405</sup> than other, and then within a while must you for<sup>406</sup> all his favor lose all.

VINCENT: Well, a man would be glad for all that, to be sure not to lack while he liveth.

ANTONY: Well then, if the great Turk give you your goods, can there then in all your life none 5 other take them from you again?

VINCENT: Verily, I suppose no.

ANTONY: May he not lose this country again unto Christian men, and you, with the taking of this way, fall in the same peril then that you would now 10 eschew?<sup>407</sup>

VINCENT: Forsooth, I think that if he get it once, he will never lose it again in our days.

ANTONY: Yes, by God's grace, but yet if he lose it after your days, there goeth your children's inheritance away again. But be it now that he could never 15 lose it — could none take your substance from you then?

VINCENT: No, in good faith, none.

ANTONY: No? None at all? Not God?

20 VINCENT: God? What yes, pardie,<sup>408</sup> who doubteth of that?

ANTONY: Who? Marry, he that doubteth whether there be any God or no. And that there lacketh not some such, the prophet testifieth, where he saith, 25 Dixit insipiens in corde suo non est Deus ("The fool hath said in his heart there is no God").<sup>409</sup> With the mouth the most foolish will forbear to say it unto other folk, but in the heart they let<sup>410</sup> not to say it softly to themselves. And I fear me there be many 30 more such fools than every man would ween there were, and would not let to say it openly too, if they forbore it not more for dread or shame of men than for any fear of God. But now those that are so frantic foolish as to ween there were no God, and yet 35 in their words confess him, though that,<sup>411</sup> as Saint Paul saith, in their deeds they deny him,<sup>412</sup> we shall let them pass till it please God show himself unto them, either inwardly betime<sup>413</sup> by his merciful grace, or else outwardly, but overlate for them, by his terrible judgment.

40 But unto you, my lord, since you believe and confess (like as a wise man should) that though the Turk keep you promise<sup>414</sup> in letting you keep your substance because you do him pleasure in the forsaking of your faith, yet God, whose faith you forsake, and therein do him displeasure, may so take 45 them from you that the great Turk with all the power that he hath is not able to keep you them, why will you be so unwise with the loss of your soul to please the great Turk for your goods, while you
50 wot well that God, whom you displease therewith, may take them from you too?

Besides this, since you believe there is a God, you cannot but believe therewith that the great Turk cannot take your goods from you without his will or 55 sufferance,<sup>415</sup> no more than the devil could from Job. And think you then that if he will suffer the Turk take away your goods albeit that<sup>416</sup> by the keeping and confessing of his faith you please him, he will, when you displease him by forsaking his faith, suffer<sup>417</sup> you of those goods that you get or keep thereby to rejoice or enjoy any benefit in?

VINCENT: God is gracious, and though that<sup>418</sup> men offend him, yet he suffereth them many times to live in prosperity long after.

ANTONY: Long after? Nay, by my troth, my lord, that doth he no man — for how can that be that he should suffer you live in prosperity long after, when your whole life is but short in altogether,<sup>419</sup> and either almost half thereof or more than half (you 70 think yourself, I dare say) spent out already before? Can you burn out half a short candle, and then have a long one left of the remnant? There cannot be in this world a worse mind than that a man to delight and take comfort in any commodity<sup>420</sup> that 75 he taketh by sinful means. For it is the very straight way toward the taking of boldness and courage in sin, and finally to fall into infidelity, and think that God careth not, nor regardeth not what things men do here, nor what mind we be of. But unto such-minded folk speaketh Holy Scripture in this wise:
80 Noli dicere, "Peccavi, et nihil mihi accidit triste," patiens enim redditor est Dominus ("Say not, 'I have sinned, and yet there hath happed me no harm,<sup>421</sup> for God suffereth before he strike<sup>422</sup>);<sup>421</sup> but as Saint Augustine saith, the longer that he tarrieth ere he strike, the sorer<sup>422</sup> is the stroke when he striketh.<sup>423</sup>

5 And therefore if ye will well do, reckon yourself very sure that when you deadly displeas God for the getting or the keeping of your goods, God shall not suffer those goods to do you good, but either shall he take them shortly from you, or suffer<sup>424</sup> you to keep them for a little while to your more harm, and after shall he, when you least look therefor, take you away from them. And then what a heap of heaviness<sup>425</sup> will there enter into your heart, when you shall see that you shall so suddenly go from your goods, and leave them here in the earth in one place, and that your body shall be put in the earth in another place, and (which then shall be most heaviness of all) when you shall fear (and not without great cause) that your soul shall first forthwith,<sup>426</sup> and after that at the final judgment your body too, be driven down deep toward the center of the earth into the very pit and dungeon of the devil of hell, there to tarry in torment world without end. What goods of the world can any man imagine, whereof the pleasure and commodity could be such in a thousand years as were able to recompense that intolerable pain that there is to be suffered in one year, yea or one day, or one hour either? And then what a madness it is, for the poor pleasure of your worldly goods of so few years, to cast yourself both body and soul into the everlasting fire of hell, whereof there is not diminished the mountenance<sup>427</sup> of a moment by the lying there the space of a hundred thousand years.

35 And therefore our Savior in few words concluded and confuted<sup>428</sup> all those follies of them that, for the short use of this worldly substance, forsake him and his faith and sell their souls unto the devil forever, where he saith, *Quid prodest homini si univ-
40 sum mundum lucretur, animae vero suae detrimentum patiatur?* (“What availeth it a man if he won all the whole world and lost his soul?”)<sup>429</sup> This were methinketh cause and occasion enough to him that had never so much part of this world in his hand to be content rather to lose it all than, for the retaining or increasing of his worldly goods, to lose and destroy his soul.

VINCENT: This is, good Uncle, in good faith very true. And what other thing any of them that would not for this be content have for to allege in reason 50 for the defense of their folly, that can I not imagine, nor list<sup>430</sup> in this matter to play their part no longer, but I pray God give me the grace to play the contrary part indeed, and that I never, for any goods or substance<sup>431</sup> of this wretched world, forsake my faith toward God, neither in heart nor tongue, as I trust in his great goodness I never shall. 55

THE FIFTEENTH CHAPTER

This kind of tribulation trieth what mind men have to their goods, which they that are wise will, at the fame<sup>432</sup> thereof, see well and wisely laid up safe before 60

ANTONY: Methinketh, Cousin, that this persecution shall not only, as I said before, try men’s hearts when it cometh, and make them know their own affections, whether they have a corrupt greedy covetous mind or not, but also the very fame and expectation thereof may teach them this lesson ere ever the thing fall upon them itself, to their no little fruit,<sup>433</sup> if they have the wit and the grace to take it in time while they may; for now may they find sure places to lay their treasure in, so that all the Turk’s army shall never find it out. 65 70

VINCENT: Marry, Uncle, that way they will, I warrant you, not forget, as near as their wits will serve them. But yet have I known some that have ere this thought that they had hid their money safe and sure enough, digging it full deep in the ground, and have missed it yet when they came again, and have found it digged out and carried away to their hands.<sup>434</sup> 80

ANTONY: Nay, “from their hands,” I ween<sup>435</sup> you would say. And it was no marvel, for some such have I known too; but they have hid their goods foolishly, in such place as they were well warned before that they should not. And that were they warned by him that they well knew for such one as wist<sup>436</sup> well enough what would come thereon.

5 VINCENT: Then were they more than mad. But did he tell them too where they should have hid it to have it sure?

10 ANTONY: Yea, by Saint Mary, did he, for else had he told them but half a tale; but he told them a whole tale, bidding them that they should in no wise hide their treasure in the ground; and he showed them a good cause, for there, thieves use<sup>437</sup> to dig it out and steal it away.

15 VINCENT: Why, where should they hide it then, said he? For thieves may hap to find it out in any place.

20 ANTONY: Forsooth,<sup>438</sup> he counseled them to hide their treasure in heaven, and there lay it up, for there it shall lie safe; for thither, he said, there can no thief come till he have left his theft<sup>439</sup> and be waxen<sup>440</sup> a true man first. And he that gave this counsel wist what he said well enough, for it was our Savior himself, which in the sixth chapter of Saint Matthew saith, Nolite thesaurizare vobis thesauros in terra, ubi erugo et tinea demolitur, et ubi fures effodiunt et furantur. Thesaurizate vobis thesauros in caelo, ubi neque erugo neque tinea demolitur, et ubi fures non effodiunt nec furantur. Ubi enim est thesaurus tuus, ibi est et cor tuum (“Hoard not up your treasures in earth, where the rust and the moth fret it out,<sup>441</sup> and where thieves dig it out and steal it away. But hoard up your treasures in heaven, where neither the rust and the moth fret them out, and where thieves dig them not out and steal them away; for whereas<sup>442</sup> is thy treasure, there is thine heart too”).<sup>443</sup>

35 If we would well consider these words of our Savior Christ, we should, as methink, need no more counsel at all, nor no more comfort neither, concerning the loss of our temporal substance<sup>444</sup> in this Turk’s persecution for the faith. For here our Lord 40 in these words teacheth us where we may lay up our substance safe before the persecution come.

