VINCENT: Without doubt, Uncle, a great deal the less. But yet, though he should come without them both, by himself, whatsoever I would, I wot<sup>767</sup> well many a man would be for all that very loath to die.

5 ANTONY: That I believe well, Cousin, and the more pity it is, for that affection happeth in very few but that either the cause is lack of faith, lack of hope, or finally lack of wit.<sup>768</sup> They that believe not the life to come after this, and ween themselves here
10 in wealth, are loath to leave this, for then they think they lose all. And thereof cometh the manifold foolish unfaithful words which are so rife in over many mouths: “This world we know, and the other we know not,” and that some say in sport and think in 15 earnest, “The devil is not so black as he is painted; and let him be as black as he will, he is no blacker than a crow,” with many such other foolish fantasies of the same sort.

Some that believe well enough, yet through the 20 lewdness<sup>769</sup> of living fall out of good hope of salvation, and then though they be loath to die, I very little marvel, howbeit<sup>770</sup> some that purpose to mend, and would fain<sup>771</sup> have some time left them longer to bestow somewhat better, may peradventure<sup>772</sup> be
25 loath to die also by and by.<sup>773</sup> And that manner<sup>774</sup> loathness, albeit a very good will gladly to die and to be with God, were in my mind so thankful that it were well able to purchase as full remission both of sin and pain as peradventure he were like,<sup>775</sup> if he 30 lived, to purchase in many years’ penance—yet will I not say but that such kind of loathness to die may be before God allowable. Some are there also that are loath to die that are yet very glad to die, and long for to be dead.

35 VINCENT: That were, Uncle, a very strange case.

ANTONY: The case I fear me, Cousin, falleth not very often, but yet sometimes it doth, as where there is any man of that good mind that Saint Paul was, which for the longing that he had to be with God 40 would fain have been dead, but for the profit of other folk was content to live here in pain, and defer and forbear for the while his inestimable bliss

in heaven. Cupio dissolvi et esse cum Christo; bonum autem mihi manere propter vos.<sup>776</sup>

But of all these kinds, Cousin, of folks that are 45 loath to die (except the first kind only, that lacketh faith), there is, I suppose, none but that, except the fear of shame or sharp pain joined unto death should be the let,<sup>777</sup> would else, for the bare respect of death alone, let<sup>778</sup> to depart hence with good will
50 in this case of the faith—well witting,<sup>779</sup> by his faith, that his death taken for the faith should cleanse him clean of all his sins, and send him straight to heaven. And some of these (namely the last kind) are such that shame and pain both, joined unto death, were
55 unlikely to make them loathe death or fear death so sore<sup>780</sup> but that they would suffer death in this case with good will, since they know well that the refusing of the faith for any cause in this world (were the cause never so good in sight)<sup>781</sup> should yet sever
60 them from God—with whom, save<sup>782</sup> for other folks’ profit, they so fain would be. And charity can it not be, for the profit of the whole world, deadly to displease him that made it.

Some are there, I say also, that are loath to die for 65 lack of wit, which albeit that they believe the world that is to come, and hope also to come thither, yet they love so much the wealth of this world, and such things as delight them therein, that they would fain keep them as long as ever they might, even with 70 tooth and nail. And when they may be suffered<sup>783</sup> in no wise to keep it no longer, but that death taketh them therefrom, then, if it may be no better, they will agree to be, as soon as they be hence, hanced<sup>784</sup>
75 up in heaven and be with God by and by.<sup>785</sup>

These folk are as very nidiot<sup>786</sup> fools as he that had kept from his childhood a bag full of cherry stones, and cast such a fantasy thereto that he would not go for it for a bigger bag filled full of gold.

These folk fare, Cousin, as Aesop telleth in a fable 80 that the snail did. For when Jupiter (whom the poets feign for<sup>787</sup> the great god) invited all poor worms of the earth to a great solemn feast that it pleased him (I have forgot upon what occasion) upon a time to prepare for them, the snail kept her at home, and 85 would not come thereat. And when Jupiter asked her after wherefore she came not at his feast—where,

767 know 768 good sense; knowledge 769 wickedness 770 although 771 gladly 772 perhaps 773 by and by: right away 774 kind of 775 likely 776 “I long to be dissolved and to be with Christ; however, for you it is good for me to stay” (Phil 1:23–24). 777 obstacle 778 hesitate 779 knowing 780 greatly 781 were . . . sight: no matter how good the cause appeared to be 782 except 783 allowed 784 lifted, hoisted 785 by and by: directly 786 idiotic 787 feign für: pretend to be

he said, she should have been welcome, and have faren<sup>788</sup> well, and should have seen a goodly palace, and been delighted with many goodly pleasures—she answered him that she loved no place so well as 5 her own house; with which answer Jupiter waxed so angry that he said since she loved her house so well, she should never after go from home, but should always bear her house upon her back wheresoever she went. And so hath she done ever since, as they say, 10 and at the leastwise I wot well she doth so now, and hath done as long time as I can remember.

VINCENT: Forsooth, Uncle, I would ween the tale were not all feigned.<sup>789</sup> For I think verily that so much of your tale is true.

15 ANTONY: Aesop meant by that feigned fable to touch the folly of such folk as so set their fantasy upon some small simple pleasure that they cannot find in their heart to forbear it—neither for the pleasure of a better man, nor for the gaining of a 20 better thing—by which their fond froward<sup>790</sup> fashion, they sometimes fall in great indignation, and take thereby no little harm.

And surely such Christian folk as by their foolish affection, which they have set like the snail upon 25 their own house here in this earth, cannot for the loathness of leaving that house find in their heart with their good will to go to the great feast that God prepareth in heaven, and of his goodness so gently calleth them to, be like,<sup>791</sup> I fear me (but if<sup>792</sup> 30 they amend that mind in time), to be served as the snail was, and yet much worse too. For they be like to have their house here, the earth, bound fast upon their backs forever, and not walk therewith where they will, as the snail creepeth about with hers, but 35 lie fast bound in the mids<sup>793</sup> with the foul fire of hell about them.

For into this folly they bring themselves by their own fault, as the drunken man bringeth himself into drunkenness, whereby the evil that he doth in 40 his drunkenness is not forgiven him for his folly, but to his pain imputed to his fault.

VINCENT: Surely, Uncle, this seemeth not unlikely, and by their fault they fall in such folly indeed. And yet if this be folly indeed, there are then some folk fools that ween themselves right wise. 45

ANTONY: That ween themselves wise? Marry, I never saw fool yet that thought himself other than wise. For as it is one spark of soberness left in a drunken head when he perceive himself drunk and getteth him fair<sup>794</sup> to bed, so if a fool perceive him-50 self a fool, that point is no folly, but a little spark of wit. But now, Cousin, as for these kind of fools, since they be loath to die for the love that they bear to their worldly fantasies, which they should<sup>795</sup> by their death leave behind them and forsake, they 55 that would for that cause rather forsake the faith than die would rather forsake it than lose their worldly goods, though there were offered them no peril of death at all. And then, as touching those that are of that mind, we have, you wot well, said as 60 much as yourself thought sufficient this afternoon herebefore.

VINCENT: Verily, Uncle, that is very true, and now have you rehearsed, as far as I can remember, all the other kinds of them that would be loath to die for any other respect<sup>796</sup> than the grievous qualities of shame and pain joined unto death. And of all these kinds except the kind of infidelity<sup>797</sup>—whom no comfort can help, but counsel only, to the attain-70 ing of faith, which faith must be to the receiving of comfort presupposed and had ready before, as you showed in the beginning of our communication<sup>798</sup> the first day that we talked of the matter—but else,<sup>799</sup> I say, except that one kind, there is none of the remnant of those that were before untouched 75 which were likely to forsake their faith in the persecution for the fear and dread of death, save<sup>800</sup> for those grievous qualities (pain, I mean, and shame) that they see well would come therewith.

And therefore, Uncle, I pray you<sup>801</sup> give us some comfort against those twain. For in good faith, if death should come without them, in such a case as this is—wherein by the losing of this life we should find a far better—mine own reason giveth<sup>802</sup> me that save for the other griefs going before the change,<sup>803</sup> 85 there would no man, that wit hath, anything stick<sup>804</sup> at all.

788 dined 789 fictitious; made-up
 790 fond froward: foolish unruly 791 likely 792 but if: unless 793 middie 794 straight; directly 795 would 796 consideration 797 the kind of infidelity: those without faith 798 conversation 799 otherwise 800 except 801 pray you: ask you to 802 tells 803 the change: the change from the one life to the other 804 hesitate

ANTONY: Yes, peradventure suddenly,<sup>805</sup> before they gather their wits unto them and therewith well weigh the matter. But they, Cousin, that will consider the matter well, reason grounded upon the foundation of faith shall show them very great substantial causes for which the dread of those grievous qualities that they see shall come with death (shame, I mean, and pain also) shall not so sore abash<sup>806</sup> them as sinfully to drive them therefrom; for the proof whereof, let us first begin at the consideration of the shame.

THE TWENTY-THIRD CHAPTER

Of shame that is joined with the death in the persecution for the faith

ANTONY: How can any faithful wise man dread the death so sore for any respect<sup>807</sup> of shame, when his reason and his faith together may shortly make him perceive that there is therein no piece<sup>808</sup> of very<sup>809</sup> shame at all? For how can that death be shameful that is glorious? Or how can that be but glorious to die for the faith of Christ, if we die both for the faith and in the faith joined with hope and charity, while the Scripture so plainly saith, Pretiosa in conspectu Domini mors sanctorum eius (“Precious is, in the sight of God, the death of his saints”)?<sup>810</sup> Now if the death of his saints be glorious in the sight of God, it can never be shameful in very deed, how shameful soever it seem here in the sight of men. For here we may see and be sure that not at the death of Saint Stephen only, to whom it liked him to show himself with the heaven open over his head,<sup>811</sup> but at the death also of every man that so dieth for the faith, God with his heavenly company beholdeth his whole passion<sup>812</sup> and verily looketh on.

Now if it were so, Cousin, that ye should be brought through the broad high street of a great long city, and that all along the way that ye were going, there were on the one side of the way a rabble of ragged beggars and madmen that would despise you and dispraise<sup>813</sup> you with all the shameful names that they could call you and all the railing words that they could say to you, and that there were then, all along the other side of the same street where you should come by, a goodly company, standing in a fair range a-row, of wise and worshipful<sup>814</sup> folk, allowing<sup>815</sup> and commending you, more than fifteen times as many as that rabble of ragged beggars and railing madmen are, would you let your way by your will,<sup>816</sup> weening that you went unto your shame for<sup>817</sup> the shameful jesting and railing of those mad foolish wretches, or hold on your way with a good cheer and a glad heart, thinking yourself much honored by the laud and approbation of that other honorable sort?

VINCENT: Nay, by my troth,<sup>818</sup> Uncle, there is no doubt but I would much regard the commendation of those commendable folk, and not regard a rush<sup>819</sup> the railing of all those ribalds.<sup>820</sup>

ANTONY: Then, Cousin, can there no man that hath faith account himself shamed here by any manner death that he suffereth for the faith of Christ, while how vile and how shameful soever it seem in the sight here of a few worldly wretches, it is allowed and approved for very precious and honorable in the sight of God, and of all the glorious company of heaven, which as perfectly stand and behold it as those peevish<sup>821</sup> people do, and are in number more than a hundred to one, and of that hundred, every one a hundred times more to be regarded and esteemed than of the other a hundred such whole rabbles.

And now if a man would be so mad as, for fear of the rebuke that he should have of such rebukeful<sup>822</sup> beasts, he would be ashamed to confess the faith of Christ, then with fleeing from a shadow of shame, he should fall into a very shame and a deadly painful shame indeed, for then hath our Savior made a sure promise that he will show himself ashamed of that man before the Father of heaven and all his holy angels, saying in the ninth chapter of Saint Luke, Qui me erubuerit et meos sermones, hunc Filius hominis erubescet cum venerit in maiestate sua et Patris et sanctorum angelorum (“He that is ashamed of me and of my words, of him shall the Son of Man be ashamed when he shall come in the majesty of himself and of his Father and of his holy angels”).<sup>823</sup> And what manner a shameful shame shall that be

805 peradventure suddenly: perhaps at first 806 sore abash: greatly confuse 807 regard, consideration 808 instance 809 true 810 Ps 115(116):15 811 See

Acts 7:55–60. 812 suffering 813 disparage 814 honorable 815 approving of 816 let... will: stop your journey voluntarily 817 on account of 818 truth, faithfulness 819 regard a rush: attach a straw's worth of importance to 820 rascals, vagabonds 821 foolish 822 deserving of rebuke; shameful 823 Lk 9:26

then. If a man's cheeks glow sometimes for shame in this world, they will fall on fire for shame when Christ shall show himself ashamed of them there.

To suffer the thing for Christ's faith that we worldly wretched fools ween were villainy<sup>824</sup> and shame, the blessed apostles reckoned for great glory; for they, when they were with despite<sup>825</sup> and shame scourged, and thereupon commanded to speak no more of the name of Christ, went their way from the council joyful and glad that God had vouchsafed<sup>826</sup> to do them the worship to suffer shameful despite for the name of Jesus. And so proud were they of that shame and villainous pain put unto them that, for all the forbidding of that great council assembled, they ceased not every day to preach out the name of Jesus still, not in the Temple only (out of which they were fetched and whipped for the same before), but also, to double it with, went preaching that name about from house to house too.<sup>827</sup>

I would, since we regard so greatly the estimation of worldly folk, we would, among many naughty<sup>828</sup> things that they use,<sup>829</sup> regard also some such as are good; for it is a manner<sup>830</sup> among them in many places that some by handicraft, some by merchandise, some by other kinds of living arise and come forward in the world; and commonly folk are in youth set forth to convenient<sup>831</sup> masters, under whom they are brought up and grow; but now whensoever they find a servant such as he disdaineth to do such things as he that is his master did while he was servant himself, that servant every man accounteth for a proud unthrift,<sup>832</sup> never like<sup>833</sup> to come to good proof.<sup>834</sup>

Let us, lo, mark and consider this, and weigh well therewithal<sup>835</sup> that our master, Christ—not the master only, but the maker too of all this whole world—was not so proud to disdain<sup>836</sup> for our sakes the most villainous and most shameful death, after<sup>837</sup> the worldly count,<sup>838</sup> that then was used in the world, and the most spiteful mocking therewith, joined to most grievous pain: as<sup>839</sup> crowning him with sharp thorns, that the blood ran down about his face; then they gave him a reed in his hand for a scepter, and knelt down to him and saluted him like a king in scorn, and beat then the reed upon the sharp thorns about his holy head.<sup>840</sup>

Now saith our Savior that the disciple or servant is not above his master.<sup>841</sup> And therefore since our Master endured so many kinds of painful shame, very proud beasts may we well think ourselves if we disdain to do as our Master did. And whereas he through shame ascended into glory, we would be so mad that we rather will fall into everlasting shame, both before heaven and hell, than for fear of a short worldly shame, to follow him into everlasting glory.

THE TWENTY-FOURTH CHAPTER

Of painful death to be suffered in the Turk's persecution for the faith

VINCENT: In good faith, Uncle, as for the shame, ye shall need to take no more pain, for I suppose surely that any man that hath reason in his head shall hold himself satisfied with this. But of truth, Uncle, all the pinch is in the pain; for as for shame, I perceive well enough a man may with wisdom so master it that it shall nothing move him at all, so farforth<sup>842</sup> that it is almost in every country become a common proverb that “shame is as it is taken.”<sup>843</sup> But by God, Uncle, all the wisdom in this world can never so master pain but that pain will be painful, spite<sup>844</sup> of all the wit in this world.

ANTONY: Truth it is, Cousin, that no man can, with all the reason he hath, in such wise change the nature of pain that in the having of pain he feel it not; for but if<sup>845</sup> it be felt, it is, pardie,<sup>846</sup> no pain. And that is the natural cause, Cousin, for which a man may have his leg stricken off by the knee and grieve him not, if his head be off but half an hour before.

But reason may make a reasonable man, though he would not be so foolish as causeless to fall therein, yet upon good causes—either of gaining some kind of great profit, or avoiding of some great loss, or eschewing<sup>847</sup> thereby the suffering of far greater pain—not to shrink therefrom and refuse it to his more hurt and harm, but for his far greater

824 disgrace 825 contempt
826 granted, agreed 827 See Acts 5:12–42. 828 wicked 829 customarily do 830 custom 831 appropriate, suitable 832 good-for-nothing

833 likely 834 come... proof: turn out well 835 in comparison with that 836 to disdain: as to think it beneath him 837 according to 838 reckoning; view 839 such as 840 See Mt 27:27–30; Mk

15:16–20. 841 See Mt 10:24; Lk 6:40; Jn 15:20. 842 so far-forth: to such an extent 843 Whit S195; Til S274 844 in spite 845 but if: unless 846 “by God” (from the French), certainly 847 avoiding, escaping advantage and commodity,<sup>848</sup> content and glad to sustain it.

And this doth reason alone in many cases where it hath much less help to take hold of than it hath
 5 in this matter of faith, for well you wot, to take a sour and a bitter potion is great grief and displeasure, and to be lanced and have the flesh cut is no little pain; now when such things shall be ministered unto a child, or to some childish man either,
 10 they will by their own wills rather let their sickness or their sore grow unto their more grief, till it become incurable, than abide the pain of the curing in time — and that for faint heart, joined with lack of discretion. But a man that hath more wisdom,
 15 though he would without cause no more abide the pain willingly than would the other, yet since reason showeth him what good he shall have by the suffering, and what harm by the refusing, this maketh him well content and glad also for to take it.

Now then, if reason alone be sufficient to move a man to take pain for the gaining of some worldly rest or pleasure, and for the avoiding of another pain though peradventure<sup>849</sup> more, yet endurable but for a short season, why should not reason grounded
 25 upon the sure foundation of faith, and helped also forward with aid of God's grace — as it ever is undoubtedly when folk for a good mind<sup>850</sup> in God's name comen together thereon, our Savior saying himself, Ubi sunt duo vel tres congregati in nomine
 30 meo ibi et ego sum in medio eorum (“Where there are two or three gathered together in my name, there am I also, even in the very midst of them”)<sup>851</sup> — why should not then reason, I say, thus furthered with faith and grace, be much more able first to engender in us such an affection, and after, by long and deep meditation thereof, so to continue that affection that it shall turn into a habitual, fast,<sup>852</sup> and deep-rooted purpose of patient suffering the painful death of this body here in earth for the gaining 35 of everlasting wealthy life in heaven, and avoiding of everlasting painful death in hell?

VINCENT: By my troth, Uncle, words can I none find that should have any reason with them — faith always presupposed, as you protested<sup>853</sup> in the beginning, for a ground — words, I say, can I none find 45 wherewith I might reasonably counterplead<sup>854</sup> this that you have said here already.

But yet I remember the fable that Aesop telleth of a great old hart<sup>855</sup> that had fled from a little bitch<sup>856</sup> which had made suit<sup>857</sup> after him and 50 chased him so long that she had lost him, and as he hoped, more than half given him over;<sup>858</sup> by occasion whereof, having then some time to talk, and meeting with another of his fellows, he fell in deliberation with him what were best for him to do:
 55 whether to run on still and fly further from her, or turn again and fight with her.

Whereunto the other hart advised him to fly no further, lest the bitch might happen to find him again at such time as he should, with the labor of 60 farther flying, be fallen out of breath, and thereby all out of strength too; and so should he be killed lying where he could not stir him, whereas if he would turn and fight, he were in no peril at all: “For the man with whom she hunteth is more than a 65 mile behind her, and she is but a little body, scant<sup>859</sup> half so much as thou, and thy horns may thrust her through before she can touch thy flesh by more than ten times her tooth length.”

“By my troth,” quoth the other hart, “I like your counsel well, and methinketh that the thing is even 70 soothly<sup>860</sup> such as you say. But I fear me when I hear once that urchin<sup>861</sup> bitch bark, I shall fall to my feet<sup>862</sup> and forget altogether. But yet and<sup>863</sup> you will go back with me, then methink we shall be strong 75 enough against that one bitch, between us both.” Whereunto the other hart agreed, and so they both appointed them<sup>864</sup> thereon.

But even as they were about to busk them<sup>865</sup> forward to it, the bitch had found the foot<sup>866</sup> again, 80 and on she came yearning<sup>867</sup> toward the place; whom as soon as the harts heard, they too go, both twain apace.<sup>868</sup>

And in good faith, Uncle, even so<sup>869</sup> I fear it would fare by<sup>870</sup> myself and many others too, which, 85 though we think it reason that you say,<sup>872</sup> and in our minds agree that we should do as you say — yea,

848 benefit 849 perhaps 850 intention, purpose 851 Mt 18:20 852 firm, steadfast 853 stipulated, asserted, insisted 854 argue against 855 deer 856 female dog 857 pursuit 858 given him over: given up on him 859 hardly 860 even soothly: quite truly 861 ill-tempered 862 fall to my feet: take to my heels 863 if 864 appointed them: agreed between themselves 865 busk them: hurry themselves 866 found the foot: picked up the scent 867 baying, barking 868 twain apace: together at full speed 869 even so: in just the same way 870 fare by: happen to 871 who 872 it . . . say: what you say is reasonable and do peradventure<sup>873</sup> think also that we would indeed do as ye say—yet as soon as we should once hear these hellhounds, these Turks, come yelping and bawling<sup>874</sup> upon us, our hearts should soon fall as clean<sup>875</sup> from us as those other harts fly from the hounds.

ANTONY: Cousin, in those days that Aesop speaketh of, though<sup>876</sup> those harts and other brute beasts more had (if he saith sooth)<sup>877</sup> the power to speak and talk, and in their talking, power to talk reason too, yet to follow reason and rule themselves thereby, thereto had they never given them the power. And in good faith, Cousin, as for such things as pertain toward the conducting of reasonable men to salvation, I think without help of grace, men's reasoning shall do little more.

But then are we sure, as I said before, that as for grace, if we desire it, God is at such reasoning always present, and very ready to give it, and but if that<sup>878</sup> men will afterward willingly cast it away, he is ever still as ready to keep<sup>879</sup> it, and from time to time glad to increase it. And therefore biddeth us our Lord, by the mouth of the prophet, that we should not be like such brutish and unreasonable beasts as were those harts, and as are our horses and mules: Nolite fieri sicut equus et mulus in quibus non est intellectus (“Be not you like a horse and a mule, that hath none understanding”).<sup>880</sup>

And therefore, Cousin, let us never dread but that if we will apply our minds to the gathering of comfort and courage against such persecutions, and hear reason, and let it sink into our heart, and cast it not out again, vomit it not up, nor even there choke it up and stifle it with pampering in and stuffing up our stomachs with a surfeit<sup>881</sup> of worldly vanities, God shall so well work therewith that we shall feel strength therein, and not in such wise have all such shameful cowardous hearts as to forsake our Savior, and thereby lose our own salvation and run into eternal fire for fear of death joined therewith, though bitter and sharp, yet short for all that, and in a manner a momentary pain.

VINCENT: Every man, Uncle, naturally grudgeth<sup>882</sup> at pain and is very loath to come at it.

ANTONY: That is very truth, nor no man holdeth<sup>883</sup> any man to go run into it but that if<sup>884</sup> he be taken and may not flee. Then we say that reason plainly telleth us that we should rather suffer and endure the less and shorter here than in hell the sorer<sup>885</sup> and so far the longer too.

VINCENT: I heard, Uncle, of late, where such a reason was made as you make me now—which reason seemeth undoubted<sup>886</sup> and inevitable unto me—yet heard I late, as I say, a man answer it thus: he said that if a man in this persecution should stand still<sup>887</sup> in the confession of his faith, and thereby fall into painful tormentry,<sup>888</sup> he might peradventure hap, for the sharpness and bitterness of the pain, to forsake our Savior even in the midst, and die there with his sin, and so be damned forever; whereas by the forsaking of the faith in the beginning betime<sup>889</sup>—and for the time, and yet not but in word neither, keeping it still nevertheless in his heart—a man may save himself from that painful death, and after ask mercy, and have it, and live long and do many good deeds, and be saved as Saint Peter was.

ANTONY: That man's reason, Cousin, is like a three-footed stool, so tottering on every side that whoso sit thereon may soon take a foul fall. For these are the three feet of this tottering stool: fantastical fear, false faith, false flattering hope.

First, it is a fantastical fear that the man conceiveth that it should be perilous to stand<sup>890</sup> in the confession of the faith at the beginning lest he might afterward, through the bitterness of pain, fall to the forsaking, and so die there in the pain therewith out of hand,<sup>891</sup> and thereby be utterly damned, as though that if a man with pain were overcome, and so forsook his faith, God could not or would not as well give him grace to repent again, and thereupon give him forgiveness, as him that forsook his faith in the beginning and did set so little by<sup>892</sup> him that he would rather forsake him than suffer for his sake any manner pain at all. As though the more pain that a man taketh for God's sake, the worse would God be to him.

If this reason were not unreasonable, then should our Savior not have said as he did, Ne terreamini ab

873 perhaps 874 howling; shouting 875 completely 876 even if 877 truth
878 but if that: unless 879 preserve
880 Ps 31(32):9 881 overindulgence

882 complains; protests 883 expects 884 but that if: unless 885 worse
886 certainly correct 887 firm 888 torture 889 early on 890 stand firm 891 out of hand: immediately 892 set by: value

his qui occidunt corpus et post haec non habent amplius quid faciant (“Be not afeard of them that kill the body and after that have nothing that they can do further”).<sup>893</sup> For he should by<sup>894</sup> this reason have said, “Dread and fear them that may slay the body, for they may by the torment of painful death — but if<sup>895</sup> thou forsake me betimes,<sup>896</sup> in the beginning, and so save thy life and get of me thy pardon and forgiveness after — make thee peradventure<sup>897</sup> forsake me too late, and so to be damned forever.”

The second foot of this tottering stool is a false faith, for it is but a feigned faith for a man to say to God secretly that he believeth him, trusteth him, and loveth him, and then openly — where he should to God’s honor tell the same tale, and thereby prove that he doth so — there, to God’s dishonor, as much as in him is,<sup>898</sup> flatter God’s enemies, and do them pleasure and worldly worship<sup>899</sup> with the forsaking of God’s faith before the world, and is either faithless in his heart too, or else wotteth well that he doth God this despite<sup>900</sup> even before his own face; for except<sup>901</sup> he lack faith, he cannot but know that our Lord is everywhere present, and while he so shamefully forsaketh him, full angrily looketh on.

The third foot of this tottering stool is false flattering hope, for since the thing that he doth when he forsaketh his faith for fear is by the mouth of God (upon the pain of eternal death) forbidden, though the goodness of God forgiveth many folk the fault, yet to be the bolder in offending for the hope of forgiving is a very false pestilent<sup>902</sup> hope, wherewith a man flattereth himself toward his own destruction.

He that in a sudden braid,<sup>903</sup> for fear or other affection, unadvisedly falleth, and after<sup>904</sup> in laboring to rise again, comforteth himself with hope of God’s gracious forgiveness, walketh in the ready way toward his salvation. But he that with the hope of God’s mercy to follow doth encourage himself to sin, and therewith offendeth God first — I have no power to shut<sup>905</sup> the hand of God from giving out his pardon where he list,<sup>906</sup> nor would if I could, but rather help to pray therefor. But yet I very sore<sup>907</sup> fear that such a man may miss the grace to require<sup>908</sup>

it in such effectual wise as to have it granted. Nor I cannot suddenly now remember any example or promise expressed in Holy Scripture that the offender in such a kind shall have the grace offered after in such wise to seek for pardon that God hath (by his other promises of remission promised to penitents) bounden himself to grant it.

But this kind of presumption, under the pretext of hope, seemeth rather to draw near on the one side, as despair doth on the other side, toward the abominable sin of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, against which sin, concerning either the impossibility, or at the least the great difficulty, of forgiveness, our Savior hath showed himself in the twelfth chapter of Saint Matthew and in the third chapter of Saint Mark, where he saith that blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall never be forgiven, neither in this world nor in the world to come.<sup>909</sup>

And where the man that you speak of took in his reason an example of<sup>910</sup> Saint Peter, which forsook our Savior and got forgiveness after, let him consider again on the other side<sup>911</sup> that he forsook him not upon the boldness of any such sinful trust, but was overcome and vanquished upon a sudden fear. And yet by the forsaking Saint Peter won but little, for he did but delay his trouble but a little while, you wot well; for besides that he repented forthwith<sup>912</sup> very sore that he had so done, and wept therefor by and by<sup>913</sup> full bitterly,<sup>914</sup> he came forth at the Whitsuntide ensuing,<sup>915</sup> and confessed his Master again; and soon after that, he was imprisoned therefor; and not ceasing so, was thereupon sore scourged for the confession of his faith; and yet after that, imprisoned again afresh; and being from thence delivered, stinted<sup>916</sup> not to preach on still;<sup>917</sup> until that after manifold labors, travails, and troubles, he was at Rome crucified and with cruel torment slain.<sup>918</sup>

And in like wise I ween I might, in a manner, well warrant that there should no man which denieth our Savior once, and after attaineth remission, escape through that denying one penny the better cheap,<sup>919</sup> but that he shall, ere he come in heaven, full surely pay therefor.

893 Lk 12:4 894 according to 895 but if; unless 896 early on 897 perhaps 898 as much as in him is: as much as he possibly can 899 honor, distinction 900 insult 901 unless 902 pernicious; deadly 903 attack 904 afterwards 905 hold back 906 chooses, pleases

907 greatly 908 request 909 See Mt 12:31–32; Mk 3:28–29; Lk 12:10. 910 took . . . of: used in his argument as an example 911 hand 912 at once 913 by and by: immediately 914 See Mt 26:69–75; Mk 14:66–72; Lk 22:54–62; Jn 18:15–17, 25–27. 915 at the Whitsuntide

ensuing: during the next season of Pentecost 916 ceased 917 See Acts 2–5. 918 See Tertullian, Adversus gnosticos Scorpiæ 15; Eusebius, Church History 3.1. 919 better cheap: more cheaply

VINCENT: He shall peradventure, Uncle, afterward work it out in the fruitful works of penance, prayer, and alms-deed done in true faith and due charity, and attain in such wise forgiveness well enough.

5 ANTONY: All his forgiveness goeth, Cousin, you see well, but by “perhaps.” But as it may be perhaps yea, so may it be perhaps nay — and where is he then? And yet, you wot well, by no manner hap,<sup>920</sup> he shall never hap finally to escape from death, for 10 fear of which he forsook his faith.

VINCENT: No, but he may die his natural death, and escape that violent death, and then he saveth himself from much pain, and so winneth therewith much ease. For evermore<sup>921</sup> a violent death is 15 painful.

ANTONY: Peradventure he shall not avoid a violent death thereby, for God is without doubt displeased, and can bring him shortly to a death as violent by some other way.

20 Howbeit,<sup>922</sup> I see well that you reckon that whoso<sup>923</sup> dieth a natural death dieth like a wanton,<sup>924</sup> even at his ease; you make me remember a man that was once in a galley subtile<sup>925</sup> with us on the sea, which<sup>926</sup> while the sea was sore wrought,<sup>927</sup>
25 and the waves rose very high, and he came never on the sea before, and lay tossed hither and thither, the poor soul groaned sore, and for pain he thought he would very fain<sup>928</sup> be dead, and ever he wished, “Would God I were on land, that I might die in rest.”
30 The waves so troubled him there, with tossing him up and down, to and fro, that he thought that trouble letted him to die,<sup>929</sup> because the waves would not let him rest. But if he might get once to land, he thought he should then die there even at his ease.

35 VINCENT: Nay, Uncle, this is no doubt, but that death is to every man painful, but yet is not the natural death so painful as is the violent.

40 ANTONY: By my troth, Cousin, methinketh that the death which men call commonly “natural” is a violent death to every man whom it fetcheth hence by force against his will. And that is every man which when he dieth is loath to die, and fain would yet live longer if he might.

Howbeit, how small the pain is in the natural death, Cousin, fain would I wit<sup>930</sup> who hath told 45 you. As far as I can perceive, those folk that commonly depart of<sup>931</sup> their natural death have ever one disease and sickness or other, whereof if the pain of that whole week or twain<sup>932</sup> in which they lie pinning<sup>933</sup> in their bed were gathered together into so 50 short a time as a man hath his pain that dieth a violent death, it would, I ween, make double the pain that that is, so that he that naturally dieth offer<sup>934</sup> suffereth more pain than less, though he suffereth it in a longer time. And then would many a man be
55 more loath to suffer so long lingering in pain than with a sharper to be sooner rid.<sup>935</sup>

And yet lieth many a man more days than one in well near as great pain continually as is the pain that with the violent death riddeth the man in less
60 than half an hour, except<sup>936</sup> a man would ween that whereas the pain is great to have a knife cut his flesh on the outside from the skin inward, the pain would be much less if the knife might begin on the inside and cut from the mids<sup>937</sup> outward. 65

Some we hear in their deathbed complain that they think they feel sharp knives cut a-two their heartstrings. Some cry out and think they feel within the brainpan their head pricked even full of pins. And they that lie in a pleurisy<sup>938</sup> think that every 70 time they cough, they feel a sharp sword swap<sup>939</sup> them to the heart.

THE TWENTY-FIFTH CHAPTER

The consideration of the pains of hell, in which we fall if we forsake our Savior, may make us set all the 75 painful death of this world at right nought<sup>940</sup>

ANTONY: Howbeit, what should we need to make any such comparison, between the natural death and the violent, for the matter that we be in hand 80 with here? We may put it out of doubt<sup>941</sup> that he which for the fear of the violent death forsaketh the faith of Christ putteth himself in the peril to find

920 by no manner hap: by no way possible 921 always 922 However 923 whoever 924 pampered child 925 galley subtile: a long, narrow, low ship propelled by oars and sails 926 who

927 sore wrought: extremely turbulent 928 gladly 929 letted . . . die: prevented him from dying 930 know 931 by 932 two 933 suffering 934 more often 935 dispatched 936 unless 937 middle

938 disease resulting in pain in the chest or side 939 cut, cleave 940 set at right nought: regard as nothing at all, disregard completely 941 put it out of doubt: establish it without a doubt his natural death more painful a thousand times, for his natural death hath his everlasting pain so suddenly<sup>942</sup> knit unto it that there is not one moment of an hour between, but the end of the one is the beginning of the other that after never shall have end. And therefore was it not without great cause that Christ gave us so good warning before, when he said, as Saint Luke in the twelfth chapter rehearseth, Dico autem vobis amicis meis, ne tremamini ab his qui occidunt corpus, et post haec non habent amplius quid faciant. Ostendam autem vobis quem timeatis. Timete eum qui postquam occiderit, habet potestatem mittere in Gehennam; ita dico vobis hunc timeate (“I say to you that are my friends, be not afraid of them that kill the body, and which<sup>943</sup> when that is done, are able to do no more. But I shall show you whom you should fear. Fear him which, when he hath killed, hath in his power further to cast him whom he killeth into everlasting fire. So I say to you, be afraid of him”).<sup>944</sup>

God meaneth not here that we should nothing dread at all any man that can but kill the body, but he meaneth that we should not in such wise dread any such that we should for dread of them displease him that can everlastingly kill both body and soul, with a death ever dying and that yet never die. And therefore he addeth and repeateth in the end again the fear that we should have of him and saith, Ita dico vobis hunc timeate (“So I say to you, fear him”).

Oh, good God, Cousin, if a man would well weigh those words, and let them sink, as they should do, down deep into his heart, and often bethink himself thereon, it would, I doubt not, be able enough to make us set at nought all the great Turk’s threats, and esteem<sup>945</sup> him not at a straw, but well content<sup>946</sup> to endure all the pain that all the world would put upon us, for so short while as all they<sup>947</sup> were able to make us dwell therein, rather than by the shrinking from those pains — though never so sharp,<sup>948</sup> yet but short — to cast ourselves into the pain of hell, a hundred thousand times more intolerable, and whereof there shall never come an end. A woeful death is that death in which folk shall evermore be dying and never can once be dead, whereof the Scripture saith, Vocabunt mortem et mors fugiet ab eis (“They shall call and cry for death, and death shall fly from them”).<sup>949</sup>

Oh, good Lord, if one of them were now put in choice of the both, they would rather suffer the whole year together<sup>950</sup> the most terrible death that all the Turks in Turkey could devise than the death that they lie in for the space of half an hour. In how wretched folly fall then those faithless or feeble-faithed folk that, to avoid the pain so far the less and so short, fall in the stead thereof into pain a thousand thousand times more horrible, and of which terrible torment they be sure they shall never have end.

This matter, Cousin, lacketh, as I believe, but<sup>951</sup> either full faith or sufficient minding,<sup>952</sup> for I think, on my faith, if we have the grace verily to believe it, and often to think well thereon, the fear of all the Turks’ persecution, with all this midday devil were able to make them do in the forcing us to forsake our faith, should never be able to turn us.

VINCENT: By my troth,<sup>953</sup> Uncle, I think it be as you say, for surely if we would as often think on these pains of hell — as we be very loath to do, and seek us peevish<sup>954</sup> pastimes of<sup>955</sup> purpose to put such heavy<sup>956</sup> things out of our thought — this one point alone were able enough to make, I think, many a martyr.

THE TWENTY-SIXTH CHAPTER
The consideration of the joys of heaven should make us, for Christ’s sake, abide and endure any painful death

ANTONY: Forsooth,<sup>957</sup> Cousin, if we were such as we should be, I would scant<sup>958</sup> for very shame, in exhortation to the keeping of Christ’s faith, speak of the pains of hell. I would rather put us in mind of the joys of heaven, the pleasure whereof we should be more glad to get than we should be to flee and escape all the pains in hell.

But surely God, in that thing wherein he may seem most rigorous, is very merciful to us, and that is (which many men would little ween) in that he

942 directly 943 who 944 Lk 12:4–5
945 appraise; rate 946 well content:
(be) quite willing 947 all they: all of them 948 though... sharp: no matter how sharp they might be 949 Rv 9:6

950 without interruption 951 only 952 consideration, reflection 953 truth, faithfulness 954 foolish 955 on 956 grave, troublesome, distressing

957 Truly 958 barely; hardly ever provided hell. For I suppose very surely, Cousin, that many a man, and woman too, of whom there now sit some, and more shall hereafter sit, full gloriously crowned in heaven, had they not first been 5 afraid of hell, would toward heaven never have set foot forward.

But yet, undoubtedly, were it so that we could as well conceive in our hearts the marvelous joys of heaven as we conceive the fearful pains of hell
10 (howbeit<sup>959</sup> sufficiently we can conceive neither nother);<sup>960</sup> but if we would in our imagination draw as much toward the perceiving of the one as we may<sup>961</sup> toward the consideration of the other, we should not fail to be far more moved and stirred to the suffering for Christ's sake in this world, for the winning of the heavenly joys, than for the eschewing<sup>962</sup>
15 of all those infernal pains.

But forasmuch as<sup>963</sup> the fleshly pleasures be far less pleasant than the fleshly pains be painful, therefore we fleshly folk that are so drowned in these 20 fleshly pleasures, and in the desire thereof, that we can almost have no manner<sup>964</sup> savor or taste in any pleasure spiritual, have no cause to marvel that our fleshly affections be more abated<sup>965</sup> and refrained<sup>966</sup>
25 by the dread and terror of hell than affections spiritual imprinted in us and pricked<sup>967</sup> forward with desire and joyful hope of heaven.

Howbeit, if we would somewhat set less by the filthy voluptuous<sup>968</sup> appetites of the flesh, and would 30 by withdrawing from them, with help of prayer through the grace of God, draw near to the secret inward pleasure of the spirit, we should by the little sipping that our hearts should have here now, and that sudden taste thereof, have such an estimation of the incomparable and incogitable<sup>969</sup> joy that 35 we shall have (if we will) in heaven by the very full draught<sup>970</sup> thereof—whereof it is written, Satiabor cum apparuerit gloria tua (“I shall be satiate<sup>971</sup> satisfied and fulfilled when thy glory, good Lord, shall 40 appear,”<sup>972</sup> that is to wit, with the fruition<sup>973</sup> of the sight of God's glorious majesty face to face)—that the desire, expectation, and heavenly hope thereof shall more encourage us and make us strong to suffer and sustain for the love of God and salvation of our soul than ever we could be moved to suffer here 45 worldly pain by the terrible dread of all the horrible pains that damned wretches have in hell.

Wherefore in the meantime for lack of such experimental<sup>974</sup> taste, as God giveth here sometimes
50 to some of his special servants, to the intent we may draw toward spiritual exercise too—for which spiritual exercise, God with that gift, as with an earnest-penny<sup>975</sup> of their whole reward after in heaven, comforteth them here in earth—let us not so much with looking to have described what manner of joys 55 they shall be, as with hearing what our Lord telleth us in Holy Scripture how marvelous great they shall be, labor by prayer to conceive in our hearts such a fervent longing for them that we may, for attaining to them, utterly set at nought<sup>976</sup> all fleshly delight, 60 all worldly pleasures, all earthly losses, all bodily torment and pain.

Howbeit, some things are there in Scripture expressed of the manner of the pleasures and joys that we shall have in heaven, as where fulgebunt iusti sicut sol, et qui erudiunt ad iustitiam tamquam scintillae in harundinetis discurrent (“righteous men shall shine as the sun, and shall run about like sparks of 65 fire among reeds”).<sup>977</sup>

Now tell some carnal-minded man of this manner pleasure, and he shall take little pleasure therein, and say he careth not to have his flesh shine, he, nor like a spark of fire to skip about in the sky.
70

Tell him that his body shall be impassible,<sup>978</sup> and never feel harm, yet if he think then therewith that 75 he shall never be a-hungered nor athirst, and shall thereby forbear all his pleasure in eating and drinking, and that he shall never have lust<sup>979</sup> to sleep, and thereby lose the pleasure that he was wont<sup>980</sup> to take in slugging,<sup>981</sup> and that men and women shall there
80 live together as angels without any manner mind or motion unto the carnal act of generation, and that he shall thereby not use there his old filthy voluptuous fashion, he will say he is better at ease already, and would not give this world for that; for as Saint Paul saith, Animalis homo non percipit ea quae sunt Spiritus Dei, stultitia est enim ei.<sup>982</sup>
85

But when the time shall come that these foul

959 although 960 neither nother: neither the one nor the other 961 can 962 escaping 963 forasmuch as: seeing that, inasmuch as 964 kind of 965 subdued 966 restrained; held back 967 spurred 968 set . . . voluptuous: value

less the base, sensual 969 unthinkable; unimaginable 970 drink 971 completely 972 Ps 16(17):15 973 enjoyment 974 experiential 975 pledge, foretaste 976 set at nought: regard as nothing 977 Wis 3:7 978 incapable of suffering 979 desire 980 accustomed 981 lying around in bed 982 “The bestial man does not perceive what is of the Spirit of God, for to him it is foolishness” (1 Cor 2:14).

filthy pleasures shall be so taken from him that it shall abhor his heart once to think on them—whereof every man hath among<sup>983</sup> a certain shadow of experience in the fervent grief of a sore painful sickness, while the stomach can scant<sup>984</sup> abide to look upon any meat,<sup>985</sup> and as for acts of the other foul filthy lust, is ready to vomit if it hap him to think thereon—when men shall, I say, after this life feel that horrible abomination in their heart at the remembrance of those voluptuous pleasures (of which abomination sickness hath here a shadow), for which voluptuous pleasures he would here be loath to change with the joys of heaven; when he shall, I say, after this life have<sup>986</sup> his fleshly pleasures in abomination, and shall, of those heavenly joys, which he set here so little by,<sup>987</sup> have there a glimmering, though far from a perfect sight—oh, good God, how fain<sup>988</sup> will he then be, with how good will and how glad will he then give this whole world, if it were his, to have the feeling of some little part of those joys.

And therefore let us all that cannot now conceive such delight in the consideration of them as we should have often in our eyes by reading, often in our ears by hearing, often in our mouths by rehearsing, often in our hearts by meditation and thinking, those joyful words of Holy Scripture by which we learn how wonderful, huge, and great those spiritual heavenly joys are, of which our carnal hearts hath so feeble and so faint a feeling, and our dull worldly wits so little able to conceive so much as a shadow of the right imagination. “A shadow,” I say, for as for the thing as it is, that can not only no fleshly carnal fantasy conceive, but over<sup>989</sup> that, no spiritual ghostly<sup>990</sup> person peradventure neither that here is living still in this world. For since the very substance essential of all the celestial joy standeth in blessed beholding of the glorious Godhead face to face, there may no man presume or look to attain it in this life, for God hath so said himself: Non videbit me homo et vivet (“There shall no man here living behold me”).<sup>991</sup> And therefore we may well know that for the state of this life, we be not only shut from the fruition<sup>992</sup> of the bliss of heaven, but also that the very best man living here upon earth (the best man, I mean, being no more but a man) cannot, I ween, attain the right imagination thereof, but those that are very virtuous are yet in a manner as far therefrom as the born-blind man from the right imagination of colors.

The words that Saint Paul rehearseth of the prophet Isaiah, prophesying of Christ’s incarnation, may properly be verified of the joys of heaven: Nec oculus vidit, nec auris audivit, nec in cor hominis ascendit, quae praeparavit Deus diligentibus se.<sup>993</sup>

For surely for this state of this world, the joys of heaven are by man’s mouth unspeakable, to man’s ears not audible, to men’s hearts incogitable,<sup>994</sup> so far-forth<sup>995</sup> excel they all that ever men have heard of, all that ever men can speak of, and all that ever any man can by natural possibility think on. And yet where<sup>996</sup> the joys of heaven be such prepared for every saved soul, our Lord saith yet, by the mouth of Saint John, that he will give his holy martyrs, that suffer for his sake, many a special kind of joy.

For he saith, Vincenti dabo edere de ligno vitae (“To him that overcometh, I shall give him to eat of the tree of life”),<sup>997</sup> and also, “he that overcometh shall be clothed in white clothes, and I shall confess his name before my Father and before his angels.”<sup>998</sup>

And also he saith, “fear none of those things that thou shalt suffer,” etc., “but be faithful unto the death, and I shall give thee the crown of life. He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death.”<sup>999</sup> He saith also, Vincenti dabo manna absconditum, et dabo illi calculum candidum. Et in calculo nomen novum scriptum quod nemo scit nisi qui accipit (“To him that overcometh will I give manna secret and hid. And I will give him a white suffrage,<sup>1</sup> and in<sup>2</sup> his suffrage a new name written, which no man knoweth but he that receiveth it”).<sup>3</sup>

They used of old in Greece (where Saint John did write) to elect and choose men unto honorable rooms,<sup>4</sup> and every man’s assent<sup>5</sup> was called his “suffrages,” which in some place was by the voices, in some place by hands; and one kind of those suffrages was by certain things that are in Latin called calculi,<sup>6</sup> because that in some places they used thereto round stones. Now saith our Lord that unto him which overcometh, he will give a white suffrage, for those

They used of old in Greece (where Saint John did write) to elect and choose men unto honorable rooms,<sup>4</sup> and every man’s assent<sup>5</sup> was called his “suffrages,” which in some place was by the voices, in some place by hands; and one kind of those suffrages was by certain things that are in Latin called calculi,<sup>6</sup> because that in some places they used thereto round stones. Now saith our Lord that unto him which overcometh, he will give a white suffrage, for those

They used of old in Greece (where Saint John did write) to elect and choose men unto honorable rooms,<sup>4</sup> and every man’s assent<sup>5</sup> was called his “suffrages,” which in some place was by the voices, in some place by hands; and one kind of those suffrages was by certain things that are in Latin called calculi,<sup>6</sup> because that in some places they used thereto round stones. Now saith our Lord that unto him which overcometh, he will give a white suffrage, for those

983 now and then 984 hardly, barely 985 food 986 hold 987 set... by: valued here so little 988 glad, pleased 989 beyond 990 devout 991 Ex 33:20 992 enjoyment 993 “Eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has it arisen in the heart of man, what God has prepared for those who love him” (1 Cor 2:9).

994 unthinkable; unimaginable 995 so far-forth: to such an extent 996 whereas

997 Rv 2:7; the name “Vincent” comes from here. 998 Rv 3:5 999 Rv 2:10–11
1 vote; an object, such as a pebble, used in casting votes 2 on 3 Rv 2:17 4 offices, positions 5 vote 6 “pebbles”

that were white signified approving, as the black signifieth reproving. And in those suffrages did they use to write the name of him to whom they gave their voice.<sup>7</sup> And now saith our Lord that unto him 5 that overcometh, he will in the suffrage give him a new name, which no man knoweth but he that receiveth it.

He saith also, “He that overcometh, I will make him a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall 10 go no more out thereof; and I shall write upon him the name of my God and the name of the city of my God, the new Jerusalem, which descendeth from heaven from my God; and I shall write on him also my new name.”<sup>8</sup>

15 If we should dilate<sup>9</sup> and were able to declare<sup>10</sup> these special gifts, with yet others more specified in the second and the third chapter of the Apocalypse,<sup>11</sup> there would it appear how far those heavenly joys shall surmount above all the comfort that 20 ever came in the mind of any man living here upon earth.

The blessed apostle Saint Paul, that suffered so many perils and so many passions<sup>12</sup> — he that saith of himself that he hath been in laboribus pluribus, in carceribus abundantius, in plagis supra modum, etc. (“in many labors, in prisons offer than others, in stripes above measure,<sup>13</sup> at point of death oftentimes; of the Jews had I, five times, forty stripes save one.<sup>14</sup> Thrice have I been beaten with rods; once was 30 I stoned. Thrice have I been in shipwreck. A day and a night was I in the depth of the sea. In my journeys oft have I been in peril of floods, in peril of thieves, in perils by the Jews, in perils by the paynims,<sup>15</sup> in perils in the city, in perils in desert, in perils in the sea, perils by false brethren; in labor and misery, in many nights’ watch, in hunger and thirst, in many fastings, in cold and nakedness; besides those things that are outward, my daily instant<sup>16</sup> labor, I mean my care and solicitude about all the churches”),<sup>17</sup>
 35 and yet saith he more of his tribulations, which for the length I let pass — this blessed apostle, I say, for all the tribulations that himself suffered in the continuance of so many years, calleth yet all the tribulations of this world but light and as short as a moment in respect of<sup>18</sup> the weighty glory that it after this world winneth us: Id enim quod in praesenti est momentaneum et leve tribulationis nostrae, supra modum in sublimitate aeternum gloriae pondus operatur in nobis, non contemplantibus nobis quae videntur sed quae non videntur, quae enim videntur temporalia sunt, quae autem non videntur aeterna sunt (“This same short and momentary tribulation of ours, that is in this present time, worketh within us the weight of glory above measure — in sublimitate — on high, we beholding not those things that 55 we see, but those things that we see not. For those things that we see be but temporal things, but those things that are not seen are eternal”).<sup>19</sup>

Now to this great glory can there no man come headless. Our head is Christ,<sup>20</sup> and therefore to him
 60 must we be joined, and as members of his must we follow him if we will come thither. He is our guide to guide us thither and is entered in before us, and he therefore that will enter in after, debet sicut ille ambulavit et ipse ambulare (“the same way that Christ walked, the same way must he walk”).<sup>21</sup>
 65 And what was the way by which he walked into heaven? Himself showeth what way it was that his Father had provided for him, where he said unto the two disciples going toward the castle<sup>22</sup> of Emmaus, Nesciebatis quia oportebat Christum pati, et sic introire in regnum suum? (“Knew ye not that Christ must suffer passion, and by that way enter into his kingdom?”)<sup>23</sup> Who can for very shame desire to 70 enter into the kingdom of Christ with ease, when himself entered not into his own without pain?

THE TWENTY-SEVENTH CHAPTER
The consideration of the painful death of Christ is sufficient to make us content to suffer painful death for his sake 80

ANTONY: Surely, Cousin, as I said before in<sup>24</sup> bearing the loss of worldly goods, in suffering of captivity, thralldom,<sup>25</sup> and imprisonment, and in the glad sustaining of worldly shame, that if we would in all those points deeply ponder the example of our Savior himself, it were of itself alone sufficient to encourage every kind<sup>26</sup> Christian man and woman to 7 support; proxy 8 Rv 3:12 9 expand our scope 10 describe 11 Book of Revelation 12 sufferings, afflictions 13 stripes above measure: more floggings than can be counted 14 Thirty-nine lashes was a standard Jewish punishment, because forty was the absolute maximum; see Dt 25:3. 15 pagans 16 pressing, urgent 17 2 Cor 11:23–28 18 in respect of: in comparison with 19 2 Cor 4:17–18

20 See Col 1:18; Eph 1:22–23; 4:15–16. 21 1 Jn 2:6 22 village 23 See Lk 24:26. 24 about 25 enslavement 26 natural; loving; grateful refuse none of all those calamities for his sake, so say I now for painful death also, that if we could and would with due compassion conceive in our minds a right imagination and remembrance of 5 Christ's bitter painful Passion—of the many sore<sup>27</sup> bloody strokes that the cruel tormentors with rods and whips gave him upon every part of his holy tender body; the scornful crown of sharp thorns 10 beaten down upon his holy head, so strait<sup>28</sup> and so deep that on every part his blessed blood issued out and streamed down; his lovely limbs drawn and stretched out upon the cross to the intolerable pain of his fore-beaten and sore-beaten veins and sinews, 15 new feeling with the cruel stretching and straining pain far passing any cramp, in every part of his blessed body at once; then the great long nails cruelly driven with hammers through his holy hands and feet; and in this horrible pain, lift up and let 20 hang with the peise<sup>29</sup> of all his body bearing down upon the painful wounded places so grievously pierced with nails; and in such torment (without pity, but not without many despites)<sup>30</sup> suffered to be pinned and pained the space of more than three 25 long hours, till himself willingly gave up unto his Father his holy soul; after which yet, to show the mightiness of their malice after his holy soul departed, pierced his holy heart with a sharp spear, at which issued out the holy blood and water, whereof his holy sacraments have inestimable se-30 cret strength<sup>31</sup>—if we would, I say, remember these things in such wise, as would God we would, I verily suppose that the consideration of his incomparable kindness could not fail in such wise to inflame our key-cold<sup>32</sup> hearts, and set them on fire in his love, 35 that we should find ourselves not only content, but also glad and desirous to suffer death for his sake, that<sup>33</sup> so marvelously lovingly letted<sup>34</sup> not to sustain so far passing painful death<sup>35</sup> for ours.<sup>36</sup>

Would God we would here, to the shame of our 40 cold affection, again<sup>37</sup> toward God for such fervent love and inestimable kindness of God toward us—would God we would, I say, but consider what hot affection many of these fleshly lovers have borne, and daily do, to those upon whom they dote, how 45 many of them have not letted to jeopard<sup>38</sup> their lives—and how many have willingly lost their lives indeed—without, either, great kindness showed them before. And afterward, you wot well, they could nothing win, but even that yet contented and satisfied their mind that by their death, their 50 lover should clearly see how faithfully they loved;

 the delight whereof, imprinted in their fantasy, not assuaged only, but counterpoised also,<sup>39</sup> they thought, all their pain. Of these affections, with the wonderful dolorous effects following thereon, not 55 only old written stories, but over<sup>40</sup> that, I think in every country, Christian and heathen both, experience giveth us proof enough. And is it not then a wonderful shame for us, for the dread of temporal death, to forsake our Savior, that willingly suffered 60 so painful death rather than he would forsake us, considering that besides that, he shall for our suffering so highly reward us with everlasting wealth?

Oh, if he that is content to die for his love, of whom he looketh after<sup>41</sup> for no reward, and yet by 65 his death goeth from her, might by his death be sure to come to her, and ever after in delight and pleasure to dwell with her, such a lover would not let here to die for her twice. And how cold lovers be we then unto God, if rather than die for him once, we 70 will refuse him and forsake him forever, that both died for us before, and hath also provided that if we die here for him, we shall in heaven everlastingly both live and also reign with him? For as Saint Peter saith, Si compatimur et conregnabimus (“If we suffer 75 with him, we shall reign with him”).<sup>42</sup>

How many Romans, how many noble courages<sup>43</sup> of other sundry countries, have willingly given their own lives, and suffered great deadly pains and very painful deaths, for their countries, and the 80 respect<sup>44</sup> of winning by their deaths the only reward of worldly renown and fame? And should we then shrink to suffer as much for eternal honor in heaven, and everlasting glory? The devil hath also some so obstinate heretics that endure willingly 85 painful death for vain glory—and is it not then more than shame that Christ shall see his Catholics forsake his faith rather than suffer the same for heaven and very<sup>45</sup> glory?

Would God, as I many times have said, that the 90

27 great, grievous, painful 28 tight 29 weight 30 insults 31 hidden power. See Mt 27:24–50; Mk 15:6–37; Lk 23:13–46; Jn 19:1–34. 32 without heat or fervor 33 who 34 hesitated 35 so . . .

death: so far more extremely painful a death 36 our sake 37 in return, in response
 38 letted to jeopard: hesitated to risk

39 counterpoised also: also compensated for 40 beyond 41 afterwards 42 See Rom
 8:17; 2 Tim 2:11–12; 1 Pt 4:13. 43 spirits 44 consideration 45 true remembrance of Christ's kindness in suffering his Passion for us, the consideration of hell that we should fall in by forsaking of him, the joyful meditation of eternal life in heaven that we shall win 5 with this short temporal death patiently taken for him, had so deep a place in our breast as reason would they should, and as (if we would do our devoir<sup>46</sup> toward it and labor for it, and pray therefor) I verily think they should. For then should 10 they so take up our mind, and ravish it<sup>47</sup> all another way, that as a man hurt in a fray<sup>48</sup> feeleth not sometimes his wound, nor yet is not ware<sup>49</sup> thereof till his mind fall more thereon, so far-forth<sup>50</sup> that sometimes another man showeth him that he hath 15 lost a hand before that he perceiveth it himself, so the mind ravished in the thinking deeply of those other things — Christ's death, hell and heaven — were likely to diminish and put away of our painful death four parts<sup>51</sup> of the feeling either of the fear 20 or the pain. For of this am I very sure: if we had the fifteenth part of the love to Christ that he both had and hath to us, all the pain of this Turk's persecution could not keep us from him, but that there would be at this day as many martyrs here in Hun-25 gary as have been afore in other countries of old.

And of this point put I nothing doubt,<sup>52</sup> but that if the Turk stood even here with all his whole army about him, and every one of them all were ready at our hand with all the terrible torments that they 30 could imagine, and but if<sup>53</sup> we would forsake the faith were setting their torments to us, and to the increase of our terror, fell all at once in a shout with trumpets, tabrets, and timbrels<sup>54</sup> all blown up at once, and all their guns let go therewith, to 35 make us a fearful noise, if there should suddenly then, on the other side, the ground quake and rive a-twain,<sup>55</sup> and the devils rise out of hell, and show themselves in such ugly shape as damned wretches shall see them, and with that hideous howling that 40 those hellhounds should shriek, lay hell open on every side round about our feet, that as we stood, we should look down into that pestilent pit and see the swarm of seely<sup>56</sup> souls in the terrible torments there, we would wax so afeard<sup>57</sup> of that sight that, as for 45 the Turk's host, we should scantly<sup>58</sup> remember we saw them.

And in good faith for all that, yet think I further this: that if there might then appear the glory of God, the Trinity in his high marvelous majesty, our Savior in his glorious manhood sitting on his 50 throne, with his immaculate mother and all that glorious company calling us there unto them, and that yet our way should lie through marvelous painful death before we could come at them, upon the sight, I say, of that glory, there would I ween be 55 no man that once would shrink thereat, but every man would run on toward them in all that ever he might, though there lay for malice to kill us by the way, both all the Turk's tormentors, and all the devils too. 60

And therefore, Cousin, let us well consider these things, and let us have sure hope in the help of God, and then I doubt not but that we shall be sure that as the prophet saith, the truth of his promise shall so compass us with a pavise<sup>59</sup> that of this incursion 65 of this midday devil, this Turk's persecution, we shall never need to fear; for either if we trust in God well, and prepare us therefor, the Turk shall never meddle with us, or else if he do, harm shall he none do us, but instead of harm, inestimable good. Of 70 whose gracious help wherefore<sup>60</sup> should we so sore<sup>61</sup> now despair (except we were so mad men as to ween that either his power or his mercy were worn out already), when we see so many a thousand holy martyr's by his holy help suffered as much before as any 75 man shall be put to now? Or what excuse can we have by the tenderness of our flesh, when we can be no more tender than were many of them, among whom were not only men of strength, but also weak women and children? 80

And since the strength of them all stood in the help of God, and that the very strongest of them all was never able of themselves, and with God's help the feeblest of them all was strong enough to stand 85 against all the world, let us prepare ourselves with prayer, with our whole trust in his help, without any trust in our own strength. Let us think thereon and prepare us in our mind thereto long before; let us therein conform our will unto his, not desiring 90 to be brought unto the peril of persecution (for it seemeth a proud high<sup>62</sup> mind to desire martyrdom), but desiring help and strength of God if he suffer<sup>63</sup>

<sup>46</sup> best endeavor <sup>47</sup> ravish it: drag it by force <sup>48</sup> fight <sup>49</sup> aware <sup>50</sup> so far-forth: to such an extent <sup>51</sup> four parts:
 four times as much <sup>52</sup> put I nothing doubt: I have no doubt at all <sup>53</sup> but if: unless <sup>54</sup> tabrets and timbrels: small drums and tamborines <sup>55</sup> rive a-twain:

 split in two <sup>56</sup> poor, pitiful <sup>57</sup> wax so

afeard: become so afraid <sup>58</sup> hardly, barely <sup>59</sup> shield <sup>60</sup> why <sup>61</sup> greatly, grievously
<sup>62</sup> puffed-up; conceited <sup>63</sup> permit us to come to the stress,<sup>64</sup> either being sought, founden, and brought out against our wills, or else being by his commandment for the comfort of our cure<sup>65</sup> bounden to abide.<sup>66</sup>

5 Let us fall to fasting, to prayer, to alms-deed in time, and give that unto God that may be taken from us; if the devil put in our mind the saving of our land and our goods, let us remember that we cannot save them long; if he fear<sup>67</sup> us with exile, and 10 flying from our country, let us remember that we be born in the broad world, and not like a tree to stick still in one place, and that whithersoever we go God shall go with us.

If he threaten us with captivity, let us tell him 15 again,<sup>68</sup> better is it to be thrall<sup>69</sup> unto man a while for the pleasure of God than by displeasing God be perpetual thrall unto the devil. If he threat us with imprisonment, let us tell him we will rather be man's prisoners a while here in earth than by forsak-20 ing the faith be his prisoners ever in hell.

If he put in our minds the terror of the Turks, let us consider his false sleight<sup>70</sup> therein. For this tale he telleth us to make us forget him. But let us remember well that in respect of himself,<sup>71</sup> the Turk 25 is but a shadow, nor all that they all can do can be but a flea biting in comparison of the mischief that he goeth about. The Turks are but his tormentors, for himself doth the deed; our Lord saith in the Apocalypse, Diabolus mittet aliquos vestrum in 30 carcerem ut tentemini (“The devil shall send some of you to prison, to tempt you”);<sup>72</sup> he saith not that men shall, but that the devil shall himself, for without question, the devil's own deed it is to bring us by his temptation with fear and force thereof into 35 eternal damnation. And therefore saith Saint Paul,
Non est nobis colluctatio adversus carnem et san-guinem, etc. (“Our wrestling is not against flesh and blood,”<sup>73</sup> etc.). Thus may we see that in such persecutions it is the midday devil himself that 40 maketh such incursion<sup>74</sup> upon us, by the men that are his ministers, to make us fall for fear. For till we fall, he can never hurt us. And therefore saith Saint Peter, Resistite diabolo et fugiet a vobis (“Stand against the devil, and he shall fly from you”);<sup>75</sup> for he never runneth upon a man to seize on him with 45 his claws till he see him down on the ground willingly fallen himself, for his fashion<sup>76</sup> is to set his servants against us, and by them to make us for fear or for impatience to fall. And himself in the meanwhile compasseth<sup>77</sup> us, running and roaring like 50 a ramping<sup>78</sup> lion about us, looking who will fall, that he then may devour him. Adversarius vester

diabolus, saith Saint Peter, “sicut leo rugiens circuit quaerens quem devoret” (“Your adversary the devil like a roaring lion runneth about in circuit,<sup>79</sup> seek-55 ing whom he may devour”).<sup>80</sup> The devil it is, therefore, that if we for fear of men will fall, is ready to run upon us and devour us. And is it wisdom, then, so much to think upon the Turks that we forget the devil? What madman is he, that when a lion 60 were about to devour him, would vouchsafe<sup>81</sup> to regard the biting of a little fisting cur?<sup>82</sup> Therefore, when he roareth out upon us by the threats of mortal men, let us tell him that with our inward eye we see him well enough, and intend to stand and 65 fight with him even hand to hand. If he threaten us that we be too weak, let us tell him that our captain Christ is with us, and that we shall fight with his strength that hath vanquished him already.

And let us fence us<sup>83</sup> with faith, and comfort us 70 with hope, and smite the devil in the face with a firebrand of charity. For surely if we be of that tender loving mind that our Master was, and not hate them that kill us, but pity them and pray for them, with sorrow for the peril that they work unto them-75 selves, that fire of charity thrown in his face striketh the devil suddenly so blind that he cannot see where to fasten a stroke<sup>84</sup> on us.

When we feel us too bold, remember our own feebleness; when we feel us too faint,<sup>85</sup> remem-80 ber Christ's strength. In our fear, let us remember Christ's painful agony—that himself would for our comfort suffer before his Passion, to the intent that no fear should make us despair<sup>86</sup>—and ever call for his help, such as himself list<sup>87</sup> to send us. And 85 then need we never to doubt but that either he shall keep us from the painful death, or shall not fail so to strengthen us in it that he shall joyously bring

64 hardship, affliction; suffering; trial

65 our cure: those we are responsible for

66 bounden to abide: obliged to remain

67 frighten 68 in return, in reply

69 slave 70 false sleight: treacherous trickery 71 in respect of himself: compared to him 72 Rv 2:10 73 Eph 6:12

74 attack 75 actually Jam 4:7; but see

1 Pt 5:8–11. 76 custom, habitual practice

77 encircles 78 rampaging, raging

79 a circle 80 1 Pt 5:8 81 be willing

82 fisting cur: farting dog 83 fence us:

armor ourselves 84 fasten a stroke: land a blow 85 lacking in courage 86 agony... despair: See More's next and last book, The Sadness of Christ. 87 pleases, chooses us to heaven by it—and then doth he much more for us than if he kept us from it. For as God did more for poor Lazarus in helping him patiently to die for hunger at the rich man's door than if he had 5 brought him to the door all the rich glutton's dinner,<sup>88</sup> so though he be gracious to a man whom he delivereth out of painful trouble, yet doth he much more for a man if through right painful death he deliver him from this wretched world into eternal 10 bliss. From which whosoever shrink away with forsaking his faith, and falleth in the peril of everlasting fire, he shall be very sure to repent it ere it be long after. For I ween that whensoever he falleth sick next, he will wish that he had been killed for 15 Christ's sake before.

What folly is it then for fear to flee from that death which thou seest thou shalt shortly after wish thou hadst died? Yea, I ween almost every good Christian man would very fain<sup>89</sup> this day that he had been for 20 Christ's faith cruelly killed yesterday, even for the desire of heaven, though<sup>90</sup> there were none hell; but to fear while the pain is coming, there is all our let;<sup>91</sup> but then if we would remember hell's pain on the other side,<sup>92</sup> into which we fall while we flee from 25 this, then should this short pain be no let at all. And yet should we be more pricked forward,<sup>93</sup> if we were faithful, by deep considering of the joys of heaven, of which the Apostle<sup>94</sup> saith, Non sunt condignae pas- siones huius temporis ad futuram gloriam quae reve- 30 labitur in nobis (“The passions<sup>95</sup> of this time be not worthy to the glory that is to come, which shall be showed in us”).<sup>96</sup> We should not, I ween, Cousin, need much more in all this whole matter than that one text of Saint Paul, if we would consider it well.
 35 For surely, mine own good Cousin, remember that if it were possible for me and you alone to suffer as much trouble as the whole world doth together, all that were not worthy,<sup>97</sup> of itself, to bring us to the joy which we hope to have everlastingly. And therefore I pray you, let the consideration of that joy put out all worldly trouble out of your heart, and also 40 pray that it may do the same in me. And even thus will I, good Cousin, with these words, make a sudden end of mine whole tale, and bid you farewell.

 For now begin I to feel myself somewhat weary. 45

VINCENT: Forsooth, good Uncle, this is a good end, and it is no marvel though you be waxen<sup>98</sup> weary. For I have this day put you to so much labor that, saving for the comfort that yourself may take of your time so well bestowed, and for the 50 comfort that I have myself taken (and more shall,
 I trust) of your good counsel given, else would I be very sorry to have put you to so much pain. But now shall our Lord reward and recompense you therefor, and many shall, I trust, pray for you. For, to the 55 intent that the more may take profit by you, I purpose, Uncle, as my poor wit and learning will serve me, to put your good counsel in remembrance, not in our language only, but in the Almain<sup>99</sup> tongue too. And thus, praying God to give me and all oth-60 ers that shall read it the grace to follow your good counsel therein, I shall commit you to God.

ANTONY: Since you be minded, Cousin, to bestow so much labor thereon, I would it had happed you<sup>100</sup> to fetch the counsel at<sup>101</sup> some wiser man, 65 that could have given you better. But better men may set<sup>102</sup> more things, and better also thereto. And in the meantime, I beseech our Lord to breathe of his Holy Spirit into the reader's breast, which inwardly may teach him in heart, without whom lit-70 tle availeth all that all the mouths of the world were able to teach in men's ears. And thus, good Cousin, farewell, till God bring us together again, either here or in heaven. Amen.

Finis

75

88 See Lk 16:19–22. 89 gladly 90 even if 91 hindrance, obstacle 92 hand 93 pricked forward: spurred on 94 the Apostle: Saint Paul 95 sufferings

 96 Rom 8:18 97 enough to deserve
 98 grown 99 German 100 I would it had happed you: I wish you had happened 101 of 102 put in place, put down; add

The Sadness, the Weariness, the Fear, and the Prayer of Christ before He Was Taken Prisoner

Deprived of his writing materials on June 12, 1535, More wrote De tristitia, his last book, in the preceding weeks. Written on small gatherings of paper, this Latin commentary on Scripture was smuggled out of the Tower, probably by More's servant John-a-Wood or another visitor (CW 14: 717). The work was first published in the 1557 Workes of Sir Thomas More, Knight, in an English translation by Mary Basset, daughter of Margaret More Roper. The Latin text was first published in the 1565 Louvain edition of More's Opera omnia. The original manuscript, in More's own hand, was rediscovered in 1963 at the Royal College in Valencia; facsimiles of each page are given in CW 14, and provide an invaluable record of More's habits of composition and revision.

As Yale editor and translator Clarence Miller argues, the full title of this work, carefully chosen by More, indicates his three major concerns: first, the same "sadness" and "weariness" of emotional suffering that Christ experienced; second, the "fear," which informs More's meditation on martyrs; and finally, "the example Christ offered of reverent, attentive prayer" (CW 14: 740). Because "prayer is the only safeguard" against sadness and fear, More stresses the importance of this "fighting technique and battle plan" embodied in Christ's actions the night before his death.

Many of More's lifelong concerns as a writer remain in view throughout this last work, as the hourglass empties. More returns, for example, to the image of the ship in a storm as he considers anew the demands of bravery and prudence, as he did earlier in Utopia. He acknowledges being vexed by "mental wandering," reminiscent of struggles he discerned in The Life of Pico and elsewhere. His passages on Christ's example of friendship, extended to friends and enemies alike, recall earlier passages written by an author who was "born for friendship," according to Erasmus, and who now shares his commentary on these images of Christ's charity through writing which Louis Martz has called More's "last address to the world and to the self." Regarding More's choice of Latin for his final work, Martz concludes: "It is a moving and appropriate thought that in the somber close of his career More should have sought to communicate with the audience that had admired his Utopia."

After the text of De tristitia, readers will find a Catena (a "chain" or "connected series") of short texts that More compiled during his imprisonment. The text is a translation of twenty-eight handwritten pages that accompanied the Valencia manuscript (see CW 14: 626–81). As Clarence Miller observes, this gathering is "a catena of scriptural passages and some of his own brief reflections on the folly of refusing a martyr's death when the faith demanded it" (696).

The translation of De tristitia and notes are those of Clarence Miller, in consultation with the notes from Garry E. Haupt's edition of The Tower Works (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1980). Throughout De tristitia, More quotes from the Monotessaron, a Gospel harmony (a book that attempts to merge all four Gospels into one account) by John Gerson (1363–1429).

CONTENTS

Introduction: From the Last Supper to Gethsemane . . . . .	1251
Problem Posed: Why Did Christ Allow Himself to Be “sad unto death”? . . .	1251
On the Prayer of “Commander” Christ . . . . .	1253
How Christ Deals with Sleeping Friends . . . . .	1261
How Christ Deals with Sleepless Judas . . . . .	1269
On the Severing of Malchus’ Ear . . . . .	1285
On Priests’ and Magistrates’ “hour of darkness” . . . . .	1289
On the Flight of Disciples . . . . .	1293
On the Youth Who Flees Naked . . . . .	1293
On the Capture of Christ . . . . .	1297
More’s Catena of Scriptural Quotations . . . . .	1297

This facsimile (reduced) shows More’s original manuscript of The Sadness of Christ (Fol. 76, Valencia MS. See CW 14: 302–3). At the top of the page is a note More makes to himself (hoc vocabulum aut onerarius) asking if the pun he intended (honorarius/onerarius) on the Ciceronian phrase arbiter honorarius should be made more obvious. At the bottom he quotes Horace from memory.

The Sadness, the Weariness, the Fear, and the Prayer of Christ before He Was Taken Prisoner

Matthew 26, Mark 14, Luke 22, John 18

5 When Jesus had said these things, they recited the hymn and went out to the Mount of Olives.<sup>1</sup>

Though he had spoken at length about holiness during the supper with his apostles, nevertheless he finished his discourses with a hymn when he was ready to leave. Alas, how different we are from Christ, though we call ourselves Christians: our conversation during meals is not only meaningless and inconsequential (and even for such negligence Christ warned us that we will have to render an accounting)<sup>2</sup> but often our table-talk is also vicious, and then finally, when we are bloated with food and drink, we leave the table without giving thanks to God for the banquets he has bestowed upon us, with never a thought for the gratitude we owe him.

10 [Paul of Saint Mary, Archbishop of] Burgos, a learned, holy man, and an outstanding investigator of sacred subjects, gives some convincing arguments to show that the hymn which Christ at that time recited with his apostles consisted of those six psalms which, taken together, are called by the Jews “The Great Alleluia” — namely Psalm 112[113] and the five following it. For from very ancient times the Jews have followed the custom of reciting these six psalms, under the name “Great Alleluia,” as a prayer of thanksgiving at the Passover and certain other principal feasts, and even now they still go through the same hymn on the same feast days.

15 But as for us, though we used to say different hymns of thanksgiving and benediction at meals according to the different times of the year, each hymn suited to its season, we have now permitted almost all of them to fall out of use, and we rest content with saying two or three words, no matter what, before going away, and even those few words we mumble merely for form’s sake, muttering through our yawns.

“They went out to the Mount of Olives,” not to bed. The prophet says, “I arose in the middle of the night to pay homage to you,”<sup>3</sup> but Christ did not even lie down in bed. But as for us, I wish we could truly apply to ourselves even this text: “I thought of you as I lay in my bed.”<sup>4</sup>

Moreover, it was not yet summer when Christ left the supper and went over to the mount. For it was not that much beyond the vernal equinox, and that the night was cold is clearly shown by the fact that the servants were warming themselves around charcoal fires in the courtyard of the high priest.<sup>5</sup> But this was not the first time that Christ had done this, as the evangelist clearly testifies when he says, “as he customarily did.”<sup>6</sup> He went up a mountain to pray, teaching us by this sign that, when we prepare ourselves to pray, we must lift up our minds from the bustling confusion of human concerns to the contemplation of heavenly things.

60 Mount Olivet itself also has a mysterious significance, planted as it was with olive trees. For the olive branch was generally used as a symbol of peace, which Christ came to establish between God and man after their long alienation. Moreover, the oil which is produced from the olive represents the anointing by the Spirit, for Christ came and then returned to his Father in order to send the Holy Spirit upon the disciples so that his anointing might then teach them what they would not have been able to bear had it been told them only a short time before.<sup>7</sup>

Across the stream Cedron to the outlying estate named Gethsemani.<sup>8</sup>

75 The stream Cedron lies between the city of Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives, and the word “Cedron” in Hebrew means “sadness.” The name “Gethsemani” in Hebrew means “most fertile valley” or

1 Mt 26:30 2 Mt 12:36 3 Ps 118(119):62 4 Ps 62(63):62 5 Jn 18:8 6 Lk 22:39 7 Jn 16:12–13 8 Jn 18:1; Mt 26:36; Mk 14:32

“valley of olives.” And so there is no reason for us to attribute it merely to chance that the evangelists recorded these place-names so carefully. For if that were the case, once they had reported that he went
 5 to the Mount of Olives, they would have considered that they had said quite enough, if it were not that God had veiled under these place-names some mysterious meanings which attentive men, with the help of the Holy Spirit, would try to uncover
 10 because the names were mentioned. And so, since not a single syllable can be thought inconsequential in a composition which was dictated by the Holy Spirit as the apostles wrote it, and since not a sparrow falls to the earth without God’s direction,<sup>9</sup> I
 15 cannot think either that the evangelists mentioned those names accidentally or that the Jews assigned them to the places (whatever they themselves intended when they named them) without a secret plan (though unknown to the Jews themselves) of 20 the Holy Spirit, who concealed in these names a store of sacred mysteries to be ferreted out some-time later.

But since “Cedron” means “sadness,” and also “blackness,” and since this same word is the name
 25 not only of the stream mentioned by the evangelists but also (as is sufficiently established) of the valley through which the stream flows and which separates the city from the estate Gethsemani, these names (if their effect is not blocked by our drowsiness)
 30 remind us that while we are exiled from the Lord (as the apostle says)<sup>10</sup> we must surely cross over, before we come to the fruitful Mount of Olives and the pleasant estate of Gethsemani, an estate which is not gloomy and ugly to look at but most fertile 35 in every sort of joy, we must (I say) cross over the valley and stream of Cedron, a valley of tears and a stream of sadness whose waves can wash away the blackness and filth of our sins. But if we get so weary of pain and grief that we perversely attempt 40 to change this world, this place of labor and penance, into a joyful haven of rest, if we seek heaven on earth, we cut ourselves off forever from true happiness, and will drown ourselves in penance when it is too late to do any good and in unbearable, unending tribulations as well.

This, then, is the very salutary lesson contained in these place-names, so fittingly chosen are they.

But as the words of Holy Scripture are not tied to one sense only but rather are teeming with various mysterious meanings, these place-names harmonize with the immediate context of Christ’s
 50 Passion very well, as if for that reason alone God’s eternal providence had seen to it that these places should long beforehand have been designated by such names as would prove to be, some centuries
 55 later, preordained tokens of his Passion, as the comparison of his deeds with the names would show. For, since “Cedron” means “blackened,” does it not seem to recall that prediction of the prophet that Christ would work out his glory by means of inglorious torment, that he would be disfigured by dark bruises, gore, spittle, and dirt? — “There is nothing beautiful or handsome about his face.”<sup>11</sup>

Then, too, the meaning of the stream he crossed — “sad” — was far from irrelevant as he himself testified when he said, “My soul is sad unto death.”<sup>12</sup>

And his disciples also followed him.<sup>13</sup>

That is, the eleven who had remained followed him. As for the twelfth, the devil entered into him after the morsel and made off with him,<sup>14</sup> so that he did not follow the master as a disciple but pursued him as a traitor, and bore out only too well what Christ said: “He who is not with me is against me.”<sup>15</sup> Against Christ he certainly was, since, at that very moment, he was preparing to spring his trap for him, while the other disciples were following after him to pray. Let us follow after Christ and pray to the Father together with him. Let us not emulate Judas by departing from Christ, after partaking of his favors and dining excellently with him, lest we 70 should bear out that prophecy: “If you saw a thief you ran away with him.”<sup>16</sup>

Judas, who betrayed him, also knew the place, because Jesus frequently went there with his disciples.<sup>17</sup>

Once again the evangelists take advantage of mentioning the betrayer to emphasize for us, and to recommend to us by such emphasis, Christ’s holy custom of going together with his disciples to that place in order to pray. For if he had gone there only on some nights and not frequently, the betrayer would not have been so completely convinced he would find our Lord there that he could afford to bring the servants of the high priest and a Roman cohort there as if everything had been definitely arranged, for if they had found that it was not arranged, they would have thought he was playing a practical joke on them and would not have let him get away with it unscathed. Now where are those people who think they are men of stature, who are proud of themselves as if they had done something fine, if sometimes, on the vigil of a special feast, they either continue their prayers a little longer into the night or get up earlier for their morning prayers? Our Savior Christ had the habit of spending whole nights without sleep in order to pray.

Where are those who called him a glutton for food and wine because he did not refuse to go to the banquets of the publicans and did not think it beneath him to attend the celebrations of sinful men?<sup>18</sup> Where are those who thought that, by comparison with the strict regimen of the Pharisees, his morals were hardly better than those of the common rabble? But while these gloomy hypocrites were praying on the corners of the main thoroughfares so that they might be seen by men, he was eating lunch with sinners, calmly and kindly helping them to reform their lives. On the other hand, he used to spend the night praying under the open sky<sup>19</sup> while the hypocritical Pharisee was snoring away in his soft bed. How I wish that those of us who are prevented by our own laziness from imitating the illustrious example of our Savior might at least be willing to call to mind his all-night vigils when we turn over on the other side in our beds, half asleep, and that we might then, during the short time before we fall asleep again, offer him thanks, condemn our slothfulness, and pray for an increase of grace. Surely if we set out to make a habit of doing even the least little bit of good, I feel certain that God will soon set us forward a great way on the path of virtue.<sup>20</sup>

And he said, "Sit down here while I go over there to pray." And he took Peter and the two sons of Zebedee with him. He began to feel sorrow and grief and fear and weariness. Then he said to them, "My soul is sad unto death. Stay here and keep watch with me."<sup>21</sup>

Commanding the other eight to stop somewhat lower down, he went further on, taking with him Peter, John, and his brother James, the three whom he had always singled out from the rest of the apostles by a certain special privilege of intimacy. Now even if he had done this for no other reason than that he wanted to, no one ought to have been envious because of his generosity.<sup>22</sup> But still there were certain reasons for this which he might well have had in mind. For Peter was outstanding for his zealous faith and John for his virginity, and his brother James was to be the very first of all to suffer martyrdom in the name of Christ. Furthermore, these were the three to whom he had formerly granted the secret knowledge and open sight of his glorified body. It was only right, then, that those same three whom he had admitted to such an extraordinary vision and whom he had invigorated with a momentary flash of the eternal brilliance so that they ought to have been stronger than the others, should have assigned to them the role of his nearest supporters in the preliminary agony of his Passion. But when he had gone on a little way, he suddenly felt such a sharp and bitter attack of sadness, grief, fear, and weariness that he immediately uttered, even in their presence, those anguished words which gave expression to his overburdened feelings: "My soul is sad unto death."<sup>23</sup>

For a huge mass of troubles took possession of the tender and gentle body of our most holy Savior. He knew that his ordeal was now imminent and just about to overtake him: the treacherous betrayer, the bitter enemies, binding ropes, false accusations, slanders, blows, thorns, nails, the cross, and horrible tortures stretched out over many hours. Over and above these, he was tormented by the thought of his disciples' terror, the loss of the Jews, even the destruction of the very man who so disloyally betrayed him, and finally the ineffable grief of his beloved mother. The gathered storm of all these evils rushed into his most gentle heart and flooded it like the ocean sweeping through broken dikes.

Perhaps someone may wonder how it could be that our Savior Christ could feel sadness, sorrow, and grief, since he was truly God, equal to his all-powerful Father. Certainly he could not have felt them if he had been God (as he was) in such a way as not to be man also. But as a matter of fact, since he was no less really a man than he was really God, I see no reason for us to be surprised that, insofar as he was man, he had the ordinary feelings of mankind (though certainly no blameworthy ones)—no more than we should be surprised that, insofar as he was God, he performed stupendous miracles. For if we are surprised that Christ felt fear, weariness, and grief, simply on the grounds that he was God, why should we not also be surprised that he experienced hunger, thirst, and sleep, seeing that he was none the less divine for doing these things? But here, perhaps, you may object, “I am no longer surprised at his capacity for these emotions, but I cannot help being surprised at his desire to experience them. For he taught his disciples not to be afraid of those who can kill the body only and can do nothing beyond that;<sup>24</sup> and how can it be fitting that he himself should now be very much afraid of those same persons, especially since even his body could suffer nothing from them except what he himself allowed?

“Furthermore, since we know his martyrs rushed to their deaths eagerly and joyfully, triumphing over tyrants and torturers, how can it not seem inappropriate that Christ himself, the very prototype and leader of martyrs, the standard-bearer of them all, should be so terrified at the approach of pain, so shaken, so utterly downcast? Shouldn’t he rather have been especially careful to set a good example in this matter, just as he had always let his deeds precede his precepts,<sup>25</sup> so that others might learn from his own example to undergo death eagerly for truth’s sake, and so that those who afterwards would suffer death for the faith with fear and hesitation might not indulge their slackness by imagining that they are following Christ’s precedent?—whereas, actually, their reluctance would both detract a great deal from the glory of their cause and discourage others who observe their sadness and fear.” Those who bring up these objections and others of the same sort do not scrutinize carefully enough all the facets of this problem and do not pay enough attention to what Christ meant when he forbade his followers to fear death. For he hardly intended it to mean that they should never under any circumstances recoil from a violent death, but rather that they should not, out of fear, flee from a death which will not last, only to run, by denying the faith, into one which will be everlasting. For he wished his followers to be brave and prudent soldiers, not senseless and foolish. The brave man bears up under the blows which beset him; the senseless man simply does not feel them when they strike. Only a foolish man does not fear wounds, but a prudent man does not allow any fear of suffering to divert him from a holy way of life for that would be to refuse lesser pains at the expense of plunging himself into far more bitter ones.

When an afflicted part of the body is to be cut or cauterized, the doctor does not try to persuade the sick man not to feel any mental anguish at the thought of the pain the cutting or burning will cause, but rather encourages him to bear up under it. He admits it will be painful, but stresses that the pain will be outweighed by the pleasure of health and the avoidance of even more horrible pain. Indeed, though our Savior Christ commands us to suffer death (when it cannot be avoided) rather than fall away from him through a fear of death (and we do fall away from him when we publicly deny our faith in him), still he is so far from requiring us to do violence to our nature by not fearing death at all that he even leaves us free to flee from punishment (whenever this can be done without injury to his cause). “If you are persecuted in one city,” he says, “flee to another.”<sup>26</sup> This permission, this cautious advice of a prudent master, was followed by almost all the apostles and by almost all the illustrious martyrs in the many succeeding centuries: there is hardly one of them who did not use it at some time or other to save his life and extend it, with great profit to himself and others, until such a time as the hidden providence of God foresaw was more fitting.

On the other hand, some brave champions have taken the initiative by publicly professing their Christianity, though no one was trying to discover it, and by freely exposing themselves to death, though no one was demanding it. Thus God chose, according to his pleasure, to increase his glory sometimes by concealing the riches of the faith, so that those who set clever traps for his believers might be duped, sometimes by displaying them, so that those who cruelly persecuted his followers might be incensed by seeing all their hopes frustrated and finding, much to their outrage, that all their ferocity could not overcome martyrs who met death willingly. But God in his mercy does not command us to climb this steep and lofty peak of bravery, and hence it is not safe for just anyone to go rushing on heedlessly to the point where he cannot retrace his steps gradually but may be in danger of falling head over heels into the abyss if he cannot make it to the summit. As for those whom God calls to do this, let them choose their goal and pursue it successfully and they will reign in triumph.<sup>27</sup> He keeps hidden the times, the moments,<sup>28</sup> the causes of all things, and when the time is right he brings forth all things from the secret treasure-chest of his Wisdom, which penetrates all things irresistibly and disposes all things sweetly.<sup>29</sup>

And so, if anyone is brought to the point where he must either suffer torment or deny God, he need not doubt that it was God's will for him to be brought to this crisis. Therefore, he has very good reason to hope for the best. For God will either extricate him from the struggle, or else he will aid him in the fight and make him conquer so that he may crown him with the conqueror's wreath. "For God is trustworthy," the apostle says. "He does not allow you to be tempted beyond what you can stand, but with the temptation he also gives a way out so that you may be able to bear it."<sup>30</sup> Therefore, when things have come to the point of a hand-to-hand combat with the prince of this world, the devil,<sup>31</sup> and his cruel underlings, and there is no way left to withdraw without disgracing the cause, then I would think that a man ought to cast away fear and I would direct him to be completely calm, confident, and hopeful. "For," says the Scripture, "whoever lacks confidence on the day of tribulation, his courage will be lessened."<sup>32</sup>

But before the actual engagement, fear is not reprehensible, as long as reason does not cease to struggle against fear—a struggle which is not criminal or sinful but rather an immense opportunity for merit. For do you imagine that, since those most holy martyrs shed their blood for the faith, they had no fear at all of death and torments? On this point I will not pause to draw up a list; to me Paul may stand for a thousand others. Indeed, if David was worth ten thousand soldiers in the war against the Philistines,<sup>33</sup> then certainly Paul can also be considered worth ten thousand soldiers in the battle for the faith against faithless persecutors. And so this bravest of champions Paul, who was so far advanced in hope and the love of Christ that he had no doubts about his heavenly reward, who said, "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, and now there remains for me a crown of justice,"<sup>34</sup> which he longed for so ardently that he said, "To me to live is Christ and to die is gain"<sup>35</sup> and "I long to be dissolved and to be with Christ,"<sup>36</sup> nevertheless this very same Paul not only managed skillfully to escape from the snares of the Jews by means of the tribune,<sup>37</sup> but also freed himself from prison by declaring that he was a Roman citizen,<sup>38</sup> and once again he eluded the cruelty of the Jews by appealing to Caesar,<sup>39</sup> and he escaped the hands of the impious King Aretas by being let down from the wall in a basket.<sup>40</sup>

But if anyone should contend that he was looking to the fruit that was to be planted afterwards through his efforts, and that throughout these events he was not frightened by any fear of death, certainly I will freely grant the first point, but I would not venture to assert the second. For that most brave heart of the apostle was not impervious to fear, as he himself clearly shows when he writes to the Corinthians, "For even when we came to Macedonia, our flesh had no rest, but suffered all manner of affliction, conflicts without, fears within."<sup>41</sup> And in another place he wrote to the same persons, "I was with you in weakness and fear and much trembling."<sup>42</sup> And once again, "For we do not wish you, brethren, to be ignorant of the affliction which came upon us in Asia, since we were burdened beyond measure, beyond our strength, so that we were weary even of life."<sup>43</sup> In these passages do you not hear from Paul's own mouth his fear, his trembling, his weariness more unbearable than death itself, so that his experience seems to call to mind that agony of Christ and to present, as it were, an image of it? Go ahead now and deny if you can that Christ's holy martyrs felt fear at the terrible prospect of death. But, on the other hand, no amount of terror, however great, could deter this same Paul from his program of advancing the faith, and no advice from the disciples could persuade him not to go to Jerusalem (to which he felt he was called by the spirit of God), even though the prophet Agabus had foretold that chains and certain dangers were awaiting him there.<sup>44</sup>

<sup>27</sup> See Ps 44:5(45:4). <sup>28</sup> See Acts 1:7.

<sup>29</sup> Wis 8:1 <sup>30</sup> 1 Cor 10:13 <sup>31</sup> Jn 12:31, 14:30, 16:11 <sup>32</sup> Prv 24:10 <sup>33</sup> 1 Sm

18:7-8; 21:11; 29:5 <sup>34</sup> 2 Tm 4:7-8

<sup>35</sup> Phil 1:21 <sup>36</sup> Phil 1:21, 23 <sup>37</sup> Acts 23:6-35 <sup>38</sup> Acts 22:25-29 <sup>39</sup> Acts

25:10-12 <sup>40</sup> 2 Cor 11:32-33; Acts 9:25

<sup>41</sup> 2 Cor 7:5 <sup>42</sup> 1 Cor 2:3 <sup>43</sup> 2 Cor 1:8 <sup>44</sup> Acts 21:10-13

And so the fear of death and torments carries no stigma of guilt but rather is an affliction of the sort Christ came to suffer, not to escape. We should not immediately consider it cowardice for someone to feel fear and horror at the thought of torments, not even if he prudently avoids dangers (provided he does not compromise himself); but to flee because of a fear of torture and death when the circumstances make it necessary to fight, or to give up all hope of victory and surrender to the enemy, that, to be sure, is a capital crime according to the military code.<sup>45</sup> But otherwise, no matter how much the heart of the soldier is agitated and stricken by fear, if he still comes forward at the command of the general, goes on, fights, and defeats the enemy, he has no reason to fear that his former fear might lessen his reward in any way. As a matter of fact, he ought to receive even more praise because of it, since he had to overcome not only the enemy but also his own fear, which is often harder to conquer than the enemy himself.

As for our Savior Christ, what happened a little later showed how far he was from letting his sadness, fear, and weariness prevent him from obeying his Father's command and keep him from carrying out with courage all those things which he had formerly regarded with a wise and wholesome fear. For the time being, however, he had more than one reason why he should choose to suffer fear, sadness, weariness, and grief—"choose" I say, not "be forced," for who could have forced God?<sup>46</sup> Quite the contrary, it was by his own marvelous arrangement that his divinity moderated its influence on his humanity for such a time and in such a way that he was able to yield to the passions of our frail humanity and to suffer them with such terrible intensity. But, as I was saying, Christ, in his wonderful generosity, chose to do this for a number of reasons.

First of all, in order to do that for which he came into the world—that is, to bear witness to the truth.<sup>47</sup> And then, although he was truly man and also truly God, still there have been some who, seeing the truth of his human nature in his hunger, thirst, sleep, weariness and suchlike, have falsely persuaded themselves that he was not true God—I do not mean the Jews and gentiles of his time, who rejected him, but rather the people of a much later time who even professed his name and his faith, namely heretics like Arrius and his followers, who denied that Christ was of one nature with the Father and thus embroiled the Church in great strife for many years. But against such plagues as this Christ provided a very powerful antidote, the endless supply of his miracles. But there also arose an equal danger on the other side, just as those who escaped Scylla had to cope with Charybdis.<sup>48</sup> For there were some who fixed their gaze so intently on the glory of his signs and powers that they were stunned and dazed by that immense brightness and went so far wrong as to deny altogether that he was truly a man. These people, too, growing from their original founder into a sect, did not hesitate to rend the holy unity of the Catholic Church and to tear it apart with their disgraceful sedition. This insane belief of theirs, which is no less dangerous than it is false, seeks to undermine and subvert completely (so far as lies within their power) the mystery of mankind's redemption, since it strives to utterly cut off and dry up the spring (as it were) from which the stream of our salvation flowed forth, namely the death and Passion of our Savior. And so, to cure this very deadly disease, the best and kindest of physicians chose to experience sadness, dread, weariness, and fear of tortures and thus to show by these very real signs of human frailty that he was really a man.

Moreover, because he came into the world to earn joy for us by his own sorrow, and since that future joy of ours was to be fulfilled in our souls as well as our bodies, so too he chose to experience not only the pain of torture in his body but also the most bitter feelings of sadness, fear, and weariness in his mind, partly in order to bind us to him all the more by reason of his greater sufferings for us, partly in order to admonish us how wrong it is for us either to refuse to suffer grief for his sake (since he freely bore so many and such immense griefs for us) or to tolerate grudgingly the punishment due to our sins, since we see our holy Savior himself endured by his own free choice such numerous and bitter kinds of torment, both bodily and mental—and that not because he deserved them through any fault of his own, but rather in order to do away with the wicked deeds which we alone committed.<sup>49</sup>

Finally, since nothing was hidden from his eternal

<sup>45</sup> Codex Justinianus 12.45.1 <sup>46</sup> See Is 53:7; Jn 10:17-18. <sup>47</sup> Jn 18:37

<sup>48</sup> See Homer's Odyssey, Book 12. <sup>49</sup> See Is 53:5, 8, 12; 2 Cor 5:19-21.

foreknowledge, he foresaw that there would be people of various temperaments in the Church (which is his own mystical body) — that his members (I say) would differ considerably in their makeup.<sup>50</sup> And although nature alone, without the help of grace, is quite incapable of enduring martyrdom (since, as the apostle says, “no one can say ‘Jesus is Lord’ except in the Spirit”),<sup>51</sup> nevertheless God does not impart grace to men in such a way as to suspend for the moment the functions and duties of nature, but instead he either allows nature to accommodate itself to the grace which is superadded to it, so that the good deed may be performed with all the more ease, or else, if nature is disposed to resist, so that this very resistance, overcome and put down by grace, may add to the merit of the deed because it was difficult to do.

Therefore, since he foresaw that there would be many people of such a delicate constitution that they would be convulsed with terror at any danger of being tortured, he chose to enhearten them by the example of his own sorrow, his own sadness, his own weariness and unequalled fear, lest they should be so disheartened as they compare their own fearful state of mind with the boldness of the bravest martyrs that they would yield freely what they fear will be won from them by force. To such a person as this, Christ wanted his own deed to speak out (as it were) with his own living voice: “O faint of heart, take courage and do not despair.<sup>52</sup> You are afraid, you are sad, you are stricken with weariness and dread of the torment with which you have been cruelly threatened. Trust me. I conquered the world,<sup>53</sup> and yet I suffered immeasurably more from fear, I was sadder, more afflicted with weariness, more horrified at the prospect of such cruel suffering drawing eagerly nearer and nearer. Let the brave man have his high-spirited martyrs, let him rejoice in imitating a thousand of them. But you, my timid and feeble little sheep, be content to have me alone as your shepherd,<sup>54</sup> follow my leadership; if you do not trust yourself, place your trust in me. See, I am walking ahead of you along this fearful road. Take hold of the border of my garment and you will feel going out from it a power which will stay your heart’s blood from issuing in vain fears,<sup>55</sup> and will make your mind more cheerful, especially when you remember that you are following closely in my footsteps (and I am to be trusted and will not allow you to be tempted beyond what you can bear, but I will give together with the temptation a way out that you may be able to endure it)<sup>56</sup> and likewise when you remember that this light and momentary burden of tribulation will prepare for you a weight of glory which is beyond all measure.<sup>57</sup> For the sufferings of this time are not worthy to be compared with the glory to come which will be revealed in you.<sup>58</sup> As you reflect on such things, take heart, and use the sign of my cross to drive away this dread, this sadness, fear, and weariness like vain specters of the darkness. Advance successfully<sup>59</sup> and press through all obstacles, firmly confident that I will champion your cause<sup>60</sup> until you are victorious and then in turn will reward you with the laurel crown of victory.”<sup>61</sup>

And so among the other reasons why our Savior deigned to take upon himself these feelings of human weakness, this one I have spoken of is not unworthy of consideration — I mean that, having made himself weak for the sake of the weak, he might take care of other weak men by means of his own weakness.<sup>62</sup> He had their welfare so much at heart that this whole process of his agony seems designed for nothing more clearly than to lay down a fighting technique and a battle code for the faint-hearted soldier who needs to be swept along, as it were, into martyrdom.

For, in order to teach anyone assailed by a fear of imminent danger that he should both ask others to watch and pray, and still place his trust in God alone apart from the others, and likewise in order to signify that he would tread the bitter wine-press of his cross alone without any companion,<sup>63</sup> he commanded those same three apostles whom he had chosen from the other eight and taken on with him almost to the foot of the mount, to stop there and to bear up and watch with him; but he himself withdrew from them about a stone’s throw.<sup>64</sup>

And going on a little way he fell face down on the earth and prayed that, if it were possible, the hour might pass from him. And he said: ‘Abba, Father, to you all things are possible. Take this cup away from

<sup>50</sup> See Eph 4:14-16; Jn 14:2.

<sup>51</sup> 1 Cor 12:3 <sup>52</sup> See Is 35:4; Eccles 7:9.

<sup>53</sup> Jn 16:33 <sup>54</sup> See Mt 26:31; Jn 10:14-16;

Jer 17:16; Zec 13:7.

<sup>55</sup> Mk 5:25-34; Lk 8:43-48 <sup>56</sup> 1 Cor 10:13 <sup>57</sup> 2 Cor 4:17

<sup>58</sup> Rom 8:18 <sup>59</sup> See Ps 44:5(45:4).

<sup>60</sup> See Is 19:20, 63:11. <sup>61</sup> See 2 Tim

2:5; 1 Cor 9:25; 1 Cor 15:57; Heb 11:6.

<sup>62</sup> 1 Cor 9:22 <sup>63</sup> Is 63:3 <sup>64</sup> Lk 22:41

me, but yet not what I will, but what you will. My Father, if it is possible, let this cup pass away from me; yet not as I will, but as you will.<sup>65</sup>

5 First of all, Christ the commander teaches by his own example that his soldier should take humility as his starting point, since it is the foundation (as it were) of all the virtues from which one may safely mount to higher levels. For, though his divinity is equal and identical to that of God the Father, nevertheless because he is also man, he casts himself
10 down humbly as a man, face down on the earth before God the Father.<sup>66</sup>

Reader, let us pause for a little at this point and contemplate with a devout mind our commander 15 lying on the ground in humble supplication. For if we do this carefully, a ray of that light which enlightens every man who comes into the world<sup>67</sup> will illuminate our minds so that we will see, recognize, deplore, and at long last correct, I will not say the 20 negligence, sloth, or apathy, but rather the feeble-mindedness, the insanity, the downright block-headed stupidity with which most of us approach the all-powerful God, and instead of praying reverently address him in a lazy and sleepy sort of way;
25 and by the same token I am very much afraid that instead of pleasing him and gaining his favor we exasperate him and sharply provoke his wrath.

I wish that sometime we would make a special effort, right after finishing our prayers, to run 30 over in our minds the whole sequence of time we spent praying. What follies will we see there? How much absurdity, and sometimes even foulness will we catch sight of? Indeed we will be amazed that it was at all possible for our minds to dissipate themselves in such a short time among so many places at 35 such great distance from each other, among so many different affairs, such various, such manifold, such idle pursuits. For if someone, just as an experiment, should make a determined effort to make his mind 40 touch upon as many and as diverse objects as possible, I hardly think that in such a short time he could run through such disparate and numerous topics as the mind, left to its own devices, ranges through while the mouth negligently mumbles through the 45 hours of the office and other much used prayers.

And so if anyone wonders or has any doubts about what the mind is doing while dreams take over our consciousness during sleep, I find no comparison that comes closer to the mark than to think 50 that the mind is occupied during sleep in exactly the same way as are the minds of those who are awake (if those who pray in this way can be said to be awake) but whose thoughts wander wildly during

55 prayers, frantically flitting about in a throng of absurd fantasies—with this difference, though, from the sleeping dreamer: some of the waking dreamer's
60 strange sights, which his mind embraces in its foreign travels while his tongue runs rattling through his prayers as if they were mere sound without sense,<sup>68</sup> some of these strange sights are such filthy 65 and abominable monstrosities that if they had been seen during sleep, certainly no one, no matter how shameless, would have the nerve to recount such extravagant dreams after he woke up, not even in the 70 company of stable-boys.

And undoubtedly that old saying is very true, that our looks are a mirror of our minds.<sup>69</sup> For certainly such a wild and deranged state of mind is distinctly reflected in the eyes, in the cheeks, eyelids, 70 and eyebrows, in the hands, feet, and in short in the overall bearing of the entire body.<sup>70</sup> For just as our minds are inattentive when we set out to pray, so too we proceed to do so with an equally careless and sprawling deportment of our bodies.

True, we do pretend that the worship of God is 75 our reason for wearing better than everyday clothes on feast days, but the negligence with which most of us pray makes it utterly clear that we have utterly failed to conceal the real motive, namely a haughty
80 desire to show off in the eyes of the world. Thus in our negligence we sometimes stroll around, sometimes sit down on a stool. And even when we kneel down, we either place our weight on one knee, raising up the other and resting it on our foot, or we 85 place a cushion under our knees, and sometimes (if we are especially spoiled) we even support our elbows on a cushion, looking for all the world like a propped up house that is threatening to tumble down.

And then our actions too, in how many ways do 90 they betray that our minds are wandering miles away? We scratch our heads, clean our fingernails with a pocketknife, pick our noses with our fingers, meanwhile making the wrong responses. Having no idea what we have already said and what we have not said, we make a wild guess as to what remains to be said. Are we not ashamed to pray in such a deranged state of mind and body—to beseech God’s favor in a matter so crucial for us, to beg his forgiveness for so many monstrous misdeeds, to ask him to save us from eternal punishment?—so that even if we had not sinned before, we would still deserve tenfold eternal torments for having approached the majesty of God in such a contemptuous fashion.

65 Mt 26:39; Mk 14:35–36 66 See Phil 2:5–7. 67 Jn 1:9 68 Vergil, Aeneid

10.640 69 Cicero, De oratore 3.221 70 Cicero, In Pisonem 1.1

Imagine, if you will, that you have committed a crime of high treason against some mortal prince or other who has your life in his hands but who is so merciful that he is prepared to temper his wrath because of your repentance and humble supplication, and to commute the death sentence into a monetary fine or even to suspend it completely if you give convincing signs of great shame and sorrow. Now, when you have been brought into the presence of the prince, go ahead and speak to him carelessly, casually, without the least concern. While he stays in one place and listens attentively, stroll around here and there as you run through your plea. Then, when you have had enough of walking up and down, sit down on a chair, or if courtesy seems to require that you condescend to kneel down, first command someone to come and place a cushion beneath your knees, or, better yet, to bring a prie-dieu with another cushion to lean your elbows on. Then yawn, stretch, sneeze, spit without giving it a thought, and belch up the fumes of your gluttony. In short, conduct yourself in such a way that he can clearly see from your face, your voice, your gestures, and your whole bodily deportment that while you are addressing him you are thinking about something else. Tell me now, what success could you hope for from such a plea as this?