If we put it into the poor men’s bosoms, there shall it lie safe. For who would go search a beggar’s bag for money? If we deliver it to the poor for Christ’s sake, we deliver it unto Christ himself. And then what persecutor can there be so strong as to take it out of his hand? 45

VINCENT: These things are, Uncle, undoubtedly so true that no man may with words wrestle therewith; but yet ever there hangeth in a man’s heart a loathness<sup>445</sup> to lack a living. 50

ANTONY: There doth indeed, in theirs that either never or but seldom hear any good counsel thereagainst, and when they hear it, hearken it but as though they would an idle tale, rather for a pastime, or for the manner sake,<sup>446</sup> than for any substantial intent and purpose to follow good advertisement<sup>447</sup> and take any fruit thereby. But verily, if we would not only lay our ear, but also our heart thereto, and consider that the saying of our Savior Christ is not a poet’s fable, nor a harper’s song, but the very holy word of almighty God himself, we would, and well we might, be full sore<sup>448</sup> ashamed in ourselves, and full sorry too, when we felt in our affection those words to have in our hearts no more strength and weight but that we remain still of the same dull mind as we did before we heard them. 60 65

This manner of ours, in whose breasts the great good counsel of God no better settleth, nor taketh no better root, may well declare<sup>449</sup> us that the thorns and the briers and the brambles of our worldly substance grow so thick and spring up so high in the ground of our hearts that they strangle, as the Gospel saith, the word of God that was sown therein.<sup>450</sup> And therefore is God very good lord unto us when he causeth, like a good husbandman, his folk come on field (for the persecutors be his folk to this purpose) and with their hooks and their stocking irons<sup>451</sup> grub up<sup>452</sup> these wicked weeds and bushes of our earthly substance, and carry them quite away from us, that the word of God sown in our hearts may have room therein, and a glade round about for the warm sun of grace to come to it and make it grow; for surely those words of our Savior shall we find full 80

true: Ubi thesaurus tuus ibi est et cor tuum (“Whereas thy treasure is, there is also thine heart”);<sup>453</sup> if we lay up our treasures in earth, in earth shall be our hearts; if we send our treasure into heaven, in heaven shall

5 we have our hearts. And surely the greatest comfort that any man may have in his tribulation is to have his heart in heaven.

If thine heart were indeed out of this world and in heaven, all the kinds of torment that all the world could devise could put thee to no pain here; let us then send our hearts hence thither, in such manner as we may, by sending thither our worldly substance hence. And let us never doubt it but we shall (that once done) find our hearts so conversant in

10 heaven, with the glad consideration of our following the gracious counsel of Christ, that the comfort of his Holy Spirit, inspired<sup>454</sup> us therefor, shall mitigate, diminish, assuage, and in a manner quench the great furious fervor of the pain that we shall happen

15 to have, by his loving sufferance,<sup>455</sup> for our further merit in our tribulation.

And therefore, like<sup>456</sup> as if we saw that we should be within a while driven out of this land and fain<sup>457</sup> to flee into another, we would ween that man were mad which would not be content to forbear<sup>458</sup> his goods here for the while, and send them into that land before him where he saw he should live all the remnant of his life, so may we verily think ourselves much more mad (seeing that we be sure it cannot 20 be long ere we shall be sent, spite of our teeth,<sup>459</sup> out of this world) if the fear of a little lack, or the love to see our goods here about us, and the loathness to part from them for this little while which we may keep them here, shall be able to let<sup>460</sup> us from the sure sending them before us into the other world,

25 in which we may be sure to live wealthily with them if we send them thither, or else shortly leave them here behind us, and then stand in great jeopardy there to live wretches forever.

40 VINCENT: In good faith, good Uncle, methinketh that concerning the loss of these outward things, these considerations are so sufficient comforts that for mine own part, save<sup>461</sup> only grace well to remember them, I would methink desire no more.

THE SIXTEENTH CHAPTER
Another comfort, and courage against the loss of worldly substance

45

ANTONY: Much less than this may serve, Cousin, with calling and trusting upon God’s help, without which, much more than this cannot serve. But the fervor of the Christian faith so sore fainteth nowadays and decayeth, coming from hot unto lukewarm, and from lukewarm almost to key-cold,<sup>462</sup> that men must now be fain, as at a fire that is almost out, to lay many dry sticks thereto, and use much 55 blowing thereat; but else<sup>463</sup> would I ween, by my troth, that unto a warm<sup>464</sup> faithful man, one thing alone, whereof we spoke yet no word, were comfort enough in this kind of persecution against the loss of all his goods.

VINCENT: What thing may that be, Uncle?

ANTONY: In good faith, Cousin, even the bare remembrance of the poverty that our Savior willingly suffered for us; for I verily suppose that if there were a great king that had so tender a love to a servant of his that he had, to help him out of danger, forsaken and left off all his worldly wealth and royalty, and become poor and needy for his sake, that servant could scant<sup>465</sup> be founden that were of such an unkind villain courage<sup>466</sup> that, if himself came after to some substance,<sup>467</sup> would not with better will lose it all again than shamefully to forsake such a master.

And therefore, as I say, I do surely suppose that if we would well remember and inwardly consider the great goodness of our Savior toward us, not yet being his poor sinful servants, but rather his adversaries and his enemies, and what wealth of this world that he willingly forsook for our sake, being indeed universal king thereof, and so having the power in his own hand to have used it if he had would<sup>468</sup>—

70 instead whereof, to make us rich in heaven, he lived here in neediness and poverty all his life, and neither would have authority nor keep neither lands nor goods—the deep consideration and earnest advisement<sup>469</sup> of this one point alone were able to make

75 any kind<sup>470</sup> Christian man or woman well content rather for his sake again<sup>471</sup> to give up all that ever

God hath lent them (and lent them hath he all that ever they have) than unkindly<sup>472</sup> and unfaithfully to forsake him. And him they forsake, if that for fear they forsake the confessing of his Christian faith.

5 And therefore to finish this piece withal,<sup>473</sup> concerning the dread of losing our outward worldly goods, let us consider the slender commodity<sup>474</sup> that they bring; with what labor they be bought; how little while they abide with whomsoever they
10 abide longest; what pain their pleasure is mingled withal; what harm the love of them doth unto the soul; what loss is in the keeping, Christ's faith refused for them; what winning in the loss, if we lose them for God's sake; how much more profitable
15 they be well given than evil kept; and finally what unkindness it were if we would not rather forsake them for Christ's sake than unfaithfully forsake Christ for them, which<sup>475</sup> while he lived for our sake forsook all the world, besides the suffering of 20 shameful and painful death, whereof we shall speak after. If we these things, I say, will consider well, and will pray God with his holy hand to print them in our hearts, and will abide and dwell still in the hope of his help, his truth shall, as the prophet saith, so
25 compass us about with a pavise<sup>476</sup> that we shall not need to be afeard ab incurso et daemonio meridiano ("of this incursion of this midday devil"),<sup>477</sup> this open plain persecution of the Turk, for any loss that we can take by the bereaving from us of our 30 wretched worldly goods, for whose short and small pleasure in this life forborne, we shall be with heavenly substance everlastingly recompensed of God in joyful bliss and glory.

THE SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER

35 Of bodily pain, and that a man hath no cause to take discomfort in persecution, though he feel himself in a horror at the thinking upon bodily pain

VINCENT: Forsooth, Uncle, as for these outward goods, you have so far-forth<sup>478</sup> said that albeit<sup>479</sup> 40 no man can be sure what strength he shall have or how faint and how feeble he may hap to find himself when he shall come to the point, and therefore I can make no warrantise<sup>480</sup> of myself seeing that Saint Peter so suddenly fainted at a woman's word and so cowardly forsook his Master for whom he 45 had so boldly fought within so few hours before, and by that fall in forsaking, well perceived that he had been too rash in his promise and was well worthy to take a fall for putting so full trust in himself. Yet, in good faith, methinketh now (and God shall,

50 I trust, help me to keep this thought still) that if the Turk should take all that I have unto my very shirt, except I would forsake my faith, and offer it me all again with five times as much thereto to fall into his sect, I would not once stick<sup>481</sup> thereat rather to for-
55 sake it every whit than of Christ's holy faith to forsake any point. But surely, good Uncle, when I be think me further on the grief and the pain that may turn unto my flesh, here find I the fear that forceth mine heart to tremble. 60

ANTONY: Neither have I cause thereof to marvel, nor you, Cousin, cause to be dismayed therefor. The great horror and the fear that our Savior had in his own flesh against<sup>482</sup> his painful Passion maketh me little to marvel, and may well make you take that 65 comfort too, that for no such manner of grudging<sup>483</sup> felt in our sensual parts, the flesh shrinking at the meditation of pain and death, your reason shall give over, but resist it and manly master it, and though you would fain<sup>484</sup> flee from the painful death, and
70 be loath to come thereto, yet may the meditation of his great grievous agony move you — and himself shall, if you so desire him, not fail to work with you therein, and get and give you the grace — that you shall submit and conform your will therein unto
75 his, as he did his unto his Father, and shall thereupon be so comforted with the secret inward inspiration of his Holy Spirit, as he was with the personal presence of that angel that after his agony came and comforted him,<sup>485</sup> that you shall as his true disciple
80 follow him, and with good will without grudge do as he did, and take your cross of pain and passion upon your back, and die for the truth with him, and thereby reign with him crowned in eternal glory. And this I say to give you warning of the thing that
85 is truth, to the intent when a man feeleth such a horror of death in his heart, he should not thereby stand in outrageous fear that he were falling, for many a such man standeth for<sup>486</sup> all that fear full fast,<sup>487</sup> and finally better abideth the brunt,<sup>488</sup> when God is so 90

472 unnaturally 473 with 474 benefit, advantage 475 who 476 large shield 477 Ps 90(91):6 478 far 479 although 480 assurance 481 hesitate 482 in anticipation of 483 protest 484 gladly 485 See Lk 22:43. 486 despite 487 firm, steadfast 488 abideth the brunt: withstands the attack

good unto him as to bring him thereto and encourage him therein, than doth some other that in the beginning feeleth no fear at all. And yet may it be, and most often so it is, for God, having many mansions, and all wonderful wealthful in his Father's house,<sup>489</sup> exalteth not every good man up to the glory of a martyr, but foreseeing their infirmity—that though they be of good will before, and peradventure of right good courage too, would yet play Saint Peter if they were brought to the point, and thereby bring their souls into the peril of eternal damnation—he provideth otherwise for them before they come thereat, and either findeth a way that men shall not have the mind to lay any hands upon them (as he found for his disciples when himself was willingly taken),<sup>490</sup> or that if they set hands on them, they shall have no power to hold them (as he found for Saint John the Evangelist, which let his sheet fall from him; whereupon they caught hold, and so fled himself naked away and escaped from them),<sup>491</sup> or though they hold him and bring him to prison too, yet God sometimes delivereth them thence, as he did Saint Peter.<sup>492</sup> And sometimes he taketh them to him out of the prison into heaven, and suffereth<sup>493</sup> them not to come to their torment at all, as he hath done by many a good holy man. And some he suffereth to be brought into the torments, and yet suffereth them not to die therein, but live many years after and die their natural death (as he did by Saint John the Evangelist, and by many another more, as we may well see both by sundry stories and in the epistles of Saint Cyprian also).

And therefore, which way God will take with us, we cannot tell. But surely if we be true Christian men, this can we well tell: that without any bold warrantise<sup>494</sup> of ourselves, or foolish trust in our own strength, we be bound upon pain of damnation that we be not of the contrary mind, but that we will with his help, how loath soever we feel our flesh thereto, rather yet than forsake him or his faith afore the world (which if we do, he hath promised to forsake us afore his Father and all his holy company of heaven),<sup>495</sup> rather, I say, than we would so do, we would with his help endure and sustain for his sake all the tormentry that the devil with all his faithless tormentors in this world would devise. And then when we be of this mind, and submit our will unto his, and call and pray for his grace, we can tell well enough that he will never suffer them to put more upon us than his grace will make us able to bear, but will also with their temptation provide for us a sure way. For fidelis est Deus, saith Saint Paul, qui non patitur vos tentari supra id quod potestis sed dat etiam cum tentatione proventum ut possitis ferre (“God is,” saith the Apostle, “faithful, which suffereth you not to be tempted above that<sup>496</sup> you may bear, but giveth also with the temptation a way out”).<sup>497</sup> For either, as I said, he will keep us out of their hands (though he before suffered us to be feared with<sup>498</sup> them to prove our faith withal)<sup>499</sup> that we may have by the examination of our own mind some comfort in hope of his grace, and some fear of our own frailty, to drive us to call for grace, or else if we fall in their hands, so that we fall not from the trust of him, nor cease to call for his help, his truth shall, as the prophet saith, so compass us about with a pavise<sup>500</sup> that we shall not need to fear this incursion of this midday devil; for either shall these Turks, his tormentors that shall enter this land and persecute us, either they shall, I say, not have the power to touch our bodies at all, or else the short pain that they shall put unto our bodies shall turn us to eternal profit, both in our souls and in our bodies too.

And therefore, Cousin, to begin with, let us be of good comfort. For since we be by our faith very sure that Holy Scripture is the very word of God, and that the word of God cannot be but true, and that we see that, both by the mouth of his holy prophet and by the mouth of his blessed apostle also, God hath made us so faithful promises—both that he will not suffer us to be tempted above our power, but will both provide a way out for us, and that he will also round about so compass us with his pavise, and defend us, that we shall have no cause to fear this midday devil with all his persecution—we cannot now but be very sure (except we be very shamefully cowardous of heart, and toward God in faith out of measure faint,<sup>501</sup> and in love less than lukewarm, or waxen even key-cold),<sup>502</sup> we may be very sure, I say, that either God shall not suffer the Turks to invade this land, or if they do, God shall provide such resistance that they shall not prevail. Or if they prevail, yet, if we take the way that I have told you,

 12:6–10. <sup>493</sup> permits <sup>494</sup> assurance

 with: frightened by <sup>499</sup> thereby

 exceedingly <sup>502</sup> waxen even key-cold:
 become ice-cold

we shall by their persecution take little harm, or rather none harm at all, but that that<sup>503</sup> shall seem harm shall indeed be to us none harm at all, but good. For if God make us and keep us good men, 5 as he hath promised to do if we pray well therefor, then, saith Holy Scripture, Bonis omnia cooperantur in bonum (“Unto good folk, all things turn them to good”),<sup>504</sup>

And therefore, Cousin, since that God knoweth
 10 what shall happen and not we, let us in the meanwhile, with a good hope in the help of God’s grace, have a good purpose with us of sure standing by his holy faith against all persecutions. From which if we should (which our Lord forbid) hereafter either for fear or pain, for lack of his grace lost in 15 our own default,<sup>505</sup> mishap to decline,<sup>506</sup> yet had we both won the well-spent time in this good purpose before, to the diminishment of our pain, and were also much the more likely that God should lift us
 20 up after our fall, and give us his grace again; howbeit, if this persecution come, we be, by this meditation and well-continued intent and purpose before, the better strengthened and confirmed, and much the more likely for to stand indeed. And if it so fortune (as with God’s grace at men’s good prayers and 25 amendment of our evil lives, it may fortune full well) that the Turks shall either be well withstood and vanquished, or peradventure not invade us at all, then shall we, pardie,<sup>507</sup> by this good purpose get ourselves of God a very good cheap thanks.

And on the other side, while we now think thereon (as not to think thereon in so great likelihood thereof, I ween no wise man can), if we should for the fear of worldly loss, or bodily pain framed 35 in our own minds, think that we would give over, and to save our goods and our lives, forsake our Savior by denial of his faith, then whether the Turks come or come not, we be gone from God the while. And then if they come not indeed, or come and be 40 driven to flight, what a shame should this be to us before the face of God, in so shameful cowardous wise<sup>508</sup> to forsake him for fear of that pain that we never felt, nor never was falling toward us.

VINCENT: By my troth, Uncle, I thank you; methinketh that though you never said more in the matter, yet have you even with this that you have of the fear of bodily pain in this persecution spoken here already marvelously comforted mine heart.

ANTONY: I am glad, Cousin, if your heart have taken comfort thereby. But and if<sup>509</sup> you so have,
 50 give God the thanks and not me, for that work is his and not mine; for neither am I able any good thing to say but by him, nor all the good words in the world — no, not the holy words of God himself, and spoken also with his own holy mouth — can be 55 able to profit the man with the sound entering at his ear but if<sup>510</sup> the Spirit of God therewith inwardly work in his soul; but that is his goodness ever ready to do, except the let<sup>511</sup> be through the untowardness<sup>512</sup> of our own froward<sup>513</sup> will.

THE EIGHTEENTH CHAPTER

Of comfort against bodily pain, and first against captivity

ANTONY: And therefore, now being somewhat in comfort and courage before, whereby we may the 65 more quietly consider everything — which is somewhat more hard and difficile<sup>514</sup> to do when the heart is before taken up and oppressed with the troublous affection of heavy<sup>515</sup> sorrowful fear — let us examine the weight and the substance of those bodily 70 pains as the sorest<sup>516</sup> part of this persecution which you rehearsed before, which were, if I remember you right, thralldom,<sup>517</sup> imprisonment, painful and shameful death. And first let us (as reason is)<sup>518</sup> begin with the thralldom, for that was, as I remember, 75 the first.

VINCENT: I pray you, good Uncle, say then somewhat thereof; for methinketh, Uncle, that captivity is a marvelous heavy thing, namely<sup>519</sup> when they shall (as they most commonly do) carry us far from 80 home into a strange uncouth<sup>520</sup> land.

ANTONY: I cannot say nay but that grief it is, Cousin, indeed, but yet as unto me not half so much as it would be if they could carry me out into any such unknown country that God could not wit<sup>521</sup> 85

503 that that: that which 504 Rom 8:28

 520 unfamiliar 521 know where, nor find the means to come at me. But in good faith, Cousin, now if my transmigration into a strange country should be any great grief unto me, the fault should be much in myself; for since I am 5 very sure that whithersoever men convey me, God is no more verily here than he shall be there, if I get (as I may if I will) the grace to set my whole heart upon him and long for nothing but him, it can then make

 10 me no great matter to my mind whether they carry me hence or leave me here. And then if I find my mind much offended therewith that I am not still in mine own country, I must consider that the cause of my grief is mine own wrong imagination, whereby I beguile myself with an untrue persuasion, weening 15 that this were mine own country, whereas of truth it is not so. For as Saint Paul saith, Non habemus hic civitatem manentem sed futuram inquirimus (“We have here no city, nor dwelling country at all, but we seek for one that we shall come to”).<sup>522</sup> And in what 20 country soever we walk in this world, we be but as pilgrims and wayfaring men. And if I should take any country for mine own, it must be the country to which I come, and not the country from which I came.

25 That country that shall be to me then for a while so strange, shall yet, pardie,<sup>523</sup> be no more strange to me, nor longer strange to me neither, than was mine own native country when I came first into it. And therefore if that point, of my being far from 30 hence,<sup>524</sup> be very grievous to me, and that I find it a great pain that I am not where I would<sup>525</sup> be, that grief shall great part grow for<sup>526</sup> lack of sure setting and settling my mind in God, where it should be; which fault of mine, when I mend, I shall soon ease 35 my grief.

Now as for all other griefs and pains that are in captivity, thralldom, and bondage, I cannot deny but many there are and great. Howbeit, they seem yet somewhat (what say I somewhat? I may say a 40 great deal) the more because we take our former liberty for more a great deal than indeed it was. Let us therefore consider the matter thus.