Certainly we would consider it quite mad to defend ourselves in this way before a mortal prince against a charge that carries the death penalty. And yet such a prince, once he had destroyed our bodies, could do nothing further. And do we think it is reasonable, when we have been caught committing a whole series of far more serious crimes, to beg pardon so contemptuously from the king of all kings,<sup>71</sup> God himself, who, when he has destroyed our bodies, has the power to send both body and soul together to hell?<sup>72</sup>

Still I would not wish anyone to construe what I have said as meaning that I forbid anyone to pray while walking or sitting or even lying down. Indeed I wish that, whatever our bodies may be doing, we would at the same time constantly lift up our minds to God (which is the most acceptable form of prayer). For no matter where we may turn our steps, as long as our minds are directed to God, we clearly do not turn away from him who is present everywhere.<sup>73</sup> But just as the prophet who says to God, “I was mindful of you when I lay upon my bed”<sup>74</sup> did not rest content with that but also rose “in the middle of the night to pay homage to the Lord,”<sup>75</sup> so too I would require that, besides such prayers said while walking, we also occasionally say some prayers for which we prepare our minds more thoughtfully, for which we dispose our bodies more reverently, than we would if we were about to approach all the kings in the whole world sitting together in one place.

But of this much I can assure you: every time I think about this mental wandering, it vexes and plagues my mind.

Nevertheless, some ideas may be suggested to us during our prayers by an evil spirit or may creep into our imaginations through the normal functioning of our senses, and I would not assert that any one of these, not even if it is vile and quite horrible, must be immediately fatal, so long as we resist it and drive it away. But otherwise, if we accept it with pleasure or allow it through negligence to grow in intensity over a long period of time, I have not the slightest doubt that the force of it can become so aggravated as to be fatally destructive to the soul.

Certainly, when I consider the immeasurable glory of God’s majesty, I am immediately compelled and forced to believe that if even these brief distractions of mind are not crimes punishable by death, it is only because God in his mercy and goodness deigns not to exact death for them, not because the wickedness inherent in their own nature does not deserve death—and for this reason: I simply cannot imagine how such thoughts can gain entrance into the minds of men when they are praying (that is, when they are speaking to God) unless it be through weakness of faith. Otherwise, since our minds do not go wool-gathering while we are addressing a mortal prince about some important matter or even speaking to one of his ministers who might be in a position of some influence with his master, certainly it could never happen that our minds should stray even the least bit while we are praying to God, 5 certainly not, that is, if we believed with a strong and active faith that we are in the presence of God, who not only listens to our words and looks upon our facial features and bodily deportment as outward signs and indications from which our interior state of mind can be gathered, but who also pierces into the most secret and inward recesses of our hearts with a vision more penetrating than the eyes of Lynceus<sup>76</sup> and who illuminates everything with the immeasurable brightness of his majesty— 15 it could not happen, I say, if we believed that God is present, God in whose glorious presence all the princes of the world in all their glory<sup>77</sup> must confess (unless they are out of their minds) that they are the merest mites and earth-creeping worms.

20 Therefore, since our Savior Christ saw that nothing is more profitable than prayer, but since he was also aware that this means of salvation would very often be fruitless because of the negligence of men and the malice of demons—so much so that it would very frequently be perverted into an instrument of destruction—he decided to take this opportunity, on the way to his death, to reinforce his teaching by his words and example, and to put the finishing touches on this most necessary point just 30 as he did on the other parts of his teaching.

He wished us to know that we ought to serve God not only in soul but also in body, since he created both, and he wanted us to learn that a reverend attitude of the body, though it takes its origin and character from the soul, increases by a kind of reflex the soul's own reverence and devotion toward God. Hence he presented the most humble mode of subjection and venerated his heavenly Father in a bodily posture which no earthly prince has dared 40 to demand, or even to accept if freely offered, except that drunken and debauched Macedonian [Alexander] and some other barbarians puffed up with success, who thought they ought to be venerated as gods.

45 For when he prayed he did not sit back or stand up or merely kneel down, but rather he threw his whole body face-forward and lay prostrate on the ground. Then, in that pitiable posture, he implored his Father's mercy and twice called his Father by name, begging him that, since all things are possible 50 to him, he might be moved by his prayers to take away the cup of his Passion if this could be done, that is, if he had not imposed it on him by an immutable decree. But he also asked that his own will, as expressed in this prayer, might not be granted, 55 if something else seemed better to his Father's will, which is absolutely best.

This passage should not lead you to think that the Son was ignorant of the will of the Father. Rather, because he wanted to instruct men, he also wanted to express the feelings of men. By saying the word "Father" twice, he wanted to remind us that all fatherhood proceeds from him, both in heaven and on earth.<sup>78</sup> Moreover, he also wanted to impress upon us that God the Father is his father in a double sense—namely by creation, which is a sort of fatherhood. (For we come from God, who created us from nothing, more truly than we do from the human father who begot us, since, in fact, God created beforehand that begetter himself and since he 70 created and supplied beforehand all the matter out of which we were begotten.) But when Christ acknowledged God as his Father in this sense, he did so as a man. On the other hand, as God, he knows him as his natural and coeternal Father. 75

And yet another reason for his calling on his Father twice may not be far from the truth: he intended not only to acknowledge that God the Father is his natural father in heaven, but also to signify that he has no other father on earth, since he was conceived by a virgin mother according to the flesh, without any male seed, when the Holy Spirit came upon his mother—the Spirit, I say, both of the Father and of himself, whose works coexist in identity and cannot be radically distinguished by any human insight.<sup>79</sup> 85

Moreover, this forceful repetition of his Father's name, since it expresses an intense desire to gain what he asked for, might serve to teach us a very wholesome lesson: that when we pray for something without receiving it we should not give up like King Saul, who, because he did not immediately receive a prophecy from God, resorted to witchcraft and went off to the woman with a spirit, engaging 90

<sup>76</sup> See 2 Chr 6:30; Jer 17:9–10. Lynceus, one of the Argonauts, was famed for the

sharpness of his sight. 12:27. <sup>78</sup> Eph 3:15

<sup>77</sup> See Mt 6:29; Lk

<sup>79</sup> See Jn 5:16–19.

in a practice forbidden by the law and formerly suppressed by his own decree.<sup>80</sup>

Christ teaches us that we should persevere in our prayers without murmuring at all if we do not obtain what we seek—and for good reason, since we see that the Son of God our Savior did not obtain the reprieve from death which he sought from his Father with such urgency, but always with the condition (and this is what we ought to imitate most of all) that his will was subject to the will of his Father.

And he went to his disciples and found them sleeping.<sup>81</sup>

Notice here how much greater one love is than another. Notice how Christ's love for his own was much greater than the love they gave him in return, even those who loved him most. For even the sadness, fear, dread, and weariness which so grievously assailed him as his most cruel torment drew near, could not keep him from going to see them. But they, on the other hand, however much they loved him (and undoubtedly they loved him intensely), even at the very time when such an enormous danger was threatening their loving master, could still give in to sleep.

And he said to Peter, "Simon, are you sleeping? Could you not stay awake one hour with me? Stay awake and pray that you may not enter into temptation. For the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak."<sup>82</sup>

This short speech of Christ is remarkably forceful: the words are mild, but their point is sharp and piercing. For by addressing him as Simon and reproaching him under that name for his sleepiness, Christ tacitly lets it be known that the name Peter, which Christ had previously given him because of his firmness, would hardly be altogether appropriate now because of this infirmity and sleep. Moreover, not only was the failure to use the name Peter (or rather, Cephas) a barbed omission, but the actual use of the name Simon also carries a sting. For in Hebrew, the language in which Christ was speaking to him, "Simon" means "listening" and also "obedient." But in fact, he was neither listening nor obedient, since he went to sleep against Christ's express wishes.

Over and above these, our Savior's gentle words to Peter seem to carry certain other barbed implications, which if he were chiding him more severely, would be something like this: "Simon, no longer Cephas, are you sleeping? For how do you deserve to be called Cephas, that is, rock? I singled you out by that name because of your firmness,<sup>83</sup> but now you show yourself to be so infirm that you cannot hold out even for an hour against the inroads of sleep. As for that old name of yours, Simon, certainly you live up to that remarkably well: can you be called listening when you are sleeping this way? or can you be called obedient when in spite of my instructions to stay awake, I am no sooner gone that you relax and doze and fall asleep? I always made much of you Simon, and yet Simon are you sleeping? I paid you many high honors, and yet Simon are you sleeping? A few moments ago you boasted that you would die with me,<sup>84</sup> and now Simon are you sleeping? Now I am pursued to the death by the Jews and the gentiles and by one worse than either of them, Judas, and Simon are you sleeping? Indeed, Satan is busily seeking to sift all of you like wheat,<sup>85</sup> and Simon are you sleeping? What can I expect from the others, when, in such great and pressing danger, not only to me but also to all of you, I find that you Simon, even you are sleeping?"

Then, lest this seem to be a matter which concerned Peter only, he turned and spoke to the others. "Stay awake and pray," he says, "that you may not enter into temptation. The Spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak."<sup>86</sup>

Here we are enjoined to be constant in prayer, and we are informed that prayer is not only useful but also extremely necessary—for this reason: without it, the weakness of the flesh holds us back, somewhat in the way a remora-fish retards a ship, until our minds, no matter how willing to do good, are swept back into the evils of temptation. For whose spirit is more willing than Peter's was? And yet that he had great need of God's protection against the flesh is clear enough from this fact alone: when sleep kept him from praying and begging for God's help, he gave an opening to the devil, who not long afterwards used the weakness of Peter's flesh to blunt the eagerness of his spirit and impelled him to perjure himself by denying Christ.<sup>87</sup> Now if such things happened to the apostles, who were like flourishing green branches, that is, if they entered into temptation when they allowed sleep to interrupt their prayers, what will happen to us, who are like sapless sticks by comparison, if, when we are suddenly faced by danger (and when, I ask you, are we not in danger, since our enemy the devil constantly prowls like a roaring lion looking everywhere for someone who is ready to fall because of the weakness of the flesh, ready to pounce upon such a man and devour him)<sup>88</sup> in such great danger, I say, what will become of us if we do not follow Christ's advice by being steadfast in wakefulness and prayer?

80 1 Kgs 28:5-25 81 Mt 26:40; Mk 14:37-38 83 1 Jn 1:42 84 Mk 14:31; 14:37; Lk 22:45 82 Mt 26:40-41; Mk Lk 22:33 85 Lk 22:31 86 Mt 26:44

87 Mt 26:69-74; Mk 14:71

Christ tells us to stay awake, but not for cards and dice, not for rowdy parties and drunken brawls, not for wine and women, but for prayer. He tells us to pray not occasionally, but constantly. "Pray," he says, "unceasingly."<sup>89</sup> He tells us to pray not only during the day (for it is hardly necessary to command anyone to stay awake during the day) but rather he exhorts us to devote to intense prayer a large part of that very time which most of us usually devote entirely to sleep. How much more, then, should we be ashamed of our miserable performance and recognize the enormous guilt we incur by saying no more than a short prayer or two, perhaps, during the day, and even those said as we doze and yawn. Finally our Savior tells us to pray, not that we may roll in wealth, not that we may live in a continuous round of pleasures, not that something awful may happen to our enemies, not that we may receive honor in this world, but rather that we may not enter into temptation. In fact, he wishes us to understand that all those worldly goods are either downright harmful, or else, by comparison with that one benefit, the merest trifles; and hence in his wisdom he placed this one petition at the end of the prayer which he had previously taught his disciples, as if it were a summary, in a way, of all the rest: "And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil."<sup>90</sup>

And again he went away, for the second time, and said the same prayer over again, in these words: "My Father, if this cup cannot pass away without my drinking it, let your will be done." And he came again and found them sleeping, for their eyes were heavy. And they did not know what answer to make to him. And leaving them, he went away again and kneeling down said the same prayer, in these words: "Father, if you are willing, take this cup from me. Yet not my will but yours be done."<sup>91</sup>

Thus, after he had given his disciples this warning, he went back to pray again, and he repeated the same prayer he had said before, but still in such a way as to commit the whole matter once more to the will of the Father. Thus he teaches us to make our petitions earnest without being absolutely definite, but rather to trust the whole outcome to God, who desires our welfare no less than we ourselves do<sup>92</sup> and who knows what is likely to produce it a thousand times better than we do.

"My Father," he says, "if this cup cannot pass away without my drinking it, let your will be done." That pronoun "my" has a twofold effect: for it expresses great affection; and it makes it clear that God the Father is the father of Christ in a singular way—that is, not only by creation (for in this way he is the father of all things), not by adoption (in this way he is the father of Christians), but rather by nature he is God the Father of God the Son. And then he teaches the rest of us to pray thus: "Our Father who art in heaven." By these words we acknowledge that we are all brothers who have one Father in common, whereas Christ himself is the only one who can rightfully, because of his divinity, address the Father as he does here, "My Father." But if anyone is not content to be like other men<sup>93</sup> and is so proud as to imagine that he alone is governed by the secret spirit of God and that he has a different status from other men, it certainly seems to me that such a person arrogates to himself the language of Christ and prays with the invocation "My Father" instead of "Our Father," since he claims for himself as a private individual the spirit which God shares with all men. In fact, such a person is not much different from Lucifer, since he arrogates to himself God's language, just as Lucifer claimed God's place.<sup>94</sup> Christ's language here—"If this cup cannot pass away without my drinking it, let your will be done"—also makes it perfectly clear on what basis he calls a thing possible or impossible, namely on no other basis than the certain, immutable, unconstrained decision of his Father concerning his death. For otherwise, if he had thought that he was ineluctably and necessarily destined to die, either because of the course of the heavenly bodies or because of some more abstract overall scheme of things such as fate, and if this had been the sense in which he said, "If this cup cannot pass away without my drinking it," then it would have been completely pointless for him to add the phrase "let your will be done." For how could he have left the matter to be decided by the Father if he believed that its outcome depended on something besides the Father, or if he thought that the Father had to make a certain choice necessarily, that is, willy-nilly?

88 1 Pt 5:8 89 1 Thes; Lk 18:1 90 Mt 6:13 91 Mk 14:39-40; Mt 26:42-44

92 See Mt 6:26. 93 See Lk 18:11. 94 See Is 14:13-14.

But at the same time, while we examine the words with which Christ begged his Father to avert his death and humbly submitted everything to the will of his Father, we must also constantly bear in mind that, though he was both God and man, he said all these things not as God, but insofar as he was man. We ourselves provide a parallel: because we are composed of body and soul, we sometimes apply to our whole selves things which actually are true only of the soul and on the other hand we sometimes speak of ourselves when strict accuracy would require us to speak of our bodies alone. For we say that the martyrs go straight to heaven when they die, whereas actually only their souls are taken up to heaven. And, on the other hand, we say that men, however proud they may be, are still only dust and ashes and that when they have finished with this brief life they will rot in a common ordinary grave. We constantly talk this way, even though the soul does not enter into the grave or undergo death but rather outlives the body, either in miserable torment if it lived badly while in the body, or else in perpetual well-being if it lived well.

In a similar fashion, then, Christ speaks of what he did as God and what he did as man, not as if he were divided into two persons but as one and the same person, and that rightly, since he was one person; for in the omnipotent person of Christ humanity and divinity were joined and made one no less closely than his immortal soul was united to a body which could die. Thus because of his divinity he did not hesitate to say, "I and the Father are one"<sup>95</sup> and "Before Abraham came to be, I am."<sup>96</sup> Moreover, because of both his natures, he said, "I am with you all days even to the end of the world."<sup>97</sup> And, conversely, because of his humanity alone he said, "The Father is greater than I"<sup>98</sup> and "A little while I am with you."<sup>99</sup> It is true, of course, that his glorious body is really present with us, and always will be till the end of the world, under the appearance of bread in the venerable sacrament of the Eucharist; but that bodily form in which he once associated with his disciples (and this is the kind of presence he had in mind when he said, "A little while I am with you") was taken away after Christ's ascension, unless he himself chooses to show it to someone, as he sometimes does.

Therefore, in this passage about Christ's agony, whichever of these deeds, sufferings, or prayers of his are so lowly that they seem quite incompatible with the lofty height of divinity, let us remember that the same Christ performed them as a man. Indeed some of them had their origin only in the lower part of his humanity. I mean the part concerned with sensation; and these served to proclaim the genuineness of his human nature and to relieve the natural fears of other men in later times. Nothing, then, in these words or in any of all the other things that the sequence of his agony presented as signs of his afflicted humanity, was considered by Christ to be unworthy of his glory; indeed so little did he think so that he himself took special care to see that they became widely known.

For, though everything written by all the apostles was dictated throughout by one and the same Spirit of Christ, still I find it hard to recall any of his other deeds which he took such particular pains to preserve in the memories of men. To be sure, he told his apostles about his intense sadness, so that they might be able to hand it down from him to posterity. But the words of his prayer to his Father they could hardly have heard even if they had been awake (since the nearest of them were a stone's throw away), and even if they had been present when it happened, they still could not have heard because they were asleep. Certainly they would have been even less able, at that time of night, to make out when he knelt down or when he threw himself face forward on the ground. As for those drops of blood which flowed like sweat from his whole body,<sup>100</sup> even if they had later clearly seen the stain left on the ground, I think they would have drawn almost any number of conclusions without guessing the right one, since it was an unprecedented phenomenon for anyone to sweat blood.

Yet in the ensuing time before his death it seems unlikely that he spoke of these things either to his 5 mother or to the apostles, unless one is willing to believe that he told the apostles the whole story of his agony when he left off praying and came back to them — that is, while they were either still sleeping or barely awake and quite drowsy — or else that he
10 told them at the very time when the troops were at hand. The remaining alternative, then, and the one that seems most likely to be true, is that, after he rose from the dead and there could no longer be any doubt that he was God, his most loving mother and
15 beloved disciples heard from his own most holy lips this detailed account, point by point, of his human suffering, the knowledge of which would benefit both them and (through them) others who would come after them, and which no one could have re-20 counted except Christ himself. Therefore, to those whose hearts are troubled, meditation on this agony provides great consolation, and rightly so, since it was for this very purpose, to console the afflicted, that our Savior in his kindness made known his 25 own affliction, which no one else knew or could have known.

Some may be concerned about another point: when Christ came back from that prayer to see his apostles and found them sleeping and so startled by his arrival that they did not know what to 30 say, he left them, so that it might seem he had come only for the purpose of finding out whether they were awake, whereas he could not have lacked this knowledge (insofar as he was God) even before he 35 came.

The answer to such persons, if there are any, should be this: nothing that he did was done in vain. It is true that his coming into their presence did not rouse them to complete vigilance but only 40 to such a startled, half-waking drowsiness that they hardly raised their eyes to look at him, or else (what is worse yet) if his reproaches did wake them up completely, still they slipped back into sleep the moment he went away. Nevertheless, he himself 45 both demonstrated his anxious concern for his disciples and also by his example gave to the future pastors of his Church a solemn injunction not to allow themselves the slightest wavering, out of sadness or weariness or fear, in their diligent care of their flock, but rather to conduct themselves so as to prove in 50 actual fact that they are not so much concerned for themselves as for the welfare of their flock.

But perhaps some meticulous fussy dissector of the divine plan might say: “Either Christ wished the 55 apostles to stay awake or he did not. If he did not, why did he give such an explicit command? If he did, what use was there in going back and forth so often? Since he was God, could he not at one and the same time speak the command and insure its 60 execution?”

Doubtless he could have, my good man, since he was God, who carried out whatever he wished, who created all things with a word:<sup>101</sup> he spoke and it was done, he commanded and they were created.<sup>102</sup> He 65 opened the eyes of a man blind from birth,<sup>103</sup> and could he not, then, find a way to open the eyes of a man who was asleep? Clearly, even someone who was not God could easily do that. For anyone can see that if you merely prick the eyes of sleepy men with a tiny pin they will stay awake and will certainly not go right back to sleep.
70

Doubtless Christ could have caused the apostles not to sleep at all but to stay awake, if that had been what he wished in an absolute and unqualified sense.
75 But actually his wish was modified by a condition — namely that they themselves wish to do so, and wish it so effectually that each of them do his very best to comply with the outward command Christ himself gave and to cooperate with the promptings of his inward assistance. In this way he also wishes for 80 all men to be saved<sup>104</sup> and for no one to suffer eternal torment, that is, always provided that we conform to his most loving will and do not set ourselves against it through our own willful malice. If someone stubbornly insists on doing this, God does not
85 wish to waft him off to heaven against his will, as if he were in need of our services there and could not continue his glorious reign without our support. Indeed, if he could not reign without us, he would immediately punish many offenses which now, out 90 of consideration for us, he tolerates and overlooks for a long time to see if his kindness and patience will bring us to repent. But we meanwhile abuse this great mercy of his by adding sins to sins,<sup>105</sup> thus heaping up for ourselves (as the apostle says) a treasure of wrath on the day of wrath.<sup>106</sup>
95

Nevertheless, such is God's kindness that even when we are negligent and slumbering on the pillow of our sins, he disturbs us from time to time, shakes us, strikes us, and does his best to wake us up by means of tribulations. But still, even though he thus proves himself to be most loving even in his anger, most of us, in our gross human stupidity, misinterpret his action and imagine that such a great benefit is an injury, whereas actually (if we have any sense) we should feel bound to pray frequently and fervently that whenever we wander away from him he may use blows to drive us back to the right way, even though we are unwilling and struggle against him.

Thus we must first pray that we may see the way and with the Church we must say to God, "From blindness of heart, deliver us, O Lord."<sup>107</sup> And with the prophet we must say, "Teach me to do your will"<sup>108</sup> and "Show me your ways and teach me your paths."<sup>109</sup> Then we must intensely desire to run after you eagerly, O God, in the odor of your ointments,<sup>110</sup> in the most sweet scent of your spirit. But if we grow weary along the way (as we almost always do) and lag so far behind that we barely manage to follow at a distance,<sup>111</sup> let us immediately say to God, "Take my right hand"<sup>112</sup> and "Lead me along your path."<sup>113</sup>

Then if we are so overcome by weariness that we no longer have the heart to go on, if we are so soft and lazy that we are about to stop altogether, let us beg God to drag us along<sup>114</sup> even as we struggle not to go. Finally, if we resist when he draws us on gently, and are stiff-necked against the will of God, against our own salvation, utterly irrational like horses and mules which have no intellects,<sup>115</sup> we ought to beseech God humbly in the most fitting words of the prophet, "Hold my jaws hard, God, with a bridle and bit when I do not draw near to you."<sup>116</sup>

But then, since fondness for prayer is the first of our virtues to go when we are overtaken by sloth, and since we are reluctant to pray for anything (however useful) that we are reluctant to receive, certainly if we have any sense at all we ought to take this weakness into account, well in advance, before we fall into such sick and troubled states of mind — we ought, in other words, to pour out to God unceasingly such prayers as I have mentioned, and we should humbly implore him that, if at some later time we should ask for anything untoward — allured perhaps by the enticements of the flesh or seduced by a longing for worldly things or overthrown by the clever snares of the devils — he may be deaf to such prayers and avert what we pray for, showering upon us instead those things he knows will be good for us, however much we beg him to take them away. In fact, this is the way we normally act (if we are wise) when we are expecting a fever: we give advance warning to those who are to take care of us in our sickness that, even if we beg them, they should not give us any of those things which our diseased condition makes us perversely long for, though they are harmful to our health and only make the disease worse.

And when we are so fast asleep in our vices that even the calls and stirrings of divine mercy do not make us willing to rouse ourselves and wake up to virtuous living, we ourselves sometimes supply the reason why God goes away and leaves us to our vices; some he leaves so as never to come back again, but others he lets sleep only until another time, according as he sees fit in his wondrous kindness and the inscrutable depths of his wisdom.

Christ's action provided a sort of paradigm of this fact: when he went back to check on the apostles, they were unwilling to stay awake but rather went right on sleeping, and so he went away and left them. For "leaving them he went away again and kneeling down said the same prayer, in these words: 'Father, if you are willing, take this cup from me. Yet not my will but yours be done.'<sup>117</sup>

Notice how he again asks the same thing, again adds the same condition, again sets us an example to show that when we fall into great danger, even for God's sake, we should not think we are not allowed to beg God urgently to provide us a way out<sup>118</sup> of that crisis. For one thing, it is quite possible that he permits us to be brought into such difficulties precisely because fear of danger makes us grow fervent in prayer when prosperity has made us cold, especially when it is a question of bodily danger — for most of us are not very warmly concerned about danger to our souls. Now as for those who are concerned (as they ought to be) about

107 part of the litany of the saints in the breviary of Salisbury 108 Ps 142(143):10 109 Ps 24(25):4 110 See Sg 1:3. 111 Mt

26:58; Mk 14:54; Lk 23:54 112 See Ps 72:24(73:23); Is 42:6; 45:1. 113 See Ps 5:9(8); 26(27):11; 138(139):24. 114 See their souls, unless someone is strengthened and inspired by God to undergo martyrdom—a condition which must be either directly experienced in an unexplainable way or else judged by appropriate indications—apart from such a case everyone has sufficient grounds to be afraid that he may grow weary under his burden and give in. Hence everyone, to avoid such overconfidence as Peter's,<sup>119</sup> ought to pray diligently that God in his goodness may deliver him from such a great danger to his soul. But it must be stressed again and again that no one should pray to escape danger so absolutely that he would not be willing to leave the whole matter up to God, ready in all obedience to endure what God has prepared for him.

Sg 1:3; Jn 6:44; 12:32. 115 Tob 6:17; Ps 31(32):9 116 Ps 31(32):9 117 Mt 26:42; Mk 14:39 118 See 1 Cor 10:13.

These are some of the reasons, then, why Christ provided us with this salutary example of prayer, not that he himself was in any need of such prayer—nothing could be further from the truth. For, insofar as he was God, he was not inferior to the Father. Insofar as he was God, not only his power but also his will was the same as the Father's.<sup>120</sup> Certainly insofar as he was man, his power was infinitely less,<sup>121</sup> but then all power, both in heaven and on earth, was finally given to him by the Father.<sup>122</sup> And though his will, insofar as he was man, was not identical with the Father's, still it was in such complete conformity with the will of the Father that no disagreement was ever found between them.<sup>123</sup>

Thus the reasoning power of his soul, in obedience to the will of the Father, agrees to suffer that most bitter death, while at the same time, as a proof of his humanity, his bodily senses react to the prospect with revulsion and dread. His prayer expresses vividly both the fear and the obedience: "Father," he said, "if you are willing, take this cup from me. Yet not my will but yours be done."

His deeds, however, present this dual reaction even more clearly than his words. That his reasoning faculties never drew back from such horrible torture but rather remained obedient to the Father even to death, even to the death of the cross,<sup>124</sup> was demonstrated by the succeeding events of the Passion. And that his feelings were overwhelmed by an intense fear of his coming Passion is shown by the words which come next in the Gospel.

And there appeared to him an angel from heaven to strengthen him.<sup>125</sup>

Do you realize how intense his mental anguish must have been, that an angel should come from heaven to strengthen him?

But when I consider this passage, I cannot help wondering what pernicious nonsense has gotten into the heads of those who contend that it is futile for anyone to seek the intercession of any angel or departed saint, namely on the grounds that we can confidently address our prayers to God himself, not only because he alone is more present to us than all the angels and all the saints put together but also because he has the power to grant us more, and a greater desire to do so, than any of the saints in heaven, of whatever description.

With such trivial and groundless arguments as these, they express their envious displeasure at the glory of the saints, who are in turn equally displeased with such men; for they strive to undermine the loving homage we pay to the saints and the saving assistance they render to us. Why should these shameless men not follow the same line of reasoning here and argue that the angel's effort to offer consolation to our Savior Christ was utterly pointless and superfluous? For what angel of them all was as powerful as he himself or as near to him as God, since he himself was God? But in fact, just as he wished to undergo sadness and anxiety for our sake, so too for our sake he wished to have an angel console him, for a number of reasons: both to refute the foolish arguments of such men, and to make it clear that he was truly man (for just an angels ministered to him as God when he had triumphed over the temptations of the devil, so too an angel came to console him as man while he was making his lowly progress toward death) and moreover to give us hope that if we direct our prayers to God when we are in danger we cannot lack consolation, always provided we do not pray in a lazy and perfunctory way, but rather imitate Christ in this passage by sighing and praying from the bottom of our hearts.

For in his agony he prayed more earnestly, and his sweat became like drops of blood running down to the ground.<sup>126</sup>

Most scholars affirm that what Christ suffered for us was more painful than the suffering of any of all the martyrs, of whatever time or place, who underwent martyrdom for the faith. But others disagree, because there are various other sorts of torture than those to which Christ was subjected and some torments have been extended over a period of several days, a longer time than those of Christ lasted. Then, too, they think that, since one drop of Christ's precious blood, because of his infinite divinity, would have been far more than enough to redeem all mankind, therefore his ordeal was not ordained by God according to the standards of anyone else's suffering, but according to the proper measure of his own unfathomable wisdom. And since no one can know this measure with certainty, they hold that it is not prejudicial to the faith to believe that Christ's pain was less than that of some of the martyrs. But as for me, apart from the widespread opinion of the Church which fittingly applies to Christ Jeremiah's words about Jerusalem ("O all you who pass by the way, look and see if there is any sorrow like mine"),<sup>127</sup> certainly I find that this passage also provides very convincing reasons to believe that no martyr's torments could ever be compared with Christ's suffering, even on this point of the intensity of the pain.

Even if I should grant what I have good reasons to think need not be granted, namely that any of the martyrs was subjected to more kinds of torture, and greater ones, even (if you like) longer ones than Christ endured, still I find it not at all hard to believe that tortures which to all appearances may be considerably less fierce actually caused Christ to suffer more excruciating pain than someone might feel from tortures that seem much more grievous, and for this reason: I see that Christ, as the thought of his coming Passion was borne in upon him, was overwhelmed by mental anguish more bitter than any other mortal has ever experienced from the thought of coming torments. For who has ever felt such bitter anguish that a bloody sweat broke out all over his body and ran down in drops to the ground? The intensity of the actual pain itself, therefore, I estimate by this standard: I see that even the presentiment of it before it arrived was more bitter to Christ than such anticipation has ever been to anyone else.

Nor could this anguish of the mind ever have grown to sufficient intensity to cause the body to sweat blood if he had not, of his own free will, exercised his divine omnipotence, not only to refrain from alleviating this painful pressure, but even to add to its force and strength. This he did in order to prefigure the blood which future martyrs would be forced to pour forth on the ground, and at the same time to offer this unheard of, this marvelous example of profound anguish as a consolation to those who would be so fearful and alarmed at the thought of torture that they might otherwise interpret their fear as a sign of their downfall and thus yield to despair.

At this point, if someone should again bring up those martyrs who freely and eagerly exposed themselves to death because of their faith in Christ, and if he should offer his opinion that they are especially worthy of the laurels of triumph because with a joy that left no room for sorrow they betrayed no trace of sadness, no sign of fear, I am perfectly willing to go along with him on that point, so long as he does not go so far as to deny the triumph of those who do not rush forth of their own accord but who nevertheless do not hang back or withdraw once they have been seized, but rather go on in spite of their fearful anxiety and face the terrible prospect out of love for Christ.

Now if anyone should argue that the eager martyrs receive a greater share of glory than the others, I have no objection—he can have the argument all to himself. For I rest content with the fact that in heaven neither sort of martyr will lack a glory so great that while they were alive their eyes never saw the like, nor did their ears ever hear it, nor did it ever enter into their hearts [to conceive of it].<sup>128</sup> And even if someone does have a higher place in heaven, no one else envies him for it—quite the opposite, everyone enjoys the glory of everyone else because of their mutual love.

Besides, just who outranks whom in the glory assigned by God in heaven is not, I think, quite crystal-clear to us, groping as we are in the darkness of our mortality.

For, though I grant that God loves a cheerful giver,<sup>129</sup> still I have no doubt that he loved Tobias, and holy Job too. Now it is true that both of them bore their calamities bravely and patiently, but neither of them, so far as I know, was exactly jumping with joy or clapping his hands out of happiness.

To expose one's self to death for Christ's sake when the case clearly demands it or when God gives 5 a secret prompting to do so, this, I do not deny, is a deed of preeminent virtue. But otherwise I do not think it very safe to do so, and among those who willingly suffered for Christ we find outstanding figures who were very much afraid, who were 10 deeply distressed, who even withdrew from death more than once before they finally faced it bravely.

Certainly I do not mean to derogate from God's power to inspire martyrs; indeed I believe that he exercises it on occasion (either granting this favor to 15 holy persons as a reward for the labors of their past lives or giving it purely and simply out of his own generosity) by filling the whole mind of a martyr with such joy that he not only wards off those grievous emotional disturbances but also keeps himself
20 completely free from what the Stoics call "incipient emotions," freely admitting that even their factitious wisemen are susceptible to them.

Since we often see it happen that some men do not feel wounds inflicted in battle until their awareness, which had been displaced by strong feeling, returns to them and they notice the injury,<sup>130</sup> certainly there is no reason why I should doubt that a mind exulting in the high hopes of approaching glory can be so rapt and transported beyond itself that it 30 neither fears death nor feels torments.

But still, even if God did give someone this gift, I would certainly be inclined to call it an unearned felicity or the recompense of past virtue, but not the measure of future reward in heaven. Now I might 35 have believed that this future reward corresponds to the pain suffered for Christ except that God in his generosity bestows it in such good measure—so full, so concentrated, so overflowing<sup>131</sup>—that the sufferings of this time are by no means worthy to be compared to that future glory which will be revealed in those<sup>132</sup> who loved God so dearly that they spent their very life's blood for his glory, with such mental agony and bodily torment. Besides it is not possible that God in his goodness removes fear from 40 some persons not because he approves of or intends to reward their boldness, but rather because he is aware of their weakness and knows that they would not be equal to facing fear. For some have yielded to fear, even though they won out later when the actual tortures were inflicted.

Now as for the point that those who eagerly suffer death encourage others by their example, I would not deny that for many they provide a very useful pattern. But on the other hand, since almost all of us are fearful in the face of death, who can know 55 how many have also been helped by those whom we see face death with fear and trembling but whom we also observe as they break bravely through the hindrances blocking their path, the obstacles barring their way with barriers harder than steel, that is, their own weariness, fear, and anguish, and by bursting these iron bars and triumphing over death take heaven by storm?<sup>133</sup> Seeing them, will not weaklings who are, like them, cowardly and afraid take heart so as not to yield under the stress of persecution even though they feel great sadness welling up within them, and fear and weariness and horror at the prospect of a ghastly death?

Thus the wisdom of God, which penetrates all things irresistibly and disposes all things sweetly,<sup>134</sup> foreseeing and contemplating in his ever-present sight how the minds of men in different places would be affected, suits his examples to various times and places, choosing now one destiny, now another, according as he sees which will be most profitable. And so God proportions the temperaments of his martyrs according to his own providence in such a way that one rushes forth eagerly to his death, another creeps out hesitantly and fearfully, but for all that bears his death none the less bravely—unless someone perhaps imagines he ought to be thought less brave for having fought down not only his other enemies but also his own weariness, sadness, and fear—most strong feelings and mighty enemies indeed.

But the whole drift of the present discussion finally comes to this: we should admire both kinds of most holy martyrs, we should venerate both kinds, praise God for both, we should imitate both when the situation demands it, each according to his own capacity and according to the grace God gives to each.

But the person who is conscious of his own eagerness needs not so much encouragement to be daring as perhaps a reminder to be afraid lest his presumption, like Peter's,<sup>135</sup> lead to a sudden relapse and fall. But if a person feels anxious, heavy-hearted, fearful, certainly he ought to be comforted and encouraged 5 to take heart. For both sorts of martyrs this anguish of Christ is most salutary: it keeps the one from being over-exultant and it makes the other be of good hope when his spirit is crestfallen and downcast. For if anyone feels his mind swelling with ungovernable

 10 enthusiasm, perhaps when he recalls this lowly and anguished bearing of his commander, he will have reason to fear lest our sly enemy is lifting him up on high for a while so that a little later he can dash him to the ground all the harder.<sup>136</sup> But whoever is 15 utterly crushed by feelings of anxiety and fear and is tortured by the fear that he may yield to despair, let him consider this agony of Christ, let him meditate on it constantly and turn it over in his mind, let him drink deep and health-giving draughts of consolation from this spring. For here he will see the loving 20 shepherd lifting the weak lamb on his shoulders,<sup>137</sup> playing the same role as he himself does, expressing his very own feelings, and for this reason: so that anyone who later feels himself disturbed by similar 25 feelings might take courage and not think that he must despair.

Therefore let us give him as many thanks as we can (for certainly we can never give him enough); and in our agony remembering his (with which no 30 other can ever be compared) let us beg him with all our strength that he may deign to comfort us in our anguish by an insight into his; and when we urgently beseech him, because of our mental distress, to free us from danger, let us nevertheless follow his 35 own most wholesome example by concluding our prayer with his own addition: "Yet not as I will but as you will." If we do these things diligently, I have no doubt at all that, just as an angel brought him
 40 consolation in answer to his prayer, so too each of our angels will bring us from his Spirit consolation that will give us the strength to persevere in those deeds that will lift us up to heaven. And in order to 45 make us completely confident of this fact, Christ went there before us by the same method, by the same path. For after he had suffered this agony for a long time, his spirits were so restored that he arose, returned to his apostles, and freely went out to meet the traitor and the tormentors who were seeking him to make him suffer. Then, when he had suffered 50 (as was necessary) he entered into his glory,<sup>138</sup> preparing there a place also for those of us who follow in his footsteps.<sup>139</sup> And lest we should be deprived of it by our own dullness, may he himself because of his own agony deign to help us in ours.

And when he had arisen from prayer and come to his 55 disciples, he found them sleeping for sadness, and he said to them, "Why are you sleeping?"<sup>140</sup> Sleep on now and take your rest. That is enough. Get up and pray that you may not enter into temptation. Behold, the hour is coming when the Son of Man will be betrayed 60 into the hands of sinners. Get up, let us go. Behold, the one who will betray me is near at hand."<sup>141</sup>

See now, when Christ comes back to his apostles for the third time, there they are, buried in sleep, 65 though he commanded them to bear up with him and to stay awake and pray because of the impending danger; but Judas the traitor at the same time was so wide awake and intent on betraying the Lord that the very idea of sleep never entered his mind.

Does not this contrast between the traitor and 70 the apostles present to us a clear and sharp mirror image (as it were), a sad and terrible view of what has happened through the ages from those times even to our own? Why do not bishops contemplate
 75 in this scene their own somnolence? Since they have succeeded in the place of the apostles, would that they would reproduce their virtues just as eagerly as they embrace their authority and as faithfully as they display their sloth and sleepiness! For 80 very many are sleepy and apathetic in sowing virtues among the people and maintaining the truth, while the enemies of Christ in order to sow vices<sup>142</sup> and uproot the faith (that is, insofar as they can, to seize Christ and cruelly crucify him once again) are 85 wide awake — so much wiser (as Christ says) are the sons of darkness in their generation than the sons of light.<sup>143</sup>

But although this comparison of the sleeping apostles applies very well to those bishops who 90 sleep while virtue and the faith are placed in jeopardy, still it does not apply to all such prelates at all points. For some of them — alas, far more than I could wish — do not drift into sleep through sadness and grief as the apostles did. Rather they are numbed and buried in destructive desires; that is, drunk with the new wine<sup>144</sup> of the devil, the flesh, and the world,<sup>145</sup> they sleep like pigs sprawling in the mire. Certainly the apostles' feeling of sadness because of the danger to their master was praiseworthy, but for them to be so overcome by sadness as to yield completely to sleep, that was certainly wrong. Even to grieve because the world is perishing or to weep because of the crimes of others bespeaks a reverent outlook, as was felt by the writer who said, "I sat by myself and groaned"<sup>146</sup> and also by the one who said, "I was sick at heart because of sinners abandoning your law."<sup>147</sup> Sadness of this sort I would place in the category of which he says, ["For the sorrow that is according to God produces repentance that surely tends to salvation, whereas the sorrow that is according to the world produces death"].<sup>148</sup> But I would place it there only if the feeling, however good, is checked by the rule and guidance of reason. For if this is not the case, if sorrow so grips the mind that its strength is sapped and reason gives up the reins,<sup>149</sup> if a bishop is so overcome by heavy-hearted sleep that he neglects to do what the duty of his office requires for the salvation of his flock — like a cowardly ship's captain who is so disheartened by the furious din of a storm that he deserts the helm, hides away cowering in some cranny, and abandons the ship to the waves — if a bishop does this, I would certainly not juxtapose and compare his sadness with the sadness that leads, as [St. Paul]<sup>150</sup> says, to hell; indeed, I would consider it far worse, since such sadness in religious matters seems to spring from a mind which despairs of God's help.

135 Mt 26:33–35, 69–75 136 See Job 30:22; Ps 101:11(102:10); Claudian, In Rufinum 1.22. 137 See Lk 15:5; Jn 10:14.

138 Lk 24:26 139 Jn 14:2; 1 Pt 2:21 140 Lk 22:45–46 141 Mt 26:45–46;

Mk 14:41–42 142 See Mt 13:24–29; Lk 8:5–15. 143 Lk 16:8

The next category, but a far worse one, consists of those who are not depressed by sadness at the danger of others but rather by a fear of injury to themselves, a fear which is so much the worse as its cause is the more contemptible, that is, when it is not a question of life or death but of money.<sup>151</sup>

And yet Christ commands us to condemn the loss of the body itself for his sake. "Do not be afraid," he says, "of those who destroy the body and after that can do nothing further. But I will show you the one you should fear, the one to fear: fear him who, when he has destroyed the body, has the power to send the soul also to hell. This, I tell you, is the one you must fear."<sup>152</sup>

And though he lays down this rule for everyone without exception when they have been seized and there is no way out, he attaches a separate charge over and above this to the high office of prelates: he does not allow them to be concerned only about their own souls or merely to take refuge in silence until they are dragged out and forced to choose between open profession or lying dissimulation, but he also wished them to come forth if they see that the flock entrusted to them is in danger and to face the danger of their own accord for the good of their flock. "The good shepherd," says Christ, "lays down his life for his sheep."<sup>153</sup> But if every good shepherd lays down his life for his sheep, certainly one who saves his own life to the detriment of his sheep, is not fulfilling the role of a good shepherd.

Therefore, just as one who loses his life for Christ (and he does this if he loses it for the flock of Christ entrusted to him) saves it for life everlasting, so too one who denies Christ (and this he does if he fails to profess the truth when his silence injures his flock) by saving his life, he actually proceeds to lose it.<sup>154</sup> Clearly, it is even worse if, driven by fear, he denies Christ openly in words and forsakes him publicly. Such prelates do not sleep like Peter; they make his waking denial. But under the kindly glance of Christ most of them through his grace will eventually wipe out that failure and save themselves by weeping, if only they respond to his glance and friendly call to repentance with bitterness of heart<sup>155</sup> and a new way of life, remembering his words and contemplating his Passion and leaving behind the shackles of evil which bound them in their sins.

But if anyone is so set in evil that he does not merely neglect to profess the truth out of fear but like Arrius and his ilk preaches false doctrine, whether for sordid gain or out of a corrupt ambition, such a person does not sleep like Peter, does not make Peter's denial, but rather stays awake with wicked Judas and like Judas persecutes Christ. This man's condition is far more dangerous than that of the others, as is shown by the sad and horrible end Judas came to.<sup>156</sup> But since there is no limit to the

144 See Acts 2:13. 145 See 1 Jn 2:15–16.

146 Lam 3:28 147 Ps 118(119):53

148 More leaves a blank space here.

2 Cor 7:10 149 Plato, Phaedrus 246,

254 150 More leaves a blank space here.

151 See Terence, Phormio 631. 152 Lk

12:4–5; Mt 10:28 153 Jn 10:11 154 Mt

10:33, 39; Mk 8:35; Lk 9:24 155 See Lk

22:61–62. 156 Mt 27:5; Acts 1:18

kindness of a merciful God, even this sort of sinner ought not to despair of forgiveness. Even to Judas God gave many opportunities of coming to his senses. He did not deny him his companionship. 5 He did not take away from him the dignity of his apostleship. He did not even take the purse-strings from him, even though he was a thief.<sup>157</sup> He admitted the traitor to the fellowship of his beloved disciples at the last supper. He deigned to stoop down 10 at the feet of the betrayer and to wash with his innocent and most sacred hands Judas' dirty feet, a most fit symbol of his filthy mind.<sup>158</sup> Moreover, with incomparable generosity, he gave him to eat, in the form of bread, that very body of his which the betrayer had already sold; and under the appearance of 15 wine, he gave him that very blood to drink which, even while he was drinking it, the traitor was wickedly scheming to broach and set flowing.<sup>159</sup> Finally when Judas, coming with his crew to seize him, offered him a kiss, a kiss that was in fact the terrible 20 token of his treachery, Christ received him calmly and gently.<sup>160</sup> who would not believe that any one of all these could have turned the traitor's mind, however hardened in crime, to better courses? Then too, 25 even that beginning of repentance, when he admitted he had sinned, and gave back the pieces of silver, and threw them away when they were not accepted, crying out that he was a traitor and confessing that he had betrayed innocent blood<sup>161</sup>—I am inclined 30 to believe that Christ prompted him thus far so that he might if possible—that is, if the traitor did not add despair to his treachery—save from ruin the very man who had so recently, so perfidiously betrayed him to death.

35 Therefore, since God showed his great mercy in so many ways even toward Judas, an apostle turned traitor, since he invited him to forgiveness so often and did not allow him to perish except through despair alone, certainly there is no reason why, in this 40 life, anyone should despair of any imitator of Judas. Rather, according to that holy advice of the apostle “Pray for each other that you may be saved,”<sup>162</sup> if we see anyone wandering wildly from the right road, let us hope that he will one day return to the path, 45 and meanwhile let us pray humbly and incessantly that God will hold out to him chances to come to his senses, and likewise that with God's help he will eagerly seize them, and having seized them will hold fast and not throw them away out of malice or let them slip away from him through wretched sloth. 50

And so when Christ had found his apostles sleeping for the third time, he said to them, “Why are you sleeping?”<sup>163</sup> as if to say: “Now is not the time to sleep. Now is the crucial time for you to stay awake and pray, as I myself have already warned you twice 55 before, only a little while ago.” And as for them, since they did not know what to reply to him<sup>164</sup> when he found them sleeping for the second time, what suitable excuse could they possibly have devised now that they had been so quickly caught in 60 the same fault for the third time? Could they use as an excuse what the evangelist mentions—that is, could they say they were sleeping because of their sadness? Certainly the fact is mentioned by Luke,<sup>165</sup> but it is also quite clear that he does not praise it. 65 It is true, he does suggest that their sadness itself was praiseworthy, as it certainly was. Still, the sleep that followed from it was not free of moral blame. For the sort of sadness that is potentially worthy 70 of great reward sometimes tends toward great evil. Certainly it does if we are so taken up by it that we render it useless—that is, if we do not have recourse to God with our petitions and prayers and seek comfort from him, but instead, in a certain downcast and desperate frame of mind, try to escape our 75 awareness of sadness by looking for consolation in sleep. Nor will we find what we are looking for: losing in sleep the consolation we might have obtained from God by staying awake and praying, we feel the weary weight of a troubled mind even during sleep 80 itself and also we stumble with our eyes closed into temptations and the traps set by the devil.

And so Christ, as if he intended to preclude any excuse for this sleepiness, said, “Why are you sleeping?”<sup>166</sup> Sleep on now and take your rest. That 85 is enough. Get up and pray that you may not enter into temptation. Behold, the hour has almost come when the Son of Man will be betrayed into the hands of sinners. Get up, let us go. Behold, the one who will betray me is near at hand. And while 90 Jesus was still speaking, behold Judas Iscariot, etc.”

Immediately after he had aroused the sleeping apostles for the third time, he undercut them with irony, not indeed that trivial and sportive variety

157 Jn 12:6; 13:29 158 Jn 13:4-11
159 Lk 22:21 160 Mt 26:48-50; Lk

22:47-48 161 Mt 27:3-5 162 Jas 5:16 165 Lk 22:45 166 Lk 22:46
163 Lk 22:46 164 Mk 14:40

with which idle men of wit are accustomed to amuse themselves, but rather a serious and weighty kind of irony. “Sleep on now,” he said, “and take your rest. That is enough. Get up and pray that you may not enter into temptation. Behold, the hour has almost come when the Son of Man will be betrayed into the hands of sinners. Get up, let us go. Behold, the one who will betray me is near at hand. And while he was still speaking, Judas, etc.”

10 Notice how he grants permission to sleep in such a way as clearly shows he means to take it away. For he had hardly said “Sleep” before he added “That is enough,” as if to say: “Now there is no need for you to sleep any longer. It is enough that throughout the whole time you ought to have been staying awake, you have been sleeping—and that even against my direct orders. Now there is no time left to sleep, not even to sit down. You must get up immediately and pray that you may not enter into temptation, the temptation, perhaps, of deserting me and giving great scandal by doing so. Otherwise, so far as sleep is concerned, sleep on now and take your rest—you have my permission—that is, if you can. But you will certainly not be able to. For there are people coming—they are almost here—who will shake the yawning sleepiness out of you. For behold the hour has almost come when the Son of Man will be betrayed into the hands of sinners and behold the one who will betray me is near at hand. And he had hardly finished these few admonitions and was still speaking when, behold, Judas Iscariot, etc.”<sup>167</sup>

I am not unaware that some learned and holy men do not allow this interpretation, though they admit that others, equally learned and holy, have found it agreeable. Not that those who do not accept this interpretation are shocked by this sort of irony, as some others are—also pious men to be sure, but not sufficiently versed in the figures of speech which Sacred Scripture customarily takes over from common speech. For if they were, they would have found irony in so many other places that they could not have found it offensive here.

What could be more pungent or witty than the irony with which the blessed apostle gracefully polishes off the Corinthians?—I mean where he asks pardon because he never burdened any of them with charges and expenses. “For how have I done any less for you than for the other churches, except this, that I have never been a burden to you? Pardon me for this injustice.”<sup>168</sup> What could be more forceful or biting than the irony with which God’s prophet ridiculed the prophets of Baal as they called upon the deaf statue of their god: “Call louder,” he said, “for your god is asleep or perhaps has gone somewhere on a trip.”<sup>169</sup> I have taken this occasion to bring up these instances in passing, because some readers, out of a certain pious simplicity, refuse to accept in Sacred Scripture (or at least do not notice there) these universally used forms of speech, and by neglecting the figures of speech they very often also miss the real sense of Scripture.

Now concerning this passage Saint Augustine says that he finds the interpretation I have given to be not unacceptable but also not necessary. He claims that the plain meaning without any figure is adequate. He presents such an interpretation of this passage in the work he wrote entitled The Harmony of the Gospels. “It seems,” he says, “that the language of Matthew here is self-contradictory. For how could he say ‘Sleep on now and take your rest’ and then immediately add ‘Get up, let us go’? Disturbed by this seeming inconsistency some try to set the tone of the words ‘Sleep on now and take your rest’ as reproachful rather than permissive. And this would be the right thing to do if it were necessary. But Mark reports it in such a way that when Christ had said ‘Sleep on now and take your rest,’ he added ‘That is enough’ and then went on to say ‘The hour has come when the Son of Man will be betrayed.’ Therefore it is surely at least implied that after he had said ‘Sleep and take your rest’ the Lord was silent for a while so that they could do what he had allowed them to do, and that he then went on to say ‘Behold, the hour has almost come.’ That is the reason why Mark includes ‘That is enough,’ that is, ‘You have rested long enough.’”<sup>170</sup>

Subtle indeed this reasoning of the most blessed Augustine, as he always is; but I imagine that those of the opposite persuasion do not find it at all likely that, after Christ had already reproached them twice for sleeping when his capture was imminent, and after he had just rebuked them sternly by saying, “Why are you sleeping?” He should then have granted them time to sleep, especially at the very

167 Mt 26: 45–47; Mk 14: 41–43
168 2 Cor 12: 13 169 1 Kgs 18: 27

170 Augustine, De consensu evangelistarum Latinorum 43:282–83)
(Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum)

time when the danger which was the reason they ought not to have slept before, was now pounding on the door, as they say. But now that I have presented both interpretations, everyone is free to choose whichever he likes. My purpose has been merely to recount both of them; it is not for such a nobody as me to render a decision like an official arbitrator.

Get up and pray that you may not enter into temptation.<sup>171</sup>

Before, he ordered them to watch and pray.<sup>172</sup> Now that they have twice learned by experience that the drowsy position of sitting lets sleep gradually slip up on them, he teaches an instant remedy for that sluggish disease of somnolence, namely to get up. Since this sort of remedy was handed down by our Savior himself, I heartily wish that we would occasionally be willing to try it out at the dead of night. For here we would discover not only that well begun is half done (as Horace says)<sup>173</sup> but that once begun is all done.

For when we are fighting against sleep, the first encounter is always the sharpest. Therefore, we should not try to conquer sleep by a prolonged struggle, but rather we should break with one thrust the grip of the alluring arms with which it embraces us and pulls us down, and we should dash away from it all of a sudden. Then, once we have cast off idle sleep, the very image of death,<sup>174</sup> life with its eagerness will resume its sway. Then, if we devote ourselves to meditation and prayer, the mind, collected and composed in that dark silence of the night,<sup>175</sup> will find that it is much more receptive to divine consolation than it is during the daytime, when the noisy bustle of business on all sides distracts the eyes, the ears, and the mind, and dissipates our energy in manifold activities, no less pointless than they are diverse. But Lord spare us, though thoughts about some trifling matter, some worldly matter at that, may sometimes interrupt our sleep and keep us awake for a long time and hardly let us go back to sleep at all, prayer does not keep us awake: in spite of the immense loss of spiritual benefits, in spite of the many traps set for us by our deadly enemy, in spite of the danger of being utterly undone, we do not wake up to pray but lie in a drugged sleep watching the dream-visions induced by mandragora.

But we must continually keep in mind that Christ did not command them simply to get up, but to get up in order to pray. For it is not enough to get up if we do not get up for a good purpose. If we do not, there would be far less sin in losing time through slothful drowsiness than in devoting waking time to the deliberate pursuit of malicious crimes.

Then, too, he does not merely order them to pray but shows them the need for it and teaches what they should have prayed for: "Pray," he says, "that you may not enter into temptation." Again and again he drove home this point to them,<sup>176</sup> that prayer is the only safeguard against temptation and that if someone refuses it entrance into the castle of his soul and shuts it out by yielding to sleep, through such negligence he permits the besieging troops of the devil (that is, temptations to evil) to break in.

Three times he admonished them verbally to pray. Then, to avoid the appearance of teaching merely by these words and in order to teach them by his example as well, he himself prayed three times, suggesting in this way that we ought to pray to the Trinity, namely to the unbegotten Father, to the co-equal Son begotten by him, and to the Spirit equal to each and proceeding from each of them. From these three we should likewise pray for three things: forgiveness for the past, grace to manage the present, and a prudent concern for the future. But we should pray for these things not lazily and carelessly but incessantly and fervently. Just how far from this kind of prayer nearly all of us are nowadays, everyone can judge privately from his own conscience and we may all publicly learn (God forbid) by the decreasing fruits of prayer, falling off gradually from day to day.

Nevertheless, since a little earlier I bore down on this point as vigorously as I could by attacking that sort of prayer in which the mind is not attentive but wandering and distracted among many ideas, it would be well at this point to propose an emollient from Gerson<sup>177</sup> to alleviate this sore point, lest I seem to be like a harsh surgeon touching this common sore too roughly, bringing to many tender-souled mortals not a healing medicine but rather

171 Lk 22: 46 172 Mt 26: 41; Mk 14: 38
173 Horace, Epistulae 1.2.40 174 See

Ovid, Amores 2.9.41. 175 See Vergil,
Aeneid 4.123. 176 Mt 6: 13; 26: 41;

Mk 14: 38; Lk 22: 40, 46 177 See Gerson's De oratione et eius valore.

pain, and taking away from them hope of attaining salvation. In order to cure these troublesome inflammations of the soul, Gerson uses certain palliatives which are analogous to those medications which doctors use to relieve bodily pain and which they call “anodynes.”

And so this John Gerson, an outstanding scholar and a most gentle handler of troubled consciences, saw (I imagine) some people whom this distraction of mind made so terribly anxious that they repeated the individual words of their prayers one after the other with a belabored sort of babbling, and still got nowhere and sometimes were even less pleased with their prayer the third time than the first time. He saw that such people, through sheer weariness, lost all sense of consolation from their prayers and that some of them were ready to give up the habit of prayer as useless (if they were to pray in this way) or even harmful (as they feared). This kind man, then, in order to relieve them of their troublesome difficulty, pointed out three aspects of prayer: the act, the virtue, and the habit.

But to make his meaning clearer, he explains it by the example of a person setting out from France on a pilgrimage to Saint James [of Compostella].<sup>178</sup> For such a person sometimes goes forward on his journey and at the same time meditates on the holy saint and the purpose of the pilgrimage. And so this man throughout this whole time continues his pilgrimage by a double act, namely (and I shall use Gerson’s own words) by a “natural continuity” and a “moral continuity”: natural, because he actually and in fact proceeds toward that place; moral, because his thoughts are occupied with the matter of his pilgrimage. By “moral” he refers to that moral intention by which the act of setting out, otherwise indifferent, is perfected by the pious reason for setting out.

Sometimes, however, the pilgrim goes his way considering other matters, without thinking anything about the saint or the place, thinking perhaps about something even holier, such as God himself. In such a case he continues the act of his pilgrimage on a natural, but not on a moral level. For though he actually moves his feet along, he does not actually think about the reason for setting out nor perhaps even about the way he is going. But though the moral act of his pilgrimage does not continue, its moral virtue does. For that whole natural act of walking is informed and imbued with a moral virtue because it is silently accompanied by the pious intention formed at the beginning, since all this motion follows from that first decision just as a stone continues on its course because of the original impetus, even though the hand which threw it has been withdrawn. Sometimes, however, the moral act takes place when there is no natural act, as, for example, whenever the person thinks about his pilgrimage when he is perhaps sitting and not walking. Finally, it often happens that both kinds of act are missing, as, for example, when we are sleeping, for then the pilgrim neither performs the natural act of walking nor the moral act of thinking about the pilgrimage; but still in the meantime the moral virtue, so long as it is not deliberately renounced, remains and persists habitually.

And so this pilgrimage is never truly interrupted in such a way that its merit does not continue and persist at least habitually, unless an opposite decision is made, either to give up the pilgrimage completely or at least to put it off until another time. And so by means of this comparison he draws the same conclusions about prayer, namely that once it has been begun attentively it can never afterwards be so interrupted that the virtue of the first intention does not remain and persist continuously—that is, either actually or habitually—so long as it is not relinquished by making a decision to stop nor cut off by turning away to mortal sin.

Hence he says that those words of Christ “You should pray always and not cease”<sup>179</sup> were not spoken figuratively but in a simple and straightforward sense, and that in fact they are actually and literally fulfilled by good men. He supports his opinion with that well-known adage of learned men “whoever lives well is always praying”—which is true, because whoever does everything according to the apostle’s precept for the glory of God,<sup>180</sup> once he has begun praying attentively, never afterwards interrupts his prayer in such a way that its meritorious virtue does not persist, if not actually then at least habitually.

This is the explanation given by that most learned and virtuous man John Gerson in his short treatise entitled Prayer and its Value. But nevertheless he intends it as a consolation for those who are troubled and saddened because their attention slips away from them unawares during prayer, even though they are earnestly trying to pay attention; he does not intend that it should provide a flattering illusion of safety for those who out of careless laziness make no effort to think about their prayers. For when we perform such a grave duty negligently, we say prayers indeed, but we do not pray, and we do not (as I said before) render God favorable to us but drive him far from us in his wrath.

And why should anyone be surprised if God is angry when he sees himself addressed so contemptuously by a lowly human creature? And how can we imagine that a person does not approach and address God contemptuously when he says to God, “God, hear my prayer”<sup>181</sup> while his own mind all the time is turned away to other matters—vain and foolish and would that they were not sometimes also wicked matters—so that he does not even hear his own voice but murmurs his way by rote through well-worn prayers, his mind a complete blank, emitting (as Vergil says) sounds without sense.<sup>182</sup> Thus when we have finished our prayers and gone our way, very often we are immediately in need of other prayers to beg forgiveness for our former carelessness.

And so when Christ had said to his apostles, “Get up and pray that you may not enter into temptation,” he immediately warned them how great the impending danger was, in order to show that no drowsy or lukewarm prayer would suffice: “Behold,” he said, “the hour has almost come when the Son of Man will be betrayed into the hands of sinners,”<sup>183</sup> as if to include the following implications: “I predicted to you that I must be betrayed by one of you—you were shocked at the very words.<sup>184</sup> I foretold to you that Satan would seek you out to sift you like wheat—you heard this carelessly and made no response, as if his temptation were not much to be reckoned with.<sup>185</sup> So that you might know that temptation is not at all to be contemned, I predicted that you would all be scandalized in me—you all denied it. To him who denied it most of all, I predicted that he would deny me three times before the cock crowed—he absolutely insisted it would not be so and that he would rather die with me than deny me, and so you all said.<sup>186</sup> Lest you should consider temptation a thing to be taken lightly, I again and again commanded you to watch and pray lest you enter into temptation—but you were always so far from recognizing the strength of temptation that you took no pains to pray against it or even to stay awake.

Perhaps you were encouraged to scorn the power of the devil’s temptation by the fact that before, when I sent you out two by two to preach the faith, you came back and reported to me that even the demons were subject to you. But I, to whom the nature of demons, as well as your own nature, is more deeply known than either is to you, since indeed I established each of them, I immediately cautioned you not to glory in such vanity, because it was not your power that subjected the demons but rather I myself did it, and I did it not for your sakes but for the sake of others who were to be converted to the faith; and I admonished you rather to glory in a real source of joy, namely that your names are written in the book of life.<sup>187</sup> This really and truly belongs to you because once you have attained that joy you can never lose it, though all the ranks of the demons should struggle against you. But still the power you exerted against them at that time gave you such high confidence that you seem to scorn their temptations as matters of little moment.

“And so, though I foretold that there was danger impending on this very night, up to now you have still viewed these temptations as it were from a distance. But now I warn you that not only the very night but even the very hour is at hand. For behold, the hour has almost come when the Son of Man will be betrayed into the hands of sinners. Now, therefore, there is no more chance to sit and sleep. Now you will be forced to stay awake, and there is hardly a moment left to pray. Now, therefore, I no longer foretell future events, but I say to you right now, at this present moment, Get up, let us go—behold, the one who will betray me is at hand. If you are not willing to stay awake so that you might be able to pray, at least get up and go away quickly lest you be unable to escape. For, behold, the one who will betray me is at hand.” Unless perhaps he did not say, “Get up, let us go” as intending that they should run away in fear, but rather that they should go forward with confidence. For he himself did so: he did not turn back in another direction but even as he spoke

181 Ps 54:2(55:1) 182 Vergil, Aeneid
10.640 183 Mt 26:45; Mk 14:41

184 Mt 26:21–22 185 Lk 22:31–34
186 Mt 26:31–35 187 Lk 10:17–20

he freely went on to encounter those butchers who were making their way toward him with murder in their hearts. While Jesus was still saying these things, behold, Judas Iscariot, one of the twelve, and with him a large crowd with swords and clubs, sent by the chief priests and the scribes and the elders of the people.<sup>188</sup>

Although nothing can contribute more effectively to salvation, and to the implanting of every sort of virtue in the Christian breast, than pious and fervent meditation on the successive events of Christ's Passion, still it would certainly be not unprofitable to take the story of that time when the apostles were sleeping as the Son of Man was being betrayed, and to apply it as a mysterious image of future times. For Christ, to redeem man truly became a son of man—that is, although he was conceived without male seed, he was nevertheless really descended from the first men and therefore truly became a son of Adam, so that by his Passion he might restore Adam's posterity, lost and cast off into wretchedness through the fault of our first parents, to a state of happiness even greater than their original one.<sup>189</sup> This is the reason that, in spite of his divinity, he constantly called himself the Son of Man (since he was also really a man), thus constantly suggesting, by mentioning that nature which alone was capable of death, the benefit we derive from his death. For, though God died, since he who was God died, nevertheless his divinity did not undergo death, but only his humanity, or actually only his body, if we consider the fact of nature more than the custom of language. For a man is said to die when the soul leaves the dead body, but the soul which departs is itself immortal. But since he did not merely delight in the phrase describing our nature but was also pleased to take upon himself our nature for our salvation, and then finally to unite with himself, in the structure of one body<sup>190</sup> (as it were), all of us whom he regenerated by his saving sacraments and by faith, granting us a share even of his names (since Scripture calls all the faithful both gods<sup>191</sup> and Christs),<sup>192</sup> I think we would not be far wrong if we were to fear that the time approaches when the Son of Man, Christ, will be betrayed into the hands of sinners, as often as we see an imminent danger that the mystical body of Christ,<sup>193</sup> the Church of Christ, namely the Christian people, will be brought to ruin at the hands of wicked men. And this, alas, for some centuries now we have not failed to see happening somewhere, now in one place, now in another, while the cruel Turks invade some parts of the Christian dominion and other parts are torn asunder by the internal strife of manifold heretical sects.

Whenever we see such things or hear that they are beginning to happen, however far away, let us think that this is no time for us to sit and sleep but rather to get up immediately and bring relief to the danger of others in whatever way we can, by our prayers at least if in no other way. Nor is such danger to be taken lightly because it happens at some distance from us. Certainly if that saying of the comic poet is so highly approved, "Since I am a man, I consider nothing human to be foreign to me,"<sup>194</sup> how could it be anything but disgraceful for Christians to snore while other Christians are in danger? In order to suggest this, Christ directed his warning to watch and pray not only to those he had placed nearby but also to those he had caused to remain at some distance. Then, too, if we are perhaps unmoved by the misfortunes of others because they are at some distance from us, let us at least be moved by our own danger. For we have reason to fear that the destructive force will make its way from them to us, taught as we are by many examples how rapid the rushing force of a blaze can be and how terrible the contagion of a spreading plague. Since, therefore, all human safeguards are useless without the help of God to ward off evils, let us always remember these words from the Gospel and let us always imagine that Christ himself is again addressing to us over and over those words of his: "Why are you sleeping? Get up and pray that you may not enter into temptation."

At this juncture another point occurs to us: that Christ is also betrayed into the hands of sinners when his most holy body in the sacrament is consecrated and handled by unchaste, profligate, and sacrilegious priests. When we see such things happen (and they happen only too often, alas) let us imagine that Christ himself again says to us, "Why are you sleeping? Stay awake, get up, and pray that you may not enter into temptation, for the Son of quotes Terence (slightly inaccurately) from memory: Heautontimoroumenos 77.

188 Mt 26:47; Mk 14:43 189 See Rom 5:12–21. 190 See Jer 13:11. 191 Ex 22:8–9; Ps 81(82):6; Jn 10:34–35

192 Ps 104(105):15; Mk 9:40; 1 Chr 16:22 193 1 Cor 12:27 194 Here More

Man is betrayed into the hands of sinners.” From the example of bad priests the contamination of vice spreads easily among the people. And the less suitable for obtaining grace those persons are whose duty it is to watch and pray for the people, the more necessary it is for the people to stay awake, get up, and pray all the more earnestly for themselves—and not only for themselves but also for priests of this sort. For it will be much to the advantage of the people if bad priests improve.

Finally Christ is betrayed into the hands of sinners in a special way among those of a certain sect: these people, though they receive the venerable sacrament of the Eucharist more frequently and wish to give the impression of honoring it more piously by receiving it under both species (contrary to public custom, without any necessity, but not without a great affront to the Catholic Church), nevertheless these people blaspheme against what they have received under a show of honor, some of them by calling it true bread and true wine, some of them—and this is far worse—by calling it not only true but also mere bread and wine. For they altogether deny that the real body of Christ is contained in the sacrament, though they call it by that name. When at this late date they set out to do such a thing, against the most open passages of Scripture, against the clearest interpretations of all the saints, against the most constant faith of the whole Church for so many centuries, against the truth most amply witnessed to by so many thousands of miracles—this group that labors under the second kind of infidelity (by far the worse), how little difference is there, I ask you, between them and those who took Christ captive that night? How little difference between them and those troops of Pilate who in jest bent their knees before Christ as if they were honoring him while they insulted him and called him the king of the Jews, just as these people kneel before the Eucharist and call it the body of Christ—which according to their own profession they no more believe than the soldiers of Pilate believed Christ was a king.

Therefore, whenever we hear that such evils have befallen other peoples, no matter how distant, let us immediately imagine that Christ is urgently addressing us: “Why are you sleeping? Get up and pray that you may not enter into temptation.” For the fact is that wherever this plague rages today most fiercely, everyone did not catch the disease in a single day. Rather the contagion spreads gradually and imperceptibly while those persons who despise it at first, afterwards can stand to hear it and respond to it with less than full scorn, then come to tolerate wicked discussions, and afterwards are carried away into error, until like a cancer (as the apostle says) the creeping disease finally takes over the whole country.<sup>195</sup> Therefore let us stay awake, get up, and pray continually that all those who have fallen into this miserable folly through the wiles of Satan may quickly come to their senses and that God may never suffer us to enter into this kind of temptation and may never allow the devil to roll the blasts of this storm of his to our shores. But so much for my digression into these mysteries; let us now return to the historical events.

Judas, therefore, when he had received a cohort from the chief priests and servants from the Pharisees, came there with lanterns and torches.<sup>196</sup> And while Jesus was still speaking, behold, Judas Iscariot, one of the twelve, and with him a large crowd with swords and clubs, sent by the chief priests and scribes and elders of the people. The traitor, however, had given them a sign, etc.<sup>197</sup>

I tend to believe that the cohort which, according to the accounts of the evangelists, was handed over to the traitor by the high priests was a Roman cohort assigned to the high priests by Pilate. To it the Pharisees, scribes, and elders of the people had added their own servants, either because they did not have enough confidence in the governor’s soldiers or because they thought extra numbers would help prevent Christ from being rescued through some sudden confusion caused by the darkness, or perhaps for another reason, their desire to arrest at the same time all the apostles, without letting any of them escape in the dark. They were prevented from executing this part of their plan by the power of Christ himself, who was himself captured only because he, and he alone wished to be taken.

They carry smoking torches and dim lanterns so that they might be able to discern through the darkness of sin the bright sun of justice,<sup>198</sup> not that they might be enlightened by the light of him who enlightens every man that comes into this world,<sup>199</sup>

but that they might put out that eternal light of his which can never be darkened. And like master like servant, for those who sent them strove to overthrow the law of God for the sake of their traditions. Even now some still follow in their footsteps and persecute Christ by striving mightily to overshadow the splendor of God's glory for the sake of their own glory. But in this passage it is worthwhile to pay close attention to the constant revolutions and vicissitudes of the human condition. For not six days before, even the gentiles had been eager to get a look at Christ, because of his remarkable miracles, together with the great holiness of his life.<sup>200</sup> But the Jews had welcomed him with truly extraordinary reverence as he rode into Jerusalem. But now the Jews, joining forces with the gentiles, come to arrest him like a thief; and not merely among them but at their head was a man worse than all the gentiles and Jews put together, Judas. Thus in his death Christ took care to provide this contrast as a notable warning to all men that no one should expect blind Fortune to stand still for him, and that no Christian especially, as one who hopes for heaven, should pursue the contemptible glory of this world.

The persons responsible for sending the crowd after Christ were priests — and not merely that, but princes of the priests — Pharisees, scribes and elders of the people. Here we see that whatever is best by nature turns out in the end to be the worst, once it begins to reverse its direction. Thus Lucifer, created by God as the most eminent among the angels in heaven, became the worst of the demons after he yielded to the pride which brought his downfall. So too, not the dregs of the crowd but the elders of the people, the scribes, Pharisees, priests, and high priests, the princes of the priests, whose duty it was to see that justice was done and to promote the affairs of God, these were the very ringleaders in a conspiracy to extinguish the sun of justice<sup>201</sup> and to destroy the only begotten Son of God — to such insane extremes of perversity were they driven by avarice, arrogance, and envy.

Another point should not be passed over lightly but should be given careful consideration: Judas, who in many other places is called by the infamous name traitor, is here also disgraced by the lofty title apostle. “Behold,” he says, “Judas Iscariot, one of the twelve,” Judas Iscariot, who was not one of the unbelieving pagans, not one of the Jewish enemies, not one of Christ's ordinary disciples (and even that would have been incredible enough), but (O the shame of it!) one of Christ's chosen apostles, can bear to hand over his Lord to be captured, and even to be the leader of the captors himself.

There is in this passage a lesson to be learned by all who exercise high public office: when they are addressed with solemn titles, they do not always have reason to be proud and congratulate themselves; rather, such titles are truly fitting only if those who bear them know in their hearts that they have in fact lived up to such honorific names by conscientiously performing their duties. For otherwise, they may very well be overcome with shame (unless they find pleasure in the empty jingle of words), since wicked men in high office — whether they be great men, princes, great lords, emperors, priests, bishops, it makes no difference as long as they are wicked — certainly ought to realize that whenever men titillate their ears by crooning their splendid titles of office, they do not do so sincerely, in order to pay them true honor, but rather to reproach them freely by seeming to praise those honors which they bear in so unpraiseworthy a fashion. So too, in the Gospel, when Judas is celebrated under his title of apostle in the phrase “Judas Iscariot, one of the twelve,” the real intent is anything but praise, as is clear from the fact that in the next breath he is called a traitor. “For the traitor,” according to the account, “had given them a signal, saying, ‘whomever I kiss, that is the one. Seize him.’”<sup>202</sup>

At this point the usual question is why it was necessary for the traitor to give the crowd a signal identifying Jesus. To this some answer that they agreed on a signal because more than once before Christ had suddenly escaped from the hands of those who were trying to apprehend him. But since this usually happened in the daytime, when he was escaping from the hands of those who already recognized him, and since he did it by employing his divine power, either to disappear from their sight or to pass from their midst while they were in a state of shock, against this sort of escape giving a signal to identify him could not be of any use.

And so others say that one of the two James's looked very much like Christ — and for that reason, they think, he was called the brother of Christ<sup>203</sup> — so much so that unless you looked at them closely you could not tell them apart. But since they could have arrested both of them and taken both away with them to be identified later at their leisure by comparing them at close quarters, what need was there to worry about a signal?

The Gospel makes it clear that the night was far advanced, and, although daybreak was drawing near, it was still nighttime and quite dark, as is evident from the torches and lanterns they carried, which gave enough light to make them visible from some distance but hardly enough for them to discern anyone else from afar. And, although on that night they perhaps had the advantage of some faint light from the full moon, it could only have been enough to make out the shapes of bodies in the distance, not to get a good view of facial features and distinguish one person from another. Hence if they went rushing in at random in the hope of capturing all of them at once, each man choosing his victim without knowing who he was, they were afraid, and rightly so, that out of so many some (by all odds) might perhaps get away and that one of the fugitives might well be the very man they had come for. For those who are in the greatest danger are likely to be the quickest to look out for themselves.

Thus, whether they thought of this or whether Judas himself suggested it, they set their trap by having the betrayer go on ahead to single out the Lord by embracing and kissing him. In this way, when they had all fixed their eyes on him alone, each and every one of them could try to get his hands on him. After that, if any of the others got away, it would not be such a dangerous matter.

Therefore the traitor had given them a signal, saying, "Whomever I kiss, that is the one. Seize him and take him away carefully."<sup>204</sup>

O the lengths to which greed will go! Couldn't you be satisfied, you treacherous scoundrel, with betraying your Lord (who had raised you to the lofty office of an apostle) into the hands of impious men by the signal of a kiss, without also being so concerned that he should be taken away carefully, lest he might escape from his captors? You were hired to betray him; others were sent to take him, to guard him, to produce him in court. But you, as if your role in the crime were not important enough, go on to meddle in the duties of the soldiers; and as if the villainous magistrates who sent them had not given them adequate instructions, there was a need for a circumspect man like you to add your own gratuitous cautions and commands, that they must lead him away carefully once he is captured. Were you afraid that, even though you had fully performed your criminal task by betraying Christ to his assassins, still if the soldiers had somehow been so remiss that Christ escaped through their carelessness or was rescued by force against their will — were you afraid that then your thirty pieces of silver, that illustrious reward of your heinous crime, would not be paid? Have no fear, they will be paid. But believe me, you are no more eager and greedy to get them now than you will be impatient and anxious to throw them away once you have gotten them. Meanwhile you will go on to complete a deed that brings pain to your Lord and death to you, but salvation to many.

He went ahead of them and came up to Jesus to kiss him. And when he had come, he went right up to him and said, "Rabbi, hail Rabbi," and he kissed him. Jesus said to him, "Friend, why have you come?"<sup>205</sup> "Judas, are you betraying the Son of Man with a kiss?"<sup>206</sup>

Though Judas really did, as a matter of historical fact, precede the crowd, still this also means in a spiritual sense that among those who share in the same sinful act, the one who has most reason to abstain takes precedence in God's judgment of their guilt.

"And he came up to him to kiss him. And when he had come, he went right up to him and said 'Rabbi, hail Rabbi.' And he kissed him." In this same way Christ is approached, greeted, called "Rabbi," kissed, by those who pretend to be disciples of Christ, professing his teaching in name but striving in fact to undermine it by crafty tricks and stratagems. In just this way Christ is greeted as "Rabbi" by anyone who calls him master and scorns his precepts. In just this way is he kissed by those priests who consecrate the most holy body of Christ and then put to death Christ's members, Christian souls, by their false teaching and wicked example. In just this way is Christ greeted and kissed by those who demand to be considered good and pious because at the persuasion of bad priests, they, though laymen, receive the sacred body and blood of Christ under both species, without any real need for it, but not without great contempt for the whole Catholic Church and therefore not without grave sin. And this these latter-day saints do against the long-standing practice and custom of all Christians. And not only do they themselves do it (that we could somehow manage to put up with) but they condemn everyone who receives both substances under only one of the two species—that is, apart from themselves, all Christians everywhere for these many years. And still, though they hotly insist that both species are necessary for the laity, most of them—both laymen and priests—eliminate the reality, that is the body and blood, from both species, keeping only the words body and blood. In this respect, indeed, they are not unlike Pilate’s guards, who mocked Christ by kneeling before him and saluting him as the king of the Jews. For these men likewise genuflect in veneration of the Eucharist and call it the body and blood of Christ though they no more believe it is the one or the other than the soldiers of Pilate believed Christ was a king.

Now all these groups which I have enumerated certainly bring to our minds the traitor Judas in that they combine a greeting and a kiss with treachery. But just as they renew an action of the past, so Joab (2 Kings 20)<sup>207</sup> once provided a prophetic figure of the future: for “when he had greeted Amasa thus, ‘Greetings, my brother,’ and had caressed Amasa’s chin with his right hand” as if he were about to kiss him, he stealthily unsheathed a hidden sword and killed him with one stroke through his side,<sup>208</sup> and by a similar trick he had formerly killed Abner,<sup>209</sup> but later (as was only right) he justly paid with his life for his heinous deception.<sup>210</sup> Judas rightly calls to mind and represents Joab, whether you consider the status of the persons involved or the deceitful treachery of the crime, or the vengeance of God and the bad end both came to—with this difference, that Judas surpassed Joab in every respect.

Joab enjoyed great favor and influence with his prince; Judas had even more with an even greater prince. Joab killed Amasa who was his friend; Judas killed Jesus who was an even closer friend, not to say also his Lord. Joab was motivated by envy and ambition because he had heard that the king would promote Amasa above him;<sup>211</sup> but Judas, enticed by greed for a miserable reward, for a few pieces of silver, betrayed the Lord of the world to his death. In the same degree, therefore, as Judas’ crime was worse, the vengeance exacted from him was the more devastating. For Joab was killed by another, but the most wretched Judas hanged himself with his own hand.

But in the treacherous pattern of their deception, there is a nice equivalence between the crimes of Joab and Judas. For just as Joab kills Amasa in the very act of courteously greeting him and preparing to kiss him, so too Judas approaches Christ affably, greets him reverently, kisses him lovingly and all the time the villainous wretch had nothing else in mind than to betray his Lord to his death. But Joab was able to deceive Amasa by flattery; not so Judas with Christ. He receives his advances, listens to his greeting, does not refuse his kiss, and, though aware of his abominable treachery, he nevertheless acted for a while as if he were completely ignorant of everything. Why did he do this? Was it to teach us to feign and dissemble, and with polite cunning to turn the deception back upon the deceiver? Hardly, but rather to teach us to bear patiently and gently all injuries and snares treacherously set for us, not to smolder with anger, not to seek revenge, not to give vent to our feelings by hurling back insults, not to find an empty pleasure in tripping up an enemy through some clever trick, but rather to set ourselves against deceitful injury with genuine courage, to conquer evil with good<sup>212</sup>—in fine, to make every effort by words both gentle and harsh, to insist both in season and out of season,<sup>213</sup> that the wicked may change their ways to good, so that if anyone should be suffering from a disease that does not respond to treatment, he may not blame the failure on our negligence but rather attribute it to the virulence of his own disease. And so Christ as a most conscientious physician tries both ways of effecting a cure. Employing first of all gentle words, he says, “Friend, why have you come?”

When he heard himself called “friend,” the traitor was left hanging in doubt. For, since he was aware of his own crime, he was afraid that Christ used the title “friend” as a severe rebuke for his hostile unfriendliness. On the other hand, since criminals always flatter themselves with the hope that their crimes are unknown, he was blind and mad enough to hope (even though he had often learned by personal experience that the thoughts of men lay open to Christ<sup>214</sup> and though his own treachery had been touched upon at the [last] supper),<sup>215</sup> nevertheless, I say, he was so demented and oblivious to everything as to hope that his villainous deed had escaped Christ's notice.

But because nothing could be more unwholesome for him than to be duped by such a futile hope (for nothing could work more strongly against his repentance than this), Christ in his goodness no longer allows him to be led on by a deceptive hope of deceiving but immediately adds in a grave tone, "Judas do you betray the Son of Man with a kiss?" He addresses him by the name he had ordinarily used—and for this reason, so that the memory of their old friendship might soften the heart of the traitor and move him to repent. He openly rebukes his treachery lest he should believe it is hidden and be ashamed to confess it. Moreover, he reviles the impious hypocrisy of the traitor: "With a kiss," he says, "do you betray the Son of Man?"

Among all the circumstances of a wicked deed it is not easy to find one more hateful to God than the perversion of the real nature of good things to make them into the instruments of our malice. Thus lying is hateful to God because words, which are ordained to express the meaning of the mind, are twisted to other deceitful purposes. Within this category of evil, it is a serious offense against God if anyone abuses the law to inflict the very injuries it was designed to prevent. And so Christ reproaches Judas sharply for this detestable kind of sin: "Judas," he says, "do you betray the Son of Man with a kiss? Either Judas, with betraying the Son of Man—indeed, I say, the son of that man through whom all men would have perished if this son of man, whom you imagine you are destroying, had not redeemed those who wish to be saved—was it not enough for you, I say, to betray this son of man without doing it with a kiss, thus turning the most sacred sign of charity into an instrument of betrayal? Certainly I am more favorably disposed toward this mob which attacks me with open force than toward you, Judas, who betrayed me to the attackers with a false kiss."

And so when Christ saw no sign of repentance in the traitor, wishing to show how much more willing

he was to speak with open enemies than with a secret foe, having made it clear to the traitor that he cared not a whit for all his wicked stratagems, he immediately turned away from him and made his way, unarmed as he was, toward the armed crowd. For so the Gospel says: "And then Jesus, knowing everything that was to happen to him, went forward and said to them, 'whom do you seek?' They replied to him, 'Jesus of Nazareth.' Jesus said to them, 'I am he.' Now Judas, who betrayed him, was also standing with them. When therefore, he said to them, 'I am he,' they drew back and fell to the ground."<sup>216</sup>

O saving Christ, only a little while ago, you were so fearful that you lay face down in a most pitiable attitude and sweat blood as you begged your father to take away the chalice of your Passion. How is it that now, by a sudden reversal, you leap up and spring forth like a giant running his race<sup>217</sup> and come forward eagerly to meet those who seek to inflict that Passion upon you? How is it that you freely identify yourself to those who openly admit they are seeking you but who do not know that you are the one they are seeking? Hither, hither let all hasten who are faint of heart. Here let them take firm hold of an unwavering hope when they feel themselves struck by a horror of death. For just as they share Christ's agony, his fear, grief, anxiety, sadness, and sweat (provided that they pray, and persist in prayer, and submit themselves wholeheartedly to the will of God), they will also share this consolation, undoubtedly they will feel themselves helped by such consolation as Christ felt; and they will be so refreshed by the spirit of Christ that they will feel their hearts renewed as the old face of the earth is renewed by the dew from heaven,<sup>218</sup> and by means of the wood of Christ's cross let down into the water of their sorrow, the thought of death, once so bitter, will grow sweet,<sup>219</sup> eagerness will take the place of grief, mental strength and courage will replace dread, and finally they will long for the death they had viewed with horror, considering life a sad thing and death a gain, desiring to be dissolved and to be with Christ.<sup>220</sup>

"And so Christ coming up close to the crowd asks, 'whom do you seek?' They replied to him, 'Jesus of Nazareth.' Now Judas, who betrayed him, was standing with them. And Jesus said to them, 'I am

<sup>214</sup> See Mt 9:4; 12:25. <sup>215</sup> Mt 26:21-25
<sup>216</sup> Jn 18:4-6 <sup>217</sup> See Ps 18:6(19:5).

<sup>218</sup> Ps 103(104):5; Ex 16:13-14;
 Ps 132(133):3; Prv 19:12; Mi 5:7

<sup>219</sup> See Ex 15:23-25. <sup>220</sup> Phil 1:21-23

he.' When, therefore, Jesus said to them, 'I am he,' they drew back and fell to the ground." If Christ's previous fear and anxiety lessened his standing in anyone's mind, the balance must now be redressed
 5 by the manly courage with which he fearlessly approaches that whole mass of armed men and, though he faces certain death ("for he knew everything which was to happen to him"),<sup>221</sup> betrays himself by his own act to those villains, who did not 10 even know who he was, and thus offers himself freely as a victim to be cruelly slaughtered.

Certainly this sudden and drastic change would rightly be considered marvelous viewed simply as occurring in his venerable human nature. But what 15 sort of estimate of him, how intense a reaction to him must be produced in the hearts of all the faithful by the force of divine power flashing so wonderfully through the weak body of a man? For how was it that none of his pursuers recognized him when he
 20 came up close to them? He had taught in the Temple, he had overturned the tables of the money-changers, he had driven out the moneychangers themselves,<sup>222</sup> he had carried out his activities in public, he had confuted the Pharisees,<sup>223</sup> he had satisfied the sadducees,<sup>224</sup> he had refuted the scribes,<sup>225</sup>
 25 he eluded by a prudent answer the trick-question of the Herodian soldiers,<sup>226</sup> he had fed seven thousand men with five loaves,<sup>227</sup> he had healed the sick, raised the dead, made himself available to all sorts of men,
 30 Pharisees, tax-gatherers, the rich, the poor, just men, sinners, Jews, Samaritans, and gentiles, and now in this whole large crowd there was no one who recognized him by his face or voice as he addressed them near at hand, as if those who sent them had taken 35 special care not to send anyone along who had ever seen beforehand the person they were then seeking.

Had no one even singled out Christ from his meeting with Judas, from the embrace and the sign Judas gave with a kiss? Even more, the traitor himself, who was at that time standing together with 40 them, did he suddenly forget how to recognize the very person he had just betrayed by singling him out with a kiss? What was the source of this strange happening? Indeed, no one was able to recognize 45 him for the very same reason that a little later Mary Magdalene, though she saw him, did not recognize him until he revealed himself, and likewise neither one of the two disciples, though they were talking with him, knew who he was until he let them know, but rather the two disciples thought that he was a 50 traveler and she thought he was a gardener.<sup>228</sup> Finally, then, if you want to know how it was that no one could recognize him when he came up to them, you should undoubtedly attribute it to the same cause you use to explain the fact that when 55 he spoke no one could remain standing. "But when Jesus said, 'I am he,' they drew back and fell to the ground."

Here Christ proved that he truly is that word of God which pierces more sharply than any two-60 edged sword.<sup>229</sup> Thus a lightning bolt is said to be of such a nature that it liquefies a sword without damaging the sheath.<sup>230</sup> Certainly the mere voice of Christ, without damaging their bodies, so melted their souls that it deprived them of the strength to 65 hold up their limbs.

Here the evangelist relates that Judas was standing together with them. For when he heard Jesus rebuke him openly as a traitor, whether overcome with shame or struck with fear (for he was acquainted with Peter's impulsiveness), he immediately withdrew and returned to his own kind. Thus the evangelist tells us he was standing together with 70 them so that we may understand that like them he also fell down. And certainly the character of Judas was such that there was in that whole crowd no one worse or more worthy of being cast down. But the evangelist wished to impress upon everyone generally that they must be careful and cautious about 75 the company they keep, for there is a danger that if they take their place with wicked men they will also fall together with them. It rarely happens that a person who is foolish enough to cast his lot with those who are headed for shipwreck in an unseaworthy vessel gets back to land alive after the others have 80 drowned in the sea.

No one, I suppose, doubts that a person who could throw them all down with one word could easily have dashed them all down so forcibly that none of them could have gotten back up again.
 90 But Christ, who struck them down to let them know that they could inflict no suffering upon him against his will, allowed them to get up again so that they could accomplish what he wished to endure. “And so, when they had gotten up, he asked them once more, ‘whom do you seek?’ And they said to him, ‘Jesus of Nazareth.’”<sup>231</sup>

<sup>221</sup> Jn 18:4 <sup>222</sup> Mk 11:15 <sup>223</sup> See Jn 8:21-47. <sup>224</sup> Mk 2:6-12 <sup>225</sup> Mt 22:23-33 <sup>226</sup> See Mt 14:16-21; Mk

6:38-44; Lk 9:13-17; Jn 6:8-13. <sup>227</sup> Mt 22:15-22 <sup>228</sup> See Jn 20:14-16; Lk

24:16-31. <sup>229</sup> Heb 4:12 <sup>230</sup> See Seneca, Naturales quaestiones 2.31.

Here, too, anyone can see that they were so daunted, stunned and stupefied by their meeting with Christ that they seem almost to be out of their minds. For they might very well have known that at that time of night and in that place they would not find anyone who was not one of Christ’s band of followers or else a friend of his and that the last thing in the world such a person would do would be to lead them to Christ. And yet, suddenly meeting a person whose identity was unknown to them as well as the reason for his question, right away they foolishly blurt out the heart of the whole affair, which they ought to have kept carefully concealed until they had carried it out. For as soon as he asked, “‘Whom do you seek?’ they replied, ‘Jesus of Nazareth.’ Jesus answered, ‘I have told you I am he. If, therefore, you seek me, let these men go their way’”<sup>232</sup> — as if to say: If you are looking for me, now that I have approached you and let you know who I am by my own admission, why do you not arrest me on the spot? Surely the reason is that you are so far from being able to take me against my will that you cannot even remain standing at my mere words, as you have just learned by falling backwards. But now, if you have forgotten it so quickly, I again remind you that I am Jesus of Nazareth. “If, therefore, you seek me, let these men go their way.”

By throwing them down, Christ made it very clear, I think, that his words “Let these men go their way” did not constitute a request. But sometimes it happens that those who are planning some great piece of villainy are not content with the bare crime alone but with perverse wantonness make a practice of adding certain trimmings, as it were, beyond what is required by the scope of the crime itself. Moreover, there are some ministers of crime who are so preposterously faithful that, to avoid the risk of omitting any evil deed that has been entrusted to them, they will add something extra on their own for good measure. Christ implicitly refers to each of these two types: “If you seek me,” he says, “let these go their way.” If my blood is what the chief priests, the scribes, Pharisees, and the elders of the people are longing to drain away with such an eager thirst, behold, when you were seeking me I came to meet you; when you did not know me, I betrayed myself to you; when you were prostrate, I stood nearby; now that you are arising, I stand ready to be taken captive; and finally I myself hand myself over to you (which the traitor was not able to do) to keep my followers and you from imagining (as if it were not crime enough to kill me) that their blood must be added over and above mine. Therefore, “if you seek me, let these men go their way.”

He commanded them to let them go, but he also forced them to do so against their will, and by seeing to it that all were saved by flight he frustrated their efforts to capture them. An indication of this outcome was what he intended by this prophetic statement of his — Let these men go their way — so that those words he had spoken might be fulfilled: “Of those you have given me, I have not lost any one.”<sup>233</sup> The words of Christ which the evangelist is talking about here are those words he spoke to his Father that same night at supper: “Holy Father, preserve in your name those whom you have given to me.”<sup>234</sup> And afterwards: “I have guarded those whom you gave to me, and none of them has perished except the son of perdition, that the Scripture might be fulfilled.”<sup>235</sup> See how Christ here, as he foretells that the disciples will be saved when he is taken captive, declares that he is their guardian. Hence the evangelist recalls this to the minds of his readers, wishing them to understand that, in spite of his words to the crowd — Let these men go their way — he himself by his hidden power had opened up a way for their escape.

The place in Scripture which predicts that Judas would perish is in Psalm 108[109], where the psalmist prophesies in the form of a prayer: “May his days be few and may another take over his ministry.”<sup>236</sup> Although these prophetic words were spoken about the traitor Judas such a long time before the event, nevertheless it would be hard to say whether anyone, apart from the psalmist himself, knew that they referred to Judas until Christ made this clear and the event itself bore out the words. Even the prophets themselves did not see everything foreseen by other prophets. For the spirit of prophecy is measured out individually.<sup>237</sup> Certainly it seems clear to me that no one understands the meaning of all scriptural passages so well that there are not many mysteries hidden there which are not yet understood, whether concerning the times of the Antichrist or the last judgment by Christ, and which will remain unknown until Elijah returns to explain them.<sup>238</sup> Therefore it seems to me that I can justly apply the apostle's exclamation about God's wisdom to Holy Scripture (in which God has hidden and laid up the vast stores of his wisdom): "O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How incomprehensible are his judgments and how unsearchable his ways!"<sup>239</sup>

And nevertheless nowadays, first in one place, then in another, there are springing up from day to day, almost like swarms of wasps or hornets, people who boast that they are "autodidacts" (to use Saint Jerome's word) and that, without the commentaries of the old doctors, they find clear, open, and easy all those things which all the ancient fathers confessed they found quite difficult — and the fathers were men of no less talent or training, of tireless energy, and as for that "spirit" which these moderns have as often on their lips as they do rarely in their hearts, here the fathers surpassed them no less than in holiness of life. But now these modern men, who have sprouted up overnight as theologians professing to know everything, not only disagree about the meaning of Scripture with all those men who led such heavenly lives, but also fail to agree among themselves concerning great dogmas of the Christian faith. Rather, each of them, whoever he may be, insisting that he sees the truth, conquers the rest and is in turn conquered by them. But they all are alike in opposing the catholic faith and all are alike in being conquered by it. He who dwells in the heavens laughs to scorn these wicked and vain attempts of theirs.<sup>240</sup> But I humbly pray that he may not so laugh them to scorn as to laugh also at their eternal ruination, but rather that he may inspire in them the health-giving grace of repentance so that these prodigal sons<sup>241</sup> who have wandered so long, alas, in exile may retrace their steps to the bosom of Mother Church and so that all of us together, united in the true faith of Christ and joined in mutual charity as true members of Christ, may attain to the glory of Christ our head,<sup>242</sup> which no one should ever be foolish enough to hope to arrive at outside the body of Christ and without the true faith.

But, to return to what I was saying, the fact that this prophetic utterance applies to Judas was suggested by Christ,<sup>243</sup> was made clear by Judas' suicide, was afterwards made quite explicit by Peter,<sup>244</sup> and was fulfilled by all the apostles when Matthias was chosen by lot to take his place<sup>245</sup> and, thus another took over his ministry. And to make the matter even clearer, after Matthias took Judas' place, no replacement was ever taken into that group of twelve (although bishops succeed in the place of the apostles in an uninterrupted line), but rather, as the apostleship was transmitted gradually to more persons, that sacred number came to an end once the prophecy had been fulfilled.

Therefore, when Christ said, "Let these men go their way," he was not begging for their permission, but rather declaring in veiled terms that he himself granted his disciples the power to leave, that he might fulfill those words he had spoken: "Father, I have guarded those whom you gave to me, and none of them has perished except the son of perdition."<sup>246</sup> I think it worthwhile to consider here for a moment how strongly Christ foretold in these words the contrast between the end of Judas and the end of the rest, the ruination of the traitor Judas and the success of the others. For he asserts each future outcome with such certainty that he announces them not as future happenings but as events that have already definitely taken place. "I have guarded," he says, "those whom you gave to me." They were not defended by their own strength, nor were they preserved by the mercy of the Jews, nor did they escape through the carelessness of the cohort, but rather "I guarded them. And none of them perished except the son of perdition." For he, too, Father, was among those whom you gave to me. Chosen by me, he received me, and to him as well as to the rest who received me I had given the power to become a son of God.<sup>247</sup> But when in his insane greed he went over to Satan, leaving me, betraying me treacherously, refusing to be saved, then he became a son of destruction in the very act of pursuing my destruction, and perished like a wretch in his wretchedness.

Infalibly certain about the fate of the traitor,

Christ expresses his future ruin with such certainty that he asserts it as if it had already come to pass. And for all that, as Christ is being arrested, the unhappy traitor stands there as the ferocious leader and standard-bearer of Christ's captors, rejoicing and exulting, I imagine, in the danger of his fellow disciples and his master, for I am convinced he desired and hoped that all of them would be arrested and put to death. The raving madness and perversity of ingratitude manifests itself in this peculiarity: the ingrate desires the death of the very victim he has unjustly injured. So too, the person whose conscience is full of guilty sores is so sensitive that he views even the face of his victim as a reproach and shrinks from it with dread. Thus as the traitor rejoiced in the hope that all of them would be captured together, he was so stupidly sure of himself that nothing was further from his mind than the thought that the death sentence passed on him by God was hanging over his head like a dreadful noose ready to fall around his neck at any moment.

In this connection I am struck by the lamentable obscurity of the miserable human condition: often we are distressed and fearful, ignorant all the while that we are quite safe; often, on the other hand, we act as if we had not a care in the world, unaware that the death-dealing sword hangs over our heads. The other apostles were afraid they would be seized together with Christ and put to death, whereas actually they were all to escape. Judas, who had no fears for himself and took pleasure in their fears, perished only a few hours later. Cruel is the appetite which feeds on the misery of others. Nor is there any reason why a person should rejoice and congratulate himself on his good fortune because he has it in his power to cause another man's death, as the traitor thought he had by means of the cohort that had been delivered to him. For though a man may send someone else to his death, he himself is sure to follow him there. Even more, since the hour of death is uncertain, he himself may precede the very person he arrogantly imagines he has sent to death ahead of him.

Thus the death of the wretched Judas preceded that of Christ, whom he had betrayed to his death—a sad and terrible example to the whole world that the wrongdoer, however he may flout his arrogant impenitence, ought not to think he is safe from retribution. For against the wicked all creatures work together in harmony with their Creator.<sup>248</sup> The air longs to blow noxious vapors against the wicked man, the sea longs to overwhelm him in its waves, the mountains to fall upon him, the valleys to rise up against him, the earth to split open beneath him, hell to swallow him up after his headlong fall, the demons to plunge him into gulfs of ever-burning flames. All the while the only one who preserves the wretch is the God whom he deserted.

But if anyone is such a persistent imitator of Judas that God finally decides not to offer any longer the grace which has been offered and refused so often, this man is really and truly wretched: however he may flatter himself in the delusion that he is floating high in the air on the wings of felicity, he is actually wallowing in the utter depths of misery and calamity. Therefore let each of us pray to the most merciful Christ, each praying not only for himself but also for others, that we may not imitate Judas in his stubbornness but rather may eagerly accept the grace God offers us and may be restored once more to glory through penance and mercy.

THE SEVERING OF MALCHUS'S EAR,
THE FLIGHT OF THE APOSTLES, AND THE CAPTURE OF CHRIST

The Severing of Malchus's Ear

The apostles had previously heard Christ foretelling the very things they were now seeing happen.<sup>249</sup> On that occasion, though they were saddened and grieved, they treated the matter with much less concern than now when they see it happening before their very eyes. Now that they see the whole cohort standing there and openly admitting that they are seeking Jesus of Nazareth, there is no more room for doubt that they are seeking him to take him captive.

When the apostles saw what was about to happen, their minds were overwhelmed by a sudden welter of different feelings: anxiety for their Lord whom they loved, fear for their own safety, and finally shame for that high-sounding promise<sup>250</sup> of theirs that they would all rather die than fail their master. Thus their impulses were divided between conflicting feelings. Their love of their master urged them not to flee; their fear for themselves, not to remain. Fear of death impelled them to run away; shame for their promise, to stand fast.

Moreover, they remembered what Christ had said to them that very night: he told them that, whereas before he had forbidden any of them to carry so much as a staff to defend himself with,<sup>251</sup> now whoever did not have a sword should even sell his tunic to buy one.<sup>252</sup> Now they were struck with great fear as they saw massed against them the Roman cohort and the crowd of Jews, all of them armed with weapons, whereas there were only eleven of them, and even of those none had any weapons (apart perhaps from table-knives) except two who had swords. Nevertheless, they remembered that when they had said to Christ, “Look, here are two swords,” he had replied, “That is enough.”<sup>253</sup> Not understanding the great mystery contained in this reply, they suddenly and impulsively ask him whether he wants them to defend him with the sword, saying, “Lord, shall we strike with the sword?”<sup>254</sup>

But Peter’s feelings boiled over so that he did not wait for a reply, but drew his sword, struck a blow at the servant of the high priest, and cut off his right ear—perhaps simply because this man happened to be standing near to Peter, perhaps because his fierce and haughty bearing made him conspicuous among the rest. At any rate he certainly seems to have been a notoriously wicked man, for the evangelists mention that he was the servant of the high priest, the chief and prince of all the priests. “The greater the house, the prouder the servants,”<sup>255</sup> as the satirist says, and men know from experience that everywhere in the world the servants of great lords are more arrogant and overbearing than their masters. That we might know that this man had some standing with the high priest and was for that reason all the more egregiously proud, John immediately adds his name. “The servant’s name,” he says, “was Malchus.”<sup>256</sup> The evangelist does not ordinarily provide such information everywhere or without some special reason.

I imagine that this rascal, displaying such fierceness as he thrust himself forward, irked Peter, who chose this enemy to open the fight and who would have pressed the attack vigorously if Christ had not checked his course. For Christ immediately forbade the others to fight, declared Peter’s zeal ineffectual, and restored the ear of this miserable creature. These things he did because he came to suffer death, not to escape it; and even if he had not come to die, he would not have needed such assistance. To make this more manifest, he first gave his reply to the question put by the other apostles: “Let them go this far.”<sup>257</sup> Still give them leave for a while. For I cast them all down with a mere word, and yet even I, as you see, allowed them to get up so that for the present they may accomplish whatever they wish. Since, then, I allow them to go so far, you must do the same. The time will shortly come when I will no longer allow them any power against me. Even now, in the meantime, I do not need your help.

Thus to the others he answered only, “Let them go this far.” But turning to Peter separately, he said, “Put your sword away”<sup>258</sup>—as if to say, “I do not wish to be defended with the sword, and I have chosen you for the mission of fighting not with such a sword but with the sword of the word of God.”<sup>259</sup> Therefore return the sword of iron to the sheath where it belongs—that is, to the hands of worldly princes to be used against evildoers. You who are the apostles of my flock have yet another sword far more terrible than any sword of iron, a sword by which a wicked man is sometimes cut off from the Church (like a rotten limb<sup>260</sup> removed from my mystical body) and handed over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh to save the spirit<sup>261</sup> (provided only that the man is of a mind to be healed) and to enable him once more to be joined and grafted into my body—though it sometimes happens that a man suffering from a hopeless disease is also handed over to the invisible death of the soul, lest he should infect the healthy members with his disease. But I am so far from wishing you to make use of that sword of iron (whose proper sheath, you must recognize, is the secular magistrate) that I do not think even that spiritual sword, whose use properly pertains to you, should be unsheathed very often. Rather, wield with vigor the sword of the word,<sup>262</sup> whose stroke, like that of a scalpel, lets the pus out and heals by wounding. As for that other heavy and dangerous sword of excommunication, I desire that it be kept hidden in the sheath of mercy unless some urgent and fearful necessity requires that it be withdrawn.”

In answering the other apostles Christ contented

251 Mt 10:10 252 Lk 22:35–36 253 Lk 22:38 254 Lk 22:49 255 Juvenal 5,66

256 Jn 18:10 257 Lk 22:51 258 Mt 26:52; Jn 18:11 259 See Eph 6:17.

260 See Mt 5:29–30. 261 1 Cor 5:5 262 Eph 6:17

himself with three words, because they were more temperate, or perhaps merely more tepid, than Peter; but Peter's fiery and wild assault he controlled and checked at greater length. He not only ordered 5 him to put up his sword, but also added the reason why he did not approve of his zeal, however pious. "Do you not wish me," he said, "to drink the chalice my Father gave me?"<sup>263</sup> Some time ago Christ had predicted to the apostles that "it would be necessary
 10 for him to go to Jerusalem and to suffer many things from the elders and scribes and princes of the priests, and to be killed and to rise on the third day. And taking him aside, Peter began to chide him, saying, 'Far be it from you, O Lord. This will not 15 happen to you.' Christ turned and said to Peter, 'Get thee behind me, Satan, for you do not understand the things of God.'<sup>264</sup> Notice how severely Christ here rebuked Peter.