45 Captivity, bondage, or thralldom: what is it but the violent restraint of a man being so subdued under the dominion, rule, and power of another that he must do what the other list<sup>527</sup> to command him, and may not do at his liberty such things as he list himself?

Now when we shall be carried away with a Turk, and be fain<sup>528</sup> to be occupied about such things as he list to set us, here shall we lament the loss of 50 our liberty, and think we bear a heavy burden of our servile condition. And so to do we shall have, I grant well, many times great occasion. But yet should we, I suppose, set thereby<sup>529</sup> somewhat the less if we would remember well what liberty that 55 was that we lost, and take it for no larger than it was indeed. For we reckon as though we might before do what we would. But therein we deceive ourselves, for what free man is there so free that can be 60 suffered<sup>530</sup> to do what him list? In many things God hath restrained us by his high commandment — so many that of those things which else we would do, I ween it be more than the half; howbeit, because (God forgive us) we let<sup>531</sup> so little therefor, but do 65 what we list as though we heard him not, we reckon our liberty never the less for that.

But then is our liberty much restrained by the laws made by men, for the quiet and politic governance of the people. And these would, I ween, let<sup>532</sup> 70 our liberty but a little neither, were it not for fear of the pains that fall thereupon.

Look then whether other men that have authority over us command us never no business which we dare not but do, and therefore do it full oft full 75 sore<sup>533</sup> against our wills, of which things some service is sometimes so painful, and so perilous too, that no lord can lightly<sup>534</sup> command his bondman worse, nor seldom doth command him half so sore.

Let every free man that reckoneth his liberty to stand in doing what he list<sup>535</sup> consider well these points, and I ween he shall then find his liberty much less than he took it for before. And yet have I left untouched the bondage that almost every man
 80 is in that boasteth himself for free — the bondage, I mean, of sin, which to be a very bondage I shall have our Savior himself to bear me good record, for he saith, Qui facit peccatum servus est peccati (“He that committeth sin is the thrall or bondman of sin”).<sup>536</sup> 85 And then if this be thus (as it must needs be so, since God saith it is so), who is there then that may make so much boast of his liberty that he should take it for so sore a thing and so strange, to become through chance of war bond<sup>537</sup> unto a man, while he is already through sin become willingly thrall<sup>538</sup> and bond unto the devil?

5 Let us look well how many things and of what vile wretched sort the devil driveth us to do daily, through the rash braids<sup>539</sup> of our blind affections, which we be, for our faultful<sup>540</sup> lack of grace, fain<sup>541</sup> to follow, and are too feeble to refrain,<sup>542</sup> and then shall we find in our natural freedom our bondservice such that never was there any man lord of any so vile a villain that ever would for very shame command him so shameful service. And let us in the doing of our service to the man that we be slave unto remember what we were wont<sup>543</sup> to do about the same time of the day while we were at our free liberty before, and were well likely if we were at liberty to do the like again, and we shall peradventure perceive that it were better for us to do this business than that.

20 Now shall we have great occasion of comfort, if we consider that our servitude, though in the count<sup>544</sup> of the world it seem to come by chance of war, cometh yet in very deed unto us by the provident hand of God, and that for our great good, if we will take it well, both in remission of sins and also matter of our merit.

The greatest grief that is in bondage or captivity is this, as I trow, that we be forced to do such labor as with our good will we would not. But then against that grief Seneca teacheth us a good remedy: Semper da operam ne quid invitus facias (“Endeavor thyself evermore that thou do nothing against thy will”).<sup>545</sup> But that thing that we see we shall needs do, let us use<sup>546</sup> always to put our good will thereto.

35 VINCENT: That is, Uncle, soon said, but it is hard to do.

ANTONY: Our froward<sup>547</sup> mind maketh every good thing hard, and that to our own more hurt and harm. But in this case if we will be good Christian men, we shall have great cause gladly to be content for<sup>548</sup> the great comfort that we may take thereby, while we remember that in the patient and glad doing of our service unto that man for God’s sake — according to his high commandment by the mouth of Saint Paul, Servi oboedite dominis<sup>549</sup> — we shall have our thanks and our reward of God. 45

Finally, if we remember the great humble meekness of our Savior Christ himself — that he, being very almighty God, humiliavit semet ipsum formam servi accipiens (“humbled himself and took the form of a bondman or slave”),<sup>550</sup> rather than his Father should forsake us — we may think ourselves very unkind caitiffs<sup>551</sup> and very frantic fools too, if rather than to endure this worldly bondage for a while, we would forsake him that hath by his own death delivered us out of everlasting bondage of the devil, and will for our short bondage give us everlasting liberty. 55

VINCENT: Well fare you, good Uncle, this is very well said; albeit that<sup>552</sup> bondage is a condition that every man of any courage<sup>553</sup> would be glad to eschew<sup>554</sup> and very loath to fall in, yet have you well made it open<sup>555</sup> that it is a thing neither so strange nor so sore<sup>556</sup> as it before seemed unto me, and specially far from such as any man that any wit hath should for fear thereof shrink from the confession of his faith. And now therefore I pray you somewhat speak of your prisonment.<sup>557</sup> 60 65

Of imprisonment and comfort thereagainst 70

ANTONY: That shall I, Cousin, with good will. And first if we would consider what thing imprisonment is of his own nature, we should not methinketh have so great horror thereof; for of itself it is, pardie,<sup>558</sup> but a restraint of liberty which letteth<sup>559</sup> a man from going whither he would. 75

VINCENT: Yes, by Saint Mary, Uncle, methinketh it is much more sorrow than so; for besides the let<sup>560</sup> and restraint of liberty, it hath many more displeasures, and very sore griefs, knit and joined thereto. 80

ANTONY: That is, Cousin, very true indeed, and those pains, among many sorer<sup>561</sup> than those,

view of imprisonment 558 certainly 559 prevents, hinders 560 obstruction
561 worse, more grievous

thought I not after to forget. Howbeit, I purpose now to consider first imprisonment, but as imprisonment only, without any other incommodity<sup>562</sup> besides. For a man may be, pardie, imprisoned, and yet not set in the stocks nor collared fast by the neck; and a man may be let walk at large where he will, and yet a pair of fetters fast riveted on his legs; for in this country, ye wot well, and in Seville and Portugal too, so go all the slaves.

Howbeit, because that for such things men's hearts hath such horror thereof, albeit that I am not so mad as to go about to prove that bodily pain were no pain, yet since that because of these manner of pains, we so specially abhor the state and condition of prisoners, we should methinketh well perceive that a great part of our horror groweth of our own fantasy if we would call to mind and consider the state and condition of many other folk in whose state and condition we would wish ourselves to stand, taking them for no prisoners at all that<sup>563</sup> stand yet for all that in much part of the selfsame points that we abhor imprisonment for. Let us therefore consider these things in order.

And first as I thought to begin, because those other kinds of griefs that come with imprisonment are but accidents<sup>564</sup> thereunto—and yet neither such kinds of accidents as either be proper<sup>565</sup> thereunto, but that they may, almost all, fall unto a man without it, nor are not such accidents thereunto as are inseparable therefrom, but that imprisonment may fall to a man and none of all them therewith—we will, I say, therefore begin with the considering what manner pain or incommodity we should reckon imprisonment to be of himself and of his own nature alone. And then, in the course of our communication,<sup>566</sup> you shall as you list<sup>567</sup> increase and aggrieve<sup>568</sup> the cause of your horror with the terror of those painful accidents.

VINCENT: I am sorry that I did interrupt your tale. For you were about, I see well, to take an orderly way therein. And as yourself have devised, so I beseech you proceed; for though I reckon imprisonment much the sorer thing by sore and hard handling<sup>569</sup> therein, yet reckon I not the prisonment of itself any less than a thing very tedious, all were it<sup>570</sup> used in the most favorable manner that it possibly might; for, Uncle, if it were a great prince that were taken prisoner upon the field and in the hand of a Christian king, which use<sup>571</sup> in such case (for the consideration of their former estate, and mutable chance of the war) to show much humanity to them and in very favorable wise<sup>572</sup> entreat them—for these infidel emperors handle oftentimes the princes that they take more villainously than they do the poorest men, as the great Tamburlaine kept the great Turk, when he had taken him, to tread on his back always while he leapt on horseback—but as I began to say by the example of a prince taken prisoner, were the imprisonment never so favorable, yet were it in my mind no little grief in itself for a man to be penned up, though not in a narrow chamber, but although his walk were right large and right fair gardens too therein, it could not but grieve his heart to be restrained by another man within certain limits and bounds, and lose the liberty to be where him list.

ANTONY: This is, Cousin, well considered of you, for in this you perceive well that imprisonment is of himself, and his own very nature alone, nothing else but the retaining of a man's person within the circuit of a certain space, narrower or larger as shall be limited unto him, restraining his liberty from the further going into any other place.

VINCENT: Very well said, as methinketh.

ANTONY: Yet forgot I, Cousin, to ask you one question.

VINCENT: What is that, Uncle?

ANTONY: This, lo: if there be two men kept in two several<sup>573</sup> chambers of one great castle, of which two chambers the one is much more larger than the other, whether be they prisoners both, or but the one that hath the less room to walk in?

VINCENT: What question is it, Uncle, but that they be prisoners both, as I said myself before, although<sup>574</sup> the one lay fast<sup>575</sup> locked in the stocks, and the other had all the whole castle to walk in?