Shortly before, when Peter had professed that 20 Christ was the Son of God, Christ had said to him, "Blessed are you, Simon bar Jona, for flesh and blood have not revealed this to you, but rather my Father who is in heaven. And I say to you that you are Peter and upon this rock I will build my Church, 25 and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And to you I will give the keys of heaven, and whatever you bind on earth will also be bound in heaven, etc."<sup>265</sup> But here he almost rejects this same Peter and thrusts him behind him and declares that he is 30 a stumbling block to him and calls him Satan and asserts that he does not understand the things of God but rather those of men. And why does he do all this? Because Peter tried to persuade him not to die. Then he showed that it was necessary for him 35 to follow through to his death, which was irrevocably decreed for him by his own will; and hence not only did he not want them to hinder his death, he even wanted them to follow him along the same road. "If anyone wishes to come after me," he said,
 40 "let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me."<sup>266</sup> Not satisfied even with this, he went on to show that if anyone refuses to follow him on the road to death when the case requires it, he does not avoid death, but incurs a much worse death; on the 45 other hand, whoever gives up his life does not lose it but exchanges it for a more vital life.<sup>267</sup> "Whoever wishes to save his life," he says, "will lose it. But whoever loses his life for my sake will find it. For what does it profit a man if he gain the whole world 50 but suffer the loss of his own soul? Or what will a man give in exchange for his soul? For the Son of Man is to come with his angels in the glory of his Father, and then he will render to everyone according to his deeds."<sup>268</sup>

Perhaps I have devoted more time to this passage<sup>269</sup> than was necessary. But I ask you, who would not be led beyond the pale, as they say, by these words of Christ, so severe and threatening but also so effective in creating hope of eternal life? But the 60 relevance of these words to the passage under discussion is this: here we see Peter earnestly admonished not to be misled by his zeal into further hindering the death of Christ. And yet see now how Peter is again carried away by this same zeal to oppose
 65 Christ's death, except that this time he does not limit himself to verbal dissuasion but tries to ward it off by fierce fighting. Still, because Peter meant well when he did what he did, and also because Christ bore himself with humility toward everyone as he drew near to his Passion, Christ chose 70 not to reprove Peter sharply. Rather, he first rebuked him by giving a reason, then he declared Peter's act to be sinful, and finally he announced that even if he wished to avoid death he would not need Peter's 75 protection or any other mortal assistance, since if he wished help he had only to ask his Father, who would not fail to aid him in his danger by sending a mighty and invincible array of angels against these puny mortals who were coming to take him captive.

First of all, then, as I said, he checks Peter's zeal
 80 to strike out by presenting a rational argument. He says, "Do you not wish me to drink the chalice which my Father gave me?" My whole life up to this point has been a pattern of obedience and a
 85 model of humility. What lessons have I taught more frequently or more forcefully than that magistrates ought to be obeyed,<sup>270</sup> that parents should be honored,<sup>271</sup> that what is Caesar's should be rendered to Caesar, what is God's to God.<sup>272</sup> And now, when I
 90 ought to be applying the finishing touches to bring my work to full perfection, now can you wish that I should refuse the chalice extended to me by my

263 Jn 18:11 264 Mt 16:21-23 265 Mt 16:17-19 266 Mt 16:24 267 See Cicero, De amicitia 6.22. 268 Mt

16:25-27 269 Mt 16:13-27 270 See Rom 13:4-7; 1 Pt 2:17. 271 See Ex

20:12; Eph 6:1; Col 3:20. 272 Mt 22:21; Mk 12:17; Lk 20:25

Father, that the Son of Man should disobey God the Father, and thus unravel in a single moment all of that most beautiful fabric I have spent such a long time weaving?

5 Then he teaches Peter that he committed a sin by striking with the sword, and this he does by a parallel from the civil law. “For everyone who takes up the sword,” he says, “will perish by the sword.”<sup>273</sup> According to the Roman law, which also applied to 10 the Jews at that time, any person discovered wearing a sword without legitimate authority for the purpose of killing a man was placed in almost the same category as the man who had killed his victim.<sup>274</sup> Naturally, therefore, a person who not only wore a 15 sword but also drew it and struck a blow was in even greater legal jeopardy. Nor do I think that Peter, in that moment of confusion and alarm, was so self-possessed that he deliberately avoided hitting Malchus’ head and aimed only at his ear, so as merely to 20 frighten him but not kill him.

But if someone should perhaps maintain that everyone has the right to use even force in order to protect an innocent person from criminal assault, this objection would require a longer discussion 25 than I could conveniently introduce in this place. This much is certain: however much Peter’s offense was mitigated by his loyal affection for Christ, nevertheless, his lack of any legitimate authority to fight is made quite clear by the fact that on a previous 30 occasion Christ had sharply warned him not to try to prevent his Passion and death, not even by verbal dissuasion, much less by actual fighting.

Next he checks Peter’s attack by making another point: Peter’s protection is quite unnecessary. “Do 35 you not know,” he says, “that I could ask my Father for help and he would immediately deliver to me more than twelve legions of angels?”<sup>275</sup>

About his own power he says nothing, but glories that he enjoys the favor of his Father. For as 40 he drew near to his death, he wished to avoid lofty statements about himself or any assertion that his own power was equal to that of the Father. Rather, wishing to make it clear that he had no need of help from Peter or any other mortal, he declares that the 45 assistance of the heavenly angels (if he chose to ask for it) would immediately be at hand, sent by his omnipotent Father. “Do you not know,” he says, “that I could ask my Father for help and he would immediately deliver to me more than twelve legions 50 of angels?”—as if to say: You have just seen before your very eyes how I threw down, with a mere word, without even touching them, this whole crowd, such a large crowd that it would be sheer folly for 55 you to think you are strong enough to defend me against them. If that could not convince you that I do not need your help, consider at least whose son you proclaimed me to be when I put the question

60 “Who do you say I am?” and you immediately gave that heaven-inspired reply, “You are Christ, the son of the living God.”<sup>276</sup> Therefore, since you know from God’s own revelation that I am the Son of 65 God, and since you must know that mortal parents do not fail their children, do you imagine that, if I were not going to my death of my own free will, my heavenly Father would choose to fail me? Do 70 you not know that, if I chose to ask him, he would deliver to me more than twelve legions of angels, and that he would do so forthwith, without hesitation or delay? Against so many legions of angels, what resistance could be offered by this miserable 75 cohort of puny mortals? Ten times twelve legions of creatures such as these would not dare even to look upon the angry frown of a single angel.

Then Christ returns to his first point, as the one closest to the central issue. “How, then,” he says, 75 “will the Scriptures be fulfilled that say this is the way it must be?”<sup>277</sup>

The Scriptures are full of prophecies concerning Christ’s death, full of the mysteries of his Passion and of mankind’s redemption which would 80 not have happened without that Passion. Therefore, lest Peter or anyone else should mutter under his breath, “If you can obtain so many legions from your Father, Christ, why don’t you ask for them?”—to counter this, Christ says, “How, then, will the 85 Scriptures be fulfilled that say this is the way it must be?” Since you understand from the Scriptures that this is the only way chosen by the most just wisdom of God to restore the human race to its lost glory, if 90 I should now successfully implore my Father to save me from death, what would I be doing but striving to undo the very thing I came to do? To call down from heaven angels to defend me, what effect would that have but precisely to exclude from heaven the 95 whole human race, which I come to redeem and restore to the glory of heaven? With your sword, therefore, you are not fighting against the wicked Jews but rather attacking the whole human race, inasmuch as you are setting yourself against the fulfillment of the Scriptures and desiring me not to drink

 5 the chalice given to me by my Father, that chalice by which I myself (unstained and undefiled) will wipe away that defiling stain of fallen nature.

But now behold the most gentle heart of Christ, who did not think it enough to check Peter's strokes 10 but also touched the severed ear of his persecutor and made it sound again, in order to give us an example of rendering good for evil.

No one's body, I think, is so fully pervaded by his soul as the letter of Holy Scripture is pervaded by 15 spiritual mysteries. Indeed, just as one cannot touch any part of the body in which the soul does not reside, providing life and sensation to even the smallest part, so too no factual account in all of Scripture is so gross and corporeal (so to speak) that it
 20 does not have life and breath from some spiritual mystery. Therefore, in considering how Malchus' ear was cut off by Peter's sword and restored by the hand of Christ, we should not feel bound to consider only the facts of the account, though even 25 these can teach us salutary lessons, but let us look further for the saving mystery of the spirit veiled beneath the letter of the story.

Thus Malchus, whose name is the Hebrew word for "king," can appropriately be taken as a figure of 30 reason. For in man reason ought to reign like a king, and it does truly reign when it makes itself loyally subject to faith and serves God. For to serve him is to reign. The high priest, on the other hand, together with his priests, with the Pharisees, scribes, 35 and elders of the people, was given over to perverse superstitions, which he mixed into the law of God, and he used piety as a pretext to oppose piety and sought eagerly to eliminate the founder of true religion. Hence he together with his accomplices may 40 rightly be taken to represent wicked heresiarchs, the chief priests of pernicious superstition, together with their followers.

And so whenever the rational mind rebels against the true faith of Christ and devotes itself to heresies, 45 it becomes a fugitive from Christ and a servant of the heresiarch whom it follows, led astray by the devil and wandering down the byways of error.

Keeping, therefore, its left ear, with which it listens to sinister heresies, it loses its right ear, with which it ought to listen to the true faith. But this does not
 50 always happen from the same motivation or with the same effect. For some minds turn to heresies out of determined malice. Then the ear is not cut off by a swift stroke but rots slowly and gradually as the devil infuses his venom, until finally the purulent 55 parts harden and block the passages with a clot so that nothing good can penetrate within. Such persons, alas, are hardly ever restored to health. For the parts eaten away by the ravaging cancer are completely gone and there is nothing left which can be 60 put back in place.

But the ear cut off by a sudden stroke and sent whirling in one piece to the ground because of imprudent zeal, stands for those who turn from the truth to a false appearance of the truth because they 65 are overcome by a sudden impulse; or it also represents those who are deceived by a well-meaning zeal, concerning whom Christ says, "The time will come when everyone who [kills you will think he is]<sup>278</sup> performing a service for God."<sup>279</sup> Of this kind 70 of person the apostle Paul was a typical figure.<sup>280</sup> Some of these, because their minds are confused by earthly feelings, allow the ear which has been cut off from heavenly doctrine to remain lying on the earth. But Christ often takes pity on the misery of 75 such persons and with his own hand picks up from the earth the ear which has been cut off by a sudden impulse or by ill considered zeal and with his touch fastens it to the head again and makes it once more capable of listening to true doctrine. I know that 80 the ancient fathers elicited various mysteries from this one passage, as each one, aided by the grace of the Holy Spirit, made his own particular discovery. But it is no part of my plan to review them all here because to do so would make too long an interruption 85 in the account of the historical events.

But Jesus said to those princes of the priests and magistrates of the Temple and elders who had come, "You have come out with swords and clubs to seize me as if I were a robber, though I was with you every day in the Temple, and I sat teaching there and you did not detain me — you made no move to lay hands on me. But this is your hour and the power of darkness."<sup>281</sup>

Christ said this to those princes of the priests and magistrates of the Temple and elders who had come. But here some readers are puzzled because the evangelist Luke reports that Jesus said these things to the princes of the priests and the magistrates of the Temple and the elders of the people, while the other evangelists write in their accounts that these persons did not come themselves but sent the cohort and their servants.

Some solve the problem by saying that Jesus may indeed be said to have spoken to these persons because he spoke to those whom they had sent. In this sense princes ordinarily speak to one another through their ambassadors, and private persons everywhere speak to each other through messengers. Thus whatever we tell a servant who has been sent to us, we say to his master who sent him, for such servants will repeat to their master what they have been told.

Though I do not deny such a solution, I am certainly much more inclined to the opinion of those who think that Christ spoke face to face with the princes of the priests, magistrates of the Temple, and elders of the people. For Luke does not say that Christ said these things to all the princes of the priests, or to all the magistrates of the Temple, or to all the elders of the people, but only to those “who had come.” These words seem to indicate rather clearly that, although the cohort and servants had been commissioned to seize Christ in the name of the whole assembly gathered together in council, still some members of each group—elders, Pharisees, and princes—also went along with them. This opinion agrees exactly with Luke’s words and does not contradict the accounts of the other evangelists.

Addressing, therefore, the princes of the priests, the Pharisees, and the elders of the people, Christ implicitly reminds them that they should not attribute his capture to their own strength or adroitness and should not foolishly boast of it as a clever and ingenious achievement (according to that unfortunate tendency of those who are fortunate in evil). He lets them know that the foolish contrivances and maneuvers by which they labored to suppress the truth were powerless to accomplish anything against him, but rather the profound wisdom of God had foreseen and set the time when the prince of this world<sup>282</sup> would be justly tricked into losing his ill-gotten prey, the human race, even as he strove by unjust means to keep it. If this were not the case, Christ explains to them, there would have been no need at all for them to pay for the services of the betrayer, to come at night with lanterns and torches, to make their approach surrounded by the dense ranks of the cohort and armed with swords and clubs, since they had previously had many opportunities to arrest him as he sat teaching in the Temple and then they could have done it without expense, without any special effort, without spending a sleepless night, without any sabre-rattling at all.

But if they should take special credit for their prudent foresight and say that the arrest of Christ was no easy matter, as he claimed, but rather quite difficult because it necessarily brought with it the great danger of a popular uprising,<sup>283</sup> this difficulty, for the most part, had arisen only recently, after the resurrection of Lazarus.<sup>284</sup> Before that event, it had happened more than once that, in spite of the people’s great love of his virtues and their profound respect for him, he had had to use his own power to escape from their midst.<sup>285</sup> On those occasions anyone attempting to capture and kill him would not have been in the least danger from the crowd but would have found them to be willing accomplices in crime. So unfailingly unreliable is the common herd, always ready at a moment’s notice to take the wrong side. Finally, what happened a little later showed how easy it is to brush aside the people’s favor toward a person and any fear that might arise from it; as soon as he was arrested, the people were no less furious at him as they cried out, “Away with him! Crucify him!” than they had formerly been eager to honor him when they cried, “Blessed is he who comes in the name of the lord!” and “Hosanna in the highest!”

And so up to that time God had caused the would-be captors of Christ to imagine purely fictitious grounds for fear and to tremble with dread where there was no reason to be afraid. But now that the proper time had come for all men (all, that is, who truly desire it) to be redeemed by the bitter death of one man<sup>286</sup> and be restored to the sweetness of eternal life, these puny creatures stupidly imagined that they had achieved by clever planning what as a matter of fact God in his omnipotent providence (without which not a sparrow falls to earth)<sup>287</sup> had mercifully prescribed from all eternity. To show them how very wrong they were and to let them know that, without his own consent, the deceitfulness of the betrayer and their own cleverly laid snares and the power of the Romans would have been utterly ineffectual, Christ said, “But this is your hour and the power of darkness.” These words of Christ are grounded firmly by what the evangelist says: “But all this was done so that the writings of the prophets might be fulfilled.”<sup>288</sup>

Predictions of Christ’s death are very frequent throughout the prophets: “He was led like a lamb to the slaughter, and his cry was not heard in the streets;”<sup>289</sup> “They have pierced my hands and my feet;”<sup>290</sup> “I was struck with these blows in the home of those who loved me;”<sup>291</sup> “And he was reckoned among the wicked;”<sup>292</sup> “Truly he bore our infirmities;”<sup>293</sup> “By his bruises we have been healed;”<sup>294</sup> “He has been brought to his death by the wickedness of my people.”<sup>295</sup> The prophets are full of very clear predictions of the death of Christ. In order that these might not remain unfulfilled, it was necessary that the matter depend not on human planning but rather on him who foresaw and prearranged from all eternity what would happen (that is, on the Father of Christ, and likewise on Christ himself, and on the Holy Spirit of both of them, for the actions of these three are always so harmoniously unified that there is no exterior act of anyone of them that does not belong equally to all three). The most suitable times of fulfillment, then, were already foreseen and prescribed. Therefore, while the high priests and the princes of the priests, the scribes, Pharisees and elders of the people, in short, all these accursed and wicked magistrates, were taking pride in their masterful plan for capturing Christ cleverly, they were nothing more than tools of God, eager in their ignorance, blind instruments of the most excellent and unchangeable will of almighty God, not only of the Father and the Holy Spirit, but also of Christ himself; thus, foolish and blind with malice, they did great harm to themselves and great good to others, they inflicted a temporary death on Christ but contributed to a most happy life for the human race, and they enhanced the everlasting glory of Christ.

And so Christ said to them, “This is your hour and the power of darkness.” In the past, although you hated me intensely, although you longed to destroy me, although you could have done so at that time with less trouble (except that heavenly power prevented it), yet you did not detain me in the Temple—you did not even make a single move to lay hands on me. Why was this? It was because the time and the hour had not yet come, the hour fixed not by the heavenly bodies, not by your cleverness, but rather by the unsearchable plan of my Father, to which I too had given my consent. Would you like to know when he did this? Not only as long ago as the times of Abraham, but from all eternity. For from all eternity, together with the Father, before Abraham came to be, I am.<sup>296</sup>

“And so this is your hour and the power of darkness. This is the short hour allowed to you and the power granted to darkness, so that now in the dark you might do what you were not permitted to do in the daylight, flying in my face like winged creatures from the Stygian marsh,<sup>297</sup> like harpies, like horned owls and screech-owls, like night-ravens and bats and nightowls, futilely swarming in a shrill uproar of beaks, talons, and teeth. You are in the dark when you ascribe my death to your strength. So too the governor Pilate will be in the dark when he takes pride in possessing the power to free me or to crucify me. For, even though my people and my high priests are about to hand me over to him, he would not have any power over me if it were not given to him from above. And for that very reason, those who will hand me over to him are the greater sinners.”<sup>298</sup>

“But this is the hour and the brief power of darkness. A man who walks in the dark does not know where he is going.<sup>299</sup> You also do not see or know what you are doing, and for that reason I myself will pray that you may be forgiven for what you are scheming to do to me.<sup>300</sup> But not everyone will be forgiven. Blindness will not be an excuse for everyone. For you yourselves create your own darkness, you put out the light, you blind your own eyes first and then the eyes of others so that you are the blind leading the blind until both fall into a ditch.<sup>301</sup> This is your short hour. This is that mad and ungovernable power which brings you armed to take an unarmed man, which brings the fierce against the gentle, criminals against an innocent man, a traitor against his lord, puny mortals against God.

287 Mt 10:29 288 Mt 26:56 289 Is 53:7; Ps 43(44):11 290 Ps 21(22):16 291 Zec 13:6 292 Lk 22:37; Is 53:12

293 Is 53:4 294 Is 53:5; 1 Pt 2:24 295 Is 53:8, 12 296 Jn 8:58 297 Stygian marsh: classical underworld. See

Vergil’s Aeneid 6. 298 See Jn 19:10–11. 299 Jn 12:35 300 See Lk 22:34. 301 Mt 15:14

“But this hour and this power of darkness are not only given to you now against me, but such an hour and such a brief power of darkness will also be given to other governors and other caesars against other disciples of mine. And this too will truly be the power of darkness. For whatever my disciples endure and whatever they say, they will not endure by their own strength or say of themselves, but conquering through my strength they will win their souls by their patience,<sup>302</sup> and it is my Father’s spirit that will speak in them.<sup>303</sup> So too those who persecute and kill them will neither do nor speak anything of themselves. Rather, the prince of darkness who is already coming and who has no power over me<sup>304</sup> will instill his poison in the breasts of these tyrants and tormentors and will demonstrate and exercise his strength through them for the brief time allowed him. Hence my comrades-in-arms will be struggling not against flesh and blood but against princes and powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against the spiritual forces of evil in high places.<sup>305</sup> Thus Nero is yet to be born, in whom the prince of darkness will kill Peter and to him will add Paul, who does not yet have that name and is still displaying his hatred of me. Through the prince of darkness other caesars and their governors will rise up against other disciples of my flock.

“But although the nations have raged and the people devised vain things, although the kings of the earth have risen up and the princes gathered together against the Lord and against his Christ, striving to break their chains and to cast off that most sweet yoke which a loving God, through his pastors, places upon their stubborn necks, then he who dwells in the heavens will laugh at them and the Lord will deride them. He sits not on a curule<sup>306</sup> throne like earthly princes, raised up a few feet above the earth, but rather he rises above the setting of the sun,<sup>307</sup> he sits above the cherubim,<sup>308</sup> the heavens are his throne, the earth is the footstool beneath his feet,<sup>309</sup> his name is the Lord.<sup>310</sup> He is the King of kings and the Lord of lords,<sup>311</sup> a terrible king who daunts the hearts of princes.<sup>312</sup> This king will speak to them in his anger, and in his rage he will throw them into confusion.<sup>313</sup> He will establish his Christ, the son whom he has today begotten, as king on his holy mountain of Zion,<sup>314</sup> a mountain which will not be shaken.<sup>315</sup> He will cast all his enemies down before him like a footstool under his feet.<sup>316</sup> Those who tried to break his chains and cast off his yoke, he will rule against their will with a rod of iron, and he will shatter them like a potter’s vessel.<sup>317</sup> Against them and their instigator, the prince of darkness, my disciples will be strengthened in the Lord.

“And putting on the armor of God, their loins girt with truth, wearing the breastplate of justice, shod in preparation to preach the Gospel of peace, taking up in all things the shield of faith and putting on the helmet of salvation and the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God,<sup>318</sup> they shall be clothed with power from on high.<sup>319</sup> And they will stand against the snares of the devil,<sup>320</sup> that is, against the soft speeches he will place on the lips of their persecutors to cajole them into leaving the way of truth. The open assaults of Satan they will also resist on the evil day:<sup>321</sup> compassed about by the shield of faith,<sup>322</sup> pouring forth tears in their prayers and shedding their blood in the agony of their suffering, they shall extinguish all the fiery darts hurled against them by the underlings of that monster of evil, Satan.<sup>323</sup> Thus, when they have taken up their cross to follow me,<sup>324</sup> when they have conquered the prince of darkness, the devil, when they have trod under foot the earthly minions of Satan, then finally, riding aloft on a triumphal chariot, the martyrs will enter into heaven in a magnificent and marvelous procession.

“But you who now give vent to your malice against me, and also that corrupt generation to come which will imitate your malice, that brood of vipers<sup>325</sup> which will assail my disciples with impenitent malice similar to yours, all of you, to your everlasting infamy, will be thrust down into the dark fires of hell. But in the meantime you are permitted to demonstrate and exercise your power. Still, lest you should take too much pride in it, remember that it must shortly come to an end. For the span of time allotted to your wanton arrogance is not endless but has been shortened to the span of a brief hour for the sake of the elect, that they might not be tried beyond their strength.<sup>326</sup>

302 Lk 21:19 303 Mt 10:20 304 Jn 14:30 305 Eph 6:12 306 a seat inlaid with ivory, used by the highest magistrates of Rome 307 Ps 67:5(68:4) 308 Ps 98(99):1; 79:2(80:1) 309 Is 66:1

310 Ps 67:5(68:4) 311 1 Tm 6:15 312 Ps 75:12-13(76:11-12) 313 Ps 2:5 314 Ps 2:6-7 315 Ps 124(125):1; 92(93):1; 95(96):10 316 Ps 109(110):1; 1 Cor 15:25; Heb 1:13; 10:13 317 Ps 2:3, 9 318 Eph

6:10-17 319 Lk 24:49 320 Eph 6:11 321 Eph 6:13 322 See Ps 90:5(91:4) 323 Eph 6:16 324 Mt 10:38; 16:24; Mk 8:34 325 See Mt 3:7; 12:34; 23:33; Lk 3:7 326 Mt 24:22; Mk 13:20; 1 Cor 10:13

“And so this hour of yours and this power of darkness are not long-lasting and enduring but quite as brief as the present moment to which they are limited, an instant of time always caught between a past that is gone and a future that has not arrived. Therefore, lest you should lose any of this hour of yours which is so short, proceed immediately to use it for your own evil purposes. Since you seek to destroy me, be quick about it,<sup>327</sup> arrest me without delay, but let these men go their way.”

The Flight of the Disciples

Then all the disciples abandoned him and fled.<sup>328</sup>

From this passage it is easy to see how difficult and arduous a virtue patience is. For many can bring themselves to face certain death bravely provided they can strike back at their assailants and give vent to their feelings by inflicting wounds on those who attack them. But to suffer without any comfort from revenge, to meet death with a patience that not only refrains from striking back but also takes blows without returning so much as an angry word, that, I assure you, is such a lofty peak of heroic virtue that even the apostles were not yet strong enough to scale it. Remembering that grand promise of theirs that they would die together with him rather than desert him,<sup>329</sup> even they held out at least to the point of professing themselves ready to die providing that they had the chance to die fighting. And in deed as well as word Peter gave concrete evidence of this willingness by striking Malchus. But when our Savior denied them permission to fight and withheld the power to defend themselves, “they all abandoned him and fled.”

I have sometimes asked myself this question: when Christ left off praying and returned to the apostles only to find them sleeping, did he go to both groups or only to those he had brought farther along and placed nearest to him? But when I consider these words of the evangelist, “All of them abandoned him and fled,” I no longer have any doubt that it was all of them who fell asleep. While they should have been staying awake and praying that they might not enter into temptation (as Christ so often told them to do), instead they were sleeping and thus gave the tempter an opportunity to weaken their wills with thoughtless drowsiness and make them far more inclined to fight or flee than to bear all with patience. And this was the reason that they all abandoned him and fled. And thus that saying of Christ was fulfilled, “This night you will all be scandalized in me,” and also that prediction of the prophet, [“I will strike the shepherd and the sheep of the flock will be scattered”].<sup>330</sup>

But a certain young man was following him, having only a linen cloth wrapped about his naked body, and throwing it off, he fled from them naked.<sup>331</sup>

Just who this young man was has never been determined with certainty. Some think he was the James who was called the brother of the Lord and was distinguished by the epithet “the just.” Others assert that he was the evangelist John, who always had a special place in our Lord’s heart and who must have been still quite young, since he lived for so many years after Christ’s death. For, according to Jerome, he died in the sixty-eighth year after our Lord’s Passion.<sup>332</sup> But there are also some ancient writers who say that this young man was not one of the apostles at all but one of the servants in the household where Christ had celebrated the Passover that night. And certainly I myself find this opinion easier to accept. Apart from the fact that I find it unlikely for an apostle to be wearing nothing but a linen cloth, and even that so loosely fastened that it could be quickly thrown off, I am inclined to this opinion first of all by the sequence of historical events and then by the very words of the account.

Now, among those who think the young man was one of the apostles, the preponderance of opinion is for John. But this seems to me unlikely because of John’s own words: “But Simon Peter was following Jesus and so was another disciple. Now that disciple was known to the high priest, and he entered the courtyard of the high priest together with Jesus. But Peter was standing outside at the gate. So the other disciple, who was known to the high priest, went out and spoke to the portress, and brought Peter in.” Writers who assert that it was the blessed evangelist who followed Christ and fled when he was taken prisoner are faced with a slight hitch in their argument — namely, the fact that he threw off the linen cloth and fled naked. For this seems to conflict

327 Jn 13:27 328 Mt 26:56, Mk 14:50
329 Mt 26:35 330 Zec 13:7; More leaves

a blank space here. 331 Mk 14:51-52
332 Adversus Jovinianum 1.26 (PL 23,247),

Liber de viris illustribus 9 (PL 23,625-26)

with what follows—namely, that John entered the courtyard of the high priest, that he brought Peter in<sup>333</sup> (for everyone agrees that the disciple who did this was the evangelist), that he followed Christ
 5 all the way to the place of the crucifixion, and that he stood near the cross with Christ’s most beloved mother (two pure virgins standing together), and that when Christ commended her to him he accepted her as his own mother from that day on.<sup>334</sup>

10 Now there can be no doubt that at all these times and in all these places John was wearing clothes. For he was a disciple of Christ, not of the cynic sect;<sup>335</sup> and therefore, though he had enough good sense not to avoid nakedness when circumstances
 15 required it or necessity demanded it, nevertheless I hardly think his virgin modesty would have allowed him to go out in public naked, for everyone to see, with no good reason at all. This difficulty they try to explain away by saying that he went somewhere else
 20 in the meantime and put on other clothes—a point I will not dispute, but it hardly seems likely to me, especially when I see in this passage that he continuously followed after Christ with Peter and that he entered the residence of Annas, the father-in-law of 25 the high priest, together with Jesus.

Furthermore, another consideration that strongly persuades me to side with those who think that the young man was not one of the apostles but one of the servants of the inn is the sort of connection
 30 Mark makes between the apostles who ran away and the young man who stayed behind. “Then the disciples abandoned him and all of them ran away. But a certain young man was following him.” Notice, he says not that some ran away but “all of them” and that the person who (unlike them) stayed behind
 35 and followed Christ was not anyone of the apostles (for all of them had already run away) but rather a “certain” young man, that is, it would seem, an unknown young man, whose name Mark either did 40 not know or thought it not worthwhile to report.

Here, then, is how I would imagine it. This young man, who had previously been excited by Christ’s fame and who now saw him in person as he was bringing in food to Christ and his disciples reclining at table, was touched by a secret breath of the 45 spirit and felt the moving force of charity. Then, impelled to pursue a life of true devotion, he followed Christ when he left after dinner and continued to follow him, at a little distance, perhaps, from the apostles but still with them. And he sat down and got up again together with them until finally, when 50 the mob came, he lost himself in the crowd. Furthermore, when all the apostles had escaped in terror from the hands of the sluggish soldiers this young man dared to remain behind, with all the

 55 more confidence because he knew that no one as yet was aware of the love he felt for Christ. But how hard it is to disguise the love we feel for someone! Although this young man had mingled with that crowd of people who hated Christ, still he betrayed
 60 himself by his gait and his bearing, making it clear to everyone that he pursued Christ (now deserted by the others) not as a persecutor but as a devoted follower. And so, when they finally noticed that the rest of Christ’s band had fled and saw that this one 65 had stayed behind and still dared to follow Christ, they quickly seized him.

This act of theirs convinces me that they also intended to seize all the apostles but were so taken by surprise that they lost their chance, and thus that 70 prophetic command of Christ, “Let these men go their way,” was indeed fulfilled. Christ did not intend this command to be limited to the apostles, whom he had chosen (though it was meant to apply principally to them), but he also wished to extend 75 the riches of his kindness even more abundantly by making the command apply also to this young man, who, without being summoned, had followed him of his own accord and had slipped into the holy band of his apostles. And in this way
 80 Christ displayed his own secret power more clearly and at the same time exposed the weakness of the crowd more fully, because not only did they lose through negligence the eleven apostles, whose escape distressed them very much, but also they could 85 not even detain this one young man whom they had already seized and who was (one may conjecture) completely walled in by their ranks; for “they seized him and he threw off the linen cloth and fled from them naked.” Moreover, I have not the slightest 90 doubt that this young man, who followed Christ that night and could not be torn away from him until the last possible moment, after all the apostles had fled—and even then it took manhandling and rough force—later took the first opportunity to return to Christ’s flock and that even now he lives with Christ in everlasting glory in heaven, where I hope and pray that we will one day live with him. Then he himself will tell us who he was, and we will get a most pleasant and full account of many other details of what happened that night which are not contained in Scripture.
 95

In the meantime, in order to make our heavenward journey safer and easier, it will be of no small use for us to gather wholesome spiritual counsels from the flight of the disciples before they were captured and from the escape of this young man after he was captured: these counsels will be the provisions, as it were, for us to carry with us on the journey. The ancient fathers of the Church warn us not to be so sure of our strength as to place ourselves willingly and needlessly in danger of falling into sin. But if someone should happen to find himself in a situation where he recognizes an imminent danger that he will be driven by force to offend God, he ought to do what the apostles did—avoid capture by fleeing. I do not say this to suggest that the apostles' flight was praiseworthy, on the grounds that Christ, in his mercy (though he is indeed merciful) had permitted them to do so because of their weakness. Far from praising it, he had foretold it that very night as occasion of sin for them. But if we feel that our character is not strong enough, let us all imitate this flight of theirs insofar as we can, without sinning, flee the danger of falling into sin. For otherwise, if a person runs away when God commands him to stand and face the danger confidently, either for his own salvation or for that of those whom he sees have been entrusted to his care, then he is acting foolishly indeed, unless he does it out of concern for this present life—no, even then he acts foolishly. For what could be more stupid than to choose a brief time of misery over an eternity of happiness?

But if he does it because of the future life, with the idea that if he does not run away he may be forced to offend God, he compounds not only his folly but also his crime. For to desert one's post is itself a very serious crime, and if one adds to it the enormous gravity of despair, it is quite as serious as going over to the enemy's side. What worse offense could be imagined than to despair of God's help and by running away to hand over to the enemy the battle-station which God had assigned you to guard? Furthermore, what greater madness could be conceived than to seek to avoid the possible sin that may happen if you stay, by committing the certain sin of running away? But when flight entails no offense against God, certainly the safer plan is to make haste to escape rather than to delay so long as to be captured and thus fall into the danger of committing a terrible sin. For it is easy and (where allowable) safe to run away in time, but it is difficult and dangerous to fight.

On the other hand, the example of this young man shows us what sort of person can afford to hold his ground longer with less danger and can easily escape from the hands of his captors if he should happen to be taken. For, although this young man stayed behind after all the others and followed Christ so long that they laid hands on him and held him, nevertheless, because he was not dressed in various garments but wore only a simple linen cloth—and even that not sewn together or buttoned on, but thrown carelessly over his naked body in such a way that he could easily shake it off—this young man suddenly threw off the cloth, leaving it there in the hands of his captors, and fled from them naked—taking the kernel, as it were, and leaving them holding the shell.<sup>336</sup> What is the figurative meaning of this? What else but this: just as a pot-bellied man, slowed down by his fat paunch,<sup>337</sup> or a man who goes around wearing a heavy load of clothes is hardly in a condition to run fast, so too the man who is hemmed in by a belt full of moneybags is hardly able to escape when troubles suddenly descend on him and put him in a bind. Neither will a man run very fast or very far if his clothing, however light it may be, is so tightly laced and knotted that he cannot breathe freely. For a man who is wearing a lot of clothing but can get rid of it quickly will find it easier to escape than a man who is wearing only a little but has it tied around his neck so tightly that he has to carry it with him wherever he runs. One sees rich men—less often, it is true, than I would like—but still, thank God, one sometimes sees exceedingly rich men who would rather lose everything they have than keep anything at all by offending God through sin. These men have many clothes, but they are not tightly confined by them, so that when they need to run away from danger, they escape easily by throwing off their clothes.

On the other hand we see people—and far more of them than I would wish—who happen to have only light garments and quite skimpy outfits and yet have so welded their affections to those poor riches<sup>338</sup> of theirs that you could sooner strip skin from flesh than separate them from their goods. Such a person had better get going while there is still time. For once someone gets hold of his clothes, he will sooner die than leave his linen cloth behind. In summary, then, we learn from the example of this young man that we should always be prepared for troubles that arise suddenly, dangers that strike without warning and might make it necessary for us to run away; to be prepared, we ought not to be so loaded with various garments, or so buttoned up in even one, that in an emergency we are unable to throwaway our linen cloth and escape naked.

Now anyone who is willing to devote a little more attention to this deed of the young man can see that it offers us another teaching, even more forceful than the first. For the body is, as it were, the garment of the soul. The soul puts on the body when it comes into the world and takes off the body when it leaves the world at death. Hence, just as the clothes are worth much less than the body, so too the body is far less precious than the soul. Thus, to give away the soul to buy the body is the same kind of raving lunacy as to prefer the loss of a cloak to the loss of the body. Concerning the body, Christ did indeed say, “Is not the body worth more than its clothing?”<sup>339</sup> But concerning the soul he was far more emphatic: “What does it profit you if you gain the whole world but suffer the loss of your soul? or what will a man give in exchange for his soul?”<sup>340</sup> But I say to you, my friends, do not be afraid of those who kill the body, and after that have nothing more that they can do. But I will show you the one to be afraid of. Fear him who, after he has killed, has the power to cast into hell. Yes, I say to you, fear him.”<sup>341</sup> Thus, the example of this young man warns us about what sort of clothing for our souls our bodies ought to be when we are faced with such trials: they should not be obese from debauchery and flabby from dissolute living but thin like the linen cloth, with the fat worked off by fasting; and then we should not be so strongly attached to them that we cannot willingly cast them off when God’s cause demands it. This is the lesson which that young man teaches us; when he was in the clutches of wicked men, he preferred to leave his linen cloth behind and flee from them naked rather than be forced to do or say anything which might impugn the honor of Christ.

In a similar way, another young man who lived long before this one, the holy and innocent patriarch Joseph, left to posterity a notable example, teaching that one should flee from the danger of unchaste defilement no less than if it were an attempted murder. Because he had a handsome face and was a fine figure of a man, the wife of Potiphar, in whose house he was the chief servant, cast her eyes on him and fell passionately in love with him. She was so carried away by the raving madness of her desire that she not only offered herself freely and shamelessly to the young man by her glances and words, enticing him to overcome his aversion, but also, when he refused, she went so far as to clutch his garment in her hands and presented the shameful spectacle of a woman wooing a man by force. But Joseph, who would rather have died than commit such a horrible sin and who also knew how dangerous it is to engage the embattled forces of Venus at close quarters and that against them the surest victory is flight, Joseph, I say, left his cloak in the hands of the adulteress and escaped by dashing out of doors.<sup>342</sup>

But, as I was saying, to avoid falling into grave sin we must throw off not merely a cloak or gown or shirt or any other such garment of the body but even the garment of the soul, the body itself. For if we strive to save the body by sin, we destroy it and we also lose the soul. But if we patiently endure the loss of the body for the love of God, then, just as the snake sloughs off its old skin (called, I think, its senecta) by rubbing it against thorns and thistles, and leaving it behind in the thick hedges comes forth young and shining, so too those of us who follow Christ’s advice and become wise as serpents<sup>343</sup> will leave behind on earth our old bodies, rubbed off like a snake’s old skin among the thorns of tribulation suffered for the love of God, and will quickly be carried up to heaven, shining and young and never more to feel the effects of old age.

<sup>338</sup> See Horace, Odes 3.16.28; Ovid, Metamorphoses 3.466. <sup>339</sup> Mt 6:25

<sup>340</sup> Mt 16:26 <sup>341</sup> Lk 12:4-5 <sup>342</sup> Gn 39:6-12 <sup>343</sup> Mt 10:16

The Capture of Christ

Then they came up and laid hands on Jesus. The cohort and the tribune and the servants of the Jews seized Jesus and holding him fast they bound him and 5 took him first to Annas. For he was the father-in-law of Caiaphas. But it was Caiaphas who had advised the Jews that it is expedient that one man die for the people.<sup>344</sup> And all the priests, scribes, Pharisees, and elders gathered together.<sup>345</sup>

10 Exactly when they first laid hands on Jesus is a point on which the experts disagree. Among the interpreters of the Gospel accounts, which agree on the fact but vary in their way of presenting it (for one anticipates, another goes back to pick up 15 a detail omitted earlier), some commentators follow one opinion, others another, though none of them impugn the historical truth of the accounts or deny that an opinion differing from their own may be the correct one. For Matthew and Mark relate the events in such an order as to allow the conjecture that they laid hands on Jesus immediately after Judas' kiss. And this is the opinion adopted not only by many celebrated doctors of the Church but also approved by that remarkable man John Gerson,
 20 who follows it in presenting the sequence of events in his work entitled Monotessaron (the work which I have generally followed in enumerating the events of the Passion in this discussion).

30 But in this one place I have departed from him and followed those interpreters (and they, too, are celebrated authorities) who are persuaded by very probable inferences from the accounts of Luke and John to adopt the opinion that only after Judas had given his kiss and returned to the cohort and the
 35 Jews, after Christ had thrown down the cohort merely by speaking to them, after the ear of the high priest's servant had been cut off and restored, after the other apostles had been forbidden to fight and Peter (who had already begun to fight) had been rebuked, after Christ had once more addressed the 40 Jewish magistrates who were present at that time and had announced that they now had permission to do what they had not been able to do before — to take him captive — after all the apostles had escaped by running away, after the young man who had been 45 seized but could not be held had saved himself by his active and eager acceptance of nakedness, only then, after all these events, did they lay hands on Jesus.

MORE'S CATENA<sup>346</sup> OF SCRIPTURAL QUOTES AND REFLECTIONS 50

If your enemy should fall, do not be glad; let not your heart rejoice in his downfall, lest perhaps God should see and be displeased [Prv 24:17–18].

Do not return a curse for a curse [1 Pt 3:9]. 55

Pray for those who persecute you [Mt 5:44].

Do not cool yourself in every breeze, and do not walk on every road. Be steadfast in the way of the Lord and in the truth of your judgment. Be meek in hearing the word of God that you may understand 60 it, and make your reply with wisdom. If you understand the matter, give your neighbor an answer; but if not, put your hand over your mouth, lest you be caught saying something silly and be confounded. Never in your life be called a tale-bearer, and do not
 65 be tripped up and confounded by your tongue. But the tale-bearer shall have hatred and enmity and reproach. [Ws 5:11–17]

All flesh is grass and all its glory is like the flower of the field. The grass has withered and its flower 70 has fallen. But the word of the Lord endures forever. [1 Pt 1:24–25, quoting Is 40:6–8]

Whatever light and momentary affliction we now bear prepares for us an immeasurable and eternal weight of glory on high, while we contemplate not 75 the things that are seen but the things that are not seen. For the things that are seen are temporal, but those that are not seen are eternal [2 Cor 4:17–18].

The sufferings of the present time are not worthy to be compared to the glory to come which will be revealed in us [Rm 8:18]. 80

Eye has not seen nor ear heard nor has it entered into the heart of man, what things God has prepared for those who love him [1 Cor 2:9].

344 Jn 18:12–14 345 Mt 26:57; Mk 14:53 346 Catena means “chain” or “connected series.” What follows is a translation of twenty-eight handwritten pages that accompanied the manuscript of De tristitia (CW 14: 626–81).

Cast your thoughts upon God and he will support you [Ps 54:23(55:22)].

Beloved, do not be startled at the trial by fire that is taking place among you to prove you, as if something strange were happening to you; but rejoice, insofar as you share in the sufferings of Christ, that you may also rejoice with exultation in the revelation of his glory [1 Pt 4:12–13].

Let those who suffer according to the will of God commend their souls to a faithful Creator [1 Pt 4:19].

Good men should be ashamed to be more timid in good deeds than wicked men are in wicked deeds: for one may hear thieves saying that a man is a coward to refuse seven years of pleasure to avoid a half hour of hanging, and should not a Christian man be ashamed to lose eternal life and happiness rather than be willing to suffer a quick death a little sooner, for he knows that he will have to suffer death a little later anyway and that unless he repents he will fall from a temporal death to an eternal death, one full of more grievous torments than any death whatever.

If you despair in the day of distress, your courage will be diminished [Prv 24:10].

Peter walked erect on the water with confidence, but when the wind rose and he began to lose his confidence and be afraid, he immediately began to sink. But when he called to Christ for help, Christ reached out his hand, saying, “O you of little faith, why did you doubt?” [See Mt 14:29–31.]

Christ was tempted not once but three times, and also afterwards. For as Luke testifies, the tempter left him “until the time” [Lk 4:13].

God is faithful and does not permit you to be tempted beyond what you can bear, but with the temptation also gives a way out [1 Cor 10:13].

Consider it nothing but joy, my brothers, when you fall into various trials, knowing that the trying of your faith produces patience. But let your patience have its perfect work, that you may be whole and perfect. [Js 1:2–4]

Whoever wishes to be my disciple, let him take up his cross and follow me [Mt 16:24; Mk 8:34; Lk 9:23; 14:27].

They have crucified their flesh with its vices and desires [Gal 5:24].

The world is crucified to me and I to the world [Gal 6:14].

Strong as death is love [Sg 8:6].

I long to be dissolved and to be with Christ [Phil 1:23].

For me to live is Christ and to die is gain [Phil 1:21].

As the hind longs for springs of water, so my soul longs for you, O God. My soul has thirsted for God, the living spring. When shall I come and appear before the face of God? [Ps 41:2–3(42:1–2)]

I say to you, my friends, do not be afraid of those who can kill the body and after that have nothing more that they can do. But I will show you whom you ought to be afraid of. Fear him who, when he has killed, has the power to cast into hell. Yes, I say to you, fear him. [Lk 12:4–5]

Your adversary the devil goes about like a roaring lion, seeking someone to devour [1 Pt 5:8]. Bernard:<sup>347</sup> I give thanks to that great Lion of the tribe of Judah [Rv 5:5]. He can roar but he cannot bite. However much he may threaten, let us not be beasts that an empty roar should lay us low. For that man is truly a beast, truly lacking reason, who is so faint-hearted that fear alone makes him yield, who even before the battle is conquered simply by an exaggerated notion of the effort to come and is laid low not by a weapon but by a war-trumpet. “For you have not yet resisted as far as blood,” says that vigorous leader who knew that the roar of this lion is futile [Heb 12:4] and another leader says, “Resist the devil and he will flee from you” [Js 4:7]. “Resist him, steadfast in the faith” [1 Pt 5:9].

<sup>347</sup> See St. Bernard of Clairvaux, Sermo 13 in psalmum “Qui habitat” [Ps 90].

He chose a glorious death over a hateful life [2 Mc 6:19]. If a man saves his life by offending God, he will find the life he has saved in this way to be hateful. For if you save your life in this way, on the very 5 next day you yourself will find your life hateful and you will be very sorry indeed that you did not suffer death the day before. For you will remember that death still awaits you, though you do not know what sort it will be nor how quickly it will come. And you
 10 have good reason to fear that this delayed death will be followed by the torments of hell, where men will long to die and death will flee from them [Rv 9:6], whereas the death you fled from would have been followed by the eternal glory of heaven.

15 Your adversary the devil goes about like a raging lion, seeking someone to devour [1 Pt 5:8]. This lion is the prince of this world, nor is there any power on earth like him. The strongest and most savage of men, compared with this lion, would be 20 like a Maltese lapdog. A roaring and rapacious lion [Ps 21:14(22:13)] is attacking me, seeking to devour me, and do I have time to give even a thought to the bite of a little dog? If a person could see even one of these demons who are waiting for us in great 25 numbers to torture us eternally, he would consider the combined threats of all mortals a mere trifle by comparison with the fear inspired by that one devil. And how much less would he think of these threats if he could see the heavens opened and Jesus stand-
 30 ing there as blessed Stephen saw him? [Acts 7:55–56]. How foolish is it to avoid a temporary death by incurring an eternal one! and not even to avoid the temporary one, but merely to put it off for a little while! For if you avoid death for the time be-35 ing, can you always be as successful? Will you die at another time without pain? Perhaps even you are threatened by the same danger that Christ declared to the rich man who promised himself a long life: “Fool, this night they will snatch from you your 40 soul” [Lk 12:20]. But this much you know for certain, that you must die some time and, considering the brevity of human life, you cannot live long. Finally, you are doubtless aware that when the fatal disease arrives and your anguish begins to grow 45 worse in the throes of death, you will wish you had died long before when you could have saved your soul, no matter how excruciating the death might have been. Therefore you should not be so desperately afraid of what might happen, since you know that a little later you will wish that that very 50 thing had happened.

Sadness

He is affected with sadness . . . bad health . . .

The sadness that is according to God produces repentance that surely tends toward salvation, but the 55 sadness of this world produces death [2 Cor 7:10; Jas 5:13].

My soul is sad even unto death [Mt 26:38; Mk 14:34].

For I would not have you ignorant, brothers, of 60 the tribulation which came upon us in Asia, for we were burdened beyond measure, so that we were weary even of life [2 Cor 1:8].

As the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so also through Christ does our comfort abound [2 Cor
 65 1:5]. Part of the sufferings of Christ was fear and sadness. Then, because of his weariness and fear, in the anguish of his agony, drops of his blood dripped on the ground. [See Lk 22:44.]

Isaiah predicts that [those who] abandon [hope in] 70 God [and take refuge in] human assistance [will perish] together with their assistance [Is 31:3]. Thus perished King Saul, who, murmuring impatiently and despairing of God's help because he had not been heard immediately, went over to consult a 75 witch, although formerly he had commanded by a public edict that all witches should be punished [1 Sm 28:5–25; 1 Chr 10:13–14].

Naked you came into the world [and you will take] 80 nothing away with you [1 Tm 6:7; Eccl 5:14].

The Lord gave, the Lord has taken away. As it pleased the Lord, so has it been done. [Jb 1:21]

. . . of Christ . . . this man [was led] who in all things . . . nor once opened his mouth [Acts 8:32; Is 53:7] . . . [not] a word of complaint or excuse or 85 threat or curse [1 Pt 2:23] would he speak against those cursed dogs [Ps 21:17(22:16)], but his very last act was to pour forth a word of blessing on his enemies, such as was never heard from the beginning of the world [Jn 9:32]: Father, forgive them
 90 for they know not what they do [Lk 23:34].

Blessed be God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to his mercy has begotten us again, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, unto a living hope, unto an incorruptible inheritance, undefiled and unfading, reserved in heaven for you, who are guarded by the power of God through faith unto salvation, the salvation made ready to be revealed in the last days. In this you will rejoice, though you must now be saddened for a little while by various temptations, that the trial of your faith may be far more precious than gold which is tried by fire, that it may be discovered unto praise and glory and honor at the revelation of Jesus Christ. Him, though you have not seen, you love. In him, though you do not see him now, you believe, and believing, you will rejoice with a joy inexpressible and triumphant, receiving as the final issue of your faith the salvation of your souls. [1 Pt 1:3-9]

Fear God. Honor the king. Servants, be subject to your masters in all fear, not only to the good and moderate, but also to the bad-tempered. For this is indeed a grace, if for consciousness of God anyone endures sorrows, suffering unjustly. For how is it a grace if when you sin and are buffeted you endure it? But if, when you do right, you suffer patiently, this is indeed a grace in the eyes of God. For to this you have been called, because Christ too suffered for us, leaving us an example that we might follow in his footsteps. "He committed no sin, nor was deceit found in his mouth" [Is 53:9]. When he was cursed, he did not curse. When he suffered, he did not threaten but handed himself over to him who judged him unjustly. He himself bore our sins in his body on the cross that we, having died to sin, might live to justice. By his bruises we were healed. [1 Pt 2:17-24]

Be all of one mind in the faith, compassionate, loving your brothers, merciful, modest, humble, not returning evil for evil or curse for curse, but contrariwise, blessing. For to this you were called that you might inherit a blessing. [1 Pt 3:8-9]

Who is there to harm you if you are zealous for what is good? But even if you suffer anything for the sake of justice, blessed are you. But have no fear of their fear that you may not be troubled, but in your hearts declare the holiness of the Lord, always ready to satisfy anyone who asks you the reason for the hope that is in you. But do so with modesty and fear, having a good conscience, so that those who unjustly blame your good behavior in Christ may be put to shame for the detractions they have brought against you. For it is better, if such is the will of God, that we should suffer for doing good than for doing evil. For Christ, too, once died for our sins, the just for the unjust, that he might offer us to God as men dead indeed in the flesh, but brought to life in the spirit. [1 Pt 3:13-18]

But the end of all things will draw near. Therefore, be prudent and watchful in prayers. But above all, have a constant mutual charity among yourselves, for charity covers a multitude of sins. [1 Pt 4:7-8]

Beloved, do not be startled at the trial by fire that is taking place among you to prove you, as if something strange were happening to you; but rejoice, insofar as you share in the sufferings of Christ, that you may also rejoice with exultation in the revelation of his glory. If you are reproached in the name of Christ, blessed shall you be because the honor, glory, and power of God and his Spirit rest upon you. But let none of you suffer as a murderer or thief or a slanderer or as one who covets what belongs to others. But if he suffers as a Christian, let him not be ashamed, but let him glorify God under that name. For the time is at hand for the judgment to begin with the household of God. But if it begins first with us, what will be the end of those who do not believe the Gospel? For if the just man will barely be saved, what will happen to the wicked man and the sinner? Therefore let those who suffer according to the will of God commend their souls to a faithful Creator by doing good deeds. [1 Pt 4:12-19]

And you became imitators of us and of the Lord, receiving the Word in great tribulation, with joy of the Holy Spirit [1 Thes 1:6].

As a helper, then, we exhort you not to receive the grace of God in vain. For he says, "In an acceptable time I have heard you and in the day of salvation I have helped you" [Is 49:8]. Behold, now is the acceptable time. Behold, now is the day of salvation. Giving offense to no one, so that our ministry may not be blamed, let us rather show ourselves in all things to be the ministers of God, in much patience in tribulations, in hardships, in distress, in blows, in prisons, in tumults, in labors, in sleepless nights, in fasting, in innocence, in knowledge, in long-suffering, in kindness, in the Holy Spirit, in unfeigned charity, in the Word of truth, in the power of God, with the armor of justice on the right hand and on the left, in honor and dishonor, in evil report and good report, as deceivers and yet truthful, as unknown and yet well known, as dying and behold we live, as chastised but not killed, as sorrowful yet always rejoicing, as poor yet enriching many, as having nothing yet possessing all things. [2 Cor 6:1–10]

God, who commanded light to shine out of darkness, has himself shone in our hearts to give enlightenment concerning the knowledge of the glory of God, shining in the face of Jesus Christ. But we carry this treasure in vessels of clay, to show that the abundance of power is God's and not ours. In all things we suffer tribulation but we are not distressed; we are shaken but we are not destitute; we suffer persecution but we are not forsaken; we are humiliated but not put to shame; we are cast down but we do not perish; always bearing about in our body the dying of Jesus so that the life also of Jesus may be made manifest in our bodies. For we the living are always being handed over to death for the sake of Jesus, so that the life also of Jesus may be made manifest in our mortal flesh. [2 Cor 4:6–11]

For we know that if the earthly house in which we dwell be destroyed, we have a building from God, a house not made by human hands but eternal in the heavens. For even in this present state we groan, longing to be clothed over with that habitation of ours which is from heaven, if indeed we shall be found clothed and not naked. For even we who are in this tent groan and are burdened, because we do not wish to be unclothed but rather clothed over, that what is mortal might be swallowed up by life. Now he who made us for this very thing is God, who gave us the Spirit as its pledge. Always full of courage, then, and knowing that while we are in the body we are exiled from the Lord—for we walk by faith and not by sight—we have the courage and the greatest willingness to be even more exiled from the body and to be in the presence of God. And therefore we strive, whether in the body or out of it, to please him. For all of us must be made manifest before the tribunal of Christ, so that each one may receive what he has won through the body, according to his works, whether good or evil. [2 Cor 5:1–10] 50

For you know the graciousness of our Lord Jesus Christ—how being rich, he became poor for your sakes, that by his poverty you might become rich [2 Cor 8:9]. He does not say “having been rich” he became poor, but “being rich” he took on poverty without losing his riches—inwardly rich, outwardly poor, having the hidden riches of divinity but appearing in the poverty of humanity. All of us, then, become rich by believing in the poor Christ. Therefore, let no poor man in his hut look down on himself. Rich in his conscience, he sleeps more securely on the ground than the man rich in gold does on his regal coverlet. And so do not be afraid to come like a poor beggar before him who, clothing himself in our poverty, enriched us by impoverishing himself. 60

If anyone does not obey our word by this letter, note that man and do not associate with him, that he may be put to shame. And do not regard him as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother. But may the God of peace himself give you everlasting peace in every place. [2 Thes 3:14–16] 70

How good is the God of Israel to those who are upright of heart. But my feet almost wavered, my steps almost slipped. [Ps 72(73):1–2] 75

Direct my steps according to your word, and do not let any injustice rule over me [Ps 118(119):133].

O God, you know my folly, and my offenses are not hidden from you. Let not those who are waiting for you be put to shame because of me, O Lord, Lord of hosts. Let those who seek you not be confounded because of me, O God of Israel. [Ps 68:6–7(69):5–6] 80

Blessed be the Lord, the God of Israel, who alone does wondrous things. And blessed be the name of his majesty forever, and the whole earth shall be filled with his majesty. So be it! So be it! [Ps 71(72):18–19] 85

Tribulation and distress have found me out; your commandments are my meditation [Ps 118(119):143]. 90

habenas <sup>ac sicut ignavis</sup> ~~et veluti~~ <sup>66</sup>
 namis <sup>ad fragore teptatis</sup> ~~gubernator~~ <sup>ammo concidens</sup> ~~abrupto temone relicto nardem~~ ~~relinquat fluctibus temone~~ deserit atq; in angulu quæpiã <sup>semet</sup> tristis abiectus sese <sup>puppin</sup> ~~namem~~ permittit fluctibus / sic eps meticie sue sompno
<sup>ea relinquat</sup> ~~superatus~~ <sup>infanta</sup> ~~officij sui~~ <sup>abuteni</sup> que in sua
~~officio~~ <sup>officij sui</sup> ~~locus~~ <sup>efflagrat</sup> ~~oregis~~ <sup>commodi</sup> ~~factorem~~ <sup>sui</sup> hanc ego certe tristitia / conferre et comparare no dubite ~~et~~ <sup>ad inferni</sup> <sup>que ducte ut aut</sup> immo adeo longe postposuerim
<sup>que in re divina specie quanta habet</sup> animi desperantis de deo. ~~et~~ <sup>proximi</sup>
 hinc generi locu tenet ~~et~~ sed multo

This facsimile, actual size, shows the careful revisions that More made to his manuscript penned in prison. He alludes to Plato's figure of the unruly horses with infrenet and habenae, and then to the figure of the cowardly helmsman with gubernet. See Clarence Miller's commentary on such revisions in CW 14: 789-999.

Letters: Prison Years, 1534–35

CONTENTS

The prefatory number of each letter corresponds to The Correspondence of Sir Thomas More [Corr], ed. Elizabeth F. Rogers (Princeton, NJ: Princeton UP, 1947). The symbols < > indicate uncertainty about the date or place.

LETTER NUMBER	SOURCE TEXT
200. To Margaret Roper. <ca. 17 April 1534, Tower of London>	Corr 501–7
201. To Margaret Roper. <April–May? 1534>, Tower of London	Corr 507–8
202. To Margaret Roper. <May? 1534>, Tower of London	Corr 508–9
203. From Margaret Roper. <May? 1534>	Corr 510–11
204. To All His Friends. <1534>, Tower of London	Corr 511
205. Alice Alington to Margaret Roper. 17 August <1534>	Corr 511–13
206. Margaret Roper to Alice Alington. <August 1534>	Corr 514–32
207. To Dr. Nicholas Wilson. 1534, Tower of London	Corr 532–33
208. To Dr. Nicholas Wilson. 1534, Tower of London	Corr 533–38
209. From Margaret Roper. 1534	Corr 538–39
210. To Margaret Roper. 1534, Tower of London	Corr 540–44
211. To Margaret Roper. 1534, Tower of London	Corr 544–47
212. Lady More to Henry VIII. <ca. Christmas 1534>	Corr 547–49
213. To Master Leder. Saturday, 16 January 1534/5, Tower of London	Corr 549–50
214. To Margaret Roper. 2 or 3 May 1535, Tower of London	Corr 550–54
215. Lady More to Thomas Cromwell. May 1535	Corr 554–55
216. To Margaret Roper. <3 June 1535, Tower of London>	Corr 555–59
217. To Antonio Bonvisi. 1535, Tower of London	Corr 559–61
218. To Margaret Roper. 5 July 1535, Tower of London	Corr 563–65

neither, after so many wyse me whō ye take for no saumple, but if I should say like M. Harry: why hold you refuse to swere father, for I haue sworn my self.
 At this he laughed & sayde. That word was like Cue too, for she offered Adā no woꝛse fruit than she had eaten her self.
 But yet father & I by my trowth, I fere me very soze, & this matter will byynge you in merueilous heauy truoble. You know wel & as I shewed you, M. Secretary sent you word as your very friend, to remēber, & the parlement lasteth yet.
 Margaret & my father, I thanke hym right hertely. But as I shewed you thā agayn, I left not this geare bntought on. And albert I knowe well that if they would make a lawg to doo me any harne, that lawe coulde neuer be law-full

She tok ethe othe with this exceptio as farre as would stande with the law
 of god,

This side note (given in standardized English, and correcting the typesetter's error) comments about Margaret Roper: "She took the oath with this excepted: as far as would stand with the law of God." The bishops took the same "exception" in January 1531 when they were asked to acknowledge Henry VIII as head of the Church in England. The text above is from the 1557 Workes, p. 1441 (but here, enlarged). In this Essential Works edition, it would appear next to lines 8–14 of Letter 206 on p. 1319.

Letters: Prison Years, 1534–35

200. To Margaret Roper

<Tower of London, ca. 17 April 1534>

Sir Thomas More, upon warning<sup>1</sup> given him, came before the King's Commissioners<sup>2</sup> at the Archbishop of Canterbury's place at Lambeth (the Monday the thirteenth day of April in the year of our Lord 1534, and in the latter end of the twenty-fifth year of the reign of King Henry the Eighth), where he refused the oath<sup>3</sup> then offered unto him. And thereupon was he delivered to the Abbot of Westminster<sup>4</sup> to be kept as a prisoner, with whom he remained till Friday following, and then was sent prisoner to the Tower of London. And shortly after his coming thither, he wrote a letter and sent unto his eldest daughter Mistress Margaret Roper, the copy whereof here followeth. [Workes 1428]<sup>5</sup>

When I was before the Lords at Lambeth, I was the first that was called in, albeit<sup>6</sup> Master Doctor the Vicar of Croydon<sup>7</sup> was come before me, and diverse others. After the cause of my sending-for declared<sup>8</sup> unto me (whereof I somewhat marveled in my mind, considering that they sent for no more temporal men<sup>9</sup> but me), I desired the sight of the oath, which they showed me under the Great Seal. Then desired I the sight of the Act of the Succession, which was delivered me in a printed roll. After which read secretly<sup>10</sup> by myself, and the oath considered with the act, I showed unto them that my purpose was not to put any fault either in the act or any man that made it, or in the oath or any man that swore it, nor to condemn the conscience of any other man. But as for myself, in good faith my conscience so moved me in the matter that though I would not deny to swear to the succession, yet unto the oath that there was offered me, I could not swear without the jeoparding<sup>11</sup> of my soul to perpetual damnation. And that if they doubted whether I did refuse the oath only for the grudge<sup>12</sup> of my conscience, or for any other fantasy,<sup>13</sup> I was ready therein to satisfy them by mine oath. Which if they trusted not, what should they be the better to give me any oath? And if they trusted that I would therein swear true, then trusted I that of their goodness they would not move<sup>14</sup> me to swear the oath that they offered me, perceiving that for to swear it was against my conscience.

Unto this my Lord Chancellor<sup>15</sup> said, that they all were sorry to hear me say thus, and see me thus refuse the oath. And they said all that on their faith I was the very first that ever refused it, which would cause the King's Highness to conceive great suspicion of me and great indignation toward me. And therewith they showed me the roll, and let me see the names of the lords and the commons which had sworn and subscribed their names already. Which notwithstanding when they saw that I refused to swear the same myself, not blaming any other man that had sworn, I was in conclusion commanded to go down into the garden, and thereupon I tarried in the old burned chamber that looketh into the garden, and would not go down because of the heat. In that time saw I Master Doctor Latimer<sup>16</sup> come into the garden, and there walked he with diverse other doctors and chaplains of my Lord of Canterbury,<sup>17</sup> and very merry I saw him, for he laughed, and took one or twain<sup>18</sup> about the neck so handsomely that, if they had been women, I would have weened<sup>19</sup> he had been waxen wanton.<sup>20</sup> After that came Master Doctor Wilson<sup>21</sup> forth from the lords and was with two gentlemen brought by me, and gentlemanly sent straight unto the Tower. What time my Lord of Rochester<sup>22</sup> was called in before them, that cannot I tell. But at night I heard that he had been before them, but where he remained that night, and so forth till he was sent hither, I never heard. I heard also that Master Vicar of Croydon, and all

1 summons 2 Archbishop Cranmer, Lord Chancellor Audley, and the Dukes of Norfolk and of Suffolk 3 the Oath of Succession required by the Act of Succession 4 Abbot of Westminster: William Benson 5 These introductory notes appeared in the 1557 Workes of Sir Thomas

More Knight. 6 although 7 Vicar of Croydon: Rowland Phillips, who agreed to swear the oath 8 was declared 9 temporal men: laymen 10 privately 11 endangering, jeopardizing 12 uneasiness, misgiving; scruple 13 whim; imagining 14 urge 15 Sir Thomas Audley 16 Hugh Latimer (1492?–1555) 17 Archbishop Thomas Cranmer 18 two 19 supposed, thought 20 waxen wanton: grown lustful 21 Fr. Nicholas Wilson was imprisoned a week before More for refusing the same oath. 22 Lord of Rochester: John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester

the remnant of the priests of London that were sent for, were sworn, and that they had such favor at the Council's hand that they were not lingered<sup>23</sup> nor made to dance any long attendance<sup>24</sup> to their travail and cost (as suitors were sometime wont to be), but were sped apace<sup>25</sup> to their great comfort so far-forth<sup>26</sup> that Master Vicar of Croydon, either for gladness or for dryness, or else that it might be seen (quod ille notus erat pontifici),<sup>27</sup> went to my Lord's<sup>28</sup> buttery-bar,<sup>29</sup> and called for drink, and drank (valde familiariter).<sup>30</sup>

When they had played their pageant<sup>31</sup> and were gone out of the place, then was I called in again. And then was it declared unto me, what a number had sworn, even since I went aside, gladly, without any sticking.<sup>32</sup> Wherein I laid no blame in no man, but for mine own self answered as before. Now as well before as then, they somewhat laid unto me for obstinacy, that whereas before, since I refused to swear, I would not declare any special part of that oath that grudged<sup>33</sup> my conscience, and open the cause wherefore. For thereunto I had said to them, that I feared lest the King's Highness would, as they said, take displeasure enough toward me for the only<sup>34</sup> refusal of the oath. And that if I should open and disclose the causes why, I should therewith but further exasperate his Highness, which I would in no wise<sup>35</sup> do, but rather would I abide all the danger and harm that might come toward me than give his Highness any occasion of further displeasure than the offering of the oath unto me of pure necessity constrained me. Howbeit,<sup>36</sup> when they diverse times imputed this to me for stubbornness and obstinacy—that I would neither swear the oath nor yet declare the causes why—I declined<sup>37</sup> thus far toward them: that rather than I would be accounted for obstinate, I would, upon<sup>38</sup> the King's gracious license<sup>39</sup> or rather his such commandment had,<sup>40</sup> as might be my sufficient warrant,<sup>41</sup> that my declaration should not offend his Highness, nor put me in the danger of any of his statutes, I would be content to declare the causes in writing and, over<sup>42</sup> that, to give an oath in the beginning that if I might find those causes by any man in such wise answered as I might think mine own conscience satisfied, I would after that with all mine heart swear the principal oath too.

To this I was answered that though the King would give me license under his letters patent,<sup>43</sup> yet would it not serve against the statute. Whereto I said that yet, if I had them, I would stand unto the trust of his honor at my peril for the remnant. But yet it thinketh me,<sup>44</sup> lo, that if I may not declare the causes without peril, then to leave them undeclared is no obstinacy.

My Lord of Canterbury, taking hold upon that that<sup>45</sup> I said, that I condemned not the conscience of them that swore, said unto me that it appeared well that I did not take it for a very sure thing and a certain that I might not lawfully swear it, but rather as a thing uncertain and doubtful. "But then," said my Lord, "you know for a certainty, and a thing without doubt, that you be bounden to obey your sovereign lord your King. And therefore are ye bounden to leave off the doubt of your unsure conscience in refusing the oath, and take the sure way in obeying of your Prince,<sup>46</sup> and swear it." Now all was it<sup>47</sup> so that in mine own mind methought myself not concluded,<sup>48</sup> yet this argument seemed me<sup>49</sup> suddenly so subtle—and namely<sup>50</sup> with such authority, coming out of so noble a prelate's mouth—that I could again answer nothing thereto but only that I thought myself I might not well do so, because that<sup>51</sup> in my conscience this was one of the cases in which I was bounden that I should not obey my Prince, since that whatsoever other folk thought in the matter (whose conscience and learning I would not condemn nor take upon me to judge), yet in my conscience the truth seemed on the other side. Wherein I had not informed my conscience neither suddenly nor<sup>52</sup> slightly, but by long leisure and diligent search for the matter. And of truth if that reason may conclude, then have we a ready way to avoid all perplexities. For in whatsoever matters the doctors<sup>53</sup> stand in great doubt, the King's

23 made to wait 24 dance... attendance: ready attendance; stand waiting in an antechamber 25 sped apace: expedited 26 so far-forth: to such an extent 27 quod... pontifici: "because he was known to the high priest." See Peter's denial of Christ, Jn 18:15–16. 28 Archbishop Cranmer's 29 a sideboard for serving liquor 30 valde familiariter: "very familiarly" 31 stage-play, show 32 hesitation; scruple 33 troubled 34 only for the refusal 35 way 36 however 37 acceded, gave in 38 as soon as 39 permission 40 his... bad: having such commandment 41 safeguard 42 in addition to 43 letters patent: open letters to put an agreement on record 44 it thinketh me: I think 45 that that: that which 46 King 47 all was it: even if it were 48 convinced 49 to me 50 especially 51 because that: because 52 not... nor: More commonly uses a double negative where modern English would use "not... either... or" 53 i.e., of the Church commandment, given upon whither<sup>54</sup> side he list,<sup>55</sup> soileth<sup>56</sup> all the doubts.

Then said my Lord of Westminster<sup>57</sup> to me that howsoever the matter seemed unto mine own mind, I had cause to fear that mine own mind was erroneous when I see the great Council of the realm determine of my mind the contrary, and that therefore I ought to change my conscience. To that I answered that if there were no more but myself upon my side, and the whole Parliament upon the other, I would be sore<sup>58</sup> afraid to lean to mine own mind only against so many. But on the other side,<sup>59</sup> if it so be that, in some things for which I refuse the oath, I have (as I think I have) upon my part<sup>60</sup> as great a council and a greater too, I am not then bounden to change my conscience and conform it to the council of one realm against the General Council<sup>61</sup> of Christendom. Upon this, Master Secretary<sup>62</sup> (as he that tenderly favoereth me)<sup>63</sup> said and swore a great oath that he had liefer<sup>64</sup> that his own only son (which is of truth a goodly<sup>65</sup> young gentleman, and shall, I trust, come to much worship<sup>66</sup>) had lost his head than that I should thus have refused the oath. For surely the King's Highness would now conceive a great suspicion against me, and think that the matter of the nun of Canterbury<sup>67</sup> was all contrived by my drift.<sup>68</sup> To which I said that the contrary was true and well known, and whatsoever should mishap<sup>69</sup> me, it lay not in my power to help it without peril of my soul. Then did my Lord Chancellor repeat before me my refusal unto Master Secretary, as to him that was going unto the King's Grace. And in the rehearsing,<sup>70</sup> his Lordship repeated again that I denied not but was content to swear to the succession. Whereunto I said that as for that point, I would be content so that I might see my oath in that point so framed in such a manner as might stand with my conscience.

Then said my Lord, "Marry,<sup>71</sup> Master Secretary, mark that too, that he will not swear that neither,<sup>72</sup> but under some certain manner." "Verily<sup>73</sup> no, my Lord," quoth I, "but that I will see it made in such wise first, as I shall myself see, that<sup>74</sup> I shall neither be forsworn<sup>75</sup> nor swear against my conscience.

Surely as to swear to the succession I see no peril, but I thought and think it reason that to mine own oath I look well myself, and be of counsel also in the fashion, and never intended to swear for a piece<sup>76</sup> and set my hand to the whole oath. Howbeit (as help me God), as touching the whole oath, I never withdrew any man from it, nor never advised any to refuse it, nor never put, nor will, any scruple in any man's head, but leave every man to his own conscience. And methinketh in good faith that so were it good reason that every man should leave me to mine."

201. To Margaret Roper

Tower of London, <April-May? 1534>

A letter written with a coal by Sir Thomas More to his daughter Mistress Margaret Roper, within a while after he was prisoner in the Tower. [Workes 1430]

Mine own good daughter.

Our Lord be thanked, I am in good health of body, and in good quiet of mind; and of worldly things I no more desire than I have. I beseech him make you all merry in the hope of heaven. And such things as I somewhat longed to talk with you all, concerning the world to come, our Lord put them into your minds, as I trust he doth, and better too, by his Holy Spirit, who bless you and preserve you all. Written with a coal by your tender loving father, who in his poor prayers forgetteth none of you all, nor your babes, nor your nurses, nor your good husbands, nor your good husbands' shrewd<sup>77</sup> wives, nor your father's shrewd wife neither, nor our other friends. And thus fare you heartily well for lack of paper.

Thomas More, Knight

Our Lord keep me continually true, faithful, and plain; to the contrary whereof I beseech him heartily never to suffer me live. For as for long life (as I have often told thee, Meg), I neither look for, nor long for, but am well content to go if God call me

54 whichever 55 pleases, chooses 56 resolves 57 Lord of Westminster:
the Abbot 58 greatly 59 hand 60 side 61 General Council: a meeting of all the world's bishops approved by the Pope 62 Master Secretary: Thomas

Cromwell 63 as... me: like someone kindly indulging me 64 had liefer:
would rather 65 virtuous; distinguished;
comely 66 honor, renown, distinction
67 nun of Canterbury: Elizabeth Barton 68 plotting 69 happen unfortunately to 70 telling, relating 71 Indeed (an expression of surprise, from "By Mary!") 72 not... neither: not either 73 Truly

74 so that 75 sworn to something untrue
76 for a piece: to a part 77 cunning

hence tomorrow. And I thank our Lord I know no person living that I would had one fillip<sup>78</sup> for my sake; of which mind I am more glad than of all the world beside.

5 Recommend me to your shrewd Will and mine other sons, and to John Harris my friend, and yourself knoweth to whom else, and to my shrewd wife above all; and God preserve you all, and make and keep you his servants all.

10 202. To Margaret Roper
Tower of London, <May? 1534>

Within a while after Sir Thomas More was in prison in the Tower, his daughter Mistress Margaret Roper wrote and sent unto him a letter,<sup>79</sup> wherein she seemed somewhat to labor to persuade him to take the oath (though she nothing so thought) to win thereby credence<sup>80</sup> with Master Thomas Cromwell, that she might the rather get liberty to have free resort<sup>81</sup> unto her father (which she only<sup>82</sup> had for the most time of his imprisonment) unto which letter her father wrote an answer, the copy whereof here followeth. [Workes 1431]

Our Lord bless you all.

15 If I had not been, my dearly beloved daughter, at a firm and fast<sup>83</sup> point (I trust in God's great mercy), this good great while before, your lamentable<sup>84</sup> letter had not a little abashed<sup>85</sup> me, surely far above all other things, of which I hear diverse times not a few terrible toward me. But surely they 30 all touched me never so near, nor were so grievous unto me, as to see you, my well-beloved child, in such vehement piteous manner labor to persuade unto me that thing wherein I have of pure necessity for respect unto mine own soul so often given you 35 so precise answer before. Wherein as touching the points of your letter, I can make none answer, for I doubt not but you well remember that the matters which move my conscience (without declaration whereof I can nothing touch the points) I have 40 sundry times showed you that I will disclose them to no man. And therefore, daughter Margaret, I can

in this thing no further but, like as you labor<sup>86</sup> me again to follow your mind, to desire and pray you both again to leave off such labor and with my former answers to hold yourself content. 45

A deadly grief unto me, and much more deadly than to hear of mine own death (for the fear thereof, I thank our Lord, the fear of hell, the hope of heaven and the Passion of Christ daily more and more assuage), is that I perceive my good son your husband, and you my good daughter, and my good wife, and mine other good children and innocent friends, in great displeasure and danger of great harm thereby. The let<sup>87</sup> whereof, while it lieth not in my hand, I can no further but commit all unto 50 God. Nam in manu Dei, saith the Scripture, cor regis est, et sicut divisiones aquarum quocumque voluerit, impellit illud.<sup>88</sup> Whose high goodness I most humbly beseech to incline the noble heart of the King's Highness to the tender favor of you all, and to favor
60 me no better than God and myself know that my faithful heart toward him and my daily prayer for him do deserve. For surely if his Highness might inwardly see my true mind such as God knoweth it is, it would (I trust) soon assuage his high displeasure.
65 Which while I can in this world never in such wise show but that his Grace may be persuaded to believe the contrary of me, I can no further go but put all in the hands of him for fear of whose displeasure for the safeguard of my soul stirred by mine
70 own conscience (without insectation<sup>89</sup> or reproach laying to any other man's) I suffer and endure this trouble. Out of which I beseech him to bring me, when his will shall be, into his endless bliss of heaven, and in the meanwhile, give me grace and 75 you both, in all our agonies and troubles, devoutly to resort prostrate unto the remembrance of that bitter agony, which our Savior suffered before his Passion at the Mount.<sup>90</sup> And if we diligently so do, I verily<sup>91</sup> trust we shall find therein great comfort
80 and consolation. And thus, my dear daughter, the blessed spirit of Christ for his tender mercy govern and guide you all, to his pleasure and your weal<sup>92</sup> and comforts both body and soul.

Your tender loving father, 85
Thomas More, Knight

78 a small tap with the finger
79 Margaret Roper's letter is not extant 80 confidence, trust 81 access 82 alone 83 steadfast 84 distressing

85 disconcerted 86 urge 87 hindrance, stoppage 88 "For in the hand of God is the heart of the king, and as the divisions of waters, he moves it wherever he wills"—similar to Prv 21:1; also quoted in Letters 208, 210, 213. 89 pursuing with words, railing 90 Mt 26:36–46 91 truly 92 well-being

203. From Margaret Roper

&lt;May? 1534&gt;

To this last letter, Mistress Margaret Roper wrote an answer and sent it to Sir Thomas More her father; the copy whereof here followeth. [Workes 1432]

Mine own good father.

It is to me no little comfort, since I cannot talk with you by such means as I would, at the least way to delight myself among<sup>93</sup> in this bitter time of your absence by such means as I may, by as often writing to you as shall be expedient<sup>94</sup> and by reading again and again your most fruitful and delectable letter, the faithful messenger of your very virtuous and ghostly<sup>95</sup> mind, rid from all corrupt love of worldly things, and fast knit only in the love of God, and desire of heaven, as becometh a very true worshiper and a faithful servant of God, which,<sup>96</sup> I doubt not, good Father, holdeth his holy hand over you and shall (as he hath) preserve you both body and soul (ut sit mens sana in corpore sano)<sup>97</sup> and namely<sup>98</sup> now, when you have abjected<sup>99</sup> all earthly consolations and resigned yourself willingly, gladly and fully for his love, to his holy protection.

Father, what think you hath been our comfort since your departing from us? Surely the experience we have had of your life past and godly conversation, and wholesome counsel, and virtuous example, and a surety<sup>100</sup> not only of the continuance of the same, but also a great increase by the goodness of our Lord to the great rest and gladness of your heart devoid of all earthly dregs and garnished with the noble vesture of heavenly virtues, a pleasant palace for the Holy Spirit of God to rest in, who defend you (as I doubt not, good father, but of his goodness he will) from all trouble of mind and of body, and give me your most loving obedient daughter and handmaid, and all us your children and friends, to follow that that<sup>101</sup> we praise in you, and, to<sup>102</sup> our only comfort, remember and commune<sup>103</sup> together of you, that we may in conclusion<sup>104</sup> meet with you, mine own dear father, in the bliss of heaven, to which our most merciful Lord hath bought us with his precious blood.

93 from time to time 94 appropriate
95 spiritual 96 who (God) 97 ut sit... sano: "that the mind may be sound in a sound body," Juvenal's Satire 10.356. See Letter 106, where More quoted the same passage. 98 especially 99 renounced, rejected 100 pledge, guarantee 101 that that: that which 102 as 103 talk, confer 104 in conclusion: finally, eventually 105 a woman who prays for another; named from the beads of a rosary 106 John Wood: More's personal servant, who

Your own most loving obedient daughter and beadswoman,<sup>105</sup> Margaret Roper, which desireth above all worldly things to be in John Wood's<sup>106</sup> stead to do you some service. But we live in hope that we shall shortly receive you again; I pray God heartily we may, if it be his holy will.

204. To All His Friends

Tower of London, &lt;1534&gt;

Within a while after Sir Thomas More had been in prison in the Tower, his daughter Mistress Margaret Roper obtained license of the King that she might resort unto her father in the Tower, which she did. And thereupon he wrote with a coal<sup>107</sup> a letter to all his friends, whereof the copy followeth. [Workes 1432]

To all my loving friends.

For as much as being in prison I cannot tell what need I may have, or what necessity I may hap<sup>108</sup> to stand in, I heartily beseech you all that, if my well-beloved daughter Margaret Roper (which only of all my friends hath by the King's gracious favor license to resort to me) do anything desire of any of you, of such things as I shall hap to need, that it may like you no less to regard and tender<sup>109</sup> it than if I moved it unto you and required<sup>110</sup> it of you personally present myself. And I beseech you all to pray for me, and I shall pray for you.

Your faithful lover and poor beadsman,<sup>111</sup>

Thomas More, Knight, prisoner

205. Alice Alington to Margaret Roper

17 August &lt;1534&gt;

In August in the year of our Lord 1534, and in the twenty-sixth year of the reign of King Henry the Eighth, the Lady Alice Alington (wife to Sir Giles Alington, Knight, and daughter to Sir Thomas More's second and last wife) wrote a letter to Mistress Margaret Roper, the copy whereof here followeth. [Workes 1433]

continued to serve More in the Tower 107 charcoal used for writing 108 happen 109 attend to 110 asked 111 one who prays for another

Sister Roper, with all my heart I recommend me unto you, thanking you for all kindness.

The cause of my writing at this time is to show<sup>112</sup> you that at my coming home, within two hours after, my Lord Chancellor did come to take a course at<sup>113</sup> a buck in our park, the which was to my husband a great comfort that it would please him so to do. Then when he had taken his pleasure and killed his deer, he went unto Sir Thomas Barmeston to bed, where I was the next day with him at his desire, the which I could not say nay to, for methought he did bid me heartily, and most specially because I would speak to him for my father.

And when I saw my time, I did desire<sup>114</sup> him as humbly as I could that he would, as I have heard say that he hath been, be still good lord unto my father. And he said it did appear very well when the matter of the nun<sup>115</sup> was laid to his charge. And as for this other matter,<sup>116</sup> he marveled that my father is so obstinate in his own conceit,<sup>117</sup> as that<sup>118</sup> everybody went forthwithal<sup>119</sup> save only the blind bishop<sup>120</sup> and he. “And in good faith,” said my Lord, “I am very glad that I have no learning but in a few of Aesop’s fables, of the which I shall tell you one. There was a country in the which there were almost none but fools, saving a few which were wise. And they by their wisdom knew that there should fall a great rain, the which should make them all fools that<sup>121</sup> should so be fouled or wet therewith. They, seeing that, made them<sup>122</sup> caves under the ground till all the rain was past. Then they came forth, thinking to make the fools to do what they list,<sup>123</sup> and to rule them as they would. But the fools would none of that, but would have the rule themselves, for all<sup>124</sup> their craft. And when the wise men saw they could not obtain their purpose, they wished that they had been in the rain, and had defouled<sup>125</sup> their clothes with them.”

When this tale was told, my Lord did laugh very merrily. Then I said to him that for all his merry fable I did put no doubts but that he would be good lord unto my father when he saw his time. He said, “I would not have your father so scrupulous of his conscience.” And then he told me another fable of a lion, an ass, and a wolf, and of their confession. First the lion confessed him that he had devoured all the beasts that he could come by. His confessor assoiled<sup>126</sup> him because he was a king and also it was his nature so to do. Then came the poor ass and said that he took but one straw out of his master’s shoe for hunger, by the means whereof he thought that his master did take cold. His confessor could not assoil this great trespass, but by and by<sup>127</sup> sent him to the bishop. Then came the wolf and made his confession, and he was straitly<sup>128</sup> commanded that he should not pass six pence at a meal. But when this said wolf had used this diet a little while, he waxed<sup>129</sup> very hungry, insomuch that on a day when he saw a cow with her calf come by him he said to himself, “I am very hungry and fain<sup>130</sup> would I eat, but<sup>131</sup> that I am bounden by my ghostly<sup>132</sup> father. Notwithstanding that, my conscience shall judge me. And then if it be so, then shall my conscience be thus: that the cow doth seem to me now but worth a groat,<sup>133</sup> and then if the cow be but worth a groat, then is the calf but worth two pence.” So did the wolf eat both the cow and the calf. Now good sister, hath not my lord told me two pretty fables? In good faith, they pleased me nothing, nor I wist<sup>134</sup> not what to say for I was abashed of<sup>135</sup> this answer. And I see no better suit than to almighty God, for he is the comforter of all sorrows, and will not fail to send his comfort to his servants when they have most need. Thus fare ye well, mine own good sister.

Written the Monday after Saint Lawrence in haste by

Your sister Dame,
Alice Alington

206. Margaret Roper to Alice Alington

<August 1534>

When Mistress Roper had received a letter from her sister Lady Alice Alington, she, at her next repair<sup>136</sup> to her father, showed him the letter. And what communication was thereupon between her father and her, ye shall perceive by an answer here following (as written

112 tell 113 take a course at: hunt
114 ask 115 Elizabeth Barton; see Letter 200 above. 116 other matter: More’s refusal to take the oath 117 notion, conception, idea 118 as that: since

119 immediately 120 blind bishop: John Fisher 121 who 122 themselves 123 wanted 124 for all: in spite of, notwithstanding 125 dirtied 126 absolved, forgave 127 by and by:

immediately 128 strictly 129 became 130 gladly 131 except 132 spiritual 133 a coin worth four pence 134 knew 135 abashed of: confused or disconcerted by 136 visit to the Lady Alington). But whether this answer were written by Sir Thomas More in his daughter Roper's name or by herself, it is not certainly known. [Workes 1434]

5 When I came next unto my father after, methought it both convenient and necessary to show him your letter: convenient,<sup>137</sup> that he might thereby see your loving labor taken for him; necessary, that since he might perceive thereby that if he stand still in this
10 scruple of his conscience (as it is at the leastwise called by many that are his friends and wise), all his friends that seem most able to do him good either shall finally forsake him, or peradventure<sup>138</sup> not be able indeed to do him any good at all.

15 And for these causes, at my next being with him after your letter received, when I had a while talked with him, first of his diseases — both in his breast of old, and his reins<sup>139</sup> now by reason of gravel and stone<sup>140</sup> — and of the cramp also that diverse nights
20 grippeth him in his legs, and that<sup>141</sup> I found by his words that they were not much increased but continued after their manner that they did before, sometimes very sore<sup>142</sup> and sometimes little grief, and that<sup>143</sup> at that time I found him out of pain, and
25 (as one in his case might) meetly<sup>144</sup> well-minded, after our seven psalms<sup>145</sup> and the litany<sup>146</sup> said,<sup>147</sup> to sit and talk and be merry, beginning first with other things of the good comfort of my mother, and the good order of my brother, and all my sisters, disposing
30 themselves every day more and more to set little by the world, and draw more and more to God, and that his household, his neighbors, and other good friends abroad<sup>148</sup> diligently remembered him in their prayers, I added unto this: “I pray God,
35 good father, that their prayers and ours, and your own therewith, may purchase of God the grace that you may in this great matter — for which you stand in this trouble and, for your trouble, all we also that love you — take such a way betime<sup>149</sup> as, standing 40 with the pleasure of God, may content and please the King, whom ye have always founden so singularly gracious unto you that if ye should stiffly refuse to do the thing that were his pleasure — which, God not displeased, you might do (as many great wise and well-learned men say that in this thing you may) — it would both be a great blot in your worship<sup>150</sup> in every wise man's opinion and, as myself have heard some say (such as yourself have always taken for well-learned and good), a peril unto your soul also. But as for that point, father, will I not be 50 bold to dispute upon, since I trust in God and your good mind that ye will look surely thereto. And your learning I know for such that I wot<sup>151</sup> well you can. But one thing is there which I and other your friends find and perceive abroad, which, but if<sup>152</sup> it

55 be showed you, you may — peradventure to your great peril — mistake and hope for less harm (for as for good I wot well in this world of this matter ye look for none) than, I sore fear me, shall be likely to fall to you. For I assure you, father, I have received 60 a letter of late from my sister Alington, by which I see well that if ye change not your mind, you are likely to lose all those friends that are able to do you any good. Or if ye lose not their good wills, ye shall at the leastwise lose the effect thereof, for any good 65 that they shall be able to do you.”

With this, my father smiled upon me and said: “What, Mistress Eve (as I called you when you came first), hath my daughter Alington played the serpent with you, and with a letter set you awork to 70 come tempt your father again<sup>153</sup> and, for the favor that you bear him, labor to make him swear against his conscience, and so send him to the devil?” And after that, he looked sadly again, and earnestly said unto me: “Daughter Margaret, we two have talked
75 of this thing offer<sup>154</sup> than twice or thrice, and that same tale, in effect, that you tell me now therein, and the same fear too, have you twice told me before; and I have twice answered you too that in this matter if it were possible for me to do the thing that 80 might content the King's Grace, and God therewith not offended, there hath no man taken this oath already more gladly than I would do, as he that reckoneth himself more deeply bounden unto the King's Highness for his most singular bounty, many 85 ways showed and declared, than any of them all besides. But since, standing<sup>155</sup> my conscience, I can in no wise<sup>156</sup> do it — and that for the instruction of my conscience in the matter, I have not slightly looked, but by many years studied and advisedly considered, and never could yet see nor hear that thing,

137 appropriate 138 perhaps 139 kidneys 140 gravel and stone: kidney stones 141 when 142 much 143 when 144 suitably 145 seven psalms: the penitential psalms, i.e., Pss 6, 31(32), 37(38), 50(51), 101(102), 129(130), & 142(143)

146 the Litany of the Saints 147 had been said 148 outside (the Tower)

149 in good time 150 reputation 151 know 152 but if: unless 153 See Gn 3. 154 more often 155 continuing or remaining with 156 way

nor I think I never shall, that could induce mine own mind to think otherwise than I do — I have no manner<sup>157</sup> remedy but God hath given me to the strait:<sup>158</sup> that either I must deadly displease him, or 5 abide any worldly harm that he shall for mine other sins, under name of this thing, suffer<sup>159</sup> to fall upon me. Whereof<sup>160</sup> (as I before this have told you too) I have, ere<sup>161</sup> I came here, not left unbethought nor
 10 unconsidered the very worst and the uttermost that can by possibility fall. And albeit that<sup>162</sup> I know mine own frailty full well and the natural faintness of mine own heart, yet if I had not trusted that God should give me strength rather to endure all things than offend him by swearing ungodly against mine
 15 own conscience, you may be very sure I would not have come here. And since I look in this matter but only unto God, it maketh me little matter though men call it as it pleaseth them and say it is no conscience but a foolish scruple.”

20 At this word I took a good occasion, and said unto him thus: “In good faith, father, for my part I neither do, nor it cannot become me, either to mistrust your good mind or your learning. But because 25 you speak of that — that some call it but a scruple — I assure you, you shall see my sister’s letter, that one of the greatest estates<sup>163</sup> in this realm, and a man learned too, and (as I dare say yourself shall think when you know him, and as you have already right
 30 effectually proved him) your tender friend and very special good lord, accounteth your conscience in this matter for a right simple scruple; and you may be sure he saith it of good mind and layeth<sup>164</sup> no little cause.<sup>165</sup> For he saith that where you say your conscience moveth you to this, all the nobles of this
 35 realm, and almost all other men too, go boldly forth with the contrary and stick<sup>166</sup> not thereat, save only yourself and one other man,<sup>167</sup> whom, though he be right good and very well-learned too, yet would I ween<sup>168</sup> few that love you give you the counsel, 40 against all other men, to lean to his mind alone.”

And with this word I took him your letter that he might see my words were not feigned, but spoken of his mouth whom he much loveth and esteemeth highly. Thereupon he read over your letter.

And when he came to the end, he began it afresh and read it over again. And in the reading he made 45 no manner haste, but advised<sup>169</sup> it leisurely and pointed<sup>170</sup> every word.

And after that he paused, and then thus he said: “Forsooth,<sup>171</sup> daughter Margaret, I find my daughter 50 Alington such as I have ever found her, and I trust ever shall, as naturally minding me as you that are mine own. Howbeit,<sup>172</sup> her take I verily<sup>173</sup> for mine own too, since I have married her mother, and brought up her of<sup>174</sup> a child as I have brought up you,
 55 in other things and learning both, wherein, I thank God, she findeth now some fruit, and bringeth her own up very virtuously and well. Whereof<sup>175</sup> God, I thank him, hath sent her good store; our Lord preserve them and send her much joy of them and my 60 good son her gentle husband too, and have mercy on the soul of mine other good son her first;<sup>176</sup> I am daily beadsman<sup>177</sup> (and so write her) for them all.

“In this matter she hath used<sup>178</sup> herself like herself: wisely and like a very daughter toward me,
 65 and in the end of her letter, giveth as good counsel as any man that wit hath would wish; God give me grace to follow it and God reward her for it. Now, daughter Margaret, as for my Lord, I not only think, but have also found it, that he is undoubt-
 70 edly my singular good lord. And in mine other business concerning the seely<sup>179</sup> nun,<sup>180</sup> as my cause was good and clear, so was he my good lord therein, and Master Secretary<sup>181</sup> my good master too, for which I shall never cease to be faithful beadsman for them
 75 both and daily do I, by my troth,<sup>182</sup> pray for them as I do for myself. And whensoever it should happen (which I trust in God shall never happen) that I be found other than a true man to my Prince, let them never favor me — neither of them both — nor 80 of truth no more it could become them to do.

“But in this matter, Meg, to tell the truth between thee and me, my Lord’s Aesop’s fables do not greatly move me. But as his Wisdom,<sup>183</sup> for his pastime, told them merrily to mine one daughter, so shall I, for my pastime, answer them to thee, Meg, 85 that art mine other daughter. The first fable, of the rain that washed away all their wits that<sup>184</sup> stood

157 kind of 158 narrow place 159 allow 160 Of that [harm] 161 before
 162 albeit that: although 163 noblemen
 164 puts forward 165 reasoning
 166 hesitate; scruple 167 Bishop John Fisher 168 think 169 examined

170 marked, noted 171 Indeed
 172 However 173 truly 174 since 175 of which (children) 176 her deceased first husband, Thomas Elrington 177 one who prays for another 178 conducted 179 pitiable, foolish 180 Elizabeth

Barton 181 Thomas Cromwell 182 truthfulness, faithfulness 183 Audley, the Lord Chancellor 184 their wits that:
 the wits of those who abroad<sup>185</sup> when it fell, I have heard often ere this. It was a tale so often told among the King's Council by my Lord Cardinal<sup>186</sup> when his Grace was chancellor that I cannot lightly forget it. For of troth, in 5 times past, when variance began to fall between the Emperor<sup>187</sup> and the French King<sup>188</sup> in such wise that they were likely and did indeed fall together at war, and that there were in the Council here sometimes sundry opinions — in which some were of the mind

 10 that they thought it wisdom that we should sit still and let them alone, but evermore against that way — my Lord used this fable of those wise men that,<sup>189</sup> because they would not be washed with the rain that should make all the people fools, went them-
 15 selves into caves and hid them<sup>190</sup> under the ground. But when the rain had once made all the remnant fools and that they<sup>191</sup> come out of their caves and would utter their wisdom, the fools agreed together against them, and there all-to<sup>192</sup> beat them. And
 20 so said his Grace that if we would be so wise that we would sit in peace while the fools fought, they would not fail after<sup>193</sup> to make peace and agree and fall at length all upon us. I will not dispute upon his Grace's counsel, and I trust we never made war but 25 as reason would. But yet this fable, for his part, did in his days help the King and the realm to spend many a fair penny. But that gear<sup>194</sup> is passed and his Grace is gone, our Lord assoil<sup>195</sup> his soul.

“And therefore shall I now come to this Aesop's
 30 fable, as my Lord full merrily laid it forth for me. If those wise men, Meg, when the rain was gone at their coming abroad — where they found all men fools — wished themselves fools too because they could not rule them, then seemeth it that the foolish
 35 rain was so sore<sup>196</sup> a shower that, even through the ground, it sank into their caves, and poured down upon their heads, and wet them to the skin, and made them more noddies<sup>197</sup> than them that stood abroad. For if they had had any wit, they might well 40 see that, though they had been fools too, that thing would not have sufficed to make them the rulers over the other fools, no more than the other fools over them; and of so many fools all might not be rulers. Now when they longed so sore to bear a rule

among fools — that so they, they so might<sup>198</sup> — they 45 would be glad to lose their wit and be fools too, the foolish rain had washed them meetly<sup>199</sup> well. Howbeit, to say the truth, before the rain came, if they thought that all the remnant should turn into fools and then either were so foolish that they would or 50 so mad to think that they should, so few, rule so many fools and had not so much wit as to consider that there are none so unruly as they that lack wit and are fools, then were these wise men stark fools before the rain came. Howbeit, daughter Roper,
 55 whom my Lord taketh here for the wise men and whom he meaneth to be fools, I cannot very well guess; I cannot well read such riddles. For as Davus saith in Terence, Non sum Oedipus,<sup>200</sup> I may say, you wot<sup>201</sup> well, Non sum Oedipus, sed Morus,<sup>202</sup>
 60 which name of mine, what it signifieth in Greek, I need not tell you. But I trust my Lord reckoneth me among the fools, and so reckon I myself, as my name is in Greek. And I find, I thank God, causes not a few, wherefore I so should in very deed.
 65

“But surely among those that long to be rulers, God and mine own conscience clearly knoweth that no man may truly number and reckon me. And I ween each other man's conscience can tell himself the same, since it is so well known that, of 70 the King's great goodness, I was one of the greatest rulers in this noble realm and that, at mine own great labor by his great goodness, discharged. But whomsoever my Lord meaneth for the wise men, and whomsoever his Lordship take for the fools,
 75 and whosoever long for the rule, and whosoever long for none, I beseech our Lord make us all so wise as that we may, every man here, so wisely rule ourselves in this time of tears, this vale of misery, this simple wretched world — in which, as Boethius
 80 saith, one man to be proud that he beareth rule over other men is much like as one mouse would be proud to bear a rule over other mice in a barn<sup>203</sup> — God, I say, give us the grace so wisely to rule ourselves here that when we shall hence in haste to 85 meet the great Spouse, we be not taken sleepers and, for lack of light in our lamps, shut out of heaven among the five foolish virgins.<sup>204</sup>

185 outside 186 Cardinal Wolsey, More's predecessor as Lord Chancellor 187 Charles V, Holy Roman Emperor
 188 Francis I 189 who 190 themselves
 191 that they: if they (the wisemen)
 192 utterly, completely 193 afterwards

194 matter, talk 195 absolve, forgive
 196 great 197 fools 198 that so they, they so might: that in whatever way they (were able to obtain rule), they would (obtain it) 199 fairly; quite 200 Non sum Oedipus: “I am not Oedipus.” See

Terence's Andria 1.2.23. Oedipus famously solved the riddle of the Sphinx. 201 know 202 sed Morus: “but More”; in Greek, Morus means “fool.” 203 one man . . . in a barn: Boethius, The Consolation of Philosophy, 2. Pr. 6.147 204 Mt 25:1–13

“The second fable, Marget, seemeth not to be Aesop’s. For by that<sup>205</sup> the matter goeth all upon confession, it seemeth to be feigned since Christendom began. For in Greece before Christ’s days they
 5 used not confession, no more the men then than the beasts now. And Aesop was a Greek, and died long ere Christ was born. But what? Who made it, maketh little matter. Nor I envy not<sup>206</sup> that Aesop hath the name.<sup>207</sup> But surely it is somewhat too subtle for me. For whom his Lordship understandeth
 10 by the lion and the wolf (which both twain<sup>208</sup> confessed themselves of ravin<sup>209</sup> and devouring of all that came to their hands, and the one enlarged his conscience at his pleasure in the construction<sup>210</sup> of his penance), nor whom by the good discreet confessor (that enjoined the one a little penance, and the other none at all, and sent the poor ass to the bishop) — of all these things can I nothing tell. But by the foolish scrupulous ass (that had so sore<sup>211</sup> a conscience, for the taking of a straw for hunger out of his master’s shoe), my Lord’s other words of my scruple declare that his Lordship merrily meant that by me, signifying (as it seemeth by that similitude) that of oversight and folly my scrupulous
 25 conscience taketh for a great perilous thing toward my soul if I should swear this oath, which thing, as his Lordship thinketh, were indeed but a trifle. And I suppose well, Margaret, as you told me right now, that so thinketh many more beside, as well spiritual as temporal,<sup>212</sup> and that even of those that, for their learning and their virtue, myself not a little esteem. And yet albeit that<sup>213</sup> I suppose this to be true, yet believe I not even very surely that every man so thinketh that so saith. But though they did, daughter, that would not make much to me, not though I should see my Lord of Rochester<sup>214</sup> say the same, and swear the oath himself before me too.

“For whereas you told me right now that such as love me would not advise me that, against all other 40 men, I should lean unto his mind alone, verily, daughter, no more I do. For albeit that, of very truth, I have him in that reverent estimation that I reckon in this realm no one man — in wisdom, learning, and long-approved virtue together — meet<sup>215</sup> to be matched and compared with him, yet, that in this matter I was not led by him very well and plainly appeared both in that I refused the oath before it was offered him and in that also that his Lordship was content to have sworn of that oath (as I perceived since by<sup>216</sup> you when you moved me to the same) either somewhat more, or in some other manner than ever I minded to do. Verily, daughter, I never intend (God being my good lord) to pin my soul at another man’s back, not even the best man that I know this day living, for I know not whither he may hap<sup>217</sup> to carry it. There is no man living of whom, while he liveth, I may make myself sure. Some may do for favor, and some may do for fear, and so might they carry my soul a wrong way. And some might hap to frame himself a conscience and think that, while he did it for fear, God would forgive it. And some may peradventure<sup>218</sup> think that they will repent, and be shriven<sup>219</sup> thereof, and that so God shall remit it them. And some may be peradventure of that mind that, if they say one thing and think the while the contrary, God more regardeth their heart than their tongue, and that therefore their oath goeth upon that they think and not upon that they say, as a woman reasoned once — I trow,<sup>220</sup> daughter, you were by. But in good faith, Marget, I can use no such ways in so great a matter; but like<sup>221</sup> as if mine own conscience served me, I would not let<sup>222</sup> to do it though other men refused, so though others refuse it not, I dare not do it, mine own conscience standing against it. If I had (as I told you) looked but lightly for<sup>223</sup> the matter, I should have cause to fear. But now have I so looked for it, and so long, that I purpose at the leastwise to have no less regard unto my soul than had once a poor honest man of the country that was called Company.”

And with this, he told me a tale. I ween<sup>224</sup> I can scant<sup>225</sup> tell it you again, because it hangeth upon some terms and ceremonies of the law. But as far as I can call to mind, my father’s tale was this: That there is a court belonging of course<sup>226</sup> unto every fair, to do justice in such things as happen within the same. This court hath a pretty fond<sup>227</sup> name, but I cannot happen upon it, but it beginneth with a pie, and the 205 by that: inasmuch as 206 Nor... not: Nor am I envious (the double negative was standard at More’s time) 207 fame, glory 208 both twain: both the two 209 the act of taking prey 210 construing 211 distressed 212 as well... temporal:

clergy as well as laymen 213 although 214 Lord of Rochester: Bishop Fisher, the only bishop who refused to swear the oath 215 suitable, worthy 216 perceived since by: learned subsequently from 217 happen 218 perhaps 219 forgiven in the sacrament of confession 220 believe 221 just 222 hesitate 223 into 224 think 225 hardly, scarcely 226 of course: routinely 227 silly

remnant goeth much like the name of a knight that I have known, iwis<sup>228</sup> (and I trow you too, for he hath been at my father's often ere this, at such time as you were there), a meetly tall black<sup>229</sup> man; his name was 5 Sir William Pounder. But tut,<sup>230</sup> let the name of the court go for this once, or call it, if ye will, a court of pie Sir William Pounder.<sup>231</sup> But this was the matter, lo: That upon a time, at such a court held at Bartholomew Fair,<sup>232</sup> there was an escheator<sup>233</sup> of London that had arrested a man that was outlawed,<sup>234</sup>
 10 and had seized his goods that he had brought into the fair, tolling<sup>235</sup> him out of the fair by a train.<sup>236</sup> The man that was arrested and his goods seized was a northern man, which, by<sup>237</sup> his friends, made the 15 escheator within the fair to be arrested upon an action<sup>238</sup> (I wot nere<sup>239</sup> what), and so was he brought before the judge of the court of pie Sir William Pounder, and at the last, the matter came to a certain ceremony to be tried by a quest<sup>240</sup> of twelve men, a 20 jury, as I remember they call it, or else a perjury.

Now had the clothman,<sup>241</sup> by friendship of the officers, founden the means to have all the quest, almost, made of the northern men, such as had their booths there standing in the fair. Now was it come 25 to the last day<sup>242</sup> in the afternoon, and the twelve men had heard both the parties and their counsel tell their tales at the bar, and were, from the bar, had into a place to talk and commune<sup>243</sup> and agree upon their sentence. Nay, let me speak better in my terms yet:
 30 I trow the judge giveth the sentence and the quest's tale is called a verdict. They were scant<sup>244</sup> come in together, but the northern men were agreed—and in effect all the others too—to cast<sup>245</sup> our London escheator. They thought they needed no more to prove 35 that he did wrong than even the name<sup>246</sup> of his bare office alone. But then, was there then (as the devil would) this honest man of another quarter, that was called Company. And because the fellow seemed but a fool and sat still and said nothing, they made 40 no reckoning of him, but said, “We be agreed now; come, let us go give our verdict.”

Then when the poor fellow saw that they made such haste, and his mind nothing gave him that way that theirs did (if their minds gave them that way that they said), he prayed<sup>247</sup> them to tarry<sup>248</sup> 45 and talk upon the matter and tell him such reason therein, that he might think as they did; and when he so should do, he would be glad to say with them, or else, he said, they must pardon him. For since he had a soul of his own to keep as they had,
 50 he must say as he thought for his, as they must for theirs. When they heard this, they were half angry with him. “What, good fellow?” quoth one of the northern men. “Where wonnest thou?<sup>249</sup> Be not we eleven here and you but ene la alene,<sup>250</sup> and all we agreed? Whereto<sup>251</sup> shouldst you stick?<sup>252</sup> What is thy name, gude<sup>253</sup> fellow?” “Masters,” quoth he, “my name is called Company.” “Company,” quoth they, “now by thy troth,<sup>254</sup> gude fellow, play then the gude companion; come thereon<sup>255</sup> forth with us
 60 and pass,<sup>256</sup> even for gude company.” “Would God, good masters,” quoth the man again, “that there lay no more weight<sup>257</sup> thereby. But now when we shall hence and come before God, and that he shall send you to heaven for doing according to your conscience, and me to the devil for doing against mine, 65 in passing<sup>258</sup> at your request here for good company now, by God, Master Dickenson” (that was one of the northern men's name), “if I shall then say to all you again, ‘Masters, I went once for good company with you, which is the cause that I go now to hell, play you the good fellows now again with me; as I went then for good company with you, so some of you go now for good company with me.’ Would ye go, Master Dickenson? Nay, nay, by our Lady, nor never one of you all. And therefore must ye pardon me from passing as you pass; but if<sup>259</sup> I thought in the matter as you do, I dare not in such a matter pass for good company. For the passage of my poor soul passeth<sup>260</sup> all good company.”
 80

And when my father had told me this tale, then said he further thus: “I pray thee now, good Marget,

228 indeed, certainly 229 black hair or eyes; dark-complexioned 230 no matter 231 pie Sir William Pounder: The court at an English fair is called a “Court of Piepowders” from French pieds poudrés (dusty feet), as justice was administered without delay to all who came, dusty as they were from traveling. 232 a fair that was held annually from 1153 to 1855, at West Smithfield 233 a law officer 234 a technical legal term meaning (in this case) that he had been stripped of his property rights by a court 235 debarring (a legal action) 236 course of action; deceit 237 which, by: who, by the help of 238 a legal suit or warrant 239 wot nere: know not 240 a legally established board 241 the defendant, who was at the fair to sell cloth 242 a legal term for a court session 243 discuss, confer 244 hardly 245 defeat in a legal action 246 The officer was called both an “escheator” and a “cheator” at this time.

247 asked 248 wait 249 Where wonnest thou?: Where do you live? (“Wonest” is a word of northern England's dialect) 250 ene la alene: northern dialect for “one all alone” 251 For what reason? 252 persist; remain fixed 253 northern dialect for “good” 254 truth, faithfulness 255 on that subject 256 render a verdict (legal term) 257 lay weight: were attached importance 258 voting for a verdict 259 but if: unless 260 surpasses tell me this: wouldst you wish thy poor father, being at the leastwise somewhat learned, less to regard the peril of his soul than did there the honest unlearned man? I meddle not (you wot<sup>261</sup> well) with the conscience of any man that hath sworn; nor I take not upon me to be their judge. But now if they do well, and that their conscience grudge<sup>262</sup> them not, if I, with my conscience to the contrary, should for good company pass on with them and swear as they do, when all our souls hereafter shall pass out of this world and stand in judgment at the bar before the high Judge, if he judge them to heaven and me to the devil because I did as they did, not thinking as they thought, if I should then say (as the good man Company said): ‘Mine old good lords and friends (naming such a lord and such; yea, and some bishops peradventure of such as I love best), I swore because you swore and went that way that you went; do likewise for me now; let me not go alone; if there be any good fellowship with you, some of you come with me,’ by my troth, Marget, I may say to thee — in secret counsel, here between us twain (but let it go no farther, I beseech thee heartily) — I find the friendship of this wretched world so fickle that for anything that I could treat<sup>263</sup> or pray, that would for good fellowship go to the devil with me, among them all I ween<sup>264</sup> I should not find one. And then, by God, Marget, if you think so too, best it is, I suppose, that for<sup>265</sup> any respect of them all, were they twice as many more as they be, I have myself a respect to mine own soul.’”

“Surely, father,” quoth I, “without any scruple at all you may be bold, I dare say, for to swear that. But father, they that think you should not refuse to swear the thing that you see so many so good men, and so well-learned, swear before you, mean not that you should swear to bear them fellowship, nor to pass with them for good company, but that the credence that you may with reason give to their persons for their aforesaid qualities should well move you to think the oath such of itself as every man may well swear without peril of their soul, if their own private conscience to the contrary be not the let,<sup>266</sup> and that ye well ought and have good cause to change your own conscience, in conforming your own conscience to the conscience of so many others, namely<sup>267</sup> being such as you know they be. And since it is also by a law made by the Parliament commanded, they think that you be, upon the peril of your soul, bounden to change and reform your conscience, and conform your own, as I said, to other men’s.”

“Marry,<sup>268</sup> Marget,” quoth my father again, “for the part that you play, you play it not much amiss. But, Margaret, first, as for the law of the land, though every man being born and inhabiting therein is bounden to the keeping in every case upon some temporal pain and in many cases upon pain of God’s displeasure too, yet is there no man bounden to swear that every law is well made, nor bounden upon the pain of God’s displeasure to perform any such point of the law as were indeed unlawful. Of which manner kind, that there may such hap<sup>269</sup> to be made in any part of Christendom, I suppose no man doubteth, the General Council of the whole body of Christendom evermore in that point except,<sup>270</sup> which,<sup>271</sup> though it may make some things better than others and some things may grow to that point that by another law they may need to be reformed, yet to institute anything in such wise, to God’s displeasure, as at the making might not lawfully be performed, the Spirit of God, that governeth his Church, never hath yet suffered,<sup>272</sup> nor never hereafter shall, his whole Catholic Church lawfully gathered together in a General Council — as Christ hath made plain promises in Scripture.”

“Now if it so hap that, in any particular part of Christendom, there be a law made that be such as, for<sup>273</sup> some part thereof, some men think that the law of God cannot bear it, and some other think yes (the thing being in such manner in question that through diverse quarters of Christendom some that are good men and cunning,<sup>274</sup> both of our own days and before our days, think some one way, and some other of like learning and goodness think the contrary), in this case he that thinketh against the law neither may swear that law lawfully was made, standing his own conscience to the contrary, nor is bounden upon pain of God’s displeasure to change his own conscience therein for any particular law made anywhere, other than by the General Council or by a general faith grown by the working of God universally through all Christian nations — nor other authority than one of these twain<sup>275</sup> (except special revelation and express commandment of

261 know 262 trouble, disturb 263 entreat 264 think 265 despite 266 hindrance 267 especially

268 Indeed (from “by Mary”) 269 happen 270 excepted 271 that (Council) 272 permitted 273 because of 274 learned; clever 275 two

God), since the contrary opinions of good men and well-learned, as I put you the case, made the understanding of the Scriptures doubtful, I can see none that lawfully may command and compel any man to change his own opinion and to translate<sup>276</sup> his own conscience from the one side to the other.

“For an example of some such manner things, I have, I trow,<sup>277</sup> before this time told you that, whether our Blessed Lady were conceived in original sin or not, was some time in great question among the great learned men of Christendom. And whether it be yet decided and determined by any General Council, I remember not. But this I remember well, that notwithstanding that the feast<sup>278</sup> of her conception was then celebrated in the Church (at the leastwise in diverse provinces), yet was holy Saint Bernard — which, as his manifold books made in the laud and praise of our Lady do declare, was of as devout affection toward all things sounding toward her commendation that he thought might well be verified or suffered as any man was living — yet, I say, was that holy devout man against that part of her praise, as appeareth well by an epistle of his wherein he right sore<sup>279</sup> and with great reason argueth thereagainst and approveth not the institution of that feast neither. Nor he was not of this mind alone, but many other well-learned men with him, and right holy men too. Now was there on the other side the blessed holy bishop Saint Anselm, and he not alone neither, but many well-learned and very virtuous also with him. And they be both twain holy saints in heaven, and many more that were on either side. Nor neither part was there bounden to change their opinion for the other, nor for any provincial council either.

“But like as, after the determination of a well assembled General Council, every man had been bounden to give credence that way and conform their own conscience to the determination of the Council General, and then all they that held the contrary before were for that holding out of blame, so if before such decision a man had against his own conscience sworn to maintain and defend the other side, he had not failed to offend God very sore. But, marry, if on the other side a man would in a matter take away<sup>280</sup> — by himself upon his own mind alone, or with some few, or with never so many — against an evident truth appearing by the common faith of Christendom, this conscience is very damnable; yea, or if it be not even fully so plain and evident, yet if he see but himself with far the fewer part think the one way, against far the more part (of as well-learned and as good as those are that affirm the thing that he thinketh) thinking and affirming the contrary, and that of such folk as he hath no reasonable cause wherefore he should not in that matter suppose that those which say they think against his mind affirm the thing that they say for none other cause but for<sup>281</sup> that they so think indeed: this is, of very truth, a very good occasion to move him, and yet not to compel him, to conform his mind and conscience unto theirs.

“But Margaret, for what causes I refuse the oath, the thing (as I have often told you) I will never show you, neither you nor nobody else, except the King’s Highness should like to command me. Which if his Grace did, I have ere<sup>282</sup> this told you therein how obediently I have said. But surely, daughter, I have refused it and do, for more causes than one. And for what causes soever I refuse it, this am I sure: that it is well known that, of them that have sworn it, some of the best-learned, before the oath given them, said and plain affirmed the contrary of some such things as they have now sworn in the oath — and that upon their troth, and their learning then, and that not in haste nor suddenly, but often and after great diligence done to seek and find out the truth.”

“That might be, father,” quoth I.

“And yet since they might see more, I will not,” quoth he, “dispute, daughter Margaret, against that, nor misjudge any other man’s conscience, which lieth in their own heart, far out of my sight. But this will I say, that I never heard myself the cause of their change, by any new further thing founden of authority, than as far as I perceive they had looked on, and as I suppose, very well weighed before. Now, if the selfsame things that they saw before seem some otherwise unto them now than they did before, I am, for their sakes, the gladder a great deal. But anything that ever I saw before, yet at this day to me they seem but as they did. And therefore, though they may do otherwise than they might, yet, daughter, I may not. As for such things as some men would haply<sup>283</sup> say that I might with reason the less regard sore: very strongly 280 from its actual condition 281 but for: except 282 before 283 perhaps

276 convey; transfer 277 trust 278 of the Immaculate Conception 279 right

their change, for any example of them to be taken to the change of my conscience because that the keeping of the Prince's pleasure and the avoiding of his indignation, the fear of the losing of their worldly substance,<sup>284</sup> with regard unto the discomfort of their kindred and their friends, might hap make some men either swear otherwise than they think or frame their conscience afresh to think otherwise than they thought — any such opinion as this is, will I not conceive of them; I have better hope of their goodness than to think of them so. For if such things should have turned them, the same things had been likely to make me do the same; for, in good faith, I knew few so fainthearted as myself. Therefore will I, Margaret, by my will, think no worse of other folk in the thing that I know not, than I find in myself. But, as I know well mine only conscience<sup>285</sup> causeth me to refuse the oath, so will I trust in God that according to their conscience they have received it and sworn.

“But whereas you think, Marget, that they<sup>286</sup> be so many more than there are on the other side that think in this thing as I think, surely for your own comfort — that you shall not take thought, thinking that your father casteth himself away so like a fool that he would jeopard<sup>287</sup> the loss of his substance, and peradventure<sup>288</sup> his body, without any cause why he so should for peril of his soul, but rather his soul in peril thereby too — to this shall I say to thee, Marget, that in some of my causes I nothing doubt at all but that, though not in this realm, yet in Christendom about, of those well-learned men and virtuous that are yet alive, they be not the fewer part that are of my mind. Besides that, that it were,<sup>289</sup> ye wot<sup>290</sup> well, possible that some men in this realm too, think not so clear the contrary, as by the oath received they have sworn to say.

“Now this far-forth<sup>291</sup> I say for them that are yet alive. But go we now to them that are dead before and that are, I trust, in heaven; I am sure that it is not the fewer part of them that, all the time while they lived, thought in some of the things the way that I think now. I am also, Margaret, of this thing sure enough, that of those holy doctors and saints, which to be with God in heaven long ago no Christian man doubteth, whose books yet at this day remain here in men's hands, there thought in some such things as I think now. I say not that they thought all so, but surely such and so many (as will well appear by their writing) that I pray God give me the grace that my soul may follow theirs. And yet I show you not all, Margaret, that I have for myself in the sure discharge of my conscience. But for the conclusion, daughter Margaret, of all this matter, as I have often told you, I take not upon me neither to define nor dispute in these matters; nor I rebuke not nor impugn any other man's deed, nor I never wrote, nor so much as spoke in any company, any word of reproach in anything that the Parliament had passed; nor I meddled not with the conscience of any other man that either thinketh or saith he thinketh contrary unto mine. But as concerning mine own self, for thy comfort shall I say, daughter, to thee, that mine own conscience in this matter (I damn none other man's) is such as may well stand with mine own salvation; thereof am I, Meg, so sure, as that is, God is in heaven. And therefore as for all the remnant — goods, lands, and life both (if the chance should so fortune) — since this conscience is sure for me, I verily trust in God, he shall rather strengthen me to bear the loss, than against this conscience to swear and put my soul in peril, since all the causes that I perceive move other men to the contrary seem not such unto me as in my conscience make any change.”

When he saw me sit with this<sup>292</sup> very sad — as I promise you, sister, my heart was full heavy<sup>293</sup> for the peril of his person; for in faith I fear not his soul — he smiled upon me and said: “How now, daughter Marget? What how, mother Eve? Where is your mind now? Sit not musing with some serpent in your breast, upon some new persuasion, to offer father Adam the apple yet once again?”

“In good faith, father,” quoth I, “I can no further go, but am (as I trow<sup>294</sup> Cressida saith in Chaucer)<sup>295</sup> comen to dulcarnon,<sup>296</sup> even at my wit's end. For since the example of so many wise men cannot in this matter move you, I see not what to say more, but if<sup>297</sup> I should look to persuade you with the reason that Master Harry Patenson<sup>298</sup> made. For he met one day one of our men, and when he had asked where you were and heard that you were in the Tower still, he waxed even<sup>299</sup> angry with you

284 wealth, property 285 mine only conscience: my conscience alone 286 those who have sworn 287 jeopardize, risk 288 perhaps 289 that it were: it could be

290 know 291 to a great extent 292 me sit with this: that this made me 293 sad, distressed 294 believe 295 Cressida saith in Chaucer: Troilus and Criseyde,

3,930–31 296 a point of perplexity 297 but if: except, unless 298 Harry Patenson: More's household jester 299 waxed even: became quite and said, ‘Why? What aileth him that he will not swear? Wherefore<sup>300</sup> should he stick<sup>301</sup> to swear? I have sworn the oath myself.’ And so I can in good faith go now no further neither, after so many wise men whom ye take for no example, but if I should say like Master Harry: Why should you refuse to swear, father? For I have sworn myself.”<sup>302</sup>

At this he laughed and said, “That word was like Eve too, for she offered Adam no worse fruit than she had eaten herself.”

“But yet father, “ quoth I, “by my troth, I fear me very sore<sup>303</sup> that this matter will bring you in marvelous heavy trouble. You know well that, as I showed you, Master Secretary sent you word as your very<sup>304</sup> friend to remember that the Parliament lasteth yet.”<sup>305</sup>

“Margaret,” quoth my father, “I thank him right heartily. But as I showed you then again, I left not this gear<sup>306</sup> unthought on. And albeit<sup>307</sup> I know well that if they would make a law to do me any harm, that law could never be lawful, but that<sup>308</sup> God shall I trust keep me in that grace, that concerning my duty to my prince, no man shall do me hurt but if he do me wrong (and then, as I told you, this is like a riddle, a case in which a man may lose his head and have no harm), and notwithstanding also that I have good hope that God shall never suffer<sup>309</sup> so good and wise a prince in such wise to requite the long service of his true faithful servant, yet since there is nothing impossible to fall,<sup>310</sup> I forgot not in this matter the counsel of Christ in the Gospel<sup>311</sup> that ere I should begin to build this castle for the safeguard of mine own soul, I should sit and reckon what the charge would be. I counted, Marget, full surely many a restless night—while my wife slept, and weened<sup>312</sup> that I had slept too—what peril was possible for to fall to me, so far-forth that I am sure there can come none above. And in devising,<sup>313</sup> daughter, thereupon, I had a full heavy heart. But yet—I thank our Lord—for all that, I never thought to change, though the very uttermost should hap<sup>314</sup> me that my fear ran upon.”

“No, father,” quoth I, “it is not like<sup>315</sup> to think upon a thing that may be, and to see a thing that shall be, as ye should (our Lord save you) if the chance should so fortune.<sup>316</sup> And then should<sup>317</sup> you peradventure<sup>318</sup> think that you think not now and yet then peradventure it would be too late.”

“Too late, daughter” (quoth my father) “Margaret? I beseech our Lord that if ever I make such a change, it may be too late indeed. For well I wot the change cannot be good for my soul, that change, I say, that should grow but by fear. And therefore I pray God that in this world I never have good<sup>319</sup> of such change. For so much as I take harm here, I shall have at the leastwise the less therefore when I am hence. And if so were<sup>320</sup> that I wist<sup>321</sup> well now that I should<sup>322</sup> faint and fall, and for fear swear hereafter, yet would I wish to take harm by the refusing first, for so should I have the better hope for grace to rise again.

“And albeit, Marget, that I wot well my lewdness<sup>323</sup> hath been such that I know myself well worthy that God should let me slip, yet can I not but trust in his merciful goodness, that as his grace hath strengthened me hitherto, and made me content in my heart to lose goods, land, and life too, rather than to swear against my conscience, and hath also put in the King toward me that<sup>324</sup> good and gracious mind that as yet he hath taken from me nothing but my liberty—wherewith<sup>325</sup> (as help me God) his Grace hath done me so great good by the spiritual profit that I trust I take thereby, that among all his great benefits heaped upon me so thick, I reckon upon my faith my prisonment even the very chief—I cannot, I say, therefore mistrust the grace of God, but that either he shall conserve and keep the King in that gracious mind still to do me none hurt, or else, if his pleasure be, that for mine other sins I shall suffer in such a case in sight<sup>326</sup> as I shall not deserve, his grace shall give me the strength to take it patiently, and peradventure somewhat gladly too, whereby his high goodness shall (by the merits of his bitter Passion joined thereunto, and far surmounting in merit for me, all that I can suffer myself) make it serve for release of my pain in purgatory and, over<sup>327</sup> that, for increase of some reward in heaven.

“Mistrust him, Meg, will I not; though I feel me faint, yea, and though I should feel my fear even at

300 Why 301 hesitate; scruple
302 After this line in the 1557 Workes, a marginal note reads: “She toke the othe with this excepcion [:] as farre as would stande with the law of god” (1441).
303 greatly 304 true 305 lasteth

yet: is still in session 306 matter
307 although 308 but that: but (notwithstanding) 309 allow; permit
310 happen 311 Lk 14:28 312 thought 313 thinking out; examining 314 happen to 315 the same 316 the chance...

fortune: it does happen to turn out that way 317 might 318 perhaps 319 benefit 320 so were: it was the case 321 knew 322 would 323 sinfulness 324 such a 325 by doing so 326 in sight: apparently 327 in addition to point to overthrow me too, yet shall I remember how Saint Peter, with a blast of wind, began to sink for his faint faith, and shall do as he did: call upon Christ and pray him to help.<sup>328</sup> And then I trust he shall set his holy hand unto me, and in the stormy seas hold me up from drowning. Yea and if he suffer<sup>329</sup> me to play St. Peter further, and to fall full<sup>330</sup> to the ground and swear and forswear too — which our Lord, for his tender Passion, keep me from, and let me lose if it so fall,<sup>331</sup> and never win thereby — yet after shall I trust that his goodness will cast upon me his tender piteous eye,<sup>332</sup> as he did upon St. Peter, and make me stand up again and confess the truth of my conscience afresh, and abide the shame and harm here of mine own fault.

“And finally, Marget, this wot I well, that without my fault<sup>333</sup> he will not let me be lost. I shall therefore with good hope commit myself wholly to him. And if he suffer me for my faults to perish, yet shall I then serve for a praise of his justice. But in good faith, Meg, I trust that his tender pity shall keep my poor soul safe and make me commend<sup>334</sup> his mercy. And therefore, mine own good daughter, never trouble thy mind for anything that ever shall hap me in this world. Nothing can come but that that<sup>335</sup> God will. And I make me very sure that whatsoever that be, seem it never so bad in sight, it shall indeed be the best. And with this, my good child, I pray you heartily, be you and all your sisters and my sons too comfortable<sup>336</sup> and serviceable to your good mother my wife. And of your good husbands’ minds I have no manner<sup>337</sup> doubt. Commend me to them all, and to my good daughter Alington, and to all my other friends, sisters, nieces, nephews, and allies,<sup>338</sup> and unto all our servants — man, woman, and child — and all my good neighbors, and our acquaintance abroad. And I right heartily pray both you and them to serve God and be merry and rejoice in him. And if anything hap me that you would be loath, pray to God for me, but trouble not yourself, as I shall full heartily pray for us all, that we may meet together once in heaven, where we shall make merry forever, and never have trouble after.”

328 St. Peter... help: Mt 14:30 329 permit; allow 330 fall full: Mt 26:69–75
331 happen 332 cast... eye: Lk 22:61
333 failing, sin 334 praise 335 but that that: except that which 336 encouraging, supporting 337 kind of 338 in-laws
339 Nicholas Wilson: (d. 1548) B.A.

Cambridge (Christ’s College) 1508/9, D.D. 1533, was chaplain and confessor to the King, held Church preferments, and in 1533 was Master of Michaelhouse, Cambridge. In Convocation he was in the minority which thought that the Pope could dispense for the marriage of Henry with his brother’s widow. After two years’ imprisonment in the Tower, he took the oath to the Succession and was released.

340 know 341 partisan 342 of troth: in truth

207. To Dr. Nicholas Wilson

Tower of London, 1534

45

A letter written and sent by Sir T. More to Master Doctor Nicholas Wilson<sup>339</sup> (then both prisoners in the Tower of London) in the year of our Lord God 1534, and in the twenty-sixth year of the reign of King Henry the Eighth. [Workes 1443]

50

Our Lord be your comfort and whereas I perceive by sundry means that you have promised to swear the oath, I beseech our Lord give you thereof good luck. I never gave any man counsel to the contrary in my days nor never used any ways to put any scruple in other folks’ conscience concerning the matter. And whereas I perceive that you would gladly know what I intend to do, you wot<sup>340</sup> well that I told you when we were both abroad that I would therein neither know your mind nor no man’s else, nor you nor no man else should therein know mine, for I would be no part taker<sup>341</sup> with no man nor of troth<sup>342</sup> never I will, but leaving every other man to their own conscience myself will with good grace follow mine. For against mine own to swear were peril of my damnation and what mine own shall be tomorrow myself cannot be sure and whether I shall have finally the grace to do according to mine own conscience or not hangeth in God’s goodness and not in mine, to whom I beseech you heartily remember me in your devout prayers and I shall and daily do remember you in mine, such as they be, and as long as my poor short life shall last, any thing that I have, your part shall be therein.

55

60

65

70

208. To Dr. Nicholas Wilson

Tower of London, 1534

75

Another letter written and sent by Sir Thomas More to Master Doctor Wilson (then both prisoners in the Tower) in the year of our Lord 1534, and in the twenty-sixth year of the reign of King Henry the Eighth. [Workes 1443]

80

Master Wilson in my right hearty wise<sup>343</sup> I recommend me to you.

And very sorry am I to see you — besides the trouble that you be in by this imprisonment with loss of 5 liberty, goods, revenues of your livelihood, and comfort of your friends' company — fallen also into such agony and vexation of mind through doubts falling in your mind that diversely<sup>344</sup> to and fro toss and trouble your conscience to your great heaviness of 10 heart as I (to no little grief of mine own mind for your sake) perceive. And so much am I for you, good Master Doctor, the more sorry for that it lieth not in me to give you such kind of comfort as meseemeth<sup>345</sup> you somewhat desire and look for at mine hand.

For whereas you would somewhat hear of my 15 mind in your doubts, I am a man at this day very little meet<sup>346</sup> therefor. For this you know well, good Master Doctor, that at such time as the matter came in such manner in question as mine opinion
20 was asked therein amongst others and yet you made privy thereunto before me, you remember well that at that time you and I many things talked together thereof. And by all the time after by which I did at the King's gracious commandment both seek out
25 and read and commune<sup>347</sup> with all such as I knew made privy to the matter to perceive what I might therein upon both sides and by indifferent<sup>348</sup> weighing of everything as near as my poor wit and learning would serve to see to which side my conscience could incline and, as my own mind should give me,
30 so to make his Highness report which way myself should hap to think therein. For other commandment had I never of his Grace in good faith, saving that this knot<sup>349</sup> his Highness added thereto that I
35 should therein look first unto God and after God unto him, which word was also the first lesson that his Grace gave me what time I came first into his noble service and neither a more indifferent commandment nor a more gracious lesson could there
40 in my mind never King give his counselor or any his other servant.<sup>350</sup>

But as I began to tell you by all this long time,<sup>351</sup> I cannot now tell how many years, of all those that I talked with of the matter and with whom I most 45 conferred<sup>352</sup> those places of Scripture and of the old holy doctors that touched either the one side or the other, with the councils and laws on either side, that speak thereof also, the most, as I trow you wot<sup>353</sup> well, was yourself. For with no man communed I

50 so much and so often thereof as with you, both for your substantial learning and for your mature judgment, and for that<sup>354</sup> I well perceived ever in you that no man had or lightly could have a more faithful respect unto the King's honor and surety<sup>355</sup> both of body and soul than I ever saw that you had. 55

And yet among many other things which I well liked in you, one specially was that I well perceived in the thing that the King's Grace did put you in trust with,<sup>356</sup> your substantial<sup>357</sup> secret manner. For 60 where I had heard (I wot not now of whom) that you had written his Highness a book of that matter from Paris before, yet in all those years of our long acquaintance and often talking and reasoning upon the thing, I never heard you so much as make
65 once any mention of that book. But else (except<sup>358</sup> there were any other things in that book that you peradventure<sup>359</sup> thought not on) I suppose that all that ever came to your mind, that might in the matter make for the one side or the other comprised<sup>360</sup>
70 either in the Scripture or in the old ancient doctors, I verily<sup>361</sup> think in my mind that you did communicate with<sup>362</sup> me and I likewise with you and at the least wise I remember well that of those points which you call now newly to your remembrance there was none at that time forgotten. 75

I remember well also by your often conference<sup>363</sup> in the matter that by all the time in which I studied about it, you and I were in every point both twain<sup>364</sup> of one opinion and remember well that the laws and councils and the words of Saint Augustine's
80 De civitate Dei and the epistle of Saint Ambrose Ad paternum and the epistle of Saint Basil translated out of Greek and the writing of Saint Gregory you and I read together and over that the places of the Scripture itself both in Leviticus and in the Deuteronomy and in the Gospel and in Saint Paul's epistles<sup>365</sup> and, over<sup>366</sup> this, in that other place of Saint Augustine that you remember now and, beside that, other places of his wherein he properly toucheth<sup>367</sup>
85 the matter expressly with the words of Saint Jerome 90

343 manner 344 in diverse ways 345 it seems to me 346 suitable 347 confer, discuss 348 impartial 349 bond, obligation 350 unless 351 any... servant: any other servant of his 352 by... time: in all this long time 353 compared 354 trow you wot: think you know 355 for that: because 356 security 357 that... with: in which the King's Grace trusted you 358 essentially 359 possibly

360 perceived 361 truly 362 communicate with: impart to 363 action of taking counsel 364 together 365 See Lv 20:21; Dt 25:5; Mk 10; Mt 19; 1 Cor 7; 1 Tim 5:14. 366 in addition to 367 treats and of Saint Chrysostom too, and I cannot now remember of how many more. But I verily think that on your part, and I am very sure that on my part, albeit that<sup>368</sup> it had been peradventure over-5 long to show and read with you every man's book that I read by myself (whereto the parties peradventure that trusted me therewith gave me no leave to show their books further as you peradventure used the like manner with me) yet in good faith as it was 10 of reason my part in that case to do, you and I having both one commandment indifferently<sup>369</sup> to consider the matter, everything of Scripture and of the doctors, I faithfully communed<sup>370</sup> with you and, as I suppose, verily so did you with me too so that of me, 15 good Master Doctor, though I had all the points as ripe in mind now as I had then and had still all the books about me that I then had, and were as willing to meddle<sup>371</sup> in the matter as any man could be, yet could you now no new thing hear of me more than 20 you have, I ween,<sup>372</sup> heard often before nor, I ween, I of you neither.

But now standeth it with me in far other case. For afterward when I had signified unto the King's Highness mine own poor opinion in the matter,
 25 which his Highness very graciously took in good part, and that I saw further progress in the matter wherein to do his Grace service to his pleasure I could not, and anything meddle against his pleasure I would not, I determined utterly with myself to discharge<sup>373</sup> my mind of any further studying or mus-
 30 ing of the matter and thereupon I sent home again such books as I had saving<sup>374</sup> that some I burned by the consent of the owner that was minded<sup>375</sup> as myself was no more to meddle of<sup>376</sup> the matter, and 35 therefore now, good Master Doctor, I could not be sufficient and able to reason those points again though I were minded thereto since many things are out of my mind which I never purpose to look for again nor though I would were never like to find 40 again while I live. Besides this, all that ever I looked for was, you wot well, concerning two or three questions to be pondered and weighed by the study of Scripture and the interpreters of the same, save for somewhat that hath been touched in the same by 45 the canon laws of the Church.

But then were there at that time in the matter other things more, diverse faults found in the bull<sup>377</sup> of the dispensation,<sup>378</sup> by which the King's Council learned in the spiritual law reckoned the bull vicious, partly for untrue suggestion,<sup>379</sup> partly by reason of insufficient suggestion. Now concerning those points I never meddled. For I neither understand the doctors of the law nor well can turn their books. And many things have there since in this great matter grown in question wherein I neither 55 am sufficiently learned in the law nor full informed of the fact, and therefore I am not he that either murmur or grudge,<sup>380</sup> make assertions, hold opinions or keep dispicions<sup>381</sup> in the matter, but like the King's true poor humble subject daily pray for the 60 preservation of his Grace and the Queen's Grace and their noble issue and of all the realm, without harm doing or intending, I thank our Lord, unto any man living.

Finally as touching the oath, the causes for which I refused it, no man wotteth what they be for they be secret in mine own conscience, some other peradventure than those that other men would ween, and such as I never disclosed unto any man yet nor never intend to do while I live. Finally as I said unto you, before the oath offered unto us when we met in London at adventure,<sup>382</sup> I would be no part taker<sup>383</sup> in the matter but for mine own self follow mine own conscience, for which myself must make answer unto God, and shall leave every other man to his own, so say to you still and I dare say further that no more never intended you neither.<sup>384</sup> Many things every man learned<sup>385</sup> wotteth well there are, in which every man is at liberty without peril of damnation to think which way him list<sup>386</sup> till the one part be determined for necessary to be believed by a General Council and I am not he that take upon me to define or determine of what kind or nature everything is that the oath containeth, nor am so bold or presumptuous to blame or dispraise the conscience of 85 other men, their truth nor their learning neither, nor I meddle with no man but of myself, nor of no man's conscience else will I meddle but of mine own. And in mine own conscience I cry God mercy; I find of mine own life, matters enough to think on. 90

368 albeit that: although 369 impartially 370 conferred, discussed 371 concern myself 372 think, suppose 373 dis-burden 374 except 375 disposed 376 in 377 pope's edict, with leaden bulla or seal 378 ecclesiastical license to do what is otherwise forbidden by canon law 379 complaints; accusations

380 grumble 381 disputations 382 by chance 383 partisan 384 no... neither:
 neither did you intend more 385 man learned: learned man 386 desires

I have lived, methinks, a long life and now neither I look nor I long to live much longer. I have since I came in the Tower looked once or twice to have given up my ghost ere<sup>387</sup> this and in good faith mine heart waxed<sup>388</sup> the lighter with hope thereof. Yet forget I not that I have a long reckoning and a great to give account of, but I put my trust in God and in the merits of his bitter Passion, and I beseech him give me and keep me the mind to long to be out of this world and to be with him. For I can never but trust that who so long to be with him shall be welcome to him and on the other side my mind giveth me verily that any that ever shall come to him shall full heartily wish to be with him or<sup>389</sup> ever he shall come at<sup>390</sup> him. And I beseech him heartily to set your heart at such rest and quiet as may be to his pleasure and eternal weal<sup>391</sup> of your soul and so I verily trust that he shortly shall and shall also if it be his pleasure incline the King's noble heart to be gracious and favorable to you and me both, since we be both twain of true faithful mind unto him, whether we be in this matter of one mind both, or of diverse. Sicut divisiones aquarum, ita cor regis in manu Domini, quocumque voluerit, inclinabit illud.<sup>392</sup> And if the pleasure of God be on any of us both otherwise to dispose,<sup>393</sup> I need to give you no counsel nor advice.

But for myself I most humbly beseech him to give me the grace in such wise patiently to conform my mind unto his high pleasure therein, that, after the troublous storm of this my tempestuous time, his great mercy may conduct me into the sure haven of the joyful bliss of heaven, and after at his further pleasure (if I have any) all mine enemies too; for there shall we love together well enough and I thank our Lord for my part so do I here too. Be not angry now though I pray not like for you; you be sure enough I would my friends fare no worse than they, nor yet they, so help me God, no worse than myself.

For our Lord's sake, good Master Wilson, pray for me for I pray for you daily and sometimes when I would be sorry but if I thought you were asleep. Comfort yourself, good Master Doctor, with remembering God's great mercy and the King's accustomed goodness, and by my troth<sup>394</sup> I think that all his Grace's Council favoereth you in their hearts. I cannot judge in my mind any one of them so evil as to be of the mind that you should do otherwise than well. And for conclusion, in God is all. Spes non confundit.<sup>395</sup> I pray you pardon my scribbling for I cannot always so well endure to write as I might sometime. And I pray you when ye see time convenient at your pleasure, send me this rude bill again. Quia quamquam nihil inest mali, tamen propter ministrum nolim rescire.<sup>396</sup>

209. Margaret Roper to More
1534

A letter written and sent by Mistress Margaret Roper, to her father Sir Thomas More then shut up in close prison in the Tower, written in the year of our Lord God 1534, and in the twenty-sixth year of the reign of King Henry the Eighth, answering to a letter which her father had sent unto her. [Workes 1446]

Mine own most entirely beloved father.

I think myself never able to give you sufficient thanks, for the inestimable comfort my poor heart received in the reading of your most loving and godly letter, representing to me the clear shining brightness of your soul, the pure temple of the Holy Spirit of God, which I doubt not shall perpetually rest in you and you in him. Father, if all the world had been given to me, as I be saved, it had been a small pleasure, in comparison of the pleasure I conceived of the treasure of your letter, which though it were written with a coal is worthy in mine opinion to be written in letters of gold.

Father, what moved them to shut you up again, we can nothing hear. But surely I conjecture that when they considered that you were of so temperate mind that you were contented to abide there all your life with such liberty, they thought it were never possible to incline you to their will, except it were by restraining you from the church, and the company of my good mother, your dear wife, and us your children and beadsfolk.<sup>397</sup> But, father, this

<sup>387</sup> given . . . ere: to have died before
<sup>388</sup> grew <sup>389</sup> before <sup>390</sup> to <sup>391</sup> well-being <sup>392</sup> "As the divisions of waters, so the heart of the king is in the hand of God: whithersoever he will, he shall turn it" (Pv 21:1).
<sup>393</sup> both . . . dispose: i.e., to dispose otherwise for either of us <sup>394</sup> faithfulness; truthfulness

<sup>395</sup> "Hope does not disappoint" (Rom 5:5).
<sup>396</sup> "Because, although there is nothing evil [disloyal or treasonous] in it, yet on account of the servant I would not wish them to discover it." George Golde, the Lieutenant's servant, carried letters for prisoners. More wished to keep letters to prove their harmlessness, but Golde said there was no better keeper than the fire and burned them.

<sup>397</sup> people who pray for others

chance was not strange<sup>398</sup> to you. For I shall not forget how you told us, when we were with you in the garden, that these things were like enough to chance shortly after. Father, I have many times rehearsed to 5 mine own comfort, and diverse others, your fashion and words ye had to us when we were last with you: for which I trust, by the grace of God, to be the better while I live, and when I am departed out of this frail life, which, I pray God, I may pass and end in 10 his true obedient service, after the wholesome counsel and fruitful example of living I have had (good father) of you, whom I pray God give me grace to follow, which I shall the better through the assistance of your devout prayers, the special stay<sup>399</sup> of 15 my frailty. Father, I am sorry I have no longer leisure at this time to talk with you, the chief comfort of my life; I trust to have occasion to write again shortly. I trust I have your daily prayer and blessing.

Your most loving obedient daughter and beads-
 20 woman Margaret Roper, which daily and hourly is bound to pray for you, for whom she prayeth in this wise,<sup>400</sup> that our Lord of his infinite mercy give you of his heavenly comfort, and so to assist you with his special grace, that ye never in anything decline 25 from his blessed will, but live and die his true obedient servant. Amen.

210. To Margaret Roper

Tower of London, 1534

A letter written and sent by Sir Thomas More to his 30 daughter Mistress Roper, answering her letter here next before.<sup>401</sup> [Workes 1446]

The Holy Spirit of God be with you.

If I would with my writing, mine own good daughter, declare how much pleasure and comfort 35 your daughterly loving letters were unto me, a peck of coals would not suffice to make me the pens. And other pens have I, good Margaret, none here, and therefore can I write you no long process,<sup>402</sup> nor dare adventure,<sup>403</sup> good daughter, to write often.

40 The cause of my close keeping<sup>404</sup> again did of likelihood grow of my negligent<sup>405</sup> and very plain true word which you remember. And verily<sup>406</sup> where as

my mind gave me (as I told you in the garden) that some such thing were likely to happen, so doth my mind always give me that some folk yet ween<sup>407</sup> 45 that I was not so poor as it appeared in the search, and that it may therefore happen that yet eftsoon offer<sup>408</sup> than once, some new sudden searches may hap to be made in every house of ours as narrowly as is possible. Which thing if ever it so should hap can make but game<sup>409</sup> to us that know the truth of my poverty but if<sup>410</sup> they find out my wife's gay girdle and her golden beads. Howbeit,<sup>411</sup> I verily believe in good faith that the King's Grace of his benign pity will take nothing from her. 55

I thought and yet think that it may be that I was shut up again upon some new causeless suspicion, grown peradventure<sup>412</sup> upon some secret sinister information, whereby some folk haply<sup>413</sup> thought that there should be found out against me some other 60 greater things. But I thank our Lord whensoever this conjecture hath fallen in my mind, the clearness of my conscience hath made my heart hop for joy. For one thing am I very sure of hitherto, and trust in God's mercy to be while I live, that, as often I have said unto you, I shall for anything toward my Prince never take great harm but if I take great wrong, in the sight of God I say, howsoever it shall seem in the sight of men. For to the world, wrong may seem right sometimes by false conjecturing,
 70 sometimes by false witnesses, as that good Lord said unto you, which is I dare say my very good lord in his mind, and said it of very good will. Before the world also, my refusing of this oath is accounted a heinous<sup>414</sup> offense, and my religious fear<sup>415</sup> toward God is called obstinacy toward my Prince. But my lords of the Council, before whom I refused it, might well perceive by the heaviness of my heart appearing well more ways than one unto them that all sturdy stubbornness whereof obstinacy groweth
 80 was very far from my mind. For the clearer proof whereof, since they seemed to take for one argument of obstinacy in me that refusing of the oath, I would not declare the causes why, I offered with a full heavy heart, that albeit<sup>416</sup> I rather would endure
 85 all the pain and peril of the statute than, by declaring of the causes, give any occasion of exasperation unto my most dread Sovereign Lord and Prince, yet,

398 unknown; unfamiliar 399 support 400 way, manner 401 letter... before:
 i.e., her previous letter 402 narrative 403 try 404 strict confinement.

See reasons given by Harpsfield, 174.
 405 careless 406 truly 407 think 408 eftsoon offer: again more often 409 sport 410 but if: unless

411 However 412 perhaps 413 by chance 414 criminal 415 mingled feeling of dread and reverence 416 although rather than his Highness should for not disclosing the causes account me for stubborn and obstinate,

I would upon such his gracious license and commandment as should discharge me of his displeasure 5 and peril of any statute declare those points that let-ted<sup>417</sup> my poor conscience to receive that oath; and would over<sup>418</sup> that be sworn before, that, if I should after the causes disclosed and declared find them so answered as my conscience should think itself 10 satisfied, I would thereupon swear the oath that I there refused. To this, Master Secretary<sup>419</sup> answered me that though the King's Grace gave me such a license, yet it could not discharge me against<sup>420</sup> the statutes in saying anything that were by them upon 15 heinous<sup>421</sup> pains prohibited. In this good warning he showed himself my special tender friend.

And now you see well, Margaret, that it is no obstinacy to leave the causes undeclared, while I could not declare them without peril. But now is 20 it accounted great obstinacy that I refuse the oath, whatsoever my causes be, considering that of so many wiser and better men none sticked<sup>422</sup> thereat.
And Master Secretary of a great zeal that he bore unto me swore there before them a great oath 25 that for the displeasure that he thought the King's Highness would bear me, and the suspicion that his Grace would conceive of me, which would now think in his mind that all the Nun's business was wrought and devised by me, he had liefer<sup>423</sup> than I 30 should have refused the oath that his own only son (which is a goodly young gentleman of whom our Lord send him much joy) had had his head stricken off. This word Margaret, as it was a marvelous declaration of Master Secretary's great good mind and 35 favor toward me, so was it a heavy hearing to me that the King's Grace, my most dread Sovereign Lord, were likely to conceive such high suspicion of me and bear such grievous indignation toward me, for the thing which, without the danger and peril of 40 my poor soul, lay not in my hand to help, nor doth.

Now have I heard since that some say that this obstinate manner of mine in still refusing the oath shall peradventure force and drive the King's Grace to make a further law<sup>424</sup> for me. I cannot let<sup>425</sup> such 45 a law to be made. But I am very sure that if I died by such a law, I should die for that point innocent afore God. And albeit, good daughter, that I think our Lord that "hath the hearts of kings in his hand"<sup>426</sup> would never suffer<sup>427</sup> of his high goodness, so gracious a prince, and so many honorable men, 50 and so many good men as be in the Parliament to make such an unlawful law, as that should be if it so misshaped,<sup>428</sup> yet lest I note that point unthought upon, but many times more than one revolved and cast in my mind before my coming hither, both that 55 peril and all others that might put my body in peril of death by the refusing of this oath. In devising whereupon, albeit, mine own good daughter, that I found myself—I cry God mercy—very sensual<sup>429</sup> and my flesh much more shrinking from pain and 60 from death than methought it the part of a faithful Christian man, in such a case as my conscience gave me, that in the saving of my body should stand the loss of my soul, yet I thank our Lord, that in that conflict the Spirit had in conclusion the mastery, 65 and reason with help of faith finally concluded that for to be put to death wrongfully for doing well (as I am very sure I do, in refusing to swear against mine own conscience, being such as I am not upon peril of my soul bounden to change whether my death 70 should come without law, or by color<sup>430</sup> of a law), it is a case in which a man may lose his head and yet have none harm, but instead of harm inestimable good at the hand of God.

And I thank our Lord, Meg, since I am come 75 hither I set by<sup>431</sup> death every day less than other. For though a man lose of his years in this world, it is more than manifold recompensed by coming the sooner to heaven. And though it be a pain to die while a man is in health, yet see I very few that in 80 sickness die with ease. And finally, very sure am I that whensoever the time shall come that may hap-to come, God wot<sup>432</sup> how soon, in which I should lie sick in my deathbed by nature, I shall then think that God had done much for me, if he had suffered 85 me to die before by the color<sup>433</sup> of such a law. And therefore my reason showeth me, Margaret, that it were great folly for me to be sorry to come to that death, which I would after wish that I had died. Beside that, that a man may hap with less thanks of 90

417 prevented 418 in addition to 419 Thomas Cromwell 420 discharge me against: exempt me from 421 severe 422 hesitated; scrupled 423 rather

424 In November 1534, Parliament did pass new laws. 425 prevent 426 As in Letters 202, 208, and 213, More refers to Prv 21:1.
427 permit; allow 428 misshapened, deformed 429 depending on the senses

only and not on the intellect or spirit 430 by color: under the pretext 431 set by:
value 432 knows 433 pretext

God and more adventure<sup>434</sup> of his soul to die as violently and as painfully by many other chances as by enemies or thieves. And therefore, mine own good daughter, I assure you — thanks be to God — the thinking of any such albeit it hath grieved me ere<sup>435</sup> this, yet at this day grieveth me nothing. And yet I know well for all this mine own frailty, and that Saint Peter which feared it much less than I, fell in such fear soon after that at the word of a simple girl he forsook and forswore<sup>436</sup> our Savior.<sup>437</sup> And therefore am I not, Meg, so mad as to warrant<sup>438</sup> myself to stand. But I shall pray, and I pray thee, mine own good daughter, to pray with me, that it may please God that hath given me this mind, to give me the grace to keep it.

And thus have I, mine own good daughter, disclosed unto you the very secret bottom of my mind, referring the order thereof only to the goodness of God, and that so fully that I assure you, Margaret, on my faith, I never have prayed God to bring me hence nor deliver me from death, but referring all things whole unto his only pleasure, as to him that seeth better what is best for me than myself doth. Nor never longed I since I came hither to set my foot in mine own house, for any desire of or pleasure of my house, but gladly would I sometime somewhat talk with my friends, and specially my wife and you that pertain to my charge. But since that God otherwise disposeth,<sup>439</sup> I commit all wholly to his goodness and take daily great comfort in that I perceive that you live together so charitably and so quietly; I beseech our Lord continue it. And thus, mine own good daughter, putting you finally in remembrance that albeit if the necessity so should require, I thank our Lord in this quiet and comfort is mine heart at this day, and I trust in God's goodness so shall have grace to continue, yet (as I said before) I verily trust that God shall so inspire and govern the King's heart that he shall not suffer his noble heart and courage to requite my true faithful heart and service with such extreme unlawful and uncharitable dealing, only for the displeasure that I cannot think so as others do. But his true subject will I live and die, and truly pray for him will I, both here and in the other world too.

And thus, mine own good daughter, have me recommended to my good bedfellow and all my children, men, women and all, with all your babes and your nurses and all the maids and all the servants, and all our kin, and all our other friends abroad. And I beseech our Lord to save them all and keep them. And I pray you all pray for me, and I shall pray for you all. And take no thought for me whatsoever you shall hap to hear, but be merry in God.

211. To Margaret Roper

Tower of London, 1534

Another letter written and sent by Sir Thomas More (in the year of our Lord 1534 and in the twenty-sixth year of King Henry the Eighth) to his daughter Mistress Roper, answering a letter<sup>440</sup> which she wrote and sent unto him. [Workes 1449]

The Holy Spirit of God be with you.

Your daughterly loving letter, my dearly beloved child, was and is, I faithfully assure you, much more inward comfort unto me than my pen can well express you, for diverse things that I marked therein but of all things most especially for that<sup>441</sup> God of his high goodness giveth you the grace to consider the incomparable difference between the wretched estate of this present life and the wealthy<sup>442</sup> state of the life to come for them that die in God; and to pray God in such a good Christian fashion that it may please him, it doth me good here to rehearse your own words: “of his tender pity so firmly to rest our love in him, with little regard of this world, and so to flee sin and embrace virtue that we may say with Saint Paul, Mibi vivere Christus est et mori luctrum. And this, Cupio dissolui et esse cum Christo.”<sup>443</sup> I beseech our Lord, my dearly beloved daughter, that wholesome prayer that he hath put in your mind, it may like him to give your father the grace daily to remember and pray, and yourself as you have written it even so daily devoutly to kneel and pray it. For surely if God give us that, he giveth us and will give us therewith all that ever we can well wish. And therefore, good Marget, when you pray it, pray it for us both, and I shall on my part the like, in such manner<sup>444</sup> as it shall like our Lord to give me, poor wretch, the grace that likewise as in this wretched world I have been very glad 434 peril 435 before 436 denied

437 Mt 26:69–75 438 pledge
439 ordains 440 Margaret's letter is lost

441 for that: because 442 possessing well-being 443 Phil 1:21, 23: “For me to live is Christ and to die is gain. . . I desire to depart and to be with Christ.” 444 a way of your company and you of mine, and yet would if it might be (as natural charity bindeth the father and the child) so we may rejoice and enjoy each other's company with our other kinsfolk, allies,<sup>445</sup> and 5 friends everlastingly in the glorious bliss of heaven, and in the meantime with good counsel and prayer,

each help other thitherward.

And where you write these words of yourself—
“But good father, I wretch am far, far, farthest of 10 all others from such point of perfection; our Lord send me the grace to amend my life, and continually to have an eye to mine end, without grudge<sup>446</sup> of death, which to them that die in God is the gate of a wealthy life to which God of his infinite 15 mercy bring us all. Amen. Good father, strengthen my frailty with your devout prayers.” The father of heaven mote<sup>447</sup> strengthen thy frailty, my good daughter, and the frailty of thy frail father too.
And let us not doubt but he so will, if we will not 20 be slack in calling upon him therefor. Of my poor prayers, such as they be, ye may be bold to reckon.
For Christian charity and natural love and your very daughterly dealing (funiculo triplici, as saith the Scripture, difficile rumpitur)<sup>448</sup> both bind me and 25 strain me thereto. And of yours I put as little doubt.

That you fear your own frailty, Marget, nothing misliketh me.<sup>449</sup> God give us both twain<sup>450</sup> the grace to despair of our own self, and wholly to depend and hang upon the hope and strength of God.
30 The blessed apostle Saint Paul found such lack of strength in himself that in his own temptation he was fain<sup>451</sup> thrice to call and cry out unto God to take that temptation from him. And yet sped<sup>452</sup> he not of his prayer, in the manner that he required.<sup>453</sup> 35 For God of his high wisdom, seeing that it was (as himself saith) necessary for him to keep him from pride that else he might peradventure<sup>454</sup> have fallen in, would not at his thrice praying, by and by<sup>455</sup> take it from him, but suffered him to be panged<sup>456</sup> in 40 the pain and fear thereof, giving him yet at the last this comfort against his fear of falling: Sufficit tibi gratia mea.<sup>457</sup> By which words it well seemeth that the temptation was so strong (whatsoever kind of temptation it was) that he was very feared of falling, through the feebleness of resisting that he began to feel in himself. Wherefore for his comfort God an-45 swered, Sufficit tibi gratia mea, putting him in surety that were he of himself never so feeble and faint, nor never so likely to fall, yet the grace of God was sufficient to keep him up and make him stand. And our 50 Lord said further, Virtus in infirmitate proficitur.<sup>458</sup>

The more weak that man is, the more is the strength of God in his safeguard declared. And so Saint Paul saith, Omnia possum in eo qui me confortat.<sup>459</sup>

Surely, Meg, a fainter heart than thy frail father 55 hath, canst you not have. And yet I verily<sup>460</sup> trust in the great mercy of God that he shall of his goodness so stay<sup>461</sup> me with his holy hand that he shall not finally suffer me to fall wretchedly from his favor.
And the like trust, dear daughter, in his high good-60 ness I verily conceive of you. And so much the more in that there is neither of us both but that, if we call his benefits to mind and give him oft thanks for them, we may find tokens<sup>462</sup> many to give us good hope for all our manifold offenses toward him, that 65 his great mercy, when we will heartily call therefor, shall not be withdrawn from us. And verily, my dear daughter, in this is my great comfort, that albeit<sup>463</sup>
I am of nature so shrinking from pain that I am almost afeard of a fillip,<sup>464</sup> yet in all the agonies that 70 I have had whereof before my coming hither (as I have showed you ere this), I have had neither small nor few, with heavy fearful heart, forecasting<sup>465</sup> all such perils and painful deaths, as by any manner of possibility might after fall unto me, and in such 75 thought lain long restless and waking, while my wife had weened<sup>466</sup> I had slept, yet in any such fear and heavy pensiveness<sup>467</sup> (I thank the mighty mercy of God), I never in my mind intended to consent that I would for the enduring of the uttermost do 80 any such thing as I should in mine own conscience (for with other men's I am not a man meet<sup>468</sup> to take upon me to meddle) think to be to myself such as should damnably cast me in the displeasure of God. And this is the least point that any man may 85 with his salvation come to, as far as I can see, and is bounden if he see peril to examine his conscience surely by learning and by good counsel and be sure

445 relatives by marriage 446 fear 447 must 448 Eccl 4:12 (“a threefold cord is not quickly broken”) 449 nothing misliketh me: I do not disapprove 450 together 451 obliged 452 succeeded 453 requested

454 possibly 455 straightway 456 afflicted 457 2 Cor 12:7-10 (“My grace is sufficient for you.”) 458 2 Cor 12:9 (“Strength is made perfect in weakness.”) 459 Phil 4:13 (“I can do all things in him who strengthens me.”)

460 truly 461 support 462 signs of divine power 463 although 464 a small tap with the finger 465 imagining beforehand 466 thought 467 thoughtfulness; melancholy 468 fit

that his conscience be such as it may stand with his salvation, or else reform it. And if the matter be such as both the parties may stand with salvation, then on whither<sup>469</sup> side his conscience fall, he is safe 5 enough before God. But that mine own may stand with my own salvation, thereof I thank our Lord I am very sure. I beseech our Lord bring all parts<sup>470</sup> to his bliss.

It is now, my good daughter, late. And therefore 10 thus I commend you to the holy Trinity, to guide you, comfort you and direct you with his Holy Spirit, and all yours and my wife with all my children and all our other friends.

Thomas More, Knight

15 212. Lady More to Henry VIII

<ca. Christmas 1534>

In lamentable wise, beseech your most noble Grace your most humble subjects and continual beadsfolk,<sup>471</sup> the poor miserable wife and children of 20 your true, poor, heavy subject and beadsman Sir Thomas More, Knight, that whereas the same Sir Thomas, being your Grace's prisoner in your Tower of London by the space of eight months and above, in great continual sickness of body and heaviness of 25 heart, during all which space notwithstanding that the same Sir Thomas More had by refusing of the oath forfeited unto your most noble Grace all his goods and cattles<sup>472</sup> and the profit of all his lands, annuities<sup>473</sup> and fees<sup>474</sup> that as well himself as your 30 said beadswoman his wife should live by, yet your most gracious Highness, of your most blessed disposition, suffered<sup>475</sup> your said beadswoman, his poor wife, to retain and keep still his moveable goods and the revenues of his lands to keep her said 35 husband and her poor household with.

So it is now, most gracious Sovereign, that now late,<sup>476</sup> by reason of a new act or twain<sup>477</sup> made in this last past prorogation<sup>478</sup> of your Parliament, not only the said former forfeiture is confirmed, 40 but also the inheritance of all such lands and tenements<sup>479</sup> as the same Sir Thomas had of your most bountiful gift, amounting to the yearly value sixty pounds, is forfeited also. And thus (except your merciful favor be showed) your said poor beadswoman his wife, which brought fair substance<sup>480</sup> to 45 him — which is all spent in your Grace's service — is likely to be utterly undone; and his poor son, one of your said humble suppliants, standing charged and bounden for the payment of great sums of money due by the said Sir Thomas unto your Grace, standeth

 50 in danger to be cast away and undone in this world also. But over all this, the said Sir Thomas himself, after his long true service — to his power<sup>481</sup> diligently done to your Grace — is likely to be in his age and continual sickness, for lack of comfort and good keeping, to be shortly destroyed, to the woe-55 ful heaviness and deadly discomfort of all your said sorrowful suppliants.

In consideration of the premises, for that his offense is grown not of any malice or obstinate mind
 60 but of such a long-continued and deep-rooted scruple as passeth his power to avoid and put away, it may like your most noble Majesty, of your most abundant grace, to remit and pardon your most grievous displeasure to the said Sir Thomas and to
 65 have tender pity and compassion upon his long distress and great heaviness, and, for the tender mercy of God, to deliver him out of prison and suffer him quietly to live the remnant of his life with your 70 said poor beadswoman his wife and other of your poor suppliants his children, with only such entertainment<sup>482</sup> of living as it shall like your most noble Majesty, of your gracious alms and pity, to appoint him. And this in the way of mercy and pity, 75 and all your said poor beadsfolk shall daily during their lives pray to God for the preservation of your most royal estate.

213. To Master Leder

Tower of London, Saturday, 16 January 1534/5

A letter written by Sir Thomas More to one Master Leder,<sup>483</sup> a virtuous priest, the sixteenth day of January 80 in the year of our Lord 1534 after the computation<sup>484</sup>

469 whichever 470 sides in the contention; parties 471 people who pray for others 472 chattels, property 473 annual amounts due from a particular person 474 inheritable estates 475 permitted 476 just recently

477 two 478 the time between sessions of Parliament 479 lands and tenements: real property 480 which . . . substance: who brought to him (when she married him) considerable wealth. Her legal point is that, as a widow, she had independent title to her property, and thus the King is confiscating not only her husband's property, but hers too. 481 to his power: to the extent of his ability 482 provision for support 483 Master Leder seems not otherwise known. 484 reckoning of the Church of England, and in the twenty-sixth year of the reign of King Henry the Eighth. [Workes 1450]

The tale that is reported, albeit<sup>485</sup> I cannot but thank 5 you though you would it were true, yet I thank God it is a very vanity. I trust in the great goodness of God that he shall never suffer it to be true. If my mind had been obstinate indeed, I would not let<sup>486</sup> for any rebuke or worldly shame plainly to confess the truth.
 10 For I purpose not to depend upon the fame of the world. But I thank our Lord that the thing that I do is not for obstinacy but for the salvation of my soul, because I cannot induce mine own mind otherwise to think than I do concerning the oath.

As for other men's consciences, I will be no judge of, nor I never advised any man neither to swear nor to refuse, but as for mine own self if ever I should mishap<sup>487</sup> to receive the oath (which I trust our Lord shall never suffer me), ye may reckon sure that it were expressed and extorted by duresse<sup>488</sup> and hard handling.<sup>489</sup> For as for all the goods of this world, I thank our Lord I set not much more by, than I do by dust.<sup>490</sup> And I trust both that they will use no violent forcible ways and also that, if they would, God would of his grace and the rather a great deal through good folks' prayers give me strength to stand. Fidelis Deus, saith Saint Paul, qui non patitur vos tentari supra id quod potestis ferre, sed
dat cum tentatione proventum ut possitis sustinere.<sup>491</sup>
 For this I am very sure, that if ever I should swear it,
 I should swear deadly against mine own conscience.
 For I am very sure in my mind that I shall never be able to change mine own conscience to the contrary;
 as for other men's, I will not meddle of.

It hath been showed me that I am reckoned willful and obstinate because that since my coming hither I have not written unto the King's Highness and by mine own writing made some suit unto his Grace. But in good faith I do not forbear it of any obstinacy, but rather of a lowly mind and a reverent, because that I see nothing that I could write but that I fear me sore<sup>492</sup> that his Grace were likely rather to take displeasure with me for it than otherwise, while his Grace believeth me not that my conscience is the cause but rather obstinate willfulness.

 But surely that my let<sup>493</sup> is but my conscience, that knoweth God to whose order I commit the whole matter. In cuius manu corda regum sunt.<sup>494</sup> I beseech our Lord that all may prove as true faithful subjects to the King that have sworn as I am in my mind very sure that they be, which have refused to swear.

In haste, the Saturday the sixteenth day of January by the hand of your beadsman,<sup>495</sup>

Thomas More, Knight and prisoner 15

214. To Margaret Roper

Tower of London, 2 or 3 May 1535

A letter written and sent by Sir Thomas More to his daughter Mistress Roper, written the second or third day of May, in the year of our Lord 1535 and in the twenty-seventh year of the reign of King Henry the Eighth. [Workes 1451] 20

Our Lord bless you, my dearly beloved daughter.

I doubt not but by the reason of the councillors resorting hither — in this time (in which our Lord be 25 their comfort) these fathers of the Charterhouse<sup>496</sup> and Master Reynolds<sup>497</sup> of Syon that be now judged to death for treason (whose matters and causes I know not) — may hap to put you in trouble and fear of mind concerning my being here prisoner, specially 30 for that<sup>498</sup> it is not unlikely but that you have heard that I was brought also before the Council here myself. I have thought it necessary to advertise<sup>499</sup> you of the very truth, to the end that you neither conceive more hope than the matter giveth, lest upon other 35 turn it might aggrieve your heaviness,<sup>500</sup> nor more grief and fear than the matter giveth of, on the other side. Wherefore shortly ye shall understand that on 485 although 486 refrain 487 have the misfortune 488 compulsion 489 More feared that he would be tortured.

490 set . . . dust: value them as worth no more than I do value dust 491 1 Cor 10:13: "God is faithful and will not permit you to be tempted beyond your strength, but with the temptation will also give you a way out that you may be able to bear it." 492 greatly 493 hindrance 494 "In his hand are the hearts of kings," alluding to Prv 21:1 495 one who prays for another 496 fathers of the Charterhouse:

 Three Carthusian monks, John Houghton, prior of the London Charterhouse; Robert Lawrence, prior of the Beauvale Charterhouse; and Augustine Weber, prior of our Lady of Melwood Charterhouse. They were all in London to confer about whether to take the oath. When they refused, they were arrested and tried. They were hanged, drawn, and quartered on May 4.

 497 Master Reynolds: Richard Reynolds, a Bridgettine monk of Syon Abbey at Isleworth, near London, was tried and executed with the Carthusians. 498 for that: since 499 warn 500 anxiety, burden

Friday the last day of April in the afternoon, Master Lieutenant<sup>501</sup> came in here unto me and showed me that Master Secretary<sup>502</sup> would speak with me. Whereupon I shifted<sup>503</sup> my gown and went out with 5 Master Lieutenant into the gallery to him, where I met many, some known and some unknown, in the way. And in conclusion coming into the chamber where his Mastership<sup>504</sup> sat with Master Attorney,<sup>505</sup> Master Solicitor,<sup>506</sup> Master Bedyll,<sup>507</sup> and Master 10 Doctor Tregonwell,<sup>508</sup> I was offered to sit with them, which in no wise I would.

Whereupon Master Secretary showed unto me that he doubted not but that I had by such friends as hither had resorted to me seen the new statutes made 15 at the last sitting of the Parliament. Whereunto I answered: “Yea, verily.<sup>509</sup> Howbeit<sup>510</sup> forasmuch as being here, I have no conversation with any people, I thought it little need for me to bestow much time upon them, and therefore I redelivered the book 20 shortly, and the effect of the statutes I never marked nor studied to put in remembrance.” Then he asked me whether I had not read the first statute of them, of the King being head of the Church. Whereunto I answered, “Yes.” Then his Mastership declared unto 25 me that since it was now by Act of Parliament ordained that his Highness and his heirs be, and ever of right have been, and perpetually should be Supreme Head in earth of the Church of England under Christ, the King’s pleasure was that those of his 30 Council there assembled should demand mine opinion, and what my mind was therein. Whereunto I answered that in good faith I had well trusted that the King’s Highness would never have commanded any such question to be demanded of me, considering that I ever from the beginning well and truly 35 from time to time declared my mind unto his Highness, and since that time I had, I said, “unto your Mastership Master Secretary also, both by mouth and by writing. And now I have in good faith discharged my mind of all such matters, and neither 40 will dispute kings’ titles nor popes’, but the King’s true faithful subject I am and will be, and daily I pray for him and for all his, and for you all that are of his honorable Council, and for all the realm, and otherwise than thus I never intend to meddle.”
 45

Whereunto Master Secretary answered that he thought this manner<sup>511</sup> answer should not satisfy nor content the King’s Highness, but that his Grace would exact a more full answer. And his Mastership added thereunto that the King’s Highness was 50 a prince not of rigor, but of mercy and pity, and though that<sup>512</sup> he had found obstinacy at some time in any of his subjects, yet when he should find them at another time conformable and submit themselves, his Grace would show mercy. And that concerning 55 myself, his Highness would be glad to see me take such conformable ways, as<sup>513</sup> I might be abroad in the world again among other men as I have been before.

Whereunto I shortly (after the inward affection<sup>514</sup> of my mind) answered for a very truth that I 60 would never meddle in the world again, to have the world given me. And to the remnant of the matter, I answered in effect as before, showing that I had fully determined with myself neither to study nor 65 meddle with any matter of this world, but that my whole study should be upon the Passion of Christ and mine own passage out of this world.

Upon this I was commanded to go forth for a while, and after called in again. At which time Master Secretary said unto me that though I was prisoner and condemned to perpetual prison, yet I was 70 not thereby discharged of mine obedience and allegiance unto the King’s Highness. And thereupon demanded me whether that I thought that the King’s Grace might exact of me such things as 75 are contained in the statutes, and upon like pains as he might of other men. Whereunto I answered that I would not say the contrary. Whereunto he said that likewise as the King’s Highness would be gracious to them that he found conformable, so his Grace 80 would follow the course of his laws toward such as he shall find obstinate. And his Mastership said further that my demeanor in that matter was of a thing that of likelihood made now other men so 85 stiff therein as they be.

Whereunto I answered that I give no man occasion to hold any point one or other, nor never gave any man advice or counsel therein one way or other. And for conclusion I could no further go, whatsoever pain should come thereof. “I am,” quoth I, “the 90

501 Sir Edmund Walsingham

502 Thomas Cromwell 503 changed

504 his Mastership: Cromwell 505 Sir

Christopher Hales, Attorney-General

506 Richard Rich, Solicitor-General;

his testimony was an important part of More’s treason trial. 507 Thomas Bedyll,

Clerk of the Privy Council 508 Sir

John Tregonwell, member of the Privy Council and head judge of the Court of Admiralty 509 truly 510 However

511 kind of 512 though that: even though

513 such that 514 disposition; emotion;

inclination

King's true faithful subject and daily beadsman<sup>515</sup> and pray for his Highness and all his and all the realm. I do nobody harm, I say none harm, I think none harm, but wish everybody good. And if this 5 be not enough to keep a man alive, in good faith I long not to live. And I am dying already, and have, since I came here, been diverse times in the case that I thought to die within one hour, and I thank our Lord I was never sorry for it, but rather sorry when 10 I saw the pang past. And therefore my poor body is at the King's pleasure; would God my death might do him good."

After this Master Secretary said: "Well ye find no fault in that statute; find you any in any of the other 15 statutes after?" Whereto I answered, "Sir, whatsoever thing should seem to me other than good, in any of the statutes or in that statute either, I would not declare what fault I found, nor speak thereof."
Whereunto finally his Mastership said full gently 20 that of anything that I had spoken, there should none advantage be taken; and whether he said further that there be none to be taken, I am not well remembered. But he said that report should be made unto the King's Highness, and his gracious pleasure 25 known.

Whereupon I was delivered again to Master Lieutenant, which was then called in, and so was I by Master Lieutenant brought again into my chamber, and here am I yet in such case as I was, neither bet-30 ter nor worse. That that<sup>516</sup> shall follow lieth in the hand of God, whom I beseech to put in the King's Grace's mind that thing that may be to his high pleasure, and in mine, to mind only the weal<sup>517</sup> of my soul, with little regard of my body.

And you with all yours, and my wife and all my children and all our other friends both bodily and ghostly,<sup>518</sup> heartily well to fare. And I pray you and all them, pray for me, and take no thought whatsoever shall happen me. For I verily trust in the good-40 ness of God; seem it never so evil to this world, it shall indeed in another world be for the best.

Your loving father,
Thomas More, Knight

215. Lady More to Thomas Cromwell

May 1535

45

Right Honorable, and my especial good Master Secretary.

In my most humble wise I recommend me unto your good Mastership, acknowledging myself to be most deeply bounden to your good Mastership for 50 your manifold goodness and loving favor, both before this time and yet daily now also, showed toward my poor husband and me. I pray almighty God continue your goodness so still, for thereupon hangeth the greatest part of my poor husband's 55 comfort and mine.

The cause of my writing at this time is to certify your especial good Mastership of my great and extreme necessity, which, on and besides the charge of mine own house, do pay weekly 15 shillings for the 60 board-wages of my poor husband and his servant;
for the maintaining whereof, I have been compelled of very necessity to sell part of mine apparel for lack of other substance to make money of. Wherefore my most humble petition and suit to your Master-65 ship at this time is to desire your Mastership's favorable advice and counsel, whether I may be so bold to attend upon the King's most gracious Highness.
I trust there is no doubt in the cause of my imped-70 iment, for the young man, being a ploughman, had been diseased with the ague by the space of three years before that he departed. And besides this, it is now five weeks since he departed, and no other person diseased in the house since that time; wherefore 75 I most humbly beseech your especial good Mastership (as my only trust is, and else know not what to do, but utterly in this world to be undone), for the love of God to consider the premises, and thereupon, of your most abundant goodness, to show 80 your most favorable help to the comforting of my poor husband and me in this our great heaviness,<sup>519</sup> extreme age, and necessity. And thus we, and all ours, shall daily, during our lives, pray to God for the prosperous success of your right honorable 85 dignity.

By your poor continual oratrix,<sup>520</sup> Dame Alice More

<sup>515</sup> one who prays for another <sup>516</sup> That that: That which <sup>517</sup> well-being

<sup>518</sup> spiritually <sup>519</sup> grief; sadness
<sup>520</sup> a female plaintiff or petitioner

216. To Margaret Roper

&lt;Tower of London, 3 June 1535&gt;

Another letter written and sent by Sir Thomas More to his daughter Mistress Roper, written in the year of our Lord 1535, and in the twenty-seventh year of the reign of King Henry the Eighth. [Workes 1452]

Our Lord bless you and all yours.

Forasmuch, dearly beloved daughter, as it is likely that you either have heard or shortly shall hear that the Council was here this day, and that I was before them, I have thought it necessary to send you word how the matter standeth. And verily<sup>521</sup> to be short I perceive little difference between this time and the last, for as far as I can see the whole purpose is either to drive me to say precisely the one way, or else precisely the other.

Here sat my Lord of Canterbury,<sup>522</sup> my Lord Chancellor,<sup>523</sup> my Lord of Suffolk,<sup>524</sup> my Lord of Wiltshire<sup>525</sup> and Master Secretary.<sup>526</sup> And after my coming, Master Secretary made rehearsal<sup>527</sup> in what wise he had reported unto the King's Highness what had been said by his Grace's Council to me, and what had been answered by me to them at mine other being before them last. Which thing his Mastership rehearsed in good faith very well, as I acknowledged and confessed and heartily thanked him therefor. Whereupon he added thereunto that the King's Highness was nothing content nor satisfied with mine answer, but thought that by my demeanor<sup>528</sup> I had been occasion<sup>529</sup> of much grudge<sup>530</sup> and harm in the realm, and that I had an obstinate mind and an evil toward him and that my duty was being his subject, and so he had sent them now in his name upon mine allegiance to command me to make a plain and terminate<sup>531</sup> answer whether I thought the statute lawful or not, and that I should either acknowledge and confess it lawful that his Highness should be Supreme Head of the Church of England or else to utter plainly my malignity.

Whereto I answered that I had no malignity and therefore I could none utter. And as to the matter, I could none other answer make than I had before made, which answer his Mastership had there rehearsed. Very heavy I was that the King's Highness should have any such opinion of me. Howbeit<sup>532</sup> if there were one that had informed his Highness many evil things of me that were untrue, to which his Highness for the time gave credence, I would be very sorry that he should have that opinion of me the space of one day. Howbeit if I were sure that other should come on the morrow by whom his Grace should know the truth of mine innocency, I should in the meanwhile comfort myself with consideration of that. And in like wise now though it be great heaviness<sup>533</sup> to me that his Highness have such opinion of me for the while, yet have I no remedy to help it, but only to comfort myself with this consideration: that I know very well that the time shall come when God shall declare my troth<sup>534</sup> toward his Grace before him and all the world. And whereas it might haply<sup>535</sup> seem to be but small cause of comfort because I might take harm here first in the meanwhile, I thanked God that my case was such in this matter through the clearness of mine own conscience that though I might have pain, I could not have harm, for a man may in such case lose his head and have no harm. For I was very sure that I had no corrupt affection, but that I had always from the beginning truly used<sup>536</sup> myself to looking first upon God and next upon the King according to the lesson that his Highness taught me at my first coming to his noble service, the most virtuous lesson that ever prince taught his servant; whose Highness to have of me such opinion is my great heaviness, but I have no means, as I said, to help it but only comfort myself in the meantime with the hope of that joyful day in which my troth toward him shall well be known. And in this matter further I could not go, nor other answer thereto I could not make.

To this it was said by my Lord Chancellor and Master Secretary both that the King might by his laws compel me to make a plain answer thereto, either the one way or the other.

Whereunto I answered I would not dispute the King's authority, what his Highness might do in such case, but I said that verily under correction<sup>537</sup> it<sup>538</sup> seemed to me somewhat hard. For if it so were

521 truly 522 Archbishop Thomas Cranmer 523 Sir Thomas Audley 524 Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk 525 Thomas Boleyn, Earl of Wiltshire, Lord Privy Seal 526 Thomas

Cromwell 527 made rehearsal: repeated 528 conduct 529 the source; cause 530 discontent; ill will 531 determined, definite 532 However 533 grief 534 faithfulness; truthfulness

535 perhaps 536 accustomed, trained 537 under correction: subject to punishment 538 swearing the oath that my conscience gave me against the statutes (wherein how my mind giveth me I make no declaration), then I nothing doing nor nothing saying against the statute it were a very hard thing to 5 compel me to say either precisely with it, against my conscience to the loss of my soul, or precisely against it to the destruction of my body.

To this Master Secretary said that I had ere<sup>539</sup> this, when I was chancellor, examined heretics and thieves and other malefactors, and gave me a great 10 praise (above my deserving) in that behalf. And he said that I then (as he thought, and at the leastwise bishops) did use to examine heretics whether they believed the pope to be head of the Church,
 15 and used to compel them to make a precise answer thereto. And why should not then the King, since it is a law made here that his Grace is head of the Church, here compel men to answer precisely to the law here as they did then concerning the pope.

I answered and said that I protested that I intended not to defend any part or stand in contention, but I said there was a difference between those 20 two cases because that at that time, as well here as elsewhere through the corps<sup>540</sup> of Christendom, the pope's power was recognized for an undoubted thing which seemeth not like a thing agreed in this realm and the contrary taken for truth in other
 25 realms; whereunto Master Secretary answered that they were as well burned for the denying of that as they be beheaded for denying of this, and therefore 30 as good reason to compel them to make precise answer to the one as to the other.

Whereunto I answered that since in this case a man is not by a law of one realm so bound in his 35 conscience where there is a law of the whole corps of Christendom to the contrary in matter touching belief, as he is by a law of the whole corps though there hap to be made in some place a law local to the contrary, the reasonableness or the unreason-40 ableness in binding a man to precise answer standeth not in the respect<sup>541</sup> or difference between heading<sup>542</sup> or burning, but, because of the difference in charge of conscience, the difference standeth between heading and hell.

Much was there answered unto this both by Master Secretary and my Lord Chancellor, overlong to rehearse. And in conclusion they offered me an oath by which I should be sworn to make true answer to such things as should be asked me on the 50 King's behalf, concerning the King's own person.

Whereunto I answered that verily I never purposed<sup>543</sup> to swear any book oath<sup>544</sup> more while I lived. Then they said that was very obstinate if I would refuse that, for every man doth it in the Star Chamber and 55 everywhere. I said that was true, but I had not so little foresight but that I might well conjecture what should be part of my interrogatory, and as good it was to refuse it at the first as afterward.

Whereunto my Lord Chancellor answered that he thought I guessed truth, for I should see them; and 60 so they were showed me, and they were but twain:<sup>545</sup> the first whether I had seen the statute; the other whether I believed that it were a lawful made interrogatory or not. Whereupon I refused the oath and said further by mouth that the first I had before 65 confessed, and to the second I would make none answer.

Which was the end of the communication and I was thereupon sent away. In the communication before, it was said that it was marveled that I stuck so 70 much in my conscience while at the uttermost<sup>546</sup> I was not sure therein. Whereunto I said that I was very sure that mine own conscience, so informed as it is by such diligence as I have so long taken therein, may stand with mine own salvation. I meddle not with 75 the conscience of them that think otherwise; every man suo domino stat et cadit.<sup>547</sup> I am no man's judge. It was also said unto me that if I had as lief<sup>548</sup> be out of the world as in it, as I had there said, why did I not speak even out plain against the statute? It appeared well I was not content to die though I said
 80 so. Whereunto I answered, as the truth is, that I have not been a man of such holy living as I might be bold to offer myself to death, lest God for my presumption might suffer<sup>549</sup> me to fall, and therefore I put not myself forward, but draw back. Howbeit if God
 85 draw me to it himself, then trust I in his great mercy that he shall not fail to give me grace and strength.

In conclusion Master Secretary said that he liked me this day much worse than he did the last time, for then he said he pitied me much, and now he 90 thought that I meant not well; but God and I know both that I mean well and so I pray God do by me.<sup>550</sup>

539 before 540 body 541 point, consideration 542 beheading 543 intended 544 book oath: an oath sworn on the Bible

545 two 546 at the uttermost: in the end 547 suo . . . cadit: "before his own lord he stands and falls" (Rom 14: 4) 548 had as

lief: were as willing to 549 permit; allow 550 so . . . do by me: so deal with me

I pray you, be you and mine other friends of good cheer whatsoever fall of me, and take no thought for me but pray for me as I do and shall do for you and all them.

5                                   Your tender loving father,
  Thomas More, Knight

217. To Antonio Bonvisi

Tower of London, 1535

10 Sir Thomas More, a little before he was arraigned, was condemned (in the year of our Lord 1535, and in the twenty-seventh year of the reign of King Henry the Eighth), being shut up so close in prison in the Tower that he had no pen nor ink, wrote with a coal an epistle in Latin to Master Anthony Bonvisi (merchant of Lucca and then dwelling in London), his old and dear friend, and sent it unto him, the copy whereof here followeth. [Workes 1455]

To the most friendly of friends, and deservedly dearest to me, greetings.<sup>551</sup>

20       Since my mind has a presentiment (perhaps a false one, but still a presentiment) that before very long I will be unable to write to you, I have decided, while I may, to show by this little letter, at least, how much I am refreshed by the pleasantness of your 25       friendship now that fortune has abandoned me.

To be sure, most excellent sir, in the past I have always been wonderfully delighted by this love of yours for me, but when I remembered that for almost forty years now I have been, not a guest, but 30       a continual habitué of the Bonvisi household, and that in all this time I have not proven to be a friend in repaying my debt to you, but only a barren lover, my sense of shame truly made that genuine sweetness, which I otherwise enjoyed in thinking about 35       the friendship of the Bonvisis, turn a little bit sour because I felt somehow awkward and ashamed, as if I had neglected to do my part. But certainly I now console myself with the thought that there never arose any opportunity for me to pay you back, since 40       your fortune was so large that there was no way left for me to do anything for you. And so I am aware that I did not fail to pay you back through any neglect of my duty toward you, but because there was no opportunity. But now that even the hope of recompense is taken away, when I see you persist in loving and obliging me, nay rather, when I see you 45       push on in your friendship and run the race unwearyed, so that few men court their fortunate friends as much as you favor, love, cherish, and regard your

50       More — overthrown as he is, cast aside, struck down, and sentenced to prison — then I not only absolve myself from whatever bitter shame I felt before but also find peace in the sweetness of this wonderful
55       friendship of yours. And my good fortune in having such a faithful friend as you seems somehow — I don't know how — almost to counterbalance this 60       unfortunate shipwreck of my fleet. Certainly, apart from the indignation of the Prince, whom I love no less than I ought to fear him, for the rest, your friendship almost outweighs my losses, since they, after all,
65       are to be counted among the evils of fortune.

But if I were to count the possession of such a constant friendship — which such an unfavorable fall of fortune has not snatched away, but rather cemented more strongly — among the fleeting goods
70       of fortune, truly I should be out of my mind. For the happiness of a friendship so faithful, and so constant against the contrary blast of fortune, is a rare favor, and without a doubt is a higher good, and a more
75       exalted one, arising from a certain special loving-kindness of God. Certainly I do not otherwise accept or understand it than as something arranged by the unparalleled mercy of God, that among my 80       poor little friends, a person such as you, so great a friend, was prepared so long beforehand, who might assuage and lighten by your consolation a great part
85       of that distress which the weight of fortune rushing headlong against me has brought upon me. Therefore, my dear Antonio, dearest of all mortals to me, with all my strength I pray (the only thing I can do) to Almighty God, who provided you for me, that, since he gave you such a debtor, who will never be 90       able to discharge his debt, he himself for his loving-kindness vouchsafe to requite you for those deeds of kindness of yours which you daily expend so profusely upon me; then that he bring us, for his great mercy, from this wretched and stormy world to his peace, where there will be no need for letters, where no wall will separate us, where no porter will prevent us from talking together, but with God the Father 95       and Redeemer Jesus Christ, and the Holy Spirit of them both, the Comforter proceeding from them both, we shall fully enjoy eternal joy. Meanwhile may Almighty God bring it about that you, my dear Antonio, and I, and would that all mortals, and everyone everywhere, may hold cheap all the riches of this world, all the glory of the whole universe, and even the sweetness of life itself, for the ardent desire of that joy. Most trusty of all friends, and most beloved by me, and (as I am now long accustomed to call you) the apple of my eye: goodbye. May Christ keep unharmed your whole household, so very like the head of the family in their affection for me.

T. More: If I put down “yours,” I’ll have done so in vain. For you cannot now not know this, when you have bought it by so many deeds of kindness. Nor am I now such, that it matters whose I am.

218. To Margaret Roper

Tower of London, 5 July 1535

Sir Thomas More was beheaded at the Tower Hill in London, on Tuesday the sixth day of July in the year of our Lord 1535, and in the twenty-seventh year of the reign of King Henry the Eighth. And on the day next before, being Monday and the fifth day of July, he wrote with a coal<sup>552</sup> a letter to his daughter Mistress Roper, and sent it to her (which was the last thing that ever he wrote). The copy whereof here followeth. [Workes 1457]

Our Lord bless you, good daughter, and your good husband and your little boy and all yours and all my children and all my godchildren and all our friends. Recommend<sup>553</sup> me when you may to my good daughter Cecily,<sup>554</sup> whom I beseech our Lord to comfort, and I send her my blessing and to all her children and pray her to pray for me. I send her a handkerchief and God comfort my good son her husband. My good daughter Daunce<sup>555</sup> hath the picture in parchment that you delivered me from my Lady Conyers; her name is on the back side. Show her that I heartily pray her that you may send it in my name to her again for a token from me to pray for me.

I like special<sup>556</sup> well Dorothy Coly;<sup>557</sup> I pray you be good unto her. I would wit<sup>558</sup> whether this be she that you wrote me of. If not, I pray you be good to the other as you may in her affliction and to my good daughter Joan Aleyn<sup>559</sup> to give her I pray you some kind answer, for she sued<sup>560</sup> hither to me this day to pray you be good to her.

I cumber<sup>561</sup> you, good Margaret, much but I would be sorry if it should be any longer than tomorrow, for it is Saint Thomas Even and the Utas of Saint Peter<sup>562</sup> and therefore tomorrow long I to go to God; it were a day very meet and convenient<sup>563</sup> for me. I never liked your manner toward me better than when<sup>564</sup> you kissed me last for I love when daughterly love and dear charity hath no leisure to look to worldly courtesy.

Farewell, my dear child, and pray for me, and I shall for you and all your friends that we may merrily meet in heaven. I thank you for your great cost.

I send now unto my good daughter Clement<sup>565</sup> her algorism stone<sup>566</sup> and I send her and my good son and all hers God’s blessing and mine.

I pray you at time convenient recommend me to my good son John More.<sup>567</sup> I liked well his natural fashion. Our Lord bless him and his good wife, my loving daughter,<sup>568</sup> to whom I pray him be good, as he hath great cause, and that if the land of mine come to his hand, he break not my will concerning his sister Daunce. And our Lord bless Thomas and Austen<sup>569</sup> and all that they shall have.

<sup>552</sup> charcoal pencil <sup>553</sup> commend

<sup>554</sup> Cecily (1507–39 [?]) was More’s third and youngest daughter, who married in 1525 Giles Heron, wealthy heir of Sir John Heron, treasurer of the chamber of Henry VIII. He was a member of Parliament, but was later attainted by Parliament for treason in 1540 and hung, drawn, and quartered—his lands going to Cromwell and Rich. Giles had brought the message about the fire at Chelsea; More was his ward from 1522 to 1525, and gave a judgment against him in court. <sup>555</sup> Elizabeth (1506–64), More’s second daughter, married William Daunce, son of Sir John Daunce, Knight of the Body to Henry VIII, in 1525.

<sup>556</sup> specially <sup>557</sup> Margaret Roper’s maid. Margaret sent her to the Tower every day during More’s imprisonment, often with gifts. She married John Harris, More’s secretary. Together they preserved many of More’s letters and took them to the Low Countries in their exile. <sup>558</sup> know <sup>559</sup> Another of Margaret Roper’s maids. She had been educated in More’s “School” and so is called “daughter.” <sup>560</sup> appealed <sup>561</sup> trouble <sup>562</sup> The eve of the translation of the relics of St. Thomas of Canterbury (Becket), kept in England on July 7, octave of the feast of St. Peter,

June 29. <sup>563</sup> meet and convenient:

fitting and appropriate <sup>564</sup> when she embraced her father on Tower Wharf, on his return from Westminster Hall after conviction and sentence <sup>565</sup> Margaret Giggs, his foster daughter, now wife of John Clement. The algorism stone was for arithmetic—undoubtedly a slate, needed when he had few writing materials in prison. <sup>566</sup> algorism stone: a counter used to perform calculations <sup>567</sup> John More had knelt to ask his father’s blessing when he came from judgment. <sup>568</sup> Anne Cresacre <sup>569</sup> Thomas and Austen: the children of John More and Anne Cresacre

Gybe me thy gran god lord
Ad primam de. v. Maria. Fo. xvij.

Deus in adiutorium meum intende.
Domine ad adiuuandum me festina.
Gloria patri et filio: et spiritui sancto.
Sicut erat in prim. &c. Hymnus.
Sax. • c j

to see the world at nought

In More's own hand at the top and bottom of this page of his prayer book are the first two lines of his "Godly Meditation," written while imprisoned in the Tower of London, 1534-35.

Instructions, Meditations, and Prayers

made and collected by Sir Thomas More, Knight,
while he was prisoner in the Tower

Our major source for this collection and for their individual titles is the 1557 Workes, except for “A Godly Meditation.” That most famous prayer we have written in More’s own hand in the upper and lower margins of his prayer book, along with almost 400 of his marginal markings that include 151 written comments, 161 lines, and 71 staves that look like musical notes. (See the facing and following pages for examples.) That prayer book, composed of More’s Book of Hours and his Psalter, is in the Beinecke Library at Yale University, and a facsimile of its annotated pages was published as Thomas More’s Prayer Book (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1969) with transcription, translation, and introduction by Louis L. Martz and Richard S. Sylvester.

Each “Godly Instruction” is just that: a surprisingly impersonal, even light-heartedly logical, presentation of principles. Neither impersonal nor devoid of emotion is “Imploring Divine Help against Temptation.” This is an intricately constructed “cento prayer,” that is, a “unified prayer consisting of psalm verses” (CW 13: cliii)—a traditional prayer that Antony refers to in A Dialogue of Comfort against Tribulation when he recommends to Vincent that “special verses . . . be drawn out of the Psalter” in times of great spiritual need. This cento prayer, although in Latin, was considered to be so important by More’s early editors that it was first published in the collection of More’s English writings, the 1557 Workes of Sir Thomas More Knight, and then in the 1565, 1566, and 1689 Opera Omnia. Adding to the psalmist’s fluctuations of emotion are More’s own marginal comments in his psalter.

The most recent and detailed editor of this complex prayer, Garry E. Haupt, suggests that “More’s Psalter marginalia . . . are an integral part of [More’s] meditation” (CW 13: 302), and so this corresponding marginalia is included in square brackets in the pages that follow.

The last prayer More wrote was “A Devout Prayer before Death”—at least according to the 1557 editorial note, which dates it between More’s trial on July 1 and his execution by beheading on Tower Hill July 6, 1535. More was expecting to suffer the harshest of deaths. According to the official court account, he was to “be dragged through the midst of the city of London directly to the gallows of Tyburn and hanged upon those gallows, and while alive be cast upon the earth and his entrails be taken from his belly and burned, with him still alive, and his head be struck off and his body divided into four parts, and his head and quarters be placed where the Lord King shall wish to assign them.” When that harsh and public death was commuted to the less public and less painful beheading is not known, but it was on July 5 that Henry VIII signed the official execution warrant. On July 5 More wrote Letter 218 to his daughter Margaret, expressing his desire to die the next day, an anniversary honoring Saint Thomas Becket. At his execution the following day, according to the Paris Newsletter of August 4, 1535, “he asked those present to pray to God for him and he would do the same for them. He then besought them earnestly to pray to God to give the King good counsel, protesting that he died his good servant, and God’s first [son bon serviteur et de Dieu premierement].”

CONTENTS

A Godly Instruction [on Not Bearing Malice or Ill Will] . . . . .	1339
A Godly Instruction [on Whether to Save One’s Life] . . . . .	1339
Imploring Divine Help against Temptation . . . . .	1342
A Godly Meditation . . . . .	1349
A Devout Prayer before Death . . . . .	1350

Ad sextam de cruce.

Dia sexta tes-sus est cruci cōclauatus. Atq; cum latronibus pendens deputatus. Pre tormentis sitiens felle saturatus. Agn<sup>9</sup> crimen diluit sic iudifi-catus. Ps. Adoram<sup>9</sup> te chryste; et benedici-mus tibi. Rz. Quia per sanctam crucem
tuam redemisti mū-

dum. Oramus.

Oratio.

Domine iesu chryste fili dei vtut: pone passionē crucē et mortē tuā inter iudiciū tuū & aīas nostras nunc & in hora mor-tis nostre; et largiri digneris vīuis misericordiā et gratiā / defunctis requiē et veniā / ecclesie tue pacē et concorā / et nobis pctōri-bus vitā & gloriā sempiternā. Qui cū patre et spū sancto vīuis et regnas deus. Per oīa secula seculor. Amē. O loziosa passio dñi nostri iesu xpī eruat nos a dolore tristi / & pdu-cat nos ad gaudia paradisi. Amē. Pater no- ster. Aue maria gratia.

for the brethren of Joseph could not be had some Eg. in the good with their love & faith as they did begin with their malice ward.

This page of More's prayer book shows, in More's own hand, lines 48-52 of "A Godly Meditation."

Instructions, Meditations, and Prayers

made and collected by Sir Thomas More, Knight,
while he was prisoner in the Tower

A GODLY INSTRUCTION

5 written by Sir Thomas More, Knight, within a while after he was prisoner in the Tower of London, in the year of our Lord 1534

Bear no malice nor evil will to no man living. For either the man is good or naught.<sup>1</sup> If he be good, and I hate him, then am I naught.

If he be naught, either he shall amend and die good and go to God, or abide<sup>2</sup> naught and die naught and go the devil. And then let me remember that if he shall be saved, he shall not fail (if I be saved too, as I trust to be) to love me very heartily, and I shall then in like wise love him.

And why should I now then hate one for this while<sup>3</sup> which shall hereafter love me for evermore, and why should I be now, then, enemy to him with whom I shall in time coming be coupled in eternal friendship? And on the other side, if he shall continue naught and be damned, then is there so outrageous eternal sorrow toward<sup>4</sup> him that I may well think myself a deadly cruel wretch if I would not now rather pity his pain than malign his person. If one would say that we may well with good conscience wish an evil man harm, lest he should do harm to such other folk as are innocent and good, I will not now dispute upon that point, for that root hath more branches to be well weighed and considered than I can now conveniently write (having none other pen than a coal). But verily thus will I say that I will give counsel to every good friend of mine, but if<sup>5</sup> he be put in such a room<sup>6</sup> as to punish an evil man lieth<sup>7</sup> in his charge by reason of his office, else leave the desire of punishing unto God and unto such other folk as are so grounded in charity, and so fast cleave to God, that no secret shrewd<sup>8</sup> cruel affection,<sup>9</sup> under the cloak of a just and a virtuous zeal, can creep in and undermine them. But let us that are no better than men of a mean<sup>10</sup> sort ever pray for such merciful amendment in other folk as our own conscience showeth us that we have need in ourselves.

A GODLY INSTRUCTION

45 *written in Latin<sup>11</sup> by Sir Thomas More, Knight, while he was prisoner in the Tower of London,
in the year of our Lord 1534*

Whosoever so saveth his life that he displeaseth God thereby shall soon after, to his no little grief, full sore<sup>12</sup> mislike the same. For if thou so savest thy life, thou shalt on the morrow so deadly hate thy life that at the heart full heavy<sup>13</sup> shalt thou be that the day before thou didst not lose thy life. For that certainly die thou must, shalt thou full surely<sup>14</sup> remember; but how, or how soon, that wottest<sup>15</sup> thou not at all. And just cause hast thou to fear lest upon the such delay of that death may haply<sup>16</sup> ensue the everlasting torments in hell, where “men shall sore long to die, and death shall flee from them,”<sup>17</sup> whereas by the enduring of that death which thou so much abhorrest, there should have undoubtedly followed the everlasting joys of heaven.

What folly is it for thee, then, to avoid this temporal death as thereby to fall in peril to purchase thyself eternal death? And yet therewith not to escape thy temporal death, but perhaps for a while only to delay thy death.

For put case thou mightest for that while eschew<sup>18</sup> the danger of death. Art thou sure, therefore, either to continue thy life forever, or at another time to die and feel no pain? Nay, rather it may fortune<sup>19</sup> to fare with thee as it fared with the rich man that assuredly reckoned himself to live full many a year — to whom Christ said, “This night, thou fool, shall

1 wicked 2 remain 3 period of time
4 facing 5 but if; unless 6 office, position 7 who lieth 8 malicious, wicked 9 inclination 10 mediocre;

common; poor 11 The translation that follows appeared in the 1557 Workes.
12 full sore: very greatly 13 sorry 14 full surely: with complete certainty 15 wottest thou: you know 16 perhaps 17 Rv 9:6 18 escape; avoid 19 happen

they bereave thee of thy life.”<sup>20</sup> And again, this art thou well assured of: that both die once thou shalt and also (for that<sup>21</sup> so shortly man’s life here passeth away) that long here live thou canst not.

5 Finally hereof,<sup>22</sup> as I suppose, doubtest thou never a deal:<sup>23</sup> that when the time shall come in which thou shalt lie sick on thy deathbed, and therewith begin to feel the painful pangs of death so dreadfully<sup>24</sup> drawing on, then wilt thou heartily wish, for the saving of thy soul, thou hadst died a most sharp and cruel death many a day before. Then cause hast thou none, pardie,<sup>25</sup> so sore<sup>26</sup> to fear that thing to fall which, as thou knowest thyself right well, thou wouldst within a while after have wished to have fallen unto thee before. Whosoever suffer any trouble or adversity, according to the will of God, must wholly commit their souls into the hands of God, their trusty and faithful Creator. “Be not discouraged, my well-beloved brethren,” saith Saint Peter, “by reason of the extreme persecution that is amongst you (which is sent you for a proof<sup>27</sup> of your patience), as though some strange thing were befallen unto you; but inasmuch as ye be partakers<sup>28</sup> of Christ’s pains and Passion, full heartily rejoice, that thou mayest likewise rejoice at the revelation of his glory.”<sup>29</sup>

Well may good men be ashamed to have less courage to do good than evil men have to do evil. For a man may hear thieves not let<sup>30</sup> to say that he hath a faint stomach<sup>31</sup> that will stick<sup>32</sup> for half an hour’s hanging to live seven years in pleasure. And what a shame were it then for a Christian man to be content rather to lose the life and bliss everlasting than suffer a short death somewhat before his time— which he is so well assured that needs suffer he shall, and that within a while after and, but if<sup>33</sup> he repent him in time, straight upon his temporal death fall into eternal death, and the same so horrible and painful that it far exceedeth all other kinds of death.

40 If it were possible for a man, with his corporeal eyes, to behold one of those grisly fiends which in so great a number daily look and long for us in hell forever to torment us: the fear of him alone would make him not to regard a rush<sup>34</sup> all the terrible threats that any man could imagine. And how much less would he regard them, then, if he might possibly see heaven open and Jesus Christ there standing, as did the blessed Saint Stephen?<sup>35</sup>

“Your adversary the devil,” saith Saint Peter, “like a roaring lion runneth about, seeking whom he may devour.”<sup>36</sup> But hark what Saint Bernard saith:<sup>37</sup> “I humbly thank that mighty Lion of the tribe of Judah; well roar may this lion, but bite me he cannot. Threateneth he us never so much, let us not be such beastly cowards that for his only<sup>38</sup> rude roaring, we fall down flat to the ground.

“For a very beast is he, and hath no reason indeed, which<sup>39</sup> is either so feeble-spirited that for fear alone giveth over, or so discomfited upon a vain imagination of the pains that he may hap to suffer, that at the bare blast of the trumpet, before the battle begin, he is quite and clean overthrown, without any stroke at all.

“Ye have not resisted as yet to the shedding of your blood,<sup>40</sup> saith that valiant Captain, which knew right well that the roaring of this lion was nothing to be passed on.<sup>41</sup> And another saith, ‘Stand stiff against the devil, and he will flee from you.’”<sup>42</sup>

Stand stiff, I say, with a “strong and steadfast faith”;<sup>43</sup> for Isaiah giveth us warning<sup>44</sup> before that “they that, having no hope of God’s help, fly for succor to man’s help, shall both themselves and their helpers with them come to utter confusion.”<sup>45</sup>

So came King Saul to naught,<sup>46</sup> who, because he was not by and by<sup>47</sup> of God heard at his pleasure, murmured, grugged<sup>48</sup> and distrusted God and so fell in conclusion to seek counsel of a witch— whereas for the punishment of all witches, he himself had given generally<sup>49</sup> so precise<sup>50</sup> commandment before.<sup>51</sup> My firm hope is that he which<sup>52</sup> so dearly bought<sup>53</sup> me will not, without mine own damnable fault, lose me to his most malicious enemy.<sup>54</sup>

20 Lk 12:20 21 for that: because 22 of this 23 a bit 24 fearfully 25 “by God” (from the French); certainly 26 greatly 27 testing 28 sharers 29 1 Pt 4:12–13 30 hesitate 31 spirit, courage 32 hesitate 33 but if: unless 34 regard a rush: attach a straw’s worth of importance to 35 Acts 7:55–56 36 1 Pt

5:8 37 These next paragraphs are from Saint Bernard’s thirteenth sermon on Psalm 90(91). 38 for his only: just because of his 39 who 40 Heb 12:4 41 passed on: paid any attention to 42 Jas 4:7 43 1 Pt 5:9 44 Is 31:1, 3 45 confusion: ruin, destruction 46 wickedness 47 immediately 48 grumbled, complained 49 all inclusive, without exception 50 strict 51 1 Chr 10:13–14 52 who 53 so dearly bought: at such great cost ransomed or redeemed. See 1 Cor 6:20. 54 This concluding sentence follows the Latin prayer in Works, p. 1407.

Intrōibo in domū tuā : adorabo ad tem-plum sanctum tuum in timore tuo.
Dñe deduc me in iusticia tua ppter inimicos meos: dirige in cōspectu tuo viā meā.
Quoniam non est in ore eorum veritas :
 cor eorum vanum est.
Sepulchri patēs est guttur eorū linguīs suis dolose agebant: iudica illos deus.
Decidāt a cogitationibus suis : secundū multitudinem impietatum eorum expelle eos / quoniam irritauerunt te domine.
Et letentur omnes qui sperant in te : ineternum exultabunt et habitabis in eis.
Et gloriabuntur in te omnes qui diligūt nomen tuum: quoniam tu bñdices iusto.
Dñe vt scuto bone voluntatis tue : cornasti nos. Gloria patri. Psalmus. vj.
Domine ne in furore tuo arguas me:
 neq; in ira tua corripas me.
 a. iij.

contra insidias demonum

imploratio venie pro peccatis

ad matu. s. noct. Fo. iij.

Per Aduentū. Post epyphaniā.

Et ipse. Dñe deus meus. Domine.
 Per estatem.

De' me' Iuste de'. Dñe de' me' ps vj.

Domine deus meus in te sperant: saluum me fac ex omnibus persequentibus me et libera me.
 Neq; rapiat vt leo aſam meā:
 dñi non est q; repinat neq; qui saluū faciat.
 Domine deus meus si feci istud: si est iniquitas in manibus meis.
 Si reddidi retributibus michi mala: decidam merito ab inimicis meis inanis.
 Persequatur inimicus animam meam cōprehendat: & cōculcet in terra vitā meā

contra spiritalis
nequitias

These are two pages from Thomas More's Psalter, showing his marginalia.
 Next to Ps 5:11, More writes: contra insidias demonum ("against the snares of the devil")
 Next to Ps 6:2: Imploratio venie pro peccatis ("a prayer imploring pardon for one's sins")
 Next to Ps 7:2: contra spirituales nequitias ("against the spiritual hosts of wickedness")

IMPLORING DIVINE HELP AGAINST TEMPTATION WHILE SCORNING DEMONS THROUGH HOPE AND CONFIDENCE IN GOD

5 A devout prayer collected out of the Psalms of David by Sir Thomas More Knight, while a prisoner in the Tower of London

PSALM 3

Why, O Lord, are they multiplied that afflict me?
10 Many are they who rise up against me.<sup>55</sup>
Many say to my soul, "There is no salvation for him in his God."
But thou, O Lord, art my protector, my glory, and the lifter up of my head.
15 I have slept and taken my rest, and I have risen up, because the Lord hath protected me.<sup>56</sup>
I will not fear thousands of the people, surrounding me. Arise, O Lord; save me, O my God.<sup>57</sup>

PSALM 5

20 Conduct me, O Lord, in thy justice; because of my enemies, direct my way in thy sight.
For there is no truth in their mouth; their heart is vain.
Their throat is an open sepulchre; judge them,
25 O God.
Let them fall from their devices; according to the multitude of their wickedness cast them out, for they have provoked thee, O Lord.
But let all them be glad that hope in thee; they 30 shall rejoice forever, and thou shalt dwell in them.
O Lord, thou hast crowned us, as with a shield of thy good will.<sup>58</sup>

PSALM 7

35 O Lord my God, in thee have I put my trust; save me from all them that persecute me, and deliver
me.<sup>59</sup>
Lest at any time he seize upon my soul like a lion, while there is no one to redeem me, nor to save.

Rise up, O Lord, in thy anger, and be thou exalted 40 in the borders of my enemies.<sup>60</sup>

The enemy pursues<sup>61</sup> my soul; let them take it, and tread down my life on the earth, and bring down my glory to the dust.

He hath bent his bow and made it ready. And in it 45 he hath prepared the instruments of death; he hath made ready his arrows for them that burn.
Behold, he hath been in labor with injustice; he hath conceived sorrow, and brought forth iniquity. 50

He hath opened a pit and dug it, and he is fallen into the hole he made.<sup>62</sup>

His sorrow shall be turned on his own head, and his iniquity shall come down upon his crown.

I will give glory to the Lord according to his jus- 55
tice, and will sing to the name of the Lord, the most high.<sup>63</sup>

PSALM 4

In peace, in the selfsame, I will sleep and I will rest.
For thou, O Lord, singularly hast settled me in 60 hope.<sup>64</sup>

PSALM 9

Have mercy on me, O Lord; see my humiliation which I suffer from my enemies.

And let them trust in thee who know thy name, 65 for thou hast not forsaken them that seek thee, O Lord.

And the Lord is become a refuge for the poor, a helper in due time in tribulation.

Why, O Lord, hast thou retired afar off? Why 70 dost thou slight us in our wants, in the time of trouble?

For the poor man shall not be forgotten to the end; the patience of the poor shall not perish forever. Arise, O Lord God; let thy hand be 75 exalted; forget not the poor.

To thee is the poor man left; thou wilt be a helper to the orphan.