574 even if 575 securely

ANTONY: Methinketh verily, Cousin, that you say the truth. And then if imprisonment be such a thing as yourself here agree it is — that is to wit, but a lack of liberty to go if we list — now would I fain 5 wit<sup>576</sup> of you what any one man you know that is at this day out of prison.

VINCENT: What one man, Uncle? Marry, I know almost none other, for surely prisoner am I none acquainted with, that I remember.

10 ANTONY: Then I see well you visit poor prisoners seldom.

VINCENT: No, by my troth,<sup>577</sup> Uncle, I cry God mercy. I send them sometimes mine alms, but by my troth I love not to come myself where I should 15 see such misery.

ANTONY: In good faith, Cousin Vincent, though I say it before you, you have many good conditions;<sup>578</sup> but surely, though I say it before you too, that condition is none of them; which condition, 20 if you would amend, then should you have yet the more good conditions by one, and peradventure<sup>579</sup> the more by three or four, for I assure you, it is hard to tell how much good to a man's soul the personal visiting to poor prisoners doth.

25 But now since you can name me none of them that are in prison, I pray you name some one of all them that you be, as you say, better acquainted with: men, I mean, that are out of prison; for I know, methinketh, as few of them as you know of the other.

30 VINCENT: That were, Uncle, a strange case, for every man is, Uncle, out of prison that may go where he will, though he be the poorest beggar in the town. And in good faith, Uncle (because you reckon imprisonment so small a matter of itself),
35 the poor beggar that is at his liberty and may walk where he will is, as meseemeth,<sup>580</sup> in better case than is a king kept in prison that cannot go but where men give him leave.<sup>581</sup>

40 ANTONY: Well, Cousin, whether every way-walking<sup>582</sup> beggar be by this reason out of prison or no, we shall consider further when ye will,<sup>583</sup> but in the meanwhile, I can by this reason<sup>584</sup> see no prince that seemeth to be out of prison; for if the lack of liberty to go where a man will be imprisonment, as yourself say it is, then is the great Turk, by whom we 45 so fear to be put in prison, in prison already himself, for he may not go where he will; for if he might, he would into Portugal, Italy, Spain, France, Almain,<sup>585</sup> and England, and as far on another quarter<sup>586</sup> too: both Prester John's land<sup>587</sup> and the Grand Khan's<sup>588</sup> 50 too.

Now the beggar that you speak of, if he be (as you say he is) by reason of his liberty to go<sup>589</sup> where he will, in much better case than a king kept in prison, because he cannot go but where men give him leave,
55 then is that beggar in better case not only than a prince in prison, but also than many a prince out of prison too, for I am sure there is many a beggar that may without let<sup>590</sup> walk further upon other men's ground than many a prince at his best liberty may
60 walk upon his own. And as for walking out abroad upon other men's, that prince might hap to be said nay and holden fast where that beggar with his bag and his staff should be suffered<sup>591</sup> to go forth and hold on his way. But forasmuch, Cousin, as<sup>592</sup> nei-
65 ther the beggar nor the prince is at free liberty to walk where they will, but that if they would walk in some place, neither of them both should be suffered but men would withstand them and say them nay, therefore if imprisonment be (as you grant it 70 is) a lack of liberty to go where we list,<sup>593</sup> I cannot see but as I say: the beggar and the prince, whom you reckon both at liberty, be by your own reason restrained in prison both.

VINCENT: Yea, but Uncle, both the one and the other have way enough to walk, the one in his own 75 ground, the other in other men's or in the common highway, where they may walk till they be both weary of walking ere any man say them nay.

ANTONY: So may, Cousin, that king that had, as 80 yourself put the case, all the whole castle to walk in, and yet you say not nay but that he is prisoner for<sup>594</sup> all that — though not so straitly<sup>595</sup> kept, yet as verily prisoner as he that lieth in the stocks.

VINCENT: But they may go at the leastwise to every place that they need, or that is commodious<sup>596</sup> for them, and therefore they do not will to go but where they may go. And therefore be they at liberty 5 to go where they will.

ANTONY: Me needeth not, Cousin, to spend the time about the impugning every part of this answer. For letting pass by that though a prisoner were with his keeper brought into every place where need 10 required, yet since he might not when he would go where he would for his only pleasure, he were, ye wot well, a prisoner still; and letting pass over also this, that it were to this beggar need, and to this king commodious, to go into diverse places where nei-
15 ther of them both may come; and letting pass also that neither of them both is lightly<sup>597</sup> so temperately determined<sup>598</sup> but that they both fain so would do indeed; if this reason of yours put them out of prison, and set them at liberty and make them free
20 (as I will well grant it doth) if they so do indeed—that is to wit, if they have no will to go but where they may go indeed—then let us look on our other prisoners enclosed within a castle, and we shall find that the straitest kept of them both, if he get the 25 wisdom and the grace to quiet his own mind, and hold himself content with that place, and long not, like a woman with child for her lusts,<sup>599</sup> to be gadding out anywhere else, is by the same reason of yours, while his will is not longing to be anywhere
30 else, he is, I say, at his free liberty to be where he will, and so is out of prison too.

And on the other side, if though his will be not longing to be anywhere else, yet because that if his will so were, he should not so be suffered, he is there-
35 fore not at his free liberty but a prisoner still, so since your free beggar that you speak of, and the prince that you call out of prison too, though they be (which I ween very few be) by some special wisdom so temperately disposed that they have not the will 40 to be but where they see they may be suffered to be, yet since that if they would have that will, they could not then be where they would, they lack the effect of free liberty, and be both twain in prison too.

VINCENT: Well, Uncle, if every man universally 45 be by this reason in prison already, after<sup>600</sup> the very propriety<sup>601</sup> of imprisonment, yet to be imprisoned in this special manner (which manner is only commonly called imprisonment) is a thing of great horror and fear, both for the straitness<sup>602</sup> of the keep-50 ing and the hard handling that many men have therein, of all which griefs and pains and displeasures, in this other general imprisonment that you speak of, we feel nothing at all. And therefore every man abhorreth the one, and would be loath to come into it, and no man abhorreth the other,

55 for they feel none harm nor find no fault therein; wherefore, Uncle, in good faith, though I cannot find answers convenient<sup>603</sup> wherewith to avoid<sup>604</sup> your arguments, yet to be plain with you and tell you the very truth, my mind findeth not itself sat-
60 isfied in this point, but that ever methinketh that these things wherewith you rather convince and conclude<sup>605</sup> me than induce a credence and persuade me, that every man is in prison already, be 65 but sophistical fantasies, and that except those that are commonly called prisoners, other men are not in any prison at all.

ANTONY: Well fare thine heart, good Cousin Vincent. There was in good faith no word that you spoke since we talked of these matters that half so 70 well liked<sup>606</sup> me as this that you speak now. For if you had assented in words, and in your mind departed unpersuaded, then if the thing be true that I say, yet had you lost the fruit,<sup>607</sup> and if it be per-
75 adventure false, and myself deceived therein, then while I should ween that it liked you too, you should have confirmed me in my folly; for in good faith, Cousin, such an old fool am I that this thing—in the persuading whereof unto you I had 80 weened I had quit me<sup>608</sup> well, and when I have all done appeareth to your mind but a trifle and a sophistical fantasy—myself have so many years taken for so very substantial truth that as yet my mind cannot give me to think it any other. Wherefore
85 lest I play as the French priest played, that had so long used<sup>609</sup> to say Dominus with the second syllable long that at last he thought it must needs be so and was ashamed to say it short, to the intent you may the better perceive me, or I the better myself, we shall here between us a little more consider the

VINCENT: Nay, by my troth,<sup>611</sup> Uncle, that I intend not, nor nothing did yet since we began. And that 5 may you well perceive by some things which, without any great cause save for the further satisfaction of mine own mind, I repeated and debated again.

ANTONY: That guise,<sup>612</sup> Cousin, hold on hardily<sup>613</sup> still, for in this matter I purpose to give over 10 my part<sup>614</sup> except I make yourself perceive both that every man universally is a very<sup>615</sup> prisoner in very prison plainly, without any sophistication<sup>616</sup> at all, and that there is also no prince living upon earth but he is in worse case prisoner, by this general imprisonment that I speak of, than is many a 15 lewd<sup>617</sup> simple wretch by that special imprisonment that you speak of; and over this, that in this general imprisonment that I speak of, men are for the time that they be therein so sore handled<sup>618</sup> and so 20 hardly<sup>619</sup> and in such painful wise that men's hearts have with reason great cause as sore<sup>620</sup> to abhor the hard handling that is in this imprisonment as the other that is in that.

VINCENT: By my troth, Uncle, these things would 25 I fain see well proved.

ANTONY: Tell me, then, Cousin, first by your troth, if there were a man attainted<sup>621</sup> of treason or felony, and after judgment given of his death, and that it were determined that he should die, only the time 30 of his execution delayed till the king's further pleasure known, and he thereupon delivered to certain keepers, and put up in a sure place, out of which he could not escape, were this man a prisoner or no?

VINCENT: This man, quoth he? Yea, marry, that he 35 were in very deed, if ever any man were.

ANTONY: But now, what if for the time that were mean<sup>622</sup> between his attainder<sup>623</sup> and his execution he were so favorably handled that he were suffered to do what he would as he was while he was abroad, and to have the use of his lands and his goods, and 40 his wife and his children license to be with him, and his friends leave at liberty to resort unto him, and his servants not forbidden to bide<sup>624</sup> about him; and add yet thereunto that the place were a

45 great castle royal, with parks and other pleasures therein a very great circuit about; yea, add yet and ye will that he were suffered to go and ride also, both when he would and whither he would, only this one point always provided and foreseen: that he should ever be surely seen to and safely kept
50 from escaping, so that took he never so much of his own mind in the meanwhile all other ways save<sup>625</sup> escaping, yet he well knew that escape he could not, and that when he were called for, to death and execution he should? Now, Cousin Vincent, what 55 would you call this man? A prisoner, because he is kept for execution? Or no prisoner, because he is in the meanwhile so favorably handled and suffered<sup>626</sup> to do all that he would save escape? And I bid you not here be hasty in your answer, but advise<sup>627</sup> it 60 well, that you grant no such thing in haste as you would after mislike by leisure, and think yourself deceived.

VINCENT: Nay, by my troth, Uncle, this thing needeth no study at all in my mind, but that for 65 all this favor showed him, and all this liberty lent him, yet being condemned to death, and being kept therefor, and kept with such sure watch laid upon him that he cannot escape, he is all that while a very plain prisoner still.
70

ANTONY: In good faith, Cousin, methinketh you say very true. But then one thing must I yet desire you, Cousin, to tell me a little further: if there were 75 another laid in prison for a fray,<sup>628</sup> and through the jailer's displeasure were bolted and fettered and laid in a low dungeon in the stocks, where he might hap to lie peradventure for a while, and abide<sup>629</sup> in the mean season<sup>630</sup> some pain, but no danger of death at all, but that out again he should come well enough — whether<sup>631</sup> of these two prisoners stood in 80 worse case, he that hath all this favor, or he that is thus hardly handled?<sup>632</sup>

610 nearer 611 truth, faithfulness
612 habit, practice 613 resolutely
614 give over my part: give up my side of the dispute; admit defeat 615 true
616 sophism; specious reasoning

VINCENT: By our Lady, Uncle, I ween the most part of men, if they should needs choose, had liefer<sup>633</sup> be such prisoners in every point<sup>634</sup> as he that so sorely lieth in the stocks than in every point such as he that 5 at such liberty walketh about the park.

ANTONY: Consider then, Cousin, whether this thing seem any sophistry to you that I shall show you now, for it shall be such as seemeth, in good faith, substantial true to me. And if it so happen
10 that you think otherwise, I will be very glad to perceive which of us both is beguiled. For it seemeth to me, Cousin, first, that every man coming into this world here upon earth, as he is created by God, so cometh he hither by the providence of God — is this 15 any sophistry, first, or not?

VINCENT: Nay, verily, this is very substantial truth.

ANTONY: Now take I this also for very truth in my mind, that there cometh no man nor woman hither into the earth but that, ere ever they come quick<sup>635</sup>
20 into the world out of the mother's womb, God condemneth them unto death, by his own sentence and judgment, for the original sin that they bring with them, contracted in the corrupted stock of our forefather Adam — is this, Cousin, think you, verily 25 thus or not?

VINCENT: This is, Uncle, very true indeed.

ANTONY: Then seemeth this true, further, unto me, that God hath put every man here upon earth under so sure and under so safe keeping that of all 30 the whole people living in this wide world there is neither man, woman, nor child, would they never so fain wander about and seek it, that possibly can find any way whereby they may escape from death — is this, Cousin, a fond<sup>636</sup> imagined fantasy, or is it very 35 truth indeed?

VINCENT: Nay, this is none imagination, Uncle, but a thing so clearly proved true that no man is so mad to say nay.

ANTONY: Then need I no more, Cousin, for then 40 is all the matter plain and open<sup>637</sup> evident truth

which I said I took for truth — which is yet more a little now than I told you before, when you took my proof yet but for a sophistical fantasy, and said that for all my reasoning that every man is a prisoner, yet you thought that except these whom the common 45 people call prisoners, there is else<sup>638</sup> no man a very prisoner indeed. And now you grant yourself again, for very substantial open truth, that every man is here (though he be the greatest king upon earth) set here by the ordinance of God in a place (be it never 50 so large), a place, I say, yet (and you say the same) out of which no man can escape, but that therein is every man put under sure and safe keeping to be readily fetched forth when God calleth for him, and that then he shall surely die. And is not then,
55 Cousin, by your own granting before, every man a very prisoner, when he is put in a place to be kept to be brought forth, when he would not, and himself wot not whither?

VINCENT: Yes, in good faith, Uncle, I cannot but 60 well perceive this to be so.

ANTONY: This were, you wot well, true although<sup>639</sup> a man should be but taken by the arm and in fair manner led out of this world unto his judgment. But now, while we well know that there is no king
65 so great but that all the while he walketh here, walk he never so loose,<sup>640</sup> ride he with never so strong an army for his defense, yet himself is very sure — though he seek in the mean season some other pastime to put it out of his mind — yet is he very
70 sure, I say, that escape he cannot, and very well he knoweth that he hath already sentence given upon him to die, and that verily die he shall, and that himself, though he hope upon long respite<sup>641</sup> of his execution, yet can he not tell how soon; and therefore,
75 but if<sup>642</sup> he be a fool, he can never be without fear that either on the morrow or on the selfsame day, the grisly cruel hangman Death, which from his first coming in hath ever hoved aloof<sup>643</sup> and looked toward him, and ever lain in a wait on him,
80 shall, amid among<sup>644</sup> all his royalty and all his main strength, neither kneel before him, nor make him any reverence, nor with any good manner desire him to come forth, but rigorously and fiercely grip him by the very breast, and make all his bones rattle, and so by long and diverse sore torments strike him stark dead in this prison, and then cause his body to be cast into the ground in a foul pit within some corner of the same, there to rot and be eaten with 5 wretched worms of the earth, sending yet his soul out further unto a more fearful judgment, whereof at his temporal death his success is uncertain — and therefore, though by God’s grace not out of good hope, yet for all that in the meanwhile in very sore

 10 dread and fear, and peradventure in peril inevitable of eternal fire.

Methinketh therefore, Cousin, that, as I told you, this keeping of every man in this wretched world for execution of death, it is a very plain imprisonment indeed, and that, as I say, such that the greatest king is in this prison in much worse case in all his wealth than many a man is by the other imprisonment that is therein sore and hardly handled; for whereas some of those lie not there attained<sup>645</sup> nor 20 condemned to death, the greatest man of this world and the most wealthy in this universal prison is laid in, to be kept undoubtedly for death.

VINCENT: But yet, Uncle, in that case is the other prisoner too, for he is as sure that he shall die too, 25 pardie.

ANTONY: This is very true, Cousin, indeed, and well objected to. But then you must consider that he is not in danger of death by reason of that prison into which he is put peradventure but for a light 30 fray,<sup>646</sup> but his danger of death is by the other imprisonment by which he is prisoner in the great prison of this whole earth, in which prison all the princes thereof be prisoners as well as he. If a man condemned to death were put up in a large prison,
 35 and while his execution were respited,<sup>647</sup> he were, for fighting with his fellows, put up in a strait<sup>648</sup> place, part of the same, he is in danger of death in that strait prison, but not by the being in that — for therein he is but for the fray — but his deadly imprisonment was the other: the larger, I say, into 40 which he was put for death. So the prisoner that you speak of is, besides that narrow prison, a prisoner of the broad world, and all the princes therein prisoners with him. And by that imprisonment, both they and he in like danger of death: not

by that strait imprisonment that is commonly called imprisonment, but by that imprisonment which, because of the large walk, men call it liberty — and which prison you therefore thought but a fantasy 50 sophistical to prove it any prison at all. But now may you, methinketh, very plainly perceive that this whole earth is not only for all the whole kind<sup>649</sup> of man a very plain prison indeed, but also that every man without exception, even those that are most at their liberty therein, and reckon themselves
 55 great lords and possessioners of a very great parcel thereof, and thereby wax<sup>650</sup> with wantonness so forgetful of their own state that they ween they stand in great wealth, do stand for all that indeed, by the reason of that imprisonment in this large prison of 60 the whole earth, in the selfsame condition that others do stand which<sup>651</sup> in the narrow prisons, which only be called prisons, and which only be reputed prisons in the opinion of the common people, stand in the most fearful and in the most odious case: that 65 is to wit, condemned already to death.

And now, Cousin, if this thing that I tell you seem but a sophistical fantasy to your mind, I would be glad to know what moveth you so to think. For in good faith, as I have told you twice, I am no wiser 70 but that I verily ween<sup>652</sup> that the thing is thus of very plain truth in very deed.

THE TWENTIETH CHAPTER

VINCENT: In good faith, Uncle, as for this far-
 75 forth,<sup>653</sup> I not only can make with any reason no resistance thereagainst, but also see very clearly proved that it can be none otherwise but that every man is in this world a very prisoner, since we be all put here into a sure hold to be kept till we be put to execution, as folk already condemned all unto death.
 80 But yet, Uncle, that strait keeping, collaring, bolting, and stocking,<sup>654</sup> with lying in straw or on the cold ground — which manner of hard handling<sup>655</sup> is used in these special imprisonments that only be called commonly by that name — must needs make that 85 imprisonment, which only beareth among the people that name, much more odious and dreadful than the general imprisoning wherewith we be every man universally prisoned at large, walking where we will round about the wide world—in which broad prison, out of<sup>656</sup> those narrow prisons, there is with the prisoners no such hard handling used.

645 convicted 646 light fray: minor fight 647 stayed 648 enclosed, narrow 649 species, race 650 become,

ANTONY: I said, I trow,<sup>657</sup> Cousin, that I purposed
5 to prove you further yet that in this general prison—the large prison, I mean, of this whole world—folk be for the time that they be therein as sore handled and as hardly, and wrenched and wrunged and 10 broken in such painful wise that our hearts (save that we consider it not) have with reason good and great cause to grudge<sup>658</sup> against and (as far-forth as pertaineth only to the respect of pain) as much horror to conceive against the hard handling that is in this prison as the other that is in that.