The Lord hath heard the desire of the poor; thy ear 80 hath heard the preparation of their heart.<sup>65</sup>

<sup>55</sup> Here in the margin of his Psalter, More writes "the soul recovering from sin." Below, these handwritten comments of More are given in square brackets. For examples of this marginalia, see the previous page, as well as Thomas More's Prayer Book (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1969), which gives a facsimile of each page along with R. S. Sylvester's translations of the marginalia given here. See also Garry Haupt's detailed commentary in CW 13. <sup>56</sup> [he who rises up from sin] <sup>57</sup> [a challenge against demons] Ps 3:2–4, 6–7 (3:1–3, 5–7). <sup>58</sup> Ps 5:9–13 (5:8–12) <sup>59</sup> [against the spiritual hosts of wickedness] <sup>60</sup> [against demons] <sup>61</sup> As

Garry Haupt points out, More changes the verb form — to present indicative, making "the passage extremely relevant to More's situation in the Tower" (CW 13: 312). <sup>62</sup> [against the demon] <sup>63</sup> Ps 7:2–3, 7, 6, 13–18 (7:1–2, 6, 5, 12–17) <sup>64</sup> Ps 4:9–10 (4:8) <sup>65</sup> Ps 9:14, 11, 10, 22, 19, 33, 35, 38 (9:13, 10, 9; 10:1; 9:18; 10:12, 14, 17)

PSALM 10

The Lord is in his holy temple; the Lord's throne is in heaven.
His eyes look on the poor man; his eyelids examine 5 the sons of men.<sup>66</sup>

PSALM 11

“By reason of the misery of the needy, and the groans of the poor, now will I arise,” saith the Lord.<sup>67</sup>

PSALM 7

10 O Lord my God, in thee have I put my trust; save me from all them that persecute me, and deliver
me.<sup>68</sup>

PSALM 12

15 How long, O Lord, wilt thou forget me unto the end? How long dost thou turn away thy face from me?<sup>69</sup> How long shall I take counsels in my soul, sorrow
in my heart all the day?
20 How long shall my enemy be exalted over me? Consider, and hear me, O Lord my God.
Enlighten my eyes that I never sleep in death, lest at any time my enemy say, “I have prevailed against him.”
25 They that trouble me will rejoice when I am moved, but I have trusted in thy mercy.
My heart shall rejoice in thy salvation; I will sing to the Lord, who giveth me good things; yea I will sing to the name of the Lord the most high.<sup>70</sup>

PSALM 15

30 Preserve me, O Lord, for I have put my trust in thee. I have said to the Lord, “Thou art my God,” for thou hast no need of my goods.<sup>71</sup>

PSALM 16

35 Perfect thou my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps be not moved.<sup>72</sup> Show forth thy wonderful mercies; thou who savest them that trust in thee.<sup>73</sup>

PSALM 15

I set the Lord always in my sight, for he is at my right hand, that I be not moved.<sup>74</sup> Therefore my heart hath been glad, and my tongue hath rejoiced; moreover my flesh also shall rest in hope.<sup>75</sup>

PSALM 17

45 Thou lightest my lamp, O Lord. O my God, enlighten my darkness.
For by thee I shall be delivered from temptation,
and through my God I shall go over a wall.
50 As for my God, his way is undefiled; the words of the Lord are fire-tried; he is the protector of all that trust in him.
For who is God but the Lord? Or who is God but our God?<sup>76</sup>

PSALM 21

55 But I am a worm, and no man, the reproach of men, and the outcast of the people.<sup>77</sup>
All they that saw me have laughed me to scorn;
they have spoken with the lips, and wagged the head.
60 Thou art he that hast drawn me out of the womb, my hope from the breasts of my mother. I was cast upon thee from the womb.
From my mother's womb thou art my God; depart not from me.
65 But thou, O Lord, remove not thy help to a distance from me; look toward my defense.<sup>78</sup>

PSALM 22

Though I should walk in the midst of the shadow of death, I will fear no evils, for thou art with me.<sup>79</sup>
70 Thy rod and thy staff, they have comforted me.<sup>80</sup>

PSALM 24

To thee, O Lord, have I lifted up my soul. In thee, O my God, I put my trust; let me not be 75 ashamed.
Neither let my enemies laugh at me,<sup>81</sup> for none of them that wait on thee shall be confounded.

66 Ps 10:5 (11:4) 67 Ps 11:6 (12:5)
68 [against the spiritual hosts of darkness] Ps 7:2 (7:1) 69 [He who has scruples in confession and is not satisfied in his own soul should pray this psalm] 70 Ps 12:1–6

(13:1–6) 71 Ps 15:1–2 (16:1–2) 72 [he prays that he may not falter in the time of temptation] 73 Ps 16:5, 7 (17:5, 7)
74 [comfort in tribulation] 75 Ps 15:8–9
(16:8–9) 76 Ps 17:29–32 (18:28–31)

77 [in the time of suffering with disgrace]
78 [against demons] Ps 21:7–8, 10–12, 20 (22:6–7, 9–11, 19) 79 [trust] 80 [tribulation] Ps 22:4 (23:4) 81 [demons]

The sins of my youth and my ignorances do not remember.<sup>82</sup>
 According to thy mercy remember thou me, for thy goodness' sake, O Lord.
 5 For thy name's sake, O Lord, thou wilt pardon my sin, for it is great.<sup>83</sup>
 My eyes are ever toward the Lord, for he shall pluck my feet out of the snare.<sup>84</sup>
 The troubles of my heart are multiplied; deliver me 10 from my necessities.
 See my abjection and my labor, and forgive me all my sins.<sup>85</sup>

PSALM 26

The Lord is my light and my salvation: whom shall 15 I fear?<sup>86</sup>
 The Lord is the protector of my life: of whom shall I be afraid?
 If armies in camp should stand together against me, my heart shall not fear.
 20 If a battle should rise up against me, in this will I be confident.
 One thing I have asked of the Lord, this will I seek after: that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life.
 25 That I may see the delight of the Lord, and may visit his temple.
 Hear, O Lord, my voice, with which I have cried to thee; have mercy on me and hear me.
 My heart hath said to thee, "My face hath sought 30 thee." Thy face, O Lord, will I still seek.
 Turn not away thy face from me; decline not in thy wrath from thy servant.
 Be thou my helper; forsake me not; do not thou despise me, O God my Savior.
 35 I believe to see the good things of the Lord in the land of the living.<sup>87</sup>
 Expect the Lord; do manfully, and let thy heart take courage, and wait thou for the Lord.<sup>88</sup>

PSALM 27

40 Unto thee will I cry, O Lord. O my God, be not thou silent to me, lest if thou be silent to me, I become like them that go down into the pit.<sup>89</sup>

PSALM 29

Sing to the Lord, O ye his saints, and give praise to the memory of his holiness. 45
 For wrath is in his indignation, and life in his good will.
 In the evening weeping shall have place, and in the morning gladness.
 Thou turnedst away thy face from me, and I became troubled.<sup>90</sup> 50
 To thee, O Lord, will I cry, and I will make supplication to my God.
 What profit is there in my blood, whilst I go down to corruption?<sup>91</sup> 55

PSALM 30

In thee, O Lord, have I hoped; let me never be confounded; deliver me in thy justice.
 Bow down thy ear to me; make haste to deliver me. 60
 Be thou unto me a God, a protector, and a house of refuge, to save me.
 For thou art my strength and my refuge, and for thy name's sake thou wilt lead me, and nourish me.
 Thou wilt bring me out of this snare, which they have hidden for me, for thou art my protector.<sup>92</sup> 65
 Into thy hands I commend my spirit; thou hast redeemed me, O Lord, the God of truth.
 Have mercy on me, O Lord, for I am afflicted; my eye is troubled with wrath, my soul, and my belly. 70
 For my life is wasted with grief, and my years in sighs.
 My strength is weakened through poverty and my bones are disturbed. 75
 I am become a reproach among all my enemies and very much to my neighbors, and a fear to my acquaintance.<sup>93</sup>
 They that saw me without fled from me. I am forgotten as one dead from the heart. 80
 I am become as a vessel that is destroyed, for I have heard the blame of many that dwell round about. While they assembled together against me, they consulted to take away my life.
 But I have put my trust in thee, O Lord. I said, 85
 "Thou art my God." My lots are in thy hands.

82 [for one's sins] 83 [for one's sins] 84 [rescue from sin or prison; tribulation] 85 Ps 24(25):1-3, 7, 11, 15,

17-18 86 [trust] 87 [hope and trust] 88 [patience] Ps 26(27):1, 3-4, 7-9, 13-14 89 Ps 27(28):1 90 [tribulation] 91 Ps

29:5-6, 8-10 (30:4-5, 7-9) 92 [against the snares of demons] 93 [in infamy and danger]

Make thy face to shine upon thy servant; save me in thy mercy. Let me not be confounded,
O Lord, for I have called upon thee.
O how great is the multitude of thy sweetness, 5 O Lord, which thou hast hidden for them that fear thee.<sup>94</sup>

PSALM 32

Behold, the eyes of the Lord are on them that fear him, and on them that hope in his mercy.
10 To deliver their souls from death, and feed them in famine.
Our soul waiteth for the Lord, for he is our helper and protector.
For in him our heart shall rejoice, and in his holy 15 name we have trusted.
Let thy mercy, O Lord, be upon us, as we have hoped in thee.<sup>95</sup>

PSALM 33

Come ye to him, and be enlightened, and your 20 faces shall not be confounded.
The angel of the Lord shall encamp round about them that fear him, and shall deliver them.
O taste, and see that the Lord is sweet; blessed is the man that hopeth in him.
25 Fear the Lord, all ye his saints, for there is no want to them that fear him.
The rich have wanted, and have suffered hunger, but they that seek the Lord shall not be deprived of any good.
30 The Lord is nigh unto them that are of a contrite heart, and he will save the humble of spirit.<sup>96</sup>

PSALM 35

But the children of men shall put their trust under the covert of thy wings. They shall be inebriated 35 with the plenty of thy house.
For with thee is the fountain of life, and in thy light we shall see light.<sup>97</sup>

PSALM 37

Rebuke me not, O Lord, in thy indignation, nor chastise me in thy wrath.<sup>98</sup> 40
For thy arrows are fastened in me, and thy hand hath been strong upon me.
There is no health in my flesh, because of thy wrath; there is no peace for my bones, because of my sins. 45
For my iniquities are gone over my head, and as a heavy burden are become heavy upon me.
My sores are putrified and corrupted, because of my foolishness.
I am become miserable, and am bowed down even 50 to the end. I walked sorrowful all the day long.
For my loins are filled with illusions, and there is no health in my flesh.
I am afflicted and humbled exceedingly; I roared with the groaning of my heart. 55
Lord, all my desire is before thee, and my groaning is not hidden from thee.
My heart is troubled; my strength hath left me,
and the light of my eyes itself is not with me.
My friends and my neighbors have drawn near, and 60 stood against me.
And they that were near me stood afar off, and they that sought my soul used violence.
And they that sought evils to me spoke vain things,
and studied deceits all the day long. 65
But I, as a deaf man heard not, and as a dumb man not opening his mouth.<sup>99</sup>
And I became as a man that heareth not, and that hath no reproofs in his mouth.
For in thee, O Lord, have I hoped; thou wilt hear 70 me, O Lord my God.
For I said, "Lest at any time my enemies rejoice over me, and whilst my feet are moved, they speak great things against me."
For I am ready for scourges, and my sorrow is 75 continually before me.
For I will declare my iniquity, and I will think for my sin.
But my enemies live, and are stronger than I; and they that hate me wrongfully are multiplied. 80
They that render evil for good have detracted me, because I followed goodness.

<sup>94</sup> [consolation for the soul in tribulation]
Ps 30:2–6, 10–18, 20 (31:1–5, 9–17, 19)
<sup>95</sup> Ps 32(33):18–22 <sup>96</sup> Ps 33:6, 8–11, 19
(34:5, 7–10, 18) <sup>97</sup> Ps 35:8–10 (36:7–9)
<sup>98</sup> [a good psalm for obtaining pardon]

<sup>99</sup> [a meek man ought to behave in this way during tribulation; he should neither speak proudly himself nor retort to what is spoken wickedly, but should bless those who speak evil of him and suffer willingly, either for justice's sake if he has deserved it or for God's sake if he has deserved nothing]

Forsake me not, O Lord my God; do not thou depart from me.
Attend unto my help, O Lord, the God of my salvation.<sup>100</sup>

5 PSALM 38

I said, “I will take heed to my ways, that I sin not with my tongue.
“I have set guard to my mouth,<sup>101</sup> when the sinner stood against me.”
10 I was dumb, and was humbled, and kept silence from good things, and my sorrow was renewed. My heart grew hot within me, and in my meditation a fire shall flame out.
I spoke with my tongue, “O Lord, make me know my end.
15 And what is the number of my days, that I may know what is wanting to me.”
Behold, thou hast made my days measurable, and my substance is as nothing before thee.
20 And indeed all things are vanity, every man living. Surely man passeth as an image; yea, and he is disquieted in vain.
He storeth up, and he knoweth not for whom he shall gather these things.
25 And now what is my hope? Is it not the Lord? And my substance is with thee.
Deliver thou me from all my iniquities; thou hast made me a reproach to the fool.
I was dumb, and I opened not my mouth, because 30 thou hast done it. Remove thy scourges from me.
The strength of thy hand hath made me faint in rebukes. Thou hast corrected man for iniquity.
And thou hast made his soul to waste away like a spider; surely in vain is any man disquieted.
35 Hear my prayer, O Lord, and my supplication; give ear to my tears.
Be not silent, for I am a stranger with thee, and a sojourner as all my fathers were.
40 O forgive me, that I may be refreshed before I go hence, and be no more.<sup>102</sup>

PSALM 39

Blessed is the man whose trust is in the name of the Lord, and who hath not had regard to vanities, and lying follies. 45
Thou hast multiplied thy wonderful works, O Lord my God, and in thy thoughts there is no one like to thee.
Withhold not thou, O Lord, thy tender mercies from me; thy mercy and thy truth have always upheld me. 50
For evils without number have surrounded me; my iniquities have overtaken me, and I was not able to see.
They are multiplied above the hairs of my head, and my heart hath forsaken me. 55
Be pleased, O Lord, to deliver me; look down, O Lord, to help me.
Let all that seek thee rejoice and be glad in thee, and let such as love thy salvation say always, 60
“The Lord be magnified!”
But I am a beggar and poor; the Lord is careful for me.
Thou art my helper and my protector; O my God, be not slack.<sup>103</sup> 65

PSALM 41

As the hart panteth after the fountains of water, so my soul panteth after thee, O God.<sup>104</sup>
My soul hath thirsted after the strong living God. When shall I come and appear before the face of God? 70
My tears have been my bread day and night, whilst it is said to me daily, “Where is thy God?”
These things I remembered, and poured out my soul in me, for I shall go over into the place of the wonderful tabernacle, even to the house of God. 75
With the voice of joy and praise, the noise of one feasting.
Why art thou sad, O my soul? And why dost thou trouble me?<sup>105</sup> 80
Hope in God, for I will still give praise to him, the salvation of my countenance, and my God.
My soul is troubled within myself; therefore will I remember thee from the land of Jordan and Hermoniim, from the little hill. 85

100 Ps 37:2–23 (38:1–22) 101 [evil words (39:1–13) 103 Ps 39:5–6, 12–14, 17–18 are not to be employed] 102 Ps 38:2–14 (40:4–5, 11–13, 16–17) 104 [happy

the man who can say this from his soul]
105 [in tribulation]

Deep calleth on deep, at the noise of thy flood-gates.
All thy heights and thy billows have passed over me.
5 In the daytime the Lord hath commanded his mercy, and a canticle to him in the night.
With me is prayer to the God of my life. I will say to God, “Thou art my support.
Why hast thou forgotten me? And why go I mourning, whilst my enemy afflicteth me?” 10 Whilst my bones are broken, my enemies who trouble me have reproached me.
Whilst they say to me day by day, “Where is thy God?”
15 Why art thou cast down, O my soul? And why dost thou disquiet me?
Hope thou in God, for I will still give praise to him, the salvation of my countenance, and my God.<sup>106</sup>

PSALM 45

20 Our God is our refuge and strength, a helper in troubles, which have found us exceedingly.<sup>107</sup> Therefore we will not fear, when the earth shall be troubled, and the mountains shall be removed 25 into the heart of the sea.
Their waters roared and were troubled; the mountains were troubled with his strength.
The stream of the river maketh the city of God joyful; the Most High hath sanctified his own 30 tabernacle.
God is in the midst thereof; it shall not be moved;
God will help it in the morning early.<sup>108</sup>

PSALM 50

35 Have mercy on me, O God, according to thy great mercy.
And according to the multitude of thy tender mercies, blot out my iniquity.
Wash me yet more from my iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin.
40 For I know my iniquity, and my sin is always before me.
To thee only have I sinned, and have done evil before thee, that thou mayst be justified in thy words and mayst overcome when thou art 45 judged.

For behold I was conceived in iniquities, and in sins did my mother conceive me.
For behold thou hast loved truth; the uncertain and hidden things of thy wisdom thou hast made manifest to me. 50 Thou shalt sprinkle me with hyssop, and I shall be cleansed; thou shalt wash me, and I shall be made whiter than snow.
To my hearing thou shalt give joy and gladness, and the bones that have been humbled shall rejoice. 55 Turn away thy face from my sins, and blot out all my iniquities.
Create a clean heart in me, O God, and renew a right spirit within my bowels.
Cast me not away from thy face, and take not thy 60 holy spirit from me.
Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation, and strengthen me with a perfect spirit.
I will teach the unjust thy ways, and the wicked shall be converted to thee. 65 Deliver me from blood, O God, thou God of my salvation, and my tongue shall extol thy justice.
O Lord, thou wilt open my lips, and my mouth shall declare thy praise.
For if thou hadst desired sacrifice, I would indeed 70 have given it; with burnt offerings thou wilt not be delighted.
A sacrifice to God is an afflicted spirit; a contrite and humbled heart, O God, thou wilt not despise. 75
Deal favorably, O Lord, in thy good will with Zion, that the walls of Jerusalem may be built up.
Then shalt thou accept the sacrifice of justice, oblations and whole burnt offerings; then shall they 80 lay calves upon thy altar.<sup>109</sup>

PSALM 54

Hear, O God, my prayer, and despise not my supplication. Be attentive to me and hear me.<sup>110</sup>
My heart is troubled within me, and the fear of death is fallen upon me. 85 Fear and trembling are come upon me, and darkness hath covered me.
And I said, “Who will give me wings like a dove, and I will fly and be at rest?”
Cast thy care upon the Lord, and he shall sustain 90 thee.<sup>111</sup>

106 Ps 41:2–12 (42:1–11) 107 [trust in God against tribulation] 108 Ps 45:

2–6 (46:1–5) 109 Ps 50:3–21 (51:1–19)
110 [in tribulation]

111 Ps 54:2–3, 5–7, 23 (55:1–2, 4–6, 22)

PSALM 61

Shall not my soul be subject to God? For from him is my salvation.<sup>112</sup>

5 For he is my God and my savior; he is my protector; I shall be moved no more.

How long do you rush in upon a man? You all kill,
as if you were thrusting down a leaning wall,
and a tottering fence.

10 But be thou, O my soul, subject to God, for from him is my patience.<sup>113</sup>

For he is my God and my savior; he is my helper, I shall not be moved.

In God is my salvation and my glory; he is the God of my help, and my hope is in God.

15 Trust in him, all ye congregation of people; pour out your hearts before him. God is our helper forever.

20 God hath spoken once; these two things have I heard: that power belongeth to God, and mercy to thee, O Lord, for thou wilt render to every man according to his works.<sup>114</sup>

PSALM 62

O God, my God, to thee do I watch at break of day.
For thee my soul hath thirsted, for thee my flesh —

25 O how many ways!<sup>115</sup>
In a desert land, and where there is no way and no water, so in the sanctuary have I come before thee, to see thy power and thy glory.

30 For thy mercy is better than lives; thee my lips will praise.<sup>116</sup>

Thus will I bless thee all my life long, and in thy name I will lift up my hands.

Let my soul be filled as with marrow and fatness, and my mouth shall praise thee with joyful lips. 35

If I have remembered thee upon my bed, I will meditate on thee in the morning, because thou hast been my helper.

40 And I will rejoice under the covert of thy wings;
my soul hath stuck close to thee; thy right hand hath received me.

But they have sought my soul in vain; they shall go into the lower parts of the earth; they shall be delivered into the hands of the sword; they shall be the portions of foxes. 45

But the king shall rejoice in God; all they shall be praised that swear by him, because the mouth is stopped of them that speak wicked things.<sup>117</sup>

PSALM 66

50 May God have mercy on us, and bless us; may he cause the light of his countenance to shine upon us, and may he have mercy on us.

That we may know thy way upon earth, thy salvation in all nations.

Let people confess to thee, O God; let all people give praise to thee. 55

Let the nations be glad and rejoice, for thou judgest the people with justice, and directest the nations upon earth.

60 Let the people, O God, confess to thee; let all the people give praise to thee; the earth hath yielded her fruit.

May God, our God, bless us. May God bless us, and all the ends of the earth fear him.<sup>118</sup>

112 [patience in tribulation, or I shall not commit such a sin again] 113 [patience]
114 Ps 61:2–4, 6–9, 12–13 (62:1–3, 5–8, 11–12) 115 [longing for God] 116 [in tribulation and fear of death] 117 Ps

62:2–12 (63: 1–11) 118 Ps 66:2–8 (67:
1–7)

A GODLY MEDITATION

*written by Sir Thomas More, Knight, while he was prisoner in the Tower of London
in the year of our Lord 1534*

- 5 Give me thy grace, good Lord,
To set the world at nought;<sup>119</sup>
- To set my mind fast<sup>120</sup> upon thee,
And not to hang upon the blast of men's mouths;
- 10 To be content to be solitary,
Not to long for worldly company;
- Little and<sup>121</sup> little utterly to cast off the world,
And rid my mind of all the business thereof;
- 15 Not to long to hear of any worldly things,
But that the hearing of worldly fantasies
may be to me displeasant;
- Gladly to be thinking of God;
Piteously to call for his help;
- 20 To lean unto the comfort of God;
Busily to labor to love him;
- To know mine own vility<sup>122</sup> and wretchedness;
To humble and meeken myself under the mighty hand of God;
- 25 To bewail my sins passed;
For the purging of them, patiently to suffer adversity;
- Gladly to bear my purgatory here;
To be joyful of tribulations;
- To walk the narrow way that leadeth to life;
To bear the cross with Christ; 30
- To have the last things in remembrance;
To have ever afore mine eye my death that is ever at hand;
- To make death no stranger to me;
To foresee and consider the everlasting 35
fire of hell;
- To pray for pardon before the judge come;
To have continually in mind the Passion that Christ suffered for me;
- For his benefits incessantly to give him thanks;
To buy<sup>123</sup> the time again that I before have lost;
- To abstain from vain confabulations;<sup>124</sup>
To eschew<sup>125</sup> light foolish mirth and gladness;
- Recreations not necessary, to cut off;
Of worldly substance, friends, liberty, life, 45 and all-to set the loss at right nought<sup>126</sup> for the winning of Christ;
- To think my most<sup>127</sup> enemies my best friends,
For the brethren of Joseph<sup>128</sup> could never have done him so much good with their 50 love and favor as they did him with their malice and hatred.
- These minds<sup>129</sup> are more to be desired of every man than all the treasure of all the princes and kings, Christian and heathen, were it gathered 55 and laid together all upon one heap.

119 set at nought: regard as nothing 120 firmly; steadfastly 121 by 122 lowness of condition; moral baseness

123 redeem 124 familiar conversations; chats 125 avoid 126 set . . . nought:
regard the loss as nothing at all

127 greatest, worst 128 Gn 37, 41
129 thoughts; intentions; dispositions

A DEVOUT PRAYER

made by Sir Thomas More, Knight, after he was condemned to die, and before he was put to death;
who was condemned the Thursday the first day of 5 July in the year of our Lord God 1535, and in the twenty-seventh year of the reign of King Henry the Eighth, and was beheaded at the Tower Hill at London the Tuesday following

PATERNOSTER, AVE MARIA, CREDO.<sup>130</sup>

10 O Holy Trinity: the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost—three equal and coeternal persons, and one almighty God—have mercy on me, vile, abject, abominable, sinful wretch, meekly acknowledging before thine high majesty my long-15 continued sinful life, even from my very child-head<sup>131</sup> hitherto.

In my childhood in this point and that point, etc.

After my childhood in this point and that point,
etc., and so forth by every age.

20 Now, good gracious Lord, as thou givest me thy grace to acknowledge them, so give me thy grace, not in only word but in heart also, with very sorrowful contrition to repent them, and utterly to forsake them. And forgive me those sins also in 25 which by mine own default,<sup>132</sup> through evil affections<sup>133</sup> and evil custom,<sup>134</sup> my reason is with sensuality so blinded that I cannot discern them for sin.
And illumine, good Lord, mine heart, and give me
thy grace to know them and to acknowledge them, 30 and forgive me my sins negligently forgotten, and bring them to my mind with grace to be purely confessed of them.

Glorious God, give me from henceforth the grace, with little respect unto the world, so to set and fix 35 firmly mine heart upon thee that I may say with thy blessed apostle Saint Paul, Mundus mihi crucifixus est, et ego mundo. Mihi vivere Christus est et mori lucrum. Cupio dissolvi et esse cum Christo.<sup>135</sup>

Give me the grace to amend my life and to have an eye to mine end without grudge<sup>136</sup> of death, which to them that die in thee, good Lord, is the gate of a 40 wealthy<sup>137</sup> life.

Almighty God: *Doce me facere voluntatem tuam.
Fac me currere in odore unguentorum tuorum. Apprehende manum meam dexteram, et deduc me in* 45 via recta propter inimicos meos. Trahe me post te. In chamo et freno maxillas meas constringe, cum non approximo ad te.<sup>138</sup>

O glorious God, all sinful fear, all sinful sorrow and pensiveness, all sinful hope, all sinful mirth and gladness take from me. And on the other side, concerning such fear, such sorrow, such heaviness,<sup>139</sup> such comfort, consolation, and gladness as shall be profitable for my soul, Fac mecum secundum
50 magnam bonitatem tuam Domine.<sup>140</sup>

Good Lord, give me the grace in all my fear and agony to have recourse to that great fear and wonderful agony that thou my sweet Savior hadst at the Mount of Olivet before thy most bitter Passion, and in the meditation thereof to conceive ghostly<sup>141</sup> 60 comfort and consolation profitable for my soul.

Almighty God, take from me all vainglorious minds,<sup>142</sup> all appetites of mine own praise, all envy, covetise,<sup>143</sup> gluttony, sloth and lechery, all wrathful affections, all appetite of revenging, all desire or de-65 light of other folks' harm, all pleasure in provoking any person to wrath and anger, all delight of ex-probation<sup>144</sup> or insultation<sup>145</sup> against any person in their affliction and calamity.

And give me, good Lord, a humble, lowly, quiet, 70 peaceable, patient, charitable, kind, tender, and pitiful mind, with all my works, and all my words, and all my thoughts to have a taste of thy holy blessed Spirit.

Give me, good Lord, a full faith, a firm hope, and 75 a fervent charity, a love to thee, good Lord, incomparable<sup>146</sup> above the love to myself, and that I love nothing to thy displeasure, but everything in an order to<sup>147</sup> thee.

130 This rubric indicates one should pray the Our Father, Hail Mary, and the Creed. 131 childhood 132 misdeed 133 dispositions 134 habit 135 "The world is crucified to me, and I to the world. For to me to live is Christ and to die is gain. I wish to be dissolved and be with Christ." See Gal 6:14 and Phil

1:21–23. 136 complaint; being discontent 137 possessing well-being 138 "Teach me to do your will. Make me run in the scent of thy ointments. Take my right hand, and lead me in the right path because of my enemies. Draw me after you. With a bit and bridle bind fast my jaws when I come not near unto thee." See Ps 142(143):10; Sg 1:3;

Ps 72(73):24; Ps 26(27):11; Ps 31(32):9. 139 grief 140 "Deal with me according to your great goodness, O Lord." See Ps 118(119):124. 141 spiritual 142 dis-positions; intentions 143 covetousness 144 reproaching 145 insult; scornful triumph or boasting 146 incomparably 147 in . . . to: ordered to Give me, good Lord, a longing to be with thee, not for the avoiding of the calamities of this wretched world, nor so much for the avoiding of the pains of purgatory, nor of the pains of hell neither, nor so much for the attaining of the joys of heaven, in respect of mine own commodity,<sup>148</sup> as even for a very<sup>149</sup> love to thee.

And bear me, good Lord, thy love and favor, which thing my love to thee-ward<sup>150</sup> (were it never so great) could not but of thy great goodness deserve.

And pardon me, good Lord, that I am so bold to ask so high petitions, being so vile a sinful wretch and so unworthy to attain the lowest. But yet, good Lord, such they be as I am bounden to wish and should be nearer the effectual desire of them if my manifold sins were not the let.<sup>151</sup> From which, O glorious Trinity, vouchsafe<sup>152</sup> of thy goodness to wash me with that blessed blood that issued out of thy tender body (O sweet Savior Christ) in the diverse torments of thy most bitter Passion.

Take from me, good Lord, this lukewarm fashion, or rather key-cold<sup>153</sup> manner of meditation, and this dullness in praying unto thee. And give me warmth, delight, and quickness in thinking upon thee, and give me thy grace to long for thine holy sacraments, and specially to rejoice in the presence of thy very blessed body, sweet Savior Christ, in the holy Sacrament of the altar, and duly to thank thee for thy gracious visitation therewith, and at that high memorial, with tender compassion to remember and consider thy most bitter Passion.

Make us all, good Lord, virtually<sup>154</sup> participant of that holy Sacrament this day, and every day make us all lively members, sweet Savior Christ, of thine holy mystical body, thy Catholic Church.

Dignare Domine die isto sine peccato nos custodire.<sup>155</sup>

Miserere nostri Domine, miserere nostri.<sup>156</sup>

Fiat misericordia tua Domine super nos,

quemadmodum speravimus in te.<sup>157</sup>

In te Domine speravi, non confundar in aeternum.<sup>158</sup>

Ora pro nobis, sancta Dei genetrix, ut digni efficiamur promissionibus Christi.<sup>159</sup>

PRO AMICIS<sup>160</sup>

Almighty God, have mercy on N.<sup>161</sup> and N., etc., with special meditation and consideration of every friend, as godly affection and occasion requireth.

PRO INIMICIS<sup>162</sup>

Almighty God, have mercy on N. and N., etc., and on all that bear me evil will, and would me harm; and their faults and mine together, by such easy tender merciful means as thine infinite wisdom best can devise, vouchsafe to amend and redress, and make us saved souls in heaven together, where we may ever live and love together with thee and thy blessed saints. O glorious Trinity, for the bitter Passion of our sweet Savior Christ, Amen.

Lord, give me patience in tribulation, and grace in everything to conform my will to thine, that I may truly say: Fiat voluntas tua, sicut in caelo, et in terra.<sup>163</sup>

The things, good Lord, that I pray for, give me the grace to labor for. Amen.

148 benefit 149 true 150 to theeward: toward thee 151 hindrance 152 grant 153 cold as a key; without heat or fervor 154 with spiritual effect 155 "Deign, O Lord, on that day to preserve us without sin." This and the following psalms comprise the last stanza of the Te Deum, a hymn of thanksgiving. 156 "Have mercy upon us, O Lord, have mercy upon us." See Ps 122(123):3. 157 "Let your mercy, O Lord, be upon us, just as we have hoped in you." See Ps 32(33):22. 158 "In you, O Lord, have I hoped, let me never be confounded." See Ps 30(31):2. 159 "Pray for us, holy mother of God, that we may be made worthy of the promises of Christ"

(from the prayer Salve regina). 160 "For Friends" 161 The liturgical abbreviation for the Latin nomen ("name"), providing for one to add names appropriate to one's own prayer. 162 "For Enemies" 163 "Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven" (Mt 6:10).

Remembraunces at my next goyng to the Courte.

474
475

- + Item for redress of surge wothes ab be in the North partes.
- + Item for lre to be written to our John wallop.
- + Item for to declare the matier of Ireland to the kyng Englond, and to debate what shalbe done there
- + Item to send lre into Ireland, and to advise the Deputy of the kynges pleasure, and to send the Deputy of the kyng of the ordering of Maister Fisher, and to shewe hym of the Indenture wch same shalbe to the Governour.
- + Item to knowe his pleasure touching Maister More and to declare vnto his highnes the poyntes in his cause of vrb and willis.
- + Item to declare vnto his grace the effect of maister pabbs lre.
- + Item to remember specially Maister Gylley.
- + Item to remember what shalbe done for his comfort and confort.
- + Item to remember of water Hungerford in his well doynge.
- + Item when maister Fisher shall go to execution to also the other.
- + Item what shalbe done farther touching maister More
- + Item touching the conclusion for my lord of Suffolke.
- + Item to send vnto the kyng by Rasse the behavoure of Maister Fisher.
- + Item touching the sermond made in London upon Sunday next.
- + Item touching the surge well brought out of Almayne.
- + Item special lre to be drawn to Justices of assise throughout the realme touching the vyche of the popull.
- + Item to seeke out the first Comysion for the first fute in Gurd and to deliver the same to Danester.
- + Item to take an end w the vnter of Galifay for his fyne

[1]

[2]

[3]

This memo of Secretary Thomas Cromwell, written in the hand of a clerk ca. June 18, 1535, is entitled "Remembraunces at my next goyng to the Courte." Three items pertain directly to Thomas More. [1] The fifth "Item" reads: "to knowe his [Henry's] pleasure touching Maister More," and then Cromwell adds in his own hand: "and to declare the oppnyon of the Judges theron, & what shalbe the kynges plesure." [2] The twelfth "Item" reads: "when Maister Fisser shall go to execution with also the other," followed by [3] the thirteenth: "Item what shalbe done farther touching Maister More." "Item" 11 reads: "to remember S[i]r Wa[l]ter Hungerford in his well doynge"; Hungerford was a juror at Fisher's June 17 trial as well as the foreman of the jury for the April 28-29 trial of the three Carthusian priors (including More's friend John Houghton) and Dr. Richard Reynolds of the Bridgettine monastery of Sion.

Thomas More's Trial Reconstructed

Thomas More's trial in Westminster Hall on July 1, 1535, is among the more famous trials in Western history. The reconstruction given here is taken from Thomas More's Trial by Jury (Boydell and Brewer, 2011), which gives the existing accounts, official documents, and other documentary evidence of More's trial, including the Latin texts with translations. After "Thomas More's Trial Reconstructed" there follows a selection of the acts, oaths, and laws relevant to More's trial. The earliest published account, the Paris Newsletter, is given in the next section, "Earliest Biographical Accounts."

More had first been imprisoned in April 1534 for refusing to take the oath required by the Act of Succession, the statute whereby Queen Anne Boleyn's children were recognized as legal heirs of the throne, and as such were due the "faith, truth, and obedience" of their subjects. As Peter Marshall maintains, More's difficulty was not so much with the succession claim itself as with the oath, most likely the words pronouncing Anne the King's "entirely beloved lawful wife" (emphasis added) and especially the oath's implied rejection of any "foreign authority or potentate," a reference to Rome and the pope (CC 121–23). In late 1534, instead of a trial, More was subject to an Act of Attainder, a legislative bill passed by the English Parliament for the purpose of "attainting" or convicting More of misprision of treason, with the punishment of life imprisonment.

When More was brought to trial over six months later, he was formally charged with violating two new statutes, the Act of Supremacy and the Treasons Act, which Parliament had passed in late 1534. The Act of Supremacy gave official "corroboration and confirmation" of what the Bishops' Convocations had already in effect granted through the Submission of the Clergy earlier in 1532: "that the King, our sovereign lord, his heirs and successors, kings of this realm, shall be taken, accepted, and reputed the only Supreme Head in earth of the Church of England, called Anglicana Ecclesia..." The second statute More allegedly violated was the Treasons Act, which made it high treason, the penalty for which was death, for anyone to "maliciously wish, will or desire, by words or writing, or by craft imagine, invent, practice, or attempt any bodily harm to be done or committed to the King's most royal person, the Queen's, or their heirs apparent, or to deprive them or any of them of their dignity, title, or name of their royal estates, or slanderously and maliciously publish and pronounce, by express writing or words, that the King our sovereign lord should be heretic, schismatic, tyrant, infidel, or usurper of the crown..."

The indictment accuses More of high treason for depriving the English King of his title, Supreme Head, in three ways: first, by persevering in malicious silence when authorities demanded he affirm the King's title; second, by maliciously conspiring with Bishop John Fisher, also imprisoned, to deny the King's title; and third, by maliciously telling Richard Rich in a conversation that an act of Parliament could not make the King Supreme Head of the Church in England. More argued against the first two charges, but Richard Rich's sworn testimony regarding a conversation between himself and More was taken as proof enough in support of the third charge. While it has been widely accepted that More was convicted on the third count of the indictment alone, Henry Kelly concludes in his procedural review of the trial in Thomas More's Trial by Jury that More was convicted on the whole indictment, and he points out that there are two extant accounts of the fateful conversation between Rich and More: the first version by Rich, the second by Roper, More's son-in-law. In any event, after the dramatic exchanges reconstructed here, More was condemned for high treason and sentenced to death by being drawn and quartered. That sentence was later commuted to beheading.

CONTENTS

More's Trial Reconstructed . . . . .	1355
Laws, Acts, and Oaths Related to Thomas More's Trial . . . . .	1363

TIMELINE: IMPORTANT DATES AND LEGAL CONTEXT

Acts, Oaths, Interrogations, and Trial

- September 1530 Archbishop Cranmer presents Collectanea satis copiosa [Determinations of the Universities] arguing for the English king's divine right and imperial status.
- January 1531 King Henry charges the clergy with Praemunire and requires they recognize him as head of the English Church; they do so "as far as Christ's law allows" and pay £100,000 penalty.
- 30 March 1531 Henry has More report Collectanea to the Parliament.
- February 1532 Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, formally dissociates himself from anticlerical laws since 1529.
- 19 March 1532 Conditional Restraint of Annates Act (23 H8 c. 20) passes House of Lords after Henry VIII visits three times; all bishops, two abbots and Earl of Arundel opposed (LP 5, 879).
- 26 March 1532 Conditional Restraint of Annates Act (23 H8 c. 20) passes House of Commons after Henry VIII "causes the House to divide" for the first time in English history (LP 5, 898).
- 14 May 1532 Henry dismisses Parliament after it refuses, under More, to pass Submission of the Clergy Act.
- 15 May 1532 Submission of the Clergy Act (LP 5, 1023) accepted by some in Upper House of Convocation after disbanding Lower House; More resigns 16 May.
- Summer 1532 More has epitaph for his tomb engraved, installed — the text sent to Erasmus to publish (Letter 191).
- Feb–Mar 1533 Act in Restraint of Appeals (24 H8 c. 12): Henry as emperor and as head of the Church.
- March 1534
- Act of Submission of the Clergy (25 H8 c. 19): Parliament formalizes 1532 Convocation statute; all appeals of Church law now to go to King's Court of Chancery
  - Act Restraining Annates (25 H8 c. 20) confirms 1532 Conditional Act; abbots and bishops now appointed by Henry VIII
  - Act of Succession (25 H8 c. 22), effective 1 May 1534, penalty of high treason for writing or acting against it, and misprision of treason for refusing an oath concerning it
- 13 April 1534 More interrogated at Lambeth Palace; imprisoned on 17th (Letter 200). Interrogation #1
- August 1534 Chancellor Audley sends warning to More (Letters 205–6).
- Nov–Dec 1534
- Act Recognizing the King as Supreme Head of the Church in England (26 H8 c.1)
  - Act Ratifying the Oath to the Succession (26 H8 c. 2)
  - Treason Act (26 H8 c. 13): makes it high treason to maliciously deprive the King and Queen of the dignity, title, or name of their royal estates, by word or deed; effective 1 February 1535
  - Act of Attainder of Thomas More: misprision of treason for refusing the oath of Succession (26 H8 c. 23)
- 30 April 1535 Cromwell and others interrogate More (Letter 214; Indictment §4). Interrogation #2
- 3 June 1535 More and Fisher interrogated separately; both remain silent and speak of "two-edged sword" (Indictment §7, §9, LP 8, 814; Letter 216). Interrogation #3
- 12 June 1535 Richard Rich removes books and writing materials; has disputed conversation with More.
- 14 June 1535 More interrogated again (LP 8, 867). Interrogation #4
- 25 June 1535 Henry VIII orders the guilt of Fisher and More to be publicized (LP 8, 921).
- 28 June 1535 Grand Jury meets; they accept the state's Indictment (Indictment §12).
- 1 July 1535 More's trial at Westminster Hall; More invokes Magna Carta and the King's Coronation Oath.
- 6 July 1535 More's execution by beheading.

Thomas More's Trial<sup>1</sup>

Reconstructed

NAMES OF THE SPEAKERS

Narrator

5 Sir Thomas More

Lord Chancellor Thomas Audley

The Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Howard

Chief Justice of the King's Bench

John FitzJames

10 Justice of the King's Bench John Spelman

Other commission judges

Attorney General Christopher Hales

Richard Rich, King's General Solicitor

Sir Richard Southwell

15 Master Palmer, Cromwell's servant

Spokesman of the jury

Sergeants-at-law

Constable of the Tower Sir William Kingston

20 NARRATOR: On Saturday, June 26, 1535, a special commission of oyer<sup>2</sup> and terminer<sup>3</sup> met at Westminster and summoned a grand jury to meet on Monday, June 28; on that day the justices presented the jury with an indictment against Sir Thomas More.

25 The jury found it a true bill.<sup>4</sup>

The indictment charged More with high treason under the Act of Treasons concerning the King's supremacy of the English Church, in that he sought to deprive the King of this title in the following ways:

- 1) by maliciously remaining silent when asked to affirm it;
- 2) by maliciously conspiring with Bishop Fisher to deny the title; and
- 35 3) by maliciously asserting to Richard Rich that Parliament did not have power to grant the King this title.<sup>5</sup>

On Wednesday, June 30, the Commissioners ordered the constable of the Tower to present Sir

Thomas More before them at Westminster on the following day. On that day, Thursday, July 1, Audley ordered the Sheriff of Middlesex to have a petty jury<sup>6</sup> before them that very day. Sir Thomas More was brought to the bar by Sir Edmund Walsingham, lieutenant of Sir William Kingston, constable 45 of the Tower.<sup>7</sup>

Thereupon "Thomas More, recently chancellor of the Kingdom of England, after being confined in prison for fifteen months, was brought before the magistrates and judges appointed by the King. 50 When he was present, the accusations against him were publicly recited."<sup>8</sup>

DUKE OF NORFOLK: "More, you see that you have gravely offended against the royal Majesty in this matter. Nevertheless, we have confidence in his 55 clemency and bounty that if you should be willing to repent and change for the better this rash opinion of yours, which you have so pertinaciously adhered to, you will easily gain forgiveness of your fault from him."<sup>9</sup> 60

SIR THOMAS MORE: "Noble sirs, my very great thanks to you for your exceeding benevolence to me. But I ask only this of the great good God, that by his help I may be able to persevere in my right opinion until death. But as for what concerns the 65 accusations with which I am charged, I fear that neither my mental ability, nor memory, nor words will suffice to explain them, because I am impeded not only by the prolixity and extensiveness of the articles, but also by my long detention in prison and the 70 illness and bodily weakness that now afflict me."<sup>10</sup>

ONE OF THE JUDGES: The prisoner requires a chair for his feebleness.<sup>11</sup>

LORD CHANCELLOR THOMAS AUDLEY (when other judges nod in agreement): Let the prisoner 75 have a chair.

<sup>1</sup> This reconstruction is from Thomas More's Trial by Jury: A Procedural and Legal Review with a Collection of Documents, ed. Henry Ansgar Kelly, Louis W. Karlin, and Gerard B. Wegemer (Woodbridge, Suffolk:

Boydell Press, 2011). The footnotes that follow refer to this collection and its section numbers. A list of the original sources is given at the end of this section. <sup>2</sup> "to hear" <sup>3</sup> "to determine" <sup>4</sup> Bag of Secrets

<sup>5</sup> More's Indictment 4–11 <sup>6</sup> petty jury: a trial jury (as opposed to a grand jury) <sup>7</sup> Bag of Secrets <sup>8</sup> Guildhall Report 1.a <sup>9</sup> Guildhall Report 1.b <sup>10</sup> Guildhall Report 1.c <sup>11</sup> Guildhall Report 2.a

MORE (after being seated): "As for what pertains to the first part of the accusation, which has it that, to show the greatest possible malice of my mind against the King, I was a constant opponent in the contention over his second marriage, I have nothing to say other than what I have said before; and that is, that whatever I spoke in that matter, I did it at the urging of my conscience. For it did not behoove me, nor did I wish it, to conceal the truth from my prince. If I had not acted so, I would have been an enemy to him, not a faithful servant. Now for this sin, if it is proper to call it a sin, I was adjudged to perpetual imprisonment, in which I have now been detained for fifteen months, and my goods besides confiscated."<sup>12</sup>

In regard to the indictment, I openly declare that I would abide upon<sup>13</sup> it in law, were it not that I would thereby be driven to confess of myself the very matter, which is, the denial of the King's supremacy, which is untrue. Wherefore I plead thereto not guilty.<sup>14</sup>

I place myself for good or ill upon my country.<sup>15</sup>

And I reserve unto myself advantage to be taken of the body of the matter, after verdict, to a-void this indictment. But here I say that if only those odious terms, "maliciously, traitorously, and diabolically" were put out of the indictment, I see therein nothing justly wherewith to charge me.<sup>16</sup>

NARRATOR: The judges assigned the same day for More's trial and remanded him to Walsingham's custody until the petty jury is assembled and sworn.<sup>17</sup>

"Immediately twelve men were called by the Public Minister, after the custom of the British nation, to whom were given the chapters of accusation."<sup>18</sup>

More was called again to the bar.<sup>19</sup>

ATTORNEY GENERAL CHRISTOPHER HALES: Sir Thomas More, I challenge you to reply to the charges in the indictment.

MORE: "I reply only to the main heading of the first accusation. You say that I have merited the penalty inflicted by the statute passed in the last Parliament of our leaders, for which I was now held in custody, for the reason that, with malicious, false, and faithless mind, I injured the royal Majesty and name and titles and honor and dignity which they in the aforesaid Parliament or Council attributed to the King, by which he is considered to be Supreme Head after Jesus Christ of the English Church; and, above all, that you object to me that I wished to answer nothing to the Secretary of the King and to the honorable Council of the royal Majesty, when he asked me what my opinion was about that statute, other than that, because I was now dead to the world, I did not occupy myself with such things but only meditated on the Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ."<sup>20</sup>

"To which I clearly respond to you that it is not lawful for me to be judged to death for such silence on my part, because neither your statute nor anything in the laws of the whole world can rightly afflict anyone with punishment, unless one has committed a crime in word or deed, since laws have constituted no penalty for silence."<sup>21</sup>

HALES: "Such silence was a sure indication and a not obscure sign of some malign thinking about the statute, because all subjects, being faithful to their prince, when interrogated on their view concerning the statute, are obliged to respond openly, and without dissimulation, that it is good and holy."<sup>22</sup>

JUDGES: Malice! Malice!<sup>23</sup>

MORE: "But if it is true what universal law says, 'One who keeps silent seems to consent,' then that silence of mine gave approval to that statute of yours more than it weakened it. But as for all the faithful being bound and obliged to make response, etc., I answer that there is a much greater obligation on the part of a good man and faithful subject to consult his own conscience and eternal salvation, and to follow the prescriptions of reason, than to take account of any other thing, especially since the kind of conscience that I have offers no offense to its prince and stirs up no sedition — asserting this to you, that my conscience had not been opened to any mortal."<sup>24</sup>

"As for what I am accused of in the second part, that I contravened the statute and worked for its abolition in writings to the Bishop of Rochester, by means of eight letters in which I fortified him against your statute: again and again I wished for

<sup>12</sup> Guildhall Report 2.a in accordance with <sup>13</sup> abide upon: act Roper 3 <sup>14</sup> Bag of Secrets <sup>15</sup> Roper 3 <sup>16</sup> Bag of Secrets

<sup>17</sup> Bag of Secrets <sup>18</sup> Guildhall Report 7 <sup>19</sup> Bag of Secrets <sup>20</sup> Guildhall Report 2.b

<sup>21</sup> Guildhall

Report 2.c <sup>22</sup> Guildhall Report 3 <sup>23</sup> Pole 6 <sup>24</sup> Guildhall Report 4

those letters to have been publicly recited. But since, as you tell me, they were burned by the said Bishop, I myself will sum up for you their contents. Some of them dealt with familiar matters, such as our old custom and friendship called for. One of them responded to his request to know how I answered when first examined on the statute. I replied that I had exonerated my conscience and followed reason, and I urged him to do the same. This was, so help me God, the purport of my letters, and there is nothing on their account that should be judged worthy of death under your statute.”<sup>25</sup>

“As for what pertains to the third article, which says that when I was interrogated by the Council I responded that your statute is like a two-edged sword, so that one who obeyed it imperiled the salvation of his soul, while one who opposed it would lose his life; and that the Bishop of Rochester (you say) responded in the same way, from which it should appear that this was done by agreement between us, both of us responding in the same way: to this part of the accusation I respond that I was not speaking straightforwardly but only conditionally; that is, if there should be some statute that was like a two-edged sword, how could any person take care against coming up against one edge or the other? But what the Bishop of Rochester responded, I do not know. It may be that he responded in the same way, but it was not done through any conspiracy, but rather it occurred because of our similar minds and education. But believe me most assuredly on this point, that I never said or did anything maliciously against your statute. In the meantime, however, it could be that many things have been viciously and maliciously spoken about me to arouse hatred against me on the part of his royal Majesty.”<sup>26</sup>

NARRATOR: “And for proof to the jury that Sir Thomas More was guilty of this treason, Master Solicitor Rich was called forth to give evidence unto them upon his oath, as he did.”<sup>27</sup>

RICHARD RICH: My lords, I, being sent to Sir Thomas More into the Tower, along with Sir Richard Southwell and Master Palmer, servant to Secretary Cromwell, to fetch away his books from him, while Sir Richard and Master Palmer were busy in the trussing up of his books, spoke with him thus.”<sup>28</sup>

I asked him, if it were enacted by the authority of Parliament that if I myself, that is, Richard Rich, were king, and that it would be treason if anyone denied it, what would be the offense in the said Thomas More if the same Thomas said that the said Richard Rich was king? Certainly (I continued further), there would be no offense in his conscience, but rather the said Thomas More was obliged to say so and accept the same Richard, because the consent of the said Thomas More was obligated by the act of Parliament. The said Thomas More then and there responded and said that he would indeed commit an offense if he denied it, since he was able to give his consent to it. But he said that this case will be a trivial case.”<sup>29</sup>

“Therefore, the same Thomas then and there said to [me] that he would propose a more lofty case, saying thus: ‘Let us say that it was enacted by Parliament that God was not God, and that if anyone wished to impugn that act, it would be treason; if the question were put to you, Richard Rich, “Do you wish to say that God is not God,” in accord with the statute, and you said yes, would you not commit an offense?’”<sup>30</sup>

“To which [I said] . . . , ‘Yes, certainly, because it is impossible to bring it about that God be not God. And because your case is on such a high level, I will propose to you this middle case: You know that our Lord King has been constituted as Supreme Head on earth of the English Church; and why should not you, Master More, affirm and accept him as such in this case, just as in the foregoing case in which I was selected to be king? In that case you concede that you would be obligated to affirm and accept me as king.’”<sup>31</sup>

“To this the said Thomas More . . . responded to [me] that those cases are not like, because a king can be made by Parliament, and can be deprived by Parliament, to which act any subject being at the Parliament may give his consent; but to the case of a primacy, the subject cannot be bound, because he cannot give his consent from him in Parliament. And although the king were generally accepted as such in England, yet most outer parts do not affirm it.”<sup>32</sup>

AUDLEY: Let the prisoner be sworn to answer concerning the witness's testimony.

25 Guildhall Report 5 26 Guildhall Report 6 27 Roper 4 28 Roper 1

29 More's Indictment 11b 30 More's Indictment 11c 31 More's Indictment 11d

32 More's Indictment 11e

MORE (after being sworn specifically to respond to Rich's allegations): "If I were a man, my lords, that did not regard an oath, I needed not, as it is well known, in this place, at this time, nor in this case, to stand here as an accused person."<sup>33</sup>

"And if this oath of yours, Master Rich, be true, then pray I that I never see God in the face; which I would not say, were it otherwise, to win the whole world."<sup>34</sup>

My lords, I will here recite to you the discourse of all our communication in the Tower, according to the truth.<sup>35</sup>

Master Rich said unto me, "Forasmuch as it is well known, Master More, that you are a man both wise and well-learned as well in the laws of the realm as otherwise, I pray you therefore, sir, let me be so bold as of good will to put unto you this case. Admit there were, sir, . . . an act of Parliament that all the realm should take me for king. Would not you, Master More, take me for king?"

To which I replied: "Yes, sir, that would I."

"I put case further," quoth Master Rich, "that there were an act of Parliament that all the realm should take me for pope. Would not you, then, Master More, take me for pope?"

"For answer, sir," quoth I, "to your first case: the Parliament may well, Master Rich, meddle with the state of temporal princes. But to make answer to your other case, I will put you this case: suppose the Parliament would make a law that God should not be God. Would you then, Master Rich, say that God were not God?"

"No, sir," quoth he, "that would I not, since no Parliament may make any such law."

"No more," said I, "could the Parliament make the king Supreme Head of the Church [i.e., pope]."<sup>36</sup>

NARRATOR: Thus, having shown how Master Rich changed cases, from speaking about Rich being declared pope to speaking about King Henry being declared Head of the English Church, More addressed Master Rich directly:

MORE: "In good faith, Master Rich, I am sorrier for your perjury than for my own peril. And you shall understand that neither I nor no man else to my knowledge ever took you to be a man of such credit as in any matter of importance, aye, or any other, would at any time vouchsafe to communicate with you. And I, as you know, for no small while have been acquainted with you and your conversation, who have known you from your youth hitherto. For we long dwelled both in one parish together, where, as yourself can tell (I am sorry you compel me so to say), you were esteemed very light of your tongue, a great dicer, and of no commendable fame. And so in your house at the Temple, where hath been your chief bringing up, were you likewise accounted."<sup>37</sup>

NARRATOR: Sir Thomas More then addressed the judges:

MORE: "Can it therefore seem likely unto your honorable lordships that I would, in so weighty a cause, so unadvisedly overshoot myself as to trust Master Rich, a man of me always reputed for one of so little truth, as your lordships have heard, so far above my sovereign lord the King, or any of his noble councilors, that I would unto him utter the secrets of my conscience touching the king's supremacy, the special point and only mark at my hands so long sought for? A thing which I never did, nor never would, after the statute thereof made, reveal, either to the King's Highness himself, or to any of his honorable councilors, as it is not unknown to your honors at sundry several times sent from his Grace's own person unto the Tower unto me for none other purpose. Can this in your judgments, my lords, seem likely to be true?"<sup>38</sup>

"And yet, if I had so done in deed, my lords, as Master Rich hath sworn, seeing it was spoken but in familiar secret talk, nothing affirming, and only in putting of cases, without other displeasing circumstances, it cannot justly be taken to be spoken maliciously. And where there is no malice, there can be no offense. And over this I can never think, my lords, that so many worthy bishops, so many honorable personages, and so many other worshipful, virtuous, wise, and well-learned men as at the making of that law were in the Parliament assembled, ever meant to have any man punished by death in whom there could be found no malice, taking malitia for malevolentia. For if malitia be generally taken for 'sin,' no man is there then that can thereof excuse himself; quia, 'Si dixerimus quod peccatum non habemus, nosmetipsos seducimus, et veritas in nobis non est ["If we should say that we do not have sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us”].<sup>39</sup> And only this word maliciously is in the statute material, as this term forcible is in the Statute of Forcible Entries. By which statute, if a man enter peaceably and put not his adversary out forcibly, it is no offense. But if he put him out forcibly, then by the statute it is an offense, and so shall he be punished by this term forcibly.<sup>40</sup>

“Besides this, the manifold goodness of the King’s Highness himself, that hath been so many ways my singular good lord and gracious sovereign, that hath so dearly loved and trusted me, even at my very first coming into his noble service with the dignity of his honorable Privy Council vouchsafing to admit me, and to offices of great credit and worship most liberally advance me, and finally with that weighty room of his Grace’s high chancellor—the like whereof he never did to temporal man before—next to his own royal person the highest officer in this noble realm, so far above my merits or qualities able and meet therefore, of his incomparable benignity honored and exalted me, by the space of twenty years and more showing his continual favor towards me, and (until at my own poor suit, it pleased his Highness, giving me license, with his Majesty’s favor, to bestow the residue of my life for the provision of my soul in the service of God, of his especial goodness thereof to discharge and unburden me), most benignly heaped honors continually more and more upon me. All this his Highness’s goodness, I say, so long thus bountifully extended towards me, were, in my mind, my lords, matter sufficient to convince this slanderous surmise by this man so wrongfully imagined against me.”<sup>41</sup>

NARRATOR: “Master Rich, seeing himself so disproved, and his credit so foully defaced, caused Sir Richard Southwell and Master Palmer, that at the time of their communication were in the chamber, to be sworn what words had passed between them.”<sup>42</sup>

MASTER PALMER: My lords, I “was so busy about the trussing up of Sir Thomas More’s books in a sack, that [I] took no heed to their talk.”<sup>43</sup>

SIR RICHARD SOUTHWELL: My lords, I “was appointed only to look unto the conveyance of his books, [and therefore I] gave no ear unto them.”<sup>44</sup>

NARRATOR: “After this were there many other reasons by Sir Thomas More in his own defense alleged, to the discredit of Master Rich’s aforesaid evidence, and proof of the clearness of his own conscience.”<sup>45</sup>

AUDLEY: Let the jury now make deliberation over the accusations laid against the prisoner.

NARRATOR: “Now the twelve men, who according to the custom of our country have the power of life and death in trials, were called forward. And these men, since they had the word malice, which had sounded throughout the whole courtroom, fixed in their ears and minds, made no delay—in fact, it was a wonder that they could so quickly come to agreement.”<sup>46</sup>

The jury, “sitting about a quarter of an hour, after deliberation [having been] had among them . . . returned to the sight of the princes and judges delegate.”<sup>47</sup>

AUDLEY: How does the jury find? Is the prisoner guilty or not guilty of sinning maliciously against the statute?<sup>48</sup>

SPOKESMAN OF THE JURY: We find upon our oath that Thomas More is guilty of the treason imputed to him; and we find also that he possesses no lands or holdings or goods or chattels.<sup>49</sup>

ATTORNEY GENERAL HALES AND SERGEANTS-AT-LAW: We demand that judgment and execution be given against Thomas More according to the form of law.<sup>50</sup>

AUDLEY: We, the commissioned justices, having seen and understood all and singular of what has gone before, are ready to pronounce judgment of high treason against Thomas More.<sup>51</sup>

MORE (interrupting): “My lord, when I was toward the law, the manner in such case was to ask the prisoner before judgment why judgment should not be given against him.”<sup>52</sup>

AUDLEY: What are you able to say to the contrary of such judgment?

MORE: “Forasmuch as, my lord, . . . this indictment is grounded upon an act of Parliament directly repugnant to the laws of God and his holy Church, the supreme government of which, or of any part whereof, may no temporal prince presume by any law to take upon him, as rightfully belonging to the see of Rome, a spiritual preeminence by the mouth

5 of our Savior himself, personally present upon the earth, only to Saint Peter and his successors, bishops of the same see, by special prerogative granted; it is therefore in law amongst Christian men insufficient to charge any Christian man.”

10 “This realm, being but one member and small part of the Church, may not make a particular law disagreeable with the general law of Christ’s universal Catholic Church, no more than the city of London, being but one poor member in respect of the 15 whole realm, may make a law against an act of Parliament to bind the whole realm. . . . It [is] contrary both to the laws and statutes of our own land yet unrepealed, as [you] might evidently perceive in Magna Carta: Quod Ecclesia Anglicana libera sit et habeat omnia iura sua integra et libertates suas illaesas — [“That the English Church be free and have all of its rights whole and its liberties uninjured”]; and also contrary to that sacred oath which 20 the King’s Highness himself and every other Christian prince always with great solemnity receive at their coronations. . . . No more might this realm of England refuse obedience to the see of Rome than might the child refuse obedience to his own natural father. For, as Saint Paul said of the Corinthians, ‘I have regenerated you, my children in Christ.’ So might Saint Gregory, Pope of Rome, of whom,
25 by Saint Augustine, his messenger, we first received the Christian faith, of us Englishmen truly say: ‘You are my children, because I have given to you everlasting salvation, a far higher and better inheritance than any carnal father can leave to his child, and by regeneration made you my spiritual children in Christ.’”<sup>53</sup>

40 AUDLEY: But seeing that “all the bishops, universities, and best learned of this realm have to this act agreed,” I much marvel that you “alone against them all do so stiffly stick thereat, and so vehemently argue thereagainst.”<sup>54</sup>

45 MORE: “If the number of bishops and universities be so material as your lordship seemeth to take it, then see I little cause, my lord, why that thing in my conscience should make any change. For I nothing doubt but that, though not in this realm, yet in Christendom about, of these well-learned bishops and virtuous men that are yet alive, they be not 50 the fewer part that be of my mind therein. But if I should speak of those which already be dead, of whom many be now holy saints in heaven, I am very sure it is the far greater part of them that, all the while they lived, thought in this case that way that I

55 think now. And therefore am I not bound, my lord, to conform my conscience to the counsel of one realm against the general counsel of Christendom.”<sup>55</sup>

NARRATOR: Sir Thomas More added thereto many other exceptions, objections, and reasons for the voiding of the Indictment. Then “the Lord Chancellor, loath to have the burden of that judgment wholly to depend upon himself, there openly 60 asked the advice of the Lord FitzJames, then Lord Chief Justice of the King’s Bench, and joined in commission with him.”<sup>56</sup>

AUDLEY: My Lord Chief Justice, I put it to you, is “this indictment sufficient” in law?<sup>57</sup>

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE FITZJAMES: “My lords all, by Saint Julian, . . . I must needs confess that, if 70 the act of Parliament be not unlawful, then is not the Indictment, in my conscience, insufficient.”<sup>58</sup>

AUDLEY: “Lo, my lords, lo, you hear what my Lord Chief Justice says. [I therefore give] judgment 75 against him.”<sup>59</sup>

In accord with the Statute of Treasons, therefore, we adjudge you, Thomas More, lawfully convict of high treason, to be led by Deputy Constable Sir Edmund Walsingham “to the Tower of London, and thence dragged through the midst of the city of London directly to the gallows of Tyburn and hanged upon those gallows, and while alive to be 80 cast upon the earth and your entrails be taken from your belly and burned, you being still alive, and your head to be struck off and your body divided into four parts, and that your head and quarters be placed where the Lord King shall wish to assign them.”<sup>60</sup>

SIR JOHN SPELMAN (aside to his fellow justices): I sum up the case thus for my reports: Sir Thomas 90 More, Knight, one-time chancellor of England, having been “arraigned before the said chancellor, Sir Thomas Audley, and the other commissioners, for treason, in that he was an aider, counselor, and abettor to the Bishop, and also for that he falsely, maliciously, and traitorously desiring, willing, and scheming, contrived, practiced, and attempted to deprive the King of his dignity, name, and title of Supreme Head on earth of the Church of England, [is] found guilty, and the said chancellor gave judgment.”<sup>61</sup>

OTHER JUDGES: Sir Thomas, have you anything else to add in your defense? We will be favorably attentive to whatever you have to say.<sup>62</sup>

MORE: My lords, “since I have been adjudged to death, whether rightly or wrongly, God knows, for the exonerating of my conscience I would willingly say some words to you concerning your statute. I affirm that I have spent all my study during the whole of the last seven years, and I have never found an approved doctor of the Church to hold that any layman is the head of an ecclesiastical order.”<sup>63</sup>

SPELMAN (aside): He stands firmly against the statute, holding that “Parliament could not make the king Supreme Head” of the English Church.<sup>64</sup>

AUDLEY (interrupting More's statement): “Do you wish to be more prudent and religious than all the bishops, the whole nobility, and all of the people who are subjects of the King and his kingdom?”<sup>65</sup>

MORE: “For one bishop who agrees with you, I have easily a hundred, including some who are among the saints. And for your one council, Parliament, and your statute — what it is worth the great good God knows — on my side are all the general councils celebrated during the last thousand years. And for one kingdom, the kingdom of France and all other kingdoms of the Christian world agree with me.”<sup>66</sup>

NORFOLK: “More, now you are plainly revealing your mind's stubborn malice.”<sup>67</sup>

MORE: “What I say, I say because necessity compels me, for I wish to exonerate my conscience and not weigh down my soul. I call on God, the searcher of hearts, as witness.”<sup>68</sup>

“I add this besides, that your statute was wrongly made, because you deliberately swore your oaths against the Church, which alone is whole and undivided through the whole Christian world. And you alone have no power to enact anything, without the consent of all other Christians, which is contrary to the unity and concord of the Christian religion.”<sup>69</sup>

I am now for the first time revealing my opinion concerning this law by which the king has been appointed Head of the Church in England. I have not done so before this, to avoid giving my enemies further opportunity of lashing out against me, and it would have hindered my defense here today. But I speak out now, “being mindful of my care for England, lest any person therein should imprudently and ignorantly favor this pestiferous law. This law is in contradiction to all human and divine laws. It will be more pernicious to anyone who assents to it than it has been to me, who stand condemned to capital punishment for having dissented from it.”<sup>70</sup>

One final word, my lords: “I am not unaware of the reason for which you have adjudged me to death. The one single cause is that I have been unwilling over the past years to consent to the second marriage of the King.”<sup>71</sup>

NARRATOR: Now More addressed all present.

MORE: “Here indeed is a place of discord, dissension, and tumult, but I go now to where the root of all strife and dissension is removed, where love, peace, concord, and tranquility will live in all.”<sup>72</sup>

“But still I have great hope in the divine clemency and goodness that, as we read that Saint Paul persecuted Blessed Stephen,<sup>73</sup> but they are now together in heaven, so all of us, though we disagree in this life, will nevertheless agree in another life with perfect charity. I therefore pray the great good God to guard the King, conserve him, and make him safe, and send him salutary counsel.”<sup>74</sup>

NARRATOR: More turned back to the judges.

MORE: “More have I not to say, my lords, but that . . . I verily trust, and shall therefore right heartily pray, that though your lordships have now here in earth been judges to my condemnation, we may yet hereafter in heaven merrily all meet together, to our everlasting salvation.”<sup>75</sup>

<sup>61</sup> Spelman Report <sup>62</sup> Roper 20
<sup>63</sup> Guildhall Report 8 <sup>64</sup> Spelman
Report <sup>65</sup> Guildhall Report 9

<sup>66</sup> Guildhall Report 10 <sup>67</sup> Guildhall
Report 11 <sup>68</sup> Guildhall Report 11
<sup>69</sup> Guildhall Report 12 <sup>70</sup> Pole 8

<sup>71</sup> Guildhall Report 12 <sup>72</sup> Pole 9
<sup>73</sup> See Acts 6–9. <sup>74</sup> Guildhall Report 13
<sup>75</sup> Roper 20

NARRATOR: “Now after this arraignment, departed he from the bar to the Tower again, led by Sir William Kingston, a tall, strong, and comely knight, constable of the Tower, and his very dear friend, 5 who, when he had brought him from Westminster to the Old Swan towards the Tower, with a heavy heart, the tears running down his cheeks,” spoke to him:

SIR WILLIAM KINGSTON: My old friend, I here
10 bid you farewell.

MORE: “Good Master Kingston, trouble not yourself, but be of good cheer; for I will pray for you, and my good lady, your wife, that we may meet in heaven together, where we shall be merry forever 15 and ever.”<sup>76</sup>

NARRATOR: Then, “before he arrived at the prison, one of his daughters, named Margaret, rushing through the midst of the crowd of guards and soldiers, burning with great desire for her parent, 20 taking no care for herself or the public place or those standing by, she barely broke through at last to her father, and there, embracing his neck with pitiable weeping she bore witness to her extreme grief. And after she held onto him tightly for some time, with 25 sorrow completely overcoming her voice, her father with the guards' permission consoled her thus:

MORE: “Margaret, be of strong spirit, and do not torment yourself further; this is God's will. You have long known all the secrets of my mind.”<sup>77</sup>

NARRATOR: “Then, when her father had scarcely 30 been taken away another ten or twelve steps, she again fell upon him and once more threw her arms around her father's neck. Thereupon More, shedding no tears, and showing no distress of countenance or mind, said only this:
35

MORE: “Farewell, and pray to God for the salvation of my soul.”<sup>78</sup>

NARRATOR: “On the day before<sup>79</sup> the Nones<sup>80</sup> of July, his head was struck off in the great field before the royal Tower, and he spoke a few words before he was beheaded simply asking the crowd to 40 pray for him in this life and he in turn would intercede for them in another life. Finally he strongly exhorted them and urged them to pray to God for the King, that he would grant him right counsel and 45 good mind; openly protesting and declaring that he died a faithful minister to him, yet first of all to God Almighty.”<sup>81</sup>

ABBREVIATIONS OF SOURCES

Bag of Secrets PRO KB 8/7, part 3 (Bag of Secrets) in The National Archives, Kew: Trial of Thomas More, 26 June–1 July 1535.

Guildhall Report Guildhall MS 1231, as recovered from the composite Latin text in J. Duncan Derrett's “Neglected Versions of the Contemporary Account of the Trial of Sir Thomas More,” Bulletin of the Institute of Historical Research 33 (1960): 214–23, trans. H. A. Kelly.

More's Indictment Nicholas Harpsfield's The Life and Death of Sir Thomas Moore, Knight, ed. Elsie Vaughan Hitchcock (London: The Early English Text Society, 1932): 267–76, trans. H. A. Kelly.

Pole Reginald Pole's Pole's Defense of the Unity of the Church, trans. Joseph G. Dwyer (Westminster, Maryland: Newman Press, 1965): 217–27.

Roper William Roper's The Life of Sir Thomas Moore, Knight, ed. Elsie Vaughan Hitchcock (London: The Early English Text Society, 1935): 84–97.

Spelman Report The Reports of Sir John Spelman, 1:58, ed. J. H. Baker (London: Publications of the Seldon Society, 1977).

<sup>76</sup> Roper 22 <sup>77</sup> Guildhall Report 14
<sup>78</sup> Guildhall Report 14 <sup>79</sup> day before:

July 6 <sup>80</sup> the ninth day before the ides:
i.e., July 7 <sup>81</sup> Guildhall Report 15–16

Laws, Acts, and Oaths Related to Thomas More's Trial

1. Magna Carta Libertatem (“The Great Charter of Liberty”), Article 1, 1215

5 During his trial, More appealed to this provision of the Magna Carta. The translation below is taken from G. R. C. Davis, Magna Carta, Revised Edition (London: British Library, 1989).

10 First, we have granted<sup>1</sup> to God, and by this present charter have confirmed for us and our heirs in perpetuity, that the English Church shall be free, and shall have its rights undiminished, and its liberties unimpaired. That we wish this so to be observed, appears from the fact that of our own free will, before the outbreak of the present dispute between us and our barons, we granted and confirmed by charter the freedom of the Church's elections—a right reckoned to be of the greatest necessity and importance to it—and caused this to be confirmed by 15 Pope Innocent III. This freedom we shall observe ourselves, and desire to be observed in good faith by our heirs in perpetuity.

20 To all free men of our kingdom we have also granted, for us and our heirs for ever, all the liberties written out below, to have and to keep for them and their heirs, of us and our heirs

2. King's Coronation Oath, 1308

30 During his trial, Thomas More also invoked the kings' Coronation Oath, which dates back in some form to the 900s with the Anglo-Saxon kings. At least since the coronation of Edward II in 1308, the oath was administered, traditionally by the Archbishop of Canterbury, in the form of question and answer given here (Statutes of the Realm 1.168). The text of that 1308 oath follows, taken from Sources of English Constitutional History, ed. C. Stephenson and F. G. Marcham (New York: Harper Brothers, 1937). A manuscript copy of this Coronation Oath, with striking changes proposed in Henry's own hand, survives and 35 dates likely from the early 1530s.

ARCHBISHOP: “Sire, will you grant and keep and by your oath confirm to the people of England the laws and customs given to them by the previous just and God-fearing kings, your ancestors, and especially the laws, customs, and liberties granted to the clergy and people by the glorious king, the sainted Edward, your predecessor?” 45

KING: “I grant and promise them.”

ARCHBISHOP: “Sire, will you in all your judgments, so far as in you lies, preserve to God and Holy Church, and to the people and clergy, entire peace and concord before God?” 50

KING: “I will preserve them.”

ARCHBISHOP: “Sire will you so far as in you lies, cause justice to be rendered rightly, impartially, and wisely, in compassion and in truth?” 55

KING: “I will do so.”

ARCHBISHOP: “Sire, do you grant to be held and observed the just laws and customs that the community of your realm shall determine, and will you, so far as in you lies, defend and strengthen them to the honor of God?” 60

KING: “I grant and promise them.”

3. Oath of the Act of Succession, 1534

65 In April 1534, Sir Thomas More and others were arrested for refusing to take an oath required but not formulated by Parliament's First Act of Succession (March 1534, 25 Henry VIII c. 22). In the November–December session of Parliament, that oath was formulated in what is now known as the Second Act of Succession (26 Henry VIII c. 2). Misprision of treason (life imprisonment and loss of all property) was the automatic penalty for refusal to take this oath. The source for this and the following texts are Documents Illustrative of English Church History, ed. Henry Gee and William John Hardy (London: Macmillan, 1896). 70 75

<sup>1</sup> The Latin is concessisse, meaning to “concede” or “assent.”

Where at the last session of this present Parliament, in the Act then made for the establishment of the succession of the heirs of the King's highness in the imperial crown of this realm, it is contained, amongst other things, that all and singular the King's subjects, as well the nobles spiritual and temporal as other, should make and take a corporal oath, whensoever it should please the King's majesty, or his heirs, to appoint, that they should truly, firmly, and constantly, without fraud or guile, observe, fulfil, maintain, defend, and keep, to their cunning, wit, and uttermost of their powers, the whole effects and contents of the said Act, as in the same Act, among other things, more plainly appeareth.

And at the day of the last prorogation of this present Parliament, as well the nobles spiritual and temporal as other the Commons of this present Parliament, most lovingly accepted and took such oath as then was devised in writing for maintenance and defence of the said Act, and meant and intended at that time that every other the King's subjects should be bound to accept and take the same, upon the pains contained in the said Act, the tenor of which oath hereafter ensueth:

Ye shall swear to bear faith, truth, and obedience alonely to the King's majesty, and to his heirs of his body of his most dear and entirely beloved lawful wife Queen Anne, begotten and to be begotten, and further to the heirs of our said sovereign lord according to the limitation in the statute made for surety of his succession in the crown of this realm, mentioned and contained, and not to any other within this realm, for foreign authority or potentate: and in case any oath be made, or has been made, by you, to any person or persons, that then ye to repute the same as vain and annihilate; and that, to your cunning, wit, and uttermost of your power, without guile, fraud, or other undue means, you shall observe, keep, maintain, and defend the said Act of Succession, and all the whole effects and contents thereof, and all other Acts and statutes made in confirmation, or for the execution of the same, or of anything therein contained; and this ye shall do against all manner of persons, of what estate, dignity, degree, or condition soever they be, and in no wise do or attempt, nor to your power suffer to be done or attempted, directly or indirectly, any thing or things privily or aparty to the let, hindrance, damage, or derogation thereof, or of any part of the same, by any manner of means, or for any manner of pretense; so help you God, all saints, and the holy Evangelists.

And forasmuch as it is convenient for the sure maintenance and defence of the same Act that the said oath should not only be authorized by authority of Parliament, but also be interpreted and expounded by the whole assent of this present Parliament, that is was meant and intended by the King's majesty, the Lords and Commons of the Parliament, at the said day of the said last prorogation, that every subject should be bounden to take the same oath, according to the tenor and effect thereof, upon the pains and penalties contained in the said Act:

Therefore be it enacted by authority of this present Parliament that the said oath above rehearsed shall be interpreted, expounded, reputed, accepted, and adjudged the very oath that the King's highness, the lords spiritual and temporal, and the Commons of this present Parliament meant and intended that every subject of this realm should be obliged and bounden to take and accept, for maintenance and defence of the same Act, upon the pains contained in the said Act, and that every of the King's subjects, upon the said pains, shall be obliged to accept and take the said oath. And be it further enacted by authority aforesaid that the commissioners that hereafter shall be appointed to receive such oath of the King's subjects, or two of them at least, shall have power and authority to certify into the King's Bench, by writing under their seals, every refusal that hereafter shall be made afore them of the same oath by any person or persons coming before them to take the same oath; and that every such certificate to be made by such commissioners, as is aforesaid, shall be taken as strong and as available in the law as an indictment of twelve men lawfully found of the said refusal; so that the person and persons, against whom any such certificate shall be made, shall be compelled to answer hereunto as if they were indicted; and that such process, judgement, execution, and every other thing shall be had, used, and ministered, of and upon every such certificate against the offenders, as if they had been lawfully indicted of such offenses by the due course and order of the common laws of this realm.

4. Act of Supremacy, November 1534

This statute decreed that the English monarch is the "Supreme Head of the Church of England" (26 Henry VIII, c. 1; Statutes of the Realm 3.492). Accordingly, More was indicted with high treason for having "falsely, traitorously, and maliciously by craft schemed, contrived, practiced, and attempted to fundamentally deprive" King Henry of "his dignity, title, and name of Supreme Head on earth of the English Church."

10 Albeit the King's Majesty justly and rightfully is and ought to be the Supreme Head of the Church of England, and so is recognized by the clergy of this realm in their Convocations, yet nevertheless, for corroboration and confirmation thereof, and 15 for increase of virtue in Christ's religion within this realm of England, and to repress and extirpate all errors, heresies, and other enormities and abuses heretofore used in the same, be it enacted, by authority of this present Parliament, that the King,
20 our sovereign lord, his heirs and successors, kings of this realm, shall be taken, accepted, and reputed the only Supreme Head in earth of the Church of England, called Anglicana Ecclesia; and shall have and enjoy, annexed and united to the imperial crown of 25 this realm, as well the title and style thereof, as all honors, dignities, preeminences, jurisdictions, privileges, authorities, immunities, profits, and commodities to the said dignity of the Supreme Head of the same Church belonging and appertaining;
30 and that our said sovereign lord, his heirs and successors, kings of this realm, shall have full power and authority from time to time to visit, repress, redress, record, order, correct, restrain, and amend all such errors, heresies, abuses, offenses, contempts
35 and enormities, whatsoever they be, which by any manner of spiritual authority or jurisdiction ought or may lawfully be reformed, repressed, ordered, redressed, corrected, restrained, or amended, most to the pleasure of almighty God, the increase of vir-
40 tue in Christ's religion, and for the conservation of the peace, unity, and tranquility of this realm; any usage, custom, foreign land, foreign authority, prescription, or any other thing or things to the contrary hereof notwithstanding.

5. Act of Attainder<sup>2</sup> of Sir Thomas More, Nov/Dec 1534

More was imprisoned in April 1534 and was to be tried for violating the Act of Succession whereby the crime would be misprison of treason and the penalty life imprisonment. Instead of a trial, the November/December Parliament declared More guilty of mis-50 prison by this Act of Attainder for his "obstinate refusal" to take the oath required by the Act of Succession (26 Henry VIII, c. 23). An Act of Attainder is a legislative bill "introduced or passed in the English Parliament (first in 1459) for attainting any one without a judicial trial" (OED). An excerpt is given here from Statutes of the Realm 3.528.

... And forasmuch as the said Sir Thomas More, contrary to the trust and confidence aforesaid, being lawfully and duly required, since the first day of May last past unnaturally and contrary to his duty of allegiance, intending to sow and make sedition, murmur, and grudge within this the King's realm among the true obedient and faithful subjects of 60 the same, hath obstinately, forwardly and contemptuously refused to make and receive such corporal oath as was ordained to be accepted of every subject of this realm for the surety and establishment of the succession of our said sovereign lord in the imperial crown of this realm. And for that he has unkindly and ungratefully served our said sovereign lord by diverse and sundry ways, means, and conditions contrary to his trust and confidence. . . .

... And further be it enacted by the authority of this present Parliament, that forasmuch as the said Sir Thomas More, by the obstinate refusal of the said oath, has committed and done misprison of high treason, that the same Sir Thomas More for his offenses aforesaid shall stand and be attainted convicted of misprison of high treason, in such manner and form as if he were attainted for the same offense of misprison of high treason by the due order of the common law, and shall suffer such pains of imprisonment of his body, and losses of his goods, chattels, debts, leases for years, states of freehold, and other forfeitures and penalties contained, specified, and provided in the statute of succession of the crown of this realm for offenses of misprison of high treason, in such manner, form, and condition
80
85
90

<sup>2</sup> An Act of Attainder is a legislative bill "introduced or passed in the English Parliament (first in 1459) for attainting any one without a judicial trial" (OED).

to all intents and purpose as if the said Sir Thomas More for the same offense of misprision of high treason were lawfully attainted by order of the common law upon the same. . . .

5 6. The Treasons Act, 1534

To enforce the First and Second Acts of Succession, Parliament also passed the Treasons Act (26 Henry VIII, c. 13; Statutes of the Realm 3.508) at the November/December session, to be in effect as of February 1, 1535. At his July 1 trial, More was found guilty of high treason as defined by this Act, guilty of malicious action to deprive the King of his legislatively conferred new powers. An excerpt is given here.

15 . . . Be it therefore enacted by the assent and consent of our sovereign lord the King, and the lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that if any person or persons, after the first day of February next coming, do maliciously wish, 20 will or desire, by words or writing, or by craft imagine, invent, practice, or attempt any bodily harm to be done or committed to the King's most royal person, the Queen's, or their heirs apparent, or to deprive them or any of them of their dignity, title, or 25 name of their royal estates, or slanderously and maliciously publish and pronounce, by express writing or words, that the King our sovereign lord should be heretic, schismatic, tyrant, infidel, or usurper of the crown, or rebelliously do detain, keep, or withhold from our said sovereign lord, his heirs or successors, any of his or their castles, fortresses, fortalices, or holds within this realm, or in any other the King's dominions or marches, or rebelliously detain, keep, or withhold from the King's said Highness, his heirs or successors, any of his or their ships, 35 ordnances, artillery, or other munitions or fortifications of war, and do not humbly render and give up to our said sovereign lord, his heirs or successors, or to such persons as shall be deputed by them, such castles, fortresses, fortalices, holds, ships, ordnances, 40 artillery, and other munitions and fortifications of war, rebelliously kept or detained, within six days next after they shall be commanded by our said sovereign lord, his heirs or successors, by open proclamation under the great seal: 45

That then every such person and persons so offending in any the premises, after the said first day of February, their aiders, counselors, consenters, and abettors, being thereof lawfully convicted according to the laws and customs of this realm, shall 50 be adjudged traitors, and that every such offense in any the premises, that shall be committed or done after the said first day of February, shall be reputed, accepted, and adjudged high treason, and the offenders therein and their aiders, consenters, counselors, and abettors, being lawfully convicted of any 55 such offense as is aforesaid, shall have and suffer such pains of death and other penalties, as is limited and accustomed in cases of high treason. . . .

The Earliest Biographical Accounts and Collected Editions, 1506–95

These early documents offer a representative range of responses to More and date from roughly 1506–56. They articulate and anticipate the debate over More’s life and legacy, which began in his own time and the years following his death for high treason. More recently, debate over More intensified with the work of revisionist historians and biographers such as Geoffrey Elton, Alistair Fox, and Richard Marius, and responses to their accounts by scholars such as John Guy, Eamon Duffy, Cathy Curtis, Travis Curtright, Richard Rex, and Joanne Paul. Considering this complex debate, John Guy asks at the beginning of his Thomas More, “Is there an historical Thomas More? Which of the many characterizations that have attached to his name, some blatantly incompatible, are upheld by the sources?” (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000, ix).

Two recent accounts of More’s complex legacy are Anne Lake Prescott’s essay, “Afterlives,” in the Cambridge Companion to Thomas More (2011), and Travis Curtright’s “Iconic Thomas Mores on Trial,” the conclusion of his study The One Thomas More (2012). For a thorough cataloguing of the many references to Thomas More in early modern England, see Sir Thomas More in the English Renaissance: An Annotated Catalogue (Binghamton, NY: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1994). For accounts of the various biographies of Thomas More, see Germain Marc’hadour’s “Latin Lives of Thomas More,” and Michael Ackland’s “Modern Biographies of Sir Thomas More,” both published in A Companion to Thomas More, ed. A.D. Cousins and Damian Grace (Madison: Farleigh Dickinson University Press, 2009).

CONTENTS

Erasmus on Thomas More (1506–35) . . . . .	1369
1 May 1506, to Richard Whitford. . . . .	1369
23 July 1519, to Ulrich von Hutten . . . . .	1369
September 1521, to Guillaume Budé . . . . .	1374
Late 1532, to John Faber . . . . .	1377
August–September 1535, Erasmus’s Final Comments . . . . .	1380
Robert Whittington on Thomas More (1519–20) . . . . .	1381
William Tyndale on Thomas More (1530–31) . . . . .	1382
Paris Newsletter Account of More’s Trial and Death (1535). . . . .	1384
Reginald Pole on Thomas More (1536) . . . . .	1385
Edward Hall on Thomas More (1548) . . . . .	1386
William Roper’s Life of Thomas More (1556) . . . . .	1390
Workes of Sir Thomas More Knight (1557) . . . . .	1417
Nicholas Harnpsfield’s Life and Death of Sir Thomas More, Knight (ca. 1557) . . . . .	1420
John Foxe’s Acts and Monuments (1563–83). . . . .	1421
Thomae Mori Lucubrationes (1563) . . . . .	1422
Thomae Mori Opera Omnia (1565, 1566). . . . .	1423
Thomas Stapleton’s Vita Thomae Mori (1588) . . . . .	1424
Book of Sir Thomas More (ca. 1592–95) . . . . .	1425

In this painting that Erasmus sent to Thomas More (see Plate 9c) as a sign of friendship, artist Quentin Matsys gives a good imitation of Erasmus's handwriting. On the right-hand side, Erasmus is paraphrasing the epistle of St. Paul to the Romans. The Latin, reconstructed, is:

IN EPISTOLAM AD RO-
MANOS PARIPHASIS
ERASMI ROTERO DAME
PAulus ego ille e Saulo factus, e turbulem te pacificus, nuper obnox-ius legi mosaice. nunc Moisi Libertus. seruus autem factus Iesus.

On the LETTER TO THE ROMANS:
A PARAPHRASE OF
ERASMUS OF ROTTERDAM
I, the Paul who once was Saul, once a turbulent man,
but now a man of peace, lately subject to the Mosaic law, but now, as Moses' Freedman, having become the servant of Jesus . . .

On the left-hand page is the word Gratia or "grace," a key term of Paul's epistle. Erasmus wears a signet ring (a gift from More) and is using a reed pen, his favorite writing instrument.

Earliest Accounts and Editions

ERASMUS ON THOMAS MORE

191. To Richard Whitford<sup>1</sup>

From the country, 1 May 1506

Erasmus of Rotterdam to his delightful friend, the English scholar Richard Whitford.

After being quite immersed in Greek literature for some years now, my dear Richard, I have recently turned to writing Latin declamations, just for the sake of getting on familiar terms again with that language. This I did at the suggestion of Thomas More, who is, as you are aware, so full of eloquence that he could not fail to carry any argument, even with an enemy, and whom I regard with such affection that, even if he ordered me to join the rope-circle and dance,<sup>2</sup> I should obey him without hesitation. He himself tackles the same theme,<sup>3</sup> with such thoroughness too that there is not a single point he fails to investigate and account for. And I believe (unless I am deluded by the intensity of the love I bear him) that nature never created a livelier mind, or one quicker, more discerning, or clearer — in short, more perfectly endowed with all the talents — than his; and his intelligence is matched by his power of expression. Moreover, he has an exceptionally charming disposition and a great deal of wit; yet the wit is good-natured; so you could not find him lacking in a single one of the qualities needed by the perfect barrister.

Consequently it was not my intention, when I undertook to write this, either to rival or to outdo such a skillful practitioner, but merely to wrestle, as it were, in this contest of wits with the most congenial of all my friends, in whose company I enjoy combining jest and earnest; and I have done so all the more willingly because I am most anxious that this sort of exercise, which I regard as the most profitable of all, should someday be revived in our schools. The lack of it is, I believe, the sole reason why in this age of ours, in spite of the myriads who peruse the pages of the most eloquent authors, there are nevertheless so few who do not seem totally inarticulate when the occasion calls for an orator. But if we were to follow the precepts of Cicero and Quintilian, and also the general practice of antiquity, and carefully train ourselves from boyhood onwards in exercises of this kind, I believe there would be less of the poverty of expression, the pitiful lack of style, and the disgraceful stammering we see even among public professors of the art of oratory.

Please bear in mind, as you read my declamation, that I did not compose it but merely threw it off as a recreation within a very few days. At the same time I request you also to compare it with More's, and in this way judge if there be any difference in style between two authors whom you used to describe as so similar in mind, character, outlook, and pursuits that, you said, no pair of twins on earth could be more alike. One thing is sure; as you love both of them equally, so you in turn are equally beloved of them both. Farewell, my sweet and most charming Richard.

In the country, 1 May 1506

999. To Ulrich von Hutten<sup>4</sup>

Antwerp, 23 July 1519

Erasmus of Rotterdam to the Honorable Ulrich von Hutten, Knight, greetings.

The affection — one might almost say, the passion — that you feel for that gifted man Thomas More,<sup>5</sup> fired as of course you are by reading his books, which you rightly call as brilliant as they are scholarly — all this, believe me my dear Hutten, you share with many of us, and between you and More it works both ways: he in his turn is so delighted with the originality of your own work that I am almost jealous of you. Surely this is an example of that wisdom

<sup>1</sup> Translation by R. A. B. Mynors, from CWE 2: 112–13. Whitford was a close friend of both More and Erasmus; at that time he was chaplain to Bishop Foxe. <sup>2</sup> See Terence, Adelphoe 752. <sup>3</sup> See above

in “Lucian Translations and Response.”

<sup>4</sup> Translation by R. A. B. Mynors, from CWE 7: 16–25. Von Hutten (1488–1523) was a German poet, scholar, satirist, and humanist who eventually allied himself with Luther and turned against Erasmus.

<sup>5</sup> More is forty-one and has completed his first year in Henry VIII's service. Erasmus and More first met in 1499, when More was twenty-one.

which Plato calls the most desirable of all things, which rouses far more passionate desire in mortal hearts than the most splendid physical beauty. The eyes of the body cannot perceive it, but the mind
 5 has its own eyes, so that here too we find the truth of the old Greek saying that the eye is the gateway to the heart. They are the means through which the most cordial affection sometimes unites men who have never exchanged a word or set bodily eyes on 10 one another. It is a common experience that for some obscure reason one man is captivated by this form of beauty and another by something different; and in the same way between one man's spirit and another's there seems to be a kind of unspoken kinship, which makes us take great delight in certain 15 special people, and less in others.

Be that as it may, you ask me to draw a picture of More for you at full length, and I wish I were as skillful as you are eager. For me too it would be 20 nothing but a pleasure to spend a little time thinking about the friend I love best. But there are difficulties: it is not everyone can appreciate all More's gifts, and I doubt if he would endure to be depicted by any and every artist. It is, I suspect, no easier to 25 produce a portrait of More than one of Alexander the Great or Achilles, nor did they deserve their immortality any more than he does. Such a sitter demands the skill of an Apelles, and I fear there is less of Apelles in me than of Fulvius or Rutuba. I will 30 try, however, to do you not so much a picture as an outline sketch of the whole man, based on long-standing and intimate acquaintance, as far as my observation or memory will serve. Should any mission overseas eventually bring you together, you will
 35 realize what an incompetent artist you have selected for this task, and I am afraid that you will think me either envious or purblind — too blind to detect, or too envious to be willing to record more than a few of all his good qualities.

To begin with one aspect of More which is quite unknown to you, in stature and habit of body he is not tall, without being noticeably short, but the general harmony of his proportions is such that nothing seems amiss. He has a fair skin; his complexion tends to be warm rather than pale, though 45 with no tendency to a high color, except for a very delicate flush which suffuses it all. His hair blackish-brown, or brownish-black if you prefer; beard somewhat thin; eyes rather greyish-blue, with a kind of 50 fleck in them, the sort that usually indicates a gifted intelligence, and among the English is thought attractive, while our own people prefer dark eyes. No kind of eye, they say, is so immune from defects. His expression shows the sort of man he is, always 55 friendly and cheerful, with something of the air of one who smiles easily, and (to speak frankly) disposed to be merry rather than serious or solemn, but without a hint of the fool or the buffoon. His right shoulder looks a little higher than his left, especially when walking, not by nature but from force

 60 of habit, like so many human tricks. Otherwise there is nothing to criticize in his physique. Only his hands are a trifle coarse, at least if one compares them with his other bodily features. As for the care of his personal appearance, he has taken absolutely 65 no heed of it ever since boyhood, to the extent of devoting very little care even to those niceties allotted to the gentlemen by Ovid. How good-looking he was as a young man, one can guess even now by what remains — though I knew him myself when he 70 was not more than three-and-twenty, for even now he is scarcely past his fortieth year.

He enjoys good, but not rude, health, adequate at any rate to support all the duties of a good citizen, and is subject to no complaints or very few; there is every hope that he will enjoy long life, for his father is still alive at a great age, but wonderfully active and 75 vigorous for his years. I have never seen a man less particular about his food. Until he reached manhood he was content to drink nothing but water, a habit inherited from his father. Only, for fear of 80 causing any embarrassment in this regard, he used to drink his beer out of a pewter tankard, so that the guests did not know — small beer next door to water, and often just water. As for wine, the habit in 85 those parts being to invite your neighbor to drink in his turn from the same cup, he sometimes barely sipped it, so as not to seem entirely to dislike it, and at the same time to learn to follow common usage. Beef, salt fish, and coarse bread with much yeast in 90 it he preferred to the dishes of which most people are fond, though in other ways he was by no means averse from all the things that bring harmless pleasure, be it only to the body. Dairy produce and all the fruit which grows on trees have always had a
 95 great attraction for him, and he is particularly devoted to eggs. His voice is not loud, yet not particularly soft, but of a sort to strike clearly on the ear; no music in it, no subtlety, a straightforward speaking voice, for he does not seem framed by nature to be a singer, though he is fond of music of all kinds. His language is remarkably clear and precise, without a trace of hurry or hesitation.
 100

Simple clothes please him best, and he never wears silk or scarlet or a gold chain, except when it is not open to him to lay it aside. He sets surprisingly little store by the ceremonies which ordinary men regard as a touchstone of good breeding; these he neither demands from other people nor tenders meticulously himself either in public assemblies or in private parties, although he is familiar with them should he wish to use them. But he thinks it effeminate and unworthy of a man to waste a good part of his time in such frivolities.

Court life and the friendship of princes were formerly not to his taste, for he has always had a special hatred of tyranny and a corresponding love for equality. You will hardly find any court, however modest, that is not full of turmoil and self-seeking, of pretense and luxury, and is really free from any taint of despotic power. Even the court of Henry VIII he could not be induced to enter except by great efforts, although it would be difficult to wish for anything more cultured and more unassuming than the present king. By nature he has a great love of liberty and leisure; but dearly as he loves to enjoy leisure when he can, no one displays more energy or more endurance at the call of duty.

Friendship he seems born and designed for; no one is more open-hearted in making friends or more tenacious in keeping them, nor has he any fear of that plethora of friendships against which Hesiod warns us. The road to a secure place in his affections is open to anyone. In the choice of friends he is never difficult to please, in keeping up with them the most compliant of men, and in retaining them the most unflinching. If by any chance he has picked on someone whose faults he cannot mend, he waits for an opportunity to be quit of him, loosening the knot of friendship and not breaking it off. When he finds open-hearted people naturally suited to him, he enjoys their company and conversation so much that one would think he reckoned such things the chief pleasure in life. For ball games, games of chance, and cards he hates, and all the other pastimes with which the common run of grandees normally beguile their tedious hours. Besides which, though somewhat negligent in his own affairs, no one could take more trouble in furthering the business of his friends. In a word, whoever desires a perfect example of true friendship, will seek it nowhere to better purpose than in More.

In society he shows such rare courtesy and sweetness of disposition that there is no man so melancholy by nature that More does not enliven him, no disaster so great that he does not dissipate its unpleasantness. From boyhood he has taken such pleasure in jesting that he might seem born for it, but in this he never goes as far as buffoonery, and he has never liked bitterness. In his youth he both wrote brief comedies and acted in them. Any remark with more wit in it than ordinary always gave him pleasure, even if directed against himself—such is his delight in witty sayings that betray a lively mind. Hence his trying his hand as a young man at epigrams, and his special devotion to Lucian; in fact it was he (yes, he can make the camel dance) who persuaded me to write my In Praise of Folly.

In fact there is nothing in human life to which he cannot look for entertainment, even in most serious moments. If he has to do with educated and intelligent people, he enjoys their gifts; if they are ignorant and stupid, he is amused by their absurdity. He has no objection to professional buffoons, such is the skill with which he adapts himself to the mood of anyone. With women as a rule, and even with his wife, he confines himself to humor and pleasantries. You would think him Democritus<sup>6</sup> reborn, or rather that Pythagorean philosopher who strolled unthinking through the market-place watching the crowds of people buying and selling. Nobody is less swayed by public opinion, and yet nobody is closer to the feelings of ordinary men.

He takes a particular pleasure in contemplating the shapes, character, and behavior of different living creatures. Thus there is hardly any kind of bird of which he does not keep one in his household, and the same with any animal that as a rule is rarely seen, such as monkey, fox, ferret, weasel, and the like. Besides these, if he sees anything outlandish or otherwise remarkable, he buys it greedily, and has his house stocked with such things from all sources, so that everywhere you may see something to attract the eyes of the visitor; and when he sees other people pleased, his own pleasure begins anew. In his younger days he was not averse from affairs with young women, but always without dishonor, enjoying such things when they came his way without going out to seek them, and attracted by the mingling of minds rather than bodies.

<sup>6</sup> Democritus (fifth century BC) was known as the laughing philosopher.

5 A liberal education he had imbibed from his very earliest years. As a young man he devoted himself to the study of Greek literature and philosophy, with so little support from his father, a man in other respects of good sense and high character, that his efforts were deprived of all outside help and he was 10 treated almost as if disinherited because he was thought to be deserting his father's profession, for his father is a specialist in English law. The law as a profession has little in common with literature
15 truly so called, but in England those who have made themselves authorities in that subject are in the first rank for eminence and distinction. Nor is it easy in that country to find any other career more likely to lead to wealth and reputation, and in fact most of 20 the nobility of the island owes its rank to studies of this kind. In the law, they say, no one can perfect himself without many years of hard work. So it was not surprising that, when he was a young man, More's nature should swerve away from the law, being 25 made for better things; but after a taste of the subjects studied at the university, he betook himself to it with such good effect that there was no one whose advice was more freely sought by litigants, nor was a larger income made by any of those who
30 gave their whole time to the law. Such was the force and quickness of his intelligence.

Besides this he devoted himself actively to reading the works of the orthodox Fathers. On St Augustine's City of God he gave public lectures before large audiences while still quite a young man;<sup>7</sup>
35 priests and old men were not ashamed to seek instruction in holy things from a young man and a layman, or sorry they had done so. And all the time he applied his whole mind to the pursuit of piety,
40 with vigils and fasts and prayer and similar exercises preparing himself for the priesthood. In this indeed he showed not a little more sense than those who plunge headlong into so exacting a vocation without first making trial of themselves. Nor did 45 anything stand in the way of his devoting himself to this kind of life, except that he could not shake off the desire to get married. And so he chose to be a god-fearing husband rather than an immoral priest.

However, he chose for his wife<sup>8</sup> an unmarried girl who was still very young, of good family, and quite inexperienced as yet, having always lived in the country with her parents and her sisters, which gave 50 him the more opportunity to mold her character to match his own. He arranged for her education and made her skilled in music of every kind, and had (it 55 is clear) almost succeeded in making her a person with whom he would gladly have shared his whole life, had not an early death removed her from the scene, after she had borne him several children. Of 60 these there survive three daughters, Margaret, Alice, and Cecily, and one son, John. Nor did he endure to remain a widower for very long, though the advice of his friends urged a different course. A few
65 months<sup>9</sup> after his wife's death, he married a widow, more to have someone to look after his household than for his own pleasure, for she was neither beautiful nor in her first youth, as he used to remark in 70 jest, but a capable and watchful housewife, though they lived on as close and affectionate terms as if she had been a girl of the most winning appearance. Few husbands secure as much obedience from their wives
75 by severity and giving them orders as he did by his kindness and his merry humor. He could make her do anything: did he not cause a woman already past the prime of life, of a far from elastic disposition, and devoted to her household affairs, to learn to play the zither, the lute, the monochord, and the recorder, and in this department to produce a set piece 80 of work every day to please her exacting husband?

He shows the same geniality in the management of his household, in which there are no troubles and no disputes. If anything should go wrong, he puts it right promptly or makes them agree; nor has he ever 85 dismissed anyone as a result of ill feeling on either side. In fact his household seems to enjoy a kind of natural felicity, for no one has ever been a member of it without bettering his fortune later, and no one has ever earned the least shadow on his reputation. Indeed you would hardly find such close relations 90 anywhere between a man and his mother as exists between him and his stepmother; for his father had now remarried for the second time, and he loved them both as if they had been his own mother. The thirty days after Joanna's death, in the summer of 1511.

<sup>7</sup> More's teacher William Grocyn invited More to give these lectures at Grocyn's church (ca. 1501), at St. Lawrence Jewry.

<sup>8</sup> Joanna Colt, from Netherhall, Essex

<sup>9</sup> In fact, More married Alice Middleton

father<sup>10</sup> has lately remarried a third time, and More solemnly swears that he has never seen a better person. Such moreover is his affection for his kinsmen, his children, and his sisters that his relations with 5 them are never oppressive, nor yet does he ever fall short in his family duties.

From any love of filthy lucre he is absolutely free. To provide for his children he has earmarked as much of his resources as he considers sufficient for 10 them, and the rest he spends liberally. In the days when he was still dependent on the income from his clients, he gave everyone helpful and reliable advice, thinking much more of their advantage than of his own; the majority he used to persuade to settle their 15 actions, on the ground that this would save them expense. If that was not successful, he then tried to show them how to carry on their litigation at the least cost to themselves, for some men are so made that they actually enjoy going to law. In the city of 20 London, in which he was born, he has for some years acted as judge in civil cases.<sup>11</sup> This office is by no means onerous, for the court sits only on Thursdays until dinner-time, but it carries much prestige. No one ever determined more cases, and no one
 25 showed more absolute integrity. Many people have had the money returned to them which according to precedent must be paid by litigants; for before the action comes into court, the plaintiff must deposit three drachmas, and the defendant the same,
 30 nor is it permissible to demand any more. The result of this behavior was that his native city held him in deep affection.

He had made up his mind to be content with this station in life, which gave him quite sufficient 35 standing and at the same time was not exposed to serious risks. More than once he was forced to go on a diplomatic mission, and as he conducted these with great intelligence, his serene Majesty King Henry VIII would not rest until he had dragged the 40 man to his court. I use the word “dragged” advisedly, for no man was ever more consumed with ambition to enter a court than he was to avoid it. But since that excellent king had it in mind to fill his household with learned, wise, intelligent, and up-45 right men, he summoned a great many others, and especially More, whom he keeps so close to him that he never allows him leave to go. If serious business is afoot, no better counselor than he; if the King wishes to relax his mind with more cheerful topics, no man’s company more gay. Often difficult issues 50 demand an authoritative and able judge, and More can settle these in such a way that both parties are grateful. Yet no one has succeeded in persuading him to take a present from anybody. Happy indeed

 55 a commonwealth would be, if the prince would appoint to each post a magistrate like More. And all the time no pride has touched him.

Amidst such masses of business he does not forget his old and ordinary friends, and returns to his beloved literature from time to time. Whatever power 60 his station gives him, whatever his influence can do with so powerful a king, is all devoted to the good of the commonwealth and of his friends. His disposition was always most ready to do good unto all men, and wonderfully prone to show mercy, and he
 65 now gives it more play, because he has more power to do good. Some men he helps with money, to some he gives the protection of his authority, others he advances in life by his recommendation. Those whom he cannot help in any other way he aids with 70 good advice. He has never sent anyone away with a long face. You might call More the general resource of everyone who needs help. He thinks some great stroke of luck has come his way if he has been able to relieve the oppressed, to help the perplexed and 75 entangled out of their troubles, or to reconcile the parties to a quarrel. No one more enjoys doing a kindness or less demands gratitude for doing one. And yet, though he is very fortunate on so many counts, and though good fortune is often accom-80 panied by self-conceit, it has never yet been my fortune to see a man more free from that fault than he.

But to return to tell of his literary pursuits, which have been the chief bond between More and myself 85 in both directions. His earlier years were exercised principally in poetry; after that came a long struggle to acquire a more supple style in prose by practicing his pen in every sort of writing. What his style is like now, I need not set down, especially for your benefit, for you have his books always in your hands. He 90 has taken delight especially in declamations, and, in that department, in paradoxical themes, as offering more lively practice to one’s ingenuity. As a youth he even worked on a dialogue in which he supported Plato’s doctrine of communalism, extend-
 95 ing it even to wives. He wrote an answer to Lucian’s

<sup>10</sup> Sir John More married four times, his last wife being Alice Clerk.

<sup>11</sup> More was undersheriff of London from 1510 to 1518.

Tyrannicida, on which topic it was his wish to have me as an opponent, to test more accurately what progress he had made in this sort of composition. Utopia he published with the purpose of showing the reasons for the shortcomings of a commonwealth, but he represented the English commonwealth in particular, because he had studied it and knew it best. The second book he had written earlier, when at leisure; at a later opportunity he added the first in the heat of the moment. Hence there is a certain unevenness in the style.

It would be difficult to find a more felicitous extempore speaker, so fertile are both his mind and the tongue that does its bidding. His mind is always ready, ever passing nimbly to the next point; his memory always at his elbow, and as everything in it is held, so to say, in ready cash, it puts forward promptly and without hesitation whatever time or place demand. In disputations nothing more acute can be imagined, so that he has often taken on even the most eminent theologians in their own field and been almost too much for them. John Colet, a sensitive and experienced critic, used to say sometimes in conversation that there was only one able man in the whole of England, though the island is blessed with so many men of outstanding ability.

True piety finds in him a practicing follower, though far removed from all superstition. He has his fixed hours at which he says his prayers, and they are not conventional but come from the heart. When he talks with friends about the life after death, you recognize that he is speaking from conviction, and not without good hope. And More is like this even at court. What becomes then of those people who think that Christians are not to be found except in monasteries?

Such are the men whom that most intelligent king admits to his household and his privy chamber; admits, yes, and invites, and even forces them to come. These are the continual spectators and witnesses of the way he lives; these form his council; these are the companions of his journeys. He rejoices to have them round him rather than young men or women dissolute and vicious, or even rich men in their splendid collars, or all the blandishments of insincerity, where one man would divert him to aimless pleasures, another would heat his blood with thoughts of tyranny, another put forward fresh tricks with which to fleece his people. Had you lived in this court, my dear Hutten, I have no doubt you would quite rewrite your Aula, and cease to be a professed enemy of court life, though you too live with as honorable a prince as you could wish, nor do you lack men who look for a better state of things, such as Stromer and Kopp. But what are the few that you have in comparison with such a company of distinguished men: Mountjoy, Linacre, Pace, Colet, Stokesley, Latimer, More, Tunstall, Clerk, and others like them? Whichever you choose to name, you will have mentioned in one word a world of all the virtues and all learning. I myself, however, have hopes of no common kind that Albert, the one ornament of our native Germany at this time, may gather more men like himself into his household, and may set an important precedent for all the other princes, encouraging them too to wish to do the same, each in his own court.

There is the portrait, the best of sitters ill done by the worst of artists. You will like it less when you have the good fortune to know More better. But I have done it to protect myself for the moment to stop your complaining that I have not done what you asked, and your constant objections that my letters are too short. Though this has not seemed to me longer than usual in the writing, nor will you find it, I am sure, long-winded in the reading; my dear More's charm will see to that.

Farewell.

Erasmus

1233. To Guillaume Budé<sup>12</sup> 80
 Andelecht, <ca. September> 1521

Erasmus of Rotterdam to his friend, Guillaume Budé, greetings.

... More is to be congratulated. He neither aimed at it nor asked for it, but the king has promoted him to a very honorable post, with a salary by no means to be despised: he is his prince's treasurer. This office in England is in the first rank of grandeur and distinction, but is not unduly exposed either to unpopularity or to tedious press of business. He had a rival for it, a fairly influential man who wanted the office

<sup>12</sup> Translated by R. A. B. Mynors, from CWE 8:295–99. Budé was a leading French humanist who contributed a letter to More's Utopia (see above).

so badly that he would not object to holding it at his own costs and charges. But that admirable king gave the clearest proof of his high opinion of More, in that he went so far as to give him a salary when he did not want the post, rather than accept an official who did not need to be paid. Not content with that, this most generous prince has also knighted him, nor can there be any doubt that some day he will honor him with yet greater distinctions when the occasion presents itself; for normally princes show a much greater tendency to promote bachelors. But More is so deeply embedded in the ranks of married men, that not even his wife's death has given him his freedom. For having buried his first wife, who was a girl when he married her, the widower has now taken unto himself a widow.

I am the more delighted for More's sake at this attitude of his prince toward him for this reason, that whatever increase in authority or influence accrues to him, accrues, I believe, to the study of the humanities, of which he is such a keen supporter that, were his resources equal to his wishes, the English would find their gifted minds in no lack of an open-hearted and generous Maecenas. The courts of princes usually behave like the physician who first evacuates the body of the patient entrusted to him and then fills it up and restores its energy; and I do not doubt that our friend More has had some such experience hitherto. How it has gone in your case you know better than I do. And yet gifted men have enjoyed his bounty, in the days when not only was he far from having plenty to give away, he was burdened with debt.

But to be a good scholar himself and give generous support to all other scholars is not the only way in which he honors liberal studies. He takes pains to give his whole household an education in good literature, setting thereby a new precedent which, if I mistake not, will soon be widely followed, so happy is the outcome. He has three daughters, of whom Margaret, the eldest, is already married to a young man who is well off, has a most honorable and modest character, and besides that is no stranger to our literary pursuits. All of them from their earliest years he has had properly and strictly brought up in point of character, and has given them a liberal education. To his three daughters he has added a fourth girl,<sup>13</sup> whom he maintains as a piece of generosity to be a playmate for them. He also has a step-daughter<sup>14</sup> of great beauty and exceptional gifts, married for some years now to a young man not without education and of truly golden character. And he has a son<sup>15</sup> by his first wife, now a boy of about thirteen, who is the youngest of his children.

About a year ago, More took it into his head to give me a demonstration of the progress of their education. He told them all to write to me, each of them independently. No subject was supplied them, nor was what they wrote corrected in any way. When they had shown their drafts to their father for criticism, he told them, as though he took exception to their bad writing, to make a cleaner and more careful copy of the same words; and when they had done that, he did not alter a syllable, but sealed up the letters and sent them off to me. Believe me, my dear Budé, I never saw anything so admirable. In what they said there was nothing foolish or childish, and the language made one feel that they must be making daily progress. This charming group, with the husbands of two of them, he keeps under his own roof. There you never see one of the girls idle, or busied with the trifles that women enjoy; they have a Livy in their hands. They have made such progress that they can read and understand authors of that class without anyone to explain them, unless they come upon some word that might have held up even me or someone like me.

His wife, whose strength lies in mother-wit and experience rather than book-learning, controls the whole institution with remarkable skill, acting as a kind of overseer who gives each one her task and sees that she performs it and allows no idleness or frivolous occupations.

You are wont to complain in your letters from time to time that in your case classical study has acquired a bad name for having brought two bad things into your life, poor health and pecuniary loss. The result of More's activity on the other hand, is to make it acceptable to everyone concerned on every count, for he says he owes to his literary studies his much better health, his popularity and influence with an excellent prince and all men both friends and strangers, his easier circumstances, his own greater happiness and the happiness he gives his friends, the services he can now render to his country and his relations and kinsfolk, his increased adaptability to court society, to life among the nobility, and to the whole way of life that he now leads, and a greater ease in pleasing heaven. At first liberal studies had a bad name for depriving their devoted adherents of the common touch. There is no journey, no business however voluminous or difficult, that can take the book out of More's hand; and yet it would be hard to find anyone who was more truly a man for all seasons<sup>16</sup> and all men, who was more ready to oblige, more easily available for meeting, more lively in conversation, or who combined so much real wisdom with such charm of character. The result is that, while only a few days ago a love of literature was thought to be of no practical or ornamental value, there is now hardly one of our great nobles who would reckon his children worthy of their ancestry if they had no education in liberal studies. Monarchs themselves are thought to lack a good share of the qualities proper to a king if their knowledge of literature leaves much to be desired.

Again, scarcely any mortal man was not under the conviction that, for the female sex, education had nothing to offer in the way of either virtue or reputation. Nor was I myself in the old days completely free of this opinion, but More has quite put it out of my head. For two things in particular are perilous to a girl's virtue, idleness and improper amusements, and against both of these the love of literature is a protection. There is no better way to maintain a spotless reputation than faultless behavior, and no woman's chastity is more secure than hers who is chaste by deliberate choice. Not that I disapprove the ideas of those who plan to protect their daughters' honor by teaching them the domestic arts, but nothing so occupies a girl's whole heart as the love of reading. And besides this advantage, that the mind is kept from pernicious idleness, this is the way to absorb the highest principles, which can both instruct and inspire the mind in the pursuit of virtue. Many have been exposed to the loss of their maidenhead by inexperience and ignorance of the world, before they know what the things are that put that great treasure at risk. Nor do I see why husbands need fear that if they have educated wives they will have wives who are less obedient, unless they are the kind of men who wish to demand from a wife what ought not to be demanded of respectable married women. In my opinion, on the other hand, nothing is more intractable than ignorance. At least, a mind developed and exercised by reading has this advantage, that it can recognize good and just reasons for what they are, and perceive what conduct is proper and what is profitable. Why, the man who has taught her the facts has almost converted her. Besides which, what makes wedlock delightful and lasting is more the good will between mind and mind than any physical passion, so that far stronger bonds unite those who are joined by mutual affection of minds as well, and a wife has more respect for a husband whom she acknowledges as a teacher also. Devotion will not be less because there is less unreason in it. Personally, I would rather have one talent of pure gold than three contaminated heavily with lead and dross.

We often hear other women returning from church quite ready to say that the preacher gave them a wonderful sermon, and they provide a lively account of his expression. Beyond that, they are quite unable to report what he said or what it was like. These young ladies recount nearly the whole sermon to you in order, though not without some selection; if the preacher let fall anything foolish or irreligious or off the point, as we see not seldom happens nowadays, they know how to make fun of it or ignore it or protest against it. This, and only this, is what listening to a sermon means. One can really enjoy the society of girls like this. I differ profoundly from those who keep a wife for no purpose except physical satisfaction, for which half-witted females are better fitted. A woman must have intelligence if she is to keep her household up to its duties, to form and mold her children's characters, and meet her husband's needs in every way. Apart from that, when I was talking to More recently, I put the objection that if anything should happen, as the way of all flesh is, he would be the more tormented by grief for the loss of them, inasmuch as he had spent all that effort on their upbringing; and he replied, "If anything inevitable were to happen, I would rather they died educated than uneducated." And I was then reminded of that remark of Phocion, I think it was, who was about to drink the hemlock, and when his wife cried out, "O my husband, you will die an innocent man," his answer was, "What of it, my dear wife? Would you rather I died guilty?"

<sup>16</sup> Erasmus first comments on this phrase, omnium horarum homo, in the first edition of his Adages (1508): "The man who suits himself to seriousness and jesting alike, and whose company is always delightful — that is the man the ancients call 'a man for all hours.'" Robert Whittington translates this phrase as "a man for all seasons" in his Vulgaria (see ahead, p. 1381).

In the meantime the idea has come into my head of matching you two together as two outstanding leaders in the field, much as a man might compare Camillus and Scipio Africanus.<sup>17</sup> You have been fighting the enemies of good letters for more years and in an age more unfavorable to them, and in this respect at least you are ahead of More. At the same time, what you have been trying to do with your sons only and in your brothers, he does not hesitate in his wives and daughters too, with a brave contempt for the criticism excited by this new idea; and under this head, conversely, he is superior to you. Again, in published books you have done more for the supply in both languages than he has, and will do more still, I promise myself, in the future, if you can once start bringing forth the riches you have filed away and sharing them with the public. Not but what our younger men have great expectations of More too, for he is still a long way from old age and has a father aged, I suppose, not much less than eighty, whose old age is wonderfully green—you could hardly find anyone who carries his years with a better grace. This allows one to hope for a ripe old age for More likewise. I perceive one thing in which you might render a very great service to Greek studies, if you were to make a really full lexicon, not only listing the words but explaining the idioms and turns of speech peculiar to Greek when these are not generally known and obvious. It is a rather humdrum subject, I admit, and unworthy of your position, but I believe that a man of principle should be ready to demean himself to some extent for the public benefit, as Plato expects of his wise men. . . .

Farewell.
Erasmus

2750. To John Faber<sup>18</sup>
<Freiburg, late 1532>

How fast has the rumor flown, all the way here: the news that the distinguished Sir Thomas More has been removed from the office of chancellor, and that he has been succeeded by another noble, who then immediately set free the men More had sent to prison for their contentious teachings. Both Homer and Vergil lift “rumor” to the sky as a flying bird, all covered with feathers, to show that nothing is faster. But the speed of any winged creature seems slow and sluggish to me, compared with the swiftness of this rumor which has suddenly spread so widely: lightning flashing into every quarter of the globe would hardly be faster. And although this story has been flying through everyone’s lips constantly, and although I have not received any letters from Britain (Thomas More’s letter, which I am now forwarding to you, had been held up several months in Saxony), nevertheless I was “more certain than certain” that all this talk was the emptiest gossip. For I knew very well the character of that most humane ruler, with what constancy he cherishes friends once he has decided to take them to his heart, with what reluctance he removes anyone from his favor, even when he has detected some human error in them. On the other hand, I also knew Thomas More’s honesty, his skillfulness in handling matters both large and small, the vigilance of that extraordinary prudence of his, so free from the habit of “turning a blind eye.” In fact, the King’s benevolent attitude toward More became clearer to me when he freed him from that office—a most prestigious office, yes, but also fraught with burden and danger—than when he conferred the honor on him in the first place. When the King, in spite of More’s protests, saddled him with that heavy load, the King showed his love of country, and was only looking out for his own and the realm’s best interests; when, at More’s request, the King removed that load, he showed his love of More. When he appointed him, he merited praise and universal acclaim for his beneficence and wisdom in entrusting a most difficult post to the man best qualified in the realm for bearing so heavy a burden; when he released him, he earned high praise for his humanity by letting his own judgment and concern for the common good yield a bit to the pleas of a friend asking for the kind of leisurely retirement Cassiodorus once obtained from his ruler.<sup>19</sup> And I have no doubt that More was brought by very solid

<sup>17</sup> These are Roman statesmen: the first defeated the Gauls, ca. 387 BC; the second conquered Carthage in 202 BC.
<sup>18</sup> Translated by Gerald Malsbary with the collaboration of Mary Taneyhill, © CTMS

2016, with the first four paragraphs based on a translation by Marcus A. Haworth, S.J., which appeared in Erasmus and His Age: Selected Letters of Desiderius Erasmus, ed. Hans J. Hillerbrand (New York: Harper & Row, 1970). Faber was an Austrian humanist; later, Bishop of Vienna.

<sup>19</sup> Theodorik the Ostrogoth, King of Italy 493–526 AD

reasons to plead with the King for that release. Otherwise, neither would he ever have been so bold as to ask for a discharge so soon, nor would the King have been so compliant as to grant his request for just any excuse.

The King knew that the status of his entire domain depended for the most part upon the integrity, learning, and wisdom of the chancellor. For this office of chancellor is not, as it is in some countries, merely that of a secretary. In dignity, the office ranks next to the crown, so that, when the chancellor appears in public, to his right is displayed a golden scepter, topped by a golden imperial crown, and to his left, a book. The one symbolizes supreme power under the king, the other, knowledge of the laws. For he is chief justice of the whole British dominion, the right eye, so to speak, and the right hand of the king and of the royal council. A very wise leader would never have entrusted such a lofty responsibility to someone who had not been tested. Hardly anyone else saw more deeply, or loved more seriously, the rare and almost divine endowments of More's nature. In fact, even the Cardinal of York,<sup>20</sup> despite his own misfortune, was no fool: when he realized that he himself had no hope of returning to his former power, he declared that no man in the entire island, other than More alone, was equal to so great an office. And this was no mere "favorable recommendation" or vote of confidence. When the Cardinal was still alive, he was hardly just toward More; and more truly feared him than loved him. The judgment of the people was not otherwise. And so, just as he entered upon his office with such congratulations of the whole realm as no man had received before, so did he resign it with the deep sorrow of all the wise and good. For he resigned after he had earned the most wonderful praise of all: that none of his predecessors had administered the office more skillfully or with greater justice. And you know how critical the people usually are of top civil officials, especially during their first years in office. Even so, I could easily convince you of what I am saying if I could show you the letters of the most eminent men expressing their congratulations to the King, to the realm, to More himself, and even to me, in my enthusiasm about More's acceptance of the office; and then, by contrast, the letters written by the same men, deploring the fact that the commonwealth had lost such a judge and "counsel-giver" — boulēphóros, to use Homer's word for him.

I do not doubt that the King has replaced More by someone distinguished, although he is utterly unknown to me. Now, with regard to the luster of his own family's heritage, Thomas More, with his clearly philosophical character, never pursued it much, nor boasted of it. He was born in London, that most famous of all cities, and to be born and educated in that city is regarded by the English as bringing a good deal of nobility along with it. His father was by no means obscure, being a doctor of British law, a profession of the highest distinction among the English, and said to be the origin of a large part of the nobility of that island. Young More followed in his father's footsteps, and did it so well, that the father, though competent in every way and illustrious in his own right, was overshadowed by the son. Of course, nobody more truly casts a light upon his ancestors than when he overshadows them like this.

I shall pass over the titles of honor with which both were decorated — and not through solicited or purchased favor, but through the free decision of the King — unless perhaps, we are to think that true nobility is won only by strenuous and repeated exploits in war, while distinguished service to the commonwealth in times of peace, and accomplished by intelligence rather than arms, deserves no honor at all. The better the general condition of a commonwealth, the less need it has for military exertions. But the services of men who excel in learning, good judgment, and jurisprudence are always necessary to kings and kingdoms, both in times of war and in times of peace. We hear the oracular voice of the Scripture that says: "By me kings reign."<sup>21</sup> And yet it is not the voice of the military but of wisdom that keeps war from breaking out in the first place, and, when war cannot be avoided, to make sure that it be waged with the least possible damage to the commonwealth. It is a greater blessing to avoid war altogether than carry it out bravely.

Peace, in turn, cannot long endure, and if it is lasting, only engenders bad morals in the people unless it be directed by the counsels of the prudent. If Torquatus became famous through ripping the collar from a Gallic enemy's neck, will another man not win fame who for many years has furnished himself to his native land as a just judge and loyal counselor? The earliest Roman emperors thought far otherwise: they conferred the highest honors on their legal assistants, who were renowned for their knowledge of the law. In fact, they even decreed that teachers of grammar and logic and professors of law who had been exemplars of learning and integrity for twenty years should be decorated with the same honorary insignia as were the imperial deputies, and the rank of imperial deputy was equal to the rank of the emperor's attendants and generals. The twelfth chapter of Justinian's Code, "On Professors," attests to this.<sup>22</sup> Today, however, people are counted "noble" only when their blood bestows the insignia of nobility, and not if they are given (you might say "sold") these titles by the ruler. But I would think that the honor conferred by a ruler of the state upon those who have served the state well counts as a double nobility, since in this case the authority of the ruler comes in addition to virtue, and virtue is the parent of all true nobility. If ancient family origin is lacking, it is more glorious to earn nobility than to receive it from one's forefathers.

But I know this praise is of only the slightest importance to More, who would rather bequeath love of piety to his posterity than the honor of a distinguished rank. And as for what they are saying about prisons, whether it is true or not, I do not know. This point is certain: that most mild-natured man was not troublesome to anyone who, after being admonished by him, would be willing to return to their senses from the contagion of a sect. Do such critics demand that the highest judge of so great a kingdom not have any prisons? The man hates the seditious teachings by which, sadly, the world is now so shaken. He does not hide this feeling, nor does he want it to be secret, being so devoted to piety that, if he leaned the slightest bit toward one side or the other of two extremes, he would seem to be closer to superstition than to impiety. Yet this is pretty good proof of an extraordinary kind of mercifulness: the fact that under him as chancellor no one has suffered capital punishment for disapproved teachings,<sup>23</sup> while so many have been put to death in both Germany and France. Is this not a merciful hatred of the impious, when someone, though having the legal right to execute them, is so eager to heal their faults that he leaves their persons remain unharmed? Surely the critics are not demanding that, while representing the king, he favor a new, seditious, movement against the opinion of the King and bishops? Let us suppose that he was not at all repulsed by strange teachings (a thing far from the case): he would still either have to resign from the office that he held, or else only pretend to be enjoying the royal support.

Finally — to set aside, for now, any conflict about doctrines — who can be unaware how many amateurish and quarrelsome people would be prepared, under these circumstances, to get away with all kinds of wickedness, were it not for the strictness of public officials keeping such ever-growing audacity in check? And are they indignant that in England the kingdom's highest judge has done what a parliament has been sometimes forced to do in states that have changed their religion? And if it had not been done, false preachers would long since have burst into the chambers and libraries of the rich, and anyone who had something would be considered a papist. But so great is the audacity of so many, so out of control their malice, that even the originators and sponsors of the new doctrines are wielding their own pens fiercely against them. And did they want the supreme judge of England to look the other way, while such filth flooded the kingdom with impunity? A kingdom flourishing in wealth, talent, and especially religion? It can, of course, be true that some are being granted release from the prisons to please the new chancellor, persons who were harmless, or imprisoned on relatively light charges: the sort of thing that normally happens when new kings succeed to the throne, simply to please the multitude. The same thing happened, I suppose, when More himself first took office. But what are those Triptolemi<sup>24</sup> doing, who sow such tales? Is it to convince people that a haven has been prepared among the English for sects and supporters of sects? And yet judging by the letters of many by no means unimportant men, it is clear to me that the King is somewhat less friendly toward the new teachings than the Bishop or priests.

<sup>22</sup> Codex Justinianus 12.15 <sup>23</sup> Actually six individuals were executed for "seditious treason" under More's chancellorship. Under his successor, Thomas Audley, there were fifteen or sixteen. <sup>24</sup> Triptolemus, ancient Greek hero and god of agriculture, was taught by Demeter and famous for spreading the art of agriculture around the world. Erasmus plays on the agricultural metaphor with the verb serunt ("they sow").

No pious man does not hope for a correction of the Church's morals; but no prudent man thinks we should accept universal confusion.

When I heard that Thomas More had been raised to the highest dignity, since it seemed to me that I understood something of his talent, thanks to our long acquaintance, I wrote that I publicly congratulated the King and country, but did not privately congratulate the man himself. Now, however, I sincerely do so because, with the utmost favor of his ruler, with the entire nation's most honorable testimony, it has speedily become his good fortune to extricate himself from the labyrinths of civil affairs, an opportunity given neither to Scipio Africanus, nor Pompey the Great nor Marcus Tullius Cicero. Octavian Augustus hoped to put down the burden of empire, but never had the chance. Now in the fullness of his lifetime Thomas More has attained with dignity the kind of life to which he has been inclined since his youth, so that now he might freely have leisure with his own family (for if anyone loves his family,<sup>25</sup> he does) for worthwhile pursuits and religious devotion. He has built, by the Thames river, not far from the city of London, a country-seat that is by no means primitive, yet not so magnificent as to cause envy, but still comfortable: there he spends time with the intimate company of his wife, his son and daughter-in-law, his three daughters and as many sons-in-law, making altogether eleven with his grandchildren so far. He has, by the favor of Christ, seen his children's children, and is going to see the ones to be born from them. For since all of them are in the bloom of life, it is likely that a numerous progeny will come. But even he himself could still be the father of many children if his wife had not already ceased to bear children by reason of age. He married her as a widow, and has not raised any children by her. The children he does have, he begot by his former wife, whom he lost while still a young girl with several children. But although his wife be sterile, and advanced in age, he loves and cherishes her no otherwise than if she were a girl fifteen years old. Hardly anyone else now living loves his children more, nor does he see any difference between a matron and a girl: but such is the kindness of his disposition, or rather, to say it better, such is his piety and wisdom, that whatever comes his way that cannot be corrected, he comes to love just as wholeheartedly as if nothing better could have happened to him. You could say that his house is another Platonic Academy. But I dishonor his home when I liken it to Plato's Academy, where they discussed numbers and geometric figures, and on occasion moral virtues; this home of More's you could more rightly call a school and gymnasium of the Christian religion. There is no man or woman there who does not have leisure to study the liberal arts and worthwhile reading, although the chief and primary concern is for piety. No quarrel or nagging word is to be heard there, no lazy person to be seen. But such good family discipline is not secured through scolding or arrogance, but with courtesy and benevolence. All are busy about their duty, but there is liveliness there and no lack of self-possessed merriment.

In the church of his neighborhood he erected a common tomb for himself and his family, and brought the remains of his former wife there, since any kind of divorce from her displeased him. The wall has an inscribed tablet, testifying to the fortune and manner of life of the man; my servant has written this down word-for-word. You will receive a copy with this letter.<sup>26</sup> I see that I have been rather loquacious, but it gladdens me to talk about a friend to a friend. By addressing the people frequently, you are acting like a true bishop—a thing most pleasing to all good people. May your example encourage many imitators.

The things you wrote me about King Ferdinand's affairs were most welcome to me. After such preambles I am called to have good hope, that someday fortune will correspond to the virtues of the best and holiest ruler. Farewell.

ERASMUS'S FINAL COMMENTS
ABOUT THOMAS MORE, 1535<sup>27</sup>

3036. From the Preface to Erasmus's *Ecclesiastes
August 1535

And therefore, what could be more cruel than this moment in time, which has deprived me of so many tried and true friends? First there was William War-

<sup>25</sup> Erasmus uses the Greek word philostorgos, "one who likes family affection."

<sup>26</sup> More sent Erasmus a copy with Epistle 2831 (Allen edition). See above, Letter 191.

<sup>27</sup> The following passages were translated by Dr. Gerald Malsbary, © CTMS 2017.

ham, the Archbishop of Canterbury; and just now William Mountjoy, the Bishop of Rochester, and Thomas More, who was the highest judge of the land, with a heart purer than driven snow, a talent
 5 such as England never had before nor will ever have again, even though it is a country otherwise most abundant in talents. (lines 100–104)

3048. To Bartholomew Latomus<sup>28</sup>
 Basel, 24 August 1535

10 The capital penalty was suffered by certain monks, among whom there was a Bridgettine brother, who was dragged on the ground, then hanged, and finally, after having his heart pulled out, torn into four pieces. There is steady rumor here, which is 15 quite believable, that when the King heard that the Bishop of Rochester<sup>29</sup> had been appointed by Pope Paul III to the College of Cardinals, he brought him out of prison all the sooner to have him beheaded, and thereby gave him his red Cardinal's hat.
 20 It is true of course that Thomas More has long been in prison, his personal possessions confiscated by the crown. He too, it has been said, was executed, but I still do not have certain news of it. How I wish he had stayed out of such a dangerous business, and 25 had left theological disputes to the theologians. Other friends of mine, who have been kind enough to write to me and help me, now write or send me nothing at all, nor are they receiving anything from anybody: as if a scorpion slept under every rock!
 30 (lines 50–63)

<sup>28</sup> Bartholomew Latomus taught Latin at the College de France. <sup>29</sup> John Fisher <sup>30</sup> Peter Tomiczki was the Bishop of Cracow. <sup>31</sup> Conrad Goclenius taught Latin at the University of Louvain. <sup>32</sup> Boethius uses the same term to describe Lady Philosophy (1.1 Prose, 44–8, Consolation of Philosophy). Common definitions of imperiosus are “exercising authority, possessed of command, powerful, far-ruling, commanding.” <sup>33</sup> Richard Whittington (ca. 1480–ca. 1553) was a grammarian and schoolmaster.

His high praise of More, even greater in his two Latin poems about More, is somewhat surprising given the “grammar war” he started by attacking More’s friend William Lily, who collaborated in the “Progymnasmata” prefaced to More’s Epigrams. See R. S. Sylvester’s “The ‘Man for All Seasons’ Again: Robert Whittington’s Verses to Thomas More,” Huntington Library Quarterly 26.2 (Feb. 1963): 147–54. <sup>34</sup> For this passage, see The Vulgaria of John Stanbridge and the Vulgaria of Robert Whittington (London: Early English Text

3049. To Peter Tomiczki<sup>30</sup>
 Basel, 31 August 1535

From the fragment of the letter I am sending to you, you will learn what happened to the Bishop of Rochester and Thomas More — a pair of human beings that are England’s holiest and best possession.
 35 When More died I seem to have died myself: because we were a single soul as Pythagoras once said. But such is the tide of human affairs. (lines 160–64)

3052. To Conrad Goclenius<sup>31</sup>
 Basel, 2 September 1535

Aleander has published another angry book under the name “Doletus”: he therein takes revenge on Thomas More, whom he had heard was in prison. He makes the masterful, commanding [imperiosum]<sup>32</sup> More speak timidly. (lines 26–30)
 45

ROBERT WHITTINGTON ON THOMAS MORE<sup>33</sup> (1519–20)

a man for all seasons<sup>34</sup>

50 More is a man of an angel’s wit and singular learning. He is a man of many excellent virtues; if I should say as it is, I know not his fellow. For where is the man (in whom is so many goodly virtues) of that gentleness, lowliness, and affability? And as 55 time requires, a man of marvelous mirth and pastimes, and sometime of sad gravity — as who say, a man for all seasons. (Vulgaria, 1520)

Society, 1932), 64. The equivalent of this famous phrase was first used by Erasmus to describe More in Latin (omnia horarum homo), and Whittington probably had Erasmus’s phrase in mind when writing this passage for his grammar students. Erasmus explains the phrase in his 1508 edition of Adagia (CWE 31: 304) and applies it to More in his 1509 prefatory letter to Praise of Folly (1509, Letter 7 above; CWE 2: 163, EE 222/20–21), and later again in his 1521 letter to Budé describing More (given above; CWE 8: 297, EE 1233/94).

WILLIAM TYNDALE
ON THOMAS MORE<sup>35</sup> (1530–31)

From The Practice of Prelates: Whether the 5 King's grace may be separated from his queen because she was his brother's wife (1530)

This is Sir Thomas More<sup>36</sup>

Moreover the proctor of purgatory saith in his dialogue, Quoth I, and quoth he, and quoth your friend, 10 how that the foresaid Duke of Gloucester was a noble man and a great clerk, and so wise that he could spy false miracles, and disclose them, and judge them from the true.<sup>37</sup> (297)

Then come in the ambassadors of France, and 15 money, a few prelates, and certain other the King's play-fellows, that be sworn with them to betray both the King and the realm too, and then is peace concluded. But outwardly there is nothing save a truce taken for half a year, till our soldiers be at 20 home again, for fear lest they would not be content. Then cometh the whole host home beggared, both great and small, and the poor, that cannot suddenly get work, fall to stealing, and be hanged at home. This could More tell in his Utopia, before he was the
25 Cardinal's sworn secretary, and fallen at his feet to betray the truth for to get promotion. (302)

[I]t is concluded that the Queen is not his<sup>38</sup> wife, and the cause why they be not divorced is peradventure<sup>39</sup> that our prelates are afraid. If they could have 30 brought any marriage about, to join us unto France, it had been done long since; but because they cannot (for the French king's sister knew too much of Christ to consent unto such wickedness), haply they would it were undone. I doubt not but they 35 bear the King's Grace in hand that the Pope dare not confirm it for fear of the Emperor; but I doubt not, if they feared not the Emperor and the lords and commons, it had been done already.

After that my lord Cardinal with More, his sworn secretary, and the Bishop<sup>40</sup> of London, that still Saturn, the imaginer of all mischief, went to France to 40 juggle secretly, and carried with him more than he brought home again. This is of a truth, that he carried great treasure with him. (320–21)

Cardinal Wolsey preferred More to be chancellor 45

[Cardinal Wolsey] set up in his room,<sup>41</sup> to minister forth and to fight against God as he had begun, the chiefest of all his secretaries, one nothing
50 inferior unto his master in lying, feigning, and bearing two faces in one hood; a whelp that goeth not out of kind from his sire; the chiefest teasel<sup>42</sup> where-with the Cardinal caught the King's Grace, whom he called unto the confirmation of all that he intended to persuade, saying, "If it like your Grace, 55 More is a learned man, and knoweth it, and is also a layman, wherefore he will not say otherwise than it is, for any partiality to us-ward," which secretary yet must first deserve it with writing against Martin,<sup>43</sup> and against The Obedience, and Mammon, and become the proctor of purgatory, to write against The 60 Supplication of Beggars.<sup>44</sup> (335)

Thomas More is proved a liar

And More, among his other blasphemies in his dialogue,<sup>45</sup> saith, that none of us dare abide by our 65 faith unto the death. But shortly thereafter God, to prove More that he hath ever been a false liar, gave strength unto his servant Sir Thomas Hitton to confess, and that unto the death, the faith of his holy Son Jesus; which Thomas<sup>46</sup> the bishops
70 of Canterbury and Rochester, after they had dieted and tormented him secretly, murdered at Maidstone most cruelly. (340)

<sup>35</sup> All works of Tyndale quoted here, except for the last, are from the Cambridge University editions of 1848 and 1849 entitled respectively: Doctrinal Treatises and Introductions to Different Portions of Holy Scripture by William Tyndale, Martyr, 1536 and Expositions of Scripture and Practice of Prelates, both edited by Henry Walter. <sup>36</sup> What are given here and below as subtitles appeared as marginal notes. <sup>37</sup> Here Tyndale refers to More's Dialogue of Sir Thomas More, Knight, 1.14, where More praises the Duke of Gloucester. Shakespeare dramatizes this same incident in Henry VI.2, 2.1. The reference to "proctor of purgatory," however, refers to More's Supplication of Souls. <sup>38</sup> King Henry VIII's <sup>39</sup> perhaps <sup>40</sup> Cuthbert Tunstall <sup>41</sup> office, position <sup>42</sup> a plant with hooked prickles <sup>43</sup> Luther <sup>44</sup> The Supplication of Beggars was written by Simon Fish and answered by Thomas More's Supplication of Souls. <sup>45</sup> See Dialogue of Sir Thomas More, Knight 2.4 above. <sup>46</sup> 1849 note: This sufferer is here called Sir Thomas, after the usual manner of styling priests in Tyndale's time; but Foxe only calls Hitton "an honest poor man and religious." The Archbishop of Canterbury was Warham; the Bishop of Rochester was Fisher. The date of Hitton's martyrdom is said by Foxe to have been February 20, 1529.

From An Exposition of the First Epistle of St. John (1531)

These hypocrites laid to Wycliffe's charge, and do yet, that his doctrine caused insurrection. But they, to quench the truth of his preaching, slew the right king, and set up three false kings a row:<sup>47</sup> by which mischievous sedition they caused half England to be slain up, and brought the realm into such ruin and desolation that Master More could say, in his Utopia, that as Englishmen were wont to eat sheep, even so their sheep now eat up them by whole parishes at once, besides other inconveniences that he then saw. And so the hypocrites say now likewise, that God's Word causeth insurrection: but ye shall see shortly that these hypocrites themselves, after their old wont and examples, in quenching the truth that uttereth their juggling, shall cause all realms Christian to rise one against another, and some against themselves. (224–25)

From An Exposition upon the Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Chapters of Matthew (ca. 1531–32)

Covetousness blinded the eyes and hardened the heart of Sir Thomas More

Covetousness maketh many, whom the truth pleaseth at the beginning, to cast it up again and to be afterward the most cruel enemies thereof, after the example of Simon Magus; yea, and after the example of Sir Thomas More, Knight, which knew the truth, and for covetousness forsook it again, and conspired first with the Cardinal to deceive the King, and to lead him in darkness: and afterward, when the light was sprung upon them, and had driven them clean out of the Scripture, and had delivered it out of their tyranny, and had expelled the dark stinking mist of their devilish glosses, and had wiped away the cobwebs, which those poisoned spiders had spread upon the face of the clear text, so that the spirituality (as they call themselves) were ashamed of their part, as shameless as they

be; yet for all that, covetousness blinded the eyes of that gleering fox more and more, and hardened his heart against the truth, with the confidence of his painted poetry, babbling eloquence, and juggling arguments of subtle sophistry, grounded on his "unwritten verities," as true and as authentic as his story of Utopia. (100)

From William Tyndale's An Answer unto Sir Thomas More's Dialogue<sup>48</sup> (1531)

MASTER MORE: Christ lived chaste and exhorteth us to chastity.

TYNDALE: We be not all of Christ's complexion; neither exhorteth he to other chastity than wedlock, save at a time to serve our neighbors. Now the pope's chastity is not to serve a man's neighbor, but to run to riot and to carry away with him the living of the poor and of the true preacher, even the tithes of five or six parishes and to go and either dwell by a stew or to carry a stews with him, or to corrupt other men's wives.

Pannutius, a man that never proved<sup>49</sup> marriage, is praised in the stories for resisting such doctrine with God's word in a general council before the pope was a god. And now Master More, a man that hath proved it twice, is magnified for defending it with sophistry. And again me seemeth that it is a great oversight of Master More to think that Christ, though he was never married, would not more accept the service of a married man that would more say truth for him than they that abhor wedlock: inasmuch as the spirituality accept his humble service and reward his merits with so high honor, because he can better fain<sup>50</sup> for them, than any of their unchaste — I would say any chaste people though he be bigamous and past the grace of his neck-verse.<sup>51</sup>

And finally, if Master More look so much on the pleasure that is in marriage, why setteth he not his eyes on the thanksgiving for that pleasure and on the patience of other displeasures? (166–67)

<sup>47</sup> 1849 note: See Exposition upon Matthew, p. 53. Tyndale charges the popish clergy with what he accounted the guilt of deposing Richard II, and of transferring the crown to the house of Lancaster, when the hereditary right had

devolved to the house of York. <sup>48</sup> See Anne O'Donnell's and Jared Wick's edition (Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press, 2000), but the spelling and punctuation have been adjusted, 166–67. <sup>49</sup> experienced <sup>50</sup> be glad <sup>51</sup> a Latin verse printed in black letter formerly set before a person claiming benefit of clergy, by reading which he might prove his clerical status and hence save his neck (OED)

THE PARIS NEWSLETTER<sup>52</sup>

On More's Trial and Execution (1535)

This account of More's July 1 trial and July 6 execution was the earliest and most widely known, having left London within ten days or so after More's execution. A translation of this account, from French to Latin, had already been done in Paris by or on July 23, 1535.<sup>53</sup> Word traveled fast, since a trip from London to Paris generally took, at best, seven to ten days.

10 On the 1st July 1535, Master Thomas More, Chancellor of England, was brought before the judges and the accusations against him read in his presence. The Chancellor and the Duke of Norfolk turned to him and said, "You, Master More, have 15 gravely erred against the King; nevertheless we hope by his clemency that if you repent and correct your obstinate opinion in which you have so rashly persevered, you will receive pardon." He replied, "My lords, I thank you very heartily for your good will.
20 I pray God preserve me in my just opinion even to death. As to the accusation against me, I fear words, memory, and judgment would alike fail me to reply to such a length of articles, especially considering my present imprisonment and great infirmity."
25 A chair was then ordered to be placed for him, and he proceeded as follows.

"As to the first article, charging me with having always maliciously opposed the King's second marriage, I will only answer that what I have said has 30 been according to my conscience. I never wished to conceal the truth, and if I had, I should have been a traitor. For this error, if error it should be called, I have been condemned to perpetual imprisonment, which I have already suffered for fifteen months, 35 and my goods confiscated. For this reason I will only reply to the principal charge against me, that I have incurred the penalty of the statute made in the last Parliament since I was in prison, by refusing to the King his title of Supreme Head of the Church,
40 in proof of which you allege my reply to the Secretary and Council, that as I was dead to the world, I did not care to think of such things, but only of the Passion of Christ. I reply that your statute cannot condemn me to death for such silence, for neither 45 your statute nor any laws in the world punish people except for words or deed—surely not for keeping silence." To this the King's proctor replied that such silence was a certain proof of malice intended against the statute, especially as every faithful subject, on being questioned about the statute, 50 was obliged to answer categorically that the statute was good and wholesome. "Surely," replied More, "if what the common law says is true, that he who is silent seems to consent, my silence should rather be taken as approval than contempt of your statute.

55 You say that all good subjects are obliged to reply; but I say that the faithful subject is more bound to his conscience and his soul than to anything else in the world, provided his conscience, like mine, does not raise scandal or sedition, and I assure you that 60 I have never discovered what is in my conscience to any person living.

"As to the second article, that I have conspired against the statute by writing eight letters to the Bishop of Rochester, advising him to disobey it, I 65 could wish these letters had been read in public, but as you say the Bishop has burnt them, I will tell you the substance of them. Some were about private matters connected with our old friendship. Another was a reply to one of his asking how I had answered 70 in the Tower to the first examination about the statute. I said that I had informed my conscience, and so he also ought to do the same. I swear that this was the tenor of the letters, for which I cannot be condemned by your statute."
75

"Touching the third article, that when I was examined by the Council, I answered that your statute was like a two-edged sword, for he who approved it would ruin his soul, and he who contradicted it, 80 his body; and that the Bishop of Rochester answered similarly, showing that we were confederates, I reply that I only answered thus conditionally, that if the statute cut both ways like a two-edged sword, how could a man behave so as not to incur either danger?
85 I do not know how the Bishop replied, but if he answered like me, it must have been from the agreement between us in opinion, but not because we had ever arranged it between us. Be assured I never did or said anything maliciously against the statute, but it may be that this has been maliciously reported to 90 the King."

Then they ordered an usher to summon twelve

<sup>52</sup> This translation is from LP 8:996, with the adjustment noted at the end. For the original French, see Harpsfield 258–66.

<sup>53</sup> See J. D. M. Derrett, "Neglected Versions of the Contemporary Account of the Trial of Sir Thomas More," Bulletin

of the Institute of Historical Research 33: 202–23.

men according to the custom of the country, and these articles were given to them that they might judge whether More had maliciously contravened the statute. After a quarter of an hour's absence they declared him guilty of death, and sentence was pronounced by the Chancellor selon la lettre de la nouvelle loy.<sup>54</sup>

More then spoke as follows: "Since I am condemned, and God knows how, I wish to speak freely of your statute, for the discharge of my conscience. For the seven years that I have studied the matter, I have not read in any approved doctor of the Church that a temporal lord could or ought to be head of the spirituality." The Chancellor interrupting him, said, "What, More, you wish to be considered wiser and of better conscience than all the bishops and nobles of the realm?" To this More replied, "My lord, for one bishop of your opinion I have a hundred saints of mine; and for one parliament of yours, and God knows of what kind, I have all the General Councils for 1,000 years, and for one kingdom I have France and all the kingdoms of Christendom." Norfolk told him that now his malice was clear. More replied, "What I say is necessary for discharge of my conscience and satisfaction of my soul, and to this I call God to witness, the sole Searcher of human hearts. I say further, that your statute is ill made, because you have sworn never to do anything against the Church, which through all Christendom is one and undivided, and you have no authority, without the common consent of all Christians, to make a law or act of Parliament or Council against the union of Christendom. I know well that the reason why you have condemned me is because I have never been willing to consent to the King's second marriage, but I hope in the divine goodness and mercy, that as St. Paul and St. Stephen whom he persecuted are now friends in Paradise, so we, though differing in this world, shall be united in perfect charity in the other. I pray God to protect the King and give him good counsel."

On his way to the Tower one of his daughters, named Margaret, pushed through the archers and guards, and held him in her embrace some time without being able to speak. Afterwards More, asking leave of the archers, bade her have patience, for it was God's will, and she had long known the secret of his heart. After going ten or twelve steps she returned and embraced him again, to which he said nothing, except to bid her pray to God for his soul, and this without tears or change of color. On the Tuesday following he was beheaded in the open space in front of the Tower. A little before his death he asked those present to pray to God for him and he would do the same for them [in the other world.]<sup>55</sup> He then besought them earnestly to pray to God to give the King good counsel, protesting that he died his faithful servant, and God's first.<sup>56</sup>

REGINALD POLE<sup>57</sup> ON THOMAS MORE (1536)

Oh! England! What do you say here? . . . Rather do you not know that you were deprived of your own parent in this finest and most loving citizen of yours? Furthermore, if anyone ever deserved from you the name of "Father of his Country," it was this man. . . .

But you, Oh! City of London! All of these things happened within your view. You saw him when he was led out from jail to plead against this charge of treason. You recall that a short time thereafter he was convicted of treason before your tribunal. You beheld him as a boy, a youth, a man, and finally in his later years as he advanced up the steps of the highest honors with the very great praise and approval of all, due to his most unusual virtues. Finally, you saw him ascend to the most renowned position; and because he was your citizen and your native son, you witnessed this with a certain feeling of joy. . . . (229–30)

Though I myself write these things concerning his death, separated by such a great distance, I have not only many private reasons for loving him but I have rather loved and cherished him especially because of his virtue and uprightness, on account of which I knew him to be most useful to his native land. . . . Though indeed, [London], by nature he

<sup>54</sup> "according to the tenor of the new law" from the Spanish translation of this letter <sup>56</sup> The French of this last phrase is qu'il mourait son bon serviteur et de Dieu

premierement. <sup>57</sup> A cousin (by both the Plantagenet and Tudor lines) and one-time close friend of Henry VIII, Reginald Pole (1500–1558) wrote this personal appeal to the King in the year after More's death. This excerpt is taken from Pole's Defense of the Unity of the Church, trans. Joseph Dwyer (Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1965).

was your son through his citizenship; by his benefits, however, he was your father. He displayed more signs of paternal affection toward you than a most indulgent father showed toward his one and dearest son. But in no greater way did he show that he was your parent than by his death. He lost his life for the very special reason that he would not betray your security.

Wherefore we read in the histories of the Greeks that Socrates was assailed in an unjust trial by the Athenians, even as it is now well known that More was condemned to death by you. A short while later, in a theatre where people had assembled for a spectacle, these words were read aloud from a certain tragedy: "You have killed, you have killed the best man of all the Greeks!" Immediately at these words the bitter memory of the murder of Socrates went through the minds of all. . . . [B]y how much more just anger and compassion should you, City of London, be stirred? You did not hear these words uttered by chance just once in a theatre in your country by some actor, but you were compelled to hear this charge: "You have killed, you have killed the best of all Englishmen!" brought against you by the most serious men at a time when they were speaking most seriously in every place now Christian in name. . . . (230–31)

. . . Perhaps [a critic of More and Fisher] would say that they did not see any truth at all by divine light or by the light of reason. He would say that by some kind of obstinacy from the very beginning their minds began to defend a false opinion. He would say that it seems they decided to die rather than abandon this opinion.

Truly, my Prince, I beseech you! Examine the record for a moment. Consider the words of those who spoke in this manner. But first, you yourself who knew these men, examine them! See to it that you consider what they were like during the rest of their lives. However, I ask only this of you; I ask whether you remember anyone who ever accused these men of imprudence prior to the time when this question began to be discussed publicly.

Now I am speaking of More alone. Was anyone in all your realm considered more prudent than More during his lifetime? Manifestly, no one, in the opinion of all who knew him, can be mentioned as comparable to him in talent and prudence. He excelled in prudence; therefore, when it happened in his case that he could have avoided all inconvenience and troubles, and also could have surpassed all others in honors and in favor with you—if he would only withdraw from his opinion—he deprived himself of these honors and your favor. Can we believe he acted imprudently? (311)

EDWARD HALL ON THOMAS MORE<sup>58</sup>

1517 May Day Riot

With these opinions was the Recorder sent to the Cardinal before eight of the clock, and then he, with such as were of the King's Council at his place, commanded that in no wise<sup>59</sup> watch should be kept, but that every man should repair to his own house, and there to keep him and his servants till seven of the clock of the morning, with which commandment the said Richard Brook, serjeant at the law and recorder, and Sir Thomas More, late undersheriff of London, and then of the King's Council, came to the Guildhall half hour and before nine of the clock, and there showed the commandment of the King's Council. Then in all haste, every alderman sent to his ward<sup>60</sup> that no man should stir after nine of the clock out of his house, but to keep his doors shut, and his servants within till seven of the clock in the morning. After this commandment, Sir John Mundy, alderman, came from his ward, and found two young men in Cheap<sup>61</sup> playing at bucklers,<sup>62</sup> and a great company of young men looking on them, for the commandment was then scarce known, for then it was but nine of the clock. Master Mundy seeing that, bade them leave, and the one young man asked him, "Why?" and then he said, "Thou shalt know," and took him by the arm to have had him to the counter.<sup>63</sup> Then all the young men resisted the alderman, and took him from Master Mundy, and cried, "Apprentices and clubs!" Then out at every door came clubs and weapons and the alderman fled, and was in great danger. Then more people arose out of every quarter, and out came serving-men, and watermen and

<sup>58</sup> All references are to Edward Hall, Hall's Chronicle (London, 1809).

<sup>59</sup> way <sup>60</sup> district <sup>61</sup> a street in London <sup>62</sup> playing at bucklers: fencing, sword-fighting <sup>63</sup> prison

courtiers, and by an eleven of the clock there were in Cheap six or seven hundred. And out of Paul's Churchyard came three hundred, which wist<sup>64</sup> not of the other, and so out of all places they gathered, and broke up the counters, and took out the prisoners, that the Mayor had thither committed for hurting of the strangers, and came to Newgate<sup>65</sup> and took out Studley and Petyt, committed thither for that cause. The Mayor and sheriffs were there present, and made proclamation in the King's name, but nothing was obeyed. Thus they ran a plump<sup>66</sup> through Saint Nicholas Shambles,<sup>67</sup> and at Saint Martin's gate, there met with them Sir Thomas More and others, desiring them to go to their lodgings. And as they were entreating, and had almost brought them to a stay, the people of Saint Martin's threw out stones and bats, and hurt diverse honest persons, that were persuading the riotous people to cease, and they bade them hold their hands, but still they threw out bricks and hot water. Then a serjeant of armes called Nicholas Downes, which<sup>68</sup> was there with Master More entreating them, being sore<sup>69</sup> hurt, in a fury cried, "Down with them!" Then all the misruled<sup>70</sup> persons ran to the doors and windows of Saint Martin, and spoiled all that they found, and cast it into the street, and left few houses unspoiled. (588–89)

1518 Oration for London

And about three of the clock at afternoon on the twenty-ninth day of July the said legate entered the city, and in Southwark met him all the clergy of London with crosses, censers, and copes and censed<sup>71</sup> him with great reverence. The Mayor and aldermen, and all the occupations of the city in their best liveries<sup>72</sup> stood in the streets, and him highly honored, to whom Sir Thomas More made a brief oration in the name of the city. (593)

1522 Oration before King and Charles V

In the way, the Mayor John Milborne and his brethren, in fine scarlet and well-horsed, met with the Emperor and the King where one Sir Thomas More, Knight and well-learned, made to them an eloquent oration, in the praise of the two princes, and of the peace and love between them, and what comfort it was to their subjects to see them in such amity, and how that the Mayor and citizens offered any pleasure of service that in them lay, next their Sovereign Lord. (637)

1523 Speaker of the House of Commons

According to this instruction the Commons departed to the Common House and chose for their speaker Sir Thomas More, Knight, and presented him the Saturday after in the Parliament chamber, where he according to the old usage disabled himself<sup>73</sup> both in wit, learning, and discretion to speak before the King, and brought in for his purpose how one Phormio desired Hannibal to come to his reading, which<sup>74</sup> thereto assented, and when Hannibal was come, he began to read, de re militaire, that is "of chivalry"; when Hannibal perceived him, he called him arrogant fool, because he would presume to teach him which was master of chivalry in the feats of war. So the speaker said, if he should speak before the King of learning and ordering of a commonwealth and such other like, the King being so well learned and of such prudence and experience might say to him as Hannibal said to Phormio. Wherefore he desired his Grace that the Commons might choose another speaker. The Cardinal answered that the King knew his wit, learning, and discretion by long experience in his service, wherefore he thought that the Commons had chosen him as the most meetest<sup>75</sup> of all, and so he did admit him. Then Sir Thomas More gave to the King his most humble thanks, and desired of him two petitions—the one, if he should be sent from the Commons to the King on message and mistake their intent, that he might with the King's pleasure resort again<sup>76</sup> to the Commons for the knowledge of their true meaning; the other was, if in communication and reasoning any man in the Common House should speak more largely<sup>77</sup> than of duty he ought to do, that all such offenses should be pardoned, and that to be entered of record—which two petitions were granted, and so thus began the Parliament and continued as you shall hear. (652–53)

1525 Oration before King and Ambassadors

The twenty-eighth day of April, in the beginning of this eighteenth year, came to the Court

64 knew 65 a famous prison in London
66 a plump: in a group, band 67 a church
68 who 69 greatly, badly 70 disorderly;

unruly 71 anointed 72 clothes 73 disabled himself: pronounced himself incapable 74 who 75 fittest 76 back 77 copiously, abundantly

to Greenwich Monsieur Brenion, chief president of Roan, and John Jokyn now called Monsieur de Vaux, which President of Roan before the King, set in a throne, and accompanied with all his nobles, and the ambassadors of Rome, of the Emperor, of Venice, and Florence, being there present, made in the Latin tongue a solemn oration, the effect whereof was that he showed how dreadful the wars had been between the realms of England and France, what great loss the realm of France had sustained by the said wars. He declared further of what power the King of England was of and what conquest he might have made in France, the King being prisoner, and acknowledged the King of England's right in the wars, and their wrongs, where he humbly thanked him, of his pity and compassion that he had on them in their necessity and affliction, that he would consent to peace. To this oration the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, by name Sir Thomas More, made answer, saying that it much rejoiced the King that they first considered how by his power he might have oppressed, and how by his pity he had relieved them; wherefore he would<sup>78</sup> hereafter that for kindness, they should show him none unkindness, but inviolately to keep that league which was concluded. (711–12)

1529 Chosen as Lord Chancellor

The twenty and three day of October, the King came to his manor of Greenwich, and there much consulted with his Council, for a meet<sup>79</sup> man to be his chancellor, so that in no wise<sup>80</sup> he were no man of the spirituality,<sup>81</sup> and so after long debate, the King resolved himself upon Sir Thomas More, Knight, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, a man well-learned in the tongues, and also in the common law, whose wit was fine, and full of imaginations, by reason whereof, he was too much given to mocking, which was to his gravity a great blemish. And then on the Sunday, the twenty and four day of the same month, the King made him his chancellor, and delivered him the Great Seal, which Lord Chancellor, the next morrow after, was led into the Chancery by the two dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, and there sworn, and then the mace was borne before him. (761)

1529 Opening Speech as Lord Chancellor

The King with all the lords of the Parliament, and Commons which were summoned to appear at that day came into the Parliament chamber, where the King sat in his throne, or seat royal, and Sir Thomas More his chancellor standing on the right hand of the King behind the bar made an eloquent oration, declaring that like<sup>82</sup> as a good shepherd which not alonely keepeth and attendeth well his sheep, but also forseeth and provideth for all things, which either may be hurtful or noisome<sup>83</sup> to his flock, or may preserve and defend the same against all perils that may chance to come, so the King which was the shepherd, ruler, and governor of his realm, vigilantly forseeing things to come, considered how diverse laws before this time were made now by long continuance of time and mutation of things, very insufficient, and unperfect; and also by the frail condition of man diverse new enormities were sprung amongst the people, for the which no law was yet made to reform the same, which was the very cause why at that time the King had summoned his high court of Parliament. And he resembled the King to a shepherd, or herdsman for this cause: "For if a prince be compared to his riches, he is but a rich man, if a prince be compared to his honor, he is but an honorable man; but compare him to the multitude of his people and the number of his flock, then he is a ruler, a governor of might and puissance, so that his people maketh him a prince, as of the multitude of sheep, cometh the name of a shepherd. And as you see that amongst a great flock of sheep some be rotten and faulty, which the good shepherd sendeth from the good sheep, so the great wether<sup>84</sup> which is of late fallen, as you all know, so craftily, so scabbedly,<sup>85</sup> yea and so untruly juggled<sup>86</sup> with the King, that all men must needs guess and think that<sup>87</sup> he thought in himself, that he had no wit to perceive his crafty doing, or else that he presumed that the King would not see nor know his fraudulent juggling and attempts; but he was deceived, for his Grace's sight was so quick and penetrable, that he saw him, yea and saw through him, both within and without, so that all things to him was open, and according to his desert he hath had a gentle correction, which small punishment the King will<sup>88</sup> not to

78 wanted 79 fit, fair 80 way, manner
81 clergy 82 just 83 harmful, injurious

84 ram 85 basely 86 cheated, deceived 87 that which 88 wants be an example to other offenders, but clearly declareth that whosoever hereafter shall make like<sup>89</sup> attempt to commit like offense, shall not escape with like punishment, and because you of the Common 5 House be a gross multitude, and cannot speak all at one time. Therefore the King's pleasure is, that you shall resort to the Nether House,<sup>90</sup> and there amongst yourselves according to the old and ancient custom to choose an able person to be your common 10 mouth and speaker, and after your election so made to advertise<sup>91</sup> his Grace thereof, which will declare to you his pleasure what day he will have him present in this place. (764)

1531 Opinions on Divorce Presented to 15 Parliament

While the Parliament sat, on the thirtieth day of March at afternoon there came into the Common House the Lord Chancellor and diverse lords of the spirituality and temporality<sup>92</sup> to the number of 20 twelve, and there the Lord Chancellor said, "You of this worshipful house I am sure be not so ignorant but you know well that the King, our sovereign lord hath married his brother's wife, for she was both wedded and bedded with his brother Prince 25 Arthur, and therefore you may surely say that he hath married his brother's wife; if this marriage be good or no, many clerkes do doubt. Wherefore the King like a virtuous prince willing to be satisfied in his conscience, and also for the surety<sup>93</sup> of his realm, 30 hath with great deliberation consulted with great clerks, and hath sent my Lord of London here present to the chief universities of all Christendom to know their opinion and judgment in that behalf.
And although that the Universities of Cambridge 35 and Oxford had been sufficient to discuss the cause, yet because they be in his realm and to avoid all suspicion of partiality he hath sent into the realm of France, Italy, the Pope's dominions, and Venetians to know their judgment in that behalf, which have 40 concluded, written and sealed their determinations according as you shall hear read." Then Sir Brian Tuke took out of a box twelve writings sealed, and read them word-by-word, as after ensueth translated out of Latin into the English tongue. . . .

45 Then the Chancellor said, "Now you of this Common House may report in your countries<sup>94</sup> what you have seen and heard, and then all men shall openly perceive that the King hath not attempted this matter of<sup>95</sup> will or pleasure, as some strangers report, but only for the discharge of his conscience and surety 50 of the succession of his realm. This is the cause of our repair<sup>96</sup> hither to you, and now we will depart."

When these determinations were published, all wise men in the realm much abhorred that marriage, but women, and such as were more wilful 55 than wise or learned, spoke against the determination, and said that the universities were corrupt and enticed so to do, which is not to be thought. (775, 780)

1532 Resignation 60

The opening of these oaths was one of the occasions why the Pope, within two years following, lost all his jurisdiction in England, as you shall hear afterward. The fourteenth day [of May] the Parliament was prorogued,<sup>97</sup> till the fourteenth day of 65
February next ensuing. After which prorogation, Sir Thomas More, Chancellor of England, after long suits made to the King to be discharged of that office, the sixteenth day of May he delivered to the King at Westminster, the Great Seal of England, 70 and was with the King's favor discharged, which Seal the King kept till Whitsuntide following, and on the Monday in Whitsun week, he dubbed Thomas Audley, Speaker of the Parliament, Knight, and made him Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, and 75
so was he called. (789)

1534 Imprisonment

The thirtieth day of March, the Parliament was prorogued, and there every lord and burges and all others were sworn to the Act of Succession, and subscribed their hands to a parchment fixed to the same oath. This Parliament was prorogued till the third day of November next. After this, commissions were sent over all England to take the oath of all men and women to the Act of Succession, at 85 which few repined,<sup>98</sup> except Doctor John Fisher; Sir Thomas More, knight, late Lord Chancellor; and Doctor Nicholas Wilson, parson of Saint Thomas Apostles in London, wherefore these three persons, after long exhortation to them made by the Bishop 90 of Canterbury at Lambeth, and express denial

89 a similar 90 House of Commons 91 inform 92 spirituality and temporality: 93 safety, security 94 regions 95 from, out of 96 return 97 deferred, postponed 98 complained of them to be sworn, they were sent to the Tower where they remained and were oftentimes motioned to be sworn; but the Bishop and Sir Thomas More said that they had in their writings written the Princess-Dowager “queen,” and therefore they might not go against that, and the Doctor said that he in preaching called her “queen,” which he would not withsay; howbeit<sup>99</sup> at length he was very well contented, and dissembled the matter and so escaped. But the other twain<sup>100</sup> stood against all the realm in their opinion. (814)

1535 Execution

Also the sixth day of July was Sir Thomas More beheaded for the like treason before rehearsed,<sup>101</sup> which as you have heard was for the denying of the King’s Majesty’s supremacy. This man was also accounted learned, and as you have heard before he was Lord Chancellor of England, and in that time a great persecutor of such as detested the supremacy of the Bishop of Rome, which he himself so highly favored that he stood to it till he was brought to the scaffold on the Tower Hill where on a block his head was stricken from his shoulders and had no more harm. I cannot tell whether I should call him a foolish wiseman, or a wise foolishman, for undoubtedly he, besides his learning, had a great wit, but it was so mingled with taunting and mocking that it seemed to them that best knew him that he thought nothing to be well spoken except<sup>102</sup> he had ministred some mock in the communication, inso-much as at his coming to the Tower, one of the officers demanded his upper garment for his fee, meaning his gown, and he answered, he should have it, and took him his cap, saying it was the uppermost garment that he had. Likewise, even going to his death at the Tower gate, a poor woman called unto him and besought him to declare that he had certain evidences of hers in<sup>103</sup> the time that he was in office (which after he was apprehended she could not come by) and that he would entreat she might have them again, or else she was undone. He answered, “Good woman, have patience a little while, for the King is good unto me that even within this half hour he will discharge me of all businesses, and help thee himself.” Also when he went up the stair on the scaffold, he desired one of the sheriff’s officers to give him his hand to help him up, and said, “When I come down again, let me shift for myself as well as I can.” Also the hangman kneeled down to him, asking him forgiveness of his death (as the manner is) to whom he said, “I forgive thee, but I promise thee that thou shalt never have honesty<sup>104</sup> of the striking off my head; my neck is so short.” Also even when he should lay down his head on the block, he having a great gray beard, striked out his beard and said to the hangman, “I pray you let me lay my beard over the block, lest ye should cut it.” Thus with a mock he ended his life. (815–16)

THE LIFE OF SIR THOMAS MORE<sup>105</sup>

by William Roper (ca. 1556)

Forasmuch as Sir Thomas More, Knight, sometime<sup>106</sup> Lord Chancellor of England, a man of singular virtue and of a clear unspotted conscience, as witnesseth Erasmus, more pure and white than the whitest snow, and of such an angelical wit as England, he saith, never had the like before, nor never shall again, universally, as well in the laws of our own realm (a study in effect able to occupy the whole life of a man), as in all other sciences, right well studied, was in his days accounted a man worthy of perpetual famous memory: I, William Roper, though most unworthy, his son-in-law by marriage to his eldest daughter,<sup>107</sup> knowing at this day no one man living that of him and of his doings understood so much as myself, for that<sup>108</sup> I was continually resident in his house by the space of sixteen years and more, thought it therefore my part to set forth such matters touching his life as I could at this present call to remembrance. Among which things, very many notable things (not meet<sup>109</sup> to have been forgotten) through negligence and long continuance of time are slipped out of my mind. Yet, to the intent the same should not all utterly perish, I have at the desire of diverse worshipful friends of mine (though very far from the grace and worthiness of them, nevertheless as far-forth<sup>110</sup> as my mean wit,

<sup>99</sup> however <sup>100</sup> two <sup>101</sup> recounted <sup>102</sup> unless <sup>103</sup> from <sup>104</sup> honor; credit
<sup>105</sup> The critical edition of this work is The

Lyfe of Sir Thomas Moore, knight, ed. E. V. Hitchcock (London: Early English Text Society, 1935). <sup>106</sup> at a certain time;

formerly <sup>107</sup> Roper married Margaret More on July 2, 1521. <sup>108</sup> for that: because <sup>109</sup> proper, fitting <sup>110</sup> to the extent memory and knowledge would serve me) declared so much thereof as in my poor judgment seemed worthy to be remembered.

This Sir Thomas More, after he had been brought up in the Latin tongue at Saint Anthony's in London, was by his father's<sup>111</sup> procurement received into the house of the right reverend, wise, and learned prelate Cardinal Morton,<sup>112</sup> where, though he was young of years, yet would he at Christmastide suddenly sometimes step in among the players, and never studying for the matter, make a part of his own there presently among them, which made the lookers-on more sport than all the players besides. In whose<sup>113</sup> wit and towardness<sup>114</sup> the Cardinal, much delighting, would often say of him unto the nobles that diverse times dined with him, "This child here waiting at the table, whosoever shall live to see it, will prove a marvelous man."

Whereupon for his better furtherance in learning, he placed him at Oxford, where, when he was both in the Greek<sup>115</sup> and Latin tongue sufficiently instructed, he was then for the study of the law of the realm put to an Inn of Chancery called New Inn, where for his time he very well prospered. And from thence was admitted to Lincoln's Inn, with very small allowance, continuing there his study until he was made and accounted a worthy utter barrister.

After this, to his great commendation, he read for a good space a public lecture of Saint Augustine's De civitate Dei, in the Church of Saint Lawrence in the Old Jewry, whereunto there resorted Doctor Grocyn an excellent cunning<sup>116</sup> man, and all<sup>117</sup> the chief learned of the City of London.

Then was he made reader at Furnival's Inn, so remaining by the space of three years and more.

After which time he gave himself to devotion and prayer in the Charterhouse of London, religiously living there, without vow, about four years, until he resorted to the house of one Master Colt, a gentleman of Essex, that had oft invited him thither, having three daughters, whose honest conversation and virtuous education provoked him there specially to set his affection. And albeit<sup>118</sup> his mind most served<sup>119</sup> him to the second daughter, for that<sup>120</sup> he thought her the fairest and best favored, yet when he considered that it would be both great grief and

William Roper completed in 1556 his account of More's life to provide his own memories as source material for Nicholas Harnpsfield, who was asked by Roper to write his famous father-in-law's biography. Roper's Life was first published in the edition shown here, in 1626, but at the press of the Jesuit college at St. Omer, not in Paris.

111 John More (ca. 1451–1530) 112 Lord Chancellor of England, 1487–1500; Archbishop of Canterbury, 1486–1500; made a cardinal in 1493. More entered

Morton's household in 1490, at Lambeth Palace. 113 his (More's) 114 natural aptitude and good disposition 115 More indicates in his 1501 letter to John Holt that he began the serious study of Greek after his years at Oxford. 116 learned 117 of all 118 although 119 conducted 120 for that: because some shame also to the eldest to see her younger sister in marriage preferred before her, he then of a certain pity framed his fancy toward her, and soon after married her, never the more discontinuing his study of the law at Lincoln's Inn, but applying still the same until he was called to the bench, and had read<sup>121</sup> twice, which is as often as ordinarily any judge of the law doth read.

Before which time he had placed himself and his wife at Bucklersbury in London, where he had by her three daughters and one son, in virtue and learning brought up from their youth, whom he would often exhort to take virtue and learning for their meat, and play for their sauce.

Who,<sup>122</sup> ere<sup>123</sup> ever he had been reader in Court, was in the latter time of King Henry VII made a burgess of the Parliament, wherein there were by the King demanded (as I have heard reported) about three-fifteenths<sup>124</sup> for the marriage of his eldest daughter, that then should be the Scottish queen. At the last debating whereof he<sup>125</sup> made such arguments and reasons thereagainst, that the King's demands thereby were clean overthrown. So that one of the King's Privy Chamber named Master Tyler, being present thereat, brought word to the King out of the Parliament House that a beardless boy had disappointed all his purpose. Whereupon the King, conceiving great indignation toward him, could not be satisfied until he had some way revenged it. And, forasmuch as he nothing having, nothing could lose, his Grace devised a causeless quarrel against his father, keeping him in the Tower until he had made him pay to him a hundred pounds fine.

Shortly thereupon it fortun'd that this Sir Thomas More, coming in a suit to Doctor Fox, Bishop of Winchester (one of the King's Privy Council), the Bishop called him aside, and, pretending great favor toward him, promised him that, if he would be ruled by him, he would not fail into the King's favor again to restore him, meaning (as it was after conjectured) to cause him thereby to confess his offense against the King, whereby his Highness might with the better color have occasion to revenge his displeasure against him. But when he came from the Bishop, he fell in communication with one Master Whitford, his familiar friend, then chaplain to that Bishop, and after a father of Syon,<sup>126</sup> and showed him what the Bishop had said unto him, desiring to have his advice therein, who for the Passion of God, prayed him in no wise<sup>127</sup> to follow his counsel. "For my lord, my master," quoth he, "to serve the King's turn, will not stick<sup>128</sup> to agree to his own father's death." So Sir Thomas More returned to the Bishop no more. And had not the King soon after died,<sup>129</sup> he was determined to have gone over the sea, thinking that, being in the King's indignation, he could not live in England without great danger.

After this he was made one of the undersheriffs of London, by which office and his learning together (as I have heard him say), he gained without grief not so little as four hundred pounds<sup>130</sup> by the year, since there was at that time in none of the prince's courts of the laws of this realm any matter of importance in controversy wherein he was not with the one part of counsel. Of whom, for his learning, wisdom, knowledge, and experience, men had such estimation that, before he came to the service of King Henry VIII, at the suit and instance<sup>131</sup> of the English merchants, he was by the King's consent made twice ambassador in certain great causes between them and merchants of the Steelyard: whose wise and discreet dealing therein, to his high commendation, coming to the King's understanding, provoked his Highness to cause Cardinal Wolsey (then Lord Chancellor) to procure him to his service. And albeit<sup>132</sup> the Cardinal, according to the King's request, earnestly travailed<sup>133</sup> with him therefore, among many other his<sup>134</sup> persuasions alleging unto him how dear his service must needs be unto his Majesty, which could not, with his honor, with less than he should yearly lose thereby, seem to recompense him. Yet he, loath to change his estate, made such means to the King, by the Cardinal, to the contrary, that his Grace, for that time, was well satisfied.

Now happened there after this, a great ship of his that then was Pope to arrive at Southampton, which the King claiming for a forfeiture, the Pope's ambassador, by suit unto his Grace, obtained that he might for his master the Pope have counsel learned in the laws of this realm, and the matter in his own presence (being himself a singular<sup>135</sup> civilian) in some

121 given a series of lectures 122 He (a continuative relative) 123 before
124 a property tax that amounted to three-fifteenths of the property's value

125 More 126 a Bridgettine monastery in Middlesex 127 way 128 hesitate, delay 129 April 1509 130 An ordinary worker earned roughly ten pounds per year. 131 urgent entreaty, solicitation 132 although 133 labored 134 many other his: his many other 135 eminent, distinguished public place to be openly heard and discussed. At which time there could none of our law be found so meet<sup>136</sup> to be of counsel with this ambassador as Sir Thomas More, who could report to the ambassador 5 in Latin all the reasons and arguments by the learned counsel on both sides alleged. Upon this the counselors of either part, in presence of the Lord Chancellor and other the judges, in the Star Chamber had audience accordingly. Where Sir Thomas More not 10 only declared to the ambassador the whole effect of all their opinions, but also, in defense of the Pope's side, argued so learnedly himself, that both was the aforesaid forfeiture to the Pope restored, and himself among all the hearers, for his upright and com-

 15 mendable demeanor therein, so greatly renowned, that for no entreaty would the King from thenceforth be induced any longer to forbear his service. At whose first entry thereunto he made him Master of the Requests (having then no better room 20 void<sup>137</sup>) and within a month after, Knight and one of his Privy Council.

And so from time to time was he by the Prince advanced, continuing in his singular favor and trusty service twenty years and above, a good part 25 whereof used the King upon holy-days, when he had done his own devotions, to send for him into his traverse,<sup>138</sup> and there sometimes in matters of astronomy, geometry, divinity, and such other faculties, and sometimes of his worldly affairs, to sit and 30 confer with him. And other whiles would he, in the night, have him up into his leads,<sup>139</sup> there for to consider with him the diversities, courses, motions, and operations of the stars and planets. And because he was of a pleasant disposition, it pleased the King 35 and the Queen, after the Council had supped, at the time of their supper, for their pleasure, commonly to call for him to be merry with them. Whom when he perceived so much in his talk to delight, that he could not once in a month get leave to go home to 40 his wife and children (whose company he most desired) and to be absent from the Court two days together, but that he should be thither sent for again, he, much misliking this restraint of his liberty, began thereupon somewhat to dissemble his nature, 45 and so by little and little from his former accustomed mirth to disuse<sup>140</sup> himself, that he was of them from thenceforth at such seasons no more so ordinarily sent for.

Then died one Master Weston, Treasurer of the Exchequer, whose office, after his death, the King of 50 his own offer, without any asking, freely gave unto Sir Thomas More.<sup>141</sup>

In the fourteenth year of his Grace's reign was there a Parliament holden, whereof Sir Thomas More was chosen Speaker, who, being very loath to 55 take that room upon him, made an oration (not now extant)<sup>142</sup> to the King's Highness for his discharge thereof; whereunto when the King would not consent, he spoke unto his Grace in form following:

Since I perceive, most redoubled Sovereign, that 60 it standeth not with your high pleasure to reform this election and cause it to be changed, but have by the mouth of the most reverend father in God, the legate, your Highness's Chancellor, thereunto
 65 given your most royal assent, and have of your benignity determined, far above that I may bear, to enable me and for this office to repute me meet<sup>143</sup> rather than you should seem to impute unto your
 70 Commons that they have unmeetly chosen, I am therefore, and always shall be, ready obediently to conform myself to the accomplishment of your high commandment, in my most humble wise<sup>144</sup>
 75 beseeching your most noble Majesty that I may with your Grace's favor, before I farther enter thereunto, make mine humble intercession unto 80 your Highness for two lowly petitions: the one privately concerning myself, the other the whole assembly of your Common House.

For myself, gracious Sovereign, that if it mishap me in anything hereafter that is on the behalf 80 of your Commons in your high presence to be declared, to mistake my message, and in the lack of good utterance, by my misrehearsal,<sup>145</sup> to pervert or impair their prudent instructions, it may then
 85 like your most noble Majesty, of your abundant grace, with the eye of your accustomed pity, to pardon my simpleness, giving me leave to repair again to the Common House, and there to confer with them, and to take their substantial advice
 90 what thing and in what wise I shall on their behalf utter and speak before your noble Grace, to

136 fitting, appropriate 137 room void: office vacant 138 small screened-off portion of a larger room 139 flat roof covered with lead 140 disengage

141 Here Roper errs. More was made undertreasurer of the Exchequer, and his predecessor was John Castle, not Weston. 142 See Edward Hall's summary of that speech above, p. 1387. 143 declare me fit 144 way, manner 145 misrepresentation

the intent their prudent devices<sup>146</sup> and affairs be not by my simpleness and folly hindered or impaired: which thing, if it should so mishap, as it were well likely to mishap in me, if your gracious benignity relieved not my oversight, it could not fail to be during my life a perpetual grudge and heaviness to my heart, the help and remedy whereof, in manner aforesaid remembered,<sup>147</sup> is, most gracious Sovereign, my first lowly suit and humble petition unto your most noble Grace.

Mine other humble request, most excellent Prince, is this: forasmuch as there be of your Commons, here by your high commandment assembled for your Parliament, a great number which are, after the accustomed manner, appointed in the Common House to treat and advise of the common affairs among themselves apart, and albeit, most dear liege Lord, that according to your prudent advice, by your honorable writs everywhere declared, there hath been as due diligence used in sending up to your Highness's Court of Parliament the most discreet persons out of every quarter that men could esteem meet thereunto, whereby it is not to be doubted but that there is a very substantial assembly of right wise and politic persons; yet, most victorious Prince, since among so many wise men neither is every man wise alike, nor among so many men, like well-witted, every man like well-spoken, and it often happeneth that, likewise as much folly is uttered with painted polished speech, so many, boisterous and rude in language, see deep indeed, and give right substantial counsel; and since also in matters of great importance, the mind is often so occupied in the matter that a man rather studieth what to say than how, by reason whereof the wisest man and the best spoken in a whole country fortuneth among, while his mind is fervent in the matter, somewhat to speak in such wise<sup>148</sup> as he would afterward wish to have been uttered otherwise, and yet no worse will had when he spoke it, than he hath when he would so gladly change it; therefore, most gracious Sovereign, considering that in your High Court of Parliament is nothing entreated<sup>149</sup> but matter of weight and importance concerning your realm and your own royal estate, it could not fail to let<sup>150</sup> and put to silence from the giving of their advice and counsel many of your discreet Commons, to the great hindrance of the common affairs, except that every of your Commons were utterly discharged of all doubt and fear how anything that it should happen them to speak, should happen of your Highness to be taken. And in this point, though your well known and proved benignity putteth every man in right good hope, yet such is the weight of the matter, such is the reverend dread that the timorous hearts of your natural subjects conceive toward your High Majesty, our most redoubled King and undoubted Sovereign, that they cannot in this point find themselves satisfied, except<sup>151</sup> your gracious bounty therein declared put away the scruple of their timorous minds, and animate and encourage them, and put them out of doubt. It may therefore like your most abundant Grace, our most benign and godly King, to give to all your Commons here assembled your most gracious licence and pardon, freely, without doubt of your dreadful displeasure, every man to discharge his conscience, and boldly in everything incident among us to declare his advice, and whatsoever happen any man to say, that it may like your noble Majesty, or your inestimable goodness, to take all in good part,<sup>152</sup> interpreting every man's words, how uncunningly<sup>153</sup> soever they be couched, to proceed yet of good zeal toward the profit of your realm and honor of your royal person, the prosperous estate and preservation whereof, most excellent Sovereign, is the thing which we all, your most humble loving subjects, according to the most bounden duty of our natural allegiance, most highly desire and pray for.

At this Parliament Cardinal Wolsey found himself much grieved with the Burgesses thereof, for that<sup>154</sup> nothing was so soon done or spoken therein but that it was immediately blown abroad in every alehouse. It fortuneth at that Parliament a very great subsidy to be demanded, which the Cardinal fearing would not pass the Common House, determined for the furtherance thereof to be there personally present himself. Before whose coming, after long debating there, whether it were better but with a few of his lords (as the most opinion of the House

146 opinions; plans 147 recounted 148 a way 149 treated 150 hinder

151 unless 152 in good part: favorably, without offense 153 unskillfully

154 for that: because

was) or with his whole train royally to receive him there amongst them.

“Masters,” quoth Sir Thomas More, “forasmuch as my Lord Cardinal lately, you wot<sup>155</sup> well, laid our charge the lightness of our tongues for things uttered out of this House, it shall not in my mind be amiss with all his pomp to receive him, with his maces, his pillars, his pole-axes, his crosses, his hat, and Great Seal too — to the intent, if he find the like fault with us hereafter, we may be the bolder from ourselves to lay the blame on those that his Grace bringeth hither with him.” Whereunto the House wholly agreeing, he was received accordingly.

Where, after that he had in solemn oration by many reasons proved how necessary it was the demand there moved to be granted, and further showed that less would not serve to maintain the Prince’s purpose, he, seeing the company sitting still silent, and thereunto nothing answering, and contrary to his expectation showing in themselves toward his request no towardness of inclination, said unto them: “Masters, you have many wise and learned men among you, and since I am from the King’s own person sent hither unto you for the preservation of yourselves and the realm, I think it meet<sup>156</sup> you give me some reasonable answer.” Whereat, every man holding his peace, then began he to speak to one Master Marney (after Lord Marney): “How say you,” quoth he, “Master Marney?” Who making no answer neither, he severally asked the same question of diverse others accounted the wisest of the company.

To whom, when none of them all would give so much as one word, being before agreed, as the custom was, by their Speaker to make answer, “Masters,” quoth the Cardinal, “unless it be the manner of your House, as of likelihood it is, by the mouth of your Speaker, whom you have chosen for trusty and wise, as indeed he is, in such cases to utter your minds, here is without doubt a marvelous obstinate silence.”

And thereupon he required an answer of Master Speaker, who first reverently upon his knees excusing the silence of the House, abashed at the presence of so noble a personage, able to amaze the wisest and best learned in a realm, and after by many probable arguments proving that for them to make answer was it neither expedient nor agreeable with the ancient liberty of the House, in conclusion for himself showed that though they had all with their voices trusted him, yet except<sup>157</sup> every one of them could put into his one head all their several wits, he alone in so weighty a matter was unmeet to make his Grace answer.

Whereupon the Cardinal, displeased with Sir Thomas More, that had not in this Parliament in all things satisfied his desire, suddenly arose and departed.

And after the Parliament ended, in his gallery at Whitehall in Westminster, uttered unto him his griefs, saying, “Would to God you had been at Rome, Master More, when I made you Speaker.” “Your Grace not offended, so would I too, my lord,” quoth he. And to wind such quarrels out of the Cardinal’s head, he began to talk of that gallery, and said, “I like this gallery of yours, my lord, much better than your gallery at Hampton Court.” Wherewith so wisely broke he off the Cardinal’s displeasing talk that the Cardinal at that present, as it seemed, wist<sup>158</sup> not what more to say to him. But for the revenge of his displeasure, counseled the King to send him ambassador into Spain, commending to his Highness his wisdom, learning, and meetness for that voyage; and the difficulty of the cause considered, none was there, he said, so well able to serve his Grace therein. Which, when the King had broken to Sir Thomas More, and that he had declared unto his Grace how unfit a journey it was for him, the nature of the country and disposition of his complexion so disagreeing together that he should never be likely to do his Grace acceptable service there, knowing right well that if his Grace sent him thither, he should send him to his grave, but showing himself nevertheless ready, according to his duty (all were it with the loss of his life), to fulfill his Grace’s pleasure in that behalf, the King, allowing<sup>159</sup> well his answer, said unto him, “It is not our meaning, Master More, to do you hurt, but to do you good would we be glad; we will this purpose devise<sup>160</sup> upon some other, and employ your service otherwise.”

And such entire favor did the King bear him that he made him Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, upon the death of Sir Richard Wingfield, who had that office before.

And for the pleasure he took in his company, would his Grace suddenly sometimes come home to his house at Chelsea, to be merry with him; whither on a time, unlooked for, he came to dinner to him, and after dinner, in a fair garden of his, walked with him by the space of an hour, holding his arm about his neck. As soon as his Grace was gone, I, rejoicing thereat, told Sir Thomas More how happy he was, whom the King had so familiarly entertained, as I never had seen him to do to any other except Cardinal Wolsey, whom I saw his Grace once walk with, arm in arm. "I thank our Lord, son," quoth he, "I find his Grace my very good lord indeed, and I believe he doth as singularly favor me as any subject within this realm. Howbeit,<sup>161</sup> son Roper, I may tell thee I have no cause to be proud thereof, for if my head could win him a castle in France (for then was there war between us) it should not fail to go."

This Sir Thomas More, among all other his virtues, was of such meekness that if it had fortuneed him with any learned man resorting to him from Oxford, Cambridge, or elsewhere, as there did diverse, some for desire of his acquaintance, some for the famous report of his wisdom and learning, and some for suits of the universities, to have entered into argument (wherein few were comparable unto him) and so far to have discoursed with them therein that he might perceive they could not, without some inconvenience, hold out much further disputation against him, then, lest he should discomfort them, as he that sought not his own glory, but rather would seem conquered than to discourage students in their studies, ever showing himself more desirous to learn than to teach, would he by some witty device courteously break off into some other matter, and give over.

Of whom, for his wisdom and learning, had the King such an opinion, that at such time as he attended upon his Highness, taking his progress either to Oxford or Cambridge, where he was received with very eloquent orations, his Grace would always assign him, as one that was prompt and ready therein, ex tempore to make answer thereunto. Whose manner was, whensoever he had occasion, either here or beyond the sea, to be in any university, not only to be present at the readings and disputations there commonly used, but also learnedly to dispute among them himself.

Who, being Chancellor of the Duchy, was made ambassador twice, joined in commission with Cardinal Wolsey, once to the Emperor Charles into Flanders, the other time to the French King into France. 50

Not long after this, the Water-bailiff of London, sometime<sup>162</sup> his servant, hearing, where he had been at dinner, certain merchants liberally to rail against his old master, waxed<sup>163</sup> so discontented therewith that he hastily came to him and told him what he had heard. "And were I you, sir," quoth he, "in such favor and authority with my Prince as you are, such men surely should not be suffered so villainously and falsely to misreport and slander me. Wherefore I would wish you to call them before you, and to their shame for their lewd<sup>164</sup> malice punish them." 55 60

Who, smiling upon him, said, "Why, Master Water-bailiff, would you have me punish those by whom I receive more benefit than by you all that be my friends? Let them, a<sup>165</sup> God's name, speak as lewdly as they list of me, and shoot never so many arrows at me, as long as they do not hit me, what am I the worse? But if they should once hit me, then would it indeed not a little trouble me. Howbeit, I trust, by God's help, there shall none of them all once be able to touch me. I have more cause, I assure thee, Master Water-bailiff, to pity them than to be angry with them." Such fruitful communication had he oftentimes with his familiar friends. 65 70 75

So on a time, walking with me along the Thames-side at Chelsea, in talking of other things he said unto me, "Now would to our Lord, son Roper, upon condition that three things were well established in Christendom, I were put into a sack, and here presently cast into the Thames." 80

"What great things be those, sir," quoth I, "that should move you so to wish?"

"Wouldst thou know what they be, son Roper?" quoth he. 85

"Yea, marry,<sup>166</sup> with good will, sir, if it please you," quoth I.

"In faith, Son, they be these," said he. "The first is, that where the most part of Christian princes be at mortal war, they were all at a universal peace. The second, that where the Church of Christ is at this present sore<sup>167</sup> afflicted with many errors and heresies, it were settled in a perfect uniformity of religion. The third, that where the King's matter of his marriage is now come in question, it were to the glory of God and quietness of all parties brought to 90 95

a good conclusion.” Whereby, as I could gather, he judged that otherwise it would be a disturbance to a great part of Christendom.

Thus did it by his doings throughout the whole course of his life appear that all his travail<sup>168</sup> and pains, without respect of earthly commodities, either to himself, or any of his, were only upon the service of God, the prince, and the realm, wholly bestowed and employed, whom I heard in his later time to say that he never asked the King himself the value of one penny.

As Sir Thomas More’s custom was daily, if he were at home, besides his private prayers, with his children to say the Seven Psalms, litany and suffrages following, so was his guise<sup>169</sup> nightly, before he went to bed, with his wife, children, and household, to go to his chapel and there upon his knees ordinarily to say certain psalms and collects with them. And because he was desirous for godly purposes sometime to be solitary, and sequester himself from worldly company, a good distance from his mansion house builded he a place called the New Building, wherein there was a chapel, a library, and a gallery, in which, as his use was upon other days to occupy himself in prayer and study together, so on the Friday there usually continued he from morning till evening, spending his time only in devout prayers and spiritual exercises.

And to provoke his wife and children to the desire of heavenly things, he would sometimes use these words unto them:

It is now no mastery<sup>170</sup> for you children to go to heaven, for everybody giveth you good counsel, everybody giveth you good example; you see virtue rewarded and vice punished, so that you are carried up to heaven even by the chins. But if you live the time that no man will give you good counsel, nor no man will give you good example, when you shall see virtue punished and vice rewarded, if you will then stand fast and firmly stick to God, upon pain of my life, though you be but half good, God will allow you for whole good.

If his wife or any of his children had been diseased or troubled, he would say unto them:

We may not look<sup>171</sup> at our pleasure to go to heaven

in featherbeds; it is not the way, for our Lord himself went thither with great pain and by many tribulations, which was the path wherein he walked thither, for the servant may not look to be in better case<sup>172</sup> than his master.

And as he would in this sort persuade them to take their troubles patiently, so would he in like sort teach them to withstand the devil and his temptations valiantly, saying,

Whosoever will mark the devil and his temptations shall find him therein much like to an ape. For like as an ape, not well looked unto, will be busy and bold to do shrewd turns,<sup>173</sup> and contrariwise, being spied, will suddenly leap back and adventure no farther, so the devil, finding a man idle, slothful, and without resistance ready to receive his temptations, waxeth<sup>174</sup> so hardy that he will not fail still to continue with him, until to his purpose he have thoroughly brought him. But on the other side, if he see a man with diligence persevere to prevent and withstand his temptations, he waxeth so weary that in conclusion he utterly forsaketh him. For as the devil of disposition is a spirit of so high a pride that he cannot abide to be mocked, so is he of nature so envious that he feareth any more to assault him, lest he should thereby not only catch a foul fall himself, but also minister<sup>175</sup> to the man more matter of merit.

Thus delighted he evermore not only in virtuous exercises to be occupied himself, but also to exhort his wife, children, and household to embrace and follow the same.

To whom, for his notable virtue and godliness, God showed, as it seemed, a manifest miraculous token of his special favor toward him, at such time as my wife, as many others that year were, was sick of the sweating sickness; who, lying in so great extremity of that disease as by no invention or devices that physicians in such cases commonly use (of whom she had diverse both expert, wise, and well-learned, then continually attendant about her) she could be kept from sleep, so that both physicians and all others there despaired of her recovery, and gave her over; her father, as he that most entirely tendered her, being in no small heaviness<sup>176</sup>

for her, by prayer at God's hand sought to get her remedy.

Whereupon going up, after his usual manner, into his foresaid New Building, there in his chapel, upon his knees, with tears most devoutly besought almighty God that it would like his goodness, unto whom nothing was impossible, if it were his blessed will, at his mediation to vouchsafe graciously to hear his humble petition. Where incontinent<sup>177</sup> came into his mind that a glister<sup>178</sup> should be the only way to help her. Which, when he told the physicians, they by and by<sup>179</sup> confessed that, if there were any hope of health, that was the very best help indeed, much marveling of themselves that they had not before remembered it.

Then was it immediately ministered unto her sleeping, which she could by no means have been brought unto waking. And albeit<sup>180</sup> after that she was thereby thoroughly awaked, God's marks,<sup>181</sup> an evident undoubted token of death, plainly appeared upon her, yet she, contrary to all their expectations, was, as it was thought, by her father's fervent prayer miraculously recovered, and at length again to perfect health restored. Whom, if it had pleased God at that time to have taken to his mercy, her father said he would never have meddled with worldly matters after.

Now while Sir Thomas More was Chancellor of the Duchy, the See of Rome chanced to be void, which was cause of much trouble. For Cardinal Wolsey, a man very ambitious, and desirous (as good hope and likelihood he had) to aspire unto that dignity, perceiving himself of his expectation disappointed, by means of the Emperor Charles so highly commending one Cardinal Adrian, sometime<sup>182</sup> his schoolmaster, to the cardinals of Rome, in the time of their election, for his virtue and worthiness, that thereupon was he chosen pope, who from Spain, where he was then resident, coming on foot to Rome, before his entry into the city, did put off his hose and shoes, barefoot and barelegged passing through the streets toward his palace, with such humbleness that all the people had him in great reverence. Cardinal Wolsey, I say, waxed so wood<sup>183</sup> therewith, that he studied to invent all ways of revengement of his grief against the Emperor, which, as it was the beginning of a lamentable tragedy, so some part of it as not impertinent to my present purpose, I reckoned requisite here to put in remembrance.

This Cardinal therefore, not ignorant of the King's inconstant and mutable disposition, soon inclined to withdraw his devotion from his own most noble, virtuous, and lawful wife, Queen Catherine, aunt to the Emperor, upon every light occasion, and upon other,<sup>184</sup> to her in nobility, wisdom, virtue, favor, and beauty, far incomparable, to fix his affection, meaning to make this his so light disposition an instrument to bring about his ungodly intent, devised to allure the King (then already, contrary to his mind, nothing less looking for, falling in love with the Lady Anne Boleyn) to cast fantasy to one of the French King's sisters, which thing, because of the enmity and war that was at that time between the French King and the Emperor (whom, for the cause afore-remembered,<sup>185</sup> he mortally maligned) he was very desirous to procure. And for the better achieving thereof, [Wolsey] requested Longland, Bishop of Lincoln, and ghostly<sup>186</sup> father to the King, to put a scruple into his Grace's head, that it was not lawful for him to marry his brother's wife, which the King, not sorry to hear of, opened it first to Sir Thomas More, whose counsel he required<sup>187</sup> therein, showing him certain places of Scripture that somewhat seemed to serve his appetite; which, when he had perused, and thereupon, as one that had never professed the study of divinity, himself excused to be unmeet<sup>188</sup> many ways to meddle with such matters. The King, not satisfied with this answer, so sore<sup>189</sup> still pressed upon him therefore, that in conclusion he condescended to his Grace's motion. And further, forasmuch as the case was of such importance as needed great advisement and deliberation, he besought his Grace of sufficient respite advisedly to consider of it. Wherewith the King, well contented, said unto him that Tunstall and Clerk, Bishops of Durham and Bath, with other learned of his Privy Council, should also be dealers therein.

So Sir Thomas More departing, conferred<sup>190</sup> those places of Scripture with expositions of diverse of the old holy doctors, and at his coming to the Court, in talking with his Grace of the aforesaid matter, he said,

177 immediately 178 enema
179 immediately 180 although 181 God's marks: visible signs of the plague

182 at one time, formerly 183 waxed so wood: became so angry 184 another 185 aforementioned 186 spiritual

187 asked 188 unfit 189 intensely 190 collected, compared

To be plain with your Grace, neither my Lord of Durham, nor my Lord of Bath, though I know them both to be wise, virtuous, learned, and honorable prelates, nor myself, with the rest of your Council, being all your Grace's own servants, for your manifold benefits daily bestowed on us so most bounden to you, be, in my judgment, meet counselors for your Grace herein. But if your Grace mind to understand the truth, such counselors may you have devised, as neither for respect of their own worldly commodity,<sup>191</sup> nor for fear of your princely authority, will be inclined to deceive you.

To whom he named then Saint Jerome, Saint Augustine, and diverse other old holy doctors, both Greeks and Latins, and moreover showed him what authorities he had gathered out of them, which although the King (as disagreeable with his desire) did not very well like of, yet were they by Sir Thomas More, who in all his communication with the King in that matter had always most discreetly behaved himself, so wisely tempered, that he both presently took them in good part,<sup>192</sup> and oftentimes had thereof conference with him again.

After this were there certain questions among his Council propounded, whether the King needed in this case to have any scruple at all, and if he had, what way were best to be taken to deliver him of it. The most part of whom were of opinion that there was good cause of scruple, and that for discharging of it, suit were meet to be made to the See of Rome, where the King hoped by liberality to obtain his purpose, wherein, as it after appeared, he was far deceived.

Then was there for the trial and examination of this matrimony procured from Rome a commission in which Cardinal Campeggio and Cardinal Wolsey were joined commissioners, who for the determination thereof, sat at the Blackfriars in London where a libel<sup>193</sup> was put in for the annulling of the said matrimony, alleging the marriage between the King and Queen to be unlawful. And for proof of the marriage to be lawful, was there brought in a dispensation, in which, after diverse disputations thereon holden, there appeared an imperfection, which, by an instrument or brief,<sup>194</sup> upon search found in the Treasury of Spain, and sent to the commissioners in England, was supplied. And so should judgment have been given by the Pope accordingly, had not the King, upon intelligence thereof, before the same judgment, appealed to the next General Council. After whose application the Cardinal upon that matter sat no longer.

It fortuned before the matter of the said matrimony brought in question, when I, in talk with Sir Thomas More, of<sup>195</sup> a certain joy commended unto him the happy estate of this realm that had so Catholic a prince that no heretic durst<sup>196</sup> show his face, so virtuous and learned a clergy, so grave and sound a nobility, and so loving, obedient subjects, all in one faith agreeing together.

"Truth it is indeed, son Roper," quoth he, and in commending all degrees and estates of the same went far beyond me. "And yet, son Roper, pray God," said he, "that some of us, as high as we seem to sit upon the mountains, treading heretics under our feet like ants, live not the day that we gladly would wish to be at league and composition<sup>197</sup> with them, to let them have their churches quietly to themselves, so that they would be content to let us have ours quietly to ourselves." After that I had told him many considerations why he had no cause so to say. "Well," said he, "I pray God, son Roper, some of us live not till that day," showing me no reason why he should put any doubt therein. To whom I said, "By my troth,<sup>198</sup> Sir, it is very desperately spoken." That vile term, I cry God mercy, did I give him. Who, by these words, perceiving me in a fume, said merrily unto me, "Well, well, son Roper, it shall not be so, it shall not be so." Whom, in sixteen years and more being in house conversant with him, I could never perceive as much as once in a fume.

But now to return again where I left. After the supplying of the imperfections of the dispensation sent (as before rehearsed<sup>199</sup>) to the commissioners into England, the King, taking the matter for ended, and then meaning no farther to proceed in that matter, assigned the Bishop of Durham and Sir Thomas More to go<sup>200</sup> ambassadors to Cambrai, a place neither Imperial nor French, to treat a peace between the Emperor, the French King, and him. In the concluding whereof Sir Thomas More so worthily handled himself, procuring in our league far

<sup>191</sup> benefit <sup>192</sup> in good part: favorably, without offense <sup>193</sup> plaintiff's statement <sup>194</sup> instrument or brief: formal legal document or royal letter <sup>195</sup> out of <sup>196</sup> dared <sup>197</sup> mutual agreement

<sup>198</sup> faithfulness; truthfulness; integrity <sup>199</sup> related <sup>200</sup> go as more benefits unto this realm than at that time by the King or his Council was thought possible to be compassed,<sup>201</sup> that for his good service in that voyage, the King, when he after made him Lord Chancellor, caused the Duke of Norfolk openly to declare unto the people (as you shall hear hereafter more at large) how much all England was bound unto him.

Now upon the coming home of the Bishop of Durham and Sir Thomas More from Cambrai, the King was as earnest in persuading Sir Thomas More to agree unto the matter of his marriage as before, by many and diverse ways provoking him thereunto. For the which cause, as it was thought, he the rather soon after made him Lord Chancellor, and further declaring unto him that, though at his going overseas to Cambrai he was in utter despair thereof, yet he had conceived since some good hope to compass it. For albeit<sup>202</sup> his marriage, being against the positive laws of the Church and the written laws of God, was helped by the dispensation, yet was there another thing found out of late, he said, whereby his marriage appeared to be so directly against the law of nature that it could in no wise<sup>203</sup> by the Church be dispensable, as Doctor Stokesley (whom he then preferred to be Bishop of London, and in that case chiefly credited) was able to instruct him, with whom he prayed him in that point to confer.<sup>204</sup> But for all his conference with him, he saw nothing of such force as could induce him to change his opinion therein, which notwithstanding the Bishop showed in his report of him to the King's Highness so good and favorable that he said he found him in his Grace's cause very toward,<sup>205</sup> and desirous to find some good matter wherewith he might truly serve his Grace to his contentment.

This Bishop Stokesley, being by the Cardinal not long before in the Star Chamber openly put to rebuke and awarded<sup>206</sup> to the Fleet, not brooking<sup>207</sup> his contumelious<sup>208</sup> usage, and thinking that forasmuch as the Cardinal, for lack of such forwardness in setting forth the King's divorce as his Grace looked for, was out of his Highness's favor, he had now a good occasion offered him to revenge his quarrel against him, further to incense the King's displeasure toward him, busily travailed<sup>209</sup> to invent some colorable<sup>210</sup> device for the King's furtherance in that behalf, which (as before is mentioned) he to his Grace revealed, hoping thereby to bring the King to the better liking of himself, and the more misliking of the Cardinal, whom his Highness therefore soon after of his office displaced, and to Sir Thomas More, the rather to move him to incline to his side, the same in his stead committed.

Who, between the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, being brought through Westminster Hall to his place in the Chancery, the Duke of Norfolk, in audience of all the people there assembled, showed that he was from the King himself straightly charged, by special commission, there openly, in the presence of them all, to make declaration how much all England was beholding<sup>211</sup> to Sir Thomas More for his good service, and how worthy he was to have the highest room<sup>212</sup> in the realm, and how dearly his Grace loved and trusted him, for which, said the Duke, he had great cause to rejoice. Whereunto Sir Thomas More, among many other his humble and wise sayings not now in my memory, answered: that although he had good cause to take comfort of his Highness's singular favor toward him, that he had, far above his deserts, so highly commended him, to whom therefore he acknowledged himself most deeply bounden, yet, nevertheless, he must of his own part needs confess, that in all things by his Grace alleged he had done no more than was his duty, and further disabled himself as unmeet<sup>213</sup> for that room, wherein, considering how wise and honorable a prelate had lately before taken so great a fall, he had, he said, thereof no cause to rejoice. And as they had before, on the King's behalf, charged him uprightly to minister indifferent<sup>214</sup> justice to the people, without corruption or affection,<sup>215</sup> so did he likewise charge them again that, if they saw him, at any time, in any thing, digress from any part of his duty in that honorable office, even as they would discharge their own duty and fidelity to God and the King, so should they not fail to disclose it to his Grace, who otherwise might have just occasion to lay his fault wholly to their charge.

While he was Lord Chancellor, being at leisure (as seldom he was), one of his sons-in-law<sup>216</sup> on a time said merrily unto him, "When Cardinal

201 contrived, devised 202 although 203 way, manner 204 agree 205 agreeable 206 sentenced 207 enduring 208 reproachful 209 labored

210 plausible, reasonable 211 obliged 212 office 213 unfit, unsuitable
214 minister indifferent: give impartial 215 bias 216 William Daunce married

More's second daughter, Elizabeth on September 29, 1525. Cecily More and Giles Heron married on the same day during the same ceremony.

Wolsey was Lord Chancellor, not only diverse of his privy chamber, but such also as were his door-keepers got great gain." And since he had married one of his daughters, and gave still attendance upon him, he thought he might of reason look for some, where he indeed, because he was so ready himself to hear every man, poor and rich, and kept no doors shut from them, could find none, which was to him a great discourage. And whereas else, some for friendship, some for kindred, and some for profit, would gladly have had his furtherance in bringing them to his presence, if he should now take anything of them, he knew, he said, he should do them great wrong, for that<sup>217</sup> they might do as much for themselves as he could do for them, which condition, although he thought in Sir Thomas More very commendable, yet to him, being his son, he found it nothing profitable.

When he had told him this tale: "You say well, son," quoth he. "I do not mislike that you are of conscience so scrupulous, but many other ways be there, Son, that I may both do yourself good and pleasure your friend also. For sometimes may I by my word stand your friend in stead, and sometimes may I by my letter help him, or if he have a cause depending before me, at your request I may hear him before another. Or if his cause be not all the best, yet may I move the parties to fall to some reasonable end by arbitrament. Howbeit,<sup>218</sup> this one thing, Son, I assure thee on my faith, that if the parties will at my hands call for justice, then, all were it<sup>219</sup> my father stood on the one side and the devil on the other, his cause being good, the devil should have right." So offered he his son, as he thought, he said, as much favor as with reason he could require.<sup>220</sup>

And that he would for no respect digress from justice, well appeared by a plain example of another of his sons-in-law called Master Heron.<sup>221</sup> For when he, having a matter before him in Chancery, and presuming too much of his favor, would by him in no wise<sup>222</sup> be persuaded to agree to any indifferent<sup>223</sup> order, then made he in conclusion a flat decree against him.

This Lord Chancellor used commonly every afternoon to sit in his open hall, to the intent that, if any persons had suit unto him, they might the more boldly come to his presence and there open their complaints before him, whose manner<sup>224</sup> was also to read every bill himself ere<sup>225</sup> he would award any subpoena, which bearing matter sufficient worthy a subpoena, would he set his hand unto or else cancel it.

Whensoever he passed through Westminster Hall to his place in the Chancery by the court of the King's Bench, if his father, one of the judges thereof, had been sat ere he came, he would go into the same court, and there reverently kneeling down in the sight of them all, duly ask his father's blessing. And if it fortun'd that his father and he, at readings in Lincoln's Inn, met together, as they sometimes did, notwithstanding his high office, he would offer in argument the preeminence to his father, though he, for his office's sake, would refuse to take it. And for the better declaration of his natural affection toward his father, he not only, while he lay on his deathbed, according to his duty, oftentimes with comfortable words most kindly came to visit him, but also at his departure out of the world with tears taking him about the neck, most lovingly kissed and embraced him, commending him into the merciful hands of Almighty God, and so departed from him.

And as few injunctions as he granted while he was Lord Chancellor, yet were they by some of the judges of the law misliked, which I understanding, declared the same to Sir Thomas More, who answered me that they should have little cause to find fault with him therefor. And thereupon caused he one Master Crooke, chief of the six clerks, to make a docket containing the whole number and causes of all such injunctions as either in his time had already passed, or at that present depended in any of the King's Courts at Westminster before him. Which done, he invited all the judges to dine with him in the Council Chamber at Westminster, where, after dinner, when he had broken with<sup>226</sup> them what complaints he had heard of his injunctions, and moreover showed them both the number of causes of every one of them, in order, so plainly that, upon full debating of those matters, they were all enforced to confess that they, in like case, could have done no otherwise themselves. Then offered he this unto them: that if the justices of every court (unto whom the reformation of the rigor of the law, by reason of their office, most especially appertained)

217 for that: because 218 However 219 all were it: even if 220 ask

221 married to More's third daughter,
Cecily 222 way 223 impartial

224 custom 225 before 226 broken with: told

would, upon reasonable considerations, by their own discretions (as they were, he thought, in conscience bound), mitigate and reform the rigor of the law themselves, there should from thenceforth
 5 by him no more injunctions be granted. Whereunto when they refused to condescend,<sup>227</sup> then said he unto them, “Forasmuch as yourselves, my lords, drive me to that necessity for awarding out injunctions to relieve the people’s injury, you cannot hereafter 10 after any more justly blame me.” After that he said secretly unto me, “I perceive, Son, why they like not so to do, for they see that they may by the verdict of the jury cast off all quarrels from themselves upon them, which they account their chief defense, and therefore am I compelled to abide the adventure of 15 all such reports.”

And as little leisure as he had to be occupied in the study of Holy Scripture and controversies upon religion and such other virtuous exercises, being 20 in manner continually busied about the affairs of the King and the realm, yet such watch<sup>228</sup> and pain in setting forth of diverse profitable works, in defense of the true Christian religion, against heresies secretly sown abroad in the realm, assuredly sustained<sup>229</sup> he, that the bishops, to whose pastoral 25 cure<sup>230</sup> the reformation thereof principally appertained, thinking themselves by his travail,<sup>231</sup> wherein by their own confession they were not able with him to make comparison, of their duties in that behalf discharged; and considering that for all his 30 prince’s favor he was no rich man, nor in yearly revenues advanced as his worthiness deserved, therefore at a convocation among themselves and others of the clergy, they agreed together and concluded
 35 upon a sum of four or five thousand pounds, at the least, to my remembrance, for his pains to recompense him. To the payment whereof every bishop, abbot, and the rest of the clergy were—after the rate of their abilities—liberal contributories, hoping this portion should be to his contentation.<sup>232</sup>

Whereupon Tunstall, Bishop of Durham, Clerk, Bishop of Bath, and, as far as I can call to mind, Veysey, Bishop of Exeter, repaired unto him, declaring how thankfully his travails, to their discharge in 45 God’s cause bestowed, they reckoned themselves bounden to consider him. And that albeit<sup>233</sup> they could not, according to his deserts so worthily as they gladly would, requite him therefore, but must reserve that only to the goodness of God, yet for a small part of recompense, in respect of his estate 50 so unequal to his worthiness, in the name of their whole convocation, they presented unto him that sum, which they desired him to take in good part.