VINCENT: Indeed, Uncle, truth it is that this you 15 said you would prove.

ANTONY: Nay, so much said I not, Cousin, but I said I would if I could, and if I could not, then would I therein give over my part.<sup>659</sup> But that trust
20 I, Cousin, I shall not need to do, the thing seemeth me so plain; for Cousin, not only the prince and king, but also, though he hath both angels and devils that are jailers under him, yet the chief jailer over this whole broad prison, the world, is (as I take it) 25 God. And that, I suppose, ye will grant me too.

VINCENT: That will I not, Uncle, deny.

ANTONY: If a man be, Cousin, committed to prison for no cause but to be kept, though there be never so great charge upon him, yet his keeper, 30 if he be good and honest, is neither so cruel that would pain the man of<sup>660</sup> malice, nor so covetous that would put him to pain to make him seek his friends to pay for a pennyworth of ease; else,<sup>661</sup> if the place be such that he be sure to keep him safe 35 otherwise, or that he can get surety for the recompense of more harm than he seeth he should have if he escaped, he will never handle him in any such hard fashion as we most abhor imprisonment for. But marry, if the place be such as the keeper cannot 40 otherwise be sure, then is he compelled to keep him

after the rate the straiter.<sup>662</sup> And also, if the prisoner be unruly and fall to fighting with his fellows, or do some other manner of shrewd turns,<sup>663</sup> then useth the keeper<sup>664</sup> to punish him sundry wise,<sup>665</sup> in some of such fashions as yourself have spoken of. 45

So is it now, Cousin, that God—the chief jailer, as I say, of this broad prison, the world—is neither cruel nor covetous. And this prison is also so sure<sup>666</sup> and so subtly built that, albeit that it lieth open on every side without any wall in the world, yet wander 50 we never so far about therein, the way to get out at shall we never find, so that he needeth not to collar us nor to stock us for any fear of escaping away. And therefore, except he see some other cause than our only keeping for death, he letteth us in the mean-
55 while (for as long as he list to respite<sup>667</sup> us) walk about in the prison, and do therein what we will, using ourselves in such wise as he hath by reason and revelation from time to time told us his pleasure.

And hereof it cometh, lo, that by reason of this favor, for a time we wax (as I said) so wanton<sup>668</sup> that we forget where we be—weening that we were lords at large, whereas we be indeed, if we would consider it, even seely<sup>669</sup> poor wretches in prison; for of very truth, our very prison this earth is. And yet
65 thereof we cant<sup>670</sup> us out—part by covenants<sup>671</sup> that we make among us, and part by fraud, and part by violence too—diverse parts diversely to ourselves, and change the name thereof from the odious name of prison, and call it our own land and our livelihood. 70

Upon our prison we build our prison; we garnish it with gold and make it glorious. In this prison they buy and sell; in this prison they brawl and chide;<sup>672</sup> in this they run together and fight; in this they dice; in this they card. In this they pipe<sup>673</sup> and revel. In 75 this they sing and dance. And in this prison many a man reputed right honest letteth not,<sup>674</sup> for his pleasure in the dark, privily<sup>675</sup> to play the knave.

And thus, while God, our king and our chief jailer too, suffereth<sup>676</sup> us and letteth us alone, we 80 ween ourselves at liberty, and we abhor the state of those whom we call prisoners, taking ourselves for no prisoners at all.

wandering about for a while in this prison of this world, till we be brought unto the execution of death), where we forget with our folly both ourselves and our jail, and our underjailers, angels and devils both, and our chief jailer, God, too—God, that forgetteth not us, but seeth us all the while well enough, and being sore<sup>677</sup> discontent to see so shrewd<sup>678</sup> rule kept in the jail, besides that he sendeth the hangman Death to put to execution here and there sometimes by the thousands at once, he handleth many of the remnant, whose execution he forbear<sup>679</sup> yet unto a further time, even as hardly,<sup>680</sup> and punisheth them as sore, in this common prison of the world as there are any handled in those special prisons, which for the hard handling used (you say) therein, your heart hath in such horror and so sore abhorreth.

VINCENT: The remnant will I not gainsay,<sup>681</sup> for methinketh I see it so indeed; but that God, our chief jailer in this world, useth any such prisonly fashion of punishment, that point must I needs deny, for I neither see him lay any man in the stocks or strike fetters on his legs, or so much as shut him up in a chamber either.

ANTONY: Is he no minstrel, Cousin, that playeth not on a harp? Maketh no man melody but he that playeth on a lute? He may be a minstrel and make melody, you wot well, with some other instrument, some strange-fashioned, peradventure, that never was seen before. God, our chief jailer, as himself is invisible, so useth he in his punishments invisible instruments, and therefore not of like fashion as the other jailers do, but yet of like effect, and as painful in feeling as those: for he layeth one of his prisoners with a hot fever, as evil at his ease in a warm bed as the other jailer layeth his on the cold ground; he wringeth them by the brows with a megrim;<sup>682</sup> he collareth them by the neck with a quinsy;<sup>683</sup> he bolteth<sup>684</sup> them by the arms with a palsy, that they cannot lift their hands to their head; he manacleth their hands with the gout in their fingers; he wringeth them by the legs with the cramp in their shins; he bindeth them to the bed-board with the crick in the back, and layeth one there along,<sup>685</sup> and as unable to rise as though he lay by the feet fast in the stocks. 45

Some prisoner of another jail singeth and danceth in his two fetters, and feareth not his feet for stumbling<sup>686</sup> at a stone, while God's prisoner that hath his one foot fettered with the gout lieth groaning on a couch, and quaketh and crieth out if he fear there would fall on his foot no more but a cushion. And therefore, Cousin, as I said, if we consider it well, we shall find this general prison of this whole earth a place in which the prisoners be as sore handled<sup>687</sup> as they be in the other. And even in the other, some make as merry too, as there do some in this that are very merry at large out of that. 55

And surely, like as we ween ourselves out of prison now, so if there were some folk born and brought up in a prison that never came on the wall, nor looked out at the door, nor never heard of other world abroad, but saw some, for their shrewd turns<sup>688</sup> done among themselves, locked up in some straiter<sup>689</sup> room, and heard them only<sup>690</sup> called prisoners that were so served,<sup>691</sup> and themselves ever called free folk at large, the like opinion would they have there of themselves then that we have here of ourselves now. And when we take ourselves for other than prisoners now, as verily be we now deceived as those prisoners should there be then. 70

VINCENT: I cannot, Uncle, in good faith say nay but that you have performed all that you have promised. But yet since that for all this there appeareth no more but that as they be prisoners, so be we too, and that as some of them be sore handled, so be some of us too, since we wot well for all this that when we come to those prisons, we shall not fail to be in a straiter prison than we be now, and to have a door shut upon us where we have none shut on us now—this shall we be sure of at the leastwise, if there come no worse. And then may there come worse, ye wot well, it cometh there so commonly; wherefore, for all this, it is yet little marvel though men's hearts grudge<sup>692</sup> much there against. 80

nearer if I had said that imprisonment were no displeasure at all. But the thing that I say, Cousin, for our comfort therein, is that our fantasy frameth us a false opinion by which we deceive ourselves and take it for sorer<sup>693</sup> than it is. And that do we by the reason that we take ourselves before for more free than we be, and prisonment for a stranger thing to us than it is indeed. And thus far-forth,<sup>694</sup> as I said, have I proved very truth indeed. But now, the incommodities<sup>695</sup> that you repeat again, those, I say, that are proper to the imprisonment of their own nature—that is to wit, to have less room to walk in, and to have the door shut upon us—these are, methinketh, so very slender and slight that in so great a cause as to suffer for God’s sake, we might be sore<sup>696</sup> ashamed so much as once to think upon them.

Many a good man there is, you wot well, which<sup>697</sup> without any force at all, or any necessity wherefore he should so do, suffereth these two things willingly of his own choice, with much other hardness more—holy monks, I mean, of the Charterhouse Order,<sup>698</sup> such as never pass their cells but only to the church set fast<sup>699</sup> by their cells, and thence to their cells again; and Saint Bridget’s order, and Saint Clare’s much like; and in a manner all close<sup>700</sup> religious houses, and yet anchors and anchoresses<sup>701</sup> most especially, all whose whole room<sup>702</sup> is less than a meetly<sup>703</sup> large chamber.<sup>704</sup> And yet are they there as well content many long years together as are other men (and better too) that walk about the world. And therefore you may see that the loathness of less room, and the door shut upon us, while so many folk are so well content therewith, and will for God’s love lief<sup>705</sup> so to choose, is but a horror enhanced of our own fantasy.<sup>706</sup>

And indeed I wist<sup>707</sup> a woman once that came into a prison to visit of her charity a poor prisoner there, whom she found in a chamber, to say the truth, meetly fair; and at the leastwise it was strong enough. But with mats of straw the prisoner had made it so warm, both under the foot and round about the walls, that in these things, for keeping of his health, she was on his behalf glad and very well comforted. But among many other displeasures that for his sake she was sorry for, one she lamented much in her mind: that he should have the chamber door upon him by night made fast<sup>708</sup> by the jailer, that should shut him in. “For by my troth,”<sup>709</sup> quoth she, “if the door should be shut upon me, I would ween it would stop up my breath.” At that word of hers, the prisoner laughed in his mind, but he durst<sup>710</sup> not laugh aloud nor say nothing to her. For somewhat indeed he stood in awe of her, and had his finding<sup>711</sup> there much part of<sup>712</sup> her charity for alms; but he could not but laugh inwardly while he wist well enough that she used<sup>713</sup> on the inside to shut every night full surely<sup>714</sup> her own chamber to her, both door and windows too, and used not to open them of all the long night. And what difference then, as to the stopping of the breath, whether they were shut up within or without?<sup>715</sup>

And so surely, Cousin, these two things that you speak of are neither nother<sup>716</sup> of so great weight that in Christ’s cause ought to move a Christian man; and the one of the twain is so very a childish fantasy that in a matter almost of three chips,<sup>717</sup> but if it were in chance of fire,<sup>718</sup> never should move any man.