Who, forsaking<sup>234</sup> it, said, that like as it was no small comfort unto him that so wise and learned
 55 men so well accepted his simple doings, for which he never intended to receive reward but at the hands of God only, to whom alone was the thanks thereof chiefly to be ascribed, so gave he most humble thanks to their honors all for their so bountiful 60 and friendly consideration.

When they, for all their importunate pressing upon him, that few would have went<sup>235</sup> he could have refused it, could by no means make him to take it, then besought they him to be content yet that 65 they might bestow it upon his wife and children. “Not so, my lords,” quoth he, “I had rather see it all cast into the Thames than I, or any of mine, should have thereof the worth of one penny. For though
 70 your offer, my lords, be indeed very friendly and honorable, yet set I so much by my pleasure and so little by my profit that I would not, in good faith, for so much, and much more too, have lost the rest
 75 of so many nights’ sleep as was spent upon the same. And yet wish would I, for all that, upon condition that all heresies were suppressed, that all my books were burned and my labor utterly lost.”

Thus departing, were they fain<sup>236</sup> to restore unto every man his own again.

This Lord Chancellor, albeit he was to God and the world well known of notable virtue (though not 80 so of every man considered) yet, for the avoiding of singularity,<sup>237</sup> would he appear none otherwise than other men in his apparel and other behavior. And albeit outwardly he appeared honorable like one
 85 of his calling, yet inwardly he no such vanities esteeming, secretly next his body wore a shirt of hair, which my sister More, a young gentlewoman,<sup>238</sup> in the summer, as he sat at supper singly in his doublet and hose, wearing thereupon a plain shirt without 90 ruff or collar, chancing to spy it, began to laugh at it. My wife, not ignorant of his manner, perceiving the same, privily told him of it, and he, being sorry that she saw it, presently amended it.

227 agree 228 vigilance 229 maintained 230 charge, duty 231 labor 232 satisfaction 233 although

234 declining 235 thought 236 glad; obliged, forced 237 personal gain;

distinction 238 Anne Cresacre, who married More’s son, John, in 1529

He used also sometimes to punish his body with whips, the cords knotted, which was known only to my wife, his eldest daughter, whom for her secrecy above all others he specially trusted, causing her, as 5 need required, to wash the same shirt of hair.

Now shortly upon his entry into the high office of the Chancellorship, the King yet eftsoons<sup>239</sup> again moved him to weigh and consider his great matter, who, falling down upon his knees, humbly 10 besought his Highness to stand his gracious Sovereign, as he ever since his entry into his Grace's service had found him, saying there was nothing in the world had been so grievous unto his heart as to remember that he was not able, as he willingly would,
15 with the loss of one of his limbs, for that matter anything to find whereby he could, with his conscience, safely serve his Grace's contentation,<sup>240</sup> as he that always bore in mind the most godly words that his Highness spoke unto him at his first coming
20 into his noble service, the most virtuous lesson that ever prince taught his servant, willing him first to look unto God, and after God to him, as, in good faith, he said he did, or else might his Grace well account him his most unworthy servant. To this the 25 King answered, that if he could not therein with his conscience serve him, he was content to accept his service otherwise, and using the advice of others of his learned Council, whose consciences could well enough agree therewith, would nevertheless continue 30 his gracious favor toward him, and never with that matter molest his conscience after.

But Sir Thomas More, in process of time, seeing the King fully determined to proceed forth in the marriage of Queen Anne, and when he, with the 35 bishops and nobles of the Higher House of the Parliament, were, for the furtherance of that marriage, commanded by the King to go down to the Common House to show unto them both what the universities, as well as of other parts beyond the seas
40 as of Oxford and Cambridge, had done in that behalf,<sup>241</sup> and their seals also testifying the same — all which matters, at the King's request, not showing of what mind himself was therein, he opened to the Lower House of the Parliament — nevertheless,
45 doubting<sup>242</sup> lest further attempts after should follow, which, contrary to his conscience, by reason of his office, he was likely to be put unto, he made suit

unto the Duke of Norfolk, his singular dear friend, to be a means to the King that he might, with his Grace's favor, be discharged of that chargeable 50 room<sup>243</sup> of the chancellorship, wherein, for certain infirmities of his body, he pretended himself unable any longer to serve.

This Duke, coming on a time to Chelsea to dine with him, fortunated to find him at the church, singing in the choir, with a surplice<sup>244</sup> on his back; to whom, after service, as they went homeward together, arm in arm, the Duke said, "God body! God body! My Lord Chancellor, a parish clerk, a parish clerk! You dishonor the King and his office." "Nay," 60 quoth Sir Thomas More, smiling upon the Duke, "your Grace may not think that the King, your master and mine, will with me, for serving of God his master, be offended, or thereby count his office dishonored."
65

When the Duke, being thereunto often solicited, by importunate suit had at length of the King obtained for Sir Thomas More a clear discharge of his office, then, at a time convenient, by his Highness's appointment, repaired he to his Grace to yield up 70 unto him the Great Seal. Which, as his Grace, with thanks and praise for his worthy service in that office, courteously at his hands received, so pleased it his Highness further to say unto him that, for the service that he before had done him, in any suit
75 which he should after have unto him that either should concern his honor (for that word it liked his Highness to use unto him) or that should appertain unto his profit, he should find his Highness good and gracious lord unto him.
80

After he had thus given over the chancellorship, and placed all his gentlemen and yeomen with bishops and noblemen, and his eight watermen with the Lord Audley, that in the same office succeeded him,
85 to whom also he gave his great barge, then, calling us all that were his children unto him and asking our advice how we might now, in this decay of his ability (by the surrender of his office so impaired that he could not, as he was wont, and gladly would, bear out the whole charge<sup>245</sup> of them all himself)
90 from thenceforth be able to live and continue together, as he wished we should; when he saw us silent, and in that case not ready to show our opinions to him, "Then will I," said he, "show my poor

239 soon afterwards 240 satisfaction
241 Collectanea satis copiosa 242 fearing

243 office 244 a loose vestment of white linen worn by choristers 245 expense mind unto you. I have been brought up," quoth he, "at Oxford, at an Inn of Chancery, at Lincoln's Inn and also in the King's Court, and so forth from the lowest degree to the highest, and yet have I in yearly revenues at this present left me little above a hundred pounds by the year,<sup>246</sup> so that now must we hereafter, if we like to live together, be contented to become contributories together. But, by my counsel, it shall not be best for us to fall to the lowest fare first. We will not therefore descend to Oxford fare, nor to the fare of New Inn, but we will begin with Lincoln's Inn diet, where many right worshipful<sup>247</sup> and of good years do live full well; which, if we find not ourselves the first year able to maintain, then will we the next year go one step down to New Inn fare, wherewith many an honest man is well contented. If that exceed our ability too, then will we the next year after descend to Oxford fare, where many grave, learned, and ancient fathers be continually conversant, which if our power stretch not to maintain neither, then may we yet, with bags and wallets, go a begging together, and hoping that for pity some good folk will give us their charity, at every man's door to sing Salve Regina, and so still keep company and be merry together."

And whereas you have heard before, he was by the King from a very worshipful living taken into his Grace's service, with whom, in all the great and weighty causes that concerned his Highness or the realm, he consumed and spent with painful cares, travels and troubles, as well beyond the seas as within the realm, in effect the whole substance of his life, yet with all the gain he got thereby, being never wasteful spender thereof, was he not able, after the resignation of his office of Lord Chancellor, for the maintenance of himself and such as necessarily belonged unto him, sufficiently to find meat, drink, fuel, apparel, and such other necessary charges. All the land that ever he purchased, which also he purchased before he was Lord Chancellor, was not, I am well assured, above the value of twenty marks by the year. And after his debts paid, he had not, I know, his chain excepted, in gold and silver left him the worth of one hundred pounds.

And whereas upon the holy days during his High Chancellorship, one of his gentlemen, when service at the church was done, ordinarily used to come to my lady his wife's pew and say unto her, "Madame, my lord is gone," the next holy day after the surrender of his office and departure of his gentleman, he came unto my lady his wife's pew himself, and making a low curtsy, said unto her, "Madame, my lord is gone."

In the time somewhat before his trouble, he would talk with his wife and children of the joys of heaven and the pains of hell, of the lives of holy martyrs, of their grievous martyrdoms, of their marvelous patience, and of their passions and deaths that they suffered rather than they would offend God. And what a happy and blessed thing it was, for the love of God, to suffer loss of goods, imprisonment, loss of lands, and life also. He would further say unto them that, upon his faith, if he might perceive his wife and children would encourage him to die in a good cause, it should so comfort him that, for very joy thereof, it would make him merrily run to death. He showed unto them afore what trouble might after fall unto him, wherewith and the like virtuous talk he had so long before his trouble encouraged them, that when he after fell into trouble indeed, his trouble to them was a great deal the less. Quia spicula previsa minus laedunt.<sup>248</sup>

Now upon this resignation of his office, came Master Thomas Cromwell, then in the King's high favor, to Chelsea to him with a message from the King. Wherein when they had thoroughly communed<sup>249</sup> together, "Master Cromwell," quoth he, "you are now entered into the service of a most noble, wise, and liberal prince. If you will follow my poor advice, you shall, in your counsel-giving unto his Grace, ever tell him what he ought to do, but never what he is able to do. So shall you show yourself a true faithful servant and a right worthy Counselor. For if a lion knew his own strength, hard were it for any man to rule him."

Shortly thereupon was there a commission directed to Cranmer, then Archbishop of Canterbury, to determine the matter of the matrimony between the King and Queen Catherine, at Saint Albans, where, according to the King's mind, it was thoroughly determined, who, pretending he had no justice at the Pope's hands, from thenceforth sequestered himself from the See of Rome, and so married the Lady Anne Boleyn; which, Sir Thomas More

<sup>246</sup> Sir Thomas retained his salary of 100 pounds a year as counselor

until March 1534. <sup>247</sup> honorable <sup>248</sup> "Because spears foreseen hurt less"

<sup>249</sup> talked, conferred

understanding, said unto me, “God give grace, Son, that these matters within a while be not confirmed with oaths.” I, at that time seeing no likelihood thereof, yet fearing lest his forespeaking it would the sooner come to pass, waxed<sup>250</sup> therefore for his so saying much offended with him.

It fortun'd not long before the coming of Queen Anne through the streets of London from the Tower to Westminster to her coronation, that he received a letter from the bishops of Durham, Bath and Winchester,<sup>251</sup> requesting him both to keep them company from the Tower to the coronation, and also to take twenty pounds that by the bearer thereof they had sent him to buy him a gown with, which he thankfully receiving, and at home still tarrying, at their next meeting said merrily unto them:

My lords, in the letters which you lately sent me, you required<sup>252</sup> two things of me, the one whereof, since I was so well content to grant you, the other therefore I thought I might be the bolder to deny you. And like as the one, because I took you for no beggars, and myself I knew to be no rich man, I thought I might the rather fulfill, so the other did put me in remembrance of an emperor<sup>253</sup> that had ordained a law that whosoever committed a certain offense (which I now remember not) except<sup>254</sup> it were a virgin, should suffer the pains of death, such a reverence had he for virginity. Now so it happened that the first committer of that offense was indeed a virgin, whereof the Emperor hearing was in no small perplexity, as he that by some example fain<sup>255</sup> would have had that law to have been put in execution. Whereupon when his Council had sat long, solemnly debating this case, suddenly arose there up one of his Council, a good plain man, among them, and said, “Why make you so much ado,<sup>256</sup> my lords, about so small a matter? Let her first be deflowered, and then after may she be devoured.” And so though your lordships have in the matter of the matrimony hitherto kept yourselves pure virgins, yet take good heed, my lords, that you keep your virginity still. For some there be that by procuring your lordships first at the coronation to be present, and next to preach for the setting forth of it, and finally to write books to all the world in defense thereof, are desirous to deflower you; and when they have deflowered you, then will they not fail soon after to devour you. Now my lords, quoth he, it lieth not in my power but that they may devour me; but God being my good lord, I will provide that they shall never deflower me.

In continuance, when the King saw that he could by no manner of benefits win him on his side, then, lo, went he about by terrors and threats to drive him thereunto. The beginning of which trouble grew by occasion of a certain nun dwelling in Canterbury, for her virtue and holiness among people not a little esteemed; unto whom, for that cause, many religious persons, doctors of divinity, and diverse others of good worship<sup>257</sup> of the laity used to resort; who, affirming that she had revelations from God to give the King warning of his wicked life, and of the abuse of the sword and authority committed unto him by God, and understanding my Lord of Rochester, Bishop Fisher, to be a man of notable virtuous living and learning, repaired to Rochester, and there disclosed to him all her revelations, desiring his advice and counsel therein; which the Bishop perceiving might well stand with the laws of God and his holy Church, advised her (as she before had warning and intended) to go to the King herself, and to let him understand the whole circumstance thereof. Whereupon she went to the King, and told him all her revelations, and so returned home again. And in short space after, she, making a voyage to the nuns of Syon, by means of one Master Reynolds, a father of the same house, there fortun'd concerning such secrets as had been revealed unto her (some part whereof seemed to touch the matter of the King's supremacy and marriage, which shortly thereupon followed) to enter into talk with Sir Thomas More, who, notwithstanding he might well, at that time, without danger of any law (though after, as himself had prognosticated before, those matters were established by statutes and confirmed by oaths) freely and safely have talked with her therein; nevertheless, in all the communication between them (as in process<sup>258</sup> appeared) had always so discreetly demeaned<sup>259</sup> himself that he deserved not to be blamed, but contrariwise to be commended and praised.

<sup>250</sup> became <sup>251</sup> Cuthbert Tunstall, John Clerk, Stephen Gardiner <sup>252</sup> asked <sup>253</sup> See Tacitus, Annales 6.5.9, about

Emperor Tiberius's execution of Sejanus's young daughter. <sup>254</sup> unless <sup>255</sup> gladly

<sup>256</sup> trouble <sup>257</sup> honor, renown <sup>258</sup> the course of time <sup>259</sup> conducted

And had he not been one that in all his great offices and doings for the King and the realm, so many years together, had from all corruption of wrong-doing or bribes-taking kept himself so clear
 5 that no man was able therewith once to blemish him or make just quarrel against him, it would, without doubt, in this troublous time of the King's indignation toward him, have been deeply laid to his charge, and of the King's Highness most favorably accepted, as in the case of one Parnell it most
 10 manifestly appeared; against whom, because Sir Thomas More, while he was Lord Chancellor, at the suit of one Vaughan, his adversary, had made a decree. This Parnell to his Highness most grievously 15 complained that Sir Thomas More, for making the same decree, had of the same Vaughan (unable for the gout to travel abroad himself) by the hands of his wife taken a fair great gilt cup for a bribe. Who thereupon, by the King's appointment, being called 20 before the whole Council, where that matter was heinously laid to his charge, forthwith<sup>260</sup> confessed that forasmuch as that cup was, long after the afore-said decree, brought him for a New Year's gift, he, upon her importunate pressing upon him therefore,
 25 of courtesy, refused not to receive it.

Then the Lord of Wiltshire<sup>261</sup> (for hatred of his religion preferrer of this suit) with much rejoicing said unto the lords, "Lo, did I not tell you, my lords, that you should find this matter true?" Whereupon 30 Sir Thomas More desired their lordships that as they had courteously heard him tell the one part of his tale, so they would vouchsafe of their honors indifferently to hear the other. After which obtained, he further declared unto them that, albeit<sup>262</sup> he had 35 indeed, with much work, received that cup, yet immediately thereupon he caused his butler to fill it with wine, and of that cup drank to her, and that when he had so done, and she pledged him, then as freely as her husband had given it to him, even 40 so freely gave her the same unto her again, to give unto her husband as his New Year's gift, which, at his instant request, though much against her will, at length yet she was fain<sup>263</sup> to receive, as herself, and certain others there, presently before them
 45 deposed.<sup>264</sup> Thus was the great mountain turned scant<sup>265</sup> to a little molehill.

So I remember that at another time, upon a New Year's day, there came to him one Mistress Crocker, a rich widow, for whom with no small pain he had made a decree in the Chancery against the Lord
 50 Arundel, to present him with a pair of gloves, and forty pounds in angels<sup>266</sup> in them for a New Year's gift. Of whom he thankfully receiving the gloves, but refusing the money, said unto her, "Mistress, since it were against good manners to forsake a 55 gentlewoman's New Year's gift, I am content to take your gloves, but as for your money I utterly refuse." So, much against her mind,<sup>267</sup> enforced he her to take her gold again.

And one Master Gresham likewise, having at the 60 same time a cause depending in the Chancery before him, sent him for a New Year's gift a fair gilt cup, the fashion whereof he very well liking, caused one of his own (though not in his fantasy of so good a fashion, yet better in value) to be brought 65 him out of his chamber, which he willed the messenger, in recompense, to deliver to his master, and under other conditions would he in no wise<sup>268</sup> receive it.

Many things more of like<sup>269</sup> effect, for the declaration of his innocency and clearness from all corruption or evil affection, could I rehearse<sup>270</sup> besides, which for tediousness omitting, I refer to the readers by these few before remembered examples, with 70 their own judgments wisely to weigh and consider the same.

At the Parliament following, was there put into the Lords' House a bill to attain the nun and diverse other religious persons<sup>271</sup> of high treason, and the Bishop of Rochester, Sir Thomas More, and 80 certain others, of misprision of treason,<sup>272</sup> the King presupposing of likelihood that this bill would be to Sir Thomas More so troublous and terrible that it would force him to relent and condescend<sup>273</sup> to his request — wherein his Grace was much deceived.
 85 To which bill Sir Thomas More was a suitor personally to be received in his own defense to make answer. But the King, not liking that, assigned the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Norfolk and Master Cromwell, at a 90 day and place appointed, to call Sir Thomas More before them. At which time, I, thinking that I had

260 immediately 261 Sir Thomas Boleyn, who was father of Queen Anne 262 although 263 glad; obliged, forced 264 testified 265 hardly, barely

266 gold coins 267 intent, purpose
268 way 269 similar 270 recount, tell 271 religious persons: members of the clergy
272 misprision of treason: an offense akin to treason but punishable by life imprisonment and loss of goods, not death; usually it involved concealing one's knowledge of a treasonable act 273 agree a good opportunity, earnestly advised him to labor unto those lords for the help of his discharge out of that Parliament bill. Who answered me he would.

And at his coming before them, according to their 5 appointment, they entertained him very friendly, willing him to sit down with them, which in no wise he would. Then began the Lord Chancellor to declare unto him how many ways the King had showed his love and favor toward him, how fain<sup>274</sup> he would
 10 have had him continue in his office, how glad he would have been to have heaped more benefits upon him, and finally how he could ask no worldly honor nor profit at his Highness's hands that were likely to be denied him, hoping, by the declaration of the 15 King's kindness and affection toward him, to provoke him to recompense his Grace with the like again, and unto those things that the Parliament, the bishops and the universities had already passed, to add his consent.

20 To this Sir Thomas More mildly made answer, saying,

No man living is there, my lords, that would with better will do the thing that should be acceptable to the King's Highness than I, which must 25 needs confess his manifold goodness and bountiful benefits most benignly bestowed on me. Howbeit,<sup>275</sup> I verily<sup>276</sup> hoped that I should never have heard of this matter more, considering that I have, from time to time, always from the beginning, so plainly and truly declared my mind unto 30 his Grace, which his Highness to me ever seemed, like a most gracious prince, very well to accept, never minding, as he said, to molest me more therewith; since which time any further thing
 35 that was able to move me to any change could I never find, and if I could, there is none in all the world that would have been gladder of it than I.

Many things more were there of like<sup>277</sup> sort uttered on both sides. But in the end, when they saw 40 they could by no manner of persuasions remove him from his former determination, then began they more terribly to touch him, telling him that the King's Highness had given them in commandment, if they could by no gentleness win him, in his name 45 with his great ingratitude to charge him, that never was there servant to his sovereign so villainous, nor subject to his prince so traitorous as he, for he, by his subtle sinister slights most unnaturally procuring and provoking him to set forth a book of The Assertion of the Seven Sacraments and maintenance 50 of the Pope's authority, had caused him, to his dishonor throughout all Christendom, to put a sword into the Pope's hands to fight against himself.

When they had thus laid forth all the terrors they could imagine against him, "My lords," quoth 55 he, "these terrors be arguments for children, and not for me. But to answer that wherewith you do chiefly burden me, I believe the King's Highness of his honor will never lay that to my charge. For none is there that can in that point say in my excuse more 60 than his Highness himself, who right well knoweth that I never was procurer<sup>278</sup> nor counselor of his Majesty thereunto. But after it was finished, by his Grace's appointment and consent of the makers of the same, only a sorter-out and placer of the principal matters therein contained. Wherein when I found the pope's authority highly advanced and with strong arguments mightily defended, I said unto his Grace, 'I must put your Highness in remembrance of one thing, and that is this. The pope, 65 as your Grace knoweth, is a prince as you are, and in league with all other Christian princes. It may hereafter so fall out that your Grace and he may vary upon some points of the league, whereupon may grow breach of amity and war between you both. I think it best therefore that that place be amended, and his authority more slenderly touched.'

"'Nay,' quoth his Grace, 'that shall it not. We are so much bounden unto the See of Rome that we cannot do too much honor unto it.'
 80

"Then did I further put him in remembrance of the Statute of Praemunire, whereby a good part of the pope's pastoral cure<sup>279</sup> here was pared away.

"To that answered his Highness, 'Whatsoever impediment be to the contrary, we will set forth that authority to the uttermost. For we received from that See our crown imperial' — which, till his Grace with his own mouth told it me, I never heard of before. So that I trust, when his Grace shall be once truly informed of this, and call to his gracious remembrance my doing in that behalf, his Highness 90 will never speak of it more, but clear me thoroughly therein himself."

And thus displeasantly departed they.

Then took Sir Thomas More his boat toward his house at Chelsea, wherein by the way he was very merry, and for that I was nothing sorry, hoping that he had got himself discharged out of the Parliament bill. When he was landed and come home, then walked we twain<sup>280</sup> alone in his garden together, where I, desirous<sup>281</sup> to know how he had sped, said, “I trust, sir, that all is well because you be so merry.”

“It is so indeed, son Roper, I thank God,” quoth he.

“Are you then put out of the Parliament bill?” said I.

“By my troth,<sup>281</sup> son Roper,” quoth he, “I never remembered it.”

“Never remembered it, sir?!” said I, “a case that toucheth yourself so near, and us all for your sake?! I am sorry to hear it, for I verily<sup>282</sup> trusted, when I saw you so merry, that all had been well.”

Then said he, “Wilt thou know, son Roper, why I was so merry?”

“That would I gladly, sir,” quoth I.

“In good faith, I rejoiced, Son,” quoth he, “that I had given the devil a foul fall, and that with those lords I had gone so far, as without great shame I could never go back again.”

At which words waxed<sup>283</sup> I very sad, for though himself liked it well, yet liked it me but a little.

Now upon the report made by the Lord Chancellor and the other lords to the King of all their whole discourse had with Sir Thomas More, the King was so highly offended with him that he plainly told them he was fully determined that the aforesaid Parliament bill should undoubtedly proceed forth against him. To whom the Lord Chancellor and the rest of the lords said that they perceived the lords of the Upper House so precisely bent to hear him, in his own defense, make answer himself, that if he were not put out of the bill, it would without fail be utterly an overthrow of all. But, for all this, needs would the King have his own will therein, or else he said that at the passing thereof, he would be personally present himself.

Then the Lord Audley and the rest, seeing him so vehemently set thereupon, on their knees most humbly besought his Grace to forbear the same, considering that if he should, in his own presence receive an overthrow, it would not only encourage his subjects forever after to condemn him, but also throughout all Christendom redound to his dishonor forever, adding thereunto that they mistrusted not in time against him to find some meeter<sup>284</sup> matter to serve his turn better. For in this case of the nun, he was accounted, they said, so innocent and clear, that for his dealing therein, men reckoned him far worthier of praise than reproof. Whereupon at length, through their earnest persuasion, he was content to condescend<sup>285</sup> to their petition.

And on the morrow, Master Cromwell, meeting me in the Parliament House, willed me to tell my father that he was put out of the Parliament bill. But because I had appointed to dine that day in London, I sent the message by my servant to my wife to Chelsea. Whereof when she informed her father, “In faith, Meg,” quoth he, “quod differtur, non aufertur.”<sup>286</sup>

After this, as the Duke of Norfolk and Sir Thomas More chanced to fall in familiar talk together, the Duke said unto him, “By the Mass, Master More, it is perilous striving with princes. And therefore I would wish you somewhat to incline to the King’s pleasure, for, by God’s body, Master More, indignatio principis mors est.”<sup>287</sup>

“Is that all, my lord?” quoth he. “Then in good faith is there no more difference between your Grace and me, but that I shall die today and you tomorrow.”

So fell it out, within a month or thereabouts after the making of the statute for the Oath of the Supremacy and Matrimony, that all the priests of London and Westminster, and no temporal man but he, were sent for to appear at Lambeth before the Bishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, and Secretary Cromwell, commissioners appointed there to tender the oath unto them.

Then Sir Thomas More, as his accustomed manner was always, ere<sup>288</sup> he entered into any matter of importance, as when he was first chosen of the King’s Privy Council, when he was sent ambassador, appointed Speaker of the Parliament, made Lord Chancellor, or when he took any like<sup>289</sup> weighty matter upon him, to go to church and be confessed, to hear Mass and be houseled<sup>290</sup> so did he likewise

280 two 281 faithfulness; truthfulness 282 truly 283 became 284 fitter, more appropriate 285 agree 286 “what is put off is not put aside” 287 “the indignation of the prince is death” 288 before

289 similar 290 be houseled: receive the Eucharist

in the morning early the selfsame day that he was summoned to appear before the lords at Lambeth. And whereas he evermore used before at his departure from his wife and children, whom he tenderly 5 loved, to have them bring him to his boat, and there to kiss them all, and bid them farewell, then would he suffer<sup>291</sup> none of them forth of the gate to follow him, but pulled the wicket after him, and shut them all from him, and with a heavy heart, as by 10 his countenance<sup>292</sup> it appeared, with me and our four servants there took he his boat toward Lambeth. Wherein sitting still sadly a while, at last he suddenly rounded<sup>293</sup> me in the ear, and said, "Son Roper, I thank our Lord, the field is won." What he 15 meant thereby I then wist<sup>294</sup> not, yet loath to seem ignorant, I answered: "Sir, I am thereof glad." But as I conjectured afterwards, it was for that<sup>295</sup> the love he had to God wrought in him so effectually that it conquered all his carnal affections utterly.

Now at his coming to Lambeth, how wisely he behaved himself before the commissioners, at the ministration of the oath unto him, may be found in certain letters sent to my wife remaining in a great book of his works.<sup>296</sup> Where, by the space of four 25 days he was betaken to the custody of the Abbot of Westminster, during which time the King consulted with his Council what order were meet to be taken with him. And albeit<sup>297</sup> in the beginning they were resolved that with an oath not to be acknowledged
 30 whether he had to the Supremacy been sworn, or what he thought thereof, he should be discharged, yet did Queen Anne, by her importunate clamor, so sore<sup>298</sup> exasperate the King against him, that contrary to his former resolution, he caused the said
 35 Oath of the Supremacy to be administered unto him. Who, albeit he made a discreet qualified answer, nevertheless was forthwith<sup>299</sup> committed to the Tower.

Whom, as he was going thitherward, wearing, as 40 he commonly did, a chain of gold about his neck, Sir Richard Cromwell, that had the charge of his conveyance thither, advised him to send home his chain to his wife, or to some of his children. "Nay, 45 sir," quoth he, "that I will not, for if I were taken in the field by my enemies, I would they should somewhat fare the better by me."

At whose landing Master Lieutenant at the Tower Gate was ready to receive him, where the porter demanded of him his upper garment. "Master Porter," 50 quoth he, "here it is," and took off his cap and delivered it him saying, "I am sorry it is no better for you." "No, sir," quoth the porter, "I must have your gown."

And so was he by Master Lieutenant conveyed to his lodging, where he called unto him one John a Wood, his own servant, there appointed to attend
 55 upon him, who could neither write nor read, and swore him before the Lieutenant that if he should hear or see him, at any time, speak or write any manner of thing against the King, the Council, or the state of the realm, he should open it to the Lieuten-
 60 ant, that the Lieutenant might incontinent<sup>300</sup> reveal it to the Council.

Now when he had remained in the Tower a little more than a month, my wife, longing to see her father, by her earnest suit at length got leave to go 65 to him. At whose coming, after the Seven Psalms<sup>301</sup> and litany said (which, whensoever she came to him, ere<sup>302</sup> he fell in talk of any worldly matters, he used accustomedly<sup>303</sup> to say with her) among other communication he said unto her, "I believe, Meg, that 70 they that put me here, ween<sup>304</sup> they have done me a high displeasure. But I assure thee, on my faith, my own good daughter, if it had not been for my wife and you that be my children, whom I account the chief part of my charge, I would not have failed
 75 long ere this to have closed myself in as strait<sup>305</sup> a room, and straiter too. But since I am come hither without mine own desert, I trust that God of his goodness will discharge me of my care, and with his gracious help supply my lack among you. I find no
 80 cause, I thank God, Meg, to reckon myself in worse case<sup>306</sup> here than in my own house. For methinketh God maketh me a wanton,<sup>307</sup> and setteth me on his lap and dandleth<sup>308</sup> me." Thus by his gracious demeanor in tribulation appeared it that all the troubles that ever chanced unto him, by his patient sufferance thereof, were to him no painful punishments, but of his patience, profitable exercises.

And at another time, when he had first questioned
 90 with my wife a while of the order of his wife, children, and state of his house in his absence, he asked her how Queen Anne did. "In faith, Father," quoth

291 allow 292 face; demeanor 293 whispered 294 knew 295 for that: because 296 More's 1557 Workes
 297 although 298 greatly

299 immediately 300 immediately
 301 the Penitential Psalms: 6, 31(32),
 37(38), 50(51), 101(102), 129(130), 142(143)
 302 before 303 usually 304 think

305 tight 306 situation 307 spoiled child 308 moves (a child) lightly up and down in the arms or on the knee

she, “never better.” “Never better! Meg,” quoth he. “Alas! Meg, alas! It pitieth me to remember into what misery, poor soul, she shall shortly come.”

After this, Master Lieutenant, coming into his chamber to visit him, rehearsed<sup>309</sup> the benefits and friendship that he had many ways received at his hands, and how much bounden he was therefore friendly to entertain him and make him good cheer, which, since the case standing as it did, he could not do without the King’s indignations, he trusted, he said, he would accept his good will, and such poor cheer as he had. “Master Lieutenant,” quoth he again, “I verily<sup>310</sup> believe, as you may, so you are my good friend indeed, and would, as you say, with your best cheer entertain me, for the which I most heartily thank you, and assure yourself, Master Lieutenant, I do not mislike my cheer, but whensoever I do, then thrust me out of your doors.”

Whereas the oath confirming the supremacy and matrimony was by the first statute in few words comprised, the Lord Chancellor and Master Secretary did of their own heads add more words unto it, to make it appear unto the King’s ears more pleasant and plausible. And that oath, so amplified, caused they to be ministered to Sir Thomas More, and to all other throughout the realm. Which Sir Thomas More perceiving, said unto my wife, “I may tell thee, Meg, they that have committed me hither, for refusing of this oath not agreeable to the statute, are not by their own law able to justify my imprisonment. And surely, daughter, it is great pity that any Christian prince should by a flexible Council ready to follow his affections, and by a weak clergy lacking grace constantly to stand to their learning, with flattery be so shamefully abused.” But at length the Lord Chancellor and Master Secretary, spying their own oversight in that behalf, were fain<sup>311</sup> afterwards to find the means that another statute should be made for the confirmation of the oath so amplified with their additions.

After Sir Thomas More had given over his office and all other worldly doings therewith, to the intent he might from thenceforth the more quietly settle himself to the service of God, then made he a conveyance for the disposition<sup>312</sup> of all his lands, reserving to himself an estate thereof only for the term of his own life, and after his decease assuring some part of the same to his wife, some to his son’s wife for a jointure in consideration that she was an inheritrix in possession of more than a hundred pounds land by the year, and some to me and my wife in recompense of our marriage money, with diverse remainders over. All which conveyance<sup>313</sup> and assurance was perfectly finished long before that matter whereupon he was attainted was made an offense, and yet after by statute clearly avoided.<sup>314</sup> And so were all his lands, that he had to his wife and children by the said conveyance in such sort assured, contrary to the order of law, taken away from them, and brought into the King’s hands, saving that portion which he had appointed to my wife and me, which, although he had in the fore-said conveyance reserved, as he did the rest, for term of life to himself, nevertheless, upon further consideration, two days after, by another conveyance, he gave the same immediately to my wife and me in possession. And so because the statute had undone only the first conveyance, giving no more to the King but so much as passed by that, the second conveyance, whereby it was given to my wife and me, being dated two days after, was without<sup>315</sup> the compass of the statute. And so was our portion to us by that means clearly reserved.

As Sir Thomas More in the Tower chanced on a time, looking out of his window, to behold one Master Reynolds, a religious, learned, and virtuous father of Syon, and three monks of the Charterhouse, for the matters of the matrimony and supremacy, going out of the Tower to execution, he, as one longing in that journey to have accompanied them, said unto my wife, then standing there beside him, “Lo, dost thou not see, Meg, that these blessed fathers be now as cheerfully going to their deaths as bridegrooms to their marriage? Wherefore mayest thou see, mine own good daughter, what a great difference there is between such as have in effect spent all their days in a straight, hard, penitential, and painful life religiously, and such as have in the world, like worldly wretches, as thy poor father hath done, consumed all their time in pleasure and ease licentiously. For God, considering their long-continued life in most sore and grievous penance, will no longer suffer them to remain here in this vale of misery and iniquity, but speedily hence

309 recounted, told 310 truly
311 obliged, inclined 312 disposal

313 legal transference 314 made void
315 without the compass: beyond the bounds

5 taketh them to the fruition of his everlasting deity, whereas thy silly father, Meg, that like a most wicked caitiff<sup>316</sup> hath passed forth the whole course of his miserable life most sinfully, God, thinking him not worthy so soon to come to that eternal felicity, leaveth him here yet still in the world, further to be plunged and turmoiled with misery.”

10 Within a while after, Master Secretary,<sup>317</sup> coming to him into the Tower from the King, pretended much friendship toward him, and for his comfort told him that the King's Highness was his good and gracious lord, and minded not with any matter wherein he should have cause of scruple, from henceforth to trouble his conscience. As soon as 15 Master Secretary was gone, to express what comfort he conceived of his words, he wrote with a coal, for ink then had he none, these verses following:

20 Eye-flattering fortune, look thou never so fair,
Nor never so pleasantly begin to smile,
As though thou wouldst my ruin all repair,
During my life thou shalt not me beguile.
Trust I shall God, to enter in a while
His haven of heaven, sure<sup>318</sup> and uniform;
Ever after thy calm, look I for a storm.

25 When Sir Thomas More had continued a good while in the Tower, my lady, his wife, obtained license to see him, who, at her first coming, like a simple ignorant woman, and somewhat worldly too, with this manner of salutation bluntly saluted him:

30 “What the good year,<sup>319</sup> Master More,” quoth she.
“I marvel that you, that have been always hitherto taken for so wise a man, will now so play the fool to lie here in this close,<sup>320</sup> filthy prison, and be content thus to be shut up amongst mice and rats, when you 35 might be abroad at your liberty, and with the favor and good will both of the King and his Council, if you would but do as all the bishops and best learned of this realm have done. And seeing you have at Chelsea a right fair house, your library, your 40 books, your gallery, your garden, your orchard, and all other necessaries so handsome about you, where you might in the company of me your wife, your children, and household be merry, I muse what, a<sup>321</sup> God's name, you mean here still thus fondly<sup>322</sup> to 45 tarry.”

After he had a while quietly heard her, with a cheerful countenance he said unto her, “I pray thee, good Mistress Alice, tell me one thing.”

“What is that?” quoth she.

“Is not this house,” quoth he, “as nigh<sup>323</sup> heaven 50 as my own?”

To whom she, after her accustomed homely<sup>324</sup> fashion, not liking such talk, answered, “Tilly-vally,<sup>325</sup> tilly-vally!”

“How say you, Mistress Alice,” quoth he, “is it not 55 so?”

“Bone deus, bone deus, man, will this gear<sup>326</sup> never be left?” quoth she.

“Well then, Mistress Alice, if it be so,” quoth he, 60
“it is very well. For I see no great cause why I should much joy either of my gay house or of anything belonging thereunto, when, if I should but seven years lie buried under the ground, and then arise and come thither again, I should not fail to find some therein that would bid me get out of doors, and tell 65 me it were none of mine. What cause have I then to like such an house as would so soon forget his master?”

So her persuasions moved him but a little.

70 Not long after came there to him the Lord Chancellor, the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk with Master Secretary, and certain other of the Privy Council, at two several times, by all policies possible procuring<sup>327</sup> him, either precisely to confess the Supremacy, or precisely to deny it; whereunto, as appeareth 75 by his examinations in the said great book,<sup>328</sup> they could never bring him.

80 Shortly hereupon, Master Rich (afterwards Lord Rich), then newly made the King's Solicitor, Sir Richard Southwell, and one Master Palmer, servant to the Secretary, were sent to Sir Thomas More into the Tower to fetch away his books from him. And while Sir Richard Southwell and Master Palmer were busy in the trussing<sup>329</sup> up of his books, Master Rich, pretending friendly talk with him, among 85 other things, of<sup>330</sup> a set course, as it seemed, said thus unto him:

90 “Forasmuch as it is well known, Master More, that you are a man both wise and well-learned as well in the laws of the realm as otherwise, I pray you therefore, sir, let me be so bold as of good will to put unto you this case. Admit there were, sir,” quoth he,

316 wretch 317 Thomas Cromwell 318 secure, safe 319 an expression that connotes impatience 320 enclosed, confined 321 in 322 foolishly

323 near 324 domestic; ordinary, simple 325 “Nonsense!” 326 business; matter

327 urging 328 More's 1557 Workes
329 packing 330 from, out of

“an act of Parliament that all the realm should take me for king. Would not you, Master More, take me for king?”

“Yes, sir,” quoth Sir Thomas More, “that would I.”

5 “I put case further,” quoth Master Rich, “that there were an act of Parliament that all the realm should take me for pope. Would not you then, Master More, take me for pope?”

10 “For answer, sir,” quoth Sir Thomas More, “to your first case, the Parliament may well, Master Rich, meddle with the state of temporal princes. But to make answer to your other cause, I will put you this case: Suppose the Parliament would make a law that God should not be God. Would you then, 15 Master Rich, say that God were not God?”

“No, sir,” quoth he, “that would I not, since no Parliament may make any such law.”

20 “No more,” said Sir Thomas More, as Master Rich reported him, “could the Parliament make the king supreme head of the Church.”

25 Upon whose only report was Sir Thomas More indicted of treason upon the statute whereby it was made treason to deny the King to be supreme head of the Church. Into which indictment were put these heinous words—“maliciously, traitorously, and diabolically.”

30 When Sir Thomas More was brought from the Tower to Westminster Hall to answer the indictment, and at the King’s Bench bar before the judges thereupon arraigned, he openly told them that he would upon that indictment have abidden<sup>331</sup> in law, but that he thereby should have been driven to confess of himself the matter indeed, that was the denial of the King’s supremacy, which he protested 35 was untrue. Wherefore he thereto pleaded not guilty; and so reserved unto himself advantage to be taken of the body of the matter, after verdict, to avoid that indictment, and moreover added that if those only odious terms, “maliciously, traitorously, and diabolically,” were put out of the indictment he 40 saw therein nothing justly to charge him.

45 And for proof to the jury that Sir Thomas More was guilty of this treason, Master Rich was called forth to give evidence unto them upon his oath, as he did. Against whom thus sworn, Sir Thomas More began in this wise<sup>332</sup> to say, “If I were a man, my lords, that did not regard an oath, I needed not, as it is well known, in this place, at this time, nor in this case, to stand here as an accused person. And if 50 this oath of yours, Master Rich, be true, then pray I that I never see God in the face, which I would not say, were it otherwise, to win the whole world.” Then recited he to the court the discourse of all their communication in the Tower, according to the truth, and said: 55

In good faith, Master Rich, I am sorrier for your perjury than for my own peril. And you shall understand that neither I, nor no man else to my knowledge, ever took you to be a man of such credit as in any matter of importance I, or any other, would at any time vouchsafe to communicate with you. And I, as you know, of no small while have been acquainted with you and your conversation, who have known you from your youth hitherto. For we have long dwelled both 60 in one parish together, where, as yourself can tell (I am sorry you compel me so to say) you were esteemed very light<sup>333</sup> of your tongue, a great dicer, and of no commendable fame. And so in your house at the Temple,<sup>334</sup> where hath been your chief bringing up, were you likewise accounted. 70

Can it therefore seem likely unto your honorable lordships that I would, in so weighty a cause, so unadvisedly overshoot myself as to trust Master Rich, a man of me always reputed for one of 75 so little truth, as your lordships have heard, so far above my Sovereign Lord the King, or any of his noble councilors, that I would unto him utter the secrets of my conscience touching the King’s supremacy, the special point and only mark at my hands so long sought for, a thing which I never did, nor never would, after the statute thereof made, reveal either to the King’s Highness himself, or to any of his honorable councilors, as it is not unknown to your honors, at sundry several times sent from his Grace’s own person unto the Tower unto me for none other purpose? Can this in your judgments, my lords, seem likely to be true? And yet, if I had so done indeed, my lords, as Master Rich hath sworn, seeing it was 90 spoken but in familiar secret talk, nothing affirming, and only putting of cases, without other displeasing circumstances, it cannot justly be taken to be spoken maliciously, and where there is no malice, there can be no offense. And over<sup>335</sup> this 95

I can never think, my lords, that so many worthy bishops, so many honorable personages, and so many other worshipful,<sup>336</sup> virtuous, wise, and well-learned men as at the making of that law were in Parliament assembled, ever meant to have any man punished by death in whom there could be found no malice, taking malitia for malevolentia. For if malitia be generally taken for “sin,” no man is there then that can thereof excuse himself. Quia si dixerimus quod peccatum non habemus, nosmet ipsos seducimus, et veritas in nobis non est.<sup>337</sup> And only this word “maliciously” is in the statute material, as this term “forcible” is in the statute of forcible entries, by which statute, if a man enter peaceably, and put not his adversary out forcibly, it is no offense. But if he put him out forcibly, then by that statute it is an offense, and so shall he be punished by this term “forcibly.”

Besides this, the manifold goodness of the King’s Highness himself, that hath been so many ways my singular good lord and gracious sovereign, that hath so dearly loved and trusted me, even at my very first coming into his noble service with the dignity of his honorable Privy Council vouchsafing to admit me, and to offices of great credit and worship most liberally advanced me, and finally with that weighty room of his Grace’s High Chancellor (the like whereof he never did to temporal man before), next to his own royal person the highest officer in this noble realm, so far above my merits or qualities able and meet<sup>338</sup> therefor, of his incomparable benignity honored and exalted me, by the space of twenty years and more showing his continual favor toward me, and (until at my own poor suit, it pleased his Highness, giving me license, with his Majesty’s favor, to bestow the residue of my life for the provision of my soul in the service of God, of his especial goodness thereof to discharge and unburden me) most benignly heaped honors continually more and more upon me—all this his Highness’s goodness, I say, so long thus bountifully extended toward me, were in my mind, my lords, matter sufficient to convince this slanderous surmise by this man so wrongfully imagined against me.

Master Rich, seeing himself so disproved, and his credit so foul defaced, caused Sir Richard Southwell and Master Palmer, that at the time of their communication were in the chamber, to be sworn what words had passed between them. Whereupon Master Palmer, upon his deposition, said that he was so busy about the trussing<sup>339</sup> up of Sir Thomas More’s books in a sack, that he took no heed to their talk. Sir Richard Southwell likewise, upon his deposition, said that because he was appointed only to look unto the conveyance of his books, he gave no ear unto them.

After this were there many other reasons, not now to my remembrance, by Sir Thomas More in his own defense alleged, to the discredit of Master Rich’s aforesaid evidence, and proof of the clearness of his own conscience. All which notwithstanding, the jury found him guilty. And incontinent upon<sup>340</sup> their verdict, the Lord Chancellor, for that matter chief commissioner, beginning to proceed in judgment against him, Sir Thomas More said to him: “My lord, when I was toward<sup>341</sup> the law, the manner in such case was to ask the prisoner before judgment, why judgment should not be given against him.” Whereupon the Lord Chancellor, staying his judgment, wherein he had partly proceeded, demanded of him what he was able to say to the contrary. Who then in this sort most humbly made answer:

“Forasmuch as, my lord,” quoth he, “this indictment is grounded upon an act of Parliament directly repugnant to the laws of God and his Holy Church, the supreme government of which, or of any part whereof, may no temporal prince presume by any law to take upon him, as rightfully belonging to the See of Rome, a spiritual preeminence by the mouth of our Savior himself, personally present upon the earth, only to Saint Peter and his successors, bishops of the same See, by special prerogative granted, it is therefore in law amongst Christian men insufficient to charge any Christian man.”

And for proof thereof, like as, among diverse other reasons and authorities, he declared that this 336 honorable, distinguished 337 “If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us” (1 Jn

1:8). 338 fitting, appropriate 339 gathering 340 incontinent upon: immediately after 341 promoting, assisting; in attendance upon realm, being but one member and small part of the Church, might not make a particular law disagreeable with the general law of Christ's universal Catholic Church, no more than the city of London, being but one poor member in respect of the whole realm, might make a law against an act of Parliament to bind the whole realm. So farther showed he that it was contrary both to the laws and statutes of our own land yet unrepealed, as they might evidently perceive in Magna Carta, Quod ecclesia Anglicana libera sit, et habeat omnia iura sua integra et libertates suas illaesas.<sup>342</sup> And also contrary to that sacred oath<sup>343</sup> which the King's Highness himself and every other Christian prince always with great solemnity received at their coronations, alleging moreover that no more might this realm of England refuse obedience to the See of Rome than might a child refuse obedience to his own natural father. For as Saint Paul said to the Corinthians, "I have regenerated you, my children, in Christ."<sup>344</sup> So might Saint Gregory, pope of Rome, of whom by Saint Augustine, his messenger, we first received the Christian faith, of us Englishmen truly say, "You are my children, because I have given to you everlasting salvation, a far higher and better inheritance than any carnal father can leave to his child, and by regeneration made you my spiritual children in Christ."

Then was it by the Lord Chancellor thereunto answered that seeing all the bishops, universities, and best learned of this realm had to this act agreed, it was much marveled that he alone against them all would so stiffly stick thereat, and so vehemently argue thereagainst.

To that Sir Thomas More replied, saying, "If the number of bishops and universities be so material as your lordship seemeth to take it, then see I little cause, my lord, why that thing in my conscience should make any change. For I nothing doubt<sup>345</sup> but that, though not in this realm, yet in Christendom about,<sup>346</sup> of these well-learned bishops and virtuous men that are yet alive, they be not the fewer part that be of my mind therein. But if I should speak of those which already be dead, of whom many be now holy saints in heaven, I am very sure it is the far greater part of them that, all the while they lived, thought in this case that way that I think now. And therefore am I not bound, my lord, to conform my conscience to the Council of one realm against the General Council of Christendom."

Now when Sir Thomas More, for the voiding of the indictment, had taken as many exceptions as he thought meet,<sup>347</sup> and many more reasons than I can now remember alleged, the Lord Chancellor, loath to have the burden of that judgment wholly to depend upon himself, there openly asked advice of the Lord Fitz-James, then Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and joined in commission with him, whether this indictment were sufficient or not. Who, like a wise man, answered, "My lords all, by Saint Julian" (that was ever his oath), "I must needs confess that if the act of Parliament be not unlawful, then is not the indictment in my conscience insufficient."

Whereupon the Lord Chancellor said to the rest of the lords: "Lo, my Lords, you hear what my Lord Chief Justice saith," and so immediately gave he judgment against him.

After which ended, the commissioners yet further courteously offered him, if he had anything else to allege for his defense, to grant him favorable audience. Who answered, "More have I not to say, my lords, but that like the blessed apostle Saint Paul, as we read in the Acts of the Apostles, was present, and consented to the death of Saint Stephen, and kept their clothes that stoned him to death,<sup>348</sup> and yet be they now both twain<sup>349</sup> holy saints in heaven, and shall continue there friends forever, so I verily<sup>350</sup> trust, and shall therefore right heartily pray, that though your lordships have now here in earth been judges to my condemnation, we may yet hereafter in heaven merrily all meet together, to our everlasting salvation."

This much touching Sir Thomas More's arraignment, being not thereat present myself, have I by credible report, partly of the right worshipful Sir Anthony St. Leger, Knight, and partly of Richard Heywood and John Webbe, gentlemen, with others of good credit, at the hearing thereof present themselves, as far as my poor wit and memory would serve me, here truly rehearsed<sup>351</sup> unto you.

Now, after this arraignment, departed he from the bar to the Tower again, led by Sir William King-

<sup>342</sup> "That the English Church may be free, and that it may exist with all its laws uncorrupted and its liberties unviolated" is the first right listed in the Magna Carta.

<sup>343</sup> This Coronation Oath required the king to confirm "especially the laws, customs, and liberties granted the clergy and the people." <sup>344</sup> See 1 Cor 3:1,

4:15-16. <sup>345</sup> fear <sup>346</sup> abroad <sup>347</sup> fit; fair <sup>348</sup> See Acts 7:54-60. <sup>349</sup> two <sup>350</sup> truly <sup>351</sup> recounted, told

ston, a tall, strong, and comely knight, Constable of the Tower, and his very dear friend. Who, when he had brought him from Westminster to the Old Swan toward the Tower, there with a heavy heart, the tears running down by his cheeks, bade him farewell. Sir Thomas More, seeing him so sorrowful, comforted him with as good words as he could, saying: "Good Master Kingston, trouble not yourself, but be of good cheer; for I will pray for you, and my good lady, your wife, that we may meet in heaven together, where we shall be merry for ever and ever."

Soon after, Sir William Kingston, talking with me of Sir Thomas More, said, "In good faith, Master Roper, I was ashamed of myself, that, at my departing from your father, I found my heart so feeble, and his so strong, that he was fain<sup>352</sup> to comfort me, which should rather have comforted him."

When Sir Thomas More came from Westminster to the Towerward again, his daughter, my wife, desirous to see her father, whom she thought she should never see in this world after, and also to have his final blessing, gave attendance about the Tower Wharf, where she knew he would pass by, before he could enter into the Tower, there tarrying for his coming home. As soon as she saw him, after his blessing on her knees reverently received, she hastening toward him, and, without consideration or care of herself, pressing in among the midst of the throng and company of the guard, that with halberds and bills<sup>353</sup> went round about him, hastily ran to him, and there openly, in the sight of all, embraced him, took him about the neck, and kissed him. Who, well liking her most natural and dear daughterly affection toward him, gave her his fatherly blessing and many goodly words of comfort besides. From whom after she was departed, she, not satisfied with the former sight of him, and like one that had forgotten herself, being all ravished<sup>354</sup> with the entire love of her dear father, having respect neither to herself, nor to the press of the people and multitude that were there about him, suddenly turned back again, ran to him as before, took him about the neck, and diverse times together most lovingly kissed him, and at last, with a full heavy heart, was fain<sup>355</sup> to depart from him. The beholding whereof was to many of them that were present thereat so lamentable that it made them for very sorrow thereof to mourn and weep.

So remained Sir Thomas More in the Tower more than a seven-night<sup>356</sup> after his judgment. From whence, the day before he suffered, he sent his shirt of hair (not willing to have it seen) to my wife, his dearly beloved daughter, and a letter written with a coal, contained in the aforesaid book of his works,<sup>357</sup> plainly expressing the fervent desire he had to suffer on the morrow, in these words following:

I cumber<sup>358</sup> you, good Margaret, much, but I would be sorry if it should be any longer than tomorrow, for tomorrow is Saint Thomas's Even, and the Utas of Saint Peter.<sup>359</sup> And therefore tomorrow long I to go to God; it were a day very meet and convenient<sup>360</sup> for me, etc. I never liked your manner toward me better than when you kissed me last. For I like when daughterly love and dear charity have no leisure to look to worldly courtesy.

And so upon the next morrow, being Tuesday, Saint Thomas's Eve, and the Utas of Saint Peter, in the year of our Lord, one thousand five hundred thirty and five (according as he in his letter the day before had wished) early in the morning came to him Sir Thomas Pope, his singular friend, on message from the King and his Council, that he should before nine of the clock the same morning suffer death, and that therefore forthwith<sup>361</sup> he should prepare himself thereunto.

"Master Pope," quoth he, "for your good tidings I most heartily thank you. I have been always much bounden to the King's Highness for the benefits and honors that he hath still from time to time most bountifully heaped upon me, and yet more bound am I to his Grace for putting me into this place, where I have had convenient time and space to have remembrance of my end. And so help me, God, most of all, Master Pope, am I bound to his Highness that it pleaseth him so shortly to rid me out of the miseries of this wretched world. And therefore will I not fail earnestly to pray for his Grace, both here and also in another world."

"The King's pleasure is further," quoth Master

352 forced; obliged 353 halberds and bills: battle-axes and broadswords 354 carried away 355 obliged 356 More's trial was actually July 1 and his execution, July 6. 357 More's 1557 Workes 358 trouble 359 July 7 was the feast of St. Thomas Becket and the octave of St. Peter's feast, observed on June 29.

360 meet and convenient: fit and appropriate 361 immediately

Pope, “that at your execution you shall not use many words.”

5 “Master Pope,” quoth he, “you do well to give me warning of his Grace’s pleasure, for otherwise I had purposed at that time somewhat<sup>362</sup> to have spoken, but of no matter wherewith his Grace, or any other, should have had cause to be offended. Nevertheless, whatsoever I intended, I am ready obediently to conform myself to his Grace’s commandments. And I beseech you, good Master Pope, to be a mean<sup>363</sup> unto his Highness that my daughter Margaret may be at my burial.”

10 “The King is content already,” quoth Master Pope, “that your wife, children, and other your friends shall have liberty to be present thereat.”

15 “O, how much beholden then,” said Sir Thomas More, “am I to his Grace that unto my poor burial vouchsafeth to have so gracious consideration.”

20 Wherewithal Master Pope, taking his leave of him, could not refrain from weeping. Which Sir Thomas More perceiving, comforted him in this wise, “Quiet yourself, good Master Pope, and be not discomfited, for I trust that we shall, once in heaven, see each other full merrily, where we shall be sure to live and love together, in joyful bliss eternally.”

25 Upon whose departure, Sir Thomas More, as one that had been invited to some solemn feast, changed himself into his best apparel, which Master Lieutenant espying, advised him to put it off, saying that he that should have it was but a javel.<sup>364</sup>

30 “What, Master Lieutenant,” quoth he, “shall I account him a javel that shall do me this day so singular a benefit? Nay, I assure you, were it cloth of gold, I would account it well bestowed on him, as St. Cyprian did, who gave his executioner thirty pieces of gold.” And albeit at length, through Master Lieutenant’s importunate persuasion, he altered his apparel, yet after the example of Saint Cyprian, did he, of that little money that was left him, send 40 one angel of gold to his executioner.

And so was he by Master Lieutenant brought out of the Tower, and from thence led toward the place of execution. Where, going up the scaffold, which was so weak that it was ready to fall, he said merrily to Master Lieutenant, “I pray you, Master Lieutenant, see me safe up, and for my coming down, let me shift for myself.” 45

Then desired he all the people thereabout to pray for him, and to bear witness with him that he should now there suffer death in and for the faith of the holy Catholic Church. Which done, he knelt down, and after his prayers said, turned to the executioner and with a cheerful countenance spake thus to him: “Pluck up thy spirits, man, and be not afraid to do thine office; my neck is very short; take heed therefore thou strike not awry, for saving of thine honesty.” 55

So passed Sir Thomas More out of this world to God, upon the very same day in which himself had most desired. 60

Soon after whose death came intelligence thereof to the Emperor Charles. Whereupon he sent for Sir Thomas Elyot, our English ambassador, and said unto him: “My Lord Ambassador, we understand that the King, your master, hath put his faithful servant and grave wise councilor, Sir Thomas More, to death.” Whereunto Sir Thomas Elyot answered that he understood nothing thereof. “Well,” said the Emperor, “it is too true. And this will we say, that if we had been master of such a servant, of whose doings our self have had these many years no small experience, we would rather have lost the best city of our dominions than have lost such a worthy councilor.” Which matter was by the same Sir Thomas Elyot to myself, to my wife, to Master Clement and his wife, to Master John Heywood and his wife, and unto diverse other his friends accordingly reported. 65 70 75

Finis. Deo gratias.

WORKES OF SIR THOMAS MORE KNIGHT

(1557)

This 1,490-page book is the first one-volume collection of More's English works, edited by William Rastell, who was More's nephew and from 1529 to 1534 the printer of More's polemical books. As Rastell says in the prefatory letter to Queen Mary that follows, he "did diligently collect and gather together, as many of those his works, books, letters, and other writings, printed and unprinted in the English tongue, as I could come by," as he prepared More's Workes for publication. Rastell's letter also praises More's writing for showing the "eloquence and property of the English tongue," in the service of "true doctrine" and the "moral virtues that appertain to the framing and forming of men's manners and consciences, to live a virtuous and devout Christian life." Rastell's "commodious and profitable book" would be followed by one-volume editions of More's Latin writings later in the sixteenth century.

To the moſte hygh and

vertuous Princeſſe, MARY by the grace of GOD, queene of Englande, Spayne, Fraunce, both Sicilles, Ieruſalem, and Ireland, defendour of the fayth, Archducheſſe of Auſtria, Duchefſe of Burgondy, Myllayne, and Brabant, Counteſſe of Haſpurge, Flaunders, and Tyroll, her highneſſe moſte humble and obedient ſubiect, VVyllyam Raſtell ſeriant at lawe, wiſſeth health, wealth, honour, and felicitie, worldely and euerlaſtyngly.

Then I conſidered with my ſelfe (moſt gracious ſoueraigne) what greate eloquence, excellent learninge, and morall vertues, were and be conteyned in the workes and bookes, that the wyſe and godlie man, ſir Thomas More knighte, ſometyme lorde Chauncellour of England (my dere vncl) wrote in the Engliſh tonge, ſo many, and ſo well, as no one Engliſhman (I ſuppoſe) euer wrote the like, whereby his workes be worthy to be hadde and redde of euerye Engliſhe man, that is ſtudious or deſirous to know and learne, not onelye the eloquence and propertie of the Engliſh tonge, but alſo the true doctrine of Chriſtes catholike fayth, the confutacion of deteſtable hereſyes, or the godly morall vertues that appertaine to the framinge and four-minge of mennes maners and conſciences, to liue a vertuous and deuout chriſten life, and when I further conſidered, that thoſe workes of his were not yet all imprinted, and thoſe that were imprinted, were in ſeurall volumes and bokes, whereby it were likely, that aſwell thoſe bokes of his that were already abrode in print, as thoſe y were yet vnprinted, ſhould in time percaſe periſh and vtterly vaniſh away (to the great loſſe and detriment of many) vnleſſe they were gathered together and printed in one whole volume, for theſe cauſes (my moſt gracious liege Lady) I dyd diligently collect and gather together, as many of thoſe his workes, bokes, letters, and other writinges, printed and vnprinted in y Engliſh tonge, as I could come by, and the ſame (certain yeres in the euil world paſt, keeping in my handes, very ſurely and ſafely) now lately haue cauſed to be imprinted

¶ ii.

ted

ted in this one volume, to thintent, not onely that euery man y will now in our dayes, maye haue and take commoditie by them, but also that they may be preserued for the profit like wise of our posteritie. Which workes who so will take paines diligently and aduisedly to peruse and rede, shall therby shortly attain gret knowledge, as wel for the incresing of al kindes of godly vertues and holy liuinge, as for the confirming of his owne faith, and eschuing and confuting of all peruerse opinions, false doctrine, and de uillyshe heresies, if he be not vtterly destitute of Gods grace, and blinded both with obstinate and stubburne malice, and also with proude and ar rogant presumptiō. And this volume thus finished the last day of Aprill in this yeare of oure Lorde G O D. 1557. I your graces humble obediēte and faithfull subiect, do dedicate vnto your most excellent maiestie, as to that person, to whom specially of all worldelye creatures, I truste this boke shalbe moste acceptable, both for that ( I thinke ) that it benge red of many, as it is likely to be, shall much helpe forwarde youre Maiesties most godly purpose, in purging this youre realme of all wicked heresies, ( which are, thankes be to almighty God, thoro we his great goodnes and your Maiesties meanes, very much abated, and as I trust, if it may please god to graunt your highnes tog to reigne ouer vs, which I besече him of his most mercifull goodnes to do, in time shalbe clearly extinct ) and for that also that syr Thomas More ( the author of these workes ) whyle he lyued, dyd beare to wardes your highnesse a speciall zeale, an entier affec tion, and reuerent deuocion: and on thother syde lyke wyse your grace ( as it is well known ) had to wardes him in his life time, a beneuolent mynde and synguler fauoure, not onelye for his great leānyng, but also for his moch more vertue. And I am fully perswaded, y your highnes good affe ctiō to wardes him, is no whyt mynysshed now after his death, but rather by his worthy workes and godly ende more and more encreased, who now ( beyng with almyghtie G O D, and lyuynge in heauen with hym ) with muche greater zeale and deuocion to wardes your maiestie, than he had whyle he lyued here in earth, ceaseth not to praye to God for the kinges maiestie, for your hyghnesse, your subiectes, your realmes, and domynions, and for the common welth, and catholyke religion of the same, and for all christen realmes also. And this comodious and profytable boke thus beyng dedicated vnto your hyghnes, I your obedient subiect most hum blye praye and besече your maiestie, to be the patrone and defendour of the same, wherby I am well assured, it shall muche the rather, be ioyously embraced and had in estymacion of all trew Englyshe hartes.

This booke was founde by Barb. Toppe Luff in Mr. The Wines studdye amongs other booke at Greenstreet. Sir Wayfarers house. the 30th of Aprill 1582. was apprehended. the 30th of Aprill 1582.

To the right worshipfull M<sup>r</sup>
William Roper

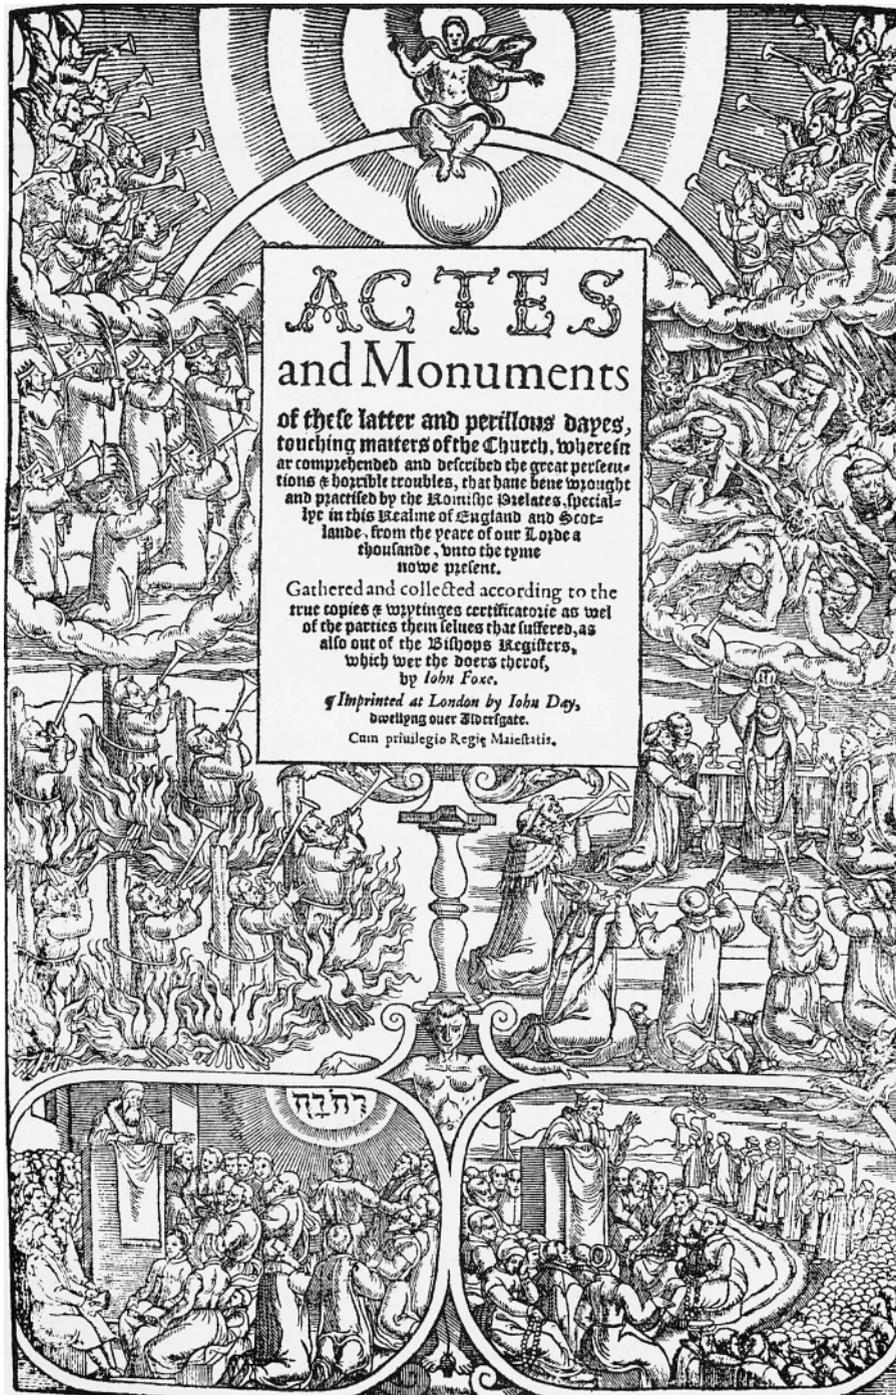

100
14.24

It is and hath bene an old and most ammittent custome, not onely among the Christians, but longe also before Christes tyme, at newyered tyme, every man according to his abilitie to visite and gratifit with some present his speciall frendes and patrones. Certeinly be to this custome, I saw at this tyme (being furnished with no worldly treasure to offer you any rich punction yf I present your worshippen even with a paper newyered yf I but yet might, as I trust, for the devotion of my poore heart toward your worshippen. I shalbe no lesse acceptable, then was the cythe of water presented once by a poore man to one of the kinges of Persia, where the custome was for every man to wechout and hande the kinges fist coming into their quarters with some costly yf. M<sup>r</sup> with what wish yf I see, the you may considering the plaint homely dealing, and great and gratefull you will of the saide poore man, not onely take in good grace, but make more attempt of, then of his rich and punction yf I see. M<sup>r</sup> herefort I trust, and little doubt, knowing the goodnes of your gentle nature, and considering the matter comprised in this booke, being the life of the worthy S<sup>t</sup> Thomas More knight, but that ye will of your part, in wher you part take and accept this my present. Neither am I so carefull of the acceptation on yo behalfe, as I am afraid on my owne behalfe, least by my differnt handling, some part of the worthines of this man may seeme to some men to be somewhat impaired blemished, or defaced: for I saw not so well like of my selfe, or stande so muche in mine owne conceipt, that I take my selfe the meetest man to take such an enterprise in hande, I doe well remember, that the great famous King Alexander went in to a tournament, that no man shoulde take his image, but that renowned carver Phidias: no man paint his image, but the excellent Painter Apelles, thinking that otherwise it woulde be some disparaging to himselfe and his image. Some muche the more ought the lives image of this worthy man, (whom not his face more being never so artificially and exquisitely set forth, but his notable doynes and saynges doo to be most exactly represent) to be by some singular artificer and workeman set

LIFE AND DEATH OF SIR THOMAS MORE, KNIGHT

by Nicholas Harpsfield (ca. 1557)

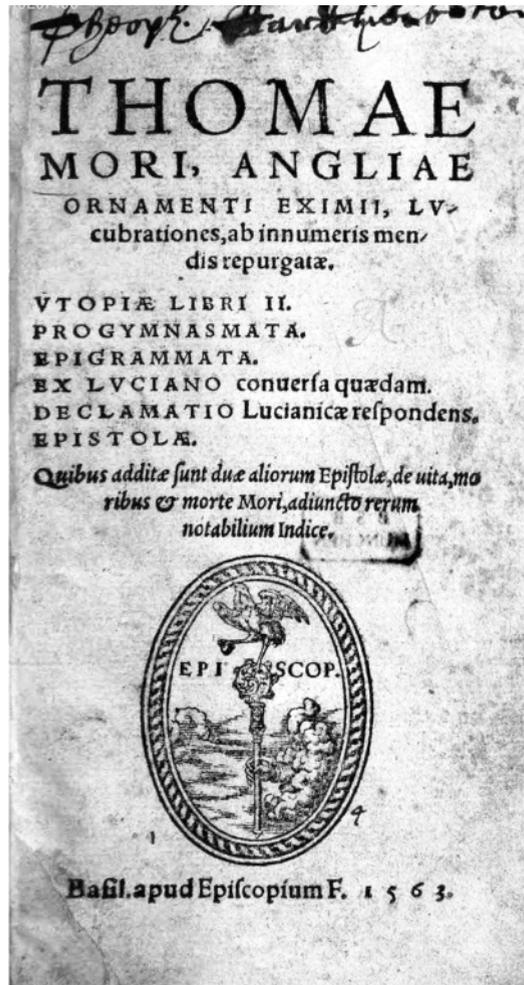

This manuscript copy of Nicholas Harpsfield's Life and Death of Sir Thomas More was taken, as indicated by the note at top, "from Mr. Thomas More's study among other books at Greenstreet, Mr. Wayfarer's house, when Mr. More [of Barnborough, grandson of Sir Thomas More] was apprehended the xiiith of April 1582." Although Harpsfield completed this biography ca. 1557, it was not published until 1932. Indebted to William Roper's recollections, Harpsfield's Life presents More as both a spiritual and secular figure. Harpsfield's More is the first English martyr among the laity, who serves as an "ambassador" and "messenger" to them. In his conclusion, Harpsfield connects the sight of More's severed head on London Bridge to the death of Cicero centuries earlier: "A rueful and a pitiful spectacle for all good Citizens and other good Christians—and much more lamentable—to see their Christian English Cicero's head in such sort, then it was to the Romans to see the head of Marcus Tullius Cicero set up in the same City and place where he had, by his great eloquent orations, preserved many an innocent from imminent danger and peril, and had preserved the whole City, by his great industry, from the mischievous conspiracy of Catiline and his seditious accomplices."

ACTS AND MONUMENTS

by John Foxe (1563–83)

John Foxe's Acts and Monuments, commonly known as Foxe's Book of Martyrs, was published in English in 1563, 1570, 1576, and 1583, in editions ranging from 1,800 large folio pages to 2,300 pages. Foxe presents Thomas More as a "hunter of heretics" whose "blind devotion" eventually brought the axe down "upon his own neck." Foxe's More is a tragic "over-reacher," "full of imaginations" and "too much given to mocking," a man who "could not tell his tale without laughing." Foxe withdrew, however, his harshest criticisms of More from his second edition, acknowledging those charges as false. He strongly maintained, however, that More pretended "falsely to face us out" about Thomas Bilney's recanting at his death, a death More authorized as Lord Chancellor. Despite his criticisms, Foxe called More "a man otherwise of pregnant wit . . . for his learning above the common sort of his estate: esteemed industrious no less in his studies than well exercised in his pen."

THOMAE MORI LUCUBRATIONES

(1563)

Printed at Basle by the Froben Press in 1563, this first edition of Thomas More's Latin works included the most famous literary works, except Richard III, and sixteen letters mostly of Erasmus and More. A folio of 608 pages from Erasmus's famous printer, Lucubrations has been said to represent the "Erasmian, humanist More." It contains the first printed edition of More's 1515 Letter to Dorp, defending Erasmus.

THOMÆ MORI
ANGLI, VIRI ERVDI-TIONIS PARITER AC VIR-TVTIS NOMINE CLARISSI-MI, ANGLIÆQVE OLIM
CANCELLARIJ,

Omnia, quæ hucusque ad manus nostras peruenerunt, Latina Opera;
quorum aliqua nunc primum in lucem prodeunt, reliqua verò multo quàm antea castigiora.

HORVM OMNIVM ELENCHVM
Pagina duodecima confirmabit.

LOVANIJ;
Apud Ioannem Bogardum sub Biblijs
Aureis, Anno 1565.

THOMÆ MORI OPERA OMNIA
(1565, 1566)

Thomas More's Latin works were published in Louvain in 1565 and again in 1566. The next and only other collected edition of the Latin works was printed in Frankfurt, Germany, in 1689. The title above in translation is THOMAS MORE / THE ENGLISHMAN, A MAN / FOR BOTH LEARNING AND VIRTUE / MOST RENOWNED, AND FORMERLY / CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND: / All his Latin writings which have up until now come into our hands; / of which some are now published for the first time, and the rest / much more correctly printed than before / OF ALL THESE WORKS A COMPLETE INDEX / Is displayed, beginning on page twelve. LOUVAIN / Johannes Bogardus, "Golden Books" / 1565 A.D.

TRES THOMAE.

SEV

De S. THOMÆ Apostoli rebus gestis.

De S. THOMA Archiepiscopo Cantuariensi & Martyre.

D. THOMÆ MORI Angliæ quondam Cancellarij VITA.

His adiecta est ORATIO FVNEBRIS in laudem R. P. Arnoldi de Ganthois Abbatis Marchbennensis.

AVTHORE
THOMA STAPLETONO ANGLO
S. Theolog. Doctore.

Summa rerum singularium CAPITA pag. post epistolam dedicatoriam proxima indicantur.

D V A C I,
Ex officina Ioannis Bogardi
M D C LXXXVIII.

VITA THOMAE MORI

by Thomas Stapleton (1588)

In 1588, Thomas Stapleton published the biographies of Three Thomases: the apostle St. Thomas, the English Archbishop St. Thomas Becket, and the “sometime English Chancellor” Thomas More. Stapleton had access to the More family, and this biography is the sole source for many of the personal letters that Thomas More wrote. Stapleton’s goal is to display “the greatness of More” and his “high excellence in all virtue and knowledge,” through a “thoroughly authentic account of Thomas More’s life, and the true cause, the manner, and the circumstances of his martyrdom.” Drawing on “abundant authentic information” and written after a review of “all contemporary writers” who commented on More’s life, Stapleton describes his book as “a complete and even worthy history” of More, one that manifests “the power of truth, the radiance of piety, and the light of justice.” Stapleton argues that More is his country’s “chief glory,” and Stapleton’s Life would be one of the sources of the Elizabethan play Sir Thomas More.

THE BOOK OF SIR THOMAS MORE<sup>1</sup>

by Anthony Munday, Henry Chettle, Thomas Decker, Thomas Heywood, William Shakespeare

[Censor Edmund Tilney, Master of Revels, writes:]
Leave out the insurrection wholly and the cause thereof, and begin with Sir Thomas More at the Mayor's sessions, with a report afterwards of his good service done being Sheriff of London upon a mutiny against the Lombards—only a short report, and not otherwise, at your own perils.

E. Tilney

I.I

Enter at one end John Lincoln with George Betts and clown Ralph Betts together; at the other end enters Francis de Barde, and Doll Williamson, a lusty woman, he haling her by the arm.

DOLL

Whither wilt thou hale<sup>2</sup> me?

BARDE

Whither I please; thou art my prize and I plead purchase of thee.

DOLL

5 Purchase of me? Away ye rascal! I am an honest, plain carpenter's wife and though I have no beauty to like a husband, yet whatsoever is mine scorns to stoop to a stranger. Hand off then when I bid thee!

BARDE

Go with me quietly, or I'll compel thee.

DOLL

10 Compel me, ye dog's face? Thou think'st thou hast the goldsmith's wife in hand, whom thou enticed'st from her husband with all his plate, and when thou turned'st her home to him again, mad'st him, like an ass, pay for his wife's board.

BARDE

So will I make thy husband too, if please me.

Enter Caveler with a pair of doves, Williamson the carpenter and Sherwin following him.

DOLL

Here he comes himself; tell him so if thou dar'st. 15

CAVELER [To Williamson.]

Follow me no further; I say thou shalt not have them.

WILLIAMSON

I bought them in Cheapside,<sup>3</sup> and paid my money for them.

SHERWIN

He did, sir, indeed, and you offer him wrong, 20 both to take them from him and not restore him his money neither.

CAVELER

If he paid for them, let it suffice that I possess them. Beef and brewis<sup>4</sup> may serve such hinds. Are pigeons meat for a coarse<sup>5</sup> carpenter? 25

LINCOLN [Aside to George Betts.]

It is hard when Englishmen's patience must be thus jetted<sup>6</sup> on by strangers, and they not dare to revenge their own wrongs.

GEORGE BETTS [Aside to Lincoln.]

Lincoln, let's beat them down, and bear no more of these abuses. 30

LINCOLN [Aside to George Betts.]

We may not, Betts. Be patient and hear more.

DOLL

How now, husband? What, one stranger take thy food from thee, and another thy wife? By'r Lady, flesh and blood, I think, can hardly brook that.

LINCOLN

Will this gear<sup>7</sup> never be otherwise? Must these 35 wrongs be thus endured?

GEORGE BETTS

Let us step in, and help to revenge their injury.

<sup>1</sup> The primary basis for this edition is W. W. Greg's The Book of Sir Thomas More (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1911).

For the best scholarly edition, see John Jowett's Sir Thomas More (London: Arden Shakespeare, 2011). <sup>2</sup> pull along forcibly

<sup>3</sup> London's main food market <sup>4</sup> broth or broth-soaked bread <sup>5</sup> common <sup>6</sup> encroached upon <sup>7</sup> business

BARDE

What art thou that talkst of revenge? My Lord
Ambassador shall once more make your Mayor 40 have a check if he punish thee not for this saucy presumption.

WILLIAMSON

Indeed, my Lord Mayor, on the Ambassador's complaint, sent me to Newgate<sup>8</sup> one day because (against my will) I took the wall<sup>9</sup> of a stranger. You 45 may do anything. The goldsmith's wife, and mine now, must be at your commandment.

GEORGE BETTS

The more patient fools are ye both to suffer it.

BARDE

Suffer it? Mend it thou or he if ye can or dare. I tell thee, fellow, an<sup>10</sup> she were the Mayor of London's wife, had I her once in my possession, I would 50 keep her in spite of him that durst say nay.

GEORGE BETTS

I tell thee, Lombard, these words should cost thy best cap,<sup>11</sup> were I not curbed by duty and obedience.
The Mayor of London's wife? O God, shall it be 55 thus?

DOLL

Why, Betts, am not I as dear to my husband as my Lord Mayor's wife to him? [To Williamson.] And wilt thou so neglectly suffer thine own shame? [To de Barde.] Hands off, proud stranger, or by him that 60 bought me, if men's milky hearts dare not strike a stranger, yet women will beat them down, ere they bear these abuses.

BARDE

Mistress, I say you shall along with me.

DOLL

Touch not Doll Williamson, lest she lay thee 65 along on God's dear earth. [To Caveler.] And you, sir, that allow such coarse cates<sup>12</sup> to carpenters, whilst pigeons which they pay for must serve your dainty appetite: deliver them back to my husband again or I'll call so many women to mine assistance, 70 as we'll not leave one inch untorn of thee. If our husbands must be bridled by law, and forced to bear your wrongs, their wives will be a little lawless, and soundly beat ye.

CAVELER

Come away, de Bard, and let us go complain to my Lord Ambassador. Exeunt both. 75

DOLL

Ay, go, and send him among us, and we'll give him his welcome too. I am ashamed that freeborn Englishmen, having beaten strangers within their own bounds, should thus be braved and abused by them at home. 80

SHERWIN

It is not our lack of courage in the cause, but the strict obedience that we are bound to. I am the goldsmith whose wrongs you talked of, but how to redress yours or mine own is a matter beyond all our abilities. 85

LINCOLN

Not so, not so, my good friends. I, though a mean man, a broker by profession and named John Lincoln, have long time winked at these vile enormities with mighty impatience, and, as these two brethren here, Bettses by name, can witness, with loss of mine 90 own life would gladly remedy them.

GEORGE BETTS

And he is in a good forwardness,<sup>13</sup> I tell ye, if all hit right.

DOLL

As how, I prithee? Tell it to Doll Williamson.

LINCOLN

You know the Spital sermons<sup>14</sup> begin the next 95 week. I have drawn a bill of our wrongs, and the strangers' insolencies.

GEORGE BETTS

Which he means the preachers shall there openly publish in the pulpit.

WILLIAMSON

Oh, but that they would! I'faith it would tickle<sup>15</sup> 100 our strangers thoroughly.

DOLL

Ay, and if you men durst not undertake it, before

<sup>8</sup> London's main prison <sup>9</sup> i.e., took the privilege of walking near the wall (the cleaner and safer side of the pavement)

<sup>10</sup> if <sup>11</sup> best cap: head <sup>12</sup> provisions <sup>13</sup> eagerness <sup>14</sup> Spital sermons: Sermons preached on Easter Monday and Tuesday from a special pulpit at St. Mary's Spital outside of Bishopsgate, London <sup>15</sup> vex, provoke

God we women will. Take an honest woman from her husband? Why, it is intolerable!

SHERWIN [To Lincoln.]

105 But how find ye the preachers affected to it?

LINCOLN

110 Master Doctor Standish [will not meddle with such matter in his sermon, but Master Doctor Beale promised that he will undertake to]<sup>16</sup> reform it and doubts not but happy success will ensue upon our wrongs. You shall perceive there's no hurt in the bill; here's a copy of it. I pray ye hear it.

ALL

With all our hearts; for God's sake, read it.

LINCOLN (Reads.)

115 "To you all the worshipful lords and masters of this city that will take compassion over the poor people your neighbors, and also of the great importable hurts, losses, and hindrances whereof proceedeth extreme poverty to all the King's subjects that inhabit within this city and suburbs of the same. For so it is that aliens and strangers eat the bread from the fatherless children, and take the living from all the artificers, and the intercourse from all merchants, whereby poverty is so much increased that every man bewaileth the misery of other, for craftsmen be brought to beggary, and merchants to neediness. Wherefore, the premises considered, the redress must be of the commons,<sup>17</sup> knit and united to one part. And as the hurt and damage grieveth all men, so must all men set to their willing power for remedy, and not suffer the said aliens in their wealth, and the natural born men of this region to come to confusion."

DOLL

Before God, 'tis excellent, and I'll maintain the suit to be honest.

SHERWIN

135 Well, say 'tis read, what is your further meaning in the matter?

GEORGE BETTS

What? Marry, list to me. No doubt but this will store us with friends enough, whose names we will 140 closely keep in writing, and on May Day<sup>18</sup> next in the morning we'll go forth a-Maying, but make it the worst May Day for the strangers that ever they saw. How say ye? Do ye subscribe, or are ye faint-hearted revolvers?

DOLL

145 Hold thee, George Betts, there's my hand and my heart; by the Lord, I'll make a captain among ye, and do somewhat to be talk of<sup>19</sup> for ever after.

WILLIAMSON

My masters, ere we part, let's friendly go and drink together, and swear true secrecy upon our lives.

GEORGE BETTS

There spake an angel; come, let us along then.

Exeunt.

1.2

An arras is drawn, and behind it (as in sessions) sit the Lord Mayor, Justice Suresby, and other justices, Sheriff More and the other sheriff sitting by; Smart is the plaintiff, Lifter the prisoner at the bar.

LORD MAYOR

Having dispatched our weightier businesses,
We may give ear to petty felonies.
Master Sheriff More, what is this fellow?

MORE

My lord, he stands indicted for a purse.
He hath been tried; the jury is together.

5

LORD MAYOR

Who sent him in?

SURESBY

That did I, my lord.

Had he had right, he had been hanged ere this,
The only captain of the cutpurse crew.

LORD MAYOR

What is his name?

SURESBY

10 As his profession is: Lifter, my lord,
One that can lift a purse right cunningly.

<sup>16</sup> This emendation follows Vittorio Gabrieli and Giorgio Melchiori's reconstruction in Sir Thomas More (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1990). Here and occasionally throughout, a portion of the manuscript is missing or damaged. <sup>17</sup> commoners <sup>18</sup> May Day: the first of May. This particular May-Day would come to be known as Ill or Evil May-Day, as is indicated later at 2.1. <sup>19</sup> somewhat to be talk of: something to be talked about

LORD MAYOR

And is that he<sup>20</sup> accuses him?

SURESBY

The same, my lord, whom, by your honor's leave,
I must say somewhat to,<sup>21</sup> because I find 15 In some respects he is well worthy blame.

LORD MAYOR

Good Master Justice Suresby, speak your mind.
We are well pleased to give you audience.

SURESBY

Hear me, Smart. Thou art a foolish fellow.
If Lifter be convicted by the law,
20 As I see not how the jury can acquit him,
I'll stand to't thou art guilty of his death.

MORE [To Lord Mayor.]

My lord, that's worth the hearing.

LORD MAYOR

Listen then, good Master More.

SURESBY [To Smart.]

I tell thee plain, it is a shame for thee
25 With such a sum to tempt necessity.
No less than ten pounds, sir, will serve your turn
To carry in your purse about with ye,
To crack and brag in taverns of your money?
I promise ye, a man that goes abroad
30 With an intent of truth, meeting such a booty,
May be provoked to that he never meant.
What makes so many pilferers and felons
But such fond baits that foolish people lay
To tempt the needy miserable wretch?
35 Ten pounds odd<sup>22</sup> money, this is a pretty sum
To bear about, which were more safe at home.
Lord Mayor and More whisper.
'Fore God, 'twere well to fine ye as much more
To the relief of the poor prisoners,
To teach ye be [more mindful of]<sup>23</sup> your own.

MORE

40 Good my lord, soothe a [little jest]<sup>24</sup> for once,
Only to try conclusions in this case.

MAYOR

Content, good Master More. We'll rise awhile
And till the jury can return their verdict
Walk in the garden. How say ye, justices?

ALL JUSTICES

We like it well, my lord; we'll follow ye. 45
Exeunt Lord Mayor and justices.

MORE

Nay, plaintiff, go you too; Exit Smart.
and, officers,
Stand you aside, and leave the prisoner
To me awhile. Exeunt all but More and Lifter
Lifter, come hither.

LIFTER

What is your worship's pleasure?

MORE

Sirrah, you know that you are known to me 50
And I have often saved ye from this place Since first I came in office. Thou seest beside That Justice Suresby is thy heavy friend,
For all the blame that he pretends to Smart
For tempting thee with such a sum of money. 55
I tell thee what: devise me but a means
To pick or cut his purse, and on my credit
And as I am a Christian and a man,
I will procure thy pardon for that jest.

LIFTER

Good Master Shrieve,<sup>25</sup> seek not my overthrow. 60
You know, sir, I have many heavy friends
And more indictments like to come upon me.
You are too deep for me to deal withal;
You are known to be one of the wisest men
That is in England. I pray ye, Master Sheriff, 65
Go not about to undermine my life.

MORE

Lifter, I am true subject to my king.
Thou much mistak'st me, and for thou shalt not think
I mean by this to hurt thy life at all,
I will maintain<sup>26</sup> the act when thou hast done it. 70
Thou knowst there are such matters in my hands
As, if I pleased to give them to the jury,
I should not need this way to circumvent<sup>27</sup> thee.
All that I aim at is a merry jest.
Perform it, Lifter, and expect my best. 75

LIFTER

I thank you worship; God preserve your life.

20 he who 21 somewhat to: something about 22 or so 23 John Shirley's emendation in Sir Thomas More (Goulden, 1938) 24 Shirley's emendation

25 Sheriff 26 uphold 27 entrap

SURESBY

In plainer English, Lifter, if my purse
Be stored<sup>33</sup> or no?

LIFTER

Ye have it, sir.

SURESBY

Excellent, excellent.

LIFTER

135 Then, sir, you cannot but for manners' sake
Walk on with him, for he will walk your way,
Alleging either you have much forgot him,
Or he mistakes you.

SURESBY

But in this time has he my purse or no?

LIFTER

140 Not yet, sir, fie! [Aside.] No, nor I have not yours.
[He takes Suresby's purse.]
Enter Lord Mayor, etc.
But now we must forbear; my lords return.

SURESBY

A murrain<sup>34</sup> on't! Lifter, we'll more anon.
Ay, thou sayst true; there are shrewd knaves indeed.

He sits down.

145 But let them gull me, widgeon me, rook me, fop me,<sup>35</sup>
I'faith, i'faith, they are too short for me.
Knaves and fools meet when purses go;
Wise men look to their purses well enough.

MORE (Aside.)

Lifter, is it done?

LIFTER (Aside.)

Done, Master Shrieve, and there it is.

MORE (Aside.)

Then build upon my word, I'll save thy life.

RECORDER

150 Lifter, stand to the bar.
The jury have returned thee guilty; thou must die.
According to the custom, look to it, Master Shrieve.

MAYOR

Then gentlemen, as you are wont to do,
Because as yet we have no burial place,

What charity your meaning's to bestow
Toward burial of the prisoners now condemned, Let it be given. There is first for me.

155

RECORDER

And there's for me.

ANOTHER

And me.

SURESBY

Body of me, my purse is gone!

MORE

Gone, sir? What, here? How can that be? 160

MAYOR

Against all reason, sitting on the bench?

SURESBY

Lifter, I talked with you. You have not lifted me, ha?

LIFTER

Suspect ye me, sir? Oh what a world is this!

MORE

But hear ye, Master Suresby, are ye sure
Ye had a purse about ye? 165

SURESBY

Sure, Master Shrieve? As sure as you are there,
And in it seven pounds odd money, on my faith.

MORE

Seven pounds odd money? What, were you so mad,
Being a wise man and a magistrate,
To trust your purse with such a liberal sum? 170
Seven pounds odd money? 'Fore God it is a shame

With such a sum to tempt necessity.

I promise ye, a man that goes abroad
With an intent of truth, meeting such a booty,<sup>36</sup>
May be provoked to that he never thought. 175
What makes so many pilferers and felons,
But these fond baits that foolish people lay
To tempt the needy miserable wretch?
Should he be taken now that has your purse,
I'd stand to't, you are guilty of his death, 180
For questionless he would be cast by law.

'Twere a good deed to fine ye as much more

To the relief of the poor prisoners,
To teach ye lock your money up at home.

SURESBY

185 Well, Master More, you are a merry man.
I find<sup>37</sup> ye, sir, I find ye well enough.

MORE

Nay, ye shall see, sir, trusting thus your money,
And Lifter here in trial for like case,
But that the poor man is a prisoner,
190 It would be now suspected that he had it.
Thus may ye see what mischief often comes
By the fond carriage of such needless sums.

MAYOR

Believe me, Master Suresby, this is strange.
You, being a man so settled in assurance,
195 Will fall in that which you condemned in other.

MORE

Well, Master Suresby, there's your purse again,
And all your money. Fear nothing of More:
Wisdom still [doth bid ye watch]<sup>38</sup> the door.

Exeunt.

1.3

Enter the Earls of Shrewsbury and Surrey, Sir Thomas Palmer and Sir Roger Cholmley.

SHREWSBURY

My Lord of Surrey, and Sir Thomas Palmer, Might I with patience tempt your grave advice?
I tell ye true, that in these dangerous times
I do not like this frowning vulgar brow.
5 My searching eye did never entertain
A more distracted countenance of grief
Than I have late observed
In the displeasèd commons of the city.

SURREY

'Tis strange, that from his princely clemency,
10 So well a tempered mercy and a grace
To all the aliens in this fruitful land,
That this high crested<sup>39</sup> insolence should spring
From them that breathe from his majestic bounty,
That, fattened with the traffic<sup>40</sup> of our country,
15 Already leap into his subjects' face.

PALMER

Yet Sherwin, hindered to commence his suit Against de Bard, by the Ambassador
By supplication made unto the King,
Who, having first enticed away his wife
And got his plate, near worth four hundred pound, 20
To grieve some wronged citizens that found
This vile disgrace oft cast into their teeth,
Of late sues Sherwin, and arrested him
For money for the boarding of his wife.

SURREY

The more knave Barde, that, using Sherwin's goods, 25
Doth ask him interest for the occupation.<sup>41</sup>
I like not that, my Lord of Shrewsbury.
He's ill bestead<sup>42</sup> that lends a well paced horse
Unto a man that will not find him meat.

CHOLMLEY

My Lord of Surrey will be pleasant still. 30

PALMER

I being then employed by your honors
To stay the broil<sup>43</sup> that fell about the same,
Where by persuasion I enforced the wrongs
And urged the grief of the displeasèd city,
He answered me, and with a solemn oath, 35
That, if he had the Mayor of London's wife,
He would keep her in despite of any English.<sup>44</sup>

SURREY

'Tis good, Sir Thomas, then, for you and me
Your wife is dead and I a bachelor.
If no man can possess his wife alone, 40
I am glad, Sir Thomas Palmer, I have none.

CHOLMLEY

If 'a<sup>45</sup> take my wife, 'a shall find her meat.

SURREY

And reason good, Sir Roger Cholmley, too.
If these hot Frenchmen needsly<sup>46</sup> will have sport,
They should in kindness yet defray the charge. 45
'Tis hard when men possess our wives in quiet
And yet leave us in to discharge<sup>47</sup> their diet.

SHREWSBURY

My lord, our caters<sup>48</sup> shall not use the market

37 understand 38 Shirley's emendation
39 proud 40 commerce 41 use

42 situated 43 quarrel 44 Tilney strikes out "English" and adds "man." 45 he 46 necessarily 47 pay for 48 servants in charge of ordering supplies for a household

For our provision, but some stranger<sup>49</sup> now
 50 Will take the victuals from him he hath bought.
 A carpenter, as I was late informed,
 Who, having bought a pair of doves in Cheap,
 Immediately a Frenchman<sup>50</sup> took them from him
 And beat the poor man for resisting him;
 55 And when the fellow did complain his wrongs,
 He was severely punished for his labour.

SURREY

But if the English blood be once but up,
 As I perceive their hearts already full,
 I fear me much, before their spleens be cold,
 60 Some of these saucy aliens for their pride
 Will pay for't soundly, wheresoe'er it lights.
 This tide of rage, that with the eddy strives,
 I fear me much will drown too many lives.

CHOLMLEY

Now afore God, your honors, pardon me.
 65 Men of your place and greatness are to blame—
 I tell ye true, my lords—in that his Majesty
 Is not informal<sup>51</sup> of this base abuse,
 And daily wrongs are offered to his subjects,
 For if he were, I know his gracious wisdom 70 Would soon redress it.

Enter a messenger.

SHREWSBURY

Sirrah, what news?

CHOLMLEY

None good, I fear.

MESSENGER

My lord, ill news, and worse I fear will follow
 If speedily it be not looked unto.
 The city is in an uproar and the Mayor
 75 Is threatened if he come out of his house.
 A number of poor artificers<sup>52</sup> [are out Inflamed to kill the hated aliens.]<sup>53</sup>

[CHOLMLEY]

['Twas to be] feared what this would come unto.
 This follows on the doctor's publishing
 80 The bill of wrongs in public at the Spital.

SHREWSBURY

That Doctor Beale may chance beshrew<sup>54</sup> himself
 For reading of the bill.

PALMER

Let us go gather forces to the Mayor
 For quick suppressing this rebellious rout.

SURREY

Now I bethink myself of Master More, 85
 One of the sheriffs, a wise and learned gentleman,
 And in especial favor with the people.
 He, backed with other grave and sober men,
 May by his gentle and persuasive speech
 Perhaps prevail more than we can with power. 90

SHREWSBURY

Believe me but your honor well advises.
 Let us make haste, or I do greatly fear
 Some to their graves this morning's work will bear. Exeunt.

2.1

Enter Lincoln, George and Clown Bettses, Williamson, Sherwin and other armed, Doll in a shirt of mail, a headpiece, sword and buckler, a crew attending.

CLOWN BETTS

Come, come; we'll tickle their turnips; we'll butter their boxes!<sup>55</sup> Shall strangers rule the roost? Yes, but we'll baste the roast. Come, come; a flaunt, a flaunt.<sup>56</sup>

GEORGE BETTS

Brother, give place and hear John Lincoln speak. 5

CLOWN BETTS

Ay, Lincoln my leader,
 And Doll my true breeder,
 With the rest of our crew
 Shall ran-tan-tarra-ran.
 Do all they what they can, 10
 Shall we be bobbed, braved?<sup>57</sup> No.
 Shall we be held under? No.
 We are free-born
 And do take scorn
 To be used so! 15

DOLL

Peace there, I say! Hear Captain Lincoln speak!
 Keep silence till we know his mind at large.

49 Tilney adds "Lombard" and strikes out "stranger." 50 Tilney adds "Lombard" and strikes out "Frenchman."

51 informed 52 craftsmen 53 Shirley's emendation, and the next 54 blame 55 tickle... boxes: beat them up 56 display oneself ostentatiously 57 bobbed, braved: beaten

CLOWN BETTS [To Lincoln.]

Then largely deliver. Speak, bully,<sup>58</sup> and he that presumes to interrupt thee in thy oration, this for 20 him!

LINCOLN

Then, gallant bloods, you whose free souls do scorn
To bear th'enforcèd wrongs of aliens,
Add rage to resolution; fire the houses
Of these audacious strangers! This is St. Martin's, 25 And yonder dwells Meautis, a wealthy Picardy,
At the Green Gate,
De Bard, Peter van Hollock, Adrian Martin,
With many more outlandish fugitives.
Shall these enjoy more privilege than we
In our own country? Let's then become their 30 slaves!
Since justice keeps not them in greater awe,
We'll be ourselves rough ministers at law.

CLOWN BETTS

Use no more swords,
Nor no more words,
35 But fire the houses!
Brave Captain Courageous,
Fire me their houses!

DOLL

Ay, for we may as well make bonfires on May Day as at Midsummer<sup>59</sup>; we'll alter the day in the calen-40 dar, and set it down in flaming letters.

SHERWIN

Stay! That would much endanger the whole city, whereto I would not the least prejudice.

DOLL

No, nor I neither—so may mine own house be burned for company. I'll tell ye what: we'll drag the 45 strangers out into Moorfields, and there bombast them till they stink again.

CLOWN BETTS

And that's soon done, for they smell for fear already.

GEORGE BETTS

Let some of us enter the strangers' houses,
50 And if we find them there, then bring them forth.

DOLL

But if ye bring them forth ere ye find them, I'll never allow of that.

CLOWN BETTS

Now, Mars, for thy honor,
Dutch or French,
So it be a wench, 55
I'll upon her.
[Exeunt Clown, Sherwin, and others.]

WILLIAMSON

Now lads, how shall we labor in our safety?
I hear the Mayor hath gathered men in arms
And that Shrieve More an hour ago received
Some of the Privy Council in at Ludgate. 60 Force now must make our peace or else we fall.
'Twill soon be known we are the principal.<sup>60</sup>

DOLL

And what of that? If thou be'st afraid, husband, go home again and hide thy head for, by the Lord, I'll have a little sport now I am at it. 65

GEORGE BETTS

Let's stand upon our guard, and if they come Receive them as they were our enemies.
Enter Sherwin and the rest.

CLOWN BETTS

A purchase, a purchase!<sup>61</sup> We have found, we ha' found—

DOLL

What? 70

CLOWN BETTS

Nothing, not a French Fleming nor a Fleming
French to be found, but all fled, in plain English.

LINCOLN

How now, have you found any?

SHERWIN

No, not one; they're all fled.

LINCOLN

Then fire the houses, that, the Mayor being busy 75
About the quenching of them, we may 'scape.
Burn down their kennels; let us, straight away,
Lest this day prove to us an ill May Day.

CLOWN BETTS

Fire, fire! I'll be the first.
 80 If hanging come, 'tis welcome; that's the worst.
Exeunt.

2.2

Enter Sheriff More and the Lord Mayor.

MAYOR

What, Sir John Munday, are you hurt?

SIR JOHN

A little knock, my lord. There was even now
 A sort of prentices playing at cudgels.
 I did command them to their masters' houses,
 5 But one of them, backed by the other crew,
 Wounded me in the forehead with his cudget;
 And now, I fear me, they are gone to join With Lincoln, Sherwin, and their dangerous train.<sup>62</sup>

MORE

The captains of this insurrection
 10 Have ta'en themselves to arms, and came but now
 To both the Counters,<sup>63</sup> where they have released Sundry indebted prisoners, and from thence
 I hear that they are gone into St Martin's,
 Where they intend to offer violence
 15 To the amazed Lombards. Therefore, my lord,
 If we expect the safety of the city,
 'Tis time that force or parley do encounter
 With these displeasèd men.

Enter a messenger.

MAYOR

How now, what news?

MESSENGER

My lord, the rebels have broke open Newgate,
 20 From whence they have delivered many prisoners,
 Both felons and notorious murderers,
 That desperately cleave to their lawless train.

MAYOR

Up with the drawbridge; gather some forces
 To Cornhill and Cheapside. And, gentlemen, 25 If diligence be used on every side,
 A quiet ebb will follow this rough tide.
Enter Shrewsbury, Surrey, Palmer, Cholmley.

SHREWSBURY

Lord Mayor, his Majesty, receiving notice
 Of this most dangerous insurrection,
 Hath sent my Lord of Surrey and myself,
 Sir Thomas Palmer and our followers 30
 To add unto your forces our best means
 For pacifying of this mutiny.
 In God's name, then, set on with happy speed.<sup>64</sup>
 The King laments if one true subject bleed.

SURREY

I hear they mean to fire the Lombards' houses. 35
 O power, what art thou in a madman's eyes?
 Thou mak'st the plodding idiot bloody-wise.

MORE

My lords, I doubt not but we shall appease
 With a calm breath this flux<sup>65</sup> of discontent.

PALMER

To call them to a parley questionless 40
 May fall out good. 'Tis well said, Master More.

MORE

Let's to these simple men, for many sweat
 Under this act that knows not the law's debt
 Which hangs upon their lives. For silly<sup>66</sup> men
 Plod on they know not how; like a fool's pen 45
 That ending shows not any sentence writ
 Linked but to common reason or slightest wit.
 These follow for no harm, but yet incur
 Self penalty with those that raised this stir.
 I' God's name on, to calm our private foes 50
 With breath of gravity, not dangerous blows.

Exeunt.

2.3<sup>67</sup>

*Enter Lincoln, Doll, Clown Betts, George Betts, [Sherwin,] Williamson, others,
 [and a sergeant-at-arms].*

LINCOLN

Peace, hear me! He that will not see a red herring at a Harry groat,<sup>68</sup> butter at eleven pence a pound, meal at nine shillings a bushel, and beef at four nobles<sup>69</sup> a stone, list to me.

<sup>62</sup> Tilney marks these opening lines for deletion. <sup>63</sup> debtors' prisons in London <sup>64</sup> success <sup>65</sup> flow <sup>66</sup> defenseless;

ignorant; deserving of pity <sup>67</sup> This scene is widely accepted to be in Shakespeare's hand. <sup>68</sup> Harry groat: a type of coin minted by Henry VIII <sup>69</sup> English gold coins

GEORGE BETTS

5 It will come to that pass, if strangers be suffered.
Mark him!

LINCOLN

Our country is a great eating country; argo,<sup>70</sup> they eat more in our country than they do in their own.

CLOWN BETTS

By a halfpenny loaf a day, troy weight.

LINCOLN

10 They bring in strange roots, which is merely to the undoing of our poor prentices,<sup>71</sup> for what's a sorry parsnip to a good heart?

WILLIAMSON

Trash, trash! They breed sore eyes, and 'tis enough to infect the city with the palsy.

LINCOLN

15 Nay, it has infected it with the palsy, for these bastards of dung—as you know they grow in dung—have infected us, and it is our infection will make the city shake, which partly comes through the eating of parsnips.

CLOWN BETTS

20 True, and pumpkins together.

SERGEANT

What say you to the mercy of the King?
Do you refuse it?

LINCOLN

25 You would have us upon th' hip,<sup>72</sup> would you? No, marry, do we not. We accept of the King's mercy, but we will show no mercy upon the strangers.

SERGEANT

You are the simplest things that ever stood
In such a question.

LINCOLN

How say you now? Prentices "simple"? Down with him!

ALL

30 Prentices simple? Prentices simple?
Enter the Lord Mayor, the Earl of Surrey, and the Earl of Shrewsbury.

SHERIFF

Hold, in the King's name, hold!

SURREY

Friends, masters, countrymen—

MAYOR

Peace ho, peace! I charge you, keep the peace.

SHREWSBURY

My masters, countrymen—

SHERWIN

The noble Earl of Shrewsbury, let's hear him.

GEORGE BETTS

We'll hear the Earl of Surrey.

35

LINCOLN

The Earl of Shrewsbury.

GEORGE BETTS

We'll hear both.

ALL

Both, both, both, both!

LINCOLN

Peace, I say peace! Are you men of wisdom, or what are you?

40

SURREY

What you will have them, but not men of wisdom.

SOME

We'll not hear my Lord of Surrey.

OTHERS

No, no, no, no, no! Shrewsbury, Shrewsbury!

MORE

Whiles they are o'er the bank of their obedience,
Thus will they bear down all things.

45

LINCOLN

Shrieve<sup>73</sup> More speaks. Shall we hear Shrieve More speak?

DOLL

Let's hear him. 'A<sup>74</sup> keeps a plentiful shrievaltry,<sup>75</sup> and 'a made my brother Arthur Watchins Sergeant Safe's yeoman. Let's hear Shrieve More!