As for those other accidents<sup>719</sup> of hard handling therein, so mad am I not to say they be no grief, but I say that our fear may imagine them much greater grief than they be. And I say that such as they be, many a man endureth them—yea, and many a woman too—that after<sup>720</sup> fare full well.

And then would I wit<sup>721</sup> what determination we take: whether for our Savior’s sake to suffer some pain in our bodies, since he suffered in his blessed body so great pain for us, or else to give him warning to be at a point rather utterly to forsake him than suffer any pain at all? He that cometh in his mind unto this latter point—from which kind of unkindness God keep every man—comfort he none needeth, for he will flee the need; and counsel, I fear, availeth him little if grace be so far gone from him. But on the other side,<sup>722</sup> if rather than forsake our Savior we determine ourselves to suffer any pain at all, I cannot then see that the fear of hard handling should

693 worse, more grievous 694 thus far-forth: this far; to this extent 695 disadvantages; discomforts 696 greatly, very much 697 who 698 Charterhouse Order: Carthusians 699 right 700 cloistered 701 anchors and anchoresses: monks and nuns who live in seclusion 702 living space 703 fairly anything stick with<sup>723</sup> us, and make us so to shrink as we rather would forsake his faith than to suffer for his sake so much as imprisonment, since the handling is neither such in prison but that many men

 5 many years, and many women too, live therewith and sustain it, and afterward yet fare full well; and yet that it may well fortune that besides the very bare imprisonment, there shall hap us no hard handling at all, nor that same haply<sup>724</sup> but for a short while
 10 neither, and yet besides all this, peradventure not at all; and specially since which of all these ways shall be taken with us lieth all in his will for whom we be content to take it, and which for that mind of ours favoereth us, and will suffer no man to put more pain 15 unto us than he well wotteth we shall be well able to bear. For he will give us the strength thereto himself, as you have heard his promise already, by the mouth of Saint Paul: Fidelis Deus qui non patitur vos tentari supra id quod potestis ferre sed dat etiam cum tentatione proventum (“God is faithful, which<sup>725</sup> suffereth 20 you not to be tempted above that you may bear, but giveth also with the temptation a way out”).<sup>726</sup>

But now, if we have not lost our faith already, before we come to forsake it for fear, we know very 25 well by our faith that by the forsaking of our faith we fall into the state to be cast into the prison of hell, and that can we not tell how soon, but as it may be that God will suffer us to live a while here upon earth, so may it be that he will throw us in 30 that dungeon beneath before the time that the Turk shall once ask us the question. And therefore, if we fear imprisonment so sore,<sup>727</sup> we be much more than mad that we fear not most for the more sore: for out of that prison shall no man never get, and in 35 this other shall no man abide but a while.

In prison was Joseph while his brethren were at large, and yet afterward were his brethren fain<sup>728</sup> to seek upon him for bread.<sup>729</sup>

40 In prison was Daniel, and the wild lions about him, and yet even here God kept him harmless,<sup>730</sup> and brought him safe out again.<sup>731</sup>

If we think that he will not do the likewise for us, let us not doubt but he will do for us either the like or better, for better may he do for us if he suffer us 45 there to die.

Saint John the Baptist was, you wot well, in prison while Herod and Herodias sat full merry at the feast, and the daughter of Herodias delighted them with her dancing, till with her dancing she 50 danced off Saint John’s head;<sup>732</sup> and now sitteth he with great feast in heaven at God’s board,<sup>733</sup> while Herod and Herodias full heavily<sup>734</sup> sit in hell burning both twain, and to make them sport withal, the devil with the damsel dance in the fire afore them.

Finally, Cousin, to finish this piece with: our Savior was himself taken prisoner for our sake; and 55 prisoner was he carried; and prisoner was he kept; and prisoner was he brought forth before Annas; and prisoner from Annas carried unto Caiaphas; then prisoner was he carried from Caiaphas unto 60 Pilate; and prisoner was he sent from Pilate to King Herod; prisoner from Herod unto Pilate again; and so kept as prisoner to the end of his Passion.<sup>735</sup>

The time of his imprisonment, I grant well, was not long, but as for hard handling (which our hearts
 65 most abhor), he had as much in that short while as many men among them all in much longer time. And surely then if we consider of what estate<sup>736</sup> he was, and therewith that he was prisoner in such wise for our sake, we shall, I trow (but if<sup>737</sup> we be worse
 70 than wretched beasts), never so shamefully play the unkind cowards as for fear of imprisonment sinfully to forsake him, nor so foolish neither as by forsaking of him to give him the occasion again to forsake us, and with the avoiding of an easier prison, 75 fall into a worse, and instead of a prison that cannot keep us long, fall into that prison out of which we can never come, where the short prisonment would win us everlasting liberty.

THE TWENTY-FIRST CHAPTER

The fear of shameful and painful death

80 VINCENT: Forsooth,<sup>738</sup> Uncle—our Lord reward you therefor—if we feared not further, besides imprisonment, the terrible dart of shameful and painful death, as for imprisonment, I would verily trust 85 that remembering these things which I have here heard of you, rather than I should forsake the faith of our Savior, I would with help of grace never shrink thereat.

736 (high) rank 737 but if: unless 738 In truth

But now are we comen, Uncle, with much work at the last unto the last and uttermost point of the dread that maketh incursum et daemonium meridianum (“this incursion of this midday devil”)—
 5 this open invasion of the Turk, and his persecution against the faith—seem so terrible to men’s minds that although the respect<sup>739</sup> of God vanquish all the remnant of the troubles that we have hitherto perused<sup>740</sup> (as<sup>741</sup> loss of goods, lands, and liberty),
 10 yet, when we remember the terror of shameful and painful death, that point so suddenly putteth us in oblivion of all that should be our comfort that we feel, all men, I fear me, for the most part, the fervor of our faith wax<sup>742</sup> so cold, and our hearts so faint, 15 that we feel ourselves at the point to fall even therefrom for fear.

ANTONY: To this I say not nay, Cousin, but that indeed in this point is the sore pinch. And yet you see for all this that even this point too taketh increase and diminishment of dread after<sup>743</sup> the difference of the affections that are before fixed and rooted in the mind, so far-forth<sup>744</sup> that you see some man set so much by<sup>745</sup> his worldly substance<sup>746</sup> that he less feareth the loss of his life than the loss of lands;
 20 yea, some man shall you see that abideth deadly torment, and such as some other had liefer<sup>747</sup> die than endure, rather than he would bring forth the money that he hath hid.

And I doubt not but you have heard of many,
 30 by right antique<sup>748</sup> stories, that some for one cause, some for other, have not letted<sup>749</sup> willingly to suffer death, diverse in diverse kinds, and some both with despiteful rebuke<sup>750</sup> and painful torment too. And therefore, as I say, we may see that the affections 35 of men’s minds toward the increase or decrease of dread maketh much of the matter.

Now are the affections of men’s minds imprinted by diverse means: one way, by the means of the bodily senses, moved by such things, pleasant or 40 displeasing, as are outwardly, through sensible<sup>751</sup> worldly things, offered and objected<sup>752</sup> unto them. And this manner of receiving of impression of affection is common unto men and beasts. Another

manner of receiving affections is by the means of reason, which both ordinately<sup>753</sup> tempereth those 45 affections that the bodily five wits<sup>754</sup> imprint, and also disposeth a man many times to some spiritual virtues very contrary to those affections that are fleshly and sensual. And those reasonable dispositions be the affections spiritual, and proper to the 50 nature of man, and above the nature of beast.

Now as our ghostly<sup>755</sup> enemy the devil enforceth<sup>756</sup> himself to make us lean<sup>757</sup> unto the sensual affections and beastly, so doth almighty God of his goodness by his Holy Spirit inspire<sup>758</sup> us good motions, with aid and help of his grace, toward the 55 other affections spiritual, and by sundry means instructeth our reason to lean unto them, and not only to receive them as engendered and planted in our soul, but also in such wise water them with the 60 wise advertisement<sup>759</sup> of godly counsel and continual prayer that they may be habitually radicate<sup>760</sup> and surely take deep root therein. And after, as the one kind of affection or the other beareth the strength in our heart, so be we stronger or feebler 65 against the terror of death in this cause.

And therefore will we, Cousin, assay<sup>761</sup> to consider what things there are for which we have cause in reason to master that affection fearful and sensual, and though we cannot clean<sup>762</sup> avoid it and put 70 it away, yet in such wise to bridle it at the least that it run not out so far like a headstrong horse,<sup>763</sup> that spite of our teeth<sup>764</sup> it carry us out unto the devil.

Let us therefore now consider and well weigh this thing that we dread so sore,<sup>765</sup> that is to wit, shameful and painful death.

THE TWENTY-SECOND CHAPTER

Of death considered by himself alone, as a bare leaving of this life only

ANTONY: And first I perceive well by these two 80 things that you join unto death—that is to wit, “shameful” and “painful”—you would esteem<sup>766</sup> death so much the less if he shall come alone, without either shame or pain.