50

ALL

Shrieve More, More, More, Shrieve More!

70 Lincoln's mistake for the Latin ergo (therefore) 71 apprentices

72 upon th' hip: at a disadvantage
73 Sheriff 74 He 75 Doll

mispronounces "shrievaltry," which is "the office of sheriff."

MORE

Even by the rule you have among yourselves,
Command still audience.

SOME

Surrey, Surrey!

OTHERS

55 More, More!

LINCOLN AND GEORGE BETTS

Peace! Peace! Silence! Peace!

MORE

You that have voice and credit with the number,
Command them to a stillness.

LINCOLN

60 A plague on them, they will not hold their peace.
The devil cannot rule them.

MORE

Then what a rough and riotous charge have you,
To lead those that the devil cannot rule.
Good masters, hear me speak.

DOLL

65 Ay, by th' Mass, will we. More, thou'rt a good housekeeper, and I thank thy good worship for my brother Arthur Watchins.

ALL

Peace, peace!

MORE

70 Look! What you do offend you cry upon:
That is, the peace. Not one of you here present,
Had there such fellows lived when you were babes
That could have topped<sup>76</sup> the peace as now you would,
The peace wherein you have till now grown up
Had been ta'en from you, and the bloody times Could not have brought you to the state of men.

75 Alas, poor things; what is it you have got,
Although we grant you get the thing you seek?

GEORGE BETTS

Marry, the removing of the strangers,<sup>77</sup> which cannot choose but much advantage the poor handicrafts<sup>78</sup> of the city.

MORE

Grant them removed, and grant that this your noise 80

Hath chid down all the majesty of England.

Imagine that you see the wretched strangers,
Their babies at their backs, with their poor luggage

Plodding to th' ports and coasts for transportation,

And that you sit as kings in your desires, 85

Authority quite silenced by your brawl,

And you in ruff<sup>79</sup> of your opinions clothed:

What had you got? I'll tell you. You had taught

How insolence and strong hand should prevail,

How order should be quelled, and by this pattern 90

Not one of you should live an aged man,

For other ruffians, as their fancies wrought —

With selfsame hand, self reasons, and self right —

Would shark<sup>80</sup> on you, and men, like ravenous fishes,

Would feed on one another. 95

DOLL

Before God, that's as true as the Gospel.

LINCOLN

Nay, this' a sound fellow, I tell you. Let's mark him.

MORE

Let me set up before your thoughts, good friends,

One supposition, which if you will mark 100

You shall perceive how horrible a shape

Your innovation<sup>81</sup> bears. First, 'tis a sin

Which oft th'apostle did forewarn us of,

Urging obedience to authority;

And 'twere no error if I told you all 105

You were in arms 'gainst God.

ALL

Marry, God forbid that!

MORE

Nay, certainly you are.

For, to the king, God hath his office lent

Of dread,<sup>82</sup> of justice, power, and command, 110

Hath bid him rule, and willed you to obey;

And to add ampler majesty to this,

He hath not only lent the king his figure,

His throne and sword, but given him his own name,

<sup>76</sup> beheaded; killed or destroyed
<sup>77</sup> foreigners <sup>78</sup> makers of handicrafts

<sup>79</sup> vainglory <sup>80</sup> prey <sup>81</sup> insurrection;
rebellion <sup>82</sup> respect, reverence

115 Calls him a god on earth. What do you, then,
Rising 'gainst him that God himself installs,
But rise 'gainst God? What do you to your souls
In doing this? Oh, desperate as you are,
Wash your foul minds with tears, and those same hands

120 That you, like rebels, lift against the peace
Lift up for peace, and your unreverent knees,
Make them your feet. To kneel to be forgiven
Is safer wars than ever you can make,
Whose discipline is riot.<sup>83</sup>

125 In, in, to your obedience! Why, even your hurly<sup>84</sup>
Cannot proceed but by obedience.

Tell me but this: What rebel captain,
As mutinies are incident,<sup>85</sup> by his name
Can still the rout? Who will obey a traitor?

130 Or how can well that proclamation sound
When there is no addition<sup>86</sup> but "a rebel"
To qualify<sup>87</sup> a rebel? You'll put down strangers, Kill them, cut their throats, possess their houses,
And lead the majesty of law in lym<sup>88</sup>

135 To slip<sup>89</sup> him like a hound — alas, alas!
Say now the King,
As he is clement if th'offender mourn,
Should so much come too short of your great trespass

140 As but to banish you: whither would you go?
What country, by the nature of your error,
Should give you harbor? Go you to France or Flanders,
To any German province, Spain or Portugal,
Nay, anywhere that not adheres to England — Why, you must needs be strangers. Would you be pleased

145 To find a nation of such barbarous temper
That, breaking out in hideous violence,
Would not afford you an abode on earth,
Whet their detested knives against your throats,
Spurn you like dogs, and like as if that God Owed<sup>90</sup> not nor made not you, nor that the elements

Were not all appropriate to your comforts,
But chartered unto<sup>91</sup> them? What would you think

To be thus used? This is the strangers' case,
And this your mountainish inhumanity.

ALL

Faith, 'a says true. Let's do as we may be done by.<sup>92</sup> 155

LINCOLN

We'll be ruled by you, Master More, if you'll stand our friend to procure our pardon.

MORE

Submit you to these noble gentlemen,
Entreat their mediation to the King,
Give up yourself to form, obey the magistrate, 160
And there's no doubt but mercy may be found,
If you so seek it.

ALL

We yield, and desire his Highness' mercy.
They lay by their weapons.

MORE

No doubt his Majesty will grant it you.
But you must yield to go to several prisons, 165
Till that his Highness' will be further known.

ALL

Most willingly, whither you will have us.

SHREWSBURY

Lord Mayor, let them be sent to several prisons,
And there in any case be well entreated.<sup>93</sup>
My Lord of Surrey, please you to take horse 170
And ride to Cheapside, where the aldermen
Are with their several companies in arms.
Will them to go unto their several wards,<sup>94</sup>
Both for the stay<sup>95</sup> of further mutiny,
And for the apprehending of such persons 175
As shall contend.

SURREY

I go, my noble lord.

Exit.

SHREWSBURY

We'll straight go tell his Highness these good news.
Withal,<sup>96</sup> Shrieve More, I'll tell him how your breath
Hath ransomed many a subject from sad death.
Exeunt Shrewsbury and Cholmley.

83 To kneel... riot: i.e., To repent your lack of discipline is the sounder war to wage.

84 commotion, tumult 85 likely to occur

86 identifying mark of one's occupation or rank 87 give recognized status to

88 a leash for hounds 89 release a hunting animal from a leash 90 owned

91 chartered unto: licensed to 92 See

Mt 7:12. 93 treated 94 districts

95 prevention 96 Moreover

MAYOR

180 Lincoln and Sherwin, you shall both to Newgate, the rest unto the Counters.

PALMER

Go, guard them hence. A little breath well spent Cheats expectation in his fair'st event.

DOLL

185 Well, Sheriff More, thou hast done more with thy good words than all they could with their weapons.
Give me thy hand; keep thy promise now for the King's pardon, or, by the Lord, I'll call thee a plain cony-catcher.<sup>97</sup>

LINCOLN

190 Farewell, Shrieve More, and as we yield by thee,
So make our peace; then thou deal'st honestly.

CLOWN BETTS

Ay, and save us from the gallows, else 'a deals double honestly.<sup>98</sup>

They are led away.

MAYOR

195 Master Shrieve More, you have preserved the city
From a most dangerous fierce commotion,
For if this limb of riot here in St. Martin's
Had joined with other branches of the city
That did begin to kindle, 'twould have bred Great rage. That rage much murder would have fed.

PALMER

200 Not steel but eloquence hath wrought this good.
You have redeemed us from much threatened blood.

MORE

205 My lord and brethren, what I here have spoke,
My country's love and next the city's care
Enjoined<sup>99</sup> me to; which, since it thus prevails, Think God hath made weak More his instrument
To thwart sedition's violent intent.
I think 'twere best, my lord, some two hours
hence
We meet at the Guildhall, and there determine That through every ward the watch be clad
In armor, but especially provide 210 That at the city gates, selected men,

Substantial citizens, do ward tonight,
For fear of further mischief.

MAYOR

It shall be so.

Enter Shrewsbury.

But yond methink's my Lord of Shrewsbury.

SHREWSBURY

My lord, his Majesty sends loving thanks
To you, your brethren, and his faithful subjects, 215
Your careful<sup>100</sup> citizens. But Master More, to you
A rougher, yet as kind a salutation:
Your name is yet too short; nay, you must kneel.

[More kneels.]

A knight's creation is this knightly steel.

[He knights More.]

Rise up, Sir Thomas More. 220

MORE

I thank his Highness for thus honoring me.

SHREWSBURY

This is but first taste of his princely favor,
For it hath pleased his high Majesty,
Noting your wisdom and deserving merit, 225
To put this staff of honor in your hand,
For he hath chose you of his Privy Council.

[He gives More a staff of office.]

MORE

My lord, for to deny my Sovereign's bounty
Were to drop precious stones into the heaps Whence first they came. 230
To urge my imperfections in excuse,
Were all as stale as custom. No, my lord,
My service is my King's — good reason why,
Since life or death hangs on our Sovereign's eye.

MAYOR

His Majesty hath honored much the city
In this his princely choice.

MORE

My lord and brethren, 235
Though I depart for [Court] my love shall rest [True to the home wherewith my youth was blessed.]<sup>101</sup>
I now must sleep in Court; sound sleeps forbear:

97 cheat 98 double honesty: not honestly at all (as in double-dealing)

99 Compelled 100 solicitous; concerned
101 Shirley's emendation

The chamberlain to state is public care.
 240 Yet in this rising of my private blood,<sup>102</sup>
 My studious thoughts shall tend the city's good.
Enter Crofts.

SHREWSBURY

How now, Crofts? What news?

CROFTS

My lord, his Highness sends express command
 That a record be entered of this riot,
 245 And that the chief and capital offenders
 Be thereon straight arraigned, for himself intends To sit in person on the rest tomorrow
 At Westminster.

SHREWSBURY

Lord Mayor, you hear your charge.
 Come, good Sir Thomas More, to Court let's 250 hic:<sup>103</sup>
 You are th'appeaser of this mutiny.

MORE [To Mayor.]

My lord, farewell. New days begets new tides;
 Life whirls 'bout fate, then to a grave it slides.
Exeunt severally.

2.4

Enter Sheriff and meet a messenger.

SHERIFF

Messenger, what news?

MESSENGER

Is execution yet performed?

SHERIFF

Not yet; the carts stand ready at the stairs,
 And they shall presently away to Tyburn.

MESSENGER

Stay, Master Shrieve; it is the Council's pleasure,
 5 For more example in so bad a case,
 A gibbet<sup>104</sup> be erected in Cheapside, Hard by the Standard, whither you must bring Lincoln and those that were the chief with him
 To suffer death, and that immediately.
Enter Officers.

SHERIFF

It shall be done, sir.

Exit messenger.

Officers, be speedy. 10

Call for a gibbet; see it be erected.
 Others make haste to Newgate; bid them bring
 The prisoners hither, for they here must die.
 Away, I say, and see no time be slacked.

OFFICERS

We go, sir. 15
Exeunt some severally; others set up the gibbet.

SHERIFF

That's well said, fellows; now you do your duty.
 God, for his pity, help these troublous times.
 The street's stopped up with gazing multitudes;
 Command our armed officers with halberds
 Make way for entrance of the prisoners. 20
 Let proclamation once again be made
 That every householder, on pain of death,
 Keep in his prentices, and every man
 Stand with a weapon ready at his door,
 As he will answer to the contrary. 25

OFFICER

I'll see it done, sir. Exit.
Enter another officer.

SHERIFF

Bring them away to execution.
 The writ is come above two hours since;
 The city will be fined for this neglect.

OFFICER

There's such a press and multitude at Newgate, 30
 They cannot bring the carts unto the stairs
 To take the prisoners in.

SHERIFF

Then let them come on foot.
 We may not dally time with great command.

OFFICER

Some of the Bench, sir, think it very fit
 That stay be made and give it out abroad 35
 The execution is deferred till morning,
 And when the streets shall be a little cleared,
 To chain them up, and suddenly dispatch it.
The prisoners are brought in well guarded.

That he is hence removed to higher place,
And made of Council to his Majesty.

DOLL

100 Well is he worthy of it, by my troth:
An honest, wise, well-spoken gentleman;
Yet would I praise his honesty much more
If he had kept his word and saved our lives.
But let that pass; men are but men, and so
Words are but words, and pays not what men 105 owe.
Now, husband, since perhaps the world may say That through my means thou comest thus to thy end,
Here I begin this cup of death to thee,
Because thou shalt be sure to taste no worse
110 Than I have taken, that must go before thee.
What though I be a woman? That's no matter.
I do owe God a death, and I must pay him.
Husband, give me thy hand; be not dismayed.
This chore being chored, then all our debt is paid.
115 Only, two little babes we leave behind us,
And all I can bequeath them at this time
Is but the love of some good honest friend
To bring them up in charitable sort.
What, masters? He goes upright that never halts, 120 And they may live to mend their parents' faults.

WILLIAMSON

Why, well said, wife; i'faith thou cheer'st my heart.
Give me thy hand; let's kiss, and so let's part.
He kisses her on the ladder.

DOLL

The next kiss, Williamson, shall be in heaven.
Now cheerly lads, George Betts, a hand with thee,
And thine too, Ralph, and thine, good honest
125 Sherwin.
Now let me tell the women of this town
No stranger yet brought Doll to lying down.
So long as I an Englishman can see,
Nor French nor Dutch shall get a kiss of me.
130 And when that I am dead, for me yet say
I died in scorn to be a stranger's prey.
A great shout and noise.
[Voices] within.
Pardon, pardon, pardon, pardon!
Room for the Earl of Surrey! Room there, room!
Enter Surrey.

SURREY

Save the man's life, if it be possible.

SHERIFF

It is too late, my lord; he's dead already. 135

SURREY

I tell ye, Master Sheriff, you are too forward
To make such haste with men unto their death.
I think your pains will merit little thanks
Since that his Highness is so merciful
As not to spill the blood of any subject. 140

SHERIFF

My noble lord, would we so much had known.
The Council's warrant hastened our dispatch;
It had not else been done so suddenly.

SURREY

Sir Thomas More humbly upon his knee
Did beg the lives of all, since on his word 145
They did so gently yield. The King hath granted it And made him Lord High Chancellor of England,
According as he worthily deserves.
Since Lincoln's life cannot be had again,
Then for the rest, from my dread<sup>113</sup> Sovereign's
lips, 150
I here pronounce free pardon for them all.

ALL (Flinging up caps.)

God save the King! God save the King,
My good Lord Chancellor and the Earl of Surrey!

DOLL

And Doll desires it from her very heart
More's name may live for this right noble part. 155
And whensoever we talk of ill May Day Praise More whose [word did sin and judgment stay].<sup>114</sup>

SURREY

In hope his Highness' clemency and mercy,
Which in the arms of mild and meek compassion
Would rather clip<sup>115</sup> you, as the loving nurse 160
Oft doth the wayward infant, than to leave you
To the sharp rod of justice, so to draw you
To shun such lewd<sup>116</sup> assemblies as beget
Unlawful riots and such traitorous acts
That striking with the hand of private<sup>117</sup> hate, 165
Maim your dear country with a public wound.
O God, that mercy, whose majestic brow

Should be unwrinkled, and that awe-full justice
Which looketh through a veil of sufferance 170 Upon the frailty of the multitude,
Should with the clamors of outrageous wrongs
Be stirred and wakened thus to punishment!
But your deserved death he doth forgive,
Who gives you life, pray all he long may live.

ALL

175 God save the King! God save the King,
My good Lord Chancellor, and the Earl of Surrey!
Exeunt.

3.1

A table being covered with a green carpet, a state cushion on it, and the purse and mace lying thereon. Enter Sir Thomas More.

MORE<sup>118</sup>

It is in heaven that I am thus and thus,
And that which we profanely<sup>119</sup> term our fortunes
Is the provision of the power above,
Fitted and shaped just to that strength of nature
Which we are born with. Good God, good
5 God,
That I from such an humble bench<sup>120</sup> of birth
Should step, as 'twere, up to my country's head
And give the law out there; I, in my father's life,
To take prerogative and tithe<sup>121</sup> of knees
10 From elder kinsmen, and him, bind by my place
To give the smooth and dexter<sup>122</sup> way to me
That owe it him by nature: sure these things,
Not physicked by respect,<sup>123</sup> might turn our
blood
To much corruption. But More, the more thou hast
15 Either of honor, office, wealth, and calling,
Which might accite<sup>124</sup> thee to embrace and hug
them,
The more do thou in serpents' natures think
them;
Fear their gay skins, with thought of their sharp
state,
And let this be thy maxim: to be great 20 Is, when the thread of hazard is once spun,
A bottom<sup>125</sup> great wound up, greatly undone.

Enter his man Randall attired like him.
Come on, sir, are you ready?

RANDALL

Yes, my lord, I stand<sup>126</sup> but on a few points. I shall have done presently. Before God, I have practised your lordship's shift<sup>127</sup> so well that I think I shall 25 grow proud, my lord.

MORE

'Tis fit thou shouldst wax<sup>128</sup> proud, or else thou'lt ne'er

Be near allied to greatness. Observe me, sirrah:
The learned clerk Erasmus is arrived

30 Within our English Court. Last night I hear

He feasted with our honored English poet

The Earl of Surrey, and I learned today

The famous clerk of Rotterdam will visit

Sir Thomas More. Therefore, sir, take my seat:

You are lord chancellor. [Randall sits.]

Dress<sup>129</sup> your behavior 35

According to my carriage,<sup>130</sup> but beware

You talk not over much, for 'twill betray thee.

Who prates<sup>131</sup> not much seems wise, his wit few scan,<sup>132</sup>

While the tongue blabs tales of the imperfect man.

I'll see if great Erasmus can distinguish 40

Merit and outward ceremony.

RANDALL

If I do not deserve a share for playing of your lordship well, let me be yeoman usher to your sumpter,<sup>133</sup> and be banished from wearing of a gold chain for ever. 45

MORE

Well, sir, I'll hide our motion.<sup>134</sup> Act my part

With a firm boldness, and thou winst my heart.

*Enter the Sheriff with Falkner (a ruffian)
and officers.*

How now? What's the matter?

FALKNER [To Officers.]

Tug me not; I'm no bear. 'Sblood,<sup>135</sup> if all the dogs in Paris Garden hung at my tail, I'd shake 'em off 50 with this: that I'll appear before no king christened
but my good Lord Chancellor.

118 This soliloquy is generally thought to be by Shakespeare. 119 impiously 120 situation 121 tribute 122 right hand (a position of honor) 123 physicked

by respect: tempered by reflection 124 excite; induce 125 a ball of wound thread 126 wait 127 contrivance 128 grow 129 arrange 130 demeanor

131 talks foolishly 132 discern 133 let... sumpter: let me be demoted to serving your lowliest servant 134 show, entertainment 135 God's blood

SHERIFF
We'll christen you, sirrah. Bring him forward.

MORE [To Falkner.]
How now, what tumults make you?

FALKNER
55 The azured heavens protect my noble Lord Chancellor.

MORE [To Sheriff.]
What fellow's this?

SHERIFF
A ruffian, my lord, that hath set half the city in an uproar.

FALKNER
60 My lord—

SHERIFF
There was a fray in Paternoster Row, and because they would not be parted, the street was choked up with carts.

FALKNER
My noble lord, Panyer Alley's throat was open.

MORE
65 Sirrah, hold your peace.

FALKNER
I'll prove the street was not choked, but is as well as ever it was since it was a street.

SHERIFF
This fellow was a principal broacher<sup>136</sup> of the broil—

FALKNER
70 'Sblood, I broached none.<sup>137</sup> It was broached and half run out before I had a lick at it.

SHERIFF
—and would be brought before no justice but your honor.

FALKNER
I am haled,<sup>138</sup> my noble lord.

MORE [To Sheriff.]
75 No ear to choose for every trivial noise
But mine, and in so full<sup>139</sup> a time? Away.

You wrong me, Master Shrieve. Dispose of him
At your own pleasure. Send the knave to Newgate.

FALKNER
To Newgate? 'Sblood, Sir Thomas More, I appeal,
I appeal; from Newgate to any of the two worship- 80
ful Counters.<sup>140</sup>

MORE
Fellow, whose man are you that are thus lusty?<sup>141</sup>

FALKNER
My name's Jack Falkner. I serve, next under God and my prince, Master Morris, secretary to my Lord of Winchester. 85

MORE
A fellow of your hair<sup>142</sup> is very fit
To be a secretary's follower!

FALKNER
I hope so, my lord. The fray was between the Bishops' men of Ely and Winchester, and I could not in honor but part them. I thought it stood not with my 90 reputation and degree<sup>143</sup> to come to my questions and answers before a city justice. I knew I should to the pot.<sup>144</sup>

MORE
Thou hast been there, it seems, too late already.<sup>145</sup>

FALKNER
I know your honor is wise and so forth, and I de- 95 sire to be only catechized<sup>146</sup> or examined by you, my noble Lord Chancellor.

MORE
Sirrah, sirrah, you are a busy<sup>147</sup> dangerous ruffian.

FALKNER
Ruffian?

MORE
How long have you worn this hair? 100

FALKNER
I have worn this hair ever since I was born.

MORE
You know that's not my question. But how long Hath this shag fleece hung dangling on thy head?

136 instigator 137 drew no liquor (playing on another sense of the word)
138 pulled along forcibly 139 busy
140 debtors' prisons in London

141 insolent 142 double meaning of physical hair and other sense of the word as "kind" or "type" 143 position 144 to the pot: be ruined or destroyed 145 been there... already: More plays on the sense of a pot for drinking. 146 instructed 147 meddlesome

FALKNER

105 How long, my lord? Why, sometimes thus long, sometimes lower, as the Fates and humors please.

MORE

So quick, sir, with me, ha? I see, good fellow,
Thou lovest plain dealing. Sirrah, tell me now,
When were you last at barber's? How long time
Have you upon your head worn this shag hair?

FALKNER

110 My lord, Jack Falkner tells no Aesop's fables.
Troth, I was not at barber's this three years. I have not been cut, nor will not be cut, upon a foolish vow which, as the destinies shall direct, I am sworn to keep.

MORE

115 When comes that vow out?

FALKNER

Why, when the humors are purged:<sup>148</sup> not these three years.

MORE

Vows are recorded in the court of heaven,
For they are holy acts. Young man, I charge thee, 120 And do advise thee, start<sup>149</sup> not from that vow,
And for<sup>150</sup> I will be sure thou shalt not shear,
Besides, because it is an odious sight
To see a man thus hairy, thou shalt lie
In Newgate till thy vow and thy three years
Be full expired. Away with him.

FALKNER

125 My lord—

MORE

Cut off this fleece, and lie there but a month.

FALKNER

I'll not lose a hair to be lord chancellor of Europe.

MORE

To Newgate then. Sirrah, great sins are bred
In all that body where there's a foul head.
130 Away with him.

Exeunt [all except Randall].

Enter Surrey, Erasmus, and attendants.

SURREY

Now, great Erasmus, you approach the presence
Of a most worthy learned gentleman.
This little isle holds not a truer friend
Unto the arts, nor doth his greatness add
A feignèd flourish<sup>151</sup> to his worthy parts. 135
He's great in study: that's the statist's grace,<sup>152</sup>
That gains more reverence than the outward place.

ERASMUS

Report, my lord, hath crossed the narrow seas
And to the several parts of Christendom
Hath borne the fame of your lord chancellor. 140
I long to see him whom with loving thoughts
I in my study oft have visited.
Is that Sir Thomas More?

SURREY

It is, Erasmus.

Now shall you view the honorablest scholar,
The most religious politician, 145
The worthiest counselor that tends our state.
That study is the general watch of England;
In it, the prince's safety and the peace
That shines upon our commonwealth are forged
By loyal industry. 150

ERASMUS

I doubt him not
To be as near the life of excellence
As you proclaim him, when his meanest servants
Are of some weight. You saw, my lord, his porter
Give entertainment to us at the gate
In Latin good phrase. What's the master then, 155
When such good parts shine in his meanest men?

SURREY

His lordship hath some weighty business,
For see, as yet he takes no notice of us.

ERASMUS

I think 'twere best I did my duty to him
In a short Latin speech: 160
[Taking off his hat, Erasmus addresses Randall.]
Qui in celeberrima patria natus est et gloriosa plus habet negotii ut in lucem veniat quam qui —<sup>153</sup>

<sup>148</sup> humors are purged: dispositions are purified <sup>149</sup> break <sup>150</sup> in order that <sup>151</sup> feigned flourish: counterfeited

embellishment <sup>152</sup> statist's grace: statesman's virtue or excellence <sup>153</sup> "Someone born in a very famous and glorious country has more difficulty in becoming famous than one who...."

RANDALL

I pray thee, good Erasmus, be covered.<sup>154</sup> I have forsworn speaking of Latin, else, as I am true councilor, I'd tickle<sup>155</sup> you with a speech. Nay, sit, Erasmus; sit, good my Lord of Surrey. I'll make my lady 165 come to you anon,<sup>156</sup> if she will, and give you good entertainment.

ERASMUS

Is this Sir Thomas More?

SURREY

O good Erasmus,
 You must conceive his vein:<sup>157</sup> he's ever furnished
 With these conceits.

RANDALL

170 Yes, faith, my learned poet doth not lie for that matter. I am neither more nor less merry Sir Thomas always. Wilt sup with me? By God, I love a parlous<sup>158</sup> wise fellow that smells of a politician better than a long progress.<sup>159</sup>

Enter Sir Thomas More.

SURREY

175 We are deluded. This is not his lordship.

RANDALL

I pray you, Erasmus, how long will the Holland cheese in your country keep without maggots?

MORE

Fool, painted barbarism, retire thyself
 Into thy first creation. [Exit Randall.]
 Thus you see,
 180 My loving learned friends, how far respect
 Waits often on the ceremonious train
 Of base, illiterate wealth, whilst men of schools,
 Shrouded in poverty, are counted fools.
 Pardon, thou reverend German. I have mixed 185 So slight a jest to the fair entertainment
 Of thy most worthy self. For know, Erasmus,
 Mirth wrinkles up my face, and I still crave,
 When that forsakes me, I may hug my grave.

ERASMUS

190 Your honor's merry humor is best physic<sup>160</sup>
 Unto your able body, for we learn,

Where melancholy chokes the passages
 Of blood and breath, the erected spirit still Lengthens our days with sportful exercise.
 Study should be the saddest<sup>161</sup> time of life;
 The rest, a sport exempt from thought of strife. 195

MORE

Erasmus preacheth gospel against physic.
 My noble poet —

SURREY

O my lord, you tax<sup>162</sup> me
 In that word "poet" of much idleness.
 It is a study that makes poor our fate;
 Poets were ever thought unfit for state. 200

MORE

Oh, give not up fair poesy, sweet lord,
 To such contempt. That I may speak my heart,
 It is the sweetest heraldry of art
 That sets a difference 'tween the tough sharp holly
 And tender bay tree.

SURREY

Yet, my lord, 205
 It is become the very lag i'number<sup>163</sup>
 To all mechanic sciences.<sup>164</sup>

MORE

Why, I'll show the reason.
 This is no age for poets: they should sing,
 To the loud canon,<sup>165</sup> heroica facta
Qui faciunt reges heroica carmina laudant;<sup>166</sup> 210
 And as great subjects of their pen decay,
 Even so, unphysicked,<sup>167</sup> they do melt away.
Enter Master Morris.
 Come, will your lordship in? My dear Erasmus —
 I'll hear you, Master Morris presently.
 My lord, I make you master of my house;
 215 We'll banquet here with fresh and staid<sup>168</sup> delights;
 The Muses' music here shall cheer our sprites;<sup>169</sup>
 The cates<sup>170</sup> must be but mean where scholars sit,
 For they're made all with courses of neat<sup>171</sup> wit.
 [Exeunt Surrey, Erasmus, and attendants.]

How now, Master Morris? 220

154 be covered: put your hat back on 155 delight; beat up; make an end of something 156 presently 157 conceive his vein: understand his style 158 shrewd; mischievous 159 a journey made by a royal personage 160 medicine 161 most serious or grave 162 blame 163 lag

i'number: last in order 164 mechanic sciences: non-liberal disciplines; practical skills and arts 165 musical composition;

law or rule; standard of judgment 166 "Heroic poems praise the heroic deeds that kings perform." 167 unnurtured 168 free from extravagance 169 spirits
 170 provisions 171 refined, well selected

MORRIS

I am a suitor to your lordship in behalf of a servant of mine.

MORE

The fellow with long hair, good Master Morris?
Come to me three years hence and then I'll hear you.

MORRIS

235 I understand, your honor, but the foolish knave has submitted himself to the mercy of a barber, and is without, ready to make a new vow before your lordship, hereafter to live civil.

MORE

Nay then, let's talk with him. Pray, call him in.
Enter Falkner and officers.

FALKNER

230 Bless your honor: a new man, my lord.

MORE

Why, sure, this' not he.

FALKNER

An<sup>172</sup> your lordship will, the barber shall give you a sample of my head. I am he in faith, my lord, I am ipse.<sup>173</sup>

MORE

235 Why, now thy face is like an honest man's.
Thou hast played well at this new cut,<sup>174</sup> and won.

FALKNER

No, my lord. Lost all that ever God sent me.

MORE

240 God sent thee into the world as thou art now, with short hair. How quickly are three years run out in Newgate.

FALKNER

I think so, my lord, for there was but a hair's length between my going thither and so long time.

MORE

245 Because I see some grace in thee, go free.
Discharge him, fellows. Farewell, Master Morris.
Thy head is for thy shoulders now more fit:
Thou hast less hair upon it but more wit. Exit.

MORRIS

Did not I tell thee always of these locks?

FALKNER

An the locks were on again, all the goldsmiths in Cheapside should not pick them open. 'Sheart!<sup>175</sup> If my hair stand not on end when I look for my face in a glass,<sup>176</sup> I am a polecat.<sup>177</sup> Here's a lousy jest. But if I notch<sup>178</sup> not that rogue Tom barber that makes me look thus like a Brownist,<sup>179</sup> hang me. I'll be worse to the nittical<sup>180</sup> knave than ten tooth-drawings.<sup>181</sup> Here's a head with a pox!

MORRIS

What ail'st thou? Art thou mad now?

FALKNER

Mad, now? 'Nails!<sup>182</sup> If loss of hair cannot mad a man, what can? I am deposed; my crown is taken from me. More had been better a' scoured Moor-ditch than a' notched me thus. Does he begin sheep-shearing with Jack Falkner?

MORRIS

Nay, an you feed this vein, sir, fare you well.

FALKNER

Why, farewell, frost! I'll go hang myself out for the poll<sup>183</sup> head. Make a Sar'cen of Jack?

MORRIS

265 Thou desperate knave, for that I see the devil wholly gets hold of thee.

FALKNER

The devil's a damned rascal.

MORRIS

I charge thee wait on me no more; no more Call me thy master.

FALKNER

Why then, a word, Master Morris.

MORRIS

I'll hear no words, sir. Fare you well.

FALKNER

'Sblood! Farewell?

MORRIS

Why dost thou follow me?

172 If 173 he himself, the very man
174 style; card game 175 God's heart
(an oath) 176 mirror 177 vile person

178 cut 179 person in a political party whose members would wear short hair 180 lice-infested 181 extractions 182 God's nails (an oath) 183 shaved

FALKNER

Because I'm an ass. Do you set your shavers<sup>184</sup>
 275 upon me, and then cast me off? Must I condole?<sup>185</sup> Have the Fates played the fools? [Weeps.] Am I their cut? Now the poor sponce<sup>186</sup> is taken, must Jack march with bag and baggage?

MORRIS

You coxcomb!<sup>187</sup>

FALKNER

280 Nay, you ha'<sup>188</sup> poached me; you ha' given me a hair. It's here, here.

MORRIS

Away, you kind ass. Come, sir, dry your eyes.
 Keep your old place, and mend these fooleries.

FALKNER

I care not to be turned off,<sup>189</sup> and 'twere a ladder, 285 so it be in my humor, or the Fates beckon to me.
 Nay, pray, sir, if the Destinies spin me a fine thread, Falkner flies another pitch. And to avoid the headache, hereafter before I'll be a hairmonger I'll be a whoremonger. Exeunt.

3.2

Enter a messenger to More.

MESSENGER

My honorable lord, the Mayor of London,
 Accompanied with his lady and her train,
 Are coming hither, and are hard at hand,
 To feast with you. A sergeant's come before
 5 To tell your lordship of their near approach.

MORE

Why, this is cheerful news. Friends go and come;
 Reverend Erasmus, whose delicious words
 Express the very soul and life of wit,
 Newly took sad leave of me, with tears
 10 Troubled the silver channel of the Thames,
 Which, glad of such a burden, proudly swelled
 And on her bosom bore him toward the sea.
 He's gone to Rotterdam; peace go with him.
 He left me heavy when he went from hence,
 15 But this recomforts me: the kind Lord Mayor,
 His brethren aldermen with their fair wives,

Will feast this night with us. Why, so't should be;
 More's merry heart lives by good company.

[Enter Master Roper and servingmen.]

Good gentlemen, be careful; give great charge
 Our diet be made dainty for the taste,
 For of all people that the earth affords
 The Londoners fare richest at their boards.<sup>190</sup>

Come, my good fellows, stir, be diligent!
 Sloth is an idle fellow; leave him now.
 The time requires your expeditious service.

Place me here stools to set the ladies on.

[Servingmen set stools.]

Son Roper, you have given order for the banquet?

ROPER

I have, my lord, and everything is ready.

Enter Lady More.

MORE

O welcome, wife. Give you direction
 How women should be placed. You know it best.
 For my Lord Mayor, his brethren, and the rest,
 Let me alone: men best can order men.

LADY MORE

I warrant ye, my lord, all shall be well.
 There's one without that stays to speak with ye,
 And bade me tell ye that he is a player.

MORE

A player, wife? One of ye bid him come in.
Exit one [servingman].

Nay, stir there, fellows. Fie; ye are too slow.
 See that your lights be in a readiness;
 The banquet shall be here. God's me,<sup>191</sup> madam, Leave my Lady Mayoress? Both of us from the board?

And my son Roper too? What may our guests think?

LADY MORE

My lord, they are risen and sitting by the fire.

MORE

Why, yet go you and keep them company.
 It is not meet<sup>192</sup> we should be absent both.
Exit Lady.

Enter Player.

Welcome, good friend. What is your will with me?

184 razors; swindlers 185 grieve 186 a term for the head 188 have 189 turned hanged 190 tables 191 God's me: God
 jocular term for head 187 fool; ludicrous off: dismissed; turned off the ladder to be bless me 192 appropriate

PLAYER

My lord, my fellows and myself
Are come to tender<sup>193</sup> ye our willing service,
So please you to command us.

MORE

What, for a play, you mean?
Whom do you serve?

PLAYER

My Lord Cardinal's grace.

MORE

My Lord Cardinal's players? Now trust me, welcome.
50 You happen hither in a lucky time
To pleasure me and benefit yourselves.
The mayor of London and some aldermen,
His lady and their wives, are my kind guests
55 This night at supper. Now, to have a play
Before the banquet will be excellent.
How think you, son Roper?

ROPER

'Twill do well, my lord,
And be right pleasing pastime to your guests.

MORE

I prithee tell me, what plays have ye?

PLAYER

60 Diverse, my lord: The Cradle of Security,
Hit Nail o' th' Head, Impatient Poverty,
The Play of Four Ps, Dives and Lazarus, Lusty Juventus, and The Marriage of Wit and Wisdom.

MORE

The Marriage of Wit and Wisdom? That, my lads.
65 I'll none but that. The theme is very good,
And may maintain a liberal<sup>194</sup> argument.
To marry wit to wisdom asks some cunning;<sup>195</sup>
Many have wit that may come short of wisdom.
We'll see how Master Poet plays his part,
70 And whether wit or wisdom grace his art.
[To Servingmen.] Go, make him drink, and all his fellows too.
[To Player.] How many are ye?

PLAYER

Four men and a boy, sir.

MORE

But one boy? Then I see,
There's but few women in the play.

PLAYER

Three, my lord: Dame Science, Lady Vanity, 75
And Wisdom, she herself.

MORE

And one boy play them all? By'r Lady, he's loaden.
Well, my good fellow, get ye straight together
And make ye ready with what haste ye may.
[To Servingmen.] Provide their supper 'gainst<sup>196</sup>
the play be done, 80
Else shall we stay our guests here overlong.
[To Player.] Make haste, I pray ye.

PLAYER

We will, my lord.
Exeunt Servingmen and Player.

MORE

Where are the waits?<sup>197</sup> [To Roper.] Go, bid them play,
To spend the time awhile.
Enter Lady More.
How now, madam?

LADY MORE

My lord, they're coming hither. 85

MORE

They're welcome. Wife, I'll tell ye one thing:
Our sport is somewhat mended; we shall have A play tonight, The Marriage of Wit and Wisdom,
And acted by my good Lord Cardinal's players.
How like ye that, wife?

LADY MORE

My lord, I like it well. 90
See, they are coming.
Waits play hautbois.<sup>198</sup> Enter Lord Mayor,
so many aldermen as may, the Lady Mayoress
in scarlet, with other ladies and Sir Thomas More's daughters, servants carrying lighted torches by them.

MORE

Once again, welcome. Welcome, my good Lord
Mayor,
And brethren all, for once I was your brother

And so am still in heart. It is not state<sup>199</sup>
 95 That can our love from London separate.
 [There be, as I have oft of late espied,
 In whom Dame Fortune's gifts breed]<sup>200</sup> nought
 but pride,
 But they that cast an eye still whence they came,
 Know how they rose, and how to use the same.

MAYOR

100 My lord, you set a gloss<sup>201</sup> on London's fame,
 And make it happy ever by your name.
 Needs must we say when we remember More,
 'Twas he that drove rebellion from our door,
 With grave discretion's mild and gentle breath
 105 Shielding a many subjects' lives from death.
 Oh, how our city is by you renowned,
 And with your virtues our endeavors crowned.

MORE

No more, my good Lord Mayor; but thanks to all
 That on so short a summons you would come 110 To visit him that holds your kindness dear.
 [To Lady More.] Madam, you are not merry with my Lady Mayoress,
 And these fair ladies; pray ye seat them all.
 [To Mayor.] And here, my lord, let me appoint your place,
 The rest to seat themselves. Nay, I'll weary ye;
 115 You will not long in haste to visit me.

LADY MORE

Good madam, sit; in sooth you shall sit here.

MAYORESS

Good madam, pardon me; it may not be.

LADY MORE

In troth, I'll have it so; I'll sit here by ye.
 Good ladies, sit; more stools here, ho!

MAYORESS

120 It is your favor, madam, makes me thus Presume above my merit.

LADY MORE

When we come to you,
 Then shall you rule us as we rule you here.
 [They sit.]

Now must I tell ye, madam, we have a play
 To welcome ye withal;<sup>202</sup> how good soe'er 125 That know not I; my lord will have it so.

MORE [Aside.]

Wife, hope the best; I am sure they'll do their best.

They that would better comes not at their feast.
 [Aloud.] My good Lord Cardinal's players, I thank them for it.

Play us a play, to lengthen out your welcome.

They say it is The Marriage of Wit and Wisdom, 130

A theme of some import, howe'er it prove;

But if art fail, we'll inch it out with love.

What, are they ready?

SERVANT

My lord, one of the players craves to speak with
 you. 135

MORE

With me? Where is he?

Enter Inclination, the Vice, ready

[with bridle in hand].

INCLINATION

Here, my lord.

MORE

How now, what's the matter?

INCLINATION

We would desire your honor but to stay a little;
 one of my fellows is but run to Ogle's for a long 140
 beard for young Wit, and he'll be here presently.

MORE

A long beard for young Wit? Why, man, he may be without a beard till he come to marriage, for wit goes not all by the hair. When comes Wit in?

INCLINATION

In the second scene, next to the prologue, my 145 lord.

MORE

Why, play on till that scene come, and by that time Wit's beard will be grown, or else the fellow returned with it. And what part playst thou?

INCLINATION

Inclination, the Vice, my lord. 150

MORE

Gramercies,<sup>203</sup> now I may take the Vice if I list.<sup>204</sup>
 And wherefore hast thou that bridle in thy hand?

INCLINATION

I must be bridled anon, my lord.

MORE

155 An thou be'st not saddled too, it makes no matter, for then Wit's Inclination may gallop so fast that he will outstrip wisdom and fall to folly.

INCLINATION

Indeed, so he does to Lady Vanity; but we have no Folly in our play.

MORE

160 Then there's no wit in't, I'll be sworn. Folly waits on wit as the shadow on the body, and where wit is ripest, there folly still is readiest. But begin, I prithee; we'll rather allow a beardless Wit than Wit, all beard, to have no brain.

INCLINATION

165 Nay, he has his apparel on too, my lord, and therefore he is the readier to enter.

MORE

Then, good Inclination, begin at a venture.<sup>205</sup>

Exit [Inclination].

My Lord Mayor, Wit lacks a beard, or else they would begin.

I'd lend him mine, but that it is too thin.

Silence, they come.

The trumpet sounds. Enter the Prologue.

PROLOGUE

170 Now forasmuch as in these latter days
Throughout the whole world in every land
Vice doth increase and virtue decays,
Iniquity having the upper hand,
We therefore intend, good gentle audience,
175 A pretty, short interlude to play at this present,
Desiring your leave and quiet silence
To show the same as is meet and expedient.
It is called The Marriage of Wit and Wisdom,
A matter right pithy and pleasing to hear,
180 Whereof in brief we will show the whole sum.
But I must be gone, for Wit doth appear. Exit.
Enter Wit ruffling<sup>206</sup> and Inclination, the Vice.

WIT

In an arbor green, asleep whereas I lay,
The birds sang sweetly in the midst of the day;

I dreamed fast of mirth and play:

In youth is pleasure, in youth is pleasure. 185

Methought I walked still to and fro,

And from her company I could not go,

But when I waked it was not so:

In youth is pleasure, in youth is pleasure.

Therefore my heart is surely plight<sup>207</sup> 190

Of her alone to have a sight

Which is my joy and heart's delight:

In youth is pleasure, in youth is pleasure.

MORE [To Mayor.]

Mark ye, my lord, this is Wit without a beard;
what will he be by that time he comes to the com- 195
modity of a beard?

INCLINATION

O sir, the ground is the better on which she doth go.

For she will make better cheer with a little she can get

Than many a one can with a great banquet of meat.

WIT

And is her name Wisdom?

INCLINATION

Ay, sir, a wife most fit 200

For you, my good master, my dainty sweet Wit.

WIT

To be in her company, my heart it is set.

Therefore I prithee to let us be gone,

For unto Wisdom, Wit hath inclination.

INCLINATION

O sir, she will come herself even anon, 205

For I told her before where we would stand,

And then she said she would beck<sup>208</sup> us with her hand.

Flourishing his dagger.

Back with those boys and saucy great knaves.

What, stand ye here so big in your braves?<sup>209</sup>

180 My dagger about your coxcombs<sup>210</sup> shall walk 210
If I may but so much as hear ye chat or talk.

WIT

But will she take pains to come for us hither?

INCLINATION

I warrant<sup>211</sup> ye; therefore, you must be familiar with her.

215           When she cometh in place,
          You must her embrace
          Somewhat handsomely,
          Lest she think it danger,
          Because you are a stranger,
          To come in your company.

WIT

220    I warrant thee, Inclination, I will be busy.
      Oh, how Wit longs to be in Wisdom's company.
          Enter Lady Vanity singing and beckoning with her hand.

VANITY

Come hither, come hither, come hither, come!
Such cheer as I have, thou shalt have some.

MORE

225    This is Lady Vanity, I'll hold<sup>212</sup> my life.
      Beware, good Wit, you take not her to wife.

INCLINATION [To Vanity.]

What, Unknown Honesty, a word in your ear.
          She offers to depart.

You shall not be gone as yet, I swear.
Here's none but your friends; you need not to fray.<sup>213</sup>

This young gentleman loves ye; therefore, you must stay.

WIT

230    I trust in me she will think no danger,
      For I love well the company of fair women;
      And though to you I am a stranger,
      Yet Wit may pleasure you now and then.

VANITY

235    Who, you? Nay, you are such a holy man,
      That to touch one you dare not be bold.
      I think you would not kiss a young woman
      If one would give ye twenty pound in gold.

WIT

Yes, in good sadness,<sup>214</sup> lady, that I would.
I could find in my heart to kiss you in your smock.

VANITY

My back is broad enough to bear that mock,       240
For it hath been told me many a time
That you would be seen in no such company as mine.

WIT

Not Wit in the company of Lady Wisdom?
O Jove, for what do I hither come?

INCLINATION

Sir, she did this nothing else but to prove       245
Whether a little thing would you move
To be angry and fret.
      What an if one said so?
      Let such trifling matters go,
And with a kind kiss come out of her debt.       250
          Enter another player.

PLAYER OF INCLINATION

Is Luggins come yet with the beard?

PLAYER

No, faith, he is not come. Alas, what shall we do?

PLAYER OF INCLINATION [To More.]

Forsooth, we can go no further till our fellow Luggins come, for he plays Good Counsel, and now he should enter to admonish Wit that this is Lady       255
Vanity and not Lady Wisdom.

MORE

Nay, an<sup>215</sup> it be no more but so, ye shall not tarry at a stand<sup>216</sup> for that. We'll not have our play marred for lack of a little good counsel. Till your fellow come, I'll give him the best counsel that I can. Pardon me,       260 my Lord Mayor — I love to be merry.

MORE [As Good Counsel.]

O good Mother Wit, thou art now on the bow hand,<sup>217</sup>
And blindly in thine own opinion dost stand.
I tell thee, this naughty lewd Inclination
Does lead thee amiss in a very strange fashion.       265
This is not Wisdom, but Lady Vanity; Therefore list<sup>218</sup> to Good Counsel, and be ruled by me.

PLAYER OF INCLINATION

In troth, my lord, it is as right to Luggins's part as can be. Speak, Wit.

<sup>211</sup> assure   <sup>212</sup> stake   <sup>213</sup> fear   <sup>214</sup> in good sadness: in earnest; seriously   <sup>215</sup> if

<sup>216</sup> tarry at a stand: remain at a standstill   <sup>218</sup> listen <sup>217</sup> on the bow hand: wide of the mark

MORE

270 Nay, we will not have our audience disappointed, if I can help it.

WIT

Art thou Good Counsel, and wilt tell me so?
Wouldst thou have Wit from Lady Wisdom to go?

275 Thou art some deceiver, I tell thee verily,
In saying that this is Lady Vanity.

MORE [As Good Counsel.]

Wit, judge not things by the outward show;
The eye oft mistakes, right well you do know.
Good Counsel assures thee upon his honesty
That this is not Wisdom, but Lady Vanity.

Enter Luggins with the beard.

INCLINATION

280 O my lord, he is come; now we shall go forward.

MORE [To Luggins.]

Art thou come? Well, fellow, I have help<sup>219</sup> to save thine honesty<sup>220</sup> a little. Now, if thou canst give Wit any better counsel than I have done, spare not.
There I leave him to thy mercy.

285 But by this time I am sure our banquet's ready.
My lord and ladies, we will taste that first
And then they shall begin the play again,
Which, through the fellow's absence, and by me,
Instead of helping, hath been hindered.

[To Servants.] Prepare against we come.<sup>221</sup> Lights
290 there, I say.

Thus fools oft times do help to mar the play.
Exeunt all but the players.

WIT

Fie, fellow Luggins, you serve us handsomely; do ye not, think ye?

LUGGINS

295 Why, Ogle was not within, and his wife would not let me have the beard, and, by my troth, I ran so fast that I sweat again.

INCLINATION

300 Do ye hear, fellows? Would not my lord make a rare player? Oh, he would uphold a company beyond all ho,<sup>222</sup> better than Mason among the King's players. Did ye mark how extemp'rally he fell to the matter, and spake Luggins's part almost as it is in the very book set down?

WIT

Peace! Do ye know what ye say? My lord, a player?
Let us not meddle with any such matters. Yet I may be a little proud that my lord hath answered me in my part. But come, let us go and be ready to begin the play again. 305

LUGGINS

Ay, that's the best, for now we lack nothing.
Enter a servingman to reward the players.

SERVINGMAN

Where be these players?

ALL

Here, sir. 310

SERVINGMAN

My lord is sent for to the Court,
And all the guests do after supper part.
And for he will not trouble you again,
By me for your reward 'a sends eight angels<sup>223</sup>
With many thanks. But sup before you go. 315
It is his will you should be fairly entreated.
Follow, I pray ye.

WIT

This, Luggins, is your negligence.
Wanting Wit's beard brought things into dislike,<sup>224</sup>
For otherwise the play had been all seen,
Where now some curious citizen disgraced it 320
And, discommending it, all is dismissed.

INCLINATION

'Fore God, 'a says true. But hear ye, sirs, eight angels? Ha! My lord would never give's eight angels, more or less for twelvepence. Either it should be three pounds, five pounds or ten pounds. There's twenty shillings wanting, sure. 325

WIT

Twenty to one 'tis so. I have a trick.— My lord comes; stand aside.

Enter More with attendants with purse and mace.

MORE

In haste, to Council? What's the business now,

219 helped 220 good name; honor
221 against . . . come: for when we come

[after dinner] 222 pause, intermission
223 gold coins 224 discord

330 That all so late his Highness sends for me?
What seek'st thou, fellow?

WIT

Nay, nothing. Your lordship sent eight angels by your man,
And I have lost two of them in the rushes.

MORE

Wit, look to that. Eight angels? I did send them
Ten.
335 Who gave it them?

SERVINGMAN

I, my lord. I had no more about me,
But by and by they shall receive the rest.

MORE

Well, Wit, 'twas wisely done; thou playest Wit well indeed,
Not to be thus deceived of thy right.
340 Am I a man by office truly ordained Equally to divide true right his own,
And shall I have deceivers in my house?
Then what avails my bounty, when such servants Deceive the poor of what the master gives?
345 Go one and pull his coat over his ears.
There are too many such. Give them their right.
Wit, let thy fellows thank thee; 'twas well done.
Thou now deservest to match<sup>225</sup> with Lady Wisdom.

[Exit with attendants.]

INCLINATION

350 God a' mercy, Wit. [To the servingman.] Sir, you had a master, Sir Thomas More. More? But now we shall have more.

LUGGINS

God bless him. I would there were more of his mind. 'A loves our quality, and yet he's a learned man and knows what the world is.

INCLINATION

355 Well, a kind man and more loving than many other, but I think we ha' met with the first —

LUGGINS

First served his man that had our angels, and he may chance dine with Duke Humphrey tomorrow, being turned away today. Come, let's go.

INCLINATION

And many such rewards would make us all ride 360 and horse us with the best nags in Smithfield.

[Exeunt.]

4.1

Enter the Earls of Shrewsbury and Surrey, the Bishop of Rochester and other lords, severally, doing courtesy to each other, the Clerk of the Council waiting bareheaded.

SURREY

Good morrow to my Lord of Shrewsbury.

SHREWSBURY

The like unto the honored Earl of Surrey.
Yond comes my Lord of Rochester.

ROCHESTER

Good morrow, my good lords.

SURREY

Clerk of the Council,

What time is't of day?

CLERK

Past eight of clock, my lord. 5

SHREWSBURY

I wonder that my good Lord Chancellor
Doth stay so long, considering there's matters
Of high importance to be scanned upon.<sup>226</sup>

SURREY

Clerk of the Council, certify his lordship
The lords expect him here.

ROCHESTER

It shall not need; 10

Yond comes his lordship.

*Enter Sir Thomas More,
with purse and mace borne before him.*

MORE

Good morrow to this fair assembly.
Come, my good lords, let's sit.

They sit.

O serious square,<sup>227</sup>

Upon this little board is daily scanned
The health and preservation of the land. 15

We, the physicians, that effect this good,
Now by choice diet, anon<sup>228</sup> by letting blood.

Our toil and careful watching brings the King
In league with slumbers, to which peace doth sing.

20 — Avoid the room there!
What business, lords, today?

SHREWSBURY

This, my good lord:
About the entertainment<sup>229</sup> of the Emperor
'Gainst the perfidious French into our pay.

SURREY

25 My lords, as 'tis the custom in this place
The youngest should speak first, so if I chance
In this case to speak youngly, pardon me.
I will agree France now hath her full strength,
As having new recovered the pale blood
Which war sluiced forth,<sup>230</sup> and I consent to this:
30 That the conjunction of our English forces
With arms of Germany may sooner bring
This prize of conquest in. But then, my lords,
As in the moral hunting 'twixt the lion
And other beasts, force joined [with guile]<sup>231</sup>
35 Frighted the weaker sharers from their parts,
So if the Empire's Sovereign chance to put His plea of partnership into war's court, Swords should decide the difference, and our blood
In private tears lament his entertainment.

SHREWSBURY

40 To doubt<sup>232</sup> the worst is still the wise man's shield
That arms him safely; but the world knows this:
The Emperor is a man of royal faith.
His love unto our Sovereign brings him down
From his imperial seat, to march in pay
45 Under our English flag, and wear the cross
Like some high order<sup>233</sup> on his manly breast.
Thus serving, he's not master of himself,
But like a colonel, commanding other,
Is by the general over-awed himself.

ROCHESTER

Yet, my good lord—

SHREWSBURY

50 Let me conclude my speech.
As subjects share no portion in the conquest
Of their true sovereign, other than the merit

That from the sovereign guerdons<sup>234</sup> the true subject,

So the good Emperor, in a friendly league
Of amity with England, will not soil
55 His honor with the theft of English spoil.

MORE

There is no question but this entertainment
Will be most honorable, most commodious.<sup>235</sup>
I have oft heard good captains wish to have Rich soldiers to attend them, such as would fight 60 Both for their lives and livings. Such a one Is the good Emperor. I would to God
We had ten thousand of such able men.
Ha! Then there would appear no court, no city,
But, where the wars were, they would pay themselves.
65 Then to prevent in French wars England's loss,
Let German flags wave with our English cross.

Enter Sir Thomas Palmer.

PALMER

My lords, his Majesty hath sent by me
These articles enclosed, first to be viewed
And then to be subscribed to.
70 (With great reverence.) I tender<sup>236</sup> them
In that due reverence which befits this place.

MORE

Subscribe these articles? Stay, let us pause.
Our conscience first shall parley<sup>237</sup> with our laws.
My Lord of Rochester, view you the paper.
75

ROCHESTER

Subscribe to these? Now, good Sir Thomas
Palmer,
Beseech the King that he will pardon me.
My heart will check my hand whilst I do write:
Subscribing so, I were an hypocrite.

PALMER

Do you refuse it then, my lord?<sup>238</sup>

ROCHESTER

I do, Sir Thomas. 80

PALMER

Then here I summon you forthwith t'appear
Before his Majesty, to answer there
This capital contempt.

229 employment 230 sluiced forth:
drew out 231 Shirley's emendation
232 fear 233 honor 234 rewards

235 advantageous 236 offer for formal acceptance 237 hold conference

238 The following section (lines 82-104) was crossed out by Edmund Tilney.

ROCHESTER

I rise and part,
In lieu of this, to tender him my heart.
He rises.

PALMER

85 Will't please your honor to subscribe, my lord?

MORE

Sir, tell his Highness I entreat
Some time for to bethink me of this task.
In the meanwhile I do resign mine office
Into my Sovereign's hands.

PALMER

90 Then, my lord,
Hear the preparèd order from the King.
On your refusal, you shall straight depart
Unto your house at Chelsea, till you know
Our Sovereign's further pleasure.

MORE

95 Most willingly I go.
My lords, if you will visit me at Chelsea,
We'll go a-fishing, and with a cunning<sup>239</sup> net,
Not like weak film, we'll catch none but the great.
Farewell, my noble lords. Why, this is right.
Good morrow to the sun, to state goodnight.

*Exit.PALMER

Will you subscribe, my lords?

SURREY

100 Instantly, good Sir Thomas.
They write.
We'll bring the writing unto our Sovereign.

PALMER

My Lord of Rochester,
You must with me, to answer this contempt.

ROCHESTER

This is the worst;
Who's freed from life, is from all care exempt.
Exeunt Rochester and Palmer.

SURREY

105 Now let us [bear this]<sup>240</sup> to our Sovereign.
'Tis strange that my Lord Chancellor should refuse

The duty that the law of God bequeaths Unto the King.

SHREWSBURY

Come, let us in. No doubt
His mind will alter, and the bishop's too.
Error in learned heads hath much to do. 110
[Exeunt.]

4.2

Enter the Lady More, her two daughters, and Master Roper, as walking.

ROPER

Madam, what ails ye for to look so sad?

LADY MORE

Troth, son, I know not what. I am not sick,
And yet I am not well. I would be merry,
But somewhat<sup>241</sup> lies so heavy on my heart,
I cannot choose but sigh. You are a scholar. 5
I pray ye tell me, may one credit<sup>242</sup> dreams?

ROPER

Why ask you that, dear madam?

LADY MORE

Because tonight I had the strangest dream
That e'er my sleep was troubled with. 10
Methought 'twas night,
And that the King and Queen went on the Thames
In barges to hear music. My lord and I
Were in a little boat, methought. Lord, Lord, What strange things live in slumbers! And being near,
We grappled<sup>243</sup> to the barge that bare the King. 15
But after many pleasing voices spent
In that still-moving music house, methought
The violence of the stream did sever us
Quite from the golden fleet, and hurried us Unto the Bridge,<sup>244</sup> which with unused<sup>245</sup> horror 20
We entered at full tide; thence some flight-shoot<sup>246</sup>
Being carried by the waves, our boat stood still Just opposite the Tower, and there it turned
And turned about, as when a whirlpool sucks
The circled waters. Methought that we both cried 25
Till that we sunk, where arm in arm we died.

239 skillfully made 240 Shirley's emendation 241 something

242 trust 243 attached our boats
244 London Bridge 245 unusual

246 swift rush of water

ROPER

Give no respect,<sup>247</sup> dear madam, to fond dreams;
They are but slight illusions of the blood.

LADY MORE

Tell me not all are so, for often dreams
30 Are true diviners,<sup>248</sup> either of good or ill.
I cannot be in quiet<sup>249</sup> till I hear
How my lord fares.

ROPER (Aside.)

Nor I. [Aside to his wife.]
Come hither, wife.

I will not fright thy mother to interpret
The nature of a dream; but trust me, sweet, 35 This night I have been troubled with thy father
Beyond all thought.

ROPER'S WIFE [Aside to Roper.]

Truly, and so have I.
Methought I saw him here in Chelsea church,
Standing upon the rood loft, now defaced,
And whilst he kneeled and prayed before the image,
40 It fell with him into the upper choir,
Where my poor father lay all stained in blood.

ROPER [Aside to his wife.]

Our dreams all meet in one conclusion:
Fatal, I fear.

LADY MORE

What's that you talk? I pray ye let me know it.

ROPER'S WIFE

45 Nothing, good mother.

LADY MORE

This is your fashion still; I must know nothing.
Call Master Catesby; he shall straight to Court
And see how my lord does. I shall not rest Until my heart lean panting on his breast.

Enter Sir Thomas More merrily, servants attending.

SECOND DAUGHTER

50 See where my father comes, joyful and merry.

MORE

As seamen, having passed a troubled storm, Dance on the pleasant shore, so I— Oh, I could speak

Now like a poet. Now, afore God, I am passing light.<sup>250</sup>

Wife, give me kind welcome. [Kissing her.]

Thou wast wont to blame

My kissing, when my beard was in the stubble, 55
But I have been trimmed of late; I have had A smooth Court shaving, in good faith I have.

Daughters kneel.

God bless ye. Son Roper, give me your hand.

ROPER

Your honor's welcome home.

MORE

Honor? Ha, ha!

And how dost, wife?

ROPER

He bears himself most strangely. 60

LADY MORE

Will your lordship in?

MORE

Lordship? No, wife, that's gone.

The ground was slight that we did lean upon.

LADY MORE

Lord, that your honor ne'er will leave these jests!
In faith, it ill becomes ye.

MORE

O good wife,

Honor and jests are both together fled; 65
The merriest councilor of England's dead.

LADY MORE

Who's that, my lord?

MORE

Still "lord?" The Lord Chancellor, wife.

LADY MORE

That's you.

MORE

Certain, but I have changed my life.

Am I not leaner than I was before?

The fat is gone; my title's only "More." 70

Contented with one style,<sup>251</sup> I'll live at rest.

They that have many names are not still<sup>252</sup> best.

I have resigned mine office; count'st me not wise?

LADY MORE

O God!

MORE

75 Come, breed not female children in your eyes.
The King will have it so.

LADY MORE

What's the offense?

MORE

Tush, let that pass; we'll talk of that anon.
The King seems a physician to my fate;
His princely mind would train me back to state.

ROPER

80 Then be his patient, my most honored father.

MORE

O son Roper,
Ubi turpis est medicina, sanari piget.<sup>253</sup>
No, wife, be merry, and be merry all.
You smiled at rising; weep not at my fall.
85 Let's in, and here joy<sup>254</sup> like to private friends,
Since days of pleasure have repentant ends.
The light of greatness is with triumph borne;
It sets at midday oft, with public scorn. Exeunt.

4.3

Enter the Bishop of Rochester, Surrey, Shrewsbury, Lieutenant of the Tower and warders with weapons.

ROCHESTER

Your kind persuasions, honorable lords,
I can but thank ye for, but in this breast
There lives a soul that aims at higher things
Than temporary pleasing earthly kings.
5 God bless his Highness, even with all my heart;
We shall meet one day, though that now we part.

SURREY

We not misdoubt<sup>255</sup> your wisdom can discern
What best befits it; yet in love and zeal
We could entreat it might be otherwise.

SHREWSBURY

10 No doubt your fatherhood will by yourself
Consider better of the present case,
And grow as great in favor as before.

ROCHESTER

For that, as pleaseth God, in my restraint
From worldly causes, I shall better see
Into myself than at proud liberty. 15
The Tower and I will privately confer
Of things wherein at freedom I may err.
But I am troublesome unto your honors,
And hold ye longer than becomes my duty.
Master Lieutenant, I am now your charge, 20
And though you keep my body, yet my love
Waits on my king and you while Fisher lives.

SURREY

Farewell, my Lord of Rochester. We'll pray
For your release, and labor't as we may.

SHREWSBURY

Thereof assure yourself. So do we leave ye, 25
And to your happy private thoughts bequeath ye.
Exeunt lords.

ROCHESTER

Now, Master Lieutenant, on; i' God's name, go.
And with as glad a mind go I with you,
As ever truant bade the school adieu.
Exeunt.

4.4

*Enter Sir Thomas More, his Lady, daughters, Master Roper, gentlemen and servants,
as in his house at Chelsea. Low stools.*

MORE

Good morrow, good son Roper. [To Lady More.]
Sit, good madam,
Upon an humble seat; the time so craves.
Rest your good heart on earth, the roof of graves.
You see the floor of greatness is uneven,
The cricket<sup>256</sup> and high throne alike near heaven. 5
Now, daughters, you that like to branches spread
And give best shadow to a private house,
Be comforted, my girls. Your hopes stand fair:
Virtue breeds gentry; she makes the best heir.

DAUGHTERS

Good morrow to your honor.

<sup>253</sup> Creon's words to King Oedipus from Seneca's Oedipus, 517: "When the remedy is shameful, one hates being cured." Tilney crossed out this quotation. <sup>254</sup> joy...to:

have joy characteristic of <sup>255</sup> (do not) doubt <sup>256</sup> low stool

- MORE
 10 Nay, good night rather.
 Your honor's crestfall'n with your happy father.
- ROPER
 O, what formality, what square<sup>257</sup> observance Lives in a little room! Here public care
 Gags<sup>258</sup> not the eyes of slumber; here fierce riot 15 Ruffles<sup>259</sup> not proudly in a coat of trust,
 Whilst like a pawn at chess he keeps in rank
 With kings and mighty fellows. Yet indeed
 Those men that stand on tiptoe smile to see Him pawn his fortunes.
- MORE
 20 True, son, here[’s not so,]<sup>260</sup>
 Nor does the wanton tongue<sup>261</sup> here screw itself
 Into the ear, that like a vice drinks up
 The iron instrument.
- LADY MORE
 We are here at peace.
- MORE
 Then peace,<sup>262</sup> good wife.
- LADY MORE
 25 For keeping still in compass — a strange point
 In time's new navigation — we have sailed Beyond our course.
- MORE
 Have done.
- LADY MORE
 We are exiled the Court.
- MORE
 Still thou harp'st on that.
 'Tis sin for to deserve that banishment;
 But he that ne'er knew Court, courts sweet content.
- LADY MORE
 O, but, dear husband —
- MORE
 30 I will not hear thee, wife.
 The winding labyrinth of thy strange discourse
 Will ne'er have end. Sit still and, my good wife, Entreat thy tongue be still, or credit me,
- Thou shalt not understand a word we speak;
 We'll talk in Latin.
 [To Roper.] Humida vallis raras patitur fulminis ictus.<sup>263</sup>
 More rest enjoys the subject meanly bred
 Than he that bears the kingdom in his head.
 Great men are still musicians, else the world lies:
 They learn low strains after the notes that rise. 35
- ROPER
 Good sir, be still yourself, and but remember
 How in this general court of short-lived pleasure,
 The world, creation is the ample food
 That is digested in the maw<sup>264</sup> of time.
 If man himself be subject to such ruin, 45
 How shall his garment then, or the loose points
 That tie respect unto his awe-full place,
 Avoid destruction? Most honored father-in-law,
 The blood you have bequeathed these several hearts
 To nourish your posterity stands firm, 50
 And as with joy you led us first to rise,
 So with like hearts we'll lock preferment's eyes.<sup>265</sup>
- MORE
 Now will I speak like More in melancholy:
 For if grief's power could with her sharpest darts
 Pierce my firm bosom, here's sufficient cause 55
 To take my farewell of mirth's hurtless laws.
 Poor humbled lady, thou that wert of late Placed with the noblest women of the land,
 Invited to their angel companies,
 Seeming a bright star in the courtly sphere: 60
 Why shouldst thou like a widow sit thus low
 And all thy fair consorts move from the clouds
 That overdrip thy beauty and thy worth?
 I'll tell thee the true cause: the Court, like heaven,
 Examines not the anger of the prince, 65
 And being more frail compos'd of gilded earth,
 Shines upon them on whom the King doth shine,
 Smiles if he smile, declines if he decline.
 Yet seeing both are mortal, Court and King,
 Shed not one tear for any earthly thing; 70
 For, so God pardon me, in my saddest hour
 Thou hast no more occasion to lament —
 Nor these, nor those — my exile from the Court,
 No, nor this body's torture were't imposed —

257 solemn, precise 258 props open 259 swaggers 260 Gabrieli and Melchiori's emendation 261 wanton tongue:

lawless or insolent speech 262 hold your peace 263 From Seneca's Hippolytus, lines 1132-33: "The soggy lowland is rarely hit by lightning bolts." 264 belly 265 lock preferment's eyes: close the eyes to advancement

75 As commonly disgraces of great men
 Are the forewarnings of a hasty death—
 Than to behold me after many a toil
 Honor'd with endless rest. Perchance the King,
 Seeing the Court is full of vanity,
 80 Has pity lest our souls should be misled,
 And sends us to a life contemplative.
 O, happy banishment from worldly pride,
 When souls by private life are sanctified.

LADY MORE

O, but I fear some plot against your life!

MORE

85 Why then, 'tis thus: the King of his high grace,
 Seeing my faithful service to his state,
 Intends to send me to the King of heaven
 For a rich present, where my soul shall prove
 A true rememb'rer of his Majesty.
 Come, prithee mourn not; the worst chance is 90 death,
 And that brings endless joy for fickle breath.

LADY MORE

Ah, but your children!

MORE

Tush, let them alone.
 Say they be stripped from this poor painted cloth,
 This outside of the earth, left houseless, bare;
 95 They have minds instructed how to gather more.
 There's no man that's ingenuous can be poor.
 And therefore, do not weep, my little ones,
 Though you lose all the earth; keep your souls even
 And you shall find inheritance in heaven.
 100 But for my servants, there's my chiefest care.
 [To Catesby.] Come hither, faithful steward. Be not griev'd
 That in thy person I discharge both thee
 And all thy other fellow officers,
 For my great master hath discharged me.
 105 If thou by serving me hast suffer'd loss,
 Then benefit thyself by leaving me.
 I hope thou hast not, for such times as these Bring gain to officers, whoever leese.<sup>266</sup>
 Great lords have only name, but in their fall 110 Lord Spend-All's steward's Master Gathers-All.
 But I suspect not thee. Admit thou hast.

It's good the servants save when masters waste.
 But you, poor gentlemen, that had no place
 T'enrich yourselves but by loathed bribery,
 Which I abhorred and never found you loved, 115
 Think, when an oak falls, underwood shrinks down

And yet may live, though bruised. I pray ye, strive
 To shun my ruin, for the axe is set
 Even at my root, to fell me to the ground.
 The best I can do to prefer you all 120
 With my mean store expect, for Heaven can tell
 That More loves all his followers more than well.

Enter a servant.

SERVANT

My lord, there are new-lighted<sup>267</sup> at the gate
 The Earls of Surrey and of Shrewsbury,
 And they expect you in the inner court. 125

MORE

Entreat their lordships come into the hall.

LADY MORE

O God, what news with them?

MORE

Why, how now, wife?

They are but come to visit their old friend.

LADY MORE

O God, I fear, I fear.

MORE

What shouldst thou fear, fond<sup>268</sup> woman? 130
Iustum si fractus illabatur orbis, impavidum ferient ruinae.<sup>269</sup>

Here let me live estranged from great men's looks:
 They are like golden flies on leaden hooks.

Enter the Earls of Surrey and Shrewsbury, Downes with his mace, and attendants.

SHREWSBURY

Good morrow, good Sir Thomas.

SURREY [To Lady More.]

Good day, good madam. (Kind salutations.)

MORE

Welcome, my good lords. 135

What ails your lordships look so melancholy?
 Oh, I know: you live in Court, and the Court diet
 Is only friend to physic.<sup>270</sup>

<sup>266</sup> lose <sup>267</sup> just dismantled

<sup>268</sup> foolish <sup>269</sup> "Even if the world falls apart, the ruin will not strike fear in the heart of the just man." See Horace's ode on "Justice and Steadfastness of Purpose," 3.3.1, 7–8. <sup>270</sup> medicine

SURREY

O Sir Thomas,
Our words are now the King's, and our sad<sup>271</sup> looks

140 The interest<sup>272</sup> of your love. We are sent to you
From our mild Sovereign, once more to demand
If you'll subscribe unto those articles
He sent ye th'other day. Be well advised,
For on mine honor, lord, grave Doctor Fisher,
145 Bishop of Rochester, at the self-same instant
Attached<sup>273</sup> with you, is sent unto the Tower
For the like obstinacy; his Majesty
Hath only sent you prisoner to your house.
But if you now refuse for to subscribe,
A stricter course will follow.

LADY MORE

150 O dear husband!
Kneeling and weeping.

DAUGHTERS

Dear Father!

MORE

See, my lords,
This partner and these subjects to my flesh Prove rebels to my conscience. But, my good lords,
If I refuse, must I unto the Tower?

SHREWSBURY

155 You must, my lord. Here is an officer Ready for to arrest you of high treason.

LADY MORE AND DAUGHTERS

O God, O God!

ROPER

Be patient, good madam.

MORE

Ay, Downes, is't thou? I once did save thy life,
When else by cruel riotous assault
160 Thou hadst been torn in pieces. Thou art reserved
To be my summoner to yond spiritual court.
Give me thy hand, good fellow. Smooth thy face.<sup>274</sup>
The diet that thou drink'st is spiced with mace,<sup>275</sup>
And I could ne'er abide it. 'Twill not disgest; 165 'Twill lie too heavy, man, on my weak breast.

SHREWSBURY

Be brief, my lord, for we are limited
Unto an hour.

MORE

Unto an hour? 'Tis well,
The bell, earth's thunder, soon shall toll my knell.<sup>276</sup>

LADY MORE (Kneeling.)

Dear loving husband, if you respect<sup>277</sup> not me,
Yet think upon your daughters.

MORE

Wife, stand up. 170
I have bethought me,
And I'll now satisfy the King's good pleasure.

DAUGHTERS

Oh, happy alteration!

SHREWSBURY

Come then, subscribe, my lord.

SURREY

I am right glad of this your fair conversion.

MORE

Oh, pardon me, 175
I will subscribe to go unto the Tower
With all submissive willingness, and thereto add
My bones to strengthen the foundation
Of Julius Caesar's palace. Now, my lord, I'll satisfy the King even with my blood, 180
Nor will I wrong your patience. Friend, do thine office.<sup>278</sup>

DOWNES

Sir Thomas More, Lord Chancellor of England,
I arrest you in the King's name of high treason.

MORE

Gramercies,<sup>279</sup> friend.
To a great prison, to discharge<sup>280</sup> the strife 185
Commenced 'twixt conscience and my frailer life,
More now must march. Chelsea, adieu, adieu.
Strange farewell; thou shalt ne'er more see More true,
For I shall ne'er see thee more. Servants, farewell.
Wife, mar not thine indifferent<sup>281</sup> face; be wise. 190
More's widow's husband, he must make thee rise.

271 grave; unhappy 272 concern for;
claim upon 273 arrested 274 smooth thy face: take a calm expression 275 a nutmeg spice; swindling 276 the toll of a funeral bell; death knell 277 show consideration for 278 duty 279 Great thanks 280 relieve 281 unemotional

Daughters, [...] what's here, what's here?
 Mine eye had almost parted with a tear.
 Dear son, possess my virtue, that I ne'er gave.
 195 Grave More thus lightly walks to a quick grave.

ROPER

Curae leves loquuntur, ingentes stupent.<sup>282</sup>

MORE

You that way in; mind you my course in prayer.
 By water I to prison, to heaven through air.

Exeunt.

5.1

Enter the Warders of the Tower with halberds.

FIRST WARDER

Ho, make a guard there!

SECOND WARDER

Master Lieutenant gives a strait command
 The people be avoided<sup>283</sup> from the bridge.

THIRD WARDER

From whence is he committed,<sup>284</sup> who can tell?

FIRST WARDER

5 From Durham House, I hear.

SECOND WARDER

The guard were waiting there an hour ago.

THIRD WARDER

If he stay long, he'll not get near the wharf,
 There's such a crowd of boats upon the Thames.

FIRST WARDER

10 Well, be it spoken without offense to any,
 A wiser or more virtuous gentleman
 Was never bred in England.

SECOND WARDER

I think the poor will bury him in tears.
 I never heard a man since I was born
 So generally bewailed of everyone.

Enter a poor woman.

THIRD WARDER

15 What means this woman? — Whither dost thou press?

FIRST WARDER

This woman will be trod to death anon.

SECOND WARDER

What makest thou here?

WOMAN

To speak with that good man Sir Thomas More.

FIRST WARDER

To speak with him? He's not Lord Chancellor.

WOMAN

The more's the pity, sir, if it pleased God. 20

FIRST WARDER

Therefore if thou hast a petition to deliver,
 Thou mayst keep it now, for anything I know.

WOMAN

I am a poor woman, and have had, God knows,
 A suit this two year in the Chancery,<sup>285</sup>
 And he hath all the evidence I have, 25
 Which should I lose, I am utterly undone.

FIRST WARDER

Faith, and I fear thou'lt hardly come by 'em now.
 I am sorry for thee even with all my heart.

Enter the Lords of Shrewsbury and Surrey with Sir Thomas More and attendants, and enter Lieutenant and Gentleman Porter.

SECOND WARDER

Woman, stand back; you must avoid this place.
 The lords must pass this way into the Tower. 30

MORE

I thank your lordships for your pains thus far
 To my strong house.

WOMAN

Now, good Sir Thomas More, for Christ's dear sake,
 Deliver me my writings back again
 That do concern my title. 35

MORE

What, my old client, art thou got hither too?
 Poor silly<sup>286</sup> wretch, I must confess indeed
 I had such writings as concern thee near,
 But the King has ta'en the matter into his own
 hand;

<sup>282</sup> Seneca's Hippolytus, 607: "Silly worries speak, serious ones are silent."

<sup>283</sup> removed <sup>284</sup> imprisoned <sup>285</sup> i.e., in the court of the Lord Chancellor

<sup>286</sup> deserving of pity

40 He has all I had. Then, woman, sue to him.
I cannot help thee; thou must bear with me.

WOMAN

Ah, gentle heart, my soul for thee is sad.
Farewell, the best friend that the poor e'er had.

Exit.

GENTLEMAN PORTER

Before you enter through the Tower gate,
45 Your upper garment, sir, belongs to me.

MORE

Sir, you shall have it; there it is.
He gives him his cap.

GENTLEMAN PORTER

The upmost on your back, sir. You mistake me.

MORE

Sir, now I understand ye very well.
But that you name my back,
[He gives him his cloak.]
50 Sure else my cap had been the uppermost.

SHREWSBURY

Farewell, kind lord. God send us merry meeting.

MORE

Amen, my lord.

SURREY

Farewell, dear friend. I hope your safe return.

MORE

My lord, and my dear fellow in the Muses, 55 Farewell. Farewell, most noble poet.

LIEUTENANT

Adieu, most honored lords.

Exeunt lords.

MORE

Fair prison, welcome. Yet methinks,
For thy fair building, 'tis too foul a name.
Many a guilty soul, and many an innocent,
60 Have breathed their farewell to thy hollow rooms.
I oft have entered into thee this way,
Yet, I thank God, ne'er with a clearer conscience
Than at this hour.
This is my comfort yet: how hard soe'er
65 My lodging prove, the cry of the poor suitor, Fatherless orphan or distressed widow

Shall not disturb me in my quiet sleep.
On then, i' God's name, to our close<sup>287</sup> abode;
God is as strong here as he is abroad. Exeunt.

5.2

Enter Butler, Brewer, Porter, and Horsekeeper several ways.

BUTLER

Robin Brewer, how now, man? What cheer, what cheer?

BREWER

Faith, Ned Butler, sick of thy disease, and these our other fellows here, Ralph Horsekeeper and Giles Porter: sad, sad. They say my lord goes to his trial 5 today.

HORSEKEEPER

To it, man? Why, he is now at it. God send him well to speed.<sup>288</sup>

PORTER

Amen. Even as I wish to mine own soul, so speed it with my honorable lord and master, Sir Thomas 10
More.

BUTLER

I cannot tell; I have nothing to do with matters above my capacity,<sup>289</sup> but as God judge me, if I might speak my mind, I think there lives not a more harmless gentleman in the universal world. 15

BREWER

Nor a wiser, nor a merrier, nor an honest. Go to; I'll put that in upon mine own knowledge.

PORTER

Nay, an ye bate him his due of<sup>290</sup> his housekeeping, hang ye all. Have ye many lord chancellors comes in debt at the year's end, and for very housekeeping? 20

HORSEKEEPER

Well, he was too good a lord for us, and therefore,
I fear, God himself will take him. But I'll be hanged if ever I have such another service.

BREWER

Soft, man, we are not discharged yet. My lord may come home again and all will be well. 25

287 closed up, secret, hidden 288 success; ability 290 an... due of: if you don't give good fortune 289 competence, mental him credit for

BUTLER

I much mistrust<sup>291</sup> it; when they go to 'raigning<sup>292</sup> once, there's ever foul weather for a great while after.

Enter Gough and Catesby with a paper.

But soft, here comes Master Gough and Master
Catesby. Now we shall hear more.

HORSEKEEPER

30 Before God, they are very sad; I doubt<sup>293</sup> my lord is condemned.

PORTER

God bless his soul, and a fig<sup>294</sup> then for all worldly condemnation!

GOUGH

Well said, Giles Porter; I commend thee for it;
35 'Twas spoken like a well-affected<sup>295</sup> servant
Of him that was a kind lord to us all.

CATESBY

Which now no more he shall be, for, dear fellows,
Now we are masterless. Though he may live
So long as please the King, but law hath made him
A dead man to the world, and given the axe his 40 head,
But his sweet soul to live among the saints.

GOUGH

Let us entreat ye to go call together
The rest of your sad fellows — by the roll
You're just seven score<sup>296</sup> — and tell them what ye hear
45 A virtuous honorable lord hath done
Even for the meanest follower that he had.
This writing found my lady in his study
This instant<sup>297</sup> morning, wherein is set down
Each servant's name, according to his place
50 And office in the house. On every man
He frankly<sup>298</sup> hath bestown twenty nobles,
The best and worst together, all alike,
Which Master Catesby here forth will pay ye.

CATESBY

Take it, as it is meant, a kind remembrance
55 Of a far kinder lord, with whose sad fall
He gives up house, and farewell to us all.
Thus the fair-spreading oak falls not alone,
But all the neighbor plants and under-trees

Are crushed down with his weight. No more of this,

Come and receive your due, and after go 60
Fellow-like hence, co-partners of one woe.

Exeunt.

5.3

Enter Sir Thomas More, the lieutenant, and a servant attending, as in his chamber in the Tower.

MORE

Master Lieutenant, is the warrant come?
If it be so, i' God's name, let us know it.

LIEUTENANT

My lord, it is.

MORE

'Tis welcome, sir, to me, with all my heart.
His blessed will be done. 5

LIEUTENANT

Your wisdom, sir, hath been so well approved,<sup>299</sup>
And your fair patience in imprisonment
Hath ever shown such constancy of mind
And Christian resolution in all troubles,
As warrants us you are not unprepared. 10

MORE

No, Master Lieutenant, I thank my God
I have peace of conscience, though the world and I
Are at a little odds. But we'll be even now, I hope, Ere long. When is the execution<sup>300</sup> of your warrant?

LIEUTENANT

Tomorrow morning.

MORE

So, sir, I thank ye. 15
I have not lived so ill I fear to die.
Master Lieutenant,
I have had a sore fit of the stone<sup>301</sup> tonight,
But the King hath sent me such a rare receipt,<sup>302</sup>
I thank him, as I shall not need to fear it much. 20

LIEUTENANT

In life and death, still merry Sir Thomas More.

291 doubt 292 arraignment, trying; puns on raining 293 fear 294 a fig: term of contempt 295 cherished 296 seven score: 140 297 very same 298 freely 299 demonstrated 300 issuance (with pun on a warrant of execution)

301 sore . . . stone: grievous pain from kidney stones 302 prescription

MORE [To Servant.]

Sirrah, fellow, reach me the urinal.

He gives it him.

Ha, let me see. [There's]<sup>303</sup> gravel in the water, [Faith, there's no instant jeopardy in that.]

25 The man were likely to live long enough,
So pleased the King. Here, fellow, take it.

SERVANT

Shall I go with it to the doctor, sir?

MORE

No, save thy labor; we'll cozen<sup>304</sup> him of a fee.
Thou shalt see me take a dram<sup>305</sup> tomorrow morning

30 Shall cure the stone I warrant, doubt it not.
Master Lieutenant, what news of my Lord of Rochester?

LIEUTENANT

Yesterday morning was he put to death.

MORE

The peace of soul sleep with him.
He was a learned and a reverend prelate,
35 And a rich man, believe me.

LIEUTENANT

If he were rich, what is Sir Thomas More,
That all this while hath been Lord Chancellor?

MORE

Say ye so, Master Lieutenant? What do you think
A man that with my time had held my place
40 Might purchase?<sup>306</sup>

LIEUTENANT

Perhaps, my lord, two thousand pound a year.

MORE

Master Lieutenant, I protest to you
I never had the means in all my life
To purchase one poor hundred pound a year.
45 I think I am the poorest chancellor
That ever was in England, though I could wish,
For credit of the place, that my estate were better.

LIEUTENANT

It's very strange.

MORE

It will be found as true.

I think, sir, that with most part of my coin
I have purchased as strange commodities 50
As ever you heard tell of in your life.

LIEUTENANT

Commodities, my lord?

Might I, without offense, enquire of them?

MORE

Crutches, Master Lieutenant, and bare<sup>307</sup> cloaks,
For halting soldiers and poor needy scholars, 55
Have had my gettings in the Chancery.
To think but what a cheat<sup>308</sup> the Crown shall have
By my attainder!<sup>309</sup>

I prithee, if thou beest a gentleman,
60 Get but a copy of my inventory.
That part of poet that was given me
Made me a very unthrift;
For this is the disease attends us all:
Poets were never thrifty, never shall.

Enter Lady More mourning, daughters, Master Roper.

LIEUTENANT

O noble More — 65
My lord, your wife, your son-in-law, and daughters.

MORE

Son Roper, welcome; welcome, wife and girls.
Why do you weep? Because I live at ease?
Did you not see, when I was chancellor,
70 I was so cloyed<sup>310</sup> with suitors every hour
I could not sleep, nor dine, nor sup in quiet?
Here's none of this; here I can sit and talk
With my honest keeper half a day together,
Laugh and be merry. Why then should you weep?

ROPER

These tears, my lord, for this your long restraint 75
Hope had dried up with comfort that we yet,
Although imprisoned, might have had your life.

MORE

To live in prison, what a life were that?
The King, I thank him, loves me more than so.
80 Tomorrow I shall be at liberty

303 Shirley's emendation, and the next 304 cheat 305 draught of medicine 306 acquire 307 threadbare

308 escheat; reversion of property to a feudal lord 309 legal consequences of a treason conviction — in this case, forfeiture of property 310 encumbered

To go even whither I can,
After I have dispatched my business.

LADY MORE

Ah husband, husband, yet submit yourself.
Have care of your poor wife and children.

MORE

85 Wife, so I have, and I do leave you all
To his protection hath the power to keep You safer than I can,
The father of the widow and the orphan.

ROPER

90 The world, my lord, hath ever held you wise,
And 't shall be no distaste unto your wisdom
To yield to the opinion of the state.

MORE

I have deceived myself, I must acknowledge;
And as you say, son Roper, to confess the same
It will be no disparagement at all.

LADY MORE

95 His Highness shall be certified<sup>311</sup> thereof, immediately. Offering to depart.

MORE

Nay, hear me, wife; first let me tell ye how
I thought to have had a barber for my beard.
Now I remember that were labor lost:
The headsman now shall cut off head and all.

ROPER'S WIFE

100 Father, his Majesty upon your meek submission
Will yet, they say, receive you to his grace
In as great credit<sup>312</sup> as you were before.

MORE

105 ['Tis so indeed,]<sup>313</sup> wench. Faith, my lord the King
Has appointed me to do a little business.
If that were past, my girl, thou then shouldst see
What I would say to him about that matter.
But I shall be so busy until then, I shall not tend it.

DAUGHTERS

Ah, my dear father.

LADY MORE

Dear lord and husband.

MORE

Be comforted, good wife, to live and love my children,

For with thee leave I all my care of them. 110
Son Roper, for my sake that have loved thee well,
And for her virtue's sake, cherish my child.

Girl, be not proud, but of<sup>314</sup> thy husband's love Ever retain thy virtuous modesty.

That modesty is such a comely garment 115

As it is never out of fashion, sits as fair
Upon the meaner woman as the empress.

No stuff that gold can buy is half so rich,
Nor ornament that so becomes a woman.

Live all, and love together, and thereby 120
You give your father a rich obsequy.

DAUGHTERS

Your blessing, dear father.

MORE

I must be gone —
God bless you — to talk with God, who now doth call.

LADY MORE

Ah, my dear husband!

MORE

Sweet wife, good night, good night.
God send us all his everlasting light. 125

ROPER

I think before this hour,
More heavy hearts ne'er parted in the Tower. Exeunt.

5.4

Enter the sheriffs of London and their officers at one door, the warders with their halberds at another.

FIRST SHERIFF

Officers, what time of day is 't?

OFFICER

Almost eight o'clock.

SECOND SHERIFF

We must make haste then, lest we stay too long.

FIRST WARDER

Good morrow, Master Shrieves of London.
Master Lieutenant

5 Wills ye repair to the limits of the Tower,
There to receive your prisoner.

FIRST SHERIFF [To Officer.]

Go back, and tell his Worship we are ready.

SECOND SHERIFF

Go bid the officers make clear the way,
There may be passage for the prisoner.
Enter Lieutenant and his guard with More.

MORE

10 Yet God be thanked; here's a fair day toward<sup>315</sup>
To take our journey in. Master Lieutenant,
It were fair walking on the Tower leads.

LIEUTENANT

An so it might have liked my Sovereign Lord,
I would to God you might have walked there still. He weeps.

MORE

15 Sir, we are walking to a better place.
O sir, your kind and loving tears
Are like sweet odors to embalm your friend.
Thank your good lady; since I was your guest
She has made me a very wanton,<sup>316</sup> in good sooth.

LIEUTENANT

Oh, I had hoped we should not yet have parted.

MORE

20 But I must leave ye for a little while.
Within an hour or two you may look for me,
But there will be so many come to see me
That I shall be so proud I will not speak.
And sure my memory is grown so ill
25 I fear I shall forget my head behind me.

LIEUTENANT

God and his blessed angels be about ye.
Here, Master Shrieves, receive your prisoner.

MORE

30 Good morrow, Master Shrieves of London, to ye both.
I thank ye that ye will vouchsafe<sup>317</sup> to meet me.
I see by this you have not quite forgot
That I was in times past as you are now:
A sheriff of London.

FIRST SHERIFF

Sir, then you know our duty doth require it.

MORE

I know it well, sir, else I would have been glad
You might have saved a labor at this time. 35
[To Second Sheriff.] Ah, Master Sheriff,
You and I have been of old acquaintance.
You were a patient auditor<sup>318</sup> of mine
When I read the divinity lecture at Saint Lawrence's.<sup>319</sup>

SECOND SHERIFF

40 Sir Thomas More,
I have heard you oft, as many other did,
To our great comfort.

MORE

Pray God, you may so now, with all my heart.
And, as I call to mind,
When I studied the law in Lincoln's Inn, 45
I was of counsel<sup>320</sup> with ye in a cause.

[FIRST] SHERIFF

I was about to say so, good Sir Thomas.
[ ]<sup>321</sup>

MORE

Oh, is this the place?
I promise ye, it is a goodly scaffold. 50
In sooth, I am come about a headless errand,
For I have not much to say, now I am here.
Well, let's ascend, i' God's name.
[To the Hangman.] In troth, methinks your stair is somewhat weak.
I prithee, honest friend, lend me thy hand 55
To help me up. As for my coming down,
Let me alone; I'll look to that myself.

As he is going up the stairs, enters the Earls of Surrey and Shrewsbury.

MORE

My lords of Surrey and of Shrewsbury, give me your hands yet before we part. Ye see, though it pleaseth the King to raise me thus high, yet I am not 60 proud, for the higher I mount, the better I can see my friends about me. I am now on a far voyage, and this strange wooden horse must bear me thither;
yet I perceive by your looks you like my bargain so

315 coming, about to be 316 spoil child 317 graciously agree 318 listener 319 More's delivered lectures on

Augustine's City of God, at St. Lawrence Jewry in 1501. 320 of counsel: worked together in a legal capacity 321 This line was lost due to manuscript damage.

65 ill that there's not one of ye all dare venture with me. (Walking.) Truly, here's a most sweet gallery; I like the air of it better than my garden at Chelsea.
By your patience, good people that have pressed thus into my bedchamber, if you'll not trouble me, 70 I'll take a sound sleep here.

SHREWSBURY

My lord, 'twere good you'd publish<sup>322</sup> to the world
Your great offense unto his Majesty.

MORE

My lord, I'll bequeath this legacy to the hangman, and do it instantly. (Gives him his gown.) I confess his 75 Majesty hath been ever good to me, and my offense to his Highness makes me, of<sup>323</sup> a state pleader, a stage player (though I am old, and have a bad voice) to act this last scene of my tragedy. I'll send him for my trespass a reverent head, somewhat bald, for it 80 is not requisite any head should stand covered to so high majesty. If that content him not, because I think my body will then do me small pleasure, let him but bury it and take it.

SURREY

My lord, my lord, hold conference with your soul.
85 You see, my lord, the time of life is short.

MORE

I see it, my good lord; I dispatched that business the last night. I come hither only to be let blood;<sup>324</sup> my doctor here tells me it is good for the headache.

HANGMAN

I beseech ye, my lord, forgive me.

MORE

90 Forgive thee, honest fellow? Why?

HANGMAN

For your death, my lord.

MORE

Oh, my death. I had rather it were in thy power to forgive me, for thou hast the sharpest action against me. The law, my honest friend, lies in thy hands now.
95 (Gives his purse.) Here's thy fee, and, my good fellow, let my suit be dispatched presently; for 'tis all one pain to die a lingering death and to live in the continual mill of a lawsuit. But I can tell thee, my neck is so short that if thou shouldst behead an hundred noblemen like myself, thou wouldst ne'er get 100 credit<sup>325</sup> by it. Therefore—look ye, sir—do it hand-somerly,<sup>326</sup> or of my word thou shalt never deal with me hereafter.

HANGMAN

I'll take an order for that, my lord.

MORE

One thing more: take heed thou cut'st not off my 105 beard. Oh, I forgot; execution passed upon that last night, and the body of it lies buried in the Tower.— Stay. Is't not possible to make a scape<sup>327</sup> from all this strong guard? It is.

There is a thing within me that will raise 110
And elevate my better part 'bove sight
Of these same weaker eyes. And, Master Shrieves,
For all this troop of steel that tends<sup>328</sup> my death,
I shall break from you, and fly up to heaven.
Let's seek the means for this. 115

HANGMAN

My lord, I pray ye, put off your doublet.

MORE

Speak not so coldly to me; I am hoarse already;
I would be loath, good fellow, to take more.
Point me the block; I ne'er was here before.

HANGMAN

To the east side, my lord.

MORE

Then to the east, 120
We go to sigh; that o'er, to sleep in rest.
Here More forsakes all mirth, good reason why:
The fool of flesh must with her frail life die.
No eye salute my trunk<sup>329</sup> with a sad tear.
Our birth to heaven should be thus: void of fear. 125
Exit.

SURREY

A very learned worthy gentleman
Seals error with his blood. Come, we'll to Court.
Let's sadly hence to perfect<sup>330</sup> unknown fates,
Whilst he tends progress<sup>331</sup> to the state of states.

[Exeunt.]

FINIS.

322 formally acknowledge 323 out of, i.e., from having been 324 let blood: releasing blood was a common prescription for ill patients 325 payment; appreciation 326 properly 327 escape 328 attends 329 headless body 330 fulfill 331 tends progress: makes his way—alluding to a royal progress or journey

ONLINE RESOURCES

See the companion website, www.essentialmore.org, for supporting materials, including:

Study Materials

An ongoing collection of materials developed and used by experienced teachers

Timelines

Detailed accounts of each year from 1529 to 1535, linked to primary sources

E-texts

Full English texts not contained in this volume:

A Response to Luther

The Confutation of Tyndale's Answer 1–9

The Debellation of Salem and Bizance

Nicholas Harpsfield's Life and Death of Sir Thomas More

Full Latin texts not contained in this volume:

Lucian Latin texts

Historia Richardi Tertii

Utopia

Epigrammata

Responsio ad Lutherum

Concordances

For each individual book contained in the Yale CW and for Roger's 1947 Correspondence

A cumulative concordance of More's English works

A cumulative concordance of More's Latin works

A cumulative concordance of More's complete works

Bibliographies

Links to major international bibliographies and Moreana archive materials for over 10,000 items

Thomas More's London

Interactive color map

Writing as plainly declared the truth as I possibly can, which my Declaration of his duty toward your grace & his goodness toward me is hath I understand declared vnto your grace. In any parte of all which my dealing, whither any other man may peradventure put any doubt, or move any scruple of fustie suspicion, that can I neither tell, nor lyeth in my hand to lett, but vnto my selfe as it not possible any parte of my said demeanour to some evil, the very cleynesse of myn owne conscience findeth in all the matre my mynd & intent so good. Wherfore moste gracious soverayn I neither will nor will it can become me, to your signet to reason & argue the matre, but in my most humble matre maner proteste at your gracious face, only beseeche your mercie to your owne sight prudence & your accustomed goodness consider & wey the matre. And then if in your so doing your owne vertuous mynde shall geve you, that notwithstanding the manifold excellent goodnes that your gracious signet hath by so many maner wayes sped vnto me, I be a wretch of such a monstrous ingratitude as could to any of theym all, or with any other person living, disgrasse fro my bounden dutie of allegaunce toward your good grace, than desire I no further fauour at your gracious hand, than the losse of all that ever I may best in this world, good land & libertie, & finally my life wth all wherof the hoping of any parte vnto my selfe, could never do me penyworth of pleasure, but only shold than my recomforte be, that after my short life & your long (which to continuall prosperite to goddy pleasure our lord for his mercy send you) shold my selfe mete to your grace again in heaven & there be merry with you. Wherfore among myn other pleasur this shold yet be one, that your grace shold surely so <sup>note</sup> ffre than that (holo so ever you take me) am your true kydeman, and doer saue beare, & will be till) I say, for so doth yo<sup>r</sup> pleasure be to do by me.

177 187

hold be it if in the considering of my cause, yo<sup>r</sup> high wisdom & grace goodnes perceave (as I verily trust in god you shall) that I know otherwise I have demanded my selfe, than will may stand wth my bounden Duties of faithfullnes toward yo<sup>r</sup> soall maiestie, than in my most humble wis<sup>e</sup> I beseech yo<sup>r</sup> moste noble grace, that the knowledge of yo<sup>r</sup> true gracious persuasion in that behalf, may redde the turmen of my present solymnes, conceived of the dride & feare (by that) how such a greivous bill put by yo<sup>r</sup> learned counsaile in to yo<sup>r</sup> high wt<sup>h</sup> of parliament against me) lest yo<sup>r</sup> grace myght be some sinister informat<sup>ion</sup> be indeed any thing to think the contrary. which if yo<sup>r</sup> highnes do not (as I trust in god & yo<sup>r</sup> great goodnes the more by yo<sup>r</sup> alme high prudence examined & considered you will not) then in my most humble man<sup>er</sup> I beseech yo<sup>r</sup> highnes further (albe it that in respects of my former requeste the offer thing yo<sup>r</sup> very sleight) yet sith yo<sup>r</sup> highnes hath bene before of yo<sup>r</sup> more abundant goodnes hoped & accumulated vpon me (though) I was thereto very far vnwilling fro tyme to tyme both wisshinge & great fond<sup>ly</sup> to resist) now I am left of all such thinge, and no thinge seek a desire but the life to come, & in the meane while pray for yo<sup>r</sup> grace, it may like yo<sup>r</sup> highnes of yo<sup>r</sup> accustomed benignite somewhat to tender my poor soules.
and never suffer by the means of such a bill put forth against me, any man to take occasion hereafter against the trowth to slaunder
me. which thinge I hold yet by the power of thize alme soules do theyr selfe more hurt than me which shall) trust little man harte with yo<sup>r</sup> gracious favo<sup>r</sup> to depend vpon the co<sup>n</sup>forts of the trowth & hope of solym, and not vpon the fallible opinion or some spoken wordes, & least & some chyngeable people, and that Cleop. E. vi.

moste dreade & moste doze soverayn lord, I beseeche the blessed trinite presents yo<sup>r</sup> moste noble grace both in body & soule, and all that are yo<sup>r</sup> well willers, and amound all the contrary. among whome if doe I <sup>for ever have bene one</sup> and thus pray I god that so may with mye open shame & destruction. declares it. At mye p<sup>er</sup>son folowe in cholestiff the fifteth day of march by the knowen ende found of

yo<sup>r</sup> moste humble & moste feyde faythfull submitt & bedeman

Tho. More. ff.

MS. A. 17. 6. 17

WRITINGS OF THOMAS MORE

- ca. 1494 "Pageant Verses"
- 1496–1516 Epigrammata (published with 1518 editions of Utopia)
- ca. 1498 Latin verses for Holt's Lac puerorum
- 1501–35 Correspondence (Latin and English)
- 1503 "Rueful Lamentation"; "A Merry Jest"
- ca. 1504 Letter to John Colet; "Fortune Verses"
- 1505–6 Translations of Lucian (published 1506 with Erasmus)
- 1509 "Coronation Ode" and Epigrams 20–23
- 1510 The Life of John Pico
- 1512–13 Epigrams on Brixius
- ca. 1513 The History of King Richard III (published 1557)
Historia Richardi Tertii (published 1565)
- 1515 Letter to Dorp
- 1516 Utopia
- 1518 Epigrammata
- 1517–22 Poem and letters to his children; Letter to Gonell
- 1518–20 Letters to Oxford (1518), to a Monk, to Lee (1519), and to Brixius (1520)
- ca. 1522 The Four Last Things
- 1523 Responsio ad Lutherum
- 1525–26 Letter to Bugenhagen (published 1568)
- June 1529 A Dialogue of Sir Thomas More, Knight
- Sept. 1529 The Supplication of Souls
- May 1531 A Dialogue of Sir Thomas More, Knight, second edition
- March 1532 The Confutation of Tyndale's Answer 1–3
- Dec. 1532 Letter against Frith (published December 1533)
- Spring 1533 The Confutation of Tyndale's Answer 4–8
- April 1533 The Apology of Sir Thomas More, Knight
- June 1533 Letter to Erasmus, with More's Epitaph
- Nov. 1533 The Debellation of Salem and Bizance
- Dec. 1533 The Answer to a Poisoned Book
- 1534 A Treatise upon the Passion
A Treatise to Receive the Blessed Body
A Dialogue of Comfort against Tribulation
- 1534–35 "Imploring Divine Help against Temptation"
"A Godly Instruction [on How to Treat Those Who Wrong Us]"
"A Godly Meditation [on Detachment]"
- 1535 De tristitia Christi (published 1565; 1557 in Mary Basset's translation)
- July 1535 "A Devout Prayer [before Dying]"
- 1557 The Workes of Sir Thomas More Knight
- 1563 Thomae Mori Lucubrationes
- 1565, 1566 Thomae Mori Opera Omnia

SELECTIVE GLOSSARY

again: in return, in reply; anew albeit (that): although; though it be among (adv): from time to time and (conj): if anon: at once, straightway; directly apace: quickly, at a pace, with speed assay: test, trial; attempt ought: anything

booted: helped, made good but if: unless but that: except that, but; unless by and by: soon, directly, immediately

color: appearance, pretext commodity: benefit, advantage; profit commune (v): talk, confer, tell convenient: appropriate, suitable, proper cunning (n): knowledge, cleverness (adj): learned, clever desire: ask, request

devise: plan, scheme, contrive devoir: duty, best effort diverse: different; sundry; various drift: scheme, device

effectually: thoroughly eftsoons: soon after, again, occasionally eke: also, moreover, in addition else: otherwise
ere: before

fain (adj): glad; obliged, forced; inclined (adv): gladly, willingly, preferably (v): wish, desire; be glad far-forth: see so far-forth fast: steadfast, firm; certain; secure(ly)

fond: foolish
for that: because forasmuch as: seeing that; inasmuch as forsooth: in truth, truly forthwith: immediately, at once froward: unruly, perverse; untoward

ghostly: spiritual gracious: generous, grace-filled grudge: grumble, complain; be discontented guise: custom, habit

hap: happen, occur
haply: perhaps heaviness: sadness, grief, sorrow howbeit (adv): however, nevertheless (conj): although

incontinent: immediately

kind: related by kinship; natural; naturally-well disposed kindness: kinship; natural disposition or affection

lay: allege; ascribe; impute; expound
let (n): hindrance, obstacle (v): hesitate; hinder, prevent like (v): please like (as): just as; likely list: choose; wish; please

manner: way, custom, kind manner wise: kind of way
in (a) manner: so to speak, very nearly marry (interj): indeed; from "by Mary"
maugre: in spite of maugre my teeth: despite my resistance meat: food
meet(ly): fitting(ly); fair(ly) meetly: quite, very (as an intensive) meseems: it seems to me mind: opinion; disposition; intention; judgment
murmur: mutter complaints; accuse

namely: especially naught: wickedness; bad, wicked needs (adv): necessarily nought: nothing

over (prep): beyond, besides;
in addition

pardie (interj): certainly; from "by God" (French)

passing: surpassing, exceeding passion: suffering, agony paynim: pagan peevish: foolish, silly; perverse; capricious peradventure: perhaps percase: perhaps, by chance politic: prudent; shrewd; crafty

quite: completely, fully, utterly rehearse: tell, relate; quote, cite require: request, ask (for) respect: care, consideration, esteem right: very; directly; immediately room: position, office

saving: except scant(ly): hardly, barely seely: pitiable, poor; foolish; helpless set at; set by: regard as; value; esteem
so far-forth: to such an extent
sooth: truth
sore: grievous(ly); harsh(ly); great(ly); intense(ly); severe(ly)
sore (n): sickness; bodily suffering spirituality: clergy stand(eth): remain(s)
states: noblemen
stead: place substance: possessions; wealth; means suffer: allow, permit
sure: safe, secure; certain temporal: civil therefor: for it, for that (reason)

though that: even though towardness: readiness; willingness trains: snares, deceits
troth: faithfulness; trustworthiness; truthfulness; integrity
throw: think, believe, trust, suppose twain: two; together; separately use (v): practice, follow; is accustomed to verily, very: truly, true; full; proper vouchsafe: grant or agree or allow graciously or readily; deign

wanton: undisciplined; lustful; frivolous; reckless ware: aware; wary wax(en): grow(n), become weal, wealth: well-being ween: think, suppose, believe wherefore: why
whereof: of which; by reason of which;
what
which: often means "who"
whoso: whoever; any (one) who wise (n): way, manner
wist: knew wit (n): mind, intellect; ingenuity
wit (v): know
to wit: namely that is to wit: that is to say withal: besides, moreover; therefore, thereby; with or by (it)
wont: accustomed
worship: honor, distinction, renown
wot: know
would (one should): wants (one to) would we (it) should: wants us (it) to